Comand, how armed, and what Colours, Trumpetts, and Drums belongs to each Troope and Company, * * * and whether there be any persons fitt to beare Armes within their respective precincts, not Listed, their Names, and in what quallity they are capable to Serve[.]"{EN-1869}

• [1695] "His Ex^y [the Governor] Ordred the Severall Comanders in Cheife * * * to Inspect the State of the Militia and to se how Armed & to returne account thereof."{EN-1870}

• [1704] The Governor "require[d] the respective Collonels and Commanders in Chief to cause exact Lists to be taken of those Persons that shall appear at the * * * General Musters unprovided of Armes and Ammunition, and to transmitt the same * * * that directions may be given for Levying the fines imposed on them[.]"{EN-1871}

• [1705 and 1723] "[A]ll captains of troops and foot companys * * * [are] strictly required and injoyned, at every muster (generall and particular) to take * * * an exact account in writing of every * * * default or offence made or committed in his troop or company, by whom the default or offence was made or done, and at what time[.]"{EN-1872}

• [1738] "[T]he field officers, and captains, of every county, * * * are hereby required to meet at the court-house of their counties * * * to hold a court-martial; which said court shall have power * * * to enquire of the age and abilities of all persons listed [in the Militia], and to exempt such as they shall judge incapable of service; and of all delinquents returned by the captains[.]"{EN-1873}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "That twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and amunition, * * * and that no soldier be fined for appearing without, or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been inlisted twelve months, * * * so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with: And if any soldier shall appear at any muster not armed and accoutred, * * * the captain * * * [may] examine such soldier upon oath, whether he hath any, and what arms and ammunition he really hath of his own property, and if on such examination it shall appear, that such soldier hath any arms or ammunition of his own property, and hath not brought the same, or so much thereof, as this act requires, * * * he shall be liable to the penalties * * * although he hath not been inlisted twelve months[.]"{EN-1874}

• [1784 and 1785] Each of the "officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, shall constantly keep the[ir] * * * arms, accoutrements and ammunition ready to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer. * * * At every muster, each captain * * * shall call his roll, examine every person belonging thereto, and note down all delinquencies occurring therein[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he governor, with advice of council, shall have power to arrest the * * * commanding officer of a county, and all other officers, for any misconduct whatsoever, and upon trial and conviction, may censure or cashier them. * * * All officers under the * * * commanding officer of a county, may also be arrested by such commanding officer, and reported to the governor for trial, or * * * a general court-martial * * * . Any non-commissioned officer or soldier offending, shall be tried by a like general court-martial * * * . For obtaining the necessary evidence for the trials aforesaid, the governor or commanding officer of the county * * * shall issue his summons, and any person so summoned, failing to attend, shall forfeit and pay [certain sums.]"{EN-1875}

9. Discretion to remit a punishment. Finally, a concern for providing elementary due process of law compelled Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia to make some allowances for corrections of erroneous sentences on appeal, and for grants of clemency. For example,

• [1781] "Every sentence * * * where the trial shall be before the court-martial of the county and the officer tried shall be a field officer, shall be transmitted to the governor * * * , who may either approve or disapprove the same, according to the custom of the law-martial, but where the officer tried shall be under the rank of a field officer, in that case the * * * commanding officer of the county where the trial shall be, shall have the power to approve or disapprove the sentence[.]"{EN-1876}

• [1786] "[A]ny officer of the militia, called into actual service, neglecting or refusing to do his duty, shall forfeit his commission, and moreover be amerced at the discretion of a court martial * * * ; and non-commissioned officers or privates in like manner refusing or neglecting shall also be fined * * * : Provided always, That the penalties and forfeitures herein imposed on field officers, captains and subalterns, in case of failure or refusal as aforesaid, shall be subject to the approbation of the executive with power to remit or enforce the same."{EN-1877}

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

Virginia's laws provided members of her pre-constitutional Militia with various privileges and immunities necessary to protect them in the performance of their duties.

Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia Acts and related laws required her citizens to fulfill various duties, some—such as mustering with arms to defend the community during periods of "alarm"—rather onerous and dangerous. To impose such duties equitably required that Militiamen be provided with corresponding statutory privileges and immunities that enabled them to fulfill, or protected them against liability for the faithful performance of, their duties.

A. Personal possession of arms. Because the basic duty of all Militiamen (other than conscientious objectors) was personally to possess at all times firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for their Militia service, and because the duty of most Militiamen (other than those who were impoverished) was to supply themselves at their own expense with this equipment as their own property,[970] from the earliest days Virginia's legislators enacted statutory protections for arms in private possession:

> • [1684] "FOR the encouragement of the inhabitants * * * of Virginia, to provide themselves with arms and ammunition, for the defence of this * * * country, and that they may appear well and compleatly furnished when commanded to musters and other * * * service, which many persons have hitherto delayed to do, for that their arms have been imprest and taken from them * * * it is hereby enacted, That all such swords, musketts, pistolls, carbines, guns, and other armes and furniture, as the inhabitants of this country are already provided, or shall provide and furnish themselves with, for their necessary use and service, shall * * * be free and exempted from being imprest or taken from him or them, * * * neither shall the same be lyable to be taken by any distresse, seizure, attachment or execution[.]"{EN-1878}
>
> • [1705] "[F]or the encouragement of every soldier in horse or ffoot to provide and furnish himself * * * and his security to keep his horse, arms and ammunition, when provided,
>
> "Be it enacted * * * , That the musket or ffuzee, the sword, cartouch box and ammunition of every ffoot soldier, and the horse, * * *

---

[970] See ante, Chapters 17 through 19.

> the carbine, pistolls, sword, cartouch box and ammunition of every trooper provided and kept in pursuance of this act to appear and exercise withall be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever, and likewise from being seized or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writt of execution, and that every distress, seizure, attachment or execution made or served upon any of the premises, be unlawfull and void, and that the officer or person that presumes to make or serve the same be lyable to the suit of the party greived, wherein double damages shall be given upon a recovery."{EN-1879}
>
> • [1723, 1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[F]or an encouragement of every soldier to provide and furnish himself, according to the directions of this act, and his security to keep his horse, arms, and ammunition, when provided, Be it enacted * * * , That the horses[971] and furniture [972], arms and ammunition, provided and kept, in pursuance of this act, be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever; and likewise, from being seized or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writ of execution. And that every distress, seizure, attachment, or execution, made or served upon any of the premises, be unlawful and void: And that the officer or person that presumes to make or serve the same, be liable to the suit of the party grieved: wherein double damages shall be given upon a recovery."{EN-1880}
>
> • [1775] "[A]ll arms of the militia shall be exempted from executions or distresses[.]"{EN-1881}
>
> • [1777] "All arms and ammunition of the militia shall be exempted from executions and distresses at all times[.]"{EN-1882}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "All arms, ammunition, and equipments of the militia, shall be exempted from executions and distresses at all times[.]"{EN-1883}

Thus, Militia firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements were a very special kind of personal property, from dispossession of which Militiamen enjoyed a broad immunity. The government could not seize their arms for any reason other than perhaps the commission of some serious crime, because the government itself by statute commanded them permanently to possess those arms. And private parties could not seize those arms even in satisfaction of legitimate, judicially determined debts, because the statutes disallowed such takings. The obvious principles behind all this were that: (i) Virginia imposed upon her citizens the duty to keep arms. Therefore (ii) she could neither herself prevent, nor allow let alone aid others to frustrate, the fulfillment of that duty. But instead, (iii) she had to facilitate the fulfillment of that duty against all interference, from public officials as a matter of course, and from private parties invoking the government's powers to settle private disputes. That is, "gun control" in *pre-*constitutional Virginia meant securing firearms firmly under the control of the common Virginians who owned them.[973]

---

[971] The Acts after 1723 did not include "horses".

[972] The Acts after 1755 did not include "furniture".

B. At musters and training. As arms were the basic tools of the Militia, musters and training were the basic operations in which the proper use of those tools was learned, practiced, and perfected. So, not surprisingly, in order to encourage and to the extent possible guarantee the appearances of Militiamen at musters and training, Virginia's Militia Acts protected their going to, attending, and returning from those activities:

> • [1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[E]very person going to, attending at, or returning from muster, shall be privileged and exempted from arrests, and being served with any other process, in any civil action or suit."{EN-1884}
>
> • [1775] "[A]ll officers and soldiers shall be exempted from arrests in civil cases, during their continuance at, going to and returning from musters."{EN-1885}
>
> • [1777] "[T]he militia shall be exempted * * * [in] their persons from arrests in civil cases, while going to, continuing at, or returning from, any muster or court martial".{EN-1886}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] Militiamen "shall be exempted" in "their persons from arrests in civil cases, while going to, continuing at, or returning from musters".{EN-1887}

C. In actual service. The personal possession of arms by and training of Virginia's Militiamen were not simply activities undertaken for their own value, but were the necessary preliminaries to actual service in the field. So if Militiamen's performance of the former duties warranted the extension to them of various legal privileges and immunities, certainly their performance of the latter also merited at least similar statutory protections. Not surprisingly, then, Virginia's Militia Acts and related statutes immunized her Militiamen from certain liabilities during their actual service:

> • [1756, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[W]hen the militia of any county shall be drawn out into actual service, by virtue of this act, and of the several acts concerning invasions and insurrections,[974] every officer and soldier of such militia shall be

---

[973] Interestingly enough, Virginia's laws still provide that "every householder shall be entitled to hold exempt from creditor process * * * [o]ne firearm, not to exceed $3,000 in value". Code of Virginia § 34-26(4b).

[974] The Acts of 1757 and thereafter omitted the phrase "and of the several acts concerning invasions and insurrections".

> exempted from all process in any cause or suit whatsoever (other than for some criminal matter) and his estate privileged from all executions, attachments and distresses whatsoever; and that if any suit shall be depending in any court whatsoever, in which any officer or soldier so drawn out as aforesaid, shall be a party, either plaintiff or defendant, the same shall be stayed, and no proceedings be had or taken therein, during the time such officer or soldier shall continue in such service."{EN-1888}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] Militiamen "shall be exempted * * * [in] their persons from arrests in civil cases * * * while in actual service".{EN-1889}

It would hardly have been equitable to have exposed Militiamen to the enforcement of civil judgments or to the vicissitudes of other civil judicial proceedings against which they could not have defended themselves because they were far away or otherwise unavailable, fulfilling their statutory duties to perform actual Militia service in the field. Plainly, too, the claims of individual civil litigants for damages or other judicial relief against Militiamen needed always to be subordinated in time to Virginia's more pressing claims for the latters' services in the common defense, by staying all civil proceedings during the performance of such services. The very theory of the Militia demanded then, as it does even now, that securing the common defense should always take precedence over the welfare of particular individuals. And because most civil litigants were probably themselves also members of the Militia, postponing their private claims under these circumstances could easily have been justified as simply enforcing another element of their own Militia duties.

D. In service on "the slave patrols". In Virginia, one peculiar kind of Militiamen's active service in the field was their participation in "slave patrols".[975] For example, > [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, and 1744] "[W]hereas, great danger may happen to the inhabitants of this dominion, from the unlawful concourse of negros, during the Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide holidays, wherein they are usually exempted from labour.

>
> " * * * [I]t shall and may be lawful, to and for the county-lieutenant, or other commanding officer of the militia, in any county within this dominion, * * * from time to time, as there shall be occasion, to appoint and direct such and so many of the militia of their respective counties, to be drawn out, and to patrole in such places as such commanding officer shall think fit to direct, and from time to time, to cause to be relieved by other parties, for dispersing all unusual concourse of negroes, or other slaves, and for preventing any dangerous combinations which may be made amongst them at such meetings: Which > said parties, so sent out to patrole, * * * shall have full power and authority to take up any slaves which they shall find convened together, contrary to the directions of * * * An act directing the trial of slaves committing capital crimes; and for the more effectual punishing conspiracies and insurrections of them; and for the better government of negros, mulattos, and Indians, bond or free [1723]: And such slaves so taken up, to deliver to the next constable, in order to be dealt with as the said act directs."{EN-1890}

---

[975] See ante, at 339-343 and 392-395.

Service in the patrols was an important duty, because (until the Civil War put paid to the Peculiar Institution) rebellious slaves were always considered—and not without good reason—a mortal threat, not just to particular planters, but to the community as a whole.[976] Service in the patrols was also potentially hazardous for the patrollers themselves. For the statutory authorization "to take up any slaves which they shall find convened together * * * and to deliver to the next constable, in order to be dealt with" required patrollers to arrest and detain unruly bondsmen—which surely would have involved violent confrontations if the slaves resisted or attempted to escape in order to evade punishment. And in such circumstances any slave involved in "dangerous combinations" who was even vaguely conversant with the law would have known that resistance and escape were his best alternatives. For, typical of the harshness of the penal codes pertaining to slaves during that era, the Acts of 1723 and 1748 directed "[t]hat if any number of negros, or other slaves, exceeding five, shall at any time * * * consult, advise, or conspire, to rebel or make insurrection, or shall plot or conspire the murder of any person or persons whatsoever, every such consulting, plotting, or conspiring, shall be adjudged and deemed felony; and the slave or slaves convicted thereof * * * shall suffer death".{EN-1891} And, upon being apprehended by "the slave patrol", "every slave committing such offense, as, by the laws, ought to be punished with death, or loss of member, shall be forthwith committed to the common goal of the county, * * * there to be safely kept".{EN-1892} So, in such situations, the slaves' submission would have been tantamount to suicide.

Had the slaves resisted arrest for any violation of the laws, though, some would probably have been injured, maimed, or killed. The slaves' owners would then have sought damages, in one of two ways. First, from the General Assembly, pursuant to the allowance that, > if in the dispersing of any unlawful assemblies, pursuit of rebels or conspirators, or seizing the arms and ammunition of such [negros, mulattos, or Indians] as are prohibited * * * to keep the same, any slave

---

[976] See, e.g., S. Horton, Slave Patrols, ante note 648, at 158-161; Slono: Documenting and Interpreting a Southern Slave Revolt, Mark M. Smith, Editor (Columbia, South Carolina: University of South Carolina Press, 2005); Herbert Aptheker, American Negro Slave Revolts (New York, New York: International Publishers, 50th Anniversary Edition, 1993). See generally K. Stamp, The Peculiar Institution, ante note 392, Chapters III and IV.

> shall happen to be killed or destroied, the court of the county where such slave shall be killed, upon application by the owner of such slave, and due proof thereof made, shall put a valuation in money, upon such slave so killed, and certify such valuation to the next session of assembly, that the said assembly may be enabled to make a suitable allowance thereupon to the master or owner of such slave.{EN-1893}

Or second, through the statutorily reserved right to bring suit against the individuals who killed a slave. For the Acts of 1723 and 1748 were not to be > construed, deemed, or taken, to defeat or barr the action of any person or persons, whose slave or slaves shall happen to be killed by any other person whatsoever * * * . But that all and every owner or owners of such slave or slaves, shall and may bring his or her action, for recovery of damages for such slave or slaves so killed[.]{EN-1894}

This right, though, was apparently conditioned on a slave's being killed in a situation that did not involve "the dispersing of any unlawful assemblies, pursuit of rebels or conspirators, or seizing the arms and ammunition of such [negroes, mulattos, or Indians] as are prohibited * * * to keep the same"—because, in the latter situation, the General Assembly was "to make a suitable allowance to the master".

In addition, had they been negligent in the control of their slaves, the owners themselves could have been fined:

> • [1723] "[W]hereas many inconveniences have arisen, by the meetings of great numbers of negros and other slaves: For prevention thereof, * * * no meetings of negros, or other slaves, be allowed, on any pretence whatsoever * * * . And * * * every master, owner, or overseer of any plantation, who shall, knowingly and willingly, permit any such meetings, or suffer more than five negros or slaves, other than the negros or slaves belonging to his, her, or their plantations or quarters, to be and remain upon any plantation or quarter, at any one time, shall forfeit and pay the sum of five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, for each negro or slave, over and above such number, that shall at any time * * * so unlawfully meet or assemble * * * : To be recovered, with costs, before any justice of the peace of the county where such offence shall be committed."{EN-1895}
>
> • [1748] "[T]o prevent the inconvenience arising by the meetings of slaves, Be it * * * enacted * * * , That if any master, mistress, or overseer of a family, shall knowingly permit or suffer any slave, not belonging to him, or her, to be and remain upon his, or her plantation, above four hours at one time, without leave of the owner or overseer of such slave,

> he, or she, so permitting, shall forfeit and pay one hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco, for every such offence; and every owner, or overseer, of a plantation, who shall so permit, or suffer more than five negros, or slaves, other than his, or her own, to be and remain upon his, or her plantation, or quarter, at any one time, shall forfeit and pay five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, for each negroe, or slave above that number * * * , recoverable, with costs, before any justice of the peace of the county where such offence shall be committed."{EN-1896}

Others involved in prohibited conduct might also have been fined:

> • [1723 and 1748] "[I]f any white person, free negro, mulatto, or Indian, shall * * * be found in company with * * * slaves, at any * * * unlawful meetings, * * * or harbor or entertain any negro or other slave whatsoever, without the consent of their owners, he, she, or they, so offending * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifteen shillings, or one hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco * * * : To be recovered, with costs, before any justice of the peace; and upon failure to make present paiment, shall have and receive, on his, her, or their bare backs, for every such offence, twenty lashes, well laid on."{EN-1897}

Moreover, certain public officials who neglected or failed in their duties to deal with such illegal activities could have been fined, too:

> • [1723 and 1748] "[E]very justice of the peace of any county wherein * * * unlawful meetings shall happen, upon his own knowledge, or upon information thereof to him made, * * * shall forthwith issue his warrant to apprehend all such persons, who so met or assembled, and cause such offenders to be brought before him * * * —And that every such justice, who shall fail in his duty herein, shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty shillings, or five hundred pounds of tobacco, for every such offence.
>
> " * * * [E]very sheriff, under-sheriff, or constable, who, upon his or their own knowledge, or upon information thereof to him or them made, of any * * * unlawful meetings, * * * shall fail forthwith to endeavour to suppress and disperse the same, and to carry the offenders before some justice of the peace, in order for the said offenders to receive due punishment, the sheriff, for every offence by him committed, shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty shillings, or five hundred pounds of tobacco * * * . And the under sheriff, or constable, failing to perform his or their duty herein, for every offence by him or them committed, shall forfeit and pay twenty shillings, or two hundred pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1898}

So negligent overseers, owners, and public officials, and White persons who participated along with slaves in prohibited activities, would have had strong incentives to claim that arrests effected by the slave patrols were wrongful, and to bring legal actions against the individual patrollers on that basis.

To limit such claims, Virginia's Militia statutes extended rather broad immunity from liability to patrollers who acted within their authority:

> [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, 1771] "[I]f any action shall * * * be brought in any court of this colony, against any person or persons appointed to patrol * * * , for any matter or thing done by him or them in the execution of their duty as patrollers, it shall and may be lawful to, and for every person and persons against whom such action or suit shall be brought, to plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence on the trial, and if any judgment shall be given for the defendant, or if the plaintiff shall become non-suit, or discontinue his suit, then the defendant shall recover treble costs."{EN-1899}

This immunity was not, of course, absolute, in the sense that it completely excused the patrollers from having to answer complaints lodged against them in court. Here, terms used in *pre-*constitutional judicial procedure that are far from familiar today need to be defined. As Blackstone explained, > [T]HE general issue * * * is what traverses, thwarts, and denies at once the whole declaration; without offering any special matter whereby to evade it. * * * These pleas are called the general issue, because, by importing an absolute and general denial of what is alleged in the declaration, they amount at once to an issue; by which we mean a fact affirmed on one side and denied on the other.

>
> FORMERLY the general issue was seldom pleaded, except when the party meant wholly to deny the charge alleged against him. But when he meant to distinguish away or palliate the charge, it was always usual to set forth the particular facts in what is called a special plea; which was originally intended to apprize the court and the adverse party of the nature and circumstances of the defence, and to keep the law and the fact distinct. And it is an invariable rule, that every defence, which cannot be thus specially pleaded, may be given in evidence, upon the general issue at the trial. But, the science of special pleading having been frequently perverted to the purposes of chicane and delay, the courts have of late in some instances, and the legislature in many more, permitted the general issue to be pleaded, which leaves everything open, the fact, the law, and the equity of the case; and have allowed special matter to be given in evidence at the trial. * * *
>
> * * * SPECIAL pleas, in bar of the plaintiff's demand, are very various, according to the circumstances of the defendant's case. As, * * * in trespass, that the defendant did the thing complained of in right of some office which warranted him so to do[.]

* * * * *

> SPECIAL pleas * * * always advance some new fact not mentioned in the declaration; and then they must be averred to be true * * * [.] This is not necessary in pleas of the general issue; those always containing a total denial of the facts before advanced by the other party, and therefore putting him upon the proof of them.[977]

So the immunities set up in the Militia statutes fit the pattern of "SPECIAL pleas, in bar of the plaintiff's demand, * * * that the defendant did the thing complained of in right of some office which warranted him so to do"—pointing up that service in the Militia was a form of "public office".[978] Yet the patroller still had to establish the defense that his action was taken not merely under color of the statute (although that circumstance was obviously necessary), but particularly in actual pursuance of the law.

On the other hand, if the patroller successfully interposed that defense, then the complainant suffered a monetary penalty: namely, "if any judgment shall be given for the defendant, or if the plaintiff shall become non-suit, or discontinue his suit, then the defendant shall recover treble costs." This placed the burden squarely on the complaining party to establish that the Militiaman had not been acting under the aegis of the statute at all (perhaps because he did not belong to a "slave patrol" at the time), or had acted in excess of the authority the statute delegated to him.

E. General legal immunity. Militiamen who participated in "slave patrols" were not the sole beneficiaries of legal immunities applicable to their service. Rather, Virginia's laws provided rather extensive protection across the board:

> [1755, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[I]f any officer [in the Militia] shall be sued for any thing by him done, in pursuance of this act, it shall and may be lawful, for such officer, to plead the general issue, and give the special matter and this act in evidence."{EN-1900}

Although these statutes applied in terms only to "any officer", if an officer could not have been successfully sued for giving an order that had been justifiable under the law, then presumably any Militiaman who had faithfully carried out that order would have been entitled to assert a derivative immunity for himself, too.

Importantly, all of these immunities were statutory in nature. None derived from "common law" (that is, from judicial decisions purporting to enforce some part of the lex non scripta)[979]—showing once again that the judiciary exercised no special supervisory authority over the Militia.[980]

---

[977] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 305-306, 309.

[978] See post, at 844-845.

[979] On the differences at the time between these two sources of law, see W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 63-92.

[980] See ante, at 108-113, 319.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia laws embodied the very antitheses of contemporary "gun control".

In modern times, so-called "gun control"—by which term its proponents ultimately intend the systematic disarming of the general populace, leaving only the regular Armed Forces and various politically reliable "law-enforcement agencies" in possession of firearms—has become a contentious, even raucous, issue. Yet, as a general proposition, "gun control" is not a novel idea. Throughout American history, some form of "gun control", enforced by law, has always existed. But "gun control" in pre-constitutional Virginia was quite the opposite of contemporary "gun control". Specifically, in Virginia (as well as in all but one of the other Colonies and then all of the independent States) during that era, comprehensive "gun control" was the subject of numerous Militia Acts, all of which aimed, not at bringing about the wholesale disarmament of the people, but instead at insuring that every able-bodied, free, and adult male White Virginian (and other Americans elsewhere) personally possessed at all times at least one firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service. To be sure, other forms of "gun control" also existed in that era. All of them, however, were aimed at, or at least consistent with, the same goal: maintaining "homeland security" by seeing to it that those who were loyal to the community were always adequately armed, and that those who were disloyal were denied access to arms or affirmatively disarmed whenever that course of action proved necessary.

A. Controls aimed at securing adequate stocks of ammunition. As a practical matter, it would have been useless for Virginia to require her citizens to possess firearms without also taking steps to maintain within her own territory adequate stocks of ammunition—primarily, gunpowder and lead—always available for the people's immediate use. These measures were of two sorts: control over trade in and restrictions on the purely private use of ammunition. The goal in both instances was, not to constrict the supply of ammunition in common Virginians' hands, but instead to maximize it.

1. Limiting the exportation of ammunition. In the earliest days, when almost all ammunition had to be imported—usually from abroad, at great expense and with significant delays—Virginia's regulations aimed at preventing traders from exporting ammunition that was needed at home:

> • [1690] The Council "Ordered that * * * [certain public officials] doe not permitt any powder or Shott to be exported out of this Colony, Except by Such persons who bring the same in and Carry it out for their Necessary defence and that upon the arrivall of every Shipp they inquire what powder and Shott is brought in, and for whom, and Order that the same not be disposed of till further Order."{EN-1901}

• [1690] The Council, "Considering the small quantity of powder and Shott in this Colony, and that there is noe likelyhood at present to receive a Supply, and to the End, that [the ammunition], now in the Country, may not be Imbezelled nor Sold to the Indians, Doe Order that the Sheriffs of * * * [certain] Counties do each in his County make diligent inquiry what Powder Shott and Armes is [in] the possession of any Indian Traders, Merchants or others in the said County * * * and safely to secure the same till further Order[.]"{EN-1902}

• [1691] "On Consideration of the Great want of Powder and Shott in this Country for the defence thereof, as also that * * * all persons are forbidden selling any to the Indians, unless small quantities to our Neighbouring Indians. And to the End the Inhabitants * * * may (if possible) provide themselves with some," the Lieutenant Governor and the Council "Ord^{r}d that the Collect^{rs} demand and take an account (of the Severall Masters of Shipps and Vessels they shall Enter) of all Powder Shott and Armes brought into this Colony, and permitt them to deliver it to the Severall persons to whom it belongs, of whom an account thereof will be required when occasion shall offer, for * * * this Countrys Service."{EN-1903}

2. Suppressing the wastage of ammunition at home. Besides restricting the exportation of ammunition, Virginia's early lawmakers also sought to restrain her citizens' profligate domestic use of the limited supplies available:

• [1624 and 1632] "That no commander of any plantation do either himselfe or suffer others to spend powder unnecessarily in drinking or entertainments, &c."{EN-1904}

• [1656, 1658, and 1662] "WHEREAS it is much to be doubted, That the comon enemie the Indians, if opportunity serve, would suddenly invade this collony to a totall subversion of the same, and whereas the only means for the discovery of their plotts is by allarms, of which no certainty can be had in respect of the frequent shooting of gunns in drinking, whereby they proclaim, and as it were, justifie that beastlie vice spending much powder in vaine, that might be reserved against the comon enemie, Be it therefore enacted that what person or persons soever shall * * * shoot any gunns at drinkeing (marriages and ffuneralls onely excepted,) that such person or persons so offending shall forfeit 100 lb. of tobacco to be levied by distresse[981] * * * and to be disposed of by the militia in amunition towards a magazine for the county where the offence shall be committed."{EN-1905}

[981] The Act of 1662 permitted shooting only at "buryalls", and raised the fine for impermissible shooting to two hundred pounds of tobacco.

• [1658] "THAT the Lord's day be kept holy, and * * * that no * * * shooteing in gunns * * * tending to the prophanation of that day, which duty is to be taken care of by the ministers and officers of the severall churches * * * , and the partie delinquent to pay one hundred pounds of tobacco or layd in the stocks[.]"{EN-1906}

Obviously, these laws presumed that significant amounts of ammunition—as well as firearms in which it could be employed—were lodged in private hands and subject to private control (and perhaps wastage). And the laws' evident purpose was not to deprive common Virginians of ammunition, but instead to restrain frivolous expenditures of it, so as to maintain the maximum amount in private possession in readiness to be employed in the community's defense.

B. Controls aimed at maximizing "homeland security". The fundamental purpose of Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia was to organize, arm, and train the people for their own self-defense against whatever enemies might threaten them. The necessary corollary of the principle that the people should be equipped with and thoroughly trained to arms was that the community's enemies, both external and internal, should be denied arms if they sought to acquire them, and otherwise disarmed if at all possible.

1. External enemies. Other than the French and to a lesser degree the Spanish, and usually of more immediate concern because of their proximity, Indians were *pre-*constitutional Virginians' main external enemies—"external" because, although the Indians and Virginians of European origin often lived in close physical proximity, the two groups considered each other to be separate and actually or potentially hostile polities. Yet the relationship between Virginians and neighboring Indians was always somewhat ambiguous. Some Indians proved friendly, some hostile; and the allegiances of many Indians were often subject to sudden change. So, depending upon circumstances, Virginia followed two distinct policies with respect to arming Indians, sometimes prohibiting their acquisition of firearms, sometimes facilitating it.

a. Prohibitions against supplying hostile Indians with arms. In the early days, it was generally the policy to prevent most Indians from acquiring and keeping any firearms at all, so as to maintain the martial superiority of Europeans on that score. Not surprisingly, in light of the serious danger that well-armed hostile Indians might have posed, rather severe restrictions and penalties were inflicted on those who violated this prohibition:

• [1633 and 1639] "IT is ordered and appoynted, That yf any person or persons shall sell or barter any gunns, powder, shott, or any armes or amunition unto any Indian or Indians within this territorie, the said person or persons shall forfeite to publique uses all the goods and chattells that he or they then have to theire owne use, and shall also suffer imprisonment duringe life[.]"{EN-1907}

• [1643] "[I]f any servant running away [from his master] * * * shall carrie either peice, powder and shott, And leave either all or any of them with the Indians, * * * shall suffer death[.]"{EN-1908}

• [1643 and 1658] "BE it * * * enacted * * * , that what person or persons soever shall sell or barter with any Indian or Indians for peece, powder and shott and being thereof lawfully convicted, shall forfeit his whole estate * * * . And whereas * * * divers persons do entertaine Indians to kill deare or other game, And do furnish the said Indians with peeces, powder and shott, by which great abuse, not onely the Indians (to the great indangering of the collony) are instructed in the vse of ovr arms, But have opportunity given to them to store themselves as well with arms as powder and shott, Be it therefore enacted, That what person or persons soever within the collony, shall lend any Indian either peece, powder and shott, It shall be lawfull for any person meeting with any such Indian so furnished, to take away either peece, powder or shott, so as such person taking away either peece, powder or shott do carrie the same to the comander of the county, * * * which said comander is hereby authorized to give possession to the informer either of the peece, powder or shott so brought before him, And the said commander is further required, to make a strict inquiry and examination to find out such person that did lend or give such peece, powder or shott to the Indians * * * , And * * * the party delinquent * * * shall forfeit two thousand pounds of tobacco * * * , And * * * such delinquent for his second offence shall forfeit his whole estate[.]"{EN-1909}

• [1654 and 1658] "TO prevent the disorderly imploying of Indians with gunns vnder the pretence of being their servants, It is inacted, That noe person shall dare to imploy such Indian servants with gunns unless they have allowance from the county court where they live or from the Governour and Councill."{EN-1910}

• [1665] "WHEREAS there was formerly a law in force prohibiting the sale of armes, ammunition, or guns to the Indians, which upon consideration of the said Indians being furnished by the Dutch was omitted; It being then thought impolitick to debarre ourselves from soe greate an advantage as might accrue to us by the Indian trade, when we could not prevent their supply; yet since those envious neighbours are now * * * removed from us, and the trade now likely to be in our hands, and none to furnish them besides ourselves, who in these times of eminent danger have scarce ability to furnish our owne people, It is therefore enacted * * * that the sale of armes, gunpowder, and shott be wholly prohibited; and that whoever * * * shall by himself or any other sell or barter powder, shott, gun or ammunition to any Indian, shalbe fined ten thousand pounds of tobacco or suffer two yeares imprisonment without bayle or mainprize for the first offence, and for the second to be proceeded against as ffellons."{EN-1911}

• [1675] "WHEREAS the country by sade experience have found that the traders with Indians by their avirice have soe armed the Indians with powder, shott and gunns, that they have beene thereby imboldened, not only to fall upon the ffronteer plantations murthered many of our people and allarmed the whole country, but to throw us into a chargeable and most dangerous warr, * * * Bee it enacted * * * , that if any person or persons whatsoever * * * shall presume to trade, truck, barter, sell or utter, directly or indirectly, to or with any Indian any powder, shott or armes * * * shall suffer death without benefitt of clergye, and shall forfeite his or their whole estates * * * . And be it further enacted * * * , that if any person or persons whatsoever * * * shalbe found within any Indian towne or three miles without the English plantations with powder, shott or other armes and ammunition, except one gunn and tenn charges of powder and shott for his necessary use, although he or they be not actually tradeing, trucking, bartering, selling or uttering to or with the Indians, * * * shalbe adjudged guilty of selling and suffer accordingly."{EN-1912}

• [1676] "[A]ll such Indians shall be accounted and prosecuted as enemies that either already have, or hereafter shall foresake theire usuall and accustomed dwelling townes without license * * * , as alsoe all such Indians as shall refuse upon demand to deliver up into the hands of the English all such armes and ammunition of what kind or nature soever (bowes and arrows onely excepted) and alsoe to deliver such hostages as shall from time to time be required of them[.]"{EN-1913}

• [1705] "[I]f any person whatsoever, shall * * * entertain or employ any Tuscarora, or other Indian, not being a servant or slave, to hunt or kill deer; or furnish them with guns, powder, or shot, to hunt * * * upon any lands * * * patented, and belong to any of her majesty's subjects within * * * Virginia, he, she, or they * * * shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons upon whose land such Indian shall be found * * * the sum of one thousand pounds of tobacco * * * .

" * * * [M]oreover, when any person shall find any such Indian shooting, ranging, or hunting upon his land, * * * it shall be lawful for such person to take away the gun, powder, and shot, which he shall find upon such Indian, and to keep and convert the same to his own use * * * .

" * * * Provided nevertheless, That nothing * * * shall * * * extend to the Pamunkey or Chickahominy Indians, or to the Indians on the Eastern shore, hunting or ranging as heretofore they have been accustomed to do."{EN-1914}

• [1705] "[T]he Indians tributary to this government, shall have and enjoy their wonted conveniences of oistering and fishing, and of gathering, on the lands belonging to the English, * * * things, not useful to the English, upon a license first had from a justice of the peace * * * .

" * * * Provided always * * * , That the said Indians shall not bring with them any guns, ammunition, or offensive weapons, but tools only for their use[.]"{EN-1915}

• [1707 and 1708] "[T]hat [no] person whatsoever presume * * * to furnish * * * [any Tuscaruro or other foreign Indian] wth Gunns, Powder or Shott * * * under Paine of being prosecuted for the same wth the utmost Severity of the Law."{EN-1916}

b. Permission for supplying friendly Indians with arms. Of course, because not all Indians were hostile, and too strict a policy of attempting to deny firearms to them not only generated continuous friction between possibly friendly tribes and the Colonists but also restricted mutually beneficial commerce among the two groups, *pre-*constitutional Virginia often allowed Indians to trade for and to possess, and even specially protected some of them in their ownership of, arms:

• [1659] "WHEREAS there is an act in force prohibiting the lending of gunns or ammunition to the Indians, by vertue of which many quarrells have arisen between English and Indians caringe their owne gunns, which might, vnless prevented, prove a disturbance of the peace now made between the two nations, It is enacted * * * that it shall be lawfull for the Indians to make vse of their owne gunns and amunition without the lett or molestation of any person or persons whatsoever within theire owne limitts."{EN-1917}

• [1659] "WHEREAS it is manifest that the neighbouringe plantations both of English and fforrainers do plentifully furnish the Indians with gunns, powder & shott, and do thereby drawe from vs the trade of beaver to our greate losse and their profitt, and besides the Indians being furnished with as much of both gunns and ammunition as they are able to purchase, It is enacted, That every man may freely trade for gunns, powder and shott: It derogateing nothing from our safety and adding much to our advantage[.]"{EN-1918}

• [1661] "CONSIDERING the great use and benefit the countrey may enjoy from the Chesskoiack Indians being kindly used by us, and being sensible that with the few gunns they have amongst them they cannot prejudice us being a small inconsiderable nation, It is ordered * * * to shew other Indians how kind wee are to such who are obedient to our laws that the said Chiskoiack Indians quietly hold and enjoy the land they are now seated upon, and have the free use of the gunns they now have[.]"{EN-1919}

• [1677] "IT is ordered that all persons have hereby liberty to sell armes and ammunition to any of his majesties loyall subjects inhabiting this colony, and that the Indians of the Easterne shore have like and equall liberty of trade or otherwayes with any other our ffriends and neighbouring Indians."{EN-1920}

• [1677] "FORASMUCH as the totall prohibition of tradeing with Indians is experimented and found hurtfull and prejudiciall to his majesties colony and the inhabitants thereof; Bee it * * * enacted * * * , that all Indians whatsoever being in amity and ffriendship with us from henceforth shall have free and full liberty to come in amongst us and bring in any comodityes whatsoever to the severall places and at the severall tymes hereafter sett downe, * * * , and to trade with, sell or truck, for the same with the English, resorting thither, but noe where else for any comodityes whatsoever, and that such marts or ffaires continue fforty dayes and noe longer[.]"

But this Act also provided that "it shall not be lawfull or permitted any Indian or Indians resorting to or meeting at any those aforesaid marts or ffaires to travell with or carry armes, or appeare there armed, except only the carrying home such armes or ammunition as they shall then and there purchase, and shalbe found registered in the clarkes booke, for which they shall have with them his certificate[.]"{EN-1921}

Presumably, though, nothing prevented these Indians from carrying their firearms about after they had returned to their homes.

• [1680 and 1691] The statute of 1680 allowed "a free and open trade for all persons att all tymes and places with our freindly Indians", whereas the statute of 1691 permitted trade "with all indians whatsoever".{EN-1922}

• [1705] "That there be a free and open trade for all persons, at all times, and at all places, with all Indians whatsoever."{EN-1923}

• [1752] "[W]hereas many evil disposed persons, under pretence of the * * * [Nottoway] Indians being indebted to them, do frequently dispossess them of their guns, blankets, and other apparel, to their great impoverishment, for prevention whereof, Be it enacted * * * , That if any person or persons shall * * * , under any pretence whatsoever, take from any of the said Indians their guns, blankets, or other apparel, such person or persons so offending, shall forfeit and pay to the Indian or Indians so injured, the sum of twenty shillings current money, for every such offence * * * ; and if the offender be a slave, he shall * * * receive, on his or her bare back, twenty five lashes well laid on * * * ; and if any free person or persons shall trade or deal with the said Indians, for their guns, blankets, or other apparel, the person or persons so trading or dealing * * * shall forfeit and pay the like sum of twenty shillings, for every such offence, and if such offender be a slave, he shall * * * receive, on his or her bare back, twenty five lashes."{EN-1924}

2. Internal enemies. *Pre-*constitutional Virginia also counted among the threats to her "homeland security" various internal enemies, whom she naturally sought to disarm.

a. Criminals. Among professional criminals of that era, pirates were the most feared and dangerous. For, in the common opinion of the time, > the crime of piracy, or robbery and depredation upon the high seas, is an offence against the universal law of society; a pirate being * * * hostis humani generis.[982] As therefore he has renounced all the benefits of society and government, and has reduced himself afresh to the savage state of nature, by declaring war against all mankind, all mankind must declare war against him: so that every community hath a right, by the rule of self-defence, to inflict that punishment upon him, which every individual would in a state of nature have been otherwise entitled to do, for any invasion of his person or personal property.

>
> BY the antient common law, piracy, if committed by a subject, was held to be a species of treason, being contrary to his natural allegiance: and by an alien to be felony only: but now * * * it is held to be only felony in a subject.[983]

And, of course, conviction of "felony" in that era always entailed the forfeiture of all of the perpetrator's personal property, including any arms he may have possessed, as well as usually his execution.[984]

So hardly surprising was Virginia's determination, while piracy remained a problem, to disarm even those individuals who had ostensibly given up involvement in that crime and been effectively pardoned:

> [1718] "[A] Pirate Ship and Sloop being lately Cast away * * * Severall of the said Pirates have Since come into this Colony with Certificates from the Governor of N^{o} Carolina of their Surrendering to him, but in regard their Travelling about the Country with their Arms and keeping together in Considerable Numb^{rs} give Great Suspicion, that they design to betake themselves again to Piracy * * * ; It is therefore ordered by the Governor * * * that a Proclamation be prepared requiring all Persons who have been concerned in any Piracys, and who Shall come into this Colony immediately upon their Arrival, to deliver up their Arms to the first Justice of the Peace or Milletary Officer, and prohibiting them to Associate in any Greater Numbers than three in one Company And that in Case any be found going armed, or in Greater Numbers * * * ,

---

[982] "Enemy of the human race".

[983] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 71 (footnotes omitted).

[984] See ante, at 145 and 272-273, and post, at 983-985 and 990.

> That the Justices of the Peace Cause them to be taken up and put in Prison till they give Security for their good behaviour."{EN-1925}

This action by the Governor was, of course, in keeping with the long-established procedure for requiring a "Surety for keeping the Peace" from individuals whose behavior demonstrably threatened a breach of the peace.[985] And probably no better example of persons rightfully subject to such control could be imagined than ostensibly former pirates who because they were "Travelling about the Country with their Arms and keeping together in Considerable Numb[rs] give Great Suspicion, that they design to take themselves again to Piracy".

b. Slaves and other persons of color. If pirates were but occasional enemies of the community, slaves were permanent ones—and because of their large numbers and dispersion throughout the land, and their antagonism not only towards their masters but also to the society that countenanced their bondage, were potentially far more dangerous if they rose in rebellion than were any conceivable pirates' raids.

(1) Towards the close of the pre-constitutional period, Blackstone had warned that

> [t]wo precautions are * * * to be observed in all prudent and free governments: 1. To prevent the introduction of slavery at all: or, 2. If it be already introduced, not to intrust those slaves with arms; who will then find themselves an overmatch for the freemen.[986]

Having lived with slavery since the mid-1600s, Virginians had taken such an admonition to heart decades earlier.

(a) From early on, Virginians—taking into account the old adages "in unity there is strength" and "strength lies in numbers"—had been careful to prohibit slaves from freely associating amongst themselves, or with free persons of questionable motives, in large groups under circumstances in which rebellions or other plots might be proposed, planned, or perpetrated:

> • [1680] "WHEREAS the frequent meeting of considerable numbers of negroe slaves under pretence of feasts and burialls is judged of dangerous consequence; for prevention whereof for the future, Bee it enacted * * * that * * * it shall not be lawfull for any negroe or other slave * * * to goe or depart from of[f] his masters ground without a certificate from his master, mistris or overseer, and such permission not to be granted but upon perticuler and necessary occasions; and every negroe or slave soe offending not haveing a certificate * * * shalbe sent to the next constable, who is * * * required to give the said negroe twenty lashes on his bare back well layd on, and soe sent home to his said master, mistris or overseer. * * * And * * * if any negroe or other slave shall absent himself from his masters service and lye hid and lurking in obscure places, comitting injuries to the inhabitants, and shall resist any person or persons that shalby any lawlfull authority be imployed to apprehend and take the said negroe, that then in case of such resistance, it shalbe lawfull for such person or persons to kill the said negroe or slave soe lying out and resisting[.]"{EN-1926}

---

[985] See ante, at 303-307 (example in Rhode Island).

[986] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 416.

• [1682 and 1705] "[F]or the further better preventing * * * insurrections by negroes or slaves, Bee it * * * enacted * * * , that noe master or overseer knowingly permitt or suffer, without the leave or licence of his or their master or overseer, any negroe or slave not properly belonging to him or them, to remaine or be upon his or their plantation above the space of four houres at any one time, * * * upon paine to forfeite * * * the summe of two hundred pounds of tobacco in cask for each time soe offending[.]"{EN-1927}

• [1705 and 1709] "And * * * be it enacted * * * , That no slave * * * go from off the plantation and seat of land where such slave shall be appointed to live, without a certificate of leave in writing * * * from his or her master, mistress, or overseer: And if any slave shall be found offending herein, it shall be lawful for any person or persons to apprehend and deliver such slave to the next constable * * * who is hereby * * * required, without further order or warrant, to give such slave twenty lashes on his or her bare back, well laid on[.]"{EN-1928}

Violators of this statute were threatened with being "prosecuted according to the Strictest Severity & Rigor of the Common Law as such Disobedience requires".{EN-1929}

• [1723] "WHEREAS the laws now in force, for the better ordering and governing of slaves * * * are found insufficient to restrain their tumultuous and unlawful meetings, or to punish the secret plots and conspiracies carried on amongst them * * *

" * * * Be it enacted, * * * That if any number of negros, or other slaves, exceeding five, shall at any time hereafter consult, advise, or conspire, to rebel or make insurrection, or shall plot or conspire the murder of any person or persons whatsoever, every such consulting, plotting, or conspiring, shall be adjudged and deemed felony; and the slave or slaves convicted thereof * * * shall suffer death, and be utterly excluded the benefit of clergy, and of all laws made concerning the same.

* * * * *

" * * * [W]hereas many inconveniences have arisen, by the meetings of great numbers of negros and other slaves: For prevention thereof, Be it enacted * * * , That * * * no meetings of negros, or other slaves, be allowed, on any pretence whatsoever * * * [except in certain cases]. And that every master, owner, or overseer of any plantation, who shall, knowingly or willingly, permit any such meetings, or suffer more than five negros or slaves, other than the negros or slaves belonging to his, her, or their plantations or quarters, to be and remain upon any plantation or quarter, at any one time, shall forfeit and pay the sum of five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, for each negro or slave, over and above such number, that shall at any time * * * so unlawfully meet and assemble * * * .

" * * * Provided always, That nothing * * * shall be construed to restrain the negros, or other slaves, belonging to one and the same owner, and seated at distant quarters or plantations, to meet, by the license of such owner, or his or her overseer, at any of the quarters or plantations to such owner belonging; nor to retrain the meeting of any number of slaves, on their owner's or overseer's business, at any public mill, so as such meeting be not in the night, or on a Sunday; nor to restrain their meeting on any other lawful occasion, by the license, in writing, of their master, mistress, or overseers; nor to prohibit any slaves repairing to and meeting at church to attend divine service * * * .

" * * * And be it further enacted * * * That if any white person, free negro, mulatto, or Indian, shall at any time * * * be found in company with any such slaves, at any such unlawful meetings, * * * or harbor or entertain any negro, or other slave whatsoever, without the consent of their owners, he, she, or they, so offending, * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifteen shillings, or one hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco, * * * and upon failure to make present payment, shall have and receive, on his, her, or their bare backs, for every such offence, twenty lashes, well laid on. And every negro, mulatto, or indian slave, who shall come or assemble to such unlawful meetings, shall * * * , for every such offence, have and receive, on his or her bare back, any number of lashes, not exceeding thirty-nine."{EN-1930}

(By the late 1700s, a "mulatto" was defined as "every person who shall have one-fourth part or more of negro blood".{EN-1931})

•[1748] "Whereas it is absolutely necessary, that effectual provision should be made for the better ordering and governing of slaves, free negroes, mulattoes, and Indians, and detecting and punishing their secret plots, and dangerous combinations * * *

" * * * BE it enacted, * * * That if any negroe, or other slaves, shall at any time consult, advise, or conspire, to rebel or make insurrection, or shall plot, or conspire the murder of any person, or persons whatsoever, every such consulting, plotting, or conspiring, shall be adjudged and deemed felony, and the slave or slaves convicted thereof * * * shall suffer death, and be utterly excluded all benefit of clergy.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]o prevent the inconveniences arising by the meetings of slaves, Be it * * * enacted * * * , That if any master, mistress, or overseer > * * * shall knowingly permit or suffer any slave, not belonging to him, or her, to be and remain upon his, or her plantation, above four hours at one time, without leave of the owner or overseer of such slave, he, or she, so permitting, shall forfeit and pay one hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco, for every such offence; and every owner, or overseer, of a plantation, who shall so permit, or suffer more than five negroes, or slaves, other than his, or her own, to be and remain upon his, or her plantation, or quarter, at any one time, shall forfeit and pay five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, for each negroe, or slave above that number * * * .

>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [I]f any white person, free negroe, mulattoe, or Indian, shall at any time be found in company with slaves, at any unlawful meeting, or shall harbour, or entertain any slave, without the consent of his, or her owner, such person * * * shall forfeit and pay fifteen shillings, or one hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco, * * * or, on failure of present payment, shall receive on his, or her, bare back, twenty lashes, well laid on * * * : And every slave, present at any unlawful meeting, shall * * * receive any number of lashes, not exceeding thirty nine.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [I]f any slave shall presume to come, and be upon the plantation of any person whatsoever, without leave in writing, from his, or her owner, or overseer, not being sent upon lawful business, it shall be lawful for the owner, or overseer of such plantation, to give, or order, such slave ten lashes, on his, or her bare back, for every such offence.
>
> " * * * [N]o slave shall go from the plantation, or seat of land whereon he, or she, is appointed to live, without a certificate of leave, in writing, from his, or her owner, or overseer, or by their express order[.]"{EN-1932}

- [1785] "No slave shall go from the tenements of his master or other person with whom he lives, without a pass, or some letter or token whereby it may appear that he is proceeding by authority of his master, employer, or overseer: If he does, it shall be lawful for any person to apprehend and carry him before a justice of the peace, to be * * * punished with stripes or not, in his discretion.

> " * * * [U]nlawful assemblies, trespasses, and seditious speeches, by a slave or slaves, shall be punished with stripes, at the discretion of a justice of the peace[.]"{EN-1933}

(b) To render impotent rebellions and other crimes that could not be prevented, Virginia prohibited slaves and free people of color as well from, and punished them for, possessing firearms (or other weapons), except under one or another form of close supervision by their masters or public officials:

- [1639] "ALL persons except negroes to be provided with arms and amunition or be fined[.]"{EN-1934}

• [1680] "[I]t shall not be lawfull for any negroe or other slave to carry or arme himselfe with any club, staffe, gunn, sword or any other weapon of defence or offence[.]"{EN-1935}

• [1705 and 1709] "That no slave go armed with gun, sword, club, staff, or other weapon * * * : And if any slave shall be found offending herein, it shall be lawful for any person or persons to apprehend and deliver such slave to the next constable or head-borough, who is hereby * * * required, without further order or warrant, to give such slave twenty lashes on his or her bare back, well laid on, and so send him or her home[.]"{EN-1936}

Violations of this statute were to be "prosecuted according to the Strictest Severity & Rigor of the Common Law as such Disobedience requires".{EN-1937}

• [1723] "[N]o negro, mulatto, or Indian whatsoever; (except as hereafter excepted,) shall * * * presume to keep, or carry any gun, powder, shot, or any club, or other weapon whatsoever, offensive or defensive; but that every gun, and all powder and shot, and every such club or weapon * * * found or taken in the hands, custody, or possession of any such negro, mulatto, or Indian, shall be taken away; and * * * be forfeited to the seisor and informer, and moreover, every such negro, mulatto, or Indian, in whose hands, custody, or possession, the same shall be found, shall * * * receive any number of lashes, not exceeding thirty-nine, well laid on, on his or her bare back, for every such offence.

" * * * Provided nevertheless, That every free negro, mullatto, or indian, being a house-keeper, or listed in the militia, may be permitted to keep one gun, powder, and shot; and that those who are not house-keepers, nor listed in the militia * * * , who are now possessed of any gun, powder, shot, or any weapon, offensive or defensive, may sell and dispose thereof, at any time before the last day of October next ensuing. And that all negros, mullattos, or indians, bond or free, living at any frontier plantation, be permitted to keep and use guns, powder, and shot, or other weapons, offensive or defensive; having first obtained a license for the same, from some justice of the peace of the county wherein such plantations lie * * * upon the application of such free negros, mullattos, or indians, or of the owner or owners of such as are slaves[.]"{EN-1938}

• [1748] "[N]o negroe, mulattoe, or Indian whatsoever, shall keep, or carry any gun, powder, shot, club, or other weapon, whatsoever, offensive, or defensive, but all and every gun, weapon, and ammunition, found in the custody or possession of any negroe, mulattoe, or Indian, may be seized by any person, and * * * be forfeited to the seizor, for his own use; and moreover, every such offender shall * * * receive * * * any number of lashes, not exceeding thirty nine, on his, or her bare back, well laid on, for every such offence.

> " * * * Provided nevertheless, That every free negroe, mulattoe, or Indian, being a house keeper, may be permitted to keep one gun, powder, and shot: And all negroes, mulattoes, and Indians, bond or free, living at any frontier plantation, may be permitted to keep and use guns, powder, shot, and weapons, offensive, or defensive, by license, from a justice of peace, of the county wherein such plantations lie, to be obtained upon the application of free negroes, mulattoes, or Indians, or of the owners of such as are slaves[.]"{EN-1939}
>
> • [1785] "No slave shall keep any arms whatever, nor pass unless with written orders from his master or employer, or in his company with arms, from one place to another. Arms in possession of a slave contrary to this prohibition, shall be forfeited to him who will seize them."{EN-1940}

Revealingly, as draconian as these statutes were, in the post-constitutional period the discrimination against people of color became even worse. For example:

> [1832] "No free negro or mulatto shall be suffered to keep or carry any firelock of any kind, any military weapon, or any powder or lead; and any free negro or mulatto who shall so offend, shall * * * forfeit all such arms and ammunition to the use of the informer; and shall moreover be punished with stripes * * * , not exceeding thirty lashes. And [an earlier Act] * * * authorizing justices of the peace, in certain cases, to permit slaves to keep and use guns or other weapons, powder and shot; and so much of th[at] * * * act as authorizes the county and corporation courts to grant licenses to free negroes and mulattoes to keep or carry any firelock of any kind, any military weapon, or any powder or lead, * * * are hereby repealed."{EN-1941}

(c) During the period surrounding the War of Independence, Virginians refused to consider the wholesale enrollment of slaves for service in their Militia or the recruitment of slaves for their regular Armed Forces. Doubtlessly, this reluctance stemmed in no small measure from the attempt by the truculent Lord Dunmore, Virginia's last Royal Governor, to recruit Virginians' slaves in aid of suppression of Virginia's patriots. On 7 November 1775, Dunmore issued a proclamation,"declar[ing] all indented Servants, Negroes, or others, (appertaining to Rebels), free that are able and willing to bear Arms, they joining His Majesty's Troops as soon as may be, for the more speedily reducing this Colony to a proper sense of their Duty".{EN-1942} His obvious intent was to mobilize the large numbers and presumed desires for vengeance of freed bondsmen to provide "an overmatch for the freemen" then in rebellion against the Crown. And Virginians plainly understood that to be his plan—and his anticipation of success in that endeavor to be not without foundation—when they referred to Dunmore's proclamation as one important ground for increasing their military exertions in order to win their independence from Great Britain:

> WHEREAS the earl of Dunmore, by his many hostile attacks upon the good people of this colony, and attempts to infringe their rights and liberties, by his proclamation declaring freedom to our servants and slaves, and arming them against us, by seizing our persons and properties, and declaring those who opposed such his arbitrary measures in a state of rebellion, hath made it necessary that an additional number of forces be raised for our protection and defence[.]{EN-1943}

Besides redoubling their own efforts, Virginians in arms against the British also threatened with dire punishment every one of their own slaves who took up arms against them:

> [1775] "[I]f any slave, or slaves, shall be hereafter taken in arms against this colony, or in the possession of any enemy, through their own choice, the committee of safety shall have full power and authority to transport such slave, or slaves, to any of the foreign West India islands, there to be disposed of by sale, and the money arising from such sale to be laid out in the purchase of arms and ammunition, or otherwise applied to the use of this colony, as the committee of safety shall judge most proper; and in case such slaves, so taken in arms, or in the possession of any enemy, cannot be transported with convenience to this colony, the same shall be disposed of for the use of this colony, or returned to the owner or owners of such slaves, or otherwise dealt with according to an act of assembly for punishing slaves committing capital offenses, as the committee of safety may judge most proper."{EN-1944}

And they refused to enlist any persons of color in their own Armed Forces, without official proof that the volunteers were in fact free men:

> [1777] "And whereas several negro slaves have deserted from their masters, and under pretence of being free men have enlisted as soldiers: For prevention whereof, Be it enacted, that is shall not be lawful for any recruiting officer within this commonwealth to enlist any negro or mulatto into the service of this or either of the United States, until such negro or mulatto shall produce a certificate from some justice of the peace for the county wherein he resides that he is a free man."{EN-1945}

(2) From the foregoing can be extracted two principles of *pre-*constitutional "gun control" in Virginia that appertained or related to the Peculiar Institution:

• A right to possess arms could be denied on the basis of an individual's condition of servitude. Personal disarmament was an unavoidable "badge and incident of slavery", enforced by law, which could be mitigated in particular instances only by the permission of a slave's master or of some public official.

•A right to possess arms could be denied simply on the basis of an individual's race, irrespective of his actual condition of servitude. As, for example, the statutes of 1723 and 1748 (quoted above) demonstrate, many free persons of color were prohibited from possessing firearms, doubtlessly at least in part as an expedient means to simplify enforcement of the strict prohibition against possession of any weapons by slaves. For if, in general, no (or very few) persons of color could lawfully have possessed firearms, vanishingly few slaves could ever have hoped to succeed in openly violating the law, because the combination in plain sight of a colored person's race and his possession of a firearm was prima facie evidence of his guilt. And, in a society economically dependent upon slavery, this glaring discrimination against free people of color was all too easily rationalized by the notion that all people of color were "a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them".[987]

Yet, as to free people of color, the discriminatory policy was not particularly well thought out. Throughout the Eighteenth Century, basically "all free male persons whatsoever" (if able-bodied and not specially exempted for one reason or another) were listed in Virginia's Militia.{EN-1946} But free male persons of color listed in the Militia were generally "emploied [only] as drummers or trumpeters" or "were obliged * * * to do the duty of pioneers, or * * * other servile labour", rather than to perform standard military duties as foot soldiers or cavalry in regular Militia Companies.{EN-1947} Between 1723 and 1748, free persons of color were permitted to possess no more than one firearm and ammunition, either because they were housekeepers—that is, "master[s] of a family",[988] or because they were listed in the Militia, or because they were "living at any frontier plantation". Presumably, though, possession of a firearm by these people was allowed for purposes of personal self-defense alone, because under the Militia Act of 1738 "all such free mulattos, negros, or Indians, as are or shall be listed, * * * shall appear [for their Militia service] without arms".{EN-1948} (Although the Militia Act of 1723 was not explicit on this point, that was probably how it, too, was actually applied.{EN-1949}) This explicit limitation was necessary, because free persons of color listed in the Militia could possess firearms perforce simply of that listing, but legislators did not want them to perform Militia duty with firearms (perhaps because they did not want them well trained in the efficient use of arms). After 1748, though, only free persons of color who were housekeepers, or who "liv[ed] at any frontier plantation" and were licensed by a Justice of the Peace, were permitted to possess firearms. But

---

[987] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 404-405 (1857) (opinion of Taney, C.J.).

[988] Then, as now, "housekeeper" was defined as "householder; master of a family", and "householder" was defined as "master of a family". S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions. See, e.g., Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1207.

certainly some of them were also listed in the Militia. So the express prohibition against persons of color appearing for their Militia service with arms had to be continued in the Militia Acts from 1755 through 1771.{EN-1950}

One must wonder, however, what sense inhered in distinctions amongst and even discrimination against free people of color who were listed in the Militia but not housekeepers, those who were both housekeepers and listed in the Militia, those who were housekeepers but not listed in the Militia, and those who were "living at any frontier plantation", when it came to who should be armed. Surely it was sensible to allow all housekeepers—and especially all persons who "liv[ed] at any frontier plantation"—to be armed, in order to protect their families, even if they were not listed in the Militia. But it would have been even more sensible to have allowed every person of color who was listed in the Militia, housekeeper or not and wherever he happened to live, to be armed, in order to maximize the entire community's ability to protect itself.

Interestingly, the class of housekeepers who were not listed in the Militia doubtlessly included widows and some single women, as well as some superannuated or otherwise not-able-bodied men. That all of these individuals in such disfavored groups as Negroes, Mulattoes, and Indians were apparently permitted to be armed under the statutes of 1723 and 1748 indicates that essentially no otherwise innocent housekeeper, male or female, or of any race, was to be disarmed under color of law. For nothing in Virginia's pre-constitutional history suggests that White women, or old or infirm White men, were ever systematically disarmed; and the statutes of 1723 and 1748 expressly permitted non-White housekeepers (implicitly of all descriptions) to arm themselves. So, statutory disarmament of any free Virginians must have applied almost exclusively to single male individuals of color who neither were housekeepers nor "liv[ed] at any frontier plantation".

Today, of course, "gun control" of Virginia's pre-constitutional variety could still be imposed on individuals justifiably sentenced to "slavery [ ]or involuntary servitude * * * as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted".[989] But no "gun control" of that type could be imposed upon any innocent individual simply on the basis of his race.[990]

(3) These statutes cast in sharp relief the practical distinctions Virginians made between people held in slavery (and those subject to related racial discrimination) and the Militia during the pre-constitutional era. First, slaves (and even free people in league with them) could not freely associate, let alone organize themselves; whereas, in complete contrast, the Militia was the total association and organization of the community. Second, slaves (and even most free people of color)

---

[989] U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1. See post, at 749-749, 993-998, and 1011-1013.

[990] See U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

could not possess firearms without special permission and supervision; whereas, in contrast, in the Militia everyone except conscientious objectors was required personally to possess at least one firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements at all times. Third, slaves (and, again, free people of color) could not or would not be trained to arms, even under strict supervision; whereas, "a well regulated militia" was, by definition, "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".[991]

c. Disloyal citizens. In the hierarchy of *pre-*constitutional Virginians' domestic enemies, arguably the most dangerous were disloyal citizens, because they undermined the community's political cohesion in a manner beyond the capacity of any other enemies. No inducement would have encouraged any large number of Virginians to take up arms on behalf of hostile Indians or rebellious slaves, let alone to aid common criminals. But, under the confusion and allure of subversive political doctrines and promises, some Virginians might have separated themselves into mutually antagonistic factions, jeopardizing everyone's security, prosperity, and even independence. So the disloyal could not be allowed to exercise exactly the same rights loyal citizens enjoyed. The private possession of arms being central to the community's defense, on more than one critical occasion Virginia's legislators mandated the disarmament of disloyal citizens.

(1) During the French and Indian War, American Catholics (disparaged as "Papists" in the idiom of that day) were suspected of disloyalty throughout the Colonies, not just because France was largely a Catholic country and the British Empire predominately Protestant, but perhaps more importantly because all Catholics presumably opposed the established Church of England and the Protestant monopoly over the British Crown.[992] For that reason, a statute enacted in Virginia in 1756 prescribed that,

> WHEREAS it is dangerous at this time to permit Papists to be armed, * * * it shall, and may be lawful, for any two or more justices of the peace, who shall know, or suspect any person to be a Papist, * * * to tender to such person * * * the oaths appointed by act of parliament to be taken * * * ; and if such person * * * shall refuse to take the said oaths, * * * or shall refuse, or forebear to appear * * * for the taking the said oaths, * * * such person * * * shall be * * * liable and subject to all and every the penalties, forfeitures, and disabilities hereafter in this act mentioned.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * And for the better securing the lives and properties of his majesty's faithful subjects, * * * no Papist, or reputed Papist so refusing, > or making default * * * , shall, or may have, or keep in his house or elsewhere, or in the possession of any other person to his use, or at his disposition, any arms, weapons, gunpowder or ammunition, (other than such necessary weapons as shall be allowed to him, by order of the justices of the peace * * * , for the defence of his house or person) and that any two or more justices of the peace * * * may authorise and impower any person or persons in the day-time, with the assistance of the constables * * * to search for all arms, weapons, gunpowder or ammunition, which shall be in the house, custody, or possession of any such Papist, or reputed Papist, and seize the same for the use of his majesty and his successors * * * .

---

[991] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[992] See, e.g., W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 210-217.

>
> * * * [E]very Papist, or reputed Papist, who shall not, within the space of ten days after such refusal, or making default * * * , discover and deliver * * * to some of his majesty's justices of the peace, all arms, weapons, gunpowder or ammunition, which he shall have in his house or elsewhere, or which shall be in the possession of any person to his use, or at his disposition, or shall hinder or disturb any person or persons, authorised * * * to search for, and seize the same; that every such person so offending * * * shall be committed to the goal of the county wherein he shall commit such offence, * * * there to remain without bail or mainprize for the space of three months, and shall also forfeit and lose the said arms, and pay treble the value of them to the use of his majesty and his successors * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * Provided always, That if any person who shall have refused or made default * * * shall desire to submit and conform * * * and shall * * * in open court take the said oaths, * * * he shall from thenceforth be discharged of and from all disabilities and forfeitures[.] {EN-1951}

Interestingly, the sanctions with respect to possession of arms imposed against presumptively disloyal Catholics at this point in time were rather less severe than those meted out to slaves throughout the *pre-*constitutional era—perhaps indicating that the charge of Catholics' disloyalty partook more of religious-historical form than of real political substance, whereas no one ever seriously doubted that slaves in no small numbers were quite likely to revolt if afforded the opportunity and allowed to acquire the means. Catholics who refused to take the prescribed oaths were required to disclose the existence and surrender all of the firearms and ammunition in their possession and subject to their control, and to submit to searches of their property for arms and seizures of such arms as were found—or be committed to jail, suffer expropriation of their arms, and be fined triple the arms' value. They were, however, not entirely disarmed, even if they were believed to be disloyal. For the statute permitted them to retain "such necessary weapons as shall be allowed * * * by order of the justices of the peace * * * for the defence of * * * house or person"—the imperative "shall be allowed" indicating that the Justices perhaps lacked discretion to make no such allowance at all, but certainly not precluding them from determining in any particular case what might have constituted "necessary weapons" for purposes of some individual's personal defense. Moreover, any Catholic could have avoided all of the statute's prohibitions and penalties simply by taking the prescribed loyalty oaths.

(2) During the War of Independence, the problem of disloyalty arose again, albeit without openly religious overtones. And, once more, disarmament was prescribed or enforced as part of the penalty. For instance, in 1776, Virginia's Convention decreed "[t]hat if any free person or persons shall in any manner, or by any device, ways, or means, aid, abet, or assist the enemy, he, she, or they, so offending, * * * shall forfeit all his, her, or their estates, real and personal, to the use of the commonwealth, and moreover be imprisoned * * * , not extending beyond the continuance of the present war with Great Britain".{EN-1952} Although this Ordinance did not provide in so many words for confiscation of disloyal individuals' firearms, it was accompanied in operation by a mandated "test oath"—and those refusing to take this oath were stripped of their arms and ammunition (but usually received some financial compensation for their losses).[993]

Then, in 1777, Virginia's General Assembly provided that,

> WHEREAS allegiance and protection are reciprocal, and those who will not bear the former are not entitled to the benefits of the latter, * * * all free born male inhabitants of this state, above the age of sixteen years, except imported servants during the time of their service, shall * * * , take and subscribe * * * [a prescribed] oath or affirmation [of allegiance] * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [T]he court of every county * * * shall appoint some of their members to make a tour of the county, and tender the oath or affirmation to every free born male person above the age of sixteen years, except as before excepted; and * * * in the certificate * * * returned * * * shall be mentioned the names of such as refuse. And * * * the * * * chief commanding officer of the militia * * * is * * * directed forthwith to cause such recusants to be disarmed.
>
> Provided, That the person so disarmed shall, nevertheless, be obliged to attend musters, but shall be exempted from the fines imposed for appearing * * * without arms, accoutrements, and ammunition.
>
> * * * [E]very person above the age before mentioned, except as before excepted, refusing or neglecting to take and subscribe the oath or affirmation aforesaid, shall, during the time of such neglect or refusal, be incapable of holding any office in this state, serving on juries, suing for any > debts, electing or being elected, or buying lands, tenements, or hereditaments.{EN-1953}

---

[993] See H. Eckenrode, The Revolution in Virginia, ante note 644, at 118-119, 136-137.

Revealingly, under this statute disloyal citizens were impressed with many of the most degrading "badges and incidents" of slavery and related racial discrimination. First and foremost, they were disarmed, yet required to attend Militia musters without arms—in precisely the same way that free people of color were.{EN-1954} In addition, just as were slaves, they were deprived of other important attributes of citizenship, including the rights to vote, to hold public office, to serve on juries, to petition the courts for legal relief, and to own real property. Thus, this statute emphasized (if emphasis were needed) that armed service in the Militia—and, implicitly, the right to keep and bear arms for and in that service—was of the highest political and legal stature.

This form of "gun control" and associated losses of rights were not the worst punishments that threatened disloyal Virginians during the War of Independence, however. For, in 1781, the General Assembly decreed that,

> WHEREAS in this time of public danger, it is necessary to invest the executive with the most ample powers, both for the purpose of strenuous opposition to the enemy, and also to provide for the punctual execution of the laws, on which the safety and welfare of the commonwealth depends[,] * * * [t]he governor, with the advice of the council, is * * * empowered to apprehend or cause to be apprehended and committed to close confinement, any person or persons whatsoever, whom they may have just cause to suspect of disaffection to the independence of the United States or of attachment to their enemies, and such person or persons shall not be set at liberty by bail, mainprize or habeas corpus. The governor, with the advice of council, is also * * * empowered, if necessary, to send within the enemy's lines, any person or persons who hath or have heretofore refused to take the oaths of allegiance, unless such refusal shall have arisen from religious scruples or other reasons equally satisfactory, and whom they shall have good cause to suspect, do still continue inimical to the independence of the United States; and also any person or persons having been previously convicted by testimony on oath before the said executive of disaffection to the government, giving any person or persons at the least twenty days notice of such banishment, that he or they may have an opportunity to dispose of his or their property, which they are hereby permitted to do. And any person refusing to go when so ordered, or returning after having so gone within the enemy's lines, shall be adjudged guilty of felony and shall suffer death without benefit of clergy. * * * If any person or persons shall make opposition by force to laws for the express purpose of calling men into the field for the defence of this state, he or they shall be considered as civilly dead as to his or their property, which shall go and descend to his or their > next heir, or be distributed among his or their next of kin according to law; every such person shall also incur and suffer all the pains, penalties and forfeitures of a premunire.{EN-1955}

Thus,

• Any person disaffected to the independence of the United States was to be committed to "close confinement"—and of course disarmed during that confinement.

• Any person who refused without good reason to take the oaths of allegiance or who had been convicted of disaffection was to be deprived of his citizenship entirely and banished by being "sen[t] within the enemy's lines", having first been afforded an opportunity to dispose of his property (doubtlessly at distress prices)—so he could not depart with any arms that he might have possessed. This was only fitting, though, because, [w]hen the citizens at large govern for the public good * * * in such a state the profession of arms will always have the greatest share in the government",[994] and therefore those who are legitimately stripped of their citizenship can expect to suffer dispossession of their arms.

• Any disaffected person refusing to leave Virginia, or returning after entering the enemy's lines, was to be put to death—besides which punishment mere disarmament was trivial. And,

• Any person temerarious enough forcibly to oppose the laws for calling men to military service—including, presumably, Virginia's Militia laws—was to be deprived of every personal legal claim to his property, including arms, and to "suffer all the pains, penalties and forfeitures of a premunire".

This threat of being subject to "all the pains, penalties, and forfeitures of a premunire" is perhaps the most interesting of all, because today it is the most unfamiliar. Under old English law, persons guilty of the offense of "praemunire" were to "be put out of the king's protection, their lands and goods forfeited to the king's use, and they [themselves] * * * attached by their bodies to answer to the king and his council". Moreover, "such [a] delinquent * * * c[ould] bring no action for any private injury, how atrocious soever; being so far out of the protection of the law, that it w[ould] not guard his civil rights, nor remedy any grievance which he as an individual m[ight] suffer. And no man, knowing him to be guilty, c[ould] with safety give him comfort, aid, or relief."[995]

---

[994] Aristotle, Politics, Book III, Chapter VII, in A TREATISE ON GOVERNMENT OR, THE POLITICS OF ARISTOTLE, ante note 73, at 79.

[995] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 112, 118 (footnote omitted). See W. Hawkins, A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter XIX, §§ 45 through 47, at 55. A conviction under "praemunire", then, shared many characteristics with outlawry. See Blackstone, ante, Volume 1, at 142; Volume 3, at 283-284; and Volume 4, at 314-315.

Although archaic and rather severe in practice, in principle "praemunire" would be a peculiarly appropriate and deserved charge to level against contemporary "gun controllers". For under *pre-*constitutional Anglo-American law, "[t]o obtain an exclusive patent for the sole making or importation of gunpowder or arms, or to hinder others from importing them, [wa]s * * * a praemunire".[996] In this light, many of the unconstitutional "hind[rances]" that modern rogue officials, at the instigation of various malign factions and special-interest groups, have set up against common Americans' dealing in firearms and ammunition amount to rather obvious violations of this principle of "praemunire"—enforceable through the Constitution's incorporation of "the Militia of the several States" and its guarantee of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", as explained in this study.

In addition, the principles of "praemunire" could be invoked against the Federal Reserve System's emission of paper currency, irredeemable in either silver or gold. For, during *pre-*constitutional times, "the offence of acting as a broker or agent in any usurious contract, where above ten per cent. interest is taken", and "all unwarrantable undertakings by unlawful subscriptions, then commonly known by the name of bubbles", were violations of "praemunire".[997] So, because a loan of fictitious currency is necessarily an "usurious contract" at an arguably infinite rate of interest (the currency loaned having been created out of nothing), the entire Ponzi scheme of modern central banking, and the huge variety of corrupt financial manipulations, "bail outs", and other "bubbles" it facilitates, all amount to violations of this principle of "praemunire"—again, enforceable through the Constitution.[998]

Finally, the principles of "praemunire" could interdict various schemes for subordinating the United States to some foreign nation or to some regional or global *supra-*national government. For, since the days of King Edward I, "introducing a foreign power into th[e] land, and creating imperium in imperio", was "the original meaning of the offence * * * call[ed] praemunire".[999] So, every rogue public official whoring for some foreign power or plumping for the erection of a so-called "New World Order" to which the United States would be subordinated is chargeable with violating this fundamental principle of "praemunire". In this instance, "praemunire" could be enforced through the Declaration of Independence as well as the Constitution—namely, that: (i) The Declaration asserts the right of each State, and of their association in the United States, to those "separate and equal station[s]" "among the powers of the earth" "to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them"; whereas, subordination of any of the States, let alone the United

---

[996] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 116.

[997] Id., Volume 4, at 115, 117.

[998] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 1401-1524.

[999] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 114.

States as a whole, to some foreign nation or to a supra-national government would necessarily obliterate such "separate and equal station[s]". And (ii) the Constitution requires the United States to "guarantee to every State in th[e] Union a Republican Form of Government",[1000] "one constructed on th[e] principle, that the Supreme Power resides in the body of the people" of those very States;[1001] whereas, allowing a foreign state or some supra-national government to exercise any political influence, let alone actual legal sway over the United States, in whole or in part, would necessarily transfer some, or in the event of the erection of a true "world government" even all, of "the Supreme Power" from Americans to foreigners.

Today, "gun control" of Virginia's pre-constitutional variety could still be imposed on individuals guilty of certain types of disloyalty. For example, if an individual were "convicted of Treason * * * on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court",[1002] he could justifiably be sentenced to "slavery * * * as [the] punishment for [the] crime whereof * * * [he] shall have been duly convicted",[1003] and thereby totally disarmed for the duration of his sentence, because Congress could "declare the Punishment of Treason" to be "slavery", and the preëminent "badge and incident" of slavery is a slave's disarmament.[1004] Of course, in the exercise of its discretion, Congress also could punish "Treason" simply by imposing lifetime disarmament on the perpetrator, without any other "badge and incident" of slavery. To be sure, consistently with the Eighth Amendment, Congress may not "declare [any] Punishment of Treason" under color of which "excessive fines [are] imposed, [ ]or cruel and unusual punishments inflicted" (although one must wonder what could constitute an "excessive fine[ ]" when the Constitution explicitly allows for "Attainder of Treason" and "Forfeiture * * * during the Life of the Person attainted").[1005] But, inasmuch as (i) slavery existed throughout America when the Eight Amendment was ratified and was not abolished or its mere existence in any way hindered pursuant to it, and (ii) the Thirteenth Amendment was ratified after the Eighth Amendment and to the extent of any inconsistency between the two repeals or qualifies it—therefore "slavery * * * as a punishment for crime" cannot be deemed in principle always either to impose "excessive fines" or to inflict "cruel and unusual punishments". In practice however, the imposition of "slavery * * * as a[n excessive] punishment for [relatively minor] crime[s]" could conceivably violate the Eighth

---

[1000] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[1001] See Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 457 (1793) (opinion of Wilson, J.).

[1002] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

[1003] U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1.

[1004] Compare U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 2 with W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 416.

[1005] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 2 with amend. VIII.

Amendment, because "it is a precept of justice that punishment for crime should be graduated and proportioned to the offense",[1006] and therefore that Amendment should bar "all punishments which by their excessive length or severity are greatly disproportioned to the offenses charged".[1007]

C. Internal police regulations to prevent the misuse of otherwise legitimate arms. Finally, some "gun control" arising in the very earliest days in pre-constitutional Virginia, which no reasonable individual would consider at all controversial today, aimed at the protection of private property, the promotion of personal safety, and the maintenance of public propriety. For example,

> • [1639] "NOT to shoot or hunt on other men's land that is seated and bounds marked under penalty of 40[shillings] but may pursue deer and shoot on their own land."{EN-1956}
>
> • [1643, 1645, 1658, and 1662] "WHEREAS the rights and interests of the inhabitants are very much infringed by hunting and shooting of divers men vpon their neighbours lands and dividents contrary to the priviledges granted to them by their patents, whereby many injuries do dayly happen to the great damage of the owners of the land whereon such hunting or shooting is vsed, It is therefore enacted * * * that if any planter or person shall hunt or shoot vpon or within the precincts or lymitts of his neighbour or other divident without leave first obtained for his soe doing, and having been warned by the owner of the land to forbear hunting and shooting as aforesaid, he or they soe offending shall forfeit for everie such offence foure hundred pounds of tobacco * * * —Notwithstanding it shall and may be lawfull for any person or planter to hunt and shoot upon any divident of land not being planted or seated without any restraint or penalty, Provided that the lymitts of everie divident be bounded with certain and noted marks. Provided also that it shall be lawfull for any person having shott a deare or other game without the lymitts of any man's land to pursue the said deare or game into the divident of another man, and freely to carry away the same without any trespass against the owner or proprietor of the said land and without incurring the penalty of this * * * act."{EN-1957}
>
> • [1643] "Be it * * * enacted * * * , for the better observation of the Saboth and for the restraint of divers abuses committed in the collony by vnlawfull shooting on the Sabbath day * * * , vnles it shall be for the safety of his or their plantations or corne fields or for defence against the Indians, he or they so offending shall forfeit for his or their first offence * * * if he be a freeman the quantity of twenty pounds of tobacco, and if a servant to be punished at the discretion of his master, And if masters of any such servants be remisse and negligent in the punishing of his servant for the offence * * * he shall be liable to the forfeiture of twenty pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1958}

---

[1006] Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 367 (1910).

[1007] O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U.S. 323, 339-340 (1892) (Field, J., dissenting).

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

The Resolution of the Continental Congress of 18 July 1775 provides an excellent summary of the major principles of "the Militia of the several States" as the Founding Fathers understood them from their own personal experience.

A complete study of all of the pre-constitutional Militia and related statutes of all of the original Thirteen Colonies other than Pennsylvania, and then of all of the independent States, would confirm each and every one of the conclusions set out heretofore for Rhode Island and Virginia.[1008] Such an undertaking would prove both tedious and unnecessary for the average student of these matters, though, inasmuch as the Continental Congress—a body that, perhaps more than any other at the time, was in a position to develop an overview of the situation as comprehensive as it was accurate—provided an adequate summary in its Resolution of 18 July 1775:

> The Congress resumed the report of the Committee for putting the Militia into a proper state of defence and after debating the same by paragraphs came to the following resolutions:
>
> Resolved, That it be recommended to the inhabitants of all the united English Colonies in North America, that all able bodied effective men, between sixteen and fifty years of age in each colony, immediately form themselves into regular companies of Militia, to consist of one Capt[n], two lieutenants, one ensign, four serjeants, four corporals, one clerk, one drummer, one fifer, and about 68 privates.
>
> That the officers of each company be chosen by the respective companies.
>
> That each soldier be furnished with a good musket, that will carry an ounce ball, with a bayonet, steel ram-rod, worm, priming wire and brush fitted thereto, a cutting sword or tomahawk, a cartridge-box, that will contain 23 rounds of cartridges, twelve flints and a knapsack.
>
> That the Companies be formed into Regiments or Battalions, officered with a Colonel, lieutenant Colonel, two Majors, an Adjutant, and Quarter Master.

[1008] See generally as the minimum resource necessary for such research The Selective Service System, Backgrounds of Selective Service, Military Obligation: The American Tradition, A Compilation of the Enactments of Compulsion From the Earliest Settlements of the Original Thirteen Colonies in 1607 Through the Articles of Confederation 1789, Special Monograph No. 1, Volume II (14 Parts) (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1947).

That all officers above the Rank of a captain, be appointed by their respective provincial assemblies or conventions, or in their recess, by the committees of safety appointed by s[d] assemblies or conventions.

That all officers be commissioned by the provincial Assemblies or conventions, or in their recess by the committees of safety appointed by s[d] Assemblies or conventions.

That all the Militia take proper care to acquire military skill, and be well prepared for defence by being each man provided with one pound of good gun powder, and four pounds of ball, fitted to his gun.

That one fourth part of the Militia in every Colony, be selected for minute men, of such persons as are willing to enter into this necessary service, formed into companies and Battalions, and their officers chosen and commissioned as aforesaid, to be ready on the shortest notice, to march to any place where their assistance may be required, for the defence of their own or a neighbouring colony; And as these minute men may eventually be called to action before the whole body of the militia are sufficiently trained, it is recommended that a more particular and diligent attention be paid to their instruction in military discipline.

That such of the minute men, as desire it, be relieved by new draughts as aforesaid, from the whole body of the Militia, once in four months.

As there are some people, who, from religious principles, cannot bear arms in any case, this Congress intend no violence to their consciences, but earnestly recommend it to them, to contribute liberally in this time of universal calamity, to the relief of their distressed brethren in the several colonies, and to do all other services to their oppressed Country, which they can consistently with their religious principles.

That it be recommended to the assemblies or Conventions in the respective colonies to provide, as soon as possible, sufficient stores of ammunition for their colonies; Also that they devise proper means for furnishing with Arms, such effective men as are poor and unable to furnish themselves.

That it be recommended to each Colony to appoint a committee of safety, to superintend and direct all matters necessary for the security and defence of their respective colonies, in the recess of their assemblies and conventions.

That each colony, at their own expence, make such provision by armed vessels or otherwise, as their respective assemblies, conventions, or committees of safety shall judge expedient and suitable to their circumstances and situations, for the protection of their harbours and navigation on their sea coasts, against all unlawful invasions, attacks, and depredations, from cutters and ships of war.

That it be recommended to the makers of arms for the use of the Militia, that they make good substantial muskets, with barrels three feet and half in length, that will carry an ounce ball, and fitted with a good > bayonet and steel ram-rod, and that the making such arms be encouraged in these United Colonies.

>
> Where in any colony a militia is already formed under regulations approved of by the convention of such colony, or by such assemblies as are annually elective, we refer to the discretion of such convention or assembly, either to adopt the foregoing regulations in the whole or in part, or to continue their former, as they, on consideration of all circumstances, shall think best.[1009]

This Resolution rather neatly encapsulates the most important principles of the pre-constitutional Militia, including:

- Near-universal service—by "all able bodied effective men, between sixteen and fifty years of age in each colony".
- Local organization—in small "regular companies of Militia", usually of less than one hundred members.
- Local selection of officers—either "chosen by [the people themselves in] the[ir] respective [Militia] companies" by direct democracy or "appointed by the[people's own] respective provincial assemblies or conventions" according to the Republican Principle.[1010]
- Universal training—"[t]hat all the Militia take proper care to acquire military skill".
- Selective assignments to particular duties—that "a more particular and diligent attention be paid to the[ ] instruction in military discipline" of such parts of the Militia as "may eventually be called to action before the whole body of the militia are sufficiently trained". That is, selections from within the Militia for particular duties, rather than the creation of a "select militia" for all duties.
- The duty of every Militiaman (other than conscientious objectors) to keep and bear serviceable arms—so that "each soldier [will] be furnished with a good musket" and "provided with * * * good gun powder, and * * * ball, fitted to his gun".
- The duty of public officials to arm those Militiamen incapable of arming themselves—by "devis[ing] proper means for furnishing with Arms, such effective men as are poor and unable to furnish themselves"—and for all other Militiamen to equip themselves with arms at their own expense.

[1009] Journals of the Continental Congress, ante note 42, Volume II (May 10 to September 20, 1775), at 187-190 (footnote omitted).

[1010] "A republic" is "a government in which the scheme of representation takes place". The Federalist No. 10 (James Madison).

• Primary reliance on the free market for the production of arms—with the government proposing standards with which private manufacturers should comply.

• The duty of public officials to promote a vigorous free market in arms suitable for Militia service—so that "the making of * * * arms [will] be encouraged" throughout America.

• The importance of ammunition—recognizing that, because arms without ammunition are of limited utility, public officials are obliged to ensure that the Militia have access to "sufficient stores of ammunition" at all times.

• Rotation in service—that Militiamen selected for special service "be relieved by new draughts * * * from the whole body of the Militia" on some regular basis.

• Limited exemption from Militia duties for conscientious objectors—who must perform "all * * * services" other than bearing arms "which they can consistently with their religious principles".

• Recognition of the States' concurrent and even superior authority over the Militia—so that the States retain "the discretion * * * either to adopt * * * [Congressional] regulations in the whole or in part, or to continue their [own regulations] * * * , as they, on consideration of all circumstances, shall think best", so long as all of these regulations are mutually compatible. And, of particular importance today,

• The need for special institutions capable of overseeing "homeland security" in each of the States at all times—such as "a committee of safety, to superintend and direct all matters necessary for the security and defence of the[ ] respective" States "in the recess of their assemblies and conventions".

Part Three

CONCLUSIONS

A good militia is of such importance to a nation, that it is the chief part of the constitution of any free government. For though as to other things, the constitution be never so slight, a good militia will always preserve the publick liberty. But in the best constitution that ever was, as to all other parts of government, if the militia be not upon the right foot, the liberty of that people must perish.

Andrew Fletcher

The quotation on the preceding page is taken from A DISCOURSE OF GOVERNMENT WITH RELATION TO MILITIAS (Edinburgh, Scotland: M. Cooper, 1755 reprint of the 1688 edition), at 41.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN

The pre-constitutional Militia statutes of the Colonies and independent States establish at least seventeen fundamental principles that define the constitutional structure and service of revitalized "Militia of the several States".

In order to draw definitive conclusions as to what the Constitution's provisions concerning "the Militia of the several States" actually mean and how they should be applied today, this study has painstakingly "review[ed] the background and environment of the period in which that constitutional language was fashioned and adopted",[1011] has "place[d the reader] as nearly as possible in the condition of the [Founding Fathers]",[1012] and has "recall[ed] the contemporary or then recent history of the controversies on the subject" that still "were fresh in the memories of those who achieved our independence and established our form of government".[1013]

With this exception: That, having analyzed in detail the pre-constitutional Militia statutes of Rhode Island and Virginia, as typical examples of the laws that all but one of the original Thirteen Colonies and then all of the independent States adopted during that era—in order to determine "[w]hat * * * those who framed and adopted [the Constitution] underst[oo]d [its] terms to designate and include",[1014] "th[e] sense in which [the words were] generally used by those for whom the instrument was intended",[1015] "the common understanding" "when the Constitution was adopted",[1016] "the common parlance of the times in which the Constitution was written",[1017] and the "accepted meaning [of the words] in that day"[1018]—this study has established that there were no "controversies on the subject"

[1011] Everson v Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947). Accord, e.g., Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, 157 U.S. 429, 558 (1895); Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581, 602 (1900); Grosjean v. American Press Company, 297 U.S. 233, 245-249 (1936).

[1012] Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, 12 (1887). Accord, e.g., South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 450 (1905).

[1013] Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 625 (1886).

[1014] Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, 157 U.S. 429, 558 (1895).

[1015] Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U.S. (12 Wheaton) 213, 332 (1827) (Marshall, C.J., dissenting).

[1016] Ohio ex rel. Popovici v. Agler, 280 U.S. 379, 383 (1930).

[1017] United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association, 322 U.S. 533, 539 (1944). Accord, Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheaton) 1, 190 (1824).

[1018] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 418 (1857).

at all. Rather, the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes embodied a remarkable unanimity with respect to the principles and practices that everyone knew as characterizing "[a] well regulated Militia"[1019] among "the Militia of the several States"[1020] in those days.

Now, having parsed and analyzed these *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes, this study can set down with legal-historical certainty at least seventeen fundamental constitutional principles of "the Militia of the several States" on the basis of which the relevant provisions of the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights can be correctly construed and should be applied. To be sure, these are not the only principles that could be drawn from the compendious *pre-*constitutional record. But they are worthy of being singled out, because they will prove to be the most useful for devising a program for revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" today—which, after all, is the practical purpose of this entire exercise. These principles are:

> ✳ "[T]he Militia of the several States" are based upon each person's individual and especially the community's collective rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and duties of self-defense under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".
>
> ✳ Each of "the Militia of the several States" must always be identified as "the Militia" of a particular State, and by no other name.
>
> ✳ *"[T]he Militia of the several States" must always be strictly differentiated from the regular "Army and Navy of the United States" and from the "Troops, or Ships of War" that the States may "keep * * * in time of Peace" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress".*
>
> ✳ "[T]he Militia of the several States" are governmental establishments, not private institutions.
>
> ✳ "[T]he Militia of the several States" perform the critically important political function of enforcing popular sovereignty both in ordinary and especially in extraordinary times.
>
> ✳ "[T]he Militia of the several States" consist of separate and independent establishments which must always exist in each and every State throughout the United States.
>
> ✳ Congress, the States, and in default thereof WE THE PEOPLE themselves must ensure that each and every one of "the Militia of the several States" is fully organized, armed, disciplined, and trained at all times.

[1019] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1020] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

✳ Near-universal membership, compulsory participation, and reasonable equality in individuals' burdens of service are necessary characteristics of "the Militia of the several States".

✳ Service in each of "the Militia of the several States" is subject only to limited exemptions, all of which in principle must be consistent with the fundamental standards of "[a] well regulated Militia" and in application must advance "the common defence" and "the general Welfare".

✳ Because the ultimate goal of "homeland security" must be WE THE PEOPLE'S own political freedom and economic well-being, and because that goal can be attained only by THE PEOPLE'S own participation where THE PEOPLE actually reside in Local communities, "the Militia of the several States" must be organized and controlled "from the bottom up", not "from the top down".

✳ Unless specifically exempted, all members of "the Militia of the several States" must acquire and thereafter at all times must maintain—and must be supported by public officials in their maintenance of—personal possession (and usually their own private ownership) of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for their Militia service.

✳ Every individual possibly eligible to be a member of "the Militia of the several States" may acquire, possess, and own as of right any firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for any type of Militia service.

✳ Every individual possibly eligible for service in "the Militia of the several States" must enjoy untrammeled access to a free market in which to obtain whatever firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements may prove useful for any type of Militia service.

✳ Every member of "the Militia of the several States" must be trained to participate in the provision of some aspect of "homeland security" for his particular State and Locality as well as for the United States as a whole.

✳ "[T]he Militia of the several States" are vested with the constitutional authority and responsibility to, and therefore must, provide every type of protection—whether political, economic, or social in character—that may be "necessary to the security of a free State" in every

State, for the United States as a whole, and ultimately for WE THE PEOPLE under whatever form of government they may establish.

✳ The primary method for enforcing discipline as well as raising revenue within revitalized "Militia of the several States" should be the imposition of fines for their members' failures, neglects, or refusals to perform their duties.

✳ Under present conditions, raising Independent Companies composed of volunteers on a Local basis provides the best means to begin revitalization of "the Militia of the several States".

In Chapters 28 through 44, each of these principles will be explained, evaluated, and applied to modern conditions.

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT

"[T]he Militia of the several States" are based upon each person's individual and especially the community's collective rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and duties of self-defense under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".

Blackstone's Commentaries provided Americans of the Founding Era with a clear explanation of the law as it related to > [T]HE defence of one's self, or the mutual and reciprocal defence of such as stand in the relations of husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant. In these cases, if the party himself, or any of these his relations, be forcibly attacked in his person or property, it is lawful for him to repel force by force; and the breach of the peace, which happens, is chargeable upon him only who began the affray. For the law, in this case, respects the passions of the human mind; and (when external violence is offered to a man himself, or those to whom he bears a near connection) makes it lawful in him to do himself that immediate justice to which he is prompted by nature, and which no prudential motives are strong enough to restrain. It considers that the future process of law is by no means an adequate remedy for injuries accompanied with force; since it is impossible to say, to what wanton lengths of rapine or cruelty outrages of this sort might be carried, unless it were permitted a man immediately to oppose one violence with another. Self-defence therefore, as it is justly called the primary law of nature, so it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society.[1021]

Blackstone, of course, was for Americans but the last in a long line of legal commentators who held that self-defense arises out of Natural Law or natural reason.[1022]

[1021] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 3-4 (footnote omitted) (bold-face emphasis supplied).

[1022] See, e.g., David B. Kopel, Paul Gallant, & Joanne D. Eisen, "The Human Right of Self-Defense", 22 Brigham Young University Journal of Public Law 43 (2008), at 60-96, describing and quoting from the teachings of Giovanni de Legnano, Francisco de Vitoria, Pierino Belli, Francisco Suarez, Alberico Gentili, Hugo Grotius, Samuel Pufendorf, Emer de Vattel, and Jean-Jacques Burlamaqui. As this article explains, however, the United Nations Organization and influential political forces and special-interest groups aligned with it are now concerting their efforts drastically to limit, if not to eliminate, the right of self-defense with firearms for private

From this, Americans in that time naturally drew several important conclusions directly applicable to their Militia:

> First, that self-defense is the ultimate law of society, because it is "the primary law of nature".
>
> Second, that self-defense is an unconditional right, privilege, and immunity, because "it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society". As such, self-defense comes within the "unalienable Rights" with which "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator".
>
> Third, that each and every individual, as the beneficiary of an unconditional right, privilege, and immunity superior to "the law of society", requires no permission from any public official (or anyone else, for that matter) to engage in self-defense.
>
> Fourth, that, as an unconditional and unalienable right, self-defense is entitled to receive support from public officials' exercise of whatever governmental powers may prove to be necessary and proper to provide for its full recognition, implementation, and effectuation through "the law of society". For, as the Declaration asserted, it is "to secure these rights, [that] Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed".[1023]
>
> Fifth, that the full recognition, implementation, and effectuation of the right of self-defense requires extrapolation, from the familial to the social level, of Blackstone's teaching that every man is entitled to defend not only himself but also "those to whom he bears a near connection"—so that the right of self-defense is understood clearly and applied completely in both of its aspects: namely, the individual, or personal; and especially the collective, or political. And,
>
> Sixth, that the exclusive purpose of and justification for self-defense—individual or collective—are, as that term itself imports, always defense, never aggression.

A. The primacy of the collective right and duty of self-defense. Most of "the good People of the[ ] Colonies" who believed that the Declaration of Independence derived its authority from "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" understood self-defense to be, not simply a personal right, but also a personal duty, with a firm theological foundation under and compulsion behind it. For inasmuch as "Nature's God" gives every human being life in order to serve His purposes, and individuals everywhere throughout the world. The evident goal of this cabal is to supplant "the primary law of nature"—and, by extension, the entire corpus of the "law of nature"—with "the law of [their] society".

---

[1023] Emphasis supplied.

inasmuch as "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator with * * * [an] unalienable Right[ ] * * * [to] Life", not only may no one wantonly deprive another human being of that person's life, but also must each beneficiary of God's gift of life defend his own life against aggressors rather than suffer it to be needlessly extinguished and God's purpose in granting it to be blasphemously thwarted. For example, a sermon delivered in 1747 in Philadelphia admonished the congregants that "[h]e that suffers his life to be taken from him by one that hath no authority for that purpose, when he might preserve it by defense, incurs the Guilt of self murder since God hath enjoined him to seek the continuance of his life, and Nature itself teaches every creature to defend himself".[1024] Of course, some Americans of that era believed that, out of charity towards an aggressor, an individual might choose to forgo his personal right of self-defense in some instances; and others were outright pacifists, for whom self-defense was always impermissible. Yet the vast majority of "the good People" knew that the choice to eschew self-defense in some or all purely personal situations could never be available when and where an individual was bound in justice to defend himself, someone else, or his community as a whole.

In contrast, in the political realm self-defense was not simply an unconditional personal right and perhaps a duty for Americans taken as individuals, but also was their unconditional and unavoidable collective right and duty taken together as a single society, all the members of which "bear[ ] a near connection" of interdependence and mutual reliance to one another. The political philosophy to which "the good People" adhered taught them in no uncertain terms that

> [n]o man can divest himself so far of his liberty as to submit to an arbitrary power, who is to treat him absolutely according to his fancy. This would be renouncing his own life, which he is not master of; it would be renouncing his duty, which is never permitted: and if thus it be with regard to an individual who should make himself a slave, much less hath an intire nation that power which is not to be found in any of its members.[1025]

In keeping with this precept, the Declaration of Independence asserted that, "when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce the[good People] under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security".[1026] This, because "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God

---

[1024] Quoted in Don B. Kates, Jr., "Handgun Prohibition and the Original Meaning of the Second Amendment", 82 Michigan Law Review 204 (1983), at 230 note 109. See also, e.g., Westminster Larger Catechism (1648), Questions Nos. 134 through 136.

[1025] Jean-Jacques Burlamaqui, THE PRINCIPLES OF POLITIC LAW: BEING A SEQUEL TO THE Principles of NATURAL LAW, Thomas Nugent, Translator (London, England: J. Nourse, 1752), Part I, Chapter VII, § 2, ¶ XXIII, at 52 (emphasis supplied).

[1026] Emphasis supplied.

always entitle the[good People]" in the first instance "to assume among the powers of the earth" a "separate and equal station", and to "institute[ ]" governments that "deriv[e] their just powers from the consent of the governed". So, in the final analysis, "the good People" are always accountable under those "Laws" for dealing with the consequences of the failure of any "Form of Government" they have established and empowered—or even simply allowed—to act in their name and by dint of their authority. For that authority is not theirs to abuse or to permit to be abused by others, having been delegated to them for the sole purpose of seeing to it that they order their society in compliance with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". Thus, when any degenerate "Form of Government" finally devolves into such a sump of oppression that its "evils" are no longer "sufferable", political self-defense becomes no longer optional but imperative.

Moreover, "the good People" realized that simply being imperative in political principle would never guarantee that their right and duty of self-defense against oppression could always be invoked in a timely and efficacious manner in practice. After all, by the time oppression had become intolerable to the people, the oppressors' iron sway, efficiency, and ruthlessness would have approached their apogees, too. Nothing would then dissuade such evil rulers from attempting to apply whatever force might be necessary to deny "the good People" the opportunity to exercise their right of self-defense to the least degree, let alone in a decisive manner. Then what?

Were self-defense truly a right, an effective remedy against its denial would always be available. For "[a] right without a remedy * * * may be said not to exist".[1027] So "'every right, when withheld, must have a remedy, and every injury its proper redress'".[1028] Certainly every legally literate American who lived in the pre-constitutional era would have dismissed as an absurd self-contradiction, and rank political effrontery, the contention that self-defense (as Blackstone held) cannot be "taken away by the law of society" but that nevertheless "the law of society" could withhold adequate means to put self-defense into practice under whatever circumstances might necessitate it, for individuals or for the community as a whole—and that therefore "the good People" were hapless, helpless, and hopeless in the face of usurpers and tyrants who scoffed at "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".

Although Americans of that time were unfamiliar with the epigram "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[1029] they knew in their own

---

[1027] United States ex rel. Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 71 U.S. (4 Wallace) 535, 554 (1867). Accord, Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 303 (1885).

[1028] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 163 (1803), quoting W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 109.

[1029] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

idiom that "the Sword and Soveraignty always march hand in hand";[1030] and, knowing that, they appreciated full well that the only effective remedy for a thoroughgoing denial of men's right of political self-defense was to be found in the barrels of the guns available to them. Yet, although arms would be necessary in such circumstances, even the barrels of many guns would not suffice in and of themselves. For, confronted by usurpers and tyrants deploying "standing armies" and para-militarized police forces, or by hordes of foreign invaders, armed individuals in isolation or in small groups would likely prove feckless. In the very situations that required it most, then, armed political self-defense had to be organized among "the good People" in some collective, cohesive, coördinated, and consistent fashion, in keeping with the maxim that "God favors the big battalions". So, throughout the pre-constitutional period, Americans settled and regulated Colonial and then State Militia for this purpose. Their Militia embodied and exemplified in action the principle that self-defense for a self-governing community depends upon self-reliance, self-help, and full participation amongst, for, and by "the good People" themselves.

From the very first, what came to be denoted "well regulated militia"[1031] throughout America were always compulsory in nature, collective in action, and committed to preserving their communities' security. Of course, participation in the Militia was a multifaceted individual duty for each adult able-bodied free male, because the whole must always be composed of the sum of its parts. Each individual's duty, though, was never to be fulfilled in isolation, separate from and independent of everyone else's, but instead was a component of an unified organization in which everyone worked in unison for an unitary purpose. And because the basic principles of the Militia have never changed since then, each individual's participation in "the Militia of the several States" today must be measured by, and satisfy, the selfsame duty.

So, because "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" must conduce to the organization and operation of "[a] well regulated Militia", which itself serves the collective purpose of ensuring "the security of a free State",[1032] that one "right" embraces as necessary components both an individual right and two collective rights: namely, (i) the individual "right" of each one among "the people" "to keep * * * Arms" of a certain kind in his personal possession and "to * * * bear [those] Arms" in his own hands for certain purposes ; (ii) the collective right of all the individuals who comprise "the people" to exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" in concert within "well regulated Militia"; and (iii) those individuals' further

---

[1030] AN ARGUMENT, Shewing, that a Standing Army Is inconsistent with A Free Government, ante note 27, at 7.

[1031] E.g., Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[1032] U.S. Const. amend. II.

collective right to direct their efforts in the Militia exclusively towards "the security of [the] free State[s]" in which they live. These rights also entail corresponding duties: (i) Every person has a collective duty to assist everyone else in providing for "the security of a free State" in which they all live. (ii) To fulfill this duty, every able-bodied adult has a collective duty to serve with others in "[a] well regulated Militia". And (iii) to perform this function, every such person (not a conscientious objector) has an individual duty "to keep and bear Arms" in his own private possession.

Self-evidently, too, these collective rights and duties are of a status superior to the corresponding individual rights and duties. For, inasmuch as "a free State" is the only place in which men can fully enjoy the "unalienable Rights" of "Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness", the foundational collective right and duty to "secur[e] * * * a free State" subserve the ultimate purpose of America's entire constitutional enterprise. From this combination of right and duty derives the collective organizational right and duty of free men to serve in "well regulated Militia". And from this derives the individual instrumental right and duty "to keep and bear Arms". Each individual enjoys "the right * * * to keep and bear [his own] Arms", not simply so that he can defend himself, but so that all individuals can act in concert in "well regulated Militia" to preserve their communities as "free State[s]". Thus, nothing could be more erroneous—and even destructive of the purpose of the Second Amendment as well as the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution—than the notions that not only does "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" embrace an "individual right to possess and carry weapons in case of confrontation", "having nothing whatever to do with service in a militia", but also individual self-defense is "the central component of the right itself".[1033]

As with all half-baked ideas, though, the mental oven from which this one emerged contains some crumbs of legal substance. Of course the possession of "Arms" suitable for collective service in "[a] well regulated Militia" also provides each individual with the means to defend himself personally. So, of course "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is instrumental for both an individual and a collective purpose. But this is only part of the recipe that must be consulted. The important ingredient is the insight that a right and even a duty "to keep and bear Arms" solely for the individual purpose of personal self-defense could never guarantee, and would not even go very far towards, fulfillment of the collective purposes of fielding "[a] well regulated Militia" and thereby guaranteeing "the security of a free State" through community self-defense. Worse yet, a "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" for the purpose of individual self-defense "having nothing whatever to do with service in a militia" would in principle preclude a "right of the people to keep and bear Arms" for community self-defense. For, if an individual may be called upon to protect his community at the cost of his own life, then whatever "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" he may enjoy for purposes of personal self-defense must be subordinate to his duty "to keep and bear Arms" in order to participate in collective self-defense. Whereas, if an individual's "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" "ha[s] nothing whatever to do with service in a militia", then the duty of community self-defense through "[a] well regulated Militia" must be subordinate to the right of personal self-defense—which necessarily would mean that the clause "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State" has no operative effect (that is, no legal consequence), but amounts merely to some sort of vapid constitutional "window dressing". Not only would this conclusion contradict the rule that, "'[i]n expounding the Constitution * * * , every word must have its due force, and appropriate meaning; for it is evident from the whole instrument, that no word was unnecessarily used, or needlessly added'",[1034] but also it would make an indigestible historical, political, and philosophical hash out of the Second Amendment, the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution, and even the Declaration of Independence.

[1033] District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 592, 593, 599 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court).

Thus, the essence of the Militia—and of all the rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and especially duties pertaining to the Militia, including "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"—derives from the people's collective right of self-defense, to which each individual's personal right of self-defense necessarily contributes, but is not superior.

B. Defense the sole purpose of the Militia. Although confusion about the relationship between "individual" and "collective" self-defense, on the one hand, and "the Militia of the several States", on the other hand, may sometimes be possible, no confusion is even plausible when it comes to application of the term "defense" to the Militia. By constitutional definition, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", "[a] well regulated Militia", and "a free State" are incapable of and inimical to aggressive purposes:

1. As to "a free State", the Declaration of Independence teaches that "the good People" ought not to "throw off" by force even an oppressive "Government" until it has demonstrated its aggressive intent beyond any doubt through "a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object[, which] evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism"—and they are at length "constrain[ed]" by unavoidable necessity "to alter their former Systems of Government".

[1034] Williams v. United States, 289 U.S. 553, 572-573 (1933), quoting Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Peters) 540, 570-571 (1840) (opinion of Taney, C.J.). Accord, Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803). See also Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 490-491 (1965); Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 151-152 (1926); Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 87 (1900); Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 260-261 (1898).

2. The Constitution explicitly declares that one of its purposes is "the common defence", not any form of aggression.[1035] And because "the genius and character of our institutions are peaceful", even the power of Congress "[t]o declare War" "[is] not conferred * * * for the purposes of aggression or aggrandizement".[1036]

3. The Constitution also makes plain that aggression is foreign to "the Militia of the several States". For Congress may "provide for calling forth the Militia" to "be employed in the Service of the United States" for three purposes only: "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"[1037]—each of which is entirely defensive. Execution of "the Laws of the Union" cannot constitute aggression against anyone, because those "Laws" consist of (i) the Declaration of Independence—which aims at "secur[ing]" men's "unalienable Rights", (ii) the Constitution—which aims at "secur[ing] the Blessings of Liberty",[1038] and (ii) "the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance" of the Constitution explicitly[1039] and the Declaration implicitly, and therefore must be consistent in purpose with both. And, by definition, those who foment "Insurrections" and launch "Invasions" are the aggressors, not those who "suppress * * * and repel" them.

4. Finally, because "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is the instrument upon which "[a] well regulated Militia" depends, and the purpose of "[a] well regulated Militia" is to provide "the security of a free State", that "right" allows for no aggressive exercise by "the people", either individually or collectively.

[1035] Preamble (emphasis supplied). Accord, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[1036] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 11 with Fleming v. Page, 50 U.S. (9 Howard) 603, 614 (1850).

[1037] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[1038] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1039] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

Each of "the Militia of the several States" must always be identified as "the Militia" of a particular State, and by no other name.

The establishments that the Constitution denotes collectively in one place as "the Militia of the several States"[1040] and in other places simply as "the Militia"[1041] must always be identified in precisely those words. And in any particular case, a single member of that group—which the Second Amendment describes as "[a] well regulated Militia"—must always be identified as "the Militia of [some State]", such as "the Militia of Rhode Island" or "the Militia of Virginia". No "Militia" should ever be called, either collectively or individually, "the National Guard", "the State Guard", "the Home Guard", "the State Defense Force", or by some other fanciful title without *pre-*constitutional provenance. To insist on this is not simply a semantic quibble, but instead a necessity if the Constitution is to be enforced with exactitude.

No one has any idea what names such as "National Guard", "State Guard", and so on mean historically or legally in relation to "the Militia of the several States", because not one of those names appears in the Constitution, in the Articles of Confederation, or especially in any of the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes upon which both the Articles and the Constitution drew for the meaning of the term "Militia". All of those names were quite unknown to Americans of that era—for no pre*-constitutional Militia statute ever referred to the institution it regulated as anything but a "Militia"*. Thus, any definition given to any such name at any time subsequent to the ratifications of the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights is at least *extra-*constitutional, if not *non-*constitutional or even *un-*constitutional. Unless, of course, the name at issue is to be treated as a perfect synonym for "Militia", no more and no less.

In that case, however, no justifiable purpose can be served by substituting the new name for the term "Militia" in the first place. At best, confusion is generated. For, if "Militia" is replaced by some other term with no clear *pre-*constitutional origin that proves beyond doubt the strict equivalence of the two nouns, then the unavoidable conclusion must be —or at least the inference useful to some political factions or controversialists inevitably will be—that the new term denotes an entity somehow different from a true constitutional "Militia". If so, the questions will arise: What is that new entity? What is its origin? What are its characteristics? And, most important, what is its legitimacy? Whatever the answers to the first three queries, the response to the fourth must be "none at all". If in any degree truly new, the entity can have no legitimacy, because it does not derive from the Constitution—and "[t]he government * * * of the United States", in any of its parts, "can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the constitution".[1042]

---

[1040] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1041] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; and amend. V.

Conversely, if the new name is supposed to mean nothing more or less than "Militia" in the unadulterated and undiluted constitutional sense, then why not simply use the term "Militia", and thereby avoid all equivocation, doubt, and possibility of error? Or something worse than mere error: One need recall, for example, only how the Judiciary has rationalized an intellectually infinite (albeit dishonest) expansion of the power of Congress "[t]o regulate Commerce * * * among the several States"[1043] by misapplying that clause as if it read "[t]o regulate [whatever affects] Commerce * * * among the several States", even though the phrase "whatever affects" (or any other words to that effect) nowhere appear in the Constitution, and even though the subjects of the purported "regulat[ions of whatever affects] Commerce" themselves never travel or are transported "among the several States", or never move very far within a single State, or even never constitute or participate in "Commerce" at all.[1044]

Although to date the overall result has not been quite as grotesque, the attempt to substitute the term "National Guard" for the constitutionally proper name "Militia" has injected terminological incoherence into this area of law. For the Militia are not in any sense uniquely a "National Guard", because they are "the Militia of the several States" which can be called forth and "employed in the Service of the United States" only for three defined, and therefore limited, National purposes.[1045] Otherwise, at all times they protect their own individual States. Thus, not surprisingly, in practice this substitution of names has created all sorts of intractable problems. For example, in 1903 Congress purported to divide the Militia into "the organized militia, to be known as the National Guard", and "the remainder to be known as the Reserve Militia".[1046] In 1916, Congress purported to

---

[1042] Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheaton) 304, 326 (1816). Accord, e.g., Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U.S. 466, 477 (1939); Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 25 (1942).

[1043] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

[1044] See, e.g., United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Company, 315 U.S. 110, 118-119 (1942), and especially Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 121-129 (1942).

[1045] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied) and art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[1046] Compare and contrast An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 1, 32 Stat. 775, 775, with An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, § 1, 1 Stat.

"divide[the Militia] into three classes, the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the Unorganized Militia", and to designate these three collectively as "the militia of the United States".[1047] Today, Congress claims that the so-called "militia of the United States" is composed of two "classes": namely, "the organized militia, which consists of the National Guard and the Naval Militia"; and "the unorganized militia", which consists of everyone else potentially subject to duty in "the militia of the United States".[1048] Apparently, the impossibility of a "militia of the United States" under a Constitution that recognizes only "the Militia of the several States", and delegates no power to the General Government to create any other form of "Militia", has not dawned on modern lawmakers.[1049] Neither have lawmakers noticed the impossibility of "*un*organized militia" under a Constitution which 271, 271, and with Revised Statutes of the United States (1873-1874), TITLE XVI, THE MILITIA, § 1625, 18 Stat. 285, 285.

---

[1047] An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 57, 39 Stat. 166, 197.

[1048] 10 U.S.C. § 311.

[1049] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 and art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16. Contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13. In fairness to latter-day Members of Congress, this terminological error or confusion has not cropped up only from 1916 to today. See An Act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes, Act of 2 January 1795, CHAP. IX, § 1, 1 Stat. 408, 408 ("the militia of the United States, when called into actual service"); An Act directing a Detachment from the Militia of the United States, Act of 9 May 1794, CHAP. XXV, 1 Stat. 367; An Act authorizing a detachment from the Militia of the United States, Act of 24 June 1797, CHAP. IV, 1 Stat. 522; An Act directing a detachment from the Militia of the United States, and for erecting certain Arsenals, Act of 3 March 1803, CHAP. XXXII, 2 Stat. 241; An Act authorizing a detachment from the Militia of the United States, Act of 18 April 1806, CHAP. XXXII, 2 Stat. 383; An Act authorizing a detachment from the Militia of the United States, Act of 30 March 1808, CHAP. XXXIX, 2 Stat. 478; An Act to authorize a detachment from the Militia of the United States, Act of 10 April 1812, CHAP. LV, 2 Stat. 705; An Act Making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and two, Act of 2 March 1901, CHAP. 803, 31 Stat. 895, 903 ("[f]or the continuance of the Army War College * * * for investigation and study in the Army and militia of the United States").

One presumes, though, that from 1795 to 1812 Members of Congress were referring to "the United States" in the then-familiar collective sense of each and every State allied in the Union, as opposed to the unitary sense of the General Government. That is, "the United States" was taken, not as a singular, but as a plural, noun, as it is in the original Constitution. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8, and art. III, § 3, cl. 1. See also U.S. Const. amends. XI and XIII, which evidence the continuation of this usage for some seventy-seven years. If so, "the militia of the United States" would have meant the aggregation of the Militia of each of the States composing the United States, that is, "the Militia of the several States". This seems to be the most plausible interpretation, because the Act of 1795 refers to "the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service", which plainly draws upon the constitutional language, "the Militia of the several States, when called into * * * actual Service". See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

In 1901, conversely, Members of Congress may have been thinking of the "militia of the United States" as the Militia that could be "call[ed] forth" to "be employed in the Service of the United States"—that is, the "Part" of "the Militia of the several States" that could come under the direct control of the General Government for one or more of the three purposes the Constitution enumerates. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; and art. II, § 2, cl. 1. After all, the statutory language "the Army and militia of the United States" can hardly be taken to employ the phrase "of the United States" in two different senses at the same time—referring to "the United States" as an unified collective in relation to the "Army" (because there is no such thing as an "Army of the several States"), but implicitly referring to "the United States" as "the several States" in relation to the "militia". Of course, although a less likely reading, the collective sense of "the United States" could have been intended, too, inasmuch as "the Army * * * of the United States" is "the Army of the several States" in their unified capacity as "the United States".

empowers Congress only "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia", and in which "[a]ffirmative words are * * * negative of other objects than those affirmed".[1050]

In sum, no more justification exists or could exist—whether in constitutional law, in American history, or in common sense—for statutorily renaming "the Militia of the several States" or any part thereof "the National Guard" than for renaming the President of the United States "the Leader" or for renaming Congress "the Supreme Soviet of America". Indeed, the only purpose for such verbal transmogrifications would be for their proponents to assert, somehow as a consequence of their linguistic legerdemain alone, powers for "the Leader" or for "the Supreme Soviet" different from—and doubtlessly in gross excess of—the powers the Constitution actually confers upon the President or Congress. Or, in the case of the Militia, characteristics significantly different from those the Militia exhibited in *pre-*constitutional times and that the original Constitution and the Second Amendment adopted—and therefore characteristics that would seriously detract from the ability of the Militia to perform the functions the Amendment declares to be "necessary to the security of a free State".

[1050] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied) with Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803).

CHAPTER THIRTY

"[T]he Militia of the several States" must always be strictly differentiated from the regular "Army and Navy of the United States" and from the "Troops, or Ships of War" that the States may "keep * * * in time of Peace" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress".

For good reason, the Constitution makes sharp distinctions among "the Militia of the several States",[1051] "the Army and Navy of the United States"[1052] (variously denoted as "Armies",[1053] "a Navy",[1054] and "the land and naval Forces"[1055]) and the "Troops, or Ships of War" that the States may not "keep * * * in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress".[1056] And Americans can disregard or blur these distinctions only at their peril.

A. "[T]he Militia of the several States" not parts of the regular Armed Forces of the Union or of the States. Contrary to the widespread misconception that the contemporary statutory National Guard is the continuation of, or (even more implausibly) the successor to, the constitutional "Militia of the several States",[1057] the National Guard is actually an adjunct or reserve component of the regular Armed Forces, and in one aspect arguably part of the "Troops" that the States may "keep * * * in time of Peace" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress"—and therefore is constitutionally disqualified from being any part of "the Militia of the several States" at all.[1058] More importantly, for numerous constitutional reasons, [1051] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1; art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; and amends. II and V.

---

[1052] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1053] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1054] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 13.

[1055] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14 and amend. V.

[1056] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1057] See generally, e.g., Michael D. Doubler & John W. Listman, Jr., The National Guard: An Illustrated History of America's Citizen-Soldiers (Washington, D.C.: Brassey's, Inc., 2003). In particular, see R. Wright, Jr., The Continental Army, ante note 396, APPENDIX A, at 429-430, which links various units of the National Guard to the pre-constitutional Militia, even describing these as "U.S. Army Units Dating From the Revolution", without apparent awareness of the constitutional impossibility of any unit in "the Militia of the several States" being in its inception or thereafter becoming part of the Army of the United States.

[1058] See generally AN ACT To revise, codify, and enact into law, title 10 of the United States Code, entitled "Armed Forces", and title 32 of the United States Code, entitled "National Guard", Act of 10 August 1956, Pub. L. 1028, 70 Stat. 1126, printed as Title 32, United States Code, in 70A Stat. at 596-617. For an historical overview of the National Guard and various "State Guards", "Home Guards", and "State Defense Forces" with pretensions to be or which have been passed off as "Militia", see Barry M. Stentiford, The American Home

"the Militia of the several States" are not, and can never be, any part of the National Guard or any other component of the regular Armed Forces.

1. The extra- and even *supra-*constitutional status of "the Militia of the several States" denied to the regular Armed Forces. That the Militia *pre-*existed the Constitution, the Union under the Articles of Confederation, and even the States as independent polities is of great consequence in understanding their political and legal position—

a. Explaining why "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed", the Second Amendment took care to emphasize that "[a] well regulated Militia[is] necessary to the security of a free State".[1059] That this is the only instance in the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights, other than in the Preamble, in which WE THE PEOPLE expressly set forth the purpose of a constitutional right, power, privilege, immunity, or disability proves how supremely important they considered—and wanted everyone else, down through the ensuing ages, to be aware of—the inextricable historical, legal, and operational relationship among "[a] well regulated Militia", "the security of a free State", and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", as Americans understood all of those concepts when they ratified the Bill of Rights in 1791, and had understood them for generations before that.[1060] Moreover, when the Second Amendment referred to "a free State" it attested to THE PEOPLE'S belief that any and every "free State" always, without exception, needs "[a] well regulated Militia" to provide true "security". That belief long preëxisted the original Constitution, as well as the Second Amendment. For the actual "Militia of the several States" which THE PEOPLE came to incorporate as integral and permanent parts of the Constitution's federal structure were not institutions newly

---

Guard: The State Militia in the Twentieth Century (College Station, Texas: Texas A&M University Press, 2002). Although useful in many respects, this particular study does not review the *pre-*constitutional history of the Militia, or come to grips with the constitutional problems the statutes from 1903 onwards raise. For example, referring to various "State Defense Forces" (which the book ambiguously treats as "militia" although many if not most of them lack the constitutional characteristics necessary for that appellation), the author opines that these forces "continue to prepare for the day when the National Guard again leaves the states for distant battlefields, while attempting to develop new reasons for existing in the event that the entire National Guard never leaves. As such, they represent the latest chapter in a long struggle over the proper role for militia in the United States." Id. at 241. Evidently the author never considered that the Constitution has already determined "the proper role for militia in the United States", and that therefore no "long struggle" to define that "role" was ever necessary in the past or is necessary now. So, to the extent that some "long struggle" has gone on, at least one side in that contest has been promoting *un*constitutional action all along, and apparently will continue to do so until the American people finally demand that the Constitution be enforced in these particulars.

[1059] The Amendment could have expressly linked the Militia with the preservation of "a Republican Form of Government", too—for the Constitution implies no less. See post, at 890-893, 921-922, 1038-1040, 1301-1307, 1451-1453, and 1497-1499.

[1060] The Constitution does delegate to Congress the authority "[t]o promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries". Art. I, § 8, cl. 8. There, however, "[t]o promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts" is the power, "securing * * * the exclusive Right" the sole means by which to exercise it. No actual purpose is stated, unless it be the implicit expectation that "promot[ion of] the Progress of Science and useful Arts" will redound to society's benefit.

invented for that purpose in 1788 or 1791. Rather, they were the very "well regulated Militia" in which THE PEOPLE and their forebears had personally participated for more than a century theretofore. The belief had prompted the action; and the action had confirmed the belief. Thus, the necessity of the Militia in America's constitutional system is not the product of the Constitution itself or of THE PEOPLE'S desire to experiment in a novel manner in matters of "homeland security", but instead a fundamental principle of American political philosophy, applied and proven in practice in the crucible of extensive historical experience, which subtends and supports the Constitution—upon which the Constitution depends—and without which the Constitution would be, not simply defective, but actually incapable of performing its purpose. Indeed, the Militia enjoy an extra-constitutional status, because they do not depend upon the Constitution for their definition—rather, the Constitution cannot be properly construed without importing that definition from the Militia's pre-constitutional legal history. And the Militia enjoy even a supra-constitutional status, because (having been governmental institutions long before anyone even imagined the Constitution) they do not depend upon the Constitution for their legitimacy—rather, the legitimacy of the Constitution depended in the first instance upon the success of the Declaration of Independence, to which the Militia contributed in no small measure. For, at the minimum, "the militia played a very important role in the War of American Independence. Its political functions probably were indispensable, and as a military institution, supported by state troops, it continued to meet its traditional colonial responsibilities for local defense and for providing a general emergency reserve."[1061] Even today, the Constitution continues to depend upon the Militia, because the Constitution is the supreme law of the Union; the Union is composed of the several States; each of the States must be "a free State"; and "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", and therefore to the security of all of the States, of the Union, and of the Union's supreme law.[1062]

b. In stark contrast to the Militia, never did WE THE PEOPLE affirm, or even suggest, that the "Armies", "Navy", or "Troops, or Ships of War" to which the original Constitution referred were in 1788, or might thereafter become, "necessary to the security of a free State", or inevitably and unavoidably "necessary" for any other purpose. Or that such establishments ought to be integral and permanent parts of the federal system. This could hardly have been accidental. Beyond any possible doubt, THE PEOPLE—who had just successfully waged the War of [1061] R. Wright, Jr., The Continental Army, ante note 396, at 183. Observe, though, how this author, who certainly should know better, refers to the Militia in the singular, rather than the constitutional plural.

---

[1062] In response to the objection that none of the several States now fields a true Militia, one need only point to the parlous state of "constitutional law" (or even any satisfactory "rule of law") in America to appreciate the truth of the analysis set out in the text. The Constitution having temporarily lost its "necessary" protector, of course this country is slipping into anti-constitutional chaos.

Independence—were acutely aware of the usefulness of "Armies", a "Navy", and "Troops, or Ships of War" for prosecuting armed conflicts. That they did not consider and declare this usefulness indispensably "necessary" reflected their fear, quite justified by political theory as well as their own experiences, that any regular standing "Armies", "Navy", or "Troops, or Ships of War"—in which professional soldiers, not "the people" generally, bore "Arms"—could or would likely be inimical to Americans' liberties. That is, not "necessary", but actually antagonistic, "to the security of a free State". And the more effective such forces were in purely military terms, the more dangerous they would become in political terms.

c. This concern was shared not just by every American patriot of the founding era who was conversant with *pre-*constitutional Anglo-American law, history, and political philosophy. As even Blackstone himself had observed:

> THE military state includes the whole of the soldiery; or, such persons as are peculiarly appointed among the rest of the people, for the safeguard and defence of the realm.
>
> IN a land of liberty it is extremely dangerous to make a distinct order of the profession of arms. In absolute monarchies this is necessary for the safety of the prince, and arises from the main principle of their constitution, which is that of governing by fear: but in free states the profession of a soldier, taken singly and merely as a profession, is justly an object of jealousy. In these no man should take up arms, but with a view to defend his country and it's laws: he puts not off the citizen when he enters the camp; but it is because he is a citizen, and would wish to continue so, that he makes himself for a while a soldier. The laws therefore and constitution of these kingdoms [that is, England, Scotland, and Ireland] know no such state as that of a perpetual standing soldier * * *.[1063]

> TO prevent the executive power from being able to oppress, * * * it is requisite that the armies with which it is entrusted should consist of the people, and have the same spirit with the people * * * . Nothing then, according to these principles, ought to be more guarded against in a free state, than making the military power, when such a one is necessary to be kept on foot, too distinct from the people.[1064]

Inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" can never be "distinct from the people", because "the people" themselves comprise it, and inasmuch as "[n]othing * * * ought to be more guarded against in a free state" than standing armies that form "a distinct order of the profession of arms", hardly surprising is the Second

---

[1063] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 407 (emphasis supplied).

[1064] Id., Volume 1, at 413-414 (emphasis supplied).

Amendment's conclusion, and constitutional command, that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State". The Amendment embodies a fundamental negative principle that underlays the Constitution: to wit, that "[i]t is against sound policy for a free people to keep up large military establishments and standing armies in time of peace, both from the enormous expenses with which they are attended and the facile means which they afford to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people".[1065] A negative principle the disregard of which, the Founders knew, is likely to be fatal to freedom—because "the Constitution [of a free State] must either break the Army, or the Army will destroy the Constitution: for it is universally true, that where-ever the [military power] is, there is or will be the Government in a short time".[1066]

2. The constitutional superiority of "the Militia of the several States" to the regular Armed Forces. Because the Constitution did not create "the Militia of the several States", but incorporated them into its federal system in the form which they had exhibited and under the legal principles which had subtended them for generations, they must be conceded a special status within the Constitution which is denied to the regular Armed Forces—

a. The Militia are composed of almost everyone among WE THE PEOPLE themselves, whereas the Armed Forces typically constitute only a very small segment of America's population.

b. The Constitution recognizes "the Militia of the several States" as entities that preëxisted its own ratification, and incorporates them within its federal system as permanent components which (absent a constitutional Amendment, and perhaps not even then) neither Congress nor the States, individually or collectively, may ever purport to remove. The Constitution authorizes Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia",[1067] and "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" for certain purposes.[1068] But Congress is not responsible for the existence of the Militia, in the sense of being empowered to create them in the first instance, because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States" not "the Militia of the United States". And having no power to create the Militia, Congress can have no discretion not to create them, or to disband them either directly itself or indirectly by ordering (or merely encouraging and allowing) the States to take such action. Distinguishably, Congress may "raise and support Armies" and "provide and maintain a Navy",[1069] if it believes those establishments are "necessary and proper"

[1065] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[1066] AN ARGUMENT, Shewing, that a STANDING ARMY Is inconsistent with a Free Government, ante note 27, at 4.

[1067] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1068] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1069] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13.

for "the common defence".[1070] But Congress is not constitutionally required always to do so. Indeed, each newly elected House of Representatives by itself may completely prevent the "rais[ing] and support[ing of] Armies"—and thus effectively disestablish "Armies" entirely during its term in office—because "[n]o Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law",[1071] "no Appropriation of Money to th[e] Use [of raising and supporting Armies] shall be for a longer Term than two Years",[1072] and "[t]he House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States".[1073] The Constitution, however, grants neither to the House or the Senate individually, nor to Congress as a whole, an equivalent license to withhold all financial support from the Militia. Similarly, the Constitution provides that "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace"[1074]—which, on the one hand, empowers Congress to refuse altogether to allow the States to raise their own regular Armed Forces; and, on the other hand, licenses the States to elect not to raise such forces even if Congress would allow them to do so (for Congress's authority is only to grant or to withhold its "Consent" with respect to an action a State proposes to be taken on her own initiative, not to compel such action in the first instance). This clause, however, does not apply to the Militia.

c. Furthermore, the Second Amendment declares that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State". This is the only instance in which the Constitution explicitly identifies anything as "being necessary" for any purpose. To be sure, the Constitution implies that the States, Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court are in some sense sufficient for the particular plan of federalism and limited government that it lays out—otherwise, it would not include them as permanent parts of the federal system, along with the Militia. Nonetheless, the Constitution does not deny that some other plan—perhaps not including Congress, the President, or the Supreme Court at all, or including one or more of them in some form or with some powers other than those the Constitution specifies—might not prove just as satisfactory for WE THE PEOPLE'S purposes, too. Distinguishably, when the Second Amendment asserts that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", it speaks in terms without exception. No other plan for attaining such "security" can ever suffice.

d. The Second Amendment is also one of only two instances in which the Constitution explicitly identifies a particular means to achieve its basic goals. That [1070] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 with preamble.

---

[1071] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 7.

[1072] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1073] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 1.

[1074] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

"[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" specifies such a "Militia" as the means simultaneously to "provide for the common defence * * * and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity",[1075] as well as to guarantee "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures"[1076]—which in the aggregate amounts to no less than effectuating the principle of the Declaration of Independence that "Governments are instituted among Men" solely in order "to secure" their "unalienable Rights" to "Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness", including the acquisition and enjoyment of property. Elsewhere, the Constitution defines Congress's power "[t]o lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises" as the means "to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States"[1077]—again, two goals also identified in its Preamble. From which it follows that for Congress to employ the power "[t]o lay and collect Taxes" in support of exercises of its power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" would always be "necessary and proper",[1078] because "the security of a free State" in the broadest sense embraces maintenance of "the general Welfare" as well as "the common defence" and "the Blessings of Liberty" in their every manifestation. In contrast, nowhere does the Constitution even suggest either that an "Arm[y]" or "a Navy" is "necessary" for any purpose, let alone "to the security of a free State"; or that an "Arm[y]" or "a Navy" will always "provide for the common defence" and simultaneously "secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"; or that the maintenance of an "Arm[y]" or "a Navy" will always be consistent with "the general Welfare"—or even that an "Arm[y]" or "a Navy" will not provide the rogue personnel, under color of some ersatz "martial law", to conduct "unreasonable searches and seizures" of "the[people's] persons, houses, papers, and effects". To the contrary: That the Constitution explicitly specifies that "no Appropriation of Money" "to raise and support Armies" "shall be for a longer Term than two Years"[1079] emphasizes that it may be "necessary and proper" for Congress (and even just the House of Representatives) to refuse to employ its "Power to lay and collect Taxes" to that end, in order thereby to discontinue the existence of "Armies" altogether (and presumably the existence of "a Navy", as well).

e. Finally, the Constitution delegates to Congress the power and the duty "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union".[1080] The [1075] U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

---

[1076] U.S. Const. amend. IV (emphasis supplied).

[1077] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[1078] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 18.

[1079] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1080] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15. On the conjunction of constitutional power and duty, see ante, at 50-54.

Constitution explicitly entrusts this authority and responsibility "to execute the Laws" to no institution or establishment other than the Militia, or to any person other than the President of the United States, to whom it extends a cognate power and duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed",[1081] and who it doubtlessly foresees will often perform this function with the aid of "the Militia of the several States", of which he is "Commander in Chief * * * when [they are] called into the actual Service of the United States".[1082] In contrast, nowhere does the Constitution explicitly entrust any authority or responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union" (or any other "Laws", for that matter) to "Armies" or "a Navy", or even delegate to Congress a power that can in any straightforward manner be construed as enabling it "[t]o provide for calling forth" any "Armies" or "a Navy" for that purpose. And under the self-evident precept of constitutional priority, even if "Armies" and "a Navy" in principle could be assigned to perform that task safely and effectively, they should be so deployed in practice only after "the Militia of the several States" in their entirety had been "call[ed] forth" and had failed to succeed in that endeavor.

3. The constitutional separation of "the Militia of the several States" from the regular Armed Forces. The Constitution carefully distinguishes and separates the permanent "Militia of the several States" from the contingent "Armies", "Navy", and "Troops, or Ships of War" which it permits Congress or the States to "raise and support", "provide and maintain", or "keep".[1083] In so doing, the Constitution plainly recognizes that the Militia hold a position of priority to those institutions, as well as a position of outright superiority to every para-military or civilian police or other "homeland-security" agency that Congress may enjoy some power to create.[1084]

a. The Colonies' and independent States' Militia were always separate establishments, rather than simply units in the regular British, Colonial, or later State and Continental Armed Forces. Throughout the pre-constitutional period, some Colonial and then State statutes regulated the Colonial and State Militia without in any way affecting Colonial and State regular "Troops"; other statutes raised "Troops" without affecting the Militia; and yet other statutes both regulated the Militia and raised "Troops" without conflating the two different establishments. So, because the Constitution incorporates "the Militia of the several States" into its federal system according to principles derived from their actual existence, structure, and operation during that era, the Militia cannot be parts of the regular Armed Forces of either the several States or the United States.

[1081] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[1082] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1083] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 16, and § 10, cl. 3; and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1084] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 and amends. II and X.

b. As to the States in particular, the Constitution clearly differentiates between regular forces—the "Troops, or Ships of War" which "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * keep * * * in time of Peace"[1085]—and "the Militia of the several States", which the States and Congress must maintain perforce of and in compliance with the Constitution at all times. In this, the Constitution follows the pattern set in the Articles of Confederation, which provided that

> [n]o vessels of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any state, except such number only, as shall be deemed necessary by the united states in congress assembled, for the defence of such state or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any state, in time of peace, except such number only, as in the judgment of the united states, in congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defence of such state; but each state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred[.][1086]

As with the Constitution, the Articles secured a preferred and practically permanent position for the Militia at that time, because "the Articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every state * * * ; nor shall any alteration at any time * * * be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to in a congress of the united states, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state".[1087]

c. Congress's powers with respect to "the Militia" are separate and distinct from its powers that appertain to "Armies" and "a Navy", for the self-evident reason that the "Armies" and "Navy"—or, as the Constitution elsewhere describes them, "the land and naval Forces"[1088]—are "the Army and Navy of the United States", whereas the Militia are "the Militia of the several States".[1089] In one clause, the Constitution empowers Congress "[t]o raise and support Armies",[1090] in another clause "[t]o provide and maintain a Navy",[1091] and in yet two other clauses "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" and "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[1092] The latter two clauses are completely independent of the former two. Similarly, in one clause the Constitution delegates to Congress the authority "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and

---

[1085] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1086] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4 (emphasis supplied).

[1087] Arts. of Confed'n art. XIII.

[1088] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14 and amend. V ("the land or naval forces").

[1089] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1090] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1091] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 13.

[1092] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

naval Forces";[1093] whereas in a separate clause it authorizes Congress "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of them [that is, the Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress".[1094] Not only are these powers mutually independent, but also the reserved authority of the States as to "the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of Training the Militia" set out in the second of them finds no counterpart in the first. Because, of course, "the land and naval Forces" are "the Army and Navy of the United States", whereas the Militia are "the Militia of the several States".[1095]

d. The President of the United States is the only constitutional officer who holds or can hold a joint command in both the Armed Forces and the Militia. In separate phrases the Constitution expressly appoints the President as "Commander in Chief" of both "the Army and Navy of the United States" at all times and "the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States",[1096] but only at that time. Yet his status as "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy" is of a different order from his status as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia". When the President commands the "the Army and Navy of the United States" he acts as a permanent officer of the Armed Forces, not at all of the Militia; and when he commands "the Militia of the several States" he acts as a temporary officer of the Militia, not at all of the Armed Forces. This bipartite designation would be meaninglessly redundant if the Army and Navy, on the one hand, and the Militia, on the other, were simply components of the selfsame unified establishment for National defense. But "[i]t cannot be presumed that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect".[1097]

e. Other than with respect to the President as "Commander in Chief", the States retain exclusive authority for "the Appointment of the Officers [in the Militia]"[1098]—which means that no "Officers" in the regular Armed Forces of the United States, all of whom are "nominate[d], and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate * * * appoint[ed]", by the President,[1099] may command any portion of the Militia. Moreover, inasmuch as the Constitution expressly foresees

---

[1093] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

[1094] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1095] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1096] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1097] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803). See also, e.g., Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 151-152 (1926); Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 87 (1900); Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 260-261 (1898).

[1098] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16. See also U.S. Const. amend. X.

[1099] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

the possibility that only a "Part of the[Militia] * * * may be employed in the Service of the United States" at any one time,[1100] even the President's authority to command the Militia will extend only to such "Part" then "called into the actual Service of the United States",[1101] with the rest of the Militia remaining under the exclusive command of "Officers" appointed exclusively by the States.

f. In addition, the Constitution commands that "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace".[1102] Yet each of the States must maintain her Militia in being at all times, even if solely with respect to "the Appointment of the Officers, and * * * training * * * according to the discipline prescribed by Congress".[1103] The existence of "the Militia of the several States" in no way depends upon "the Consent of Congress"—that is, Congress's political discretion—because the Constitution presumes the presence of the Militia as part of its federal structure at all times, irrespective of Congressmen's minds on the subject. Even if Congress neglects, fails, or refuses to fulfill its constitutional duty "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia",[1104] the Militia nonetheless remain in being, in the persons of WE THE PEOPLE capable of exercising "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", who may "provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining" themselves, either through their respective State legislatures or in the final extremity on their own recognizance.

A State's "Troops, or Ships of War", therefore, are constitutionally distinct from her "Militia". As well they would have to be as a practical matter. For the Constitution provides that "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay".[1105] But if, "without the Consent of Congress", a State may "engage in War, [when] actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay", to do so she would need immediately at hand "[a] well regulated Militia * * * necessary to the security of a free State"[1106]—unless her enemy were sufficiently accommodating to allow her ample time to raise "Troops, or Ships of War" from scratch, in which case the "Danger" would hardly be so "imminent * * * as will not admit of delay".

g. The Fifth Amendment also distinguishes between "the land or naval forces", on the one hand, and "the Militia", on the other. The Amendment provides [1101] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied). On the critical importance of the adjective "actual", see post, at 871-880.

---

[1100] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1102] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1103] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 with art. VI, cl. 2.

[1104] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16. See ante, at 50-54.

[1105] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1106] U.S. Const. amend. II.

that "[n]o person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger".[1107] Self-evidently, "the land or naval forces" mentioned here are the very same "land and naval Forces" "for the Government and Regulation of [which]" the Constitution empowers Congress "[t]o make Rules"—to wit, the "Army and Navy of the United States" to which the original Constitution referred. And "the Militia" are "the Militia of the several States" and the "well regulated Militia" to which first the original Constitution and then the Second Amendment referred. For "[w]hen the same term which has been used plainly in [a particular] * * * sense in [one clause of the Constitution] * * * is also employed [in another provision] * * * , it must be understood as retaining the sense originally given to it".[1108] Moreover, the disjunctive "or" between these entities—"in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia"—indicates that they are of constitutionally different characters, "the land or naval forces" belonging to one discreet set, "the Militia" to another.

h. In sum, in four ways the Constitution treats "the Militia of the several States" as separate and distinct from, and independent of, the various "Armies", "Navy", and "Troops, or Ships of War" that it permits Congress to create, and the States to "keep" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress".

(1) "[T]he Militia of the several States" are foundational and permanent establishments of and within the Constitution's federal system, whereas the existence of any of the others is entirely contingent upon circumstances and the actions of Congress and the States in response thereto. Even if the various "Armies", "Navy", and "Troops, or Ships of War" that the Constitution mentions never came into existence, the Militia would always subsist as a matter of law. True enough, if "necessary and proper" to "establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty",[1109] Congress would be bound in duty "[t]o raise and support Armies",[1110] "[t]o provide and maintain a Navy",[1111] and to give its "Consent" for the States to "keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace".[1112] But otherwise not. Conversely, the Militia are not the subjects of a Congressional power and duty to create—and therefore can never be the potential victims of any rightful Congressional neglect, failure, or refusal to exercise such a power and fulfill such a duty—because, by recognizing the Militia as preëxistent, the Constitution denies

---

[1107] Emphasis supplied.

[1108] See Hepburn and Dundas v. Ellzey, 6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 445, 453 (1805).

[1109] Compare U.S. Const. preamble with art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[1110] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1111] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 13.

[1112] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

Congress any discretion in the premises. Congress can no more refuse to recognize the existence of "the Militia of the several States" than it can refuse to recognize the existence of the States themselves.

(2) As a matter of constitutional definition derived from the *pre-*constitutional Militia Acts, "the Militia of the several States" must enroll every able-bodied adult citizen among WE THE PEOPLE from sixteen to sixty years of age, with only a few permissible exemptions, and may enlist as well disabled or superannuated volunteers still capable of performing useful functions. For proper reasons, Congress (and in default of Congress, the States) may impose different organization and discipline upon, provide different training for, and assign different duties to different subsets within that group. Nonetheless, the Militia tend to near-universality, in that all able-bodied adult citizens, not legitimately exempted, must be organized, armed, disciplined, governed, and trained in some manner, and assigned some duty. Whereas "Armies", "a Navy", and "Troops, or Ships of War" include only those individuals whom Congress and the States for reasons of policy may designate for service. That is, the "land and naval Forces" inevitably tend to selectivity—and the greater the selectivity, the less constitutionally trustworthy such forces tend to become.

(3) Being identifiable with those among WE THE PEOPLE who are able to exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", the Militia are always potentially in being as a matter of fact—even if only in the form of individuals who on their own initiatives, in keeping with their legal duty under the Constitution and their political duty under the Declaration of Independence, have provided themselves and trained with firearms and ammunition—no matter what Congress or the States may neglect, fail, or refuse to do. Whereas "Armies" need to be "raise[d] and support[ed]", "a Navy" to be "provide[d] and maintain[ed]", and "Troops, or Ships of War" "ke[pt]" by the affirmative actions of Congress and the States.[1113]

(4) "[T]he Militia of the several States" may be brought within the General Government's temporary control for three reasons only: namely, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1114] Then and only then, in that specifically delimited "Service", are they under the President's command,[1115] and subject to rules Congress promulgates for "governing" them.[1116] None of these reasons, however, can serve as an occasion or excuse for combining the Militia with "the Army and Navy of the United States" into the "large military establishments and standing armies" that Joseph Story denounced as "facile means"

[1113] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13, and § 10, cl. 3.

[1114] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1115] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1116] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

for "ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people".[1117]

i. Unfortunately, even with all of this information before it, in the early Twentieth Century Congress began thoroughly to muddle the constitutional differentiation between the "the Militia of the several States" and the regular Armed Forces:

> • In 1903 and 1908, Congress provided "[t]hat the militia * * * shall be divided into two classes—the organized militia, to be known as the National Guard of the State * * * or by such other designations as may be given them by the laws of the respective States * * * , and the remainder to be known as the Reserve Militia".[1118] This prepared the statutory groundwork for unlimited confusion thereafter, by bifurcating the Militia into two components, and assigning to each one a new name unknown in *pre-*constitutional American history and for which the Constitution provides no justification.
>
> • In 1914, Congress mandated "[t]hat the land forces of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the organized land militia [that is, the so-called 'National Guard' of 1908] while in the service of the United States, and such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize".[1119] The Constitution, however, repeatedly distinguishes between, on the one hand, the "land * * * Forces" of the United States—which consist of the "Armies" that Congress is authorized "[t]o raise and support"; and, on the other hand, "the Militia of the several States"—which are establishments of the States that "may be employed in the Service of the United States". And it does so in a manner that absolutely precludes the conflation of the two different types of establishments.[1120] For example, that "the Militia of the several States" can be "employed in the Service of the United States" or not, and that the President can be the "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States" or not, depending upon circumstances that lie beyond Congress's and the President's control, proves that the Militia can not be "forces of the United States"—otherwise they would always be "in the Service of the United States", and always under the President's control as

---

[1117] Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[1118] An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 1, 32 Stat. 775, 775 (emphasis supplied). Continued, An Act To further amend the Act entitled "An Act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes," approved January twenty-first, nineteen hundred and three, Act of 27 May 1908, CHAP. 204, § 1, 35 Stat. 399, 399.

[1119] An Act To provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, Act of 25 April 1914, CHAP. 71, § 1, 38 Stat. 347, 347.

[1120] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 14 with art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, with art. II, § 2, cl. 1, and with amend. V.

"Commander in Chief", just as are the regular Armed Forces.[1121] And that the Constitution delegates to Congress the separate and distinct powers "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces"[1122] and "[t]o provide for * * * governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States"[1123] establishes beyond peradventure that "such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States" can never become part of "the land forces of the United States", or else two different powers for governing them, purportedly as such, would not be necessary—and "[i]t cannot be presumed that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect".[1124]

• In 1916, Congress purported to mandate that "[t]he militia of the United States * * * shall be divided into three classes, the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the Unorganized Militia"; "[t]he National Guard shall consist of the regularly enlisted militia * * * organized, armed, and equipped"; and "the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the Volunteer Army, * * * the National Guard while in the service of the United States, and such other land forces as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law".[1125] Here, for the first time in American history, Congress set up an explicit dichotomy between an "organized" and an "unorganized" "militia"—because, from 1903 to 1916, it might have been possible to imagine that, although the National Guard was described as "the organized militia", nonetheless the so-called "Reserve Militia" was also to be in some manner "organized". In 1916, however, it became apparent that Congress actually intended to treat its power "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia"[1126] as encompassing a license "[t]o provide for [un]organizing * * * the Militia" or "[t]o provide for [refusing to] organiz[e] * * * the Militia" in large part. In addition, also for the first time in American history, Congress purported to transmogrify the separate "Militia of the several States" (in the plural) into the constitutionally impossible unified "militia of the United States" (in the singular), notwithstanding that Congress's only authority in the premises is "[t]o provide * * * for governing

---

[1121] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1122] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

[1123] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1124] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803).

[1125] An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, §§ 57, 58, and 1, 39 Stat. 166, 197, 166. This particular statute does not mention the Navy, because it was "applicable only to militia organized as a land force, and not to the Naval Militia". § 117, 39 Stat. at 212.

[1126] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States";[1127] and notwithstanding that the Constitution designates the President as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States"—not "the Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the United States", even when "the Militia of the several States" have been "called into the actual Service of the United States".[1128] Worse yet, Congress purported under some circumstances to absorb "the militia of the United States" into "the Army of the United States", notwithstanding (as will be explained immediately below) that the Constitution requires the Militia and the Army to be separate and distinct establishments precisely so that the Militia may act as independent "checks and balances" against rogue elements in the Armed Forces.

• In 1920, Congress repeated its definition that "the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, [and] the National Guard while in the service of the United States"—adding that "[t]he Organized peace establishment, including the Regular Army, the National Guard and the Organized Reserves, shall include all of those divisions and other military organizations necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the national defense in the event of a national emergency declared by Congress".[1129] Self-evidently, if "a national emergency declared by Congress" arose under circumstances that did not require "[para-military] execut[ion of] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ion of] Insurrections and repel[ling of] Invasions"—as many such purported "emergencies" have over the years, and as the very generality of the term "emergency" suggests—then "the Militia of the several States" could not constitutionally be "call[ed] forth" into "the Service of the United States" at all.[1130] So, this statute's inclusion of the National Guard in "[t]he Organized peace establishment" for such an open-ended purpose provided a further Congressional admission (if one were needed) that the National Guard is no constitutional "Militia" at all.

• Finally, in 1933, Congress completed the arguably unconstitutional fusion of its bastardized "militia of the United States" with the regular Armed Forces by: (i) defining "[t]he National Guard of each State * * *

[1127] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[1128] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1129] An Act To amend an Act entitled "An Act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice, Act of 4 June 1920, CHAP. 227, §§ 1 and 3, 41 Stat. 759, 759.

[1130] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

> [to] consist of members of the militia voluntarily enlisted therein, * * * organized, armed, equipped, and federally recognized"; (ii) designating "[t]he National Guard of the United States" as "a reserve component of the Army of the United States" which "shall consist of * * * federally recognized National Guard units * * * of the several States" that "in time of peace * * * shall be administered, armed, uniformed, equipped, and trained in their status as the National Guard of the several States"; and (iii) declaring "[t]hat the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, [and] the National Guard while in the service of the United States".[1131] Voluntary enlistment and being a component of the Army are, of course, incompatible with "Militia" status.

To be sure, an "unconstitutional fusion" would result only if the National Guard were treated in principle at all relevant times as somehow part of a true "Militia"—as what was then called "the National Guard" may marginally have been under color of the statutes of 1903 and 1908. From at least the statute of 1914 onwards, though, the National Guard was systematically transformed from some marginally possible albeit seriously questionable sort of "Militia" into the quite different "Troops" that a State may "keep * * * in time of Peace" only "with[ ] the Consent of Congress".[1132] Initially, the Act of 1914 declared that "the land forces of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, [and] the organized militia [that is, the National Guard] while in the service of the United States"[1133]—which is constitutionally impossible for any "Part" of the Militia, but perhaps not for State "Troops", particularly when "the Consent of Congress" for the States to "keep" such "Troops" at all is explicitly conditioned upon service of those "Troops" within "the land forces of the United States" when summoned to that duty.[1134] In 1916, Congress provided that "the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, * * * [and] the National Guard while in the service of the United States"[1135]—again, a constitutional impossibility for any "Part" of the Militia, but not for State "Troops". In the same Act, Congress provided that "[n]o State shall maintain troops in time of peace other than as authorized in accordance with the organization prescribed under this Act: Provided, That nothing contained in this Act shall be construed as limiting the rights of the States * * * in the use of the [1131] AN ACT To amend the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, Act of 15 June 1933, CHAPTER 87, §§ 5 and 1, 48 Stat. 153, 155-156, 153. See AN ACT Relating to the reserve components of the Armed Forces of the United States, Act of 9 July 1952, Pub. L. 476, CHAPTER 608, §§ 301, 601, and 701 through 703, 66 Stat. 481, 498, 501-502.

---

[1132] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1133] An Act To provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, Act of 25 April 1914, CHAP. 71, § 1, 38 Stat. 347, 347.

[1134] See post, Chapter 49.

[1135] An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 1, 39 Stat. 166, 166.

National Guard within their respective borders in time of peace".[1136] This evidenced Congress's recognition and intention, recited in terms obviously lifted directly from the Constitution itself—namely, in the parallel between the constitutional language "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * keep Troops * * * in time of Peace"[1137] and the statutory language "[n]o State shall maintain troops in time of peace other than as authorized" by Congress—that the National Guard actually consists, not of State Militiamen, but of State "Troops". Similarly in 1933, in that statute's declaration that "the members of the National Guard of the United States shall not be in the active service of the United States except when ordered thereto in accordance with law, and, in time of peace, they shall be administered, armed, uniformed, equipped, and trained in their status as the National Guard of the several States"[1138]—once again drawing upon the constitutional phraseology "in time of Peace" to differentiate between the dual status of the National Guard as forces "of the several States" as well as forces "of the United States", depending upon circumstances. The only forces that "the several States" may maintain only "in time of Peace", of course, are "Troops", and then only "with[ ] the Consent of Congress" (which the statute granted). Distinguishably, the States must maintain their Militia at all times, whether Congress tenders its "Consent" or not. And when "the Militia of the several States" are "call[ed] forth" for one or more of the three constitutional purposes,[1139] they are not thereby transformed into components of the regular Armed Forces "of the United States", but instead always remain Militia which are merely "employed in the Service of the United States".[1140] So "the National Guard of the several States" must consist of those "Troops" which the States may "keep" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress", upon the condition that they will be detached to become "the National Guard of the United States" "when [so] ordered * * * in accordance with law" for any presumably constitutional purpose.[1141] Moreover, such "Part[s] of th[e Militia of the several States]" which are not "call[ed] forth" for a legitimate constitutional purpose, and which therefore can not become the subjects of Congress's power "[t]o provide for "governing such "Part[s] of th[e Militia of the several States]" as are "call[ed] forth", remain under the control of their respective States, where they cannot possibly come under even the wildest extrapolation of Congress's power "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land

---

[1136] An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 61, 39 Stat. 166, 198 (emphasis supplied).

[1137] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3 (emphasis supplied).

[1138] AN ACT To amend the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, Act of 15 June 1933, CHAPTER 87, § 5, 48 Stat. 153, 156 (emphasis supplied).

[1139] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1140] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1. Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14 with cl. 16.

[1141] See post, Chapter 49.

and naval Forces", and for that reason can never be considered at any time or for any reason to be any component whatsoever of "the land forces of the United States". Congress confirmed this understanding of the National Guard's dual status in 1940 and 1950.[1142] And the present version of the United States Code once again affirms it:

> (a) In time of peace, a State * * * may maintain no troops other than those of its National Guard and defense forces authorized by subsection (c).
>
> * * * * *
>
> (c) In addition to its National Guard, if any, a State * * * may, as provided by its laws, organize and maintain defense forces. A defense force established under this section may be used within the jurisdiction concerned, * * * but it may not be called, ordered, or drafted into the armed forces.[1143]

So, inasmuch as Congress has no constitutional authority whatsoever to prohibit the States from maintaining "the Militia of the several States", in whole or in part, the National Guard and any so-called State "defense forces" must be, not any kind or part of a constitutional "Militia", but instead "Troops" for the "keep[ing]" of which by the States "in time of Peace" Congress has given its "Consent".[1144] And if that is true in principle, then in practice all of the conditions and controls which Congress has attached to its "Consent" for the States to "keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" in the forms of the National Guard and the Naval Militia are presumably valid, because Congress may condition its "Consent" upon whatever otherwise constitutional requirements it deems expedient,[1145] and may even permit the States to enact legislation of their own in order to implement the terms of that "Consent".[1146]

[1142] See AN ACT To amend section 61 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, by adding a proviso which will permit States to organize military units not a part of the National Guard, and for other purposes, Act of 21 October 1940, CHAPTER 904, 54 Stat. 1206; and AN ACT To amend section 61 of the National Defense Act to permit the States to organize military forces, other than as parts of their National Guard units, to serve while the National Guard is in active Federal Service, Act of 27 September 1950, CHAPTER 1058, 64 Stat. 1072.

[1143] 32 U.S.C. § 109.

[1144] For example, the Virginia Defense Force is a small establishment ("with a targeted membership of at least 1,200") the "mission" of which is "to (i) provide for a[ ] * * * reserve militia to assume control of the Virginia National Guard facilities and to secure any federal and state property left in place in the event of the mobilization of the Virginia National Guard, (ii) assist in the mobilization of the Virginia National Guard, (iii) support the Virginia National Guard in providing family assistance to military dependents within the Commonwealth in the event of the mobilization of the Virginia National Guard, (iv) to provide a military force to respond to the call of the Governor in [certain] circumstances". Code of Virginia § 44-54.4. Obviously, the only connection between the Virginia Defense Force—in composition, organization, mission, and certainly pedigree—and the pre-constitutional Militia of Virginia is the word "Virginia".

[1145] See Arizona v. California, 292 U.S. 341, 345 (1934) (interstate compact).

[1146] See De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144, 153-155 (1960).

Nonetheless, these developments expose some rather shady terminological double-dealings by Congress over the years, along the lines of political "bait and switch"—on the one hand, use of the verbiage "the National Guard while in the service of the United States", which plainly was intended to invoke the constitutional provisions applicable to the Militia,[1147] and thereby to lead the careless observer to conclude that the National Guard is somehow a proper constitutional "Militia"; and, on the other hand, use of the verbiage "[n]o State shall maintain troops in time of peace other than as authorized", which no less plainly was intended to invoke Congress's power over the States' regular "Troops" as distinct from their true "Militia". Nonetheless, at the end of the day, this serpentine statutory phraseology does tend to support the basal constitutionality of the National Guard as it is now organized. For if these statutes can avoid constitutional infirmity by reasonably being construed as positioning the National Guard within the "Troops" that the States may constitutionally "keep" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress", and that statutorily may be deployed in the service of the United States without restriction to the three constitutional purposes mandated for the Militia, then they should be so interpreted.[1148] For that reason, the Supreme Court was arguably correct to characterize "[t]he [National] Guard [a]s an essential reserve component of the Armed Forces of the United States, available with regular forces in time of war"[1149]—although the Justices were apparently not perceptive enough to notice that, if the National Guard constitutes any "component of the Armed Forces of the United States", it cannot be any part of "the Militia of the several States". Yet that these statutes, even so construed, can avoid constitutional infirmity is not necessarily assured. For the States to "keep [their own] Troops" that simultaneously constitute "a reserve component of the Army of the United States" sets up a constitutional paradox which will require no little acumen to resolve.

One does need, moreover, to analyze these statutes with no little intellectual discrimination and skepticism. For they exhibit a distinct coloration of unconstitutional political imperialism on Congress's part. For example, a subsection of the relevant section of the United States Code intones that "[n]othing in this title * * * prevents [a State] from organizing and maintaining police or constabulary"[1150]—the implication being that, if it wanted to, Congress could "prevent[ ]" a State from so doing. But if a State's "police or constabulary" were part and parcel of her Militia, as any such "law-enforcement unit" ought to be, or were some civilian agency necessarily separate in character from both the Militia and any

---

[1147] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1148] See, e.g., Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932); National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, 301 U.S. 1, 30 (1937); Lynch v. Overholser, 369 U.S. 705, 710-711 (1962); United States v. Thirty-seven (37) Photographs, 402 U.S. 363, 369 (1971).

[1149] Gilligan v. Morgan, 413 U.S. 1, 6-7 (1973).

[1150] 32 U.S.C. § 109(b).

State "Troops", then Congress would have no authority to dictate to the State whether she could or could not "organiz[e] and maintain[ ]" such an establishment. Although, if a State's "police or constabulary" were integral to her Militia, Congress could constitutionally "provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining" it, to prepare it (say) to be "call[ed] forth to execute the Laws of the Union".[1151] Only if the "police or constabulary" were separate from the State's Militia, and of such a decidedly military cast as to be considered "Troops", would Congress be entitled to dictate to the State the terms on which that "police or constabulary" could be "organiz[ed] and maintain[ed]".

4. Americans' deep and abiding suspicion of "standing armies" embodied in "the Militia of the several States". Analysis of the constitutional position of the Militia must always keep in the sharpest focus the dichotomy between the Militia and "standing armies".

a. If many and complex were the reasons for Americans in *pre-*constitutional times to develop an aversion to "standing armies",[1152] that they did so became patent in such documents as the Declaration and Resolves of the First Continental Congress in 1774, which asserted that "the keeping a standing army in several of these colonies, in time of peace, without the consent of the legislature of that colony, in which such army is kept, is against law";[1153] and the Declaration of Independence in 1776, which enumerated as grievances against King George III that "[h]e has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies without the Consent of our legislatures" and "has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power".

b. Justice Joseph Story later summarized Americans' dominant objections to "standing armies"—and identified the Militia alone as capable of providing the necessary "checks and balances" against their excesses:

> The militia is the natural defence of a free country against sudden foreign invasions, domestic insurrections, and domestic usurpations of power by rulers. It is against sound policy for a free people to keep up large military establishments and standing armies in time of peace, both from the enormous expenses with which they are attended and the facile means which they afford to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people. The right of the citizens to keep and bear arms has justly been considered as the palladium of the liberties of a republic, since it offers a strong moral check against

---

[1151] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 15.

[1152] See John Shy, Toward Lexington: The Role of the British Army in the Coming of the American Revolution (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1965), at 376-398.

[1153] Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 5.

> the usurpation and arbitrary power of rulers, and will generally, even if these are successful in the first instance, enable the people to resist and triumph over them.[1154]

"[L]arge military establishments and standing armies" must inevitably work at cross-purposes to the Constitution's goals, because: (i) the exorbitant costs of what today is styled "the military-industrial complex" will always undermine "the general Welfare" without necessarily advancing "the common defence" to a compensatory degree; and (ii) the tendency for rogue elements among the regular Armed Forces to offer themselves as latter-day praetorians in service of aspiring usurpers and tyrants will always threaten "the Blessings of Liberty".[1155] So the Militia—WE THE PEOPLE exercising "[t]he right of the citizens to keep and bear arms"—must always provide the necessary and sufficient "checks and balances" against these dangers, because: (i) as taxpayers and public creditors, THE PEOPLE will oppose wasteful expenditures for "standing armies"; and (ii) as possessors of the ultimate "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[1156] THE PEOPLE will by "keep[ing] * * * arms" deter, and where deterrence fails will by "bear[ing] arms" resist and defeat, usurpers, tyrants, and their myrmidons.

c. Story's summary fairly reflected the consensus among patriotic Americans in the Founding Era. The constitutions of several of the independent States addressed the issue in precisely those terms, including:

> DELAWARE. "SEC[TION] 17. No standing army shall be kept up without the consent of the legislature; and the military shall, in all cases and at all times, be in strict subordination to the civil power."[1157]
>
> MARYLAND. "[Article] XXV. That a well-regulated militia is the proper and natural defence of a free government.
>
> "XXVI. That standing armies are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be raised or kept up, without consent of the Legislature.
>
> "XXVII. That in all cases, and at all times, the military ought to be under strict subordination to and control of the civil power."[1158]
>
> MASSACHUSETTS. "Art[icle] XVII. The people have a right to keep and to bear arms for the common defence. And as, in time of peace,

---

[1154] Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646 (footnote omitted).

[1155] See U.S. Const. preamble.

[1156] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1157] CONSTITUTION OF DELAWARE (1792), in THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS COLONIAL CHARTERS AND OTHER ORGANIC LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES, Benjamin P. Poore, Compiler (New York, New York: Burt Franklin, Second Edition, 1972 Reprint of the 1924 Edition), PART I, at 279.

[1158] A DECLARATION OF RIGHTS, and the CONSTITUTION and FORM of GOVERNMENT, agreed to by the Delegates of Maryland, in free Convention Assembled (1776), A DECLARATION OF RIGHTS, in THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, ante note 1157, PART I, at 819.

armies are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be maintained without the consent of the legislature; and the military power shall always be held in an exact subordination to the civil authority, and be governed by it."[1159]

NEW HAMPSHIRE. "[Article] XXIV. A well regulated militia is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a state.

"XXV. Standing armies are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be raised or kept up without the consent of the legislature.

"XXVI. In all cases, and at all times, the military ought to be under strict subordination to, and governed by the civil power."[1160]

NORTH CAROLINA. "[Article] XVII. That the people have a right to bear arms, for the defence of the State; and, as standing armies, in time of peace, are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be kept up; and that the military should be kept under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power."[1161]

PENNSYLVANIA. "[Article] XIII. That the people have a right to bear arms for the defence of themselves and the state; and as standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be kept up; And that the military should be kept under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power."[1162]

SOUTH CAROLINA. "[Article] XLII. That the military be subordinate to the civil power of the State."[1163]

VIRGINIA. "13. That a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state; that standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty; and that, in all cases, the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power."[1164]

d. Other States made like declarations upon their ratifications of the Constitution of the United States, including:

[1159] CONSTITUTION OF MASSACHUSETTS (1780), PART THE FIRST, A DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE INHABITANTS OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, in THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, ante note 1157, PART I, at 959.

[1160] CONSTITUTION OF NEW HAMPSHIRE (1784), PART I.—THE BILL OF RIGHTS, in THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, ante note 1157, PART II, at 1282.

[1161] CONSTITUTION OF NORTH CAROLINA (1776), A DECLARATION OF RIGHTS, in THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, ante note 1157, PART II, at 1410.

[1162] CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA (1776), A Declaration of the Rights of the Inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania, in THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, ante note 1157, PART II, at 1542.

[1163] CONSTITUTION OF SOUTH CAROLINA (1778), An act for establishing the constitution of the State of South Carolina, in THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, ante note 1157, PART II, at 1627.

[1164] VIRGINIA BILL OF RIGHTS (1776), in THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, ante note 1157, PART II, at 1909.

> NEW YORK. "That the People have a right to keep and bear Arms; that a well regulated Militia, including the body of the People capable of bearing Arms, is the proper, natural and safe defence of a free State;
>
> * * * * *
>
> "That standing Armies in time of Peace are dangerous to Liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in Cases of necessity; and that at all times, the Military should be under strict Subordination to the civil Power."[1165]
>
> RHODE ISLAND. "[Article] 17*th* That the people have a right to keep and bear arms, that a well regulated militia, including the body of the people capable of bearing arms, is the proper, natural and safe defence of a free state; * * * that standing armies in time of peace, are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in cases of necessity; and that at all times the military should be under strict subordination to the civil power[.]"[1166]

In her ratification, Rhode Island added that she was asserting the right of "the people * * * to keep and bear arms", the cruciality of a Militia to the "defence of a free state", and the necessity for limitations on "standing armies" "[u]nder these impressions, and declaring, that the rights aforesaid cannot be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid, are consistent with the [United States C]onstitution".[1167] This, of course, was a correct construction of the original Constitution in these particulars, and an accurate prediction of the Second Amendment: namely,

- Rhode Island declared that "the people have a right to keep and bear arms" and that "a well regulated militia, including the body of the people capable of bearing arms, is the proper, natural and safe defence of a free state"—which principles both the Second Amendment (in like verbiage) and the original Constitution (by incorporation of "the Militia of the several States" into its federal structure) affirmed. Significantly, Rhode Island found both of them embodied in the original Constitution alone.

- Rhode Island declared that "standing armies in time of peace, are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in cases of necessity"—which admonition the original Constitution not only affirmed but also rendered effective, by enabling each newly elected House of Representatives to deny an "Appropriation of Money" "[t]o raise and support Armies", whenever its Members might believe that "Armies" are too [1165] Convention (1788), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1035.

---

[1166] Ratification of the Constitution, by the Convention of the State of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations (1790), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1055.

[1167] Id.

dear or too dangerous to be kept up.[1168] The assertion in its Preamble of "the common defence" and "the general Welfare" as two of the original Constitution's goals limited the exercise of all of the General Government's powers in conformity with those standards.[1169] Nonetheless, the original Constitution repeated that limitation in almost the very same words in Congress's power "[t]o lay and collect Taxes * * * to * * * provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States"—a repetition to be found nowhere else in the document.[1170] Now, "[i]t cannot be presumed that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect".[1171] And no one may "construe any clause of the Constitution as to defeat its obvious ends, when another construction, equally accordant with the words and sense thereof, will enforce and protect them".[1172] Therefore, some special purpose and effect must be assigned to this repetition—and particularly to the conjunction linking "the common Defence and general Welfare". Self-evidently, these words should be construed as an emphatic reminder to the Members of the House of Representatives of their plenary authority and responsibility in the premises: That "[a]ll Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House".[1173] That, if the "Revenue" is intended for an "Appropriation" "[t]o raise and support Armies" in excess of what is truly necessary and proper for "the common Defence", it will undermine the "general Welfare", either because it is simply wasteful, or because it may build up a huge "military-industrial complex" with interests and designs antagonistic to WE THE PEOPLE'S liberty. And therefore that WE THE PEOPLE are entitled to treat any such excessive "Appropriation" as a serious grievance, and a series of such improper "Appropriations" as components of "a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object", which "evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism" in the very same sense the Declaration of Independence employed those terms.

• Finally, Rhode Island declared that "at all times the military should be under strict subordination to the civil power"—which the Constitution also plainly required, because: (i) Although the President is "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States",[1174] he is also required

---

[1168] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1169] See, e.g., W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Volume 1, at 374-379.

[1170] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1171] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803).

[1172] Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Peters) 539, 612 (1842).

[1173] U.S. Const. art. I, § 7, cl. 1.

[1174] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed",[1175] and therefore himself must recognize, and must compel all of his subordinates to recognize, the preëminent authority of Congress "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces".[1176] And (ii) "martial law", in the sense of the general supersession of civilian law by some sort of military dictatorship or junta, is constitutionally impossible in America.[1177]

e. These attitudes carried over into the drafting of the Constitution of the United States. For, as Virginia's Governor Edmund Randolph reported to that State's Convention, "[w]ith respect to a standing army * * * there was not a member in the federal Convention, who did not feel indignation at such an institution".[1178] This aversion and animosity were the products, not simply of historical erudition and acumen, but of profound political prescience. For although the Founders were never exposed to modern totalitarianism, they would have agreed that "[a]ccording to the Marxist theory of the state, the army is the chief component of state power".[1179]

Against this background, the original Constitution incorporated and relied upon "the Militia of the several States", not for the practical reason that America's *pre-*constitutional Militia had always proven themselves perfectly efficient military forces (which in many instances they had not), but for the more important political reason that, being composed of WE THE PEOPLE en masse, the Militia promised to provide the most reliable "checks and balances" against the excesses of "standing armies" and the aspirations of usurpers and tyrants who would rely upon such forces to seize and abuse excessive political power. For, no matter how well organized, armed, and disciplined THE PEOPLE'S Militia may be, they will never function as "standing armies" in aid of usurpation and tyranny aimed at THE PEOPLE themselves. And the better organized, armed, and disciplined the Militia are, the better they can deter, and if necessary resist and overcome, "standing armies" raised by aspiring usurpers and tyrants in order to overawe THE PEOPLE.

In addition, inasmuch as properly organized Militia spread many of the costs of preparedness for emergencies amongst THE PEOPLE in the Localities in which they live through the citizenry's direct participation, they will tend to lower those costs. For, when THE PEOPLE themselves experience the total costs of preparedness palpably through personal participation—not just vicariously through their payment of taxes, the later expenditures of which revenues they cannot carefully

---

[1175] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[1176] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

[1177] See post, Chapter 48.

[1178] J. Elliot, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS, ante note 110, Volume 3, at 401.

[1179] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 62.

supervise—and thereby come to understand how and why those costs are being generated, and what benefits do or do not accrue to them from those expenditures, they will become unwilling to include in their programs for "homeland security" anything they do not recognize as truly necessary. Whereas, when massive "standing armies", semi-civilian "law-enforcement" bureaucracies, and a supporting financial and industrial complex organized on corporative-state lines provide the simulacrum of "homeland security", THE PEOPLE are unable to judge firsthand the real need for and burden of what almost always tend to be huge and generally profligate expenditures.

Of no less importance, when WE THE PEOPLE take upon themselves the responsibility for providing "homeland security", they will become acutely sensitive to what may be peculiarly necessary in their own Localities, unlike distant and aloof civilian and military bureaucrats who invariably consider rigid standardization the greatest desideratum, and unlike "standing armies" in the pay of usurpers and tyrants which count on the inability of THE PEOPLE, when unorganized, to take maximum advantage of the unique defenses their Localities afford them.

B. The constitutional imperative to maintain the distinct existences and character of "the Militia of the several States". The special constitutional position, status, and authority of "the Militia of the several States"; their separation from the "Armies", "Navy", and other "Troops, or Ships of War" that the Constitution allows; and their independence of those entities must always be recognized and scrupulously applied. This is because, "'[i]n expounding the Constitution of the United States, every word must have its due force, and appropriate meaning; for it is evident from the whole instrument, that no word was unnecessarily used, or needlessly added. * * * Every word appears to have been weighed with the utmost deliberation and its force and effect to have been fully understood.'"[1180] That being so, "[t]o disregard [WE THE PEOPLE'S] * * * deliberate choice of words and their natural meaning would be a departure from the first principle of constitutional interpretation".[1181] Rather, the constitutional language must be construed and applied "in such a manner, as, consistently with the words, shall fully and completely effectuate the whole objects of it".[1182]

The complex legal structure WE THE PEOPLE adopted in the Constitution plainly serves more than the merely linguistic purpose of listing various military establishments suitable to "provide for the common defence",[1183] but leaving to Congress and the States open-ended licenses to pick and choose among them,

---

[1180] Williams v. United States, 289 U.S. 553, 572-573 (1933), quoting from Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Peters) 540, 570-571 (1840) (opinion of Taney, C.J.).

[1181] Wright v. United States, 302 U.S. 583, 588 (1938).

[1182] Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Peters) 539, 612 (1842).

[1183] U.S. Const. preamble.

employing some while disregarding others, as mere political expediency may counsel from time to time. Here, at least six points deserve emphasis:

1. The Founding Fathers obviously "weighed with the utmost deliberation" and "fully understood" the "force and effect" of including "the Militia of the several States" as permanent components of the Constitution's federal structure, while relegating "the Army and Navy of the United States" and other "Troops, or Ships of War" to the positions of merely contingent forces of the General Government and of the States, respectively.

This surmise should hardly surprise. The unique constitutional status of the Militia reflects their identity with WE THE PEOPLE. The Constitution incorporates the Militia within its federal system because they are comprised of THE PEOPLE whose exercise of "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is "necessary to the security of a free State".[1184] And inasmuch as the States themselves cannot survive as "free" political establishments without their Militia, neither can the federal system composed of them.

2. The Constitution recognizes the separate and independent position of "the Militia of the several States" as against all other National and State military establishments, in order to reflect and preserve the Militia's institutional integrity.

a. Although, as a matter of strategy and tactics, when "call[ed] forth" the Militia may deploy alongside and in close coöperation with "the Army and Navy of the United States", as a matter of constitutional law the Militia can never be integrated into, merged with, or otherwise transformed into or treated as mere components, appendages, satellites, or "reserves" of either of the latter entities, thereby terminating the Militia's own unique existences. After all, Congress may "provide for calling forth the Militia" for three purposes only: to wit, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1185] None of these involves their becoming integral (or even any) parts of "the Army and Navy of the United States", of any State's "Troops, or Ships of War", or of any other military or para-military establishment or entity. When the Militia are "call[ed] forth", they remain Militia. This is why the Constitution refers to them in such circumstances as being merely "employed in the Service of the United States",[1186] and "in[ ] the actual Service of the United States".[1187] These qualifications describe a contingent and conditional relationship that can never apply to the National "Armies", "Navy", or "land and naval Forces". For they are permanently "the Army and Navy of the United States", whatever services they may perform.

[1184] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[1185] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1186] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[1187] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

b. If, even when "call[ed] forth" for constitutional purposes, "the Militia of the several States" cannot be integrated into "the Army and Navy of the United States" that the Constitution expressly recognizes, they surely cannot be conscripted into or subordinated unto any constitutionally unnamed domestic civilian police or other law-enforcement or internal-security agency of the General Government or the States. Even less may the Militia be dragooned into any military or police establishment of a foreign state or international or supra-national organization.

c. Similarly, the Militia cannot be forcibly integrated into any "Troops, or Ships of War" that the States may "keep" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress".[1188] Congress cannot give "Consent" to the States to employ their Militia to that end, because: (i) such employment is not one of the three constitutional purposes for which alone Congress is "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia";[1189] and (ii) if the Militia were translated into State "Troops" or mustered onto State "Ships of War", they would not be "employed in the Service of the United States".[1190]

d. Moreover, even were a State "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay", and therefore the "Consent of Congress" were not required,[1191] she could not legitimately integrate the entirety of her Militia within her own "Troops, or Ships of War". For that would deprive Congress of the very Militia the Constitution incorporated into its federal structure so that they will always be available for Congress to "call[ ] forth * * * to repel [such] Invasions"—and the States lack any authority so to interfere with the fulfillment of Congress's constitutional powers and duties.[1192] Any State "actually invaded, or in * * * imminent Danger" could employ her Militia to repel the invasion—but only as Militia, not as "Troops".

3. The Constitution separates "the Militia of the several States" from every other military establishment in order to fix the locus of their command, and thereby guarantee their independence.

a. The Constitution appoints the President as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States",[1193] but always subject to whatever rules Congress may "provide * * * for governing such Part of them [that is, the Militia] as may be employed in the Service of United States".[1194] Otherwise, no designee of the General Government may hold

---

[1188] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1189] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1190] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[1191] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1192] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[1193] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1194] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

a commission in, or exercise command or control over, the Militia. For, even while delegating to Congress the power "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia", the Constitution expressly "reserv[es] to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers".[1195]

b. As a consequence of this, no officer of "the Army * * * [or] Navy of the United States" may be assigned to or may himself assume command of any part of "the Militia of the several States". For all officers of "the Army and Navy" are "Officers of the United States" appointed, not by the States, but by the President "by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate".[1196] Even the President of the United States may assert command over the Militia only in his separate capacity as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia", not as an officer of "the Army * * * [or] Navy". So, the President may exercise his command of the Militia either by himself directly or through those Militia "Officers" the States appoint, and in no other manner.

And because Congress's power "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States" is specifically limited by the "reserv[ation] to the States respectively, [of] the Appointment of the Officers", Congress cannot direct officers of "the Army and Navy" to assume commands within the Militia under color of its power "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces".[1197] For the latter delegation of power, being of no more than "equal dignity" with the former reservation of power, cannot "be so enforced as to nullify or substantially impair" it.[1198]

c. To an even greater degree, no police, law-enforcement, internal-security, intelligence, or other civilian "Officers of the United States"[1199] may be imposed on "the Militia of the several States" as actual commanders (as opposed to advisors or observers) in any capacity. If "Officers of the United States" appointed to positions of command within military establishments the creation of which the Constitution expressly permits ("the Army and Navy of the United States") may not exercise command over or within the Militia, certainly such authority cannot be asserted or assumed by any "other Officers of the United States" appointed to positions of command within civilian establishments the creation of which the Constitution at best only impliedly allows.[1200]

[1195] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1196] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[1197] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

[1198] See Dick v. United States, 208 U.S. 340, 353 (1908).

[1199] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[1200] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 and art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

4. Because "Officers" of the Militia (with the sole exception of the President) always remain State "Officers", even when "employed in the Service of the United States", not only in principle are the Militia integrated as establishments within the Constitution's federal structure, but also in practice federalism permeates—and should always and everywhere instruct—their operations on behalf of the United States.

a. To be sure, when "in[ ] the actual Service of the United States" "Officers" of "the Militia of the several States" may be required by the President to assist officers of "the Army and Navy" in the performance of the latters' duties, and vice versa. Out of courtesy, comity, and prudence, Militia "Officers" may even solicit and defer to expert advice from officers of "the land and naval Forces". And for negligent, reckless, or intentional failures or refusals to follow such well-founded counsel "in time of War or public danger", Militia "Officers" may even subject themselves to courts-martial or other discipline for dereliction of duty.[1201] This, though, not because in such circumstances the Militia "Officers" have breached some obligation mechanically to "obey orders" from officers of "the Army and Navy", but because the Militia "Officers" have breached their duty personally to exercise proper initiative and judgment within the Militia when they became fully aware of, but chose to disregard, the correct course of action.

Yet, in the final analysis, in all cases actual command of Militia forces must always remain with Militia "Officers" themselves. They must always be authorized to refuse to comply with purported "orders", and to reject advice they consider ill advised, from any and all "Officers of the United States"—save the President, in his capacity as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia", and then only when the Militia are "called into the actual Service of the United States".[1202]

b. Although this independence on the part of "the Militia of the several States" may appear cumbersome and inefficient from the narrow perspective of a smoothly functioning military chain of command that operates "from the top down", it is uniquely effective for three vastly more important purposes:

(1) Independence of command maintains the separation of the Militia from "the land and naval Forces" required to preserve, protect, and promote federalism the right way: "from the bottom up". "[T]he security of a free State" for each of the several States (the most important of all "States' rights"),[1203] and "the Blessings of Liberty" for WE THE PEOPLE as individuals,[1204] can best be maintained against encroachments from politically powerful special-interest groups, unbridled electoral

---

[1201] See U.S. Const. amend. V.

[1202] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1203] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1204] U.S. Const. preamble.

majorities, rogue officials, and aspiring usurpers and tyrants working their nefarious schemes through the General Government if, during times of crisis, the States actively participate in the operations of that government in a manner that relies upon and partakes to some significant degree of their original sovereignty. Especially at such times, the States and their citizens must avoid finding themselves "on the outside", as impotent critics, opponents, and possibly victims of incompetent, malicious, or antagonistically rogue officials of the General Government. Rather, as much as possible they must position themselves "on the inside", actually exercising or supervising the exercise of federal authority.

The Power of the Sword is an—ultimately, the most important—attribute of sovereignty. Maintaining a military force is an exercise of the Power of the Sword. For the States, that exercise is circumscribed by the requirement that they obtain "the Consent of Congress" in order to "keep Troops, or Ships of War in Time of Peace",[1205] and by Congress's authority in the first instance "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[1206] Nonetheless, the Constitution incorporates the Militia into its federal system just as the Framers found them, as "the Militia of the several States". And it expressly reserves to the States, as a residue of their original sovereignty, the ability at least indirectly to exercise federal authority through their reserved powers over:

> • "the Appointment of the Officers"[1207] who are to exercise independent command, subject only to the President, whenever the Militia are "call[ed] forth * * * to execute the Laws of the Union" and to support the President when he "take[s] Care that the Laws be faithfully executed";[1208] and
>
> • "training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress",[1209] through which activity the States can guarantee that their Militia are aware of and prepared to fulfill their constitutional duties.

(2) Independence of command preserves federalism by preventing the Militia from being dragooned into schemes of usurpation and tyranny fomented or abetted by the "large military establishments and standing armies" the Founders feared and of which, in that spirit of foreboding, Justice Story warned. By expressly limiting Congress's and the President's authority over "the Militia of the several States", even while it disallows the States from "keep[ing] Troops, or Ships of War

---

[1205] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1206] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1207] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1208] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 and art. II, § 3.

[1209] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress",[1210] the Constitution plainly intends the Militia to serve as "checks and balances" against the other Armed Forces it expressly allows, "the Army and Navy of the United States". If the Militia are to perform this vital function, though, they must never be put under the Army's or Navy's command or control. For then they would be nothing but adjuncts or appendages of the very "large military establishments and standing armies" the Constitution sets them up to deter, and may require them to oppose and even to resist with arms. And the Constitution cannot be construed in such a self-contradictory, self-defeating, even suicidal manner.

The selfsame conclusion applies with perhaps even more force to the General Government's civilian police, law-enforcement, and internal-security apparatus, as well as to those para-militarized police forces of the States that rogue officials of the General Government are now in the process of equipping, training, and coöpting through the Department of Homeland Security. For, as police states all over the world have demonstrated, such ostensibly "civilian" agencies are simply camouflaged forms of "large military establishments and standing armies", or at least pose dangers to the people's liberties that are equally immediate and grave.

(3) Independence of command on the part of the Militia also preserves true constitutional federalism by securing America's National independence. Here, one must speak of federalism by exclusion: that is, defining "federalism" to include the States and the General Government, and therefore to exclude all other political entities. As the Declaration of Independence asserts, the thirteen Colonies found it "necessary * * * to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle[d] them"; and, > appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of [their] intentions, d[id], in the Name, and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES; that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do.[1211]

"[T[he good People of these Colonies", in their capacity as "WE THE PEOPLE of the United States", then "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution" under the

---

[1210] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 with § 10, cl. 3.

[1211] Emphasis supplied.

aegis of this "separate and equal station" and status as citizens of "Free and Independent States".[1212]

Having been formed on this basis, and deriving its legitimacy and authority solely from this source, the Constitution cannot possibly contain or countenance any means by which it might be twisted to negate its own validity by purporting to set the Declaration of Independence aside. Such a pernicious result cannot come about through the exercise of any power of the General Government or the States, because every officer of both the General Government and the States "shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution",[1213] not to overthrow its foundation. Neither can such a result arise through a purported "amendment" of the Constitution, because the sole power in that regard allows "Amendments to this Constitution" alone,[1214] not "amendments" that would purport to negate the Declaration of Independence, and thereby to demolish the legal basis for every constitutional provision, including the very power of amendment itself. Nor can such a result derive from any purported "treaty", because no treaty can override the Constitution[1215]—a matter which should be self-evident, inasmuch as a treaty can be ratified with merely a two-thirds vote in the Senate, whereas a constitutional Amendment requires concurrence of three-quarters of the States themselves, not just their Senators.[1216]

For these reasons, the Militia can never be dragooned into the service of any foreign states or international or supra-national organizations at all, and certainly not of those foreign powers, organizations, and interests that aim at destroying, compromising, or prostituting America's National independence, sovereignty, and special variety of federalism. Actions in pursuit of such alien aims:

- can never be "in[ ] the actual Service of the United States"—and therefore can never be the subject of legitimate commands to the Militia from the President as their "Commander in Chief";[1217]

- can never amount to legitimate "employ[ment] in the Service of the United States"—and therefore can never come within

---

[1212] See U.S. Const. preamble.

[1213] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1214] U.S. Const. art. V (emphasis supplied).

[1215] See, e.g.,Doe v. Braden, 57 U.S. (16 Howard) 635, 657 (1853); The Cherokee Tobacco, 78 U.S. (11 Wallace) 616, 620-621 (1871); Holden v. Joy, 84 U.S. (17 Wallace) 211, 242-243 (1872); Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890); United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U.S. 649, 701 (1898); Asakura v. City of Seattle, 265 U.S. 332, 341 (1924); United States v. Minnesota, 270 U.S. 181, 208 (1926); Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 16-18 (1957) (opinion of Black, J., announcing the judgment of the Court).

[1216] Compare U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2 with art. V.

[1217] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

Congress's power "[t]o provide * * * for governing * * * [any] Part of the[Militia]";[1218] and

• can never constitute a valid purpose for "calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union"[1219]

—because, rather than "execut[ing any of] th[os]e Laws", such a deployment would constitute an attempt not simply to subvert or even negate the "Laws" ("the supreme Law of the Land" not least among them), but also to destroy "the Union" itself, and with it the grounds for all of its "Laws".

5. By incorporating "the Militia of the several States" as preëxisting and permanent establishments within the federal system, but treating "the Army and Navy of the United States" as merely contingent entities, the Constitution recognizes a clear hierarchy of place and authority between the Militia, on the one hand, and "the Army and Navy", on the other.

a. Being constitutionally independent of both "the Army and Navy"—as well as of all the unnamed para-military and civilian agencies the General Government might create—the Militia are not and can not be made subordinate to any of them. This is particularly true because the Constitution plainly intends the Militia to provide the ultimate "checks and balances" against "large military establishments and standing armies in time of peace"—or any other armed bodies—that could afford "facile means * * * to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people".[1220] For that reason, the Militia must be so "organiz[ed], arm[ed], discipline[d,] * * * govern[ed,] * * * [and] train[ed]"[1221] that:

• they are able to hold their own against, or at least to deter, rogue elements in the regular Armed Forces that might support the malign designs of "ambitious and unprincipled rulers"; and

• they enjoy absolute material superiority as against any and all para-military or civilian police, intelligence, and internal-security agencies of the General Government and the States that might lend themselves to such conspiracies.

b. Even more fundamentally, because in point of their constitutional lineage the Militia are antecedent and therefore superior to the Armed Forces and any para-military or civilian agencies, they should be organized, armed, disciplined, governed, and trained for the crucial purpose of exercising some form of on-going

---

[1218] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1219] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1220] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[1221] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

"constitutional supervision" over the latter entities. This, in fulfillment of the Militia's constitutional responsibilities "to execute the Laws of the Union, [and] suppress Insurrections"[1222]—both of which functions would necessarily be involved were rogue elements of the Armed Forces or civilian agencies to plot or attempt "to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people", and which therefore can be invoked to prevent and punish such occurrences.

6. Even if the constitutional provisions that deal with "the Militia of the several States", on the one hand, and "the Army and Navy of the United States" and the "Troops, or Ships of War" which the States may "keep" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress", on the other hand, were "of equal dignity" in all respects, "neither [set] must be so enforced as to nullify or substantially impair the other".[1223] These constitutional provisions, however, are of quite unequal dignity, to the Militia's distinct advantage. For "the Militia of the several States" are permanent establishments within the federal system, with a status akin to that of the States themselves, and over the continuation of which neither Congress nor any State has any control (outside of the process of amending the Constitution)—whereas, in contrast, "the Army and Navy" are institutions within the General Government the very existences of which are contingent upon action by Congress; and the "Troops, or Ships of War" which the States may "keep" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress" are Armed Forces within the States the very existences of which are contingent upon joint action by Congress and the States.

Therefore—

a. No purported "interpretation" of these provisions of the Constitution by officials of the General Government or the States can be accepted if it commands or even countenances suppression or neglect of the Militia in any substantial part—for example, on the specious grounds that the Militia can be relegated to disorganization, disarray, disuse, and general discard because "the Army and Navy of the United States", and such of their adjuncts as Congress permits the States to maintain, supposedly suffice for National defense.

Today, though, the latter errant theory finds embodiment in the basic Congressional statute purporting to deal with the Militia, which provides that:

> (a) The militia of the United States consists of all able-bodied males at least 17 years of age and * * * under 45 years of age who are, or who have made a declaration of intention to become, citizens of the United States and of female citizens of the United States who are members of the National Guard.

[1222] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1223] See Dick v. United States, 208 U.S. 340, 353 (1908).

> (b) The classes of the militia are—
>
> (1) the organized militia, which consists of the National Guard and the Naval Militia; and
>
> (2) the unorganized militia, which consists of the members of the militia who are not members of the National Guard or the Naval Militia.[1224]

Inasmuch, however, as "the National Guard and the Naval Militia" are not parts of the constitutional "Militia of the several States" at all, but instead are components of "the Army and Navy of the United States", the so-called "organized militia" is a deceptive misnomer.[1225] And inasmuch as the Constitution delegates to Congress the power and the duty "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" in their entirety—not for "*un*organizing" them—the so-called "unorganized militia" is an oxymoron.[1226]

b. No purported "interpretation" of these provisions of the Constitution[1227] by officials of the General Government or the States can be accepted if it subordinates "the Militia of the several States" to "the Army and Navy of the United States"—for example, on the grounds of the familiar, yet fallacious contention that the National Guard is the modern Militia,[1228] or at least is the suppositious successor to the original *pre-*constitutional Militia.[1229]

The Commonwealth of Virginia supplies a contemporary example of how the latter fallacy can lead to treating members of the Militia as a mere "reserve" for the National Guard. In that State,

> [t]he militia * * * shall consist of all able-bodied citizens of the Commonwealth who are citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied persons resident in the Commonwealth who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who are at least sixteen years of age and [with certain statutory exemptions] not more than fifty-five years of age. The militia shall be divided into four classes: the National Guard, which includes the Army National Guard and the Air

---

[1224] 10 U.S.C. § 311. See generally E. Vieira, Jr., Constitutional "Homeland Security", ante note 3, at 50-54.

[1225] See ante, at 786-793. This has not escaped attention elsewhere. See generally, e.g., S.T. Ansell, "Legal and Historical Aspects of the Militia", 26 Yale Law Journal 471 (1917), at 479-480; Frederick B. Wiener, "The Militia Clause of the Constitution", 54 Harvard Law Review 181 (1940), at 196-215; David Hardy, "The Militia Is Not the National Guard", in Larry Pratt, Editor, Safeguarding Liberty: The Constitution and Citizen Militias (Franklin, Tennessee: Legacy Communications, 1995), at 99. Also compare and contrast Perpich v. Department of Defense, 496 U.S. 334 (1990), with United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174 (1939).

[1226] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16. See ante, at 50-54.

[1227] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 16; art. I, § 10, cl. 3; and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1228] See 10 U.S.C. § 311(b)(1), quoted in the text immediately ante.

[1229] See, e.g., M. Doubler & J. Listman, Jr., The National Guard, ante note 1057, at 4; R. Wright, Jr., The Continental Army, ante note 396, APPENDIX A, at 429-430.

> National Guard; the Virginia Defense Force; the naval militia; and the unorganized militia.[1230]

To be sure, able-bodied individuals "who are at least sixteen years of age and * * * not more than fifty-five years of age", and who are not enlisted in the Armed Forces of the United States, do qualify as members of "the Militia of the several States", in Virginia or any other State in the Union. The Virginia National Guard and "naval militia", however, are adjuncts of the Army, Air Force, and Navy of the United States.[1231] And the Virginia Defense Force is merely a tiny appendage of and supplement to the Commonwealth's National Guard,[1232] specially authorized by Congressional statute,[1233] as it must be to satisfy the constitutional requirement that the State must receive "the Consent of Congress" as a precondition to raising such a force.[1234] As Virginia's Code specifies,

> [w]hen called to state active duty, the mission of the Virginia Defense Force shall be to (i) provide for an adequately trained organized reserve militia to assume control of Virginia National Guard facilities and to secure any federal and state property left in place in the event of the mobilization of the Virginia National Guard, (ii) assist in the mobilization of the Virginia National Guard, (iii) support the Virginia National Guard in providing family assistance to military dependents within the Commonwealth in the event of the mobilization of the Virginia National Guard, (iv) provide a military force to respond to the call of the Governor * * * .[1235]

Further differentiating the Virginia Defense Force from any part of "the Militia of the several States", Virginia's Code decrees that, although "[t]he Virginia Defense Force, to the extent authorized by the Governor and funded by the General Assembly, shall be equipped as needed for training and for state active duty", "[m]embers of the Virginia Defense Force shall not be armed with firearms during the performance of training duty or state active duty, except under circumstances and in instances authorized by the Governor".[1236] By itself alone, this disability of its members to bear arms as part of their normal active service utterly disqualifies the Virginia Defense Force as a constitutional Militia of any sort, because:

[1230] Code of Virginia § 44-1.

[1231] See Code of Virginia §§ 44-2, 44-3, 44-55, 44-56, 44-57, 44-58, 44-59, 44-60, and 44-62.

[1232] See Code of Virginia §§ 44-54.4 ("a targeted membership of at least 1,200"), 44-54.5, 44-54.6, 44-54.7, and 65.2-103.

[1233] 32 U.S.C. § 109. See Code of Virginia § 44-54.7.

[1234] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1235] Code of Virginia § 44-54.4.

[1236] Code of Virginia § 44-54.12 (emphasis supplied).

(1) The constitutional definition of "Militia" requires that every eligible citizen be armed. The Second Amendment would not command that, "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed", unless American legal history proved that "[a] well regulated Militia" is always composed of "the people" as a whole, each of them personally possessed of the necessary "Arms". Such was the case in all but one of the thirteen Colonies and then in all of the independent States from the early 1600s through the late 1780s. Specifically in Virginia, (i) her pre-constitutional Militia always included nearly every able-bodied free White man, not specially exempted, each of whom was required by Militia Act after Militia Act to supply himself (or, if he were penurious, to be supplied by the community) with one or more firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements suitable for military use, all of which he maintained in his personal possession at home; and (ii) other of Virginia's pre-constitutional Armed Forces were often composed of volunteers who supplied their own personal firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements.[1237]

(2) The Constitution requires that Congress "provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" in their entirety throughout the country, not "*dis*arming" them; and in default of sufficient Congressional action, each of the States must arm, not disarm, her own Militia; and in default of sufficient Congressional and State action, WE THE PEOPLE must arm themselves, not acquiesce in disarmament imposed on them by public officials' acts of omission, commission, or arbitrary discretion. The Virginia Defense Force, however, is not armed by Congress. It is not armed by the Commonwealth in the general course of events, either, because its members are prohibited from carrying "firearms during the performance of training duty or state active duty, except under circumstances and in instances authorized by the Governor", but as to which situations the statute provides no standards to inform, let alone control, the Governor's conduct.[1238] Presumably, too, the same statute precludes the members of the Defense Force on their own initiatives from procuring and maintaining arms in their possession at home as part of their official duties. Thus, under Virginia's own law, her Defense Force cannot qualify as "a well regulated militia", because it is not "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".[1239] (Nothing in Virginia law seems to prevent or hinder members of the Virginia Defense Force from possessing firearms in their capacities as mere private citizens, though.)

(3) Notwithstanding that the Virginia Defense Force cannot possibly be a component of "the Militia of the several States", Virginia's statutes provide that:

[1237] See ante, Chapters 17 through 19.

[1238] See Code of Virginia § 44-54.12.

[1239] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

- "[t]he National Guard, the Virginia Defense Force, the naval militia, and the unorganized militia or any part thereof may be ordered into service by the Governor in such order as he determines";[1240]

- "[t]he Governor * * * may order the[unorganized militia] out either by calling for volunteers or by draft";[1241]

- "[w]henever the Governor orders out the unorganized militia or any part thereof, it shall be incorporated into the Virginia Defense Force until relieved from service";[1242] and

- "[w]henever any part of the unorganized militia is ordered out, it shall be governed by the same rules and regulations and be subject to the same penalties as the National Guard or naval militia".[1243]

So, as a matter of fact but plainly without constitutional warrant, Virginia purports to transmogrify the largest portion of her citizens qualified for her Militia (the misnamed "unorganized militia") into a "reserve" for the National Guard, subject to a draft at her Governor's command.

(4) Although perhaps not foreseen by Virginia's legislators, the consequence of all this is nonetheless truly revolutionary. For, by reducing Virginia's Militia from what Justice Story called "the natural defence of a free country against * * * domestic usurpation of power by rulers" into part and parcel of the "large military establishments and standing armies in time of peace" that he warned could afford "facile means * * * to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people",[1244] Virginia's Code converts her Militia into a force capable of negating—indeed, turning upside down and inside out—the Second Amendment's principle that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State"!

c. Finally, no purported "interpretation" of these provisions of the Constitution[1245] by officials of the General Government or the States can be accepted if it licenses public officials—on the grounds that "the Army and Navy of the United States" and such of their adjuncts as the National Guard are sufficient for this country's defense—to prohibit or inhibit WE THE PEOPLE from organizing,

---

[1240] Code of Virginia § 44-80.

[1241] Code of Virginia § 44-87.

[1242] Code of Virginia § 44-88.

[1243] Code of Virginia § 44-85. But see Code of Virginia § 44-54.4, ¶ 3.

[1244] Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646 (footnote omitted).

[1245] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 16; art. I, § 10, cl. 3; and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

arming, disciplining, governing, and training themselves in Militia for self-defense in their own Localities, either through their own State legislatures when Congress neglects, fails, or refuses to act; or on their own initiatives when both Congress and their States are repeatedly petitioned to revitalize the Militia,[1246] but nonetheless do nothing constructive.

(1) No public official can ever prohibit or inhibit any American from advocating, working assiduously for, and organizing other individuals on behalf of legislative revitalization of "the Militia of the several States". For

- not only does the First Amendment deny Congress any power to "make * * * [any] law * * * abridging * * * the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances"; and

- not only does the Fourteenth Amendment apply this limitation to the States;[1247] but also,

- "[t]he very idea of a government, republican in form, implies a right on the part of its citizens to meet peaceably for consultation in respect of public affairs and to petition for a redress of grievances";[1248]

- "[a] well regulated Militia" composed of "the people", who exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", is an indispensable component of the "Republican Form of Government" which every State in America must always maintain;[1249] and

- "[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in th[e] Union a Republican Form of Government" in all of its particulars.[1250]

- Even more fundamentally, for individuals to organize themselves on behalf of legislative revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" amounts, not simply to their exercise of "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances", but also to an act of self-government necessary to preserve self-government. Unlike the right to petition, which distinguishes "the people" as suppliants on one side from "the Government" as their ostensible superior on the other, revitalization of the Militia involves "the people's" self-assertion of their

[1246] See U.S. Const. amend. I.

[1247] U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1, as construed in, e.g., DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364-365 (1937); Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization, 307 U.S. 496, 512-513 (opinion of Roberts, J.), 519 (opinion of Stone, J.) (1939); Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 275-278 (1941).

[1248] United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 552 (1876).

[1249] See post, at 890-893, 921-922, 1038-1040, 1301-1307, 1451-1453, and 1497-1499.

[1250] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

own primary governmental authority and duty to provide directly for "the security of a free State".[1251]

(2) No matter how well-prepared "the Army and Navy of the United States", the National Guard, and various other para-military law-enforcement and internal-security agencies may be to fulfill their legitimate functions, no public official may fall back on that state of readiness as an excuse to prohibit or inhibit Americans from forming prototypical Militia units for self-defense in their own Localities when officeholders neglect, fail, or refuse to do so after repeated entreaties from their constituents. That public officials may have followed the Constitution with respect to the regular Armed Forces provides no justification for their disregarding the Constitution with respect to "the Militia of the several States"—let alone for coercing WE THE PEOPLE into surrendering their own constitutional rights and neglecting their own constitutional duties in that particular. This is especially true when public officials have created and lavishly equipped those "large military establishments and standing armies" that afford "the facile means * * * to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people"[1252]—and that the Militia are supposed to "check and balance", deter, and if necessary resist.

(3) The employment of any part of "the Army and Navy of the United States", or such of their adjuncts as the National Guard, either directly or as advisors to National, State, or Local police, or other para-military or civilian law-enforcement agencies, for the purpose of enforcing any statutory prohibition against WE THE PEOPLE'S revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" by statute, or even formation of Militia units on their own initiatives when and where public officials refuse to revitalize the Militia, would constitute the crime of lèse-majesté in whatever jurisdiction it took place. For, in America, "WE THE PEOPLE of the United States"[1253] are the only earthly sovereigns the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution recognize.[1254] The Declaration of Independence put itself forth "in the Name, and by the Authority of the good People of these Colonies"; and the Preamble to the Constitution attests that "WE THE PEOPLE of the United States * * * do ordain and establish th[e] Constitution". So, on the best evidence available, the testimony of America's formative documents, "[i]n our country the people are sovereign".[1255] "[T]here are citizens, but no subjects".[1256] For this reason, public officials always remain nothing more than WE THE PEOPLE'S temporary

---

[1251] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1252] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[1253] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1254] Fleming v. Page, 50 U.S. (9 Howard) 603, 617-618 (1850).

[1255] Afroyim v. Rusk, 387 U.S. 253, 257 (1967).

[1256] Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 456 (1793) (opinion of Wilson, J.).

representatives or agents—and as such may exercise only whatever authority THE PEOPLE have deigned to delegate to them.[1257] WE THE PEOPLE enacted the Constitution to "provide for the common defence",[1258] and determined that "[a] well regulated Militia" in which they themselves exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is "necessary to the security of a free State".[1259] Therefore, if, due to public officials' obstructionism, the only means by which WE THE PEOPLE can fulfill their constitutional duties in "the Militia of the several States" in any particular State (or in all of them) is through self-organization, any attempt on the part of those officials to thwart such self-organization is (as lawyers say) ultra vires—that is, beyond those officials' powers.

(4) If that attempt takes the form of actual armed opposition to THE PEOPLE'S revitalization of their Militia, let alone to the Militia when revitalized, then it amounts to nothing less than "Treason". For "Treason against the United States, shall consist only of levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort".[1260] "WE THE PEOPLE of the United States" are "the United States"—everything else being merely a legal construct born of and reflecting their existence and authority. And "the Militia of the several States" not only are composed of WE THE PEOPLE but also are "necessary to the security of a free State", such that the continued existence of each State, and therefore of "the United States" as a collective, depends upon them, in a way the Constitution attributes to no other entity it recognizes. So, armed opposition by anyone to the Militia, or to WE THE PEOPLE in their attempts to revitalize the Militia, amounts to nothing less than armed opposition to "the United States", and thereby "Treason". Of course, not simply the rogue soldiers or police appearing in arms against the Militia would be criminally liable for such misbehavior. "On the contrary, * * * if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors."[1261]

Conversely, the Militia are incapable of committing "Treason" as the Constitution understands that term. After all, the Militia consist of all those among WE THE PEOPLE who are entitled to "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms"[1262]—a subset of THE PEOPLE most likely larger even than the subset of those who are

---

[1257] E.g., McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 316, 404-405 (1819).

[1258] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1259] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1260] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

[1261] Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cranch) 75, 125-126 (1807) (emphasis supplied). See 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[1262] U.S. Const. amend. II.

entitled to vote.[1263] Therefore, the Militia are not merely agglomerations of armed "subjects", who under some imaginable circumstances could commit "treason" against their "sovereign", but are themselves the very embodiments of sovereignty itself—indeed, the highest actual embodiments of sovereignty possible under the Constitution: namely, the Power of the Sword wielded by the sovereigns with their own hands.

As the Founding Fathers learned from Blackstone, "treason" is that "general division of crimes * * * which amount either to a total renunciation of that allegiance, or at least to a criminal neglect of that duty, which is due from every subject to his sovereign".[1264] The contours of "allegiance", though, are not always self-evident. For example, Blackstone observed that > allegiance is usually, and therefore most easily, considered as the duty of the people, and protection as the duty of the magistrate; and yet they are, reciprocally, the rights as well as the duties of each other. Allegiance is the right of the magistrate, and protection the right of the people.[1265]

In general, American law has tended to follow that reasoning: "Treason is a breach of allegiance, and can be committed by him only who owes allegiance either perpetual or temporary."[1266] And > [t]he very idea of a political community, such as a nation is, implies an association of persons for the promotion of their general welfare. Each one of the persons associated becomes a member of the nation formed by the association. He owes it allegiance and is entitled to its protection. Allegiance and protected are, in this connection, reciprocal obligations. The one is a compensation for the other; allegiance for protection and protection for allegiance.[1267]

Yet, under the Constitution, Blackstone's conception of "allegiance" is multiply flawed, because—

- All "magistrates" are merely WE THE PEOPLE'S representatives, agents, and therefore subordinates, never their superiors. If THE PEOPLE owe allegiance to anything relating to magistracy, it is to the earthly laws that [1263] Compare ante, at 245-249 and 611-614 (minimum age for enrollment in Rhode Island's and Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia was generally 16), with U.S. Const. amend. XXVI, § 1 (minimum age for voters today is 18).

---

[1264] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 74.

[1265] Id., Volume 1, at 123.

[1266] United States v. Wiltberger, 18 U.S. (5 Wheaton) 76, 97 (1820).

[1267] Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wallace) 162, 165-166 (1875).

create those positions. Of those laws, however, THE PEOPLE themselves are the ultimate authors, interpreters, and enforcers. So, in the final analysis, THE PEOPLE owe allegiance only to themselves.

• "[M]agistrates" are not the sources or guarantors of THE PEOPLE'S protection. Rather, inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" and every such Militia is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[1268] in the final analysis THE PEOPLE protect themselves. Indeed, the Constitution expects that, in dire circumstances, "magistrates" will "call[ ] forth" THE PEOPLE in the Militia for very that purpose[1269]—and if "magistrates" fail, neglect, or refuse to do so, then THE PEOPLE will call themselves forth, the opposition of "magistrates" in words or deeds notwithstanding.

• Most importantly, "magistrates" can put forward no even colorable claim to be treated as "sovereigns" to whose persons common Americans perpetually owe allegiance, obedience, and personal respect according or even in analogy to the *pre-*constitutional British pattern of "Nobility" which the Constitution prohibits.[1270] In fact, depending upon public officials' behavior, exactly the contrary may and should be the case. True enough, all citizens do labor under a legal duty to obey and assist loyal officials in all constitutional exercises of the latters' authority. But not otherwise, because "[a]n unconstitutional act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties * * * ; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed".[1271] Thus, true allegiance will require THE PEOPLE, ultimate through their Militia, to oppose and disobey any and all public officials who neglect let alone betray their own "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution",[1272] and whose negligence or betrayals cannot be punished in some other manner in the regular course of law. That being so, no one can rightfully impute "Treason" to armed opposition by the Militia to those who, although holding offices in the General Government or the governments of the States, attempt by any means (and particularly by main force) to skirt, subvert, or pervert the Constitution and laws of the United States for malign ends.

More specifically, Blackstone exemplified as one variety of "treason" under English law

---

[1268] U.S. Const. amend. II and Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1269] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1270] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8 and § 10, cl. 1.

[1271] Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886). Accord, Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 288 (1885); Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 97, 101-102 (1887); Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408-409 (1963).

[1272] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

> "if a man do levy war against our lord the king in his realm." And this may be done by taking arms, not only to dethrone the king, but under pretence to reform religion, or the laws, or to remove evil counsellors, or other grievances, whether real or pretended. For the law does not, neither can it, permit any private man, or set of men, to interfere forcibly in matters of such high importance; especially as it has established a sufficient power, for these purposes, in the high court of parliament: neither does the constitution justify any private or particular resistance for private or particular grievances; though in cases of national oppression the nation has very justifiably risen as one man, to vindicate the original contract subsisting between the king and his people.[1273]

Blackstone's example—"if a man do levy war against our lord the king"—the Constitution obviously adopted, in republican form, in its definition of "Treason" as "levying War against the[United States]".[1274] But, even on the terms Blackstone drew from the monarchical context of Britain in his era, "the Militia of the several States" could never commit "Treason". This is because—

- The Militia are not composed of mere "private m[e]n, or set[s] of men", with merely "private or particular grievances". Instead, they are governmental entities, empowered by the Constitution itself "to execute the Laws of the Union, [and] suppress Insurrections"—and when doing so are engaged in the righting of public grievances.

- The Militia cannot "tak[e] arms * * * [to] dethrone the king", in the sense of forcibly setting aside the "sovereign". For they consist of America's true sovereigns—WE THE PEOPLE arrayed in arms—exercising the ultimate rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and duties of sovereignty.

- The Militia would never act "under pretence to reform religion", because: (i) The First Amendment commands that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof"—a limitation the Fourteenth Amendment extends to the States and all of their institutions and officials, including the Militia.[1275] (ii) The First Amendment is one of the foremost "Laws of the Union". And (iii) Congress may "provide for calling forth the Militia", and the Militia may come forth, "to execute the Laws of the Union", not to violate them.[1276]

[1273] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 81-82 (footnote omitted).

[1274] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

[1275] U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1, as early applied in, e.g., Hamilton v. Board of Regents of the University of California, 293 U.S. 245, 262 (1934), and Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940) (free exercise of religion); and in, e.g., Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 7-16 (1947), and Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203, 209-212 (1948) (establishment of religion)

[1276] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

• The Militia cannot act under "pretence to reform * * * the laws", because the Constitution expressly empowers them only "to execute the Laws of the Union" as "the Laws" actually are, not as members of the Militia might wish "the Laws" to be.

• The Militia will never act under mere "pretence * * * to remove evil counsellors" in public positions. For if the "counsellors" were truly "evil" in a political sense, it would be because they were conspiring to violate or actually violating the Constitution and laws of the United States or of the several States, and therefore were criminals.[1277] Moreover, if circumstances compelled the Militia to call themselves forth, it could only be because such regularly constituted authorities as Congress, the Judiciary, and particularly the President (as the Militia's sometime "Commander in Chief") either could not act, being thwarted by "evil counsellors"; or would not act, being in league with, aiding and abetting, or sheltering those criminal "counsellors". And finally,

• In the latter case, were rogue public officials in the highest offices complicit in schemes of "national oppression", the Militia would be justified in doing whatever was necessary on their own initiative "to vindicate the original contract" for self-government among WE THE PEOPLE under the Constitution. And "risen as one man" would aptly describe how the Militia would come forth to oppose usurpation or tyranny and "execute the Laws of the Union".

Self-evidently, then, the Militia could never perform their duty as "checks and balances" against "large military establishments and standing armies", and the plots of "ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people",[1278] and at the same time, through the very performance of that duty, commit "Treason" in the sense of the Constitution. Whereas, any attempt by rogue military, para-military, or police forces on behalf of "ambitious and unprincipled rulers" to suppress the Militia, or to prevent WE THE PEOPLE from revitalizing and maintaining their Militia, by force of arms would plainly constitute "Treason".

To be sure, these conclusions depend upon the premiss that the Militia are constitutionally entitled themselves to determine when "Treason" has clamped a stranglehold on Americans' throats—in the form of "ambitious and unprincipled rulers" attempting "to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people", "large military establishments and standing armies" prostituting themselves as those rulers' myrmidons, and "national oppression" parading as "government". But that entitlement is clear.

---

[1277] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[1278] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

In the final analysis, it is the right and duty of WE THE PEOPLE to interpret their own Constitution.[1279] Under normal circumstances. THE PEOPLE exercise this right and fulfill this duty through "representatives" in the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of their National, State, and Local governments. In the midst of "national oppression", however, WE THE PEOPLE will have no (or vanishingly few) true "representatives" in "government", because most (and certainly the highest) ostensible "public officials" will be usurpers and tyrants, and the ostensible "governments" those "officials" administer will be criminal conspiracies.[1280] In such a situation, common sense dictates that the usurpers and tyrants cannot be suffered to define what constitutes "Treason", and thereby exculpate themselves and inculpate their victims.

At that point, though, WE THE PEOPLE will be unable to enforce the Constitution through exercise of the franchise. Voting will be entirely useless, because the usurpers and tyrants will control the political parties, nominate dummy candidates, and rig the voting machines. And, in any event, elections will come too infrequently to retard aggression by oppressors ready, willing, and able to deploy "large military establishments and standing armies", as well as para-military police forces, to suppress every manifestation of dissent as it arises. (Even Members of the House of Representatives in Congress, the National legislative branch closest to THE PEOPLE, are elected only every two years.[1281])

Yet WE THE PEOPLE will still be entitled to defend themselves, according to the principle of the Declaration of Independence that, "when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security". But to know when their country has arrived at that critical juncture, THE PEOPLE must determine for themselves what constitutes "Treason". And to succeed in "throw[ing] off such Government", when the outcome turns on the harsh reality that "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[1282] THE PEOPLE must command by themselves the necessary force. Self-evidently, at that point in time WE THE PEOPLE'S only recourse for the accomplishment of these ends will be reliance on themselves alone, arrayed in their Militia.

[1279] Compare U.S. Const. preamble with Propper v. Clark, 337 U.S. 472, 484 (1949), and with W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 212.

[1280] Compare Texas v. White, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 700, 718-726 (1868), with 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[1281] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 1.

[1282] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

In such an extremity, the Militia will provide the most lawful means of resistance possible, because they are constitutionally empowered "to execute the Laws of the Union"[1283]—among which the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence are paramount. Moreover, the Militia will provide the most democratic form of resistance possible, because enrollment and some sort of service in them are mandatory for every able-bodied, eligible citizen from sixteen to sixty years of age, and permissive even for disabled and superannuated citizens who can perform any useful function; whereas voting is merely discretionary even for fully competent, eligible citizens of eighteen years of age and upwards.[1284]

C. The need for "the Militia of the several States" and the Armed Forces to coöperate to the maximum degree the Constitution allows. That "the Militia of the several States" are separate from, independent of, and even constitutionally superior to, and must serve as "checks and balances" against rogues within, the Armed Forces does not mean that the two establishments are necessarily, inevitably, or inexorably antagonists or even competitors.

1. After all, the Constitution embraces both establishments—although it singles out only the Militia as "necessary to the security of a free State";[1285] and incorporates "the Militia of the several States" according to *pre-*constitutional principles from which no deviation is possible (absent an Amendment of the Constitution); whereas it permits Congress to "raise and support Armies" and "provide and maintain a Navy" upon such principles as lawmakers may find "necessary and proper" from time to time.[1286] Both the Militia and the Armed Forces share the general constitutional purpose of "provid[ing] for the common defence"[1287]—although only the Militia are explicitly entrusted with the specific authority and responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1288] And, because "Officers" in both the Armed Forces and the Militia, as "executive * * * Officers * * * of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution",[1289] the Militia must support the Armed Forces, and the Armed Forces must support the Militia, in their constitutional existences, authorities, and activities—although the duty of the Armed Forces to support the Militia must be weightier than the duty of the Militia to support the Armed Forces, inasmuch as the

---

[1283] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1284] See U.S. Const. amend. XXVI, § 1.

[1285] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13 with art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II.

[1286] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12, 13, and 18.

[1287] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1288] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1289] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

Second Amendment declares the Militia, and the Militia alone, to be "necessary to the security of a free State". Indeed, that declaration enjoins the members of the Armed Forces—past, present, and future—and their supporters in the civilian branches of the General Government always to recognize, acknowledge, and promote the constitutional primacy of the Militia: such that, for example, when appropriations or the distribution of equipment from the General Government's storehouses are necessary "for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" in order to make them capable of providing "the security of a free State",[1290] those appropriations or distributions should precede any appropriations or distributions for the Armed Forces.

2. In the normal course of events, "the Militia of the several States" could and should operate alongside "the Army and Navy of the United States" to "repel Invasions"—although under only their own "Officers". The situation would become drastically different, however, if an actual "Invasion[ ]" were mounted by foreign forces in league with "ambitious and unprincipled [domestic] rulers", and either: (i) the "large [domestic] military establishments and standing armies" at the beck and call of such "rulers" were treasonously conniving and coöperating with those foreign forces;[1291] or (ii) the high command of the "large [domestic] military establishments and standing armies" were so infiltrated with actual foreign agents, or so contaminated with Americans corrupted by personal loyalties to or excessive sympathies for foreign governments, that the commanders could not be expected effectively to "repel" the "Invasion[ ]". Or, although no actual "Invasion[ ]" by hostile foreign troops was under way, "ambitious and unprincipled [domestic] rulers", together with their accomplices in the high command of the "large [domestic] military establishments and standing armies", had become so dominated by foreign agents, domestic agents of foreign influence, or the fellow travelers, "useful idiots", and dupes of foreign ideologies, or so personally corrupted by foreign influences, that they were in effect operating the General Government and its Armed Forces as mere marionettes in the service and for the peculiar benefit of some foreign power. Although this would amount to an "Invasion[ ]" largely through the subversive force of foreign ideologies and influences, rather than through a large number of foreign agents and the strength of foreign arms, it would constitute a constitutionally recognized "Invasion[ ]" nonetheless—because it would violate the assertion of the Declaration of Independence that WE THE PEOPLE, first in the thirteen original States and then collectively in the United States, have "assume[d] among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them", which

[1290] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 and amend. II.

[1291] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

"separate and equal station" public officials can never claim any power to prostitute to the selfish interests and agendas of any foreign country.

In the normal course of events, "the Militia of the several States" also could and should operate alongside "the Army and Navy of the United States" to "suppress Insurrections"—although, once again, under only their own "Officers". This situation, too, would become decidedly different if the "Insurrection[ ]" manifested itself, not in a rising by disgruntled private citizens, but instead in an attempt by "ambitious and unprincipled rulers" and their partisans in the high command of the Armed Forces "to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people". Such an "Insurrection[ ]" obviously could take the form of an open and violent coup d'état. But it could also appear surreptitiously in subversion of the General Government by individuals who misemployed the Armed Forces in a domestic internal-security and para-police rôle to cow the general public into submission.

Finally, in the normal course of events "the Militia of the several States" could and should operate alongside "the Army and Navy of the United States" to "execute the Laws of the Union"—again, of course, under only their very own "Officers". Yet when "large military establishments and standing armies" afford "facile means * * * to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people", "the Laws"—the Constitution foremost among them—are being violated, not "execute[d]". And then the right, power, and unavoidable duty of the Militia in "execut[ing] the Laws" is (in Justice Story's phrase) to "resist and triumph over" the perpetrators of these violations.

3. On the other hand, it is worse than useless to contend that, if the Militia and heavily armed rogue elements within the regular Armed Forces were to become open antagonists—because those elements aligned themselves with civilian usurpers and tyrants, or sought to establish a military junta misruling the country under "martial law"—the Militia would prove incapable of effective resistance, and therefore the Militia are not worth maintaining and the Second Amendment is obsolete.

a. From the mouths or pens of some individuals this is a consciously subversive argument, because it aims at deluding common Americans into believing that the Militia should be left largely if not entirely "unorganized", and that the Second Amendment should be disregarded or even aggressively undermined by pervasive "gun control". Yet, if the Militia are incapable today of performing their constitutional duties—as the result of the failure, neglect, or refusal of rogue, incompetent, or simply insouciant public officials to see to it that the Militia are "well regulated"—then what is "necessary to the security of a free State" in these times? What has replaced the Militia? How? And to what end? Certainly no substitution has been had through the procedures of "a free State". For, according to the Second Amendment, "[a] well regulated Militia", and only "[a] well regulated Militia", is "necessary to the security of a free State"—so that a constitutional Amendment would be required to establish as matters of constitutional law and fact both: (i) that "[a] well regulated Militia" is not "necessary" any more; and even more importantly (ii) exactly what must now take the place of the Militia in the provision of such "security". But, of course, no such Amendment has ever been proposed, let alone ratified.

Presumably, detractors of the Militia would argue that "security" is now being provided by the para-militarized national-security apparatus centered around the Department of Homeland Security, in close coöperation with the regular Armed Forces. But, if so, what sort of "security" is this? It cannot be "the security of a free State", because the Constitution declares that such "security" depends upon "well regulated Militia" in every State, not a central Reichssicherheitshauptamt. Therefore, it must be "the security of [something other than] a free State". So, when rogue members of the regular Armed Forces disparage the Militia as being unable to resist, or even to deter, a military take-over of this country, they should immediately be disciplined, if not cashiered, on the grounds that "the thought is father to the deed". Patriots in the Armed Forces should concern themselves with how to ensure that: (i) the Armed Forces are sufficiently governed and regulated so that rogue elements therein are exposed and expelled in a timely fashion;[1292] and (ii) the Militia are sufficiently "well regulated" to be able to detect, to deter, and if necessary effectively to resist, any and all rogue elements in the Armed Forces, whether the latter are acting in their own interests as would-be Bonapartists or in collusion with aspiring civilian usurpers and tyrants.

b. Besides being irrelevant and impertinent as a matter of constitutional law, the canard that the Militia are not worth putting into a constitutionally proper state of readiness is wrong as a matter of fact. It presumes, after all, that the Militia could never deter even civilian usurpation and tyranny supported by rogue elements in the Armed Forces, let alone an outright military Putsch. Yet, surely, the level of deterrence required depends upon the extent to which aspiring usurpers, tyrants, and Bonapartists can suborn segments of the Armed Forces at each stage of their conspiracies. In the early stages, far less deterrence would be required than later on. Indeed, if most of the Armed Forces remained loyal to the Constitution, and not only unwilling to challenge the Militia but also fully supportive of them, very little deterrence would be required at any time.

c. If the situation today is so out of hand that the Militia could never deter usurpers, tyrants, or Bonapartists acting with or through rogue elements in the Armed Forces, how did matters ever deteriorate to such a degree? And what should be done to correct this condition? Were the Armed Forces always heavily salted with untrustworthy members? Or did they just recently become so? Is this corruption a consequence of their training—or lack of it, particularly with respect to constitutional law? In any event, is not at least a major part of the reason for this situation (if it were true) precisely that the Militia have been almost totally "unorganized"—or, worse yet, people who should have been members of the Militia have been enrolled as adjuncts of the Armed Forces through the National Guard—for far too long? Must not, then, a major part of the cure (if a cure is needed) be to restore the Militia, and if necessary reduce the Armed Forces, to their proper constitutional positions?

---

[1292] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

d. Denigration of the Militia as incompetent to deter, let alone to resist, rogue elements in the Armed Forces leaves out of account the successes of guerrilla and other forms of irregular resistance (including thoroughly organized "nonviolent action"[1293]) against well-armed tyrannies throughout the world during the last two hundred years or so.[1294] For example, America's contemporary Armed Forces depend upon the regular delivery through a complex transportation-network of gargantuan supplies of matériel from a huge military-industrial complex working efficiently and uninterruptedly within the domestic United States, and even drawing much of its equipment from overseas. How this dependency could be satisfied in the midst of a nationwide guerrilla conflict, shrewdly waged, is an open question.[1295]

e. If the threat of unconstitutional intervention into politics by rogue elements in the Armed Forces were so extensive and imminent as some observers insist—and which, if true, would indicate that the Armed Forces cannot be trusted even to police their own houses—then it would be necessary either: (i) to supply the Militia with the heavy weaponry and training sufficient to render them a reasonable match for whatever segments of the Armed Forces might turn rogue;[1296] or (ii) to disable the Armed Forces from engaging in conspiracies against the Constitution by assigning special "political officers" from the Militia to serve as liaison to, to survey, and, to supervise, and if necessary to exert extraordinary command over every unit

---

[1293] See, e.g., Gene Sharp, Civilian-Based Defense: A Post-Military Weapons System (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part One, Power and Struggle (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part Two, The Methods of Nonviolent Action (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part Three, The Dynamics of Nonviolent Action (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973).

[1294] And this, in sometimes the most adverse of circumstances. See, e.g., The Memoirs of General Grivas, Charles Foley, Editor (New York, New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1964).

[1295] See, e.g., T.E. Lawrence ["Lawrence of Arabia"], The Seven Pillars of Wisdom (Ware, England: Wordsworth Editions Limited, 1977). See generally Michael Korda, Hero: The Life and Legend of Lawrence of Arabia (New York, New York: HarperCollins Publishers, 2010); Joseph Berton, Lawrence and the Arab Revolt: An Illustrated Guide (Madrid, Spain: Andrea Press, 2011).

[1296] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

in the Armed Forces of (say) battalion strength and higher; or (iii) to do both. Surely, the Constitution does not preclude the second of these alternatives. It "reserv[es] to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers [in the Militia]".[1297] So officers of the regular Armed Forces cannot be "Officers" in the Militia, or command Militia "Officers", because officers of the regular Armed Forces are "nominated, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate * * * appoint[ed]", by the President, not by the States.[1298] Nothing in the Constitution, however, disallows "Officers" in the Militia from directly commanding, let alone simply overseeing the performance of their duties by, officers and men in the regular Armed Forces. Certainly no one in the Armed Forces could justifiably complain if the President as their "Commander in Chief" ordered them to accept such oversight pursuant to "Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces" that Congress enacted; and no one in the Militia could complain if the President seconded Militia "Officers" to such supervisory duty pursuant to regulations enacted by Congress "for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States" in that manner.[1299] For, in that case, "the Service of the United States" to be performed by the Militia would be to fulfill their unique responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union" generally with respect to the "Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces", and to enforce those "Rules" specifically against rogue elements in the Armed Forces by "suppress[ing] Insurrections"[1300]—a perfect concatenation of constitutional authority. Moreover, the President would be required to connect himself as the final link in that chain, in fulfillment of his own unique constitutional duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed".[1301]

D. "[T]he Militia of the several States" to be distinguishable from the Armed Forces in structure and operations. Maintaining the constitutionally proper distinction between "the Militia of the several States" and the regular Armed Forces of the United States (as well as between the Militia and such regular "Troops, or Ships of War" as Congress might give its "Consent" for the States to raise from time to time) cannot be simply a matter of distinctions in nomenclature, as important as differentiation on that score is.[1302] "[A] rose by any other name would smell as sweet"[1303] precisely because a rose is substantively different from all other flowers. So, because revitalized Militia are substantively different from the

---

[1297] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1298] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[1299] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 and art. I, § 8, cls. 14 and 16.

[1300] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1301] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[1302] See ante, Chapter 29.

[1303] William Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, Act II, Scene 2.

regular Armed Forces (and the States' "Troops, or Ships of War, too), they must be made unmistakably distinct as well, in no less than three respects.[1304]

1. In terms of command. The Constitution explicitly provides for this. Except for the President of the United States, whom the Constitution itself appoints as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States",[1305] "the Appointment of [all of] the Officers" in the Militia is the exclusive prerogative of "the States respectively".[1306] And being so appointed, each of "th[os]e Officers" can also be removed perforce of the same authority, according to whatever procedures and for whatever reasons "the States respectively" may deem appropriate. For inasmuch as the Constitution delegates to the United States no power to remove any "Officers" from the Militia (other than the President himself, through the process of "Impeachment and Conviction"[1307]), and does not prohibit the States from removing such "Officers", therefore the power of removal is "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people".[1308] Indeed, even in the absence of the Tenth Amendment, the States would enjoy the plenary power to remove "Officers" from their respective Militia, because the power of "the Appointment of the Officers" is exclusive to the States; and, absent some other limitation, a constitutional power of appointment necessarily implies an allied power of removal.[1309] So "the Officers" of revitalized "Militia of the several States" not only would represent their particular States in a formal sense, but also, being subject to removal by those States, could be held strictly accountable to and closely supervised and controlled by them in the performance of their (the "Officers'") duties. Thus, in contradistinction to the officers of the regular Armed Forces, whose primary loyalty (after, presumably, their loyalty to the Constitution) would be to the General Government which appointed them, "the Officers" of the Militia would be loyal first and foremost to their respective States.

The practical consequences of this for popular self-government would be profound. Congress can enact regulations "for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States";[1310] and the President, as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia", can issue orders to "the Officers" of the Militia under color of those regulations "when [the Militia are] called into the [1304] Inasmuch as Congress has seen fit to incorporate into the regular Armed Forces—in the forms of the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and various State Defense Forces—the "Troops, or Ships of War" that the States may "keep * * * in time of Peace" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress", for the sake of simplicity the following analysis will conflate those "Troops, or Ships of War" with the Armed Forces.

---

[1305] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1306] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1307] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5, and § 3, cls. 6 and 7; and art. II, § 4.

[1308] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[1309] See Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926).

[1310] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

actual Service of the United States".[1311] But such regulations and orders as might be forthcoming would amount to no more than mere ink on paper unless and until "the Officers" carried them out. And "the Officers" should carry out regulations from Congress and orders from the President only if those regulations and orders were directed towards matters within "the actual Service of the United States".[1312] Any among "the Officers" who might appear at all willing to take and subsequently enforce orders not so directed the States could and should replace with new "Officers" more faithful to their "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution".[1313] Thus, the constitutional structure of command would enable the Militia to engage in "negative interposition"—refusing to obey unconstitutional orders from rogue officials in the General Government—which would enforce in the most direct manner possible the principle that "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people".[1314]

Furthermore, but a short step would lead from "negative interposition" to "affirmative interposition", by means of which the States could enforce the Constitution by insisting, through their Militia, that the "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia" should punctiliously fulfill his duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed".[1315] If "the Militia of the several States" were to discover, or to be informed, that "the [supreme] Law[ ] of the Land" were being violated, then, because willful violations of the Constitution are serious crimes,[1316] it would be their duty to "make known the [fact] * * * to some * * * person in civil or military authority under the United States".[1317] For the Militia, the appropriate "person in * * * authority" to whom to report would obviously be the President, their "Commander in Chief". And such a report, coming from such a source, would amount, not to a toothless exercise of "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances",[1318] nor to a mere recommendation, but rather to an enforceable demand. For the Constitution imposes no limitation on when during the times at which they are "call[ed] forth" to be "employed in the Service of the United States" the Militia may "execute the Laws", or what "Laws of the Union" the Militia may "execute", or whom the Militia may charge with violating those "Laws" and take into custody in aid of future

---

[1311] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1312] See post, at 871-880.

[1313] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1314] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[1315] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[1316] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[1317] See 18 U.S.C. § 4.

[1318] U.S. Const. amend. I.

prosecution. So, if the Militia should happen to be "called into the actual Service of the United States" for any valid reason at that or some future time, they could then assert their authority "to execute [any and all of] the Laws of the Union" as against anyone known to be in violation of "th[os]e Laws"—including the President himself for any refusal on his part to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed" after he had been duly informed that they were being flouted. Thus, the constitutional structure of command would enable the Militia to make federalism work in a most direct and forceful way, not just "from the top down", but especially "from the bottom up".

And rightly so. For the States and WE THE PEOPLE to remain secure in their sovereignty and freedom, the forces that the Constitution declares to be "necessary to [that] security" must not behave as mere robots programmed mechanically to obey the arbitrary dictates of some latter-day American Caesar who mistakes his narrow constitutional authority as "Commander in Chief" for the unlimited power of a Führer or Duce. Because such a Caesar will likely be more of a Caligula or Nero than an Augustus or Marcus Aurelius, WE THE PEOPLE must ensure that they themselves will not prove deserving of the denunciation Marullus justly hurled at the Roman mob when it swooned in its enthusiasm to embrace Julius Caesar's tyranny: "You blocks, you stones, you worse than senseless things!"[1319] If WE THE PEOPLE are to protect themselves from the tyranny of some latter-day Caesar, they must govern themselves, and never allow themselves to be governed by others. THE PEOPLE have the means to protect themselves: "the Militia of the several States". But to employ the Militia properly, because they are the Militia, THE PEOPLE must think for themselves, and act for themselves upon their own responsibility. Ultimately, WE THE PEOPLE—and no one else—must command "the Militia of the several States", in the fullest sense of that verb.

2. With respect to their missions, organization, and equipment. The Constitution explicitly mandates that the Militia must be differentiated from the Armed Forces in these matters, too.

a. The Constitution delegates to Congress the power "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1320] Nowhere, however, does it explicitly authorize Congress to employ the regular Armed Forces for these (or any other) purposes. Yet, although the Constitution does not expressly assign to the Armed Forces the responsibility to "repel Invasions" and "suppress Insurrections", in the nature of things they would surely be deployed in the first case, and would probably be at least mobilized in the second should an "Insurrection[ ]" become widespread and sufficiently severe.

[1319] William Shakespeare, The Tragedy of Julius Caesar, Act I, Scene 1.

[1320] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

Moreover, were the Armed Forces sent into the field to "suppress [such an] Insurrection[ ]", they would be required by force of circumstances to "execute the Laws of the Union" against at least the "Insurrection[ists]" until the disturbance were put down. So, it would not be unlikely that, in cases of "Invasions" and widespread "Insurrections", "the Militia of the several States" and the Armed Forces of the United States would be called upon to coöperate very closely.

Where an identity of mission and the need for concerted action were involved, in the coördinated exercise of its powers "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States",[1321] and "[t]o raise and support Armies", "[t]o provide and maintain a Navy", and "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces",[1322] Congress might require the Militia, in preparation for being and when "call[ed] forth" "in the Service of the United States", to be organized, equipped, trained, disciplined, and governed in a fashion that was uniform with, similar to, or simply compatible with the organization, equipment, training, discipline, and governance of the regular Armed Forces. Or Congress might decide that the Militia's equipment, training, and governance needed closely to conform to that of the Armed Forces, but that their organization and internal discipline did not. Or Congress might devise some other accommodation by means of which the Militia and the Armed Forces could effectively coöperate with respect to "suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions", without sacrificing their separate identities and purposes in the process.

b. With respect to the Militia's general responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union", though, things are decidedly different. "[T]o execute the Laws of the Union" properly in all of the situations that would not involve an "Insurrection[ ]" or an "Invasion[ ]" would require the Militia to perform duties for which much or even most of their organization, equipment, and training appropriate for "suppres[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions" would be of little or no use, or even counterproductive. So the Militia should be organized, equipped, and trained in a manner specifically tailored for these other purposes of "law enforcement"—and, most likely, in a manner radically different from the organization, equipment, and training almost all units of the Armed Forces should receive.

In addition, even if organizing, equipping, and training the Militia in conformity with the standards of the Armed Forces to "suppress Insurrections", "repel Invasions", and "execute the Laws of the Union" in the course of "suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions" could qualify the Militia for [1322] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 14.

---

[1321] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

"execut[ing] the Laws of the Union" in general, the Militia should not be so organized, equipped, and trained. For, if they were, their performance of those duties in that way might inure common Americans to a form of *para-*military law enforcement which would render them insufficiently wary of supposed "law enforcement" conducted by the Armed Forces. In principle, the Armed Forces should never be called upon "to execute the Laws of the Union" except in cases directly related to "Insurrections" and "Invasions". For, if the mere presence of "standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty", and "in all cases, the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power",[1323] then the worst of all situations would be for a "standing army" to be licensed "to execute the Laws" on a routine basis, so that "the civil power" ended up as a matter of practice in "strict subordination to", or at least utterly dependent upon, "the military". True, the Constitution nowhere suggests that the Armed Forces should "execute the Laws of the Union" at all—and certainly not in preference to the Militia. But, until the Militia are revitalized, natural disasters, major industrial accidents, economic breakdowns, and other crises that overwhelm civilian public officials or expose them as incompetents will tend to rationalize demands that the Armed Forces step in "to maintain order". Inevitably, regular deployment of the Armed Forces in these types of situations will foster and lend credence to the claim that such authority inheres in the Armed Forces in all situations that might be labeled "emergencies"—indeed, that "martial law" is actually superior to the Constitution, because it can, will, and even should be enforced whenever and wherever normal constitutional methods supposedly fail to maintain the supremacy of civilian law.[1324] Obviously, nothing the Militia might do should be allowed to encourage such a development.

c. These considerations would be even more consequential when the Militia were not "employed in the Service of the United States"—that is, "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union", "suppress[ing] Insurrections", and "repel[ling] Invasions" perforce of some Congressional statute—but instead were performing other duties solely on behalf of their States. Of course, in some instances, a State's Militia might also "execute the Laws of the Union" within, suppress an "Insurrection[ ]" inside of, or repel an "Invasion[ ]" of its own State's territory, without being "call[ed] forth" by the United States for such a purpose. Each of the States may (and should) enforce "the Laws of the Union" against anyone who violates them within her own geographical limits (unless Congress has decreed that those laws are to be enforced exclusively by the General Govrernment),[1325] may protect herself against "domestic [1324] On the many fallacies lurking in such loose interpretations of "martial law", see post, Chapter 48.

---

[1323] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1325] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3.

Violence" on her own soil without the aid or intervention of the United States,[1326] and may even "engage in War" on her own recognizance when "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay".[1327] In addition to deploying her own Militia in response to these perils, though, each State may employ her own Militia in whatever other ways may conduce to her "homeland security". For, other than that no State may withhold her Militia from being "call[ed] forth" and "employed in the Service of the United States" for one or more of the three enumerated purposes,[1328] the Constitution imposes no prohibition whatsoever on how any State may deploy her Militia in response to her own special needs. Rather, the Tenth Amendment stipulates that "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people". The Militia are "the Militia of the several States" respectively. And the first and foremost purpose of each "well regulated Militia" must be to take whatever action may be "necessary to the security of a free State" in its own State.[1329] (After all, one can imagine that the United States might be broken up by "Insurrections", "Invasions", or some other calamities—and yet some of the States might still survive intact and independent. Surely the Constitution could not require "[a] well regulated Militia" to suffer its own State to be destroyed, simply because it had proven incapable of preventing other States, and the Union, from being destroyed.) In the nature of things, the particular needs of "homeland security" will differ—perhaps markedly so—from State to State, and even from Locality to Locality within some States. And, to the extent of those differences, the organization, equipment, and training of each State's Militia—so as to qualify it as truly "well regulated" under the circumstances—will also differ from that of every other State's Militia.

Doubtlessly, too, the organization, equipment, and training that each State's "well regulated Militia" will need to satisfy her unique requirements of "homeland security" will differ significantly from the normal organization, equipment, and training of the Armed Forces. And such differences should be maintained—not simply because it would be cumbersome in practice to attempt to prepare the Armed Forces for such a wide variety of tasks as may confront the Militia, but as a matter of fundamental political principle. Perhaps the Armed Forces could be organized, equipped, and trained to deal with all of the important problems of "homeland security" that each State could reasonably foresee. Even so, the Armed Forces should not be organized, equipped, and trained for such duties, because no State should allow her internal "homeland security" to depend upon forces which [1326] See U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[1327] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1328] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16 with art. VI, cl. 2.

[1329] U.S. Const. amend. II.

that State herself lacks the legal authority to control. No State can expect to enjoy for long "the security of a free State" when someone else, not directly responsible to the State, supplies (and therefore can possibly withhold) that "security". Of course, it might be contended that no State would ever retain the untrammeled legal authority to control her own Militia, because, if Congress "call[ed] forth" the entirety of every State's Militia to be "employed in the Service of the United States", all of the States would be constitutionally required to comply, leaving them with no meaningful "homeland-security" forces of their own.[1330] This, however, is an extremely unlikely scenario. First, in delegating to Congress the power "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States", the Constitution itself foresees the unlikelihood of such a complete mobilization of the Militia.[1331] Second, never in American history has the entirety of every State's, or even of most States', Militia been "call[ed] forth". On the other hand, many instances could be cited in which States with no "well regulated Militia" have had to depend upon the regular Armed Forces (including the so-called "federalized" National Guard) for relief and protection when some public disorder broke out or some natural disaster struck. At that point, typically, the Armed Forces took control of the situation. But in the case (say) of a widespread and profoundly catastrophic natural disaster, or a nationwide economic collapse, the Armed Forces would likely prove too small and ill-trained to provide sufficient relief and protection to all of the affected States. So the States would be bereft of both control and adequate assistance.

d. Examples of differences that should be maintained between revitalized Militia and the Armed Forces with respect to organization and equipment include the following:

- An "Independent Company" in "[a] well regulated Militia" has no equivalent within the regular Armed Forces.

- Although the requirement of service in "[a] well regulated Militia" is nearly universal, flexible exemptions from various duties allow it to be satisfied in many different ways; whereas the modern Armed Forces depend upon voluntary enlistments, and offer few exemptions from particular duties for those within their ranks. And, of course,

- Unlike members of the Armed Forces, members of "well regulated Militia" (other than conscientious objectors) are required personally to possess their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements at all times. The Second Amendment protects "the right of the people to keep and bear

---

[1330] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 and art. VI, cls. 2 and 3.

[1331] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

Arms",[1332] not a right of members of the Armed Forces. So "the people" cannot be prevented from "keep[ing] * * * Arms" in their personal possession, and cannot be denied the opportunity of "bear[ing] Arms" in "well regulated Militia".[1333] In contrast, in this regard the members of the Armed Forces can claim no constitutional rights at all. Rather, they operate under defeasible statutory licenses. Individually, members of the Armed Forces can be disarmed at any time, for any reason, because they have no personal rights to possession, let alone ownership, of the public arms made available to them for their service. And collectively, the Armed Forces can be entirely disestablished. For example, if a newly elected House of Representatives refused to approve an appropriation for the Army, the Army would effectively cease to exist, because "[n]o Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law",[1334] and "no Appropriation of Money to [raise and support Armies] * * * shall be for a longer Term than two Years".[1335]

3. With regard to ranks, uniforms, decorations, and other distinctions of service. Differentiation of the Militia from the regular Armed Forces is important in these particulars, as well.

a. The Constitution implies, and certainly allows, that ranks in the Militia should differ from ranks in the Armed Forces. Commissioned "Officers" in the Armed Forces are "nominate[d], and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, * * * appoint[ed]" by the President,[1336] pursuant to such "Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces" as Congress may "make";[1337] whereas, "the Appointment of the Officers" in the Militia is "reserv[ed] to the States respectively".[1338] Inasmuch as the Constitution itself does not specify what particular ranks or grades should obtain in either the Armed Forces or the Militia (other than the rank of "Commander in Chief" for the President[1339]), the competence to designate all other ranks and grades arguably should rest with those who exercise the authority to make appointments—the General Government with respect to the Armed Forces; the States, with respect to the Militia. This follows not

---

[1332] Emphasis supplied.

[1333] See post, at 1318-1353.

[1334] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 7.

[1335] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1336] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[1337] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14. See also U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2: "Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, * * * or in the Heads of Departments".

[1338] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1339] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

simply from the Constitution's explicit "reserv[ation to] the States respectively, [of] the Appointment of the Officers [in their Militia]", but more importantly from the reason, promotive and protective of federalism, for that reservation: namely, that the Militia are "the Militia of the several States", over which the States and WE THE PEOPLE retain all authority beyond the narrow set of powers delegated to Congress. So, because the authority confided to the States and THE PEOPLE in these regards is separate from and independent of the authority delegated to Congress, and because the requirements of "homeland security" will surely differ in different States, as well as go beyond the three constitutional purposes for which the Militia may be "call[ed] forth" "in the Service of the United States", for individual States to recognize and act upon a need to assign special and even unique ranks and grades within their own Militia should hardly be unexpected, unwarranted, or unwelcome.

To be sure, from 1792 onwards, Congress has construed its power "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia", with nary a note of dissent from the States, as authorizing it to establish uniform ranks and grades throughout "the Militia of the several States".[1340] Constitutionally, however, this imposed nationwide uniformity can apply only to the "Part of the[Militia]" actually "call[ed] forth" "in the Service of the United States", when as a practical matter a large degree of conformity to a single pattern of organization might be required. And, historically, Congress could afford to set a pattern of organization apparently "from the top down" for this purpose, because it was actually adopting a pattern that had already been long established "from the bottom up". For generations, the Colonies and then the independent States had regulated their Militia on a very similar basis. Having been well tested in practice, the system Congress adopted could have been expected to work. And being the product of the States' own experiences, and more or less in operation in each of them, it could have been expected to draw no criticism from that quarter.

Today, though, as a consequence of the effective, albeit unconstitutional, disestablishment of the Militia from 1903 on, leading to the ubiquity of "the unorganized militia" throughout America,[1341] no pattern of organization of the Militia "from the top down" exists, and next to no actual organization of the Militia "from the bottom up" can be found in any State. Rather, from the beginning of the process by which Congress purported to supplant the true "Militia of the several States" with the National Guard, the policy has been that "the organization of the National Guard, including the composition of all units thereof, shall be the same as that which is or may * * * be prescribed for the Regular Army".[1342] So, as far as the Militia are concerned, nothing exists that needs to be changed. Instead, everything needs to be constructed anew, "from the bottom up". And setting out the constitutional principles upon which revitalization must be predicated requires no more than some relatively straightforward legal-historical research in sources which contain the answers to whatever questions may be asked.[1343] Nonetheless, the outcome of applying those principles in practice in a contemporary context cannot be easily, let alone unerringly, predicted in States with widely divergent and ever-fluid problems of "homeland security" and no recent history of addressing such problems through any form of Militia. Instead, because of more than a century of official neglect—or outright sabotage—of the Militia, any program for revitalization probably must begin at the Local level, and must be largely experimental, innovative, and above all flexible. The very first goal must be to reëstablish the Militia—in both concept and execution—at the Local and then the State levels, firmly in WE THE PEOPLE'S control, because that is where and how constitutional "homeland security" needs to be introduced immediately, if not sooner, in order to prepare for unavoidable economic, political, and social crises, and especially to render irrelevant or to fend off the National *para-*military police state apparatus that rogue officials in the District of Columbia are preparing to unleash when such crises break out. In this process, the General Government should stand well back out of the way, and even the States' governments should initially take a largely "hands off" approach, in order to enable THE PEOPLE themselves to figure out what works best for them. Only after revitalization at the Local and then the State levels has been accomplished, should the States and the General Government coöperate on the matter of further organizing the Militia along certain uniform lines in order for the Militia to perform one or more the three constitutional functions when "call[ed] forth" "in the Service of the United States".

---

[1340] An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, §§ 3 (officers of divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies), 6 ("adjutant-general"), and 10 ("brigade-inspector"), 1 Stat. 271, 272, 273; continued with revisions by Revised Statutes of the United States (1873-1874), TITLE XVI, THE MILITIA, §§ 1631, 1632, 1634, and 1640, 18 Stat. 285, 286, 287.

[1341] See ante, at 786-793.

On the one hand, the States might find that a system of ranks and units identical to that employed in the regular Armed Forces served their particular needs of "homeland security", and therefore would agree with Congress "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the[ir] Militia" on that basis. On the other hand, inasmuch as officers in the Armed Forces (other than the President in his separate capacity as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia") constitutionally cannot command anyone in the Militia, the States might conclude that no necessity existed for a system identical to the one the Armed Forces employed, and that some other system better served their needs—and Congress might agree to adopt that other system when the Militia were "employed in the Service of the United States". So, for instance, as was traditional in pre-constitutional times, the States today might appoint "Captains" of "Companies" in their Militia, where neither "Captain" nor "Company" has an exact equivalent in the regular Armed Forces.[1344] To further the differentiation between revitalized Militia and the Armed Forces, the States might also restore the ranks of "Ensign" (at one time the lowest commissioned rank in the infantry) and "Cornet" (at one time the lowest commissioned rank in the cavalry). The latter point is not merely an exercise in romantic historical musing. For, in some places in America at all times, and certainly in many places under circumstances of widespread economic breakdown, cavalry of one sort or another, using horses or mules, could prove quite useful—perhaps even indispensable—to the Militia, and could easily be revived and brought up to date through the agency of "Independent Companies".[1345]

---

[1342] An Act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 60, 39 Stat. 166, 197.

[1343] See ante, Chapter 27.

b. The Constitution also implies, and certainly allows, if it does not require, that uniforms in "well regulated Militia" be unmistakably distinguishable from those of the Armed Forces. After all, the Constitution treats "the Militia of the several States" as separate from "the Army and Navy of the United States".[1346] Moreover, because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States" respectively, each State should incorporate into her Militia's uniforms some unique elements of design, so that the Militia of one State can easily be differentiated from that of another. This is not merely a sartorial matter, but is most important from the political and psychological points of view. For as soon as Congress set about to eliminate the true "Militia of the several States" and substitute for them the National Guard, it was careful to provide that "[t]he National Guard of the United States shall, as far as practicable, be uniformed * * * with the same type of uniforms * * * as are or shall be provided for the Regular Army".[1347] So the continuation of such a conflation in appearance between revitalized Militia and the regular Armed Forces could lead only to continued confusion with respect to the separateness of the two establishments, and therefore should be scrupulously avoided wherever possible.

So, too, for such things as flags, medals, awards, and other items of identification and distinction. Moreover, State Militia flags and decorations should be accorded the primary positions of honor when displayed in conjunction with [1344] On average, a revitalized Militia "Company" would probably consist of from fifty or sixty to one hundred twenty men, although "Independent Companies" would be idiosyncratic in this regard. In contrast, depending on its type and mission, as of this writing a "platoon" in the contemporary regular Army ranges from sixteen to forty-four men, and is usually commanded by a "second lieutenant"; and a modern Army "company" ranges from sixty-two to one hundred ninety men, usually commanded by a "captain".

---

[1345] See post, Chapter 44.

[1346] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1347] An Act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 82, 39 Stat. 166, 203. "The National Guard of the United States" is the National Guard of the various States "while in the service of the United States". § 1, 39 Stat. at 166.

other flags and decorations, because they are emblematic of "the Militia of the several States", which alone among the forces protecting America enjoy constitutional permanence and are recognized as "necessary to the security of a free State".[1348]

c. The names of units in revitalized "well regulated Militia" should also be distinctly different from the names of units in the regular Armed Forces. This matter must be approached with some sensitivity, because many names and symbols of former Militia units the origins of which date from as far back as early *pre-*constitutional times have been mistakenly appropriated in one way or another by units of the National Guard. For example, the logo of the contemporary Army National Guard displays "the Embattled Farmer", leaving his plow and taking up his musket to repel the Redcoats at Concord's North Bridge on 19 April 1775. In fact, "the Embattled Farmer" and other members of the Militia of that era had no connection with anything akin to the modern National Guard. In particular, "the Embattled Farmer" was a member of a Militia "Company" in his own Town, and of the Militia of Massachusetts overall, and not subject in any way to the Continental Congress or other National authority; whereas members of the modern National Guard simultaneously profess dual loyalties, one to their States and the other to the United States, with the latter loyalty being the primary of the two such that they can be incorporated by units directly into the Army of the United States.[1349] Such incorporation, of course, is constitutionally impossible for units of "well regulated Militia". If the units of the contemporary National Guard claiming historical descent from the Militia were ever entitled to the names they affect, they forfeited those rights when they became parts of the National Guard; and entirely new units of the National Guard that simply appropriated those names without any historical continuity could never have justly claimed any right to them in the first place. Yet it would be unnecessary, impolitic, and in poor taste to offend National Guardsmen's armour propre in this regard. To revert to nomenclature scrupulously correct as a matter of historical fact would be complicated and emotionally traumatic, and would serve no vital purpose, because nothing of constitutional consequence turns on these misappropriations of mere names—as long as no one concedes that these units of the National Guard have an arguable constitutional basis for being treated as true "Militia" perforce of the pedigrees they have assumed. Revitalized Militia can always devise new names for their constituent units—and perhaps should prefer to do so, because revitalization of the Militia will be part of

---

[1348] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1349] This was first spelled out clearly in AN ACT To amend the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, Act of 15 June 1933, CHAPTER 87, 48 Stat. 153. June of 1933, of course, is quite a bit later than June of 1788 or December of 1791 (when the ratifications of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, respectively, were completed).

a veritable renaissance of constitutionalism, in the course of which new baptisms for units of the Militia would be highly symbolic.

4. Differentiation necessary to preserve federalism. In summation, differentiations of these kinds will preserve federalism by promoting and taking advantage of subsidiarity. The Militia are "the Militia of the several States", to be "employed in the Service of the United States" only for an expressly limited set of purposes. Most of the time, revitalized Militia will be employed in the service of their own States for whatever purposes will promote Local "homeland security". So WE THE PEOPLE in each of the States will be uniquely positioned, and most highly motivated, to determine, in the light of the peculiar dangers facing and the particular resources available to them, how best to organize, equip, train, and deploy themselves in their own "well regulated Militia". Importantly, the differentiations THE PEOPLE will make between their Militia and the Armed Forces will be scientific, because their utility will be verified or falsified through actual experimentation in Localities throughout America, rather than being arbitrarily dictated "from the top down" by some aloof "homeland-security" bureaucracy in the District of Columbia. Moreover, the solutions THE PEOPLE discover will not fall into the "one-size-fits-all" pattern typically adopted by "central planners" in some remote agency. With fifty States and hundreds of Localities confronted by their own special circumstances and problems of "homeland security", THE PEOPLE will have the inestimable advantage of numerous decentralized and independent laboratories in which to gather evidence, test hypotheses, and devise solutions custom-fitted to the situations at hand. Of course, the States will share information, so as to minimize redundancy of effort. But even if some overlap of effort will be unavoidable, its cost will be vastly offset by the flood of innovation that will come from allowing THE PEOPLE themselves to take the initiative in work they will recognize as vital to their freedom and prosperity.

By preserving federalism, differentiations between the Militia and the Armed Forces will also preserve "the security of a free State" for every State, and thereby for the Union as a whole. Even though the services the Militia can supply to the Union are limited in type, the Militia are not therefore in any sense "second-class" forces. Quite the contrary: They are constitutionally in the first class, and the only forces to be found there. The notion that the regular Armed Forces occupy that position is worse than simply erroneous. Because "standing armies, in time of peace" are "dangerous to liberty",[1350] they must be viewed with healthy suspicion and skepticism. They can be allowed whatever honors and prestige may be their due from the faithful performance of their constitutional duties. But they cannot be suffered to receive more honors and prestige than the only institutions that the

[1350] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

Constitution itself declares to be "necessary to the security of a free State". Clear differentiations between the Militia and the Armed Forces will emphasize the relative positions of each in the constitutional hierarchy, reminding Americans in a most visible manner which of these establishments the Constitution deems more trustworthy. The members of the Armed Forces, too, should favor such emphasis, for at least three reasons: (i) They should want to fulfill their "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution"[1351] or other pledges of allegiance to the best of their abilities. (ii) They should want to be untainted with the least suspicion of disloyalty. And (iii) they should want to uncover and deter potential Bonapartists within their own ranks, for which purpose the Militia can supply the most effective prophylactic.[1352]

Therefore, inasmuch as differentiations between the Militia and the Armed Forces will serve crucial constitutional purposes, Congress should not attempt to impose uniformity between the two establishments except where it might be necessary for common deployments "in the Service of the United States", but instead should largely defer to the States' decisions on these matters.

[1351] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1352] See ante, at 825-826.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

"[T]he Militia of the several States" are governmental establishments, not private institutions.

"[T]he Militia of the several States" are erected upon, and in practice embody and effectuate, the right and the duty of collective self-defense.[1353] As Blackstone explained, self-defense is the enforcement of "immediate justice", executed out of necessity in the present in order to substitute for "the future process of law [which] is by no means an adequate remedy for injuries accompanied with force".[1354] Being inherently a "process of law"—indeed, being (in Blackstone's estimation) "the primary law of nature"—when systematically organized among the people, whether under the aegis of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" or the ordinances of human positive law, collective self-defense becomes an—indeed, the primary—institution, establishment, or instrument of "government". Therefore, "the Militia of the several States" are, and must be, inherently governmental entities.

A. The essentially governmental nature of the Militia. Not surprisingly, "the Militia of the several States" exhibit a thoroughly and even uniquely and supremely governmental purpose, character, and status.

1. Governmental purpose. The Second Amendment describes "[a] well regulated Militia" as "being necessary to the security of a free State"—employing the term "free State" in the generic sense, as referring to a specific type of polity (which, of course, the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights conclusively presumed all of the first thirteen States to be). Thus, the purpose of "[a] well regulated Militia" is to provide "the security of a free State". And not in any narrow sense, but instead in a sense inclusive of every aspect of the people's political, economic, and social welfare that contributes to or derives from that "security". As the Declaration of Independence makes clear, though, to provide such security is the fundamental purpose of all true governments: namely, that "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness"; and that, "to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed". Inasmuch as "the pursuit of Happiness" takes within its ken every kind of property, as well as all things, matters, and conditions beyond mere property—that is, all of men's political, economic, and social aspirations, both temporal and spiritual, material and immaterial, pertaining to this world and to the world to come—the breadth and depth of the responsibility "to secure these rights" is awesome. The purpose of "the Militia of the several States" being the purpose of all legitimate government, and the Militia being the only institutions which the Constitution itself explicitly identifies as being "necessary" for that purpose (or for any purpose, for that matter), therefore the Militia are thoroughly and even uniquely governmental entities.

---

[1353] See ante, Chapter 28.

[1354] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 3-4.

2. Governmental character. From their governmental purpose derives the governmental character of "the Militia of the several States". In principle, "government" is not a matter of voluntary agreements among the members of society; rather, "government" claims the right, and even the duty, to employ compulsion in situations in which no mere private individuals could legitimately do so (conscription of persons by impressment and of property by taxation being the preëminent examples). In the starkest terms, "government" is the organization and application of political power; and "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[1355] "Government" is force—justified, perhaps, by "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", but force nonetheless. The essence of sovereignty is the sword.

In particular, the Militia share this principal characteristic of "government", because they are themselves based upon near-universal compulsion, in two aspects. First, the basic means the Militia employ in service of "the security of a free State" is force in its most elemental form. The primary organizational and operational principle of the Militia is encapsulated in "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms".[1356] This "right" is primarily concerned, not with mere individual self-defense, let alone hunting or "sport shooting", but instead with the availability and use of "Arms" by "the people" themselves for military, para-military, and law-enforcement purposes—in the constitutional litany, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1357] Their "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" explicitly presupposes that, in and through the Militia, "the people" will, in the most direct manner possible, coerce invaders, insurrectionists, and law-breakers—indeed, that in and through the Militia "the people" will apply whatever level of corrective compulsion by force of "Arms" may prove necessary to anyone and everyone who violates the laws or seeks to overthrow or subvert them. Second, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in "[a] well regulated Militia" is not simply a "right of the people" to coerce adventitious wrongdoers as the occasion may arise, but also a permanent, on-going duty which the law enforces on everyone among "the people" who is capable of service in such a Militia. In practice, the Militia's authority,

---

[1355] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1356] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[1357] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

responsibility, and ability "to execute the Laws of the Union" begins with and depends upon universal compulsion of all eligible Americans to participate in the Militia. So "the Militia of the several States" are doubly governmental in this critical respect: Their right to coerce is both external, applied to those who would break the law or breach the peace; and internal, applied to all law-abiding citizens who are eligible to be the Militia's members.

Because the Militia are "necessary to the security of a free State", and "a free State" is one in which "the people" govern themselves, near-universal compulsion of membership in the Militia is both unavoidable and desirable. Far from being inconsistent with self-government in a free society, compulsory participation of all eligible citizens in the Militia is the clearest manifestation of that state of affairs. Inasmuch as in "a free State" "the people" govern themselves, their participation in the Militia is not only an exercise of the powers, but also the indispensable evidence of the very existence, of self-government. An individual cannot claim to govern himself while simultaneously refusing to perform in propria persona the most important function of self-government, upon which the very "security", in every aspect, of that society (and of himself as a member) critically depends. Therefore, the citizens of a free and self-governing society, for their own political, economic, and social, as well as merely existential, self-preservation under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", are required to form themselves into Militia through their government.

As a consequence of this, every government of a free society labors under an absolute duty to establish adequate standards and provide efficient procedures for forming, organizing, arming, disciplining, training, and deploying that society's Militia in aid of the perceived needs of "homeland security". In America particularly, because the Militia are instruments through which society and all of its members assert and exert their collective and individual rights of self-preservation under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God"—and because the right to "Life" is foremost among the "certain unalienable Rights" with which "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator", and which "Governments are instituted among Men" in order "to secure" through the exercise of "just powers" "deriv[ed] * * * from the consent of the governed"[1358]—therefore, all such "Governments" are required to settle and regulate Militia as a consequence of their essential nature and in fulfillment of their fundamental purpose. Indeed, for the aggregate of governmental powers to be "just" (in the sense the Declaration of Independence employs that term), some of those powers must be directed towards, and none of them may be employed to hinder (let alone prohibit), promoting, facilitating, and even (where necessary) compelling every eligible citizen's full participation in the Militia.

[1358] Declaration of Independence.

Because, as the Second Amendment declares, "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", "a free State"—simply as the consequence of its being "a free State"—not only must enjoy the power, but also must be subject to and willing to enforce the duty, to establish and permanently to maintain a Militia. And if the representatives whom WE THE PEOPLE have selected for public office fail, neglect, or simply refuse to perform their responsibilities in this regard, then WE THE PEOPLE themselves, as self-governors, must act independently and decisively to fill the gap as soon as possible.

3. Governmental status. From their special governmental character derives the even more remarkable governmental status of "the Militia of the several States". Yes, the Militia are permanent parts of the Constitution's federal system, no less integral and important to it than the States themselves, or Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court. And yes, to be "well regulated", the Militia must be organized, armed, disciplined, and trained pursuant to statutes enacted by Congress and the several States' legislatures.[1359] But the governmental status of the Militia consists of more than their being mere components or creatures of some level of government. Because they are composed of WE THE PEOPLE themselves, the Militia are not simply the products of some exercise of governmental authority, whether of a constitutional or statutory nature, but instead embody the very essence of that authority.

Being composed of the vast majority of the very individuals who exercise sovereignty in "a free State" through a "Republican Form of Government" characterized by popular self-government[1360]—and being organized, armed, disciplined, trained, and deployed for the very purpose of preserving that sovereignty against all enemies—the Militia must reflect, partake of, and in their actions embody the sovereignty of their members. For when WE THE PEOPLE perform the vital governmental function which in the last analysis only they themselves can perform, they must thereby constitute governmental institutions and exercise governmental authority of the very highest order. In that capacity, THE PEOPLE must form and act as the most authoritative of all governmental institutions, because only they, arrayed in "well regulated Militia", are "necessary to the security of a free State". Doubtlessly, this is why the Constitution expressly delegates to "the Militia of the several States"—and to the Militia alone—the power and the duty "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".

As members of governmental institutions exercising the very highest form of governmental authority, WE THE PEOPLE in their capacity as Militiamen qualify as public officials. For "[a]n office is a public station, or employment, conferred by the appointment of government. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties"[1361]—each element of which definition applies perfectly to all of the members of "the Militia of the several States". Members of the Militia, however, are not just "public officials" somehow of equal standing with all other "public officials". Instead, they are "public officials" who, in a crisis, are empowered and even required by "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", through the Declaration of Independence, to override the authority of all other "public officials": namely, "to alter or to abolish [the existing Form of Government], and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness." This authority—"to throw off [despotic] Government, and to provide new guards for the[People's] future security"—is one reason why the Militia are truly "necessary to the security of a free State". For when that "security" is threatened from within the body politic by rogue public officials who have seized control of most of the apparatus of government, only the Militia can rectify the situation.

---

[1359] E.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1360] Compare U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4 with Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 454, 456-457 (opinion of Wilson, J.), 471-472 (opinion of Jay, C.J.) (1793).

B. The governmental nature of the Militia confirmed by American history. The chronicle of American legal history establishes beyond doubt the thoroughly governmental nature of "the Militia of the several States".

1. The Militia were first authorized perforce of Colonial charters and then were settled and periodically regulated by means of numerous Colonial and State statutes from the early 1600s through the late 1700s. With one lone exception, from the very beginning they were permanent establishments based upon the governmental principle of compulsion to service of every eligible citizen.

Most revealing in this regard are the details of that peculiar exception. During her early existence, Pennsylvania settled no Militia at all. Finally, in 1755, she enacted a statute purporting to establish a "militia" in which participation was entirely voluntary. Beyond any doubt, the legislators were motivated by the highest principles of religious scruple and toleration. As the statute explained, Pennsylvania had been "first settled by * * * Quakers, who, though they d[id] not * * * condemn the use of arms in others, yet [we]re principled against bearing arms themselves"; "[a]nd for them by any law to compel others to bear arms and exempt themselves would [have] be[en] inconsistent and partial." Yet the Colony contained "great numbers of people of other religious denominations * * * , some of whom ha[d] been disciplined in the art of war and conscientiously th[ought] it their duty to fight in defense of their country, their wives, their families and estates". From these people had arisen "petitions * * * , setting forth that the petitioners [we]re very willing to defend themselves and their country and desirous of being formed into regular bodies for that purpose, instructed and disciplined under proper officers with suitable and legal authority; representing withal that unless measures of this kind [we]re taken, * * * they [could] not assemble to oppose the enemy without the utmost danger of exposing themselves to confusion and destruction." The legislators also feared that "the voluntary assembling of great bodies of armed men from different parts of the province on any occasional alarm, * * * without call or authority from the government and without due order and direction among themselves, m[ight] be attended with danger to our neighboring Indian friends and allies, as well as to the internal peace of the province." So, believing it to be unreasonable "that any should through a want of legal powers be in the least restrained from doing what they judge it their duty to do for their own security and the public good," the legislators decreed that > it shall and may be lawful for the freemen of this province to form themselves into companies, as heretofore they have used in time of war without law, and for each company * * * to choose its own officers, * * * and present them to the governor * * * for his approbation * * * .

[1361] United States v. Hartwell, 73 U.S. (6 Wallace) 385, 393 (1868).

>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * And * * * as soon as the said companies * * * are formed * * * , it shall and may be lawful to and for the governor * * * , by and with the advice and consent of the [officers] * * * , to form, make and establish articles of war for the better government of the forces * * * ; which articles of war * * * shall be * * * distributed to the captains of the several companies, and by them distinctly read to their respective companies; and all and every * * * freeman who shall, after at least three days' consideration of the said articles, voluntarily sign the same in the presence of some one justice of the peace. acknowledging * * * that he has well considered thereof and is willing to be bound and governed thereby, * * * shall thenceforth be deemed well and duly bound to the observance of the said articles and to the duties thereby required, and subject to the pains, penalties, punishments and forfeitures that may therein be appointed for disobedience and other offenses.
>
> Provided always, That the articles so to be made and established shall contain nothing repugnant, but be as near as possible conformable to the military laws of Great Britain * * * , the different circumstances of this province compared with Great Britain, and of a voluntary militia of freemen compared with mercenary standing troops, being duly weighed and maturely considered.
>
> Provided also, That nothing in this act shall be understood or construed to give any power or authority to the governor * * * and the said officers to make any articles or rules that shall in the least affect those of the inhabitants of this province who are conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms, either in their liberties, persons or estates, nor any other persons of what persuasion or denomination soever who have not first > voluntarily and freely signed the said articles after due consideration * * * .

>
> Provided also, That no youth under the age of twenty-one years nor any bought servant or indented apprentice shall be admitted to enroll himself or be capable of being enrolled in the said companies * * * without the consent of his or their parents or guardians, masters or mistresses, in writing under their hands first had and obtained.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * Provided also, That no * * * party of volunteers shall by virtue of this act be compelled or led more than three days' march beyond the inhabited parts of the province, not detained longer than three weeks in any garrison, without an express engagement for that purpose first voluntarily entered into * * * by every man so to march or remain in garrison.{EN-1959}

Thus, this statute attempted to bridge the divide between a true Militia based upon near-universal impressment, and a "private militia" with no inherent governmental authority, by creating "a voluntary militia of freemen" with explicit governmental approbation. This was no trivial problem, inasmuch as even the people "desirous of being formed into regular bodies" themselves had recognized that they needed some kind of statutory approval, so that their officers could exercise "legal authority" over them. Similarly, the legislators observed that, without a statute, these private groups suffered from "a want of legal powers"; their "form[ing] themselves into companies, as [t]heretofore they have used [to do] in time of war" was "without law"; and "the voluntary assembling of great bodies of armed men * * * , without call or authority from the government and without due order and direction among themselves", created serious "danger". Of course, all of these demerits could have been summed up in a succinct conclusion: namely, that "great bodies of armed men * * * without call or authority from the government and without due order and direction among themselves" could not constitute "well regulated Militia", or even any form of true "Militia" at all.

Trying to escape that conclusion, Pennsylvania's legislators licensed purely voluntary enlistments and service in their "militia of freemen". And not just to exempt conscientious objectors. Rather, any "persons of what persuasion or denomination soever" could refuse to join—exactly the opposite of the rule enforced everywhere else in Colonial America. And no minor or bought servant or apprentice could enter this "voluntary militia of freemen" without the written approval of his parent, guardian, master, or mistress—exactly the opposite of the rule in Colonies in which the initial age for enlistment was under twenty-one years, and servants were not exempted from Militia service. So, in effect, Pennsylvania's "voluntary militia of freemen" was a governmentally sanctioned "private militia", with the emphasis on "private", because the idiosyncratic political perspective of each individual determined not only whether he would join, but whether he labored under any obligation to do so. Therein lurked the fallacy: namely, to assuage the religious qualms of Quakers in the legislature, Pennsylvania attempted to "regulate" her "militia" by allowing for voluntary enrollment alone, when the very voluntary nature of her novel system rendered her ostensible "militia" other than "well regulated", and even other than a true "militia" at all, because its method of organization was entirely at odds with what had always been done both in England and in the other Colonies.

The King, however, was not deceived by Pennsylvania's oxymoronic formulation of "a voluntary militia of freemen". To the contrary: In 1756, he "declare[d] his disallowance" of the statute, holding it "repealed, * * * void and of none effect".{EN-1960} And rightly so. As Blackstone pointed out, "the sole supreme government and command of the militia within all his majesty's realms and dominions * * * ever was and is the undoubted right of his majesty * * * ; and * * * both or either house of parliament cannot, nor ought to, pretend to the same".[1362] So, if the King would not accede to dictation by Parliament in such matters, of course he would not suffer the General Assembly of the mere Colony of Pennsylvania to deprive him of his right to require the compulsory enlistment of all eligible men in what ultimately was his Militia. And if the Royal disapproval meant (as it surely did) that Pennsylvania lacked authority to settle "a voluntary militia of freemen", then on the other hand it implicitly approved of the other twelve Colonies' long-settled reliance on near-universal impressment to fill the ranks of their Militia.

Of course, today, a recurrence of this episode could not occur, because neither Members of Congress nor any State's legislators, in organizing the Militia, could adopt or accede to such an explicitly religious limitation on their powers and duties. The Constitution requires that "the Militia of the several States", in keeping with pre-constitutional principles, be organized on the basis of near-universal and compulsory membership (other than for those very few who may be wholly exempted on such sufficient grounds as physical or mental incapacity to serve). Perforce of the original Constitution, "[t]he Senators and Representatives" in Congress "and the Members of the several State Legislatures * * * shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution".[1363] And "no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States."[1364] Moreover, the First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion", which prohibition Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment extends to the States.[1365] Therefore, no legislator, without violating his "Oath or Affirmation" of office, can vote for a statute that prevents the proper organization of the Militia in order to conform to the tenets of a particular religion. Indeed, it would violate his "Oath or Affirmation" for a Member of Congress or a State legislator even to propose such a statute. (For a Member's mere proposal of such a statute in Congress, however, punishment could be forthcoming only from the House of Representatives or the Senate, as the case might be, because the mere proposal of a statute would arguably constitute nothing more than "Speech or Debate in either House", for which a Member "shall not be questioned in any other Place".[1366] A Member who actually voted for such a statute, however, would expose himself to far more serious sanctions.)

[1362] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 262-263.

[1363] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1364] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

2. The Articles of Confederation required that "every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred".[1367] Which every State—including, finally, Pennsylvania{EN-1961}—had been doing, by statute, prior to adoption of the Articles, and continued to do thereafter.

3. The Constitution recognized the Militia as preëxisting establishments of the States, which it incorporated as permanent parts of its federal structure in the form they all had assumed during the pre-constitutional era, and with the authority and responsibility to perform critical governmental functions "in the Service of the United States".[1368] Because they are "the Militia of several States",[1369] the General Government cannot abolish them, either directly, or by transmogrifying them into a constitutionally nonexistent "Militia of the United States", or by absorbing them within the regular Armed Forces. Because they are required to provide "Service" to the General Government in certain critical situations, the States cannot abolish them, either.[1370] And because they are "necessary to the security of a free State",[1371] in any "free State" even WE THE PEOPLE cannot abolish them in principle or practice, by abjuring or simply neglecting their own right and duty to form and participate in Militia as instruments of collective self-defense (although, if THE PEOPLE become so corrupt as to disregard their rights and duties as sovereigns, they arguably will thereby forfeit any claim to live in "a free State").

[1365] See, e.g., Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947). Of course, judicial decisions following the line of reasoning adopted in such as Everson are wrong in locating the source of this prohibition in the Due Process Clause of that Section of the Amendment, when its true locus is the Privileges or Immunities Clause. See W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Chapters XXX through XXXII. But, as folk wisdom has it, sometimes "it takes a crooked stick to beat a mad dog".

[1366] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 1 with art. I, § 5, cls. 1 and 2; and contrast 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[1367] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

[1368] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1369] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1370] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[1371] U.S. Const. amend. II.

4. The Militia are the subjects of specific constitutional rights, powers, and privileges, separate from and even superior to those of the Armed Forces.[1372]

5. The Constitution explicitly assigns to—or more precisely put from the perspective of legal history, recognizes in—the Militia specific governmental authority and responsibility unique to them "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1373] This, in tandem with the duty—unique to him—which the Constitution imposes upon the President to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed",[1374] and which he may fulfill as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States".[1375]

6. The Constitution requires that the Militia be "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]" pursuant to statute—either by Congress, for the purposes of "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions" "in the Service of the United States";[1376] or by the States if Congress fails, neglects, or refuses to regulate the Militia in that regard;[1377] and by the States with respect to all of those matters of specifically Local concern that do not involve "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions" "in the Service of the United States".[1378]

7. Membership in the Militia is assigned by law: The Constitution appoints the President as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States".[1379] "[T]he Appointment of [all other] Officers" is "reserv[ed] to the States respectively".[1380] And all other eligible individuals, even if exempted from some duties for good and sufficient reasons consistent with "the common defence" and "the general Welfare",[1381] are required to serve in some manner perforce of the constitutional definition of "Militia".

8. All of this being true, not only do the Militia as institutions embody and exercise governmental authority of a constitutional and statutory stature, but also

---

[1372] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16 and amends. II and X with art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 14, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1, and with amend. V. See ante, Chapter 30.

[1373] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1374] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[1375] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1376] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15, 16, and 18.

[1377] Compare U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2 with amends. II and X.

[1378] See U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

[1379] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1380] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1381] U.S. Const. preamble.

WE THE PEOPLE in their capacity as members of the Militia qualify as actual public officials.[1382] True enough, WE THE PEOPLE, who "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution",[1383] have conferred this authority upon themselves. But to do so was part of "the Right of the People to alter or to abolish [any Form of Government], * * * and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness".[1384]

C. The supreme governmental nature of the Militia prefigured in pre-constitutional English law. Quite revealing in this regard is the evolution of the Militia as governmental entities from pre-constitutional English statutory law to the post-independence American constitutional law just canvassed.

1. As Blackstone explained the law of England,

> [B]Y the absolute rights of individuals we mean those which are so in their primary and strictest sense; such as would belong to their persons merely in a state of nature, and which every man is intitled to enjoy, whether out of society or in it. * * *
>
> FOR the principal aim of society is to protect individuals in the enjoyment of those absolute rights, which were vested in them by the immutable laws of nature; but which could not be preserved in peace without that mutual assistance and intercourse, which is gained by the institution of friendly and social communities. Hence it follows, that the first and primary end of human laws is to maintain and regulate those absolute rights of individuals. * * *
>
> THE absolute rights of man * * * are * * * denominated the natural liberty of mankind. This natural liberty consists properly in a power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature * * * . But every man, when he enters into society, gives up a part of his natural liberty * * * ; and, in consideration of receiving the advantages of mutual commerce, obliges himself to conform to those laws, which the community has thought proper to establish. * * * Political therefore, or civil, liberty, which is that of a member of society, is no other than natural liberty so far restrained by human laws (and no farther) as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the publick. Hence we may collect that the law, which restrains a man from doing mischief to his follow citizens, though it diminishes the natural, increases the civil liberty of mankind: but every wanton and causeless restraint of the will of the subject, whether practiced by a monarch, a nobility, or a popular assembly, is a degree of tyranny.

[1382] See ante, at 844-845.

[1383] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1384] Declaration of Independence.

* * * * *

THE absolute rights of every Englishman (which, taken in a political and extensive sense, are usually called their liberties) as they are founded on nature and reason, so they are coeval with our form of government; though subject at times to fluctuate and change: their establishment (excellent as it is) being still human. * * * But * * * their fundamental articles have been from time to time asserted in parliament, as often as they were thought to be in danger.

* * * * *

The rights themselves, thus defined by these several statutes, consist of a number of private immunities * * * . And these may be reduced to there [sic, "three" was undoubtedly meant] principal or primary articles; the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right of private property: because as there is no other known method of compulsion, or of abridging man's natural free will, but by an infringement or diminution of one or the other of these important rights, the preservation of these, inviolate, may justly be said to include the preservation of our civil immunities in their largest and more extensive sense.

* * * * *

* * * But in vain would these rights be declared, ascertained, and protected by the dead letter of the laws, if the constitution had provided no other method to secure their actual enjoyment. It has therefore established certain other auxiliary subordinate rights of the subject, which serve principally as barriers to protect and maintain inviolate the three great and primary rights of personal security, personal liberty, and private property. These are,

1. THE constitution, powers, and privileges of parliament * * * .

2. THE limitation of the king's prerogative, by bounds so certain and notorious, that it is impossible he should exceed them without the consent of the people. * * * The former of these keeps the legislative power in due health and vigour, so as to make it improbable that laws should be enacted destructive of general liberty: the latter is a guard upon the executive power, by restraining it from acting either beyond or in contradiction to the laws, that are framed and established by the other.

3. A THIRD subordinate right of every Englishman is that of applying to the courts of justice for redress of injuries. Since the law is * * * the supreme arbiter of every man's life, liberty, and property, courts of justice must at all times be open * * * and the law be duly administered therein.

* * * * *

4. IF there should happen any uncommon injury, or infringement of the rights before-mentioned, which the ordinary course of law is too defective to reach, there still remains a fourth subordinate right appertaining to every individual, namely, the right of petitioning the king, > or either house of parliament, for the redress of grievances. * * * Care only must be taken, lest, under the pretence of petitioning, the subject be guilty of any riot or tumult; * * * and, to prevent this, it is provided by * * * statute * * * that no petition to the king, or either house of parliament, for any alterations in church or state, shall be signed by above twenty persons, unless the matter thereof be approved by three justices of the peace or the major part of the grand jury, in the country; and in London by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council: nor shall any petition be presented by more than ten persons at a time. * * *

>
> 5. THE fifth and last auxiliary right of the subject * * * is that of having arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are allowed by law. Which is also declared by * * * statute * * * and is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.[1385]

An exact parallel exists between, on the one hand, Blackstone's descriptions of men's "absolute rights" and of the proper rôle of government in guaranteeing those rights, and, on the other hand, the assertions in the Declaration of Independence that "all men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights; that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness"; and "[t]hat to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed". Moreover, a close relationship exists between the five-fold English scheme of protections for men's "absolute rights" and the plan the Constitution adopted. For, following the pattern of the English political and legal system, the Constitution established three branches of government—legislative, executive, and judicial in character[1386]—the first three of Blackstone's "auxiliary subordinate rights of the subject". It recognized "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances"[1387]—the fourth of Blackstone's "auxiliary subordinate rights". And it secured "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"[1388]—the fifth and last of those rights.

2. In the English system, however, the protections for all of "the absolute rights of individuals" were purely statutory and therefore impermanent in nature—as Blackstone described them, "asserted in parliament", and "defined by * * * several statutes", but "subject at times to fluctuate and change". This was true even of "the

---

[1385] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 123-126, 127, 129, 140-141, 143-144 (footnote omitted).

[1386] U.S. Const. arts. I, II, and III.

[1387] U.S. Const. amend. I.

[1388] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II.

natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression"—so that, although Englishmen might "hav[e] arms for their defence", they were only "such [arms] as are allowed by law", "[w]hich is also declared by * * * statute * * * and is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions" that could change, for the better or the worse, with the whims of Parliamentary majorities. In contrast, after 1776, America's law set an entirely new course.

a. The original Constitution fixed the structures, the operations, and especially the powers and disabilities of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the General Government, none of which, singly or in any combination, enjoys any authority to expand or contract the authority of the General Government or the States, except through the extraordinary process of amendment of the Constitution itself.[1389]

b. The First Amendment then commanded that "Congress shall make no law respecting" individuals' freedom "peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances"—so that, now, any number of peaceable people may present any petition for "redress" as to any "grievances" without anyone's prior approval.

c. Most radically (in the sense of penetrating to the very root of the matter of securing Americans' "natural liberty"), the Second Amendment guaranteed "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" for the primary purpose of forming "well regulated Militia". Indeed, WE THE PEOPLE deemed this right so vital for this purpose that they secured it twice: (i) By incorporating "the Militia of the several States" into its federal structure, and requiring Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia",[1390] the original Constitution made the Militia permanent parts of the governmental apparatus, no less than Congress, the President, the Judiciary, and even the States themselves. So, inasmuch as every "well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[1391] and inasmuch as "the people" in a "well regulated militia" always possess their own arms in their own homes,[1392] the original Constitution recognized, protected, and provided for effectuation of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"—proving that, in this particular at least, "the [original] Constitution is itself, in every rational sense, and to every useful purpose, A BILL OF RIGHTS".[1393] (ii) In affirming "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", the Second Amendment

---

[1389] U.S. Const. art. V and amend. X.

[1390] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1391] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1392] See post, Chapter 38.

[1393] The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton).

emphasized "the people's" ultimate independence in this regard. For, although "to * * * bear Arms" may mean more than to employ "Arms" in a purely military fashion, it surely means at least that.[1394] Therefore, inasmuch as "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed"; and inasmuch as this prohibition extends to all public officials;[1395] then no public official can deny "the people" of any State "a well regulated militia * * * composed of the body of the people, trained to arms". This amounts to nothing less than a constitutional command to both Congress and the States to secure to "the people" the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'";[1396] and, if Congress and the States should default in their duties in that particular, it extends a constitutional commission to "the people" from "the people" to secure that power by and for themselves.

Moreover, in contradistinction to pre-constitutional English law, under the Constitution—which bans not only overt "Titles of Nobility" but consequently also any status of ignobility[1397]—"the people" are not limited to only such "arms for their defence" as public officials may imagine are "suitable to [individuals'] condition and degree". Instead, everyone who is eligible for the Militia (other than conscientious objectors) is to be armed as well as "trained to arms". In America, arms in the hands of "the people" are not simply "allowable by law", which under the old English formulation implied statutory permission and therefore possibly denial, but are multiply required by "the supreme Law of the Land". In addition, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is not simply, as in old England, "a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression". For the Constitution extends to the Militia the authority and responsibility both "to execute the Laws of the Union"[1398] even before those "laws [might be] found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression", and to employ those "Laws" precisely in order to deter and to "restrain [such] violence".

d. To maintain this new system of limited governmental powers and expansive individual rights—that is, a system of true popular sovereignty in which the people themselves control the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'"—the original Constitution established and the Second Amendment confirmed a complex federal structure of interlocking "checks and balances", each of which emphasizes in one manner or another the uniquely governmental character of the Militia:

[1394] See post, at 1381-1386.

[1395] See post, at 1386-1398.

[1396] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1397] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8 and § 10, cl. 1.

[1398] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

(1) The Militia are primarily and permanently institutions "of the several States", and only secondarily and contingently instruments that the General Government may "employ[ ] in the Service of the United States".[1399]

(2) Congress is explicitly delegated certain powers with respect to the Militia, because otherwise—the latter being originally and permanently State establishments—it would have no authority in regard to them at all, any more than it enjoys any authority over any other branches of the States' governments. This inherent disability of Congress was recognized in and carried over from the Articles of Confederation, which provided that "every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred",[1400] just as the independent States (and the Colonies before them) had kept up such Militia on their own throughout the *pre-*constitutional period.

(3) Perforce of the nature of the Militia as State institutions, the powers of Congress with respect to them are closely confined. With respect to their employment, Congress is authorized "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"[1401]—and for no other purpose whatsoever. With respect to their regulation, Congress is permitted "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"[1402]—which regulation, in the nature of things, must be addressed to the three purposes for which the Militia may be "call[ed] forth". And with respect to the Militia's governance, Congress is allowed "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States"[1403]—which governance, also in the nature of things, can take hold only when the Militia have actually been "call[ed] forth" for one or more of the three constitutional purposes. Otherwise, Congress is powerless to employ, regulate, or govern the Militia at any time in any way for any reason. Outside of the three constitutional purposes, regulation of the Militia to serve those purposes, and governance of the Militia when "call[ed] forth" to be so "employed", the Militia are none of Congress's business. Thus, because Congress would have no power whatsoever over the Militia absent an express constitutional grant, these delegations of power are simultaneously statements of Congressional disabilities with respect to every other possible employment, regulation, and act of governance of and over the Militia.

(4) The States' powers with respect their Militia extend to everything else conceivable—all other employments, all forms of regulation related to such [1399] Compare U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 with art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

---

[1400] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

[1401] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1402] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1403] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

employments, and general governance whenever the Militia are not "employed in the Service of the United States".[1404] To emphasize and secure this huge residuum of authority, the Constitution "reserv[es] to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers" in their Militia[1405]—including in each State even the commander in chief (or equivalent rank) for most of the time, because the Constitution empowers the President to act as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States" only "when [the Militia are] called into the actual Service of the United States".[1406]

(5) Finally, WE THE PEOPLE wield the ultimate "check and balance", embodied in "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" for the purpose of maintaining "well regulated Militia" in service of "the security of a free State" in every State and the United States as a whole at all times and under all circumstances.[1407] Perforce of that right, THE PEOPLE can demand that Congress and the States' legislatures exercise their powers so that such Militia always exist, are always adequately prepared, and whenever and wherever necessary are put to their proper use. For, unlike public officials of the General Government and the States whose identities change from election to election, and who can assert no claim to authority except as a consequence of those elections, WE THE PEOPLE always comprise "the Militia of the several States" and always exercise the authority of those establishments. Even if, as the result of some catastrophe, no elections were held during such an extended period of time that every public office of consequence in the legislative and executive branches of the General Government and the States became vacant, and even the bureaucracies become leaderless, the Militia would nevertheless survive—and not just physically, but also in terms of their governmental authority. For the Militia could lose their authority only if WE THE PEOPLE lost theirs—which could happen only if THE PEOPLE ceased to exist as America's sovereigns.

D. The constitutional impossibility of "private militia". All of this being indisputably true, no "private militia" with legal authority under the Constitution are possible in America:

1. In the contemporary United States, the term "private militia" typically signifies an organization which, although it may not be illegal or extra-legal, nonetheless exists outside of the government and makes no claim to any specifically governmental authority. So, in American constitutional law, "private militia" is a contradiction in terms, because the Militia of every Colony and independent State prior to ratification of the Constitution were public entities, both "settled" and

---

[1404] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[1405] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1406] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied). See post, at 871-880.

[1407] U.S. Const. amend. II.

"regulated" by statute, and thereby infused with and exercising governmental authority. Even the "Independent Companies" that volunteers formed in large numbers in Rhode Island and to a lesser extent in Virginia sought, and received, statutory authorization to become, not separate and private *para-*military entities, but integral components of the Militia.[1408] Membership in an Independent Company brought exemption from service in a regular Militia Company into which men were impressed, but not exemption from service in the Militia. Rather, membership in an Independent Company was perhaps the highest form of such service. Today, "the Militia of the several States" have been permanently "settled" by the Constitution, and are to be "well regulated" by statutes that Congress and the States' legislatures enact. Therefore, although individual citizens may organize private associations in which they acquire and train with arms both individually and collectively where such activity is legal (as in some forms and for some purposes it should be throughout this country),[1409] such organization and training can never qualify them as "Militia" in the constitutional sense of that noun—except perhaps in the extreme circumstances in which rogue Members of Congress and State legislators obstinately refuse to enact even the most rudimentary of Militia statutes, and thereupon "the people, from whom the militia must be taken," must exercise their "right to keep and bear arms" on their own initiative, "need[ing] no permission or regulation of law for the purpose".[1410]

2. An additional and intractable problem with some "private militia" is that various of their activities may not be legal, and even may be intentionally illegal. "Private militia", after all, are by definition not necessarily directed or directable towards the public purpose of maintaining "the security of a free State", or even the security of any polity at all. They may, in fact, be composed of principled anarchists or unprincipled outlaws, cloaking their true purposes in a loose-fitting historical disguise.

3. "Private militia" have and can claim no independent legal, and particularly constitutional, authority of their own. In true Militia, WE THE PEOPLE never act as mere private individual in private associations, but always as the executors of governmental power, in the final analysis subject only to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". In contrast, because they are not governmental entities of any kind, "private militia" are not authorized to execute the laws, except insofar as the members of such groups may justifiably defend themselves or others from aggressors, as may any individual whether he belongs to a "private militia" or not. For example—

[1408] See ante, at 224-234 (Rhode Island) and 567-597 (Virginia).

[1409] See U.S. Const. amend. IX.

[1410] Thomas M. Cooley, The General Principles of Constitutional Law in the United States of America (Boston, Massachusetts: Little Brown and Company, 1880), at 271.

a. The Constitution does not contemplate that Congress should "provide for calling forth", or the President should command, mere private individuals or groups to perform the governmental functions of "executing the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections", and "tak[ing] Care that the Laws be faithfully executed".

b. The Constitution does not contemplate that specifically police "powers not delegated to the United States * * * nor prohibited * * * to the States" but "reserved to the States * * * or to the people" are to be exercised by private parties. Arguably, police powers might be "reserved * * * to the people" as individuals and ad hoc groups if all "law and order" were irretrievably broken down and every man were compelled to defend himself. This contention assumes, however, that the phrase "to the people" means "to the people as isolated individuals" rather than as components of some recognizable political community. For if all "law and order" have broken down beyond recall, how could the Constitution—which, after all, is a law—continue to apply? In any event, even were that interpretation admissible in principle, it would not be applicable in any realistically conceivable situation. For, inasmuch as the Militia are composed of "the people" as a whole, unless all of "the people" in a particular Locality were exterminated, some part of the Militia would necessarily survive, with legal authority and the practical means to enforce it. So, absent the utter destruction of that Locality, whatever remnant of the Militia continued to exist would itself constitute the surviving embodiment of "law and order", and therefore would be entitled to exercise police powers against all other individuals.

c. The Constitution does not contemplate that any powers integral to "a Republican Form of Government", because "necessary to the security of a free State", are the province of private parties. And finally,

d. Precisely because "the Militia of the several States" have always been and today remain governmental entities, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" guaranteed by the Second Amendment is least of all an "individual" and "private" right (addressed, for instance, primarily to personal self-defense), but first and foremost: (i) a right pertaining to WE THE PEOPLE'S collective ability to preserve a certain "Form" of government uniquely beneficial to "the common defence" and "the general Welfare";[1411] and, even more fundamentally, (ii) a right pertaining to WE THE PEOPLE'S sovereignty, in that it locates the repository of supreme legal authority through application of the general axiom, "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'", modified by the specifically American corollary that the "gun" is always held by THE PEOPLE themselves under and in conformity with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".[1412]

[1411] Compare Declaration of Independence with U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

[1412] Compare Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61, with Declaration of Independence.

4. "Private militia" have no means—or, for that matter, no plans or even aspirations—for obtaining governmental authority. No matter how large their membership or how effective in training their members may become, they always remain extra-governmental entities.

5. Even in a major economic, political, or social crisis, "private militia" could never become governmental entities simply because their members happened to be organized, armed, and trained, and on the basis of such preparation somehow managed to take control over certain geographical areas by force. Soon enough, the members of any such "private militia" would be ordered to obey the directives of the regularly constituted Militia, the State or Local police, the Armed Forces, or various other agencies of the States' governments or the General Government. And even if some of those entities enjoyed no constitutional right to assume command of any portion of "the Militia of the several States", if the members of a merely "private militia" refused to comply with their directives, they could and doubtlessly would be treated as lawbreakers—and presumably correctly so, because they would enjoy no constitutional or statutory authority of their own upon which to base their disobedience.

6. On the other hand, members of "private militia" cannot be effective by emphasizing the private nature of their activities. Most members of "private militia" style themselves as patriots whose ultimate purpose is to preserve, protect, and defend popular self-government in this country. That task, however, can best be accomplished by actually participating in popular self-government within the constitutional system of "checks and balances"—which, self-evidently, becomes more critical the more the political system deviates from constitutional standards. The most important of those "checks and balances" are the real "Militia of the several States", because they are at once both the most powerful of all "checks and balances" and the "checks and balances" that WE THE PEOPLE themselves control.

7. As a practical matter, "private militia" cannot play a useful rôle in securing popular self-government in this country because—absent a catastrophic collapse of the economic, political, and social systems—they will be unable to recruit sufficient members, for numerous reasons: First, all too many Americans simply refuse to believe that any such collapse can occur—so, for them, "private militia" are entirely irrelevant. Second, most Americans expect that, if a major crisis were to break out, somehow a shadowy entity known as "the government" would successfully deal with it—they being oblivious to the likelihood, if not the certainty, that the blunders and even crimes of incompetent or rogue public officials would have been the primary causes of the crisis in the first place, and that in the midst of the crisis such officials would be intent solely upon protecting themselves and their controllers and clients in factions and other special-interest groups. Third, the very people who mindlessly rely on "the government" to correct the problems "the government" has engendered would surely reject the assistance of "private militia" precisely because such organizations had no governmental authority, or any way of obtaining it. Fourth, many contemporary "private militia" have little to no visibility or credibility or means of establishing either of them among the general public; and some "private militia" have garnered bad reputations, for good and sufficient reasons. So, if a failure of the economic, political, or social systems so calamitous as to shake the average American's naive faith in "the government" did occur, public awareness and acceptance of "private militia" would almost surely arrive too late for a handful of such "militia" scattered here and there throughout the country to recruit, equip, train, and deploy sufficient members to bring order out of chaos even in their own Localities.

8. "Private militia" tend to focus their efforts primarily on training their few committed members in exciting *para-*military techniques and exercises, rather than focusing on the more prosaic practices of popular self-government. For that reason, they attract a surfeit of individuals whose primary desire is "to play soldier" for a few days a month, rather than to learn how to be politically effective citizens every day of the year.

9. Because of the character of some of their members, "private militia" are the targets of agents provocateurs, infiltrators, informers, and other operatives deployed by rogue governmental agencies and malign private special-interest groups for the purpose of entrapping the soi-disant "militiamen" in arguably illegal activities, particularly involving firearms. Played up for all they are worth in the major media, these entrapments and "sting" operations tar with the brush of "extremism"—and even "terrorism"—every proponent of anything to do with "militia", and provide endless grist for the mills of "gun controllers". In stark contrast, any interference with "the Militia of the several States" by rogue operatives from governmental agencies or special-interest groups would be illegal—and subject to punishment by the Militia themselves, under their constitutional authority "to execute the Laws of the Union".

10. In every imaginable set of circumstances, "private militia" would serve no useful purpose. On the one hand, where a constitutional Militia existed, almost every individual who might become a member of some "private militia" would be required by law to enroll in the constitutional Militia, in which event no plausible reason would exist to form, and vanishingly few individuals would remain to join, any separate "private militia". On the other hand, where no constitutional Militia existed, citizens' first concern should be to revitalize such a Militia in strict accordance with *pre-*constitutional principles, rather than to set up some "private militia" with no possible claim to constitutional authority.[1413]

[1413] See Edwin Vieira, Jr., Constitutional "Homeland Security", Volume One, The Nation in Arms (Ashland, Ohio: BookMasters, Inc., 2007).

11. Even a "quasi-private militia" of the pattern which Pennsylvania attempted to set up in 1755—that is, "a voluntary militia of freemen" approved as such by a State statute[1414]—could claim no constitutional authority today, and indeed no statutory authority, either, because the statute creating such "a voluntary militia" would violate the constitutional principle of "[a] well regulated Militia" that mandates near-universal and compulsory service.[1415] Arguably, in a community composed solely of thoroughgoing patriots, "a voluntary militia" might in fact become near-universal in at least titular membership. But it would nonetheless not be compulsory in law—and, not being compulsory, it would be most unlikely ever to become near-universal even in that community, let alone anywhere else, when arose a crisis sufficiently severe to threaten to fracture popular solidarity along political, economic, social, or religious lines.

Admittedly, a compulsory Militia might not survive intact the onset of such a crisis, either.[1416] But people long schooled in their duty to coöperate to the maximum extent in governing their community—which is the primary lesson participation in the Militia teaches—would be less likely than any others to succumb to such fragmentation. Of course, it is also possible that a large majority of the community could become so corrupt as to refuse to settle a true Militia, in which case "a voluntary militia" might be the best such establishment that could be mounted. As Thomas Cushing, Samuel Adams, and William Heath of the Massachusetts Committee of Correspondence wrote to the Virginia Committee of Correspondence in 1773:

> [I]t may be worth Consideration, that the Work is more likely to be well done, at a Time when the Ideas of Liberty, and its Importance are strong in Men's Minds. There is Danger that these Ideas will hereafter grow faint and languid. Our Posterity may be accustomed to bear the Yoke; and being inured to Servility they may even bow the Shoulder to the Burden. It can never be expected that a People however numerous, will form and execute a wise Plan to perpetuate their Liberty, when they have lost the Spirit and Feeling of it.[1417]

Yet few individuals among a people largely devoid of "the Spirit and Feeling of [Liberty]" could be expected to form "a voluntary militia", or if they did so could be

---

[1414] See ante, at 87-88 and 845-848.

[1415] See post, Chapter 35.

[1416] For the historically most pertinent example, many Americans who were considered staunchly patriotic during the early years of the Colonies' disputes with King George III and his ministerial governments—and who decried such measures as the Stamp Act, the so-called "Intolerable Acts", and the Quebec Act—emerged as ardent Loyalists when Americans' opposition to Parliamentary excesses finally ripened into a demand for independence. See generally, e.g., Thomas B. Allen, Tories: Fighting for the King in America's First Civil War (New York, New York: HarperCollins Publishers, 2010).

[1417] Letter of 21 October 1773, in JOURNALS of the HOUSE of BURGESSES of VIRGINIA, ante note 318, at 57.

expected to convince many others to join with them in defending the abstraction of "a free State" at the cost of those others' treasure and ease, let alone their blood.

12. To be sure, if no constitutional Militia existed, and a catastrophic breakdown of public order suddenly occurred, individual citizens would have a duty under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" to protect themselves collectively. As Blackstone taught, > the right of punishing crimes against the law of nature, as murder and the like, is in a state of mere nature vested in every individual. For it must be vested in somebody; otherwise the laws of nature would be vain and fruitless, if none were empowered to put them in execution: and if that power is vested in any one, it must also be vested in all mankind; since all are by nature equal. * * * In a state of society this right is transferred from individuals to the sovereign power; whereby men are prevented from being judges in their own causes, which is one of the evils that civil government was intended to remedy. Whatever power therefore individuals had of punishing offences against the law of nature, that is now vested in the magistrate alone; who bears the sword of justice by the consent of the whole community.[1418]

So, if dire circumstances rendered "the magistrate[s']" normal authority utterly unavailable or ineffective, individuals would be justified ex necessitate in forming armed establishments in order to enforce law and order in their own Localities. In that event, however, such establishments would not, strictly speaking, be "private" at all, but instead would be at least provisional—and, depending upon the extent and duration of the breakdown, perhaps more or less permanent—"governmental" entities. Otherwise, as long as any functioning vestige of a preëxisting legitimate government remained, individuals would not be entitled to set up any "private militia" on their own authority, because a proper Militia could still be formed under the government's aegis.

Similarly, if "a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evince[d] a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism, it [would be] * * * their right, it [would be] * * * their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security"[1419]—presumably, by raising Militia on their own initiative in their own defense, because usurpers and tyrants would doubtlessly have enacted spurious "laws" purporting to prohibit WE THE PEOPLE from arming and organizing themselves. Again, these would not be "private militia", because they would be exercises of THE PEOPLE'S sovereign right

---

[1418] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 7-8.

[1419] Declaration of Independence.

"to alter or to abolish" a bad "Form of Government", and "to institute new Government", if necessary by force of arms.

E. The Militia the surest guarantors of WE THE PEOPLE'S liberties. Nevertheless, that the Militia are quintessentially governmental establishments should occasion no concern among patriots, because in America "government", properly understood and administered, is truly "of the people, by the people, for the people"[1420]—and, in the final analysis, the Militia themselves embody and guarantee that state of affairs, because they are "the people".

1. The Militia are the surest guarantors of WE THE PEOPLE'S liberties, not in spite of being governmental establishments, but precisely because they are governmental establishments of a very special kind. The Militia are the very safest of all governmental establishments, because they and they alone invest THE PEOPLE with supreme legal authority in their own hands, and provide them with a potent mechanism for enforcing the law in their own hands, and therefore with the means to secure their own liberty in their own hands. Certainly, when every thinking adult in America in 1791 knew that "[a] well regulated Militia" was one "settled" and "regulated" by statute as a governmental institution, no one could have believed that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" (as the Second Amendment declares) yet might ever threaten such "security". So, today, that declaration informs, instructs, as admonishes Americans that only by settling and regulating their Militia as governmental institutions according to the true pre-constitutional pattern can "the security of a free State" be guaranteed anywhere in this country.

2. Revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" today (so long as it is accomplished along strictly constitutional lines) poses little danger to WE THE PEOPLE from the governmental character the Militia must assume, and derivatively from the possibly unsavory characters who might stealthily ascend the ladder of public office—whether such miscreants turn out to be rogue State Governors, or a rogue President, or a profusion of rogue Members of Congress or the States' legislatures.

a. In the extreme political circumstances predictably attendant upon attempts at usurpation and tyranny, political buccaneers posing as "the President" of the United States or "the Governor" of some State will likely issue directives, in their capacities as supposed "commanders in chief", aimed at coöpting the Militia into their schemes. But in each State in which a constitutional Militia exists, they will be unable to obtain the assent of more than a few individuals not already embraced within and among their cliques, factions, and clients. For if "well regulated Militia" exist at all, it will be because the overwhelming majority of WE THE PEOPLE desire—and even in the face of adversity will demand—to live in "a free State". And institutions that are "necessary to the security of a free State", composed of such PEOPLE, will not bend before the dictates of usurpers and tyrants. To the contrary—

[1420] A. Lincoln, Gettysburg Address, ante note 30.

(1) Being "well regulated", Militiamen will understand the Constitution, "the Laws of the Union", and the laws of their States; their own rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and duties under those laws; and their own responsibility to maintain the rule of law against all enemies, domestic even more than foreign. In particular, Militiamen will know that, in the final analysis, they must judge whether the "Service" public officials might demand of them is "the actual Service of the United States" or of their own States; whether their States are being "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay"; and whether they are "in actual service in time of War or public danger".[1421] Moreover, Militiamen will recognize that the most likely occasion for posing these and related questions to public officials will be when usurpation and tyranny are afoot—the immediate proof of which will be that officialdom's answers will amount only to mendacious bluff, bluster, and double-talk. For example, what happened to Virginia's last Royal Governor, Lord Dunmore, in 1775 presents a perfect picture of what would happen today, were properly revitalized "Militia of the several States" confronted by a like situation.[1422]

(2) Imbued with the authority "to execute the Laws of the Union, [and] suppress Insurrections", and to enforce the laws of their particular States, "well regulated" Militiamen will be entitled on their own recognizance to suppress the criminal enterprises of usurpers and tyrants as those machinations arise. For every scheme of usurpation and tyranny is a criminal act;[1423] and every such scheme in service of which the perpetrators use, or even contemplate the use of, force amounts to "Insurrection[ ]" and "domestic Violence" against the Constitution, the United States, the States, and WE THE PEOPLE—and, in the conspirators' actual employment of force, no less than "Treason"[1424]—which must be put down immediately in order to maintain "a Republican Form of Government" and ultimately "the security of a free State".[1425]

(3) "[W]ell regulated" Militiamen will successfully suppress every act of usurpation and tyranny, because they will have the combined moral, political, legal, and practical power to do so. The fundamental principle of American political

---

[1421] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1; art. I, § 10, cl. 3; and amend. V (emphases supplied). See post, at 871-880.

[1422] See ante, at 567-597.

[1423] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[1424] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1. See ante, at 814-821.

[1425] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15; art. IV, § 4; and amend. II.

science is that, "whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of [men's unalienable Rights], it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it". Indeed, it is not only their right, but under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" "it is their duty*, to throw off such Government".*[1426] And even if it should prove unnecessary "to throw off such Government" in its entirety, in extreme circumstances it would remain WE THE PEOPLE'S privilege and responsibility to correct the errant course of their government by punishing particular maleficent public officials as their misdeeds occurred. Yet, to be a real "right", there must be an effective remedy: "A right without a remedy is as if it were not. For every beneficial purpose it may be said not to exist."[1427] And to be a real "duty", it must be capable of fulfillment, not just in theory but in practice as well. At base, though, every "government" is an aggregation of physical force. For "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'", and "the Sword and Soveraignty always march hand in hand".[1428] Thus, for WE THE PEOPLE to have a credible right and duty in law to "throw off such Government" of usurpers and tyrants, they must be able in fact to muster greater force than can their oppressors. Indeed, even to deter such miscreants, and thereby possibly avoid entirely the necessity to "throw off such Government", THE PEOPLE need to be able seriously to threaten the application of potentially overwhelming force. For "fear" is "the only restraining motive which may hold the hand of a tyrant".[1429]

b. When WE THE PEOPLE "ordained and established th[e] Constitution",[1430] they did not consign its or their future security to blind chance. Neither did they abandon it or themselves to the ministrations or mercies of such feckless or faithless men as Accident might vomit onto the political scene and Misfortune elevate to public office. Rather, THE PEOPLE reserved to themselves the right, the duty, and the power to safeguard their Constitution—and, subtending it, their Declaration of Independence—against all hazards at all times. The Constitution knows no "Militia of the United States", the power to create such an establishment having never been delegated to the United States. The Constitution recognizes "the Militia of the several States"; but the power to dispense with these institutions it has prohibited to the States by including those Militia as permanent structural components of the federal edifice—and, therefore, the ultimate power in, through, and over the Militia has been "reserved * * * to the people".[1431]

[1426] Declaration of Independence (emphasis supplied).

[1427] United States ex rel. Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 71 U.S. (4 Wallace) 535, 554 (1867). Accord, Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 303 (1885); Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 163 (1803).

[1428] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61; AN ARGUMENT, Shewing that a Standing Army is inconsistent with A Free Government, ante note 27, at 7.

[1429] T. Jefferson, A Summary View of the Rights of British America, ante note 613.

[1430] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1431] See U.S. Const. amend. X.

This is emphatically proven by the Second Amendment's guarantee that "right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed". And this power is sufficient to its end—"the security of a free State"—because:

- It is ubiquitous, inasmuch as the Militia exist throughout the country in the persons of every single eligible citizen.

- It is overwhelming, inasmuch as WE THE PEOPLE organized in the Militia outnumber their potential oppressors by orders of magnitude; are armed; are in actual possession of almost all of the property, territory, and material resources in this country; and themselves embody the plenitude of human knowledge and skills that make America work. And,

- It is inquisitorial, inasmuch as it is capable of ferreting out the wrongdoing of rogue public officials at every level of government, if THE PEOPLE simply maintain their resolution and vigilance.

3. In addition, the Constitution contains numerous specific safeguards against misuse of the Militia:

a. Most obviously, although within her own territory a State may call forth her own Militia for any legitimate purpose in addition to the three allowable to Congress,[1432] oppression of the State's own citizens by rogue public officials in the service of factions and special-interest groups is anything but a legitimate purpose. After all, the purpose of "[a] well regulated Militia" is to provide "the security of a free State", not to empower the overseers of a para-military police state to shackle the people with the "badges and incidents" of slavery.[1433] Therefore, in the very nature of things, no rogue public officials in any State may attempt to employ her Militia to impose "martial law" (under any rubric or guise) in order to enforce her citizens' compliance with those officials' dictates.[1434] Indeed, any such attempt would constitute a causus belli as serious as Lord Dunmore's Proclamation in Virginia,[1435] which could justify WE THE PEOPLE then and there in invoking their right and duty "to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security",[1436] just as Virginians responded to Dunmore's provocations. For anyone who attempts to deploy armed forces against THE PEOPLE who constitute the United States, or any of them, commits "Treason", by constitutional definition.[1437] Mutatis mutandis, the same condemnation would attach to any attempt by rogue

---

[1432] Compare U.S. Const. amend. X with U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1433] U.S. Const. amends. II and XIII.

[1434] The problem of defining "martial law", and the constitutional principles applicable to the most pertinent definitions, are discussed post, Chapter 48.

[1435] For the entire episode, see ante, at 567-597.

[1436] Declaration of Independence.

[1437] See ante, at 814-821.

officials in the General Government to employ the Militia to impose "martial law" or some other form of oppression upon either the States as political institutions or WE THE PEOPLE as individuals.

b. The Constitution empowers the President of the United States to assume the status of "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States" only "when [the Militia are] called into the actual Service of the United States".[1438] And the Constitution delegates to Congress the powers: (i) "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States",[1439] and such "Part" only; and (ii) "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions",[1440] and for those purposes only. Thus, the Constitution defines "the Service of the United States" as those three specific and limited purposes alone, and makes such "Service" the condition sine qua non for deploying any "Part" of "the Militia of the several States" under the control of the United States.

The President's authority as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States" differs from his authority as "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States". The latter status pertains at all times that an "Army" or "Navy" actually exists. Of course, inasmuch as Congress need not "raise and support Armies"[1441] or "provide and maintain a Navy"[1442] unless it deems such establishments "necessary and proper" under the circumstances,[1443] the President in that regard could turn out to be the "Commander in Chief" of nothing, being possessed of a title without substance. On the other hand, although "the Militia of the several States" are permanent constitutional establishments, the President's authority as "Commander in Chief" over them is contingent both in law and fact—dependent upon both some statute through which Congress has "provide[d] for calling forth the Militia" "in the Service of the United States"[1444] and the existence of evidence satisfying the requirements of that statute.

Congress's power "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States" is categorically distinct from its power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[1445] The latter power enables Congress to impose a basic uniformity on "the Militia of

---

[1438] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1439] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[1440] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1441] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1442] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 13.

[1443] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[1444] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[1445] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

the several States" in their entirety throughout the country, with an eye towards maximizing their effectiveness "in the Service of the United States". The exercise of this power does not foreclose, however, the exertions of similar powers by the States, so long as those exertions are complementary or supplementary to, rather than contradictory of or otherwise incompatible with, Congress's mandates. The former power relates solely to some "Part" of the Militia which is actually "call[ed] forth" for "Service" on behalf of the United States upon the occurrence of circumstances that justify intervention by the Militia in order to fulfill one or more of the three purposes the Constitution stipulates. This, in contradistinction to Congress's power "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces", which "Rules" apply to those "Forces" in their entireties and at all times.[1446] So, "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" by Congress do not amount to "governing" them. And the mere existence of a Congressional statute for "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" does not in any way of its own force compel any "Part of the[Militia]" to comply with a Congressional code for "governing * * * them" or to take orders from the President of the United States as their "Commander in Chief".

Distinguishably, pursuant to a statute which "provid[ed] for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", Congress could delegate to the President whatever executive authority, even separate from his status as "Commander in Chief", might be "necessary and proper" for him to see to the statute's enforcement.[1447] The President would be bound by the Constitution to undertake this delegation.[1448] And the States, their Militia, and every Militiamen would be required to comply with the statute and the President's directives thereunder.[1449] Such a delegation might even authorize the President to promulgate regulations in order to effectuate the statute.[1450] The only constitutional limitation on such a delegation would be that Congress should supply sufficient standards to guide the President's conduct.[1451] In such a situation, Congress's delegation to the President of the power to issue regulations would not constitute either an attempt "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States", or orders from the "Commander in Chief", because those regulations would apply to all of the Militia, whether or not any "Part of them" were so "employed". This points up the crucial distinction: Exercises of Congress's power "[t]o provide * * * for

---

[1446] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

[1447] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[1448] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[1449] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[1450] See, e.g., An Act to amend the act calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections, and repel Invasions, approved February twenty-eight, seventeen hundred and ninety-five, and the Acts amendatory thereof, and for other Purposes, Act of 17 July 1862, CHAP. CCI, § 1, 12 Stat. 597, 597.

[1451] See, e.g., Panama Refining Company v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388 (1935).

governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States" and the President's authority as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia" depend upon prior exertions of Congress's power "to provide for calling forth the Militia". If the Militia, in any "Part", are not "call[ed] forth", neither occasion nor justification can arise for anyone's "governing such Part of them" pursuant specifically to a Congressional directive, or for the President to "command" any Militiaman. And when the United States are not in genuine danger of "Insurrections" or "Invasions", or no real need "to execute the Laws of the Union" has arisen, no justifications on those grounds—let alone on any other grounds—can exist for "calling forth the Militia" "in the Service of the United States", for any claim on behalf of Congress to impose rules to "govern[ ]" any "Part" of the Militia, or for the President's assertion of authority as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States".

c. If any State's Militia, in whole or in part, is to deploy at the request of the United States for any presumably legitimate purpose other than the three the Constitution enumerates as within the authority of Congress, permission of and affirmative action by that State herself must be had, because the power to employ their Militia for any other purpose is "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people".[1452] That is, the State herself, not Congress, must "call[ ] forth" her Militia—and therefore the State herself may refuse, rescind, or impose conditions upon that call at any time. Moreover, in such circumstances the State's Militia would be subordinate neither: (i) to the President as "Commander in Chief"—because the President's authority would not extend to the particular purpose for which the Militia were to come forth; nor (ii) to any other official of the General Government—because, other than the President, the Constitution "reserv[es] to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers" in their Militia.[1453]

d. Moreover, even with respect to the three constitutional purposes for which Congress itself may "provide for calling forth" the Militia, the parameters of legitimate "Service" outside of the United States are difficult to imagine. "Insurrections" will certainly be "suppress[ed]" within the United States. "Invasions" will surely be "repel[led]" within or close to the borders of the United States. And only in a very few peculiar situations—such as those involving "Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations", which Congress is empowered "[t]o define and punish"[1454]—might the Militia even arguably have occasion to "execute the Laws of the Union" beyond the Union's own boundaries.

[1452] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[1453] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1454] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 10.

To be sure, within her own borders, a State may call forth her Militia for any legitimate purpose in addition to the three allowable to Congress, and without first seeking the permission of Congress.[1455] But for one State to deploy her Militia within the territory of some other State, either her Militia must be "call[ed] forth" by Congress—for one example, to fulfill the duty of the United States to "protect each of the[States] * * * against domestic Violence" that rises to the level of "Insurrection[ ]"[1456]—or the two States themselves must arrive at some agreement pursuant to which the Militia of the first may operate legally within the boundaries of the second. "No State", however, "shall * * * enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State" "without the Consent of Congress".[1457] And Congress cannot give its "Consent" to "any Agreement or Compact" between any two States that has the effect of expanding Congress's own powers beyond their constitutional limits. So, Congress could consent to an interstate "Agreement or Compact" under the authority of which one State could deploy her Militia into another State's territory in order "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions",[1458] or to execute the laws of or deal with some other emergency in the latter State, upon that State's request.[1459] But Congress could not consent to an "Agreement or Compact" that allowed Congress on its own initiative "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" for some purpose beyond "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions". Otherwise, through such legalistic legerdemain, rogue Congressmen with the aid of compliant rogue public officials in the States could effectively employ "the Militia of the several States" as if they were "the Militia of the United States", thereby overriding both the very definition of the Militia and the Tenth Amendment.

e. In addition, as to all of the constitutional justifications for exercise of Congress's power "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia", WE THE PEOPLE—doubtlessly with such as the example of Virginia's Governor Dunmore fresh in their minds—took care to draft the Constitution in especially strict terms. With respect to the Militia, the limiting adjective "actual" appears in two places in the Constitution, both times conjoined with the noun "service": (i) "[t]he President shall be Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called

---

[1455] Compare U.S. Const. amend. X with art. I, § 8, cl. 15. And compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1456] Compare U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4 with art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1457] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1458] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1459] As Congress has done. See AN ACT Granting the consent and approval of Congress to an interstate compact relating to mutual military aid in an emergency, Act of 1 July 1952, Pub. L. 435, CHAPTER 538, 66 Stat. 315 (New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania). See also 4 U.S.C. § 112(a): "The consent of Congress is hereby given to any two or more States to enter into agreements or compacts for cooperative effort and mutual assistance in the prevention of crime and in the enforcement of their respective criminal laws and policies".

into the actual Service of the United States";[1460] and (ii) "[n]o person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger".[1461] Such usage was no novelty in pre-constitutional American Militia law. Quite the contrary: Both Virginia's and Rhode Island's Militia statutes had employed the term "actual service" in precisely this way,{EN-1962} as well as employing the adjective "actual" to modify other nouns but for the same general purpose.{EN-1963} In all of those contexts, "actual" meant (and as far as the Constitution is concerned today continues to mean) "[r]eally in act; not merely potential" and "not purely in speculation"[1462]—"'real' as opposed to 'nominal'"[1463]—"[e]xisting in act or reality * * * ; in fact"[1464]—"[i]n action at the time being"[1465]—not just "*potential, possible, virtual, speculative, * * * theoretical,* or nominal"[1466]—and most assuredly not "seeming[ ], pretended[ ], or feigned[ ]".[1467] (In a different constitutional context, of course, "actual" could and does have a different connotation.[1468])

(1) As a matter of law, the adjective "actual" was not written into the Constitution in modification of "Service" in relation to the President's authority as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia" for no purpose other than the cosmetic one of filling up space on the line. Not at all. "'In expounding the Constitution * * * , every word must have its due force, and appropriate meaning; for it is evident from the whole instrument, that no word was unnecessarily used, or needlessly

---

[1460] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1461] U.S. Const. amend. V (emphasis supplied).

[1462] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 2 and 3 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[1463] Astor v. Merritt, 111 U.S. 202, 213 (1884).

[1464] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 18, definition 2. Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 27, definition 2.

[1465] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 18, definition 3. Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 27, definition 3; Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 22, definition 4.

[1466] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11 at 18, definition 2. See also Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 27, Ant. & Syn.; Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 22, definition 3.

[1467] Black's Law Dictionary, ante note 368, at 53.

[1468] The only other place in which the adjective "actual" appears in the original Constitution is in Article I, Section 2, Clause 3 (emphasis supplied): "Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct." In this context, "actual" plays a prosaic part, importing simply the "Enumeration" that is really performed, as opposed to the "potential" or "theoretical" formula set out in the clause's first sentence. See Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 18, definition 2. Accord, Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 22, definition 2b.

added.'"[1469] And as a matter of fact as plain as the words themselves, "actual" was added specifically to constrain the noun it modifies. For, without "actual", the sentence would nonetheless parse perfectly well as to its general intent. The addition of "actual" supplies, not simply verbal emphasis for the sake of mere style, but a legally necessary condition precedent that must be satisfied before the Militia can come, and if they are to remain, under the President's command: namely, that their "Service" for the United States must be demonstrably other than speculative, let alone feigned, but instead existing in fact, and especially in the scientific sense veritable or falsifiable—because "[a]greeable to truth or to fact".[1470] Thus, the adjective "actual" supplies a constitutional safeguard against some rogue President who might attempt to commandeer "the Militia of the several States" in whole or in part, or to threaten individual Militiamen with prosecution under purported "martial law", in aid of his aspirations to usurpation or tyranny. Or against some rogue faction in Congress that might enact a statute which purported "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" for some purpose other than the three constitutionally permissible ones.[1471] Or against some combination of the two. But how is this "check and balance" to be enforced?

That it must be enforceable—in a timely manner, and very effectively—is self-evident. The Second Amendment declares that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State". No Militia would be "well regulated", however, if it could, without effective resistance, be misdirected to unlawful ends as a matter of course. For that would undermine and eventually destroy "a free State". In fact, such a Militia, far from being "necessary to the security of a free State", would be inimical to it. Therefore, in any particular instance in which the Militia, in whole or in "Part", are purportedly "call[ed] forth" "in the Service of the United States", someone must enjoy the authority to deny that such a summons actually relates to any one of the three constitutional purposes that might in principle justify it. And on the basis of that denial someone must enjoy the further authority, and have the practical ability, to prevent the illegal deployment of the Militia. But who is that to be?

Recourse to the adjective "actual" is not necessary in order to empower or enjoin any honest and conscientious President to refuse his participation as "Commander in Chief" in "calling forth the Militia" for some unconstitutional purpose. For the President always labors under the comprehensive duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed",[1472] and therefore must always refuse to [1469] Williams v. United States, 289 U.S. 553, 572-573 (1933).

---

[1470] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1603 ("veritable"). Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 2832, definition 1.

[1471] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1472] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

be a party to any unconstitutional action. So, in any particular instance, on that ground alone he must determine in good faith whether any task to which, pursuant to Congressional statute, he "call[s] forth the Militia" constitutes, in law and fact, "the actual Service of the United States". Conversely, "actual" would hardly deter, let alone defeat, an aspiring usurper or tyrant who had somehow wormed his way into the office of President. For such a miscreant would simply pretend that the task he set for the Militia was in "the actual Service of the United States", even though it advanced only his own personal criminal agenda and those of his controllers, courtiers, and clients.

Similarly, the modifier "actual" is not necessary to convince and constrain honest and conscientious Members of Congress to enact only such statutes as constitutionally "call[ ] forth the Militia" and "govern[ ] such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States".[1473] For those (and all of Congress's other) powers are already and always confined to the enactment of "all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying [them] into Execution".[1474] And every Member of Congress is "bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution".[1475] With regard to the Militia (or anything else, for that matter), Congressmen lack any power to enact false "laws" that are *un*necessary and *im*proper, and the purported enactment of which would violate their "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s]". But if aspiring usurpers and tyrants should come to dominate Congress, would those miscreants pay any heed to the constitutional niceties of necessity and propriety or be swayed from their villainy by the mere paper and wind of "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s]"? Moreover, even were Congress composed overwhelmingly of patriots, how long would it require to impeach, convict, and remove from office a malefactor in the White House bent upon perverting the Militia into his personal Schutzstaffel or Red Guards?[1476] And with what adequate force could Congress rout out such a criminal, during or after such proceedings, if not only "the Militia of the several States", but "the Army and Navy of the United States" as well, continued in the manner of robots to obey his purported orders as "Commander in Chief"?[1477] Finally, no matter how effective its powers might be if it could exercise them, Congress might not even be in session—and might be prevented from coming back into session—when and after a rogue President struck.

The General Government's Judiciary, too, would be hard pressed to enforce the limitations expressed in the adjective "actual". The judges' avoidance of assuming the responsibility to confront the issue at all—through invocation of some

---

[1473] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[1474] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 (emphasis supplied).

[1475] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1476] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5 and § 3, cls. 6 and 7; art. II, § 4.

[1477] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

legalistic subterfuge such as the doctrine of "political questions"—would be the most likely result today.[1478] Absent that, what Hamlet rightly condemned as "the law's delay"—especially in the face of "[t]he insolence of office" flaunted by a rogue President and the barking and snapping hyenas and jackals of his criminal Administration—would doubtlessly render judicial intervention too late to produce any useful effect against "[t]he oppressor's wrong".[1479] And if not tardy, judicial relief would almost certainly prove to be impotent. For the judges would be utterly incompetent to enforce their decisions in the only decisive manner—by physically wresting command of the Militia from the rogue President—they not being among the "Officers" of the Militia the "Appointment" of which the Constitution has "reserv[ed] to the States respectively".[1480] On the other hand, if the rogue President's subversion of the Militia were part and parcel of a broad conspiracy infesting the upper echelons of the General Government as a whole, conniving judges would simply hold it "constitutional", unembarrassed by the naked speciousness of their contentions. After all, if judges can rule that Congress's power "[t]o regulate Commerce * * * among the several States" reaches matters that merely "affect" such "Commerce", even though the word "affect" is conspicuous by its absence in that clause of the Constitution (or anywhere else among Congress's powers);[1481] and can opine that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" should be construed without controlling reference to "[a] well regulated Militia", even though the Second Amendment inextricably conjoins the two[1482]—then they could with equal facility rule that "actual Service" does not actually mean "actual", or that "Service" need not be construed with reference to "actual", even though the word "actual" actually appears as its modifier.

The only parties left with the requisite constitutional authority and in a practical position to take the necessary action to enforce the safeguard of "actual Service" are the States and "the Militia of the several States" themselves. The States and their Militia are component parts of the Constitution's federal system that long preëxisted the creation of Congress, the President, and the Judiciary, and that enjoy legal statures not inferior to that of the General Government or any of its branches. But, distinguishably from both the States and the General Government, "the Militia of the several States" are the only institutions to which the Constitution explicitly assigns the responsibility "to execute the Laws of the [1478] Compare and contrast, e.g., Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 169-170 (1803) with Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 Howard) 1, 42-45 (1849).

---

[1479] William Shakespeare, The Tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, Act III, Scene 1.

[1480] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 with art. II, § 2, cl. 2. Of course, the several States' judges might well be among those "Officers" who could assert their authority in that capacity.

[1481] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3, as misconstrued in, for example, United States v. Wrightwood Dairy, 315 U.S. 110, 118-119 (1942), and especially Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 121-129 (1942).

[1482] District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 576-578, 598-605 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court).

Union" when they are "call[ed] forth".[1483] To be sure, the President, too, is under the specific institutional duty as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia" "to execute the Laws of the Union" when the Militia are "call[ed] forth" for that purpose, as well as being under the general duty as President at all times to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed".[1484] But in the circumstances posited here, whether in truth he were doing so would be squarely at issue. Due process of law would discountenance the President's acting as "a judge in his own case", particularly when he was the apparent defendant who stood to benefit, to the public's detriment, from a mistaken or jury-rigged ruling in his own favor.[1485] And the exigency of the circumstances would admit of no recourse other than for the Militia themselves to "execute the Laws of the Union" when they were purportedly "call[ed] forth", by determining whether that summons itself were constitutional.

For the Militia to assume this responsibility would be especially fitting as well. After all, the Militia consist of WE THE PEOPLE in essentially their entirety—the only part of the federal system that does.[1486] And as Blackstone observed, "whenever a question arises between the society at large and any magistrate vested with powers originally delegated by that society, it must be decided by the voice of the society itself: there is not upon earth any other tribunal to resort to".[1487] Moreover, "by Authority of the good People of the[ ] Colonies" the Declaration of Independence was "solemnly publishe[d]", and WE THE PEOPLE "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution"[1488]—and "[t]he power to enact carries with it final authority to declare the meaning of the legislation",[1489] which authority must be exercised whenever that meaning is seriously at issue.

In addition, "the Militia of the several States" have their own chain of command that enables them to function with complete constitutional authority and autonomy even if the link to a rogue President is broken perforce of his own misdeeds. For when the Militia are not "called into the actual Service of the United States", they are subject to the commands of only their own "Officers"—because the Constitution "reserv[es] to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers".[1490]

[1483] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1484] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1; art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; and art. II, § 3.

[1485] See, e.g., Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927).

[1486] Having a claim on individuals as young as sixteen years of age, the Militia include many persons who are not eligible to vote. See, e.g., U.S. Const. amend. XXVI. And, with respect even to those who may vote, voting is not compulsory, whereas service in the Militia is.

[1487] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 212.

[1488] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1489] Propper v. Clark, 337 U.S. 472, 484 (1949).

[1490] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

Besides this constitutional authority and autonomy, "the Militia of the several States" wield the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[1491] And presumably their members—WE THE PEOPLE themselves—possess the intestinal fortitude to use that power, the moral fibre not to misuse it, as well as the common sense and self-interest to realize that, if they fail to use it or succeed only in misusing it, they will cut their own throats, perhaps literally.

Therefore, the requirement of "actual Service" authorizes the Militia, on explicit constitutional grounds, to ascertain by and for themselves whether any purported commands from a possibly rogue President relate, in law and fact at that time, to genuine "Service" in the real National interest—that is, the National interest as WE THE PEOPLE understand it—or instead to some spurious, pretended, or feigned "Service" in furtherance of an unconstitutional agenda. This reflects and reinforces the Second Amendment's declaration of the Militia's purpose: "the security of a free State", a "State" in which WE THE PEOPLE really and genuinely govern themselves, particularly with respect to the critical decision to employ their own martial force. Inasmuch as the Militia, in and through the performance of their rightful functions, are "necessary to the security of a free State", they have an absolute constitutional duty, as well as an absolute constitutional right, to refuse to accede to commands from a rogue President that are unrelated to, let alone contradictory of, "the actual Service of the United States", because such commands must be subversive or even destructive of "a free State".

More than that, if Militiamen are "called into the [seeming, pretended, or feigned, rather than the] actual[,] Service of the United States", they become the subjects of an unconstitutional act committed in their very presences and against their very persons, as well as against the institutions they serve, because that false call attempts to inveigle them individually and instrumentally into an illegal enterprise, as both victims and accomplices.[1492] In those circumstances, to perform "the actual Service of the United States" they must wield the authority and take up the responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union" on their own then and there—both in self-defense and in vindication of their respective States and of the United States—against the perpetrators of that improper call, along with all of the latters' co-conspirators, henchmen, and hangers-on, whoever they may be.

(2) The Constitution expects similar self-reliance from an individual Militiaman whom some rogue public officials might threaten with being "held to answer for a[n alleged] capital, or otherwise infamous crime" but without "a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury", on the grounds that the Militiaman was supposedly subject to some species of "martial law" because of purportedly being

---

[1491] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1492] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242, and 1961 et seq.

"in actual service in time of War or public danger"—when in fact he was not.[1493] Presumably, such a kangaroo trial would be conducted before a trumped-up "military commission" or other junta composed of rogue officers from the regular Armed Forces. If the civilian courts were doing their duty, the Militiaman arguably could obtain an injunction against such an unconstitutional proceeding. But if the courts would not defend him (for fear of, or in complicity with, the tyrannous régime), his brethren in the Militia would step forward to quash the proceeding in one way or another. No one would be better situated than they to recognize its illegality.

(a) Even "actual service" would not always expose a Militiaman to some variety of "martial law". For example, in 1755 Virginia "rais[ed] and maintain[ed] three compa[n]ies of men * * * to be employed as rangers, for the protection of the subjects in the frontiers", who "shall not be sent out of this colony, nor incorporated with the soldiers * * * [in the Colony's regular armed forces], or made subject to martial law"{EN-1964}—proving that active service in the Militia does not necessarily subject Militiamen to "martial law". So, even if Congress could "provide * * * for governing [through martial law] such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States",[1494] the remainder of the States' Militia, not in such "Service", would be immune from such "govern[ance]".[1495]

(b) With respect to the General Government, a Militiaman's "actual service in time of War or other public danger" can entail no more than his "actual service" directed towards one or more of the three purposes constitutionally allowable for "calling forth the Militia": namely, "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions".[1496] Obviously, "War" would encompass a formal "Invasion".[1497] But "War" also could include certain violations of "the Laws of the Union" and "Insurrections" that descend to the Constitution's definition of "Treason": namely, "levying War against the[United States], or * * * adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort".[1498] "[P]ublic danger", then, would include only violations of "the Laws of the Union" and "Insurrections" of lesser magnitude than "Treason", because these are the only circumstances other than "Invasions" that allow the Militia to be "call[ed] forth". To be sure, with respect to the States, "War" is also "War", but "public danger" could extend beyond

---

[1493] See U.S. Const. amend. V.

[1494] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1495] On the problems with various definitions of "martial law", see post, Chapter 48.

[1496] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1497] Unless it could be exposed as the aggressive foreign policy of some other nation, an informal "invasion", such as now assaults the United States through the influx of aliens not legally entitled to enter, would constitute only multiple violations of "the Laws of the Union".

[1498] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

violations of "the Laws of the Union" and "Insurrections", because the States may deploy their Militia within their own territories for any legitimate purpose of "homeland security".[1499] But Militiamen presumably have far less to fear from rogue public officials in their own States' governments, where the wrongdoers are initially deterred by their exposure to direct electoral control, than from a gang of villainous officeholders in the General Government, the composition of which a minority of the States cannot change by their own citizens' votes alone.

(3) The Constitution contains further confirmation of these conclusions. Besides the adjective "actual", the adverb "actually" also appears therein, and to the same effect: namely, "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay".[1500] Once again, examples of just such usage can be found in Virginia's and Rhode Island's *pre-*constitutional statutes.{EN-1965} The Constitution's purpose here is plain enough. "War" should be waged only upon a formal "declar[ation]" from Congress, as the representative of all the States with respect to the rest of the world.[1501] Therefore, Congress must first extend its "Consent" by such a "declar[ation]", and perhaps further permission and direction, before any State may "engage in War". Unless the State's own self-defense is necessary, in which case no Congressional "Consent" need be sought, because Congress could never rightfully exercise the privilege to deny "Consent". For, as Blackstone observed, "[s]elf defence * * * , as it is justly called the primary law of nature, so it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[1502]

Who, though, in such a situation is to judge whether self-defense is necessary, and how to provide it, if not the victim of aggression? Whether a State has been "actually invaded, or [is] in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay" must be for the State herself to determine at that very moment, because otherwise inadmissible "delay" would ensue while the State sought the superfluous "Consent of Congress". And, of course, each State's premier self-defense force is (or should be) her Militia. In fact, the Constitution presumes that a State's Militia will be the force that first engages in "War" if and when the State is "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay". For "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace".[1503] And if, suddenly and unexpectedly, a State is "invaded", or put into "imminent Danger" of invasion, no opportunity will be available for her to obtain "the Consent of [1499] That the Fifth Amendment does apply in full to the States, see, e.g., W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Volume 2, Chapters XXX through XXXII. See post, at 1519-1523.

---

[1500] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3 (emphasis supplied).

[1501] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 11.

[1502] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

[1503] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

Congress" (if such "Consent" has not already been given) for the purpose of raising "Troops" or launching "Ships" to oppose the invasion in a timely manner. The only force available for her defense will be that State's own Militia.

Congress indeed has the power, the right, and the duty to "call[ ] forth the Militia" of some States to "repel Invasions" in other States; but no involvement of Congress is necessary to "call[ ] forth the Militia" of the State being violated in order to "repel [an] Invasion[ ]" of her own territory, because the Constitution itself reserves to each such State the power to "engage in War, [when] actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay".[1504] Being required by the Constitution itself, without reference to any "Consent of Congress", to exist and always to remain "well regulated" for the State's "security",[1505] each State's Militia is uniquely authorized by "the supreme Law of the Land"[1506] to defend that State on its own recognizance and by its own actions. Being in the right spot at the right time, each State's Militia is uniquely positioned to ascertain whether its State "has been actually invaded, or [is] in * * * imminent Danger". Being so situated, each State's Militia is uniquely responsible for deciding, then and there, how to respond to the facts on the ground before it is too late. And being "well regulated", and therefore prepared for all eventualities, each State's Militia is uniquely capable of dealing with the "Danger" until additional forces can be mustered.

[1504] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 with art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1505] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II.

[1506] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

"[T]he Militia of the several States" perform the critically important political function of enforcing WE THE PEOPLE'S sovereignty both in ordinary and especially in extraordinary times.

The Constitution incorporated the Militia into its federal structure as governmental institutions, not because they had proven to be the most efficient and effective military organizations known to *pre-*constitutional Americans, but because they alone could serve the Constitution's overriding political purpose. "A well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State"[1507] because, although in the final instrumental analysis raw "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'" in every case,[1508] political power coupled with right grows only out of the barrel of guns in the hands of virtuous people who subordinate their ambitions and appetites to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".

The Declaration of Independence asserts that it was promulgated "in the Name, and by the Authority of the good People of the[ ] Colonies"; and the Preamble to the Constitution attests that "WE THE PEOPLE * * * ordain[ed] and establish[ed] this Constitution for the United States of America". Therefore, as a matter of ink on parchment, the Militia, being "composed of the body of the people",[1509] consist of the armed executive establishments of the true sovereigns of this country. And as a matter of actual steel and lead in strong hands, the Militia enable the true sovereigns to defend their sovereignty against all enemies, translating THE PEOPLE'S claim of right into physical possession of the ground to which that right pertains. Thus, the Militia are the surest and most reliable enforcers of popular sovereignty, because they are composed and under the control of the sovereigns themselves, wielding the ultimate power of sovereignty for the ultimate ends of sovereignty.

A. "The right of restoration" defined. This is obvious enough in tranquil times, when the exercise of sovereignty will be directed towards the day-to-day maintenance of public order, responses to emergencies arising out of occasional natural or man-made disasters, and so on. But it is especially true in times of

---

[1507] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1508] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61 (emphasis supplied).

[1509] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

political turmoil. In such times, the Militia are the only instruments through which WE THE PEOPLE themselves can assert what is loosely denoted "the right of revolution". Americans are often reminded that "[b]elief in the principle of revolution is deep in our traditions" and that "the right of revolution has been and is a part of the fabric of our institutions".[1510] This phrase must be employed with circumspection, however, because the enemies of popular self-government have made no little headway in discrediting as an apparent self-contradiction the idea of WE THE PEOPLE'S right within and through their government to resist and when necessary forcibly replace rogue governmental officials. "The right of revolution" "is a part of the fabric of our institutions" if by the term "revolution" in the specifically American context one understands a process of thoroughgoing political renaissance mediated directly by THE PEOPLE for the purpose of securing their unalienable rights. This process involves: (i) recognition by THE PEOPLE of what their political rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and duties actually are; (ii) realization that rogue public officials have exceeded the legal limits on their authority; (iii) remonstrances and petitions for redress of grievances; (iv) if the wayward officials refuse to reform their conduct, then resistance to their continued rule; (v) removal of the miscreants from public office, and reversal of their policies, by whatever means prove necessary; and finally (vi) restoration of proper government, preferably in its original form but if necessary otherwise, as the circumstances may require. Thus, rather than reflecting some "anti-government" notion, the right—and, in order to render that right effective, the power and the duty—to retain, restore, and perhaps refashion a form of government that is supposed to derive its just powers (and only such powers) from the consent of the governed (and only from such consent) are actually the highest prerogatives of government of, by, and for THE PEOPLE. In America, then, a spurious "right of revolution" to overthrow an incumbent government, and install a new régime perhaps even worse than the one set aside, as has resulted from so many revolutions elsewhere in the world throughout history, does not exist. Here, THE PEOPLE enjoy "the right of restoration", which aims at correcting any corruptions in, and then permanently securing, a government of "just powers".

B. "The right of restoration" in political philosophy. At base, "the right of restoration" is nothing really remarkable, simply a people's obviously meritorious claim in justice to engage in collective acts of self-defense against rogue public officials who camouflage their misdeeds under the cloak of "law" in order to twist the real law into a shape suitable for their purposes of oppression. As Blackstone explained, the law of self-defense > considers that the future process of law is by no means an adequate remedy for injuries accompanied with force; since it is impossible to say, to what wanton lengths of rapine or cruelty outrages of this sort might be carried, unless it were permitted a man immediately to oppose one violence with another. Self-defence therefore, as it is justly called the primary law of nature, so it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society.[1511]

---

[1510] Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203, 268, 269 (1961) (Douglas, J., dissenting) The irony in these particular observations is that Scales was not an American patriot devoted in any degree to the ideals of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, but instead a communist revolutionary convicted of promoting the violent overthrow of the government of the United States in order to replace it with a Marxist totalitarian régime.

When usurpers and tyrants misuse the law in order to violate the law under color of the law, obviously "the future process of [such perverted] law is by no means an adequate remedy for injuries accompanied with force" which the victims suffer. For "the future process of [such] law" will consist simply of further insults, injuries, injustices, and iniquities, because it will rationalize as "lawful" every past and future act of official oppression and as "unlawful" every act of popular resistance to that oppression.

Usurpers and tyrants can never deprive their victims of either the individual or the collective right of self-defense, however, both because no public officials (and rogue officials least of all) can ever claim to override "the primary law of nature", and because usurpers and tyrants in particular are themselves wrongdoers under "the law of society" as well as "the * * * law of nature" and therefore cannot invoke either of those bodies of law in defense of their actions. As Algernon Sidney rightly observed, why should rogue public officials > not be deposed, if they become enemies to their people, and set up an interest in their own persons inconsistent with the publick good, for the promoting of which they were erected? If they were created by the publick consent, for the publick good, shall they not be removed when they prove to be of publick damage? If they set up themselves, may they not be thrown down? Shall it be lawful for them to usurp a power over the liberty of others, and shall it not be lawful for an injur'd people to resume their own? If injustice exalt itself, must it be forever established? Shall great persons be rendered sacred by rapine, perjury and murder? Shall the crimes for which private men do justly suffer the most grievous punishments, exempt them from all, who commit them in the highest excess, with most power, and most to the prejudice of mankind? Shall the laws that solely aim at the prevention of crimes be made to patronize them, and become snares to the innocent whom they ought to protect? Has every man given up into the common store his right of avenging the injuries he may receive, that the publick power which ought to protect or avenge him, should be turned to the destruction of himself, his posterity, and the society into which they enter, without any possibility of redress?

[1511] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

> Shall the ordinance of God be rendered of no effect; or the powers he hath appointed to be set up for the distribution of justice, be made subservient to the lusts of one or a few men, and by impunity encourage them to commit all manner of crimes? Is the corruption of man's nature so little known, that such as have common sense should expect justice from those, who fear no punishments if they do injustice[?] * * * There must therefore be a right of proceeding judicially or extrajudicially against all persons who transgress the laws; or else those laws, and the societies that should subsist by them, cannot stand; and the ends for which governments are constituted, together with the governments themselves, must be overthrown. Extrajudicial proceedings by sedition, tumult, or war, must take place, when the persons concern'd are of such power, that they cannot be brought under the judicial. They who deny this, deny all help against an usurping tyrant, or the perfidiousness of a lawfully created magistrate, who adds the crimes of ingratitude and treachery to usurpation. * * *
>
> If it be said that the word sedition implies that which is evil; I answer, that it ought not then to be applied to whose who seek nothing but that which is just; and tho the ways of delivering an oppressed people from the violence of a wicked magistrate, who having armed a crew of lewd villains, and fatted them with the blood and confiscations of such as were most ready to oppose him, be extraordinary, the inward righteousness of the act doth fully justify the authors. He that has virtue and power to save a people, can never want a right of doing it.[1512]

Nonetheless, although always in the wrong, usurpers and tyrants invariably will attempt to strip their victims of the remedy of self-defense through perversion or disregard of the law or through the application of main force notwithstanding and in open defiance of the law. Blackstone was certainly aware that such situations could occur, and actually had occurred in English history, which is why he explained that one of the five most important rights of Englishmen was > that of having arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are allowed by law. Which * * * is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.[1513]

The right "of having arms for the[people's] defence" against oppression is obviously the indispensable foundation for "the right of restoration", whenever popular

---

[1512] Discourses Concerning Government, ante note 54, at 226-227 (emphasis supplied). On Sidney's influence among patriots in the pre-constitutional era, see ante, at 26 & note 55.

[1513] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 143-144.

"resistance and self-preservation" require forcible resistance to rogue public officials, let alone the total overthrow of an entire form of government and the erection of another.

In addition, Blackstone went so far as to deny that the exercise of "the natural right of resistance" could ever amount to a crime. One "species of treason", he observed, > is, "if a man do levy war against our lord the king in his realm." And this may be done by taking arms, not only to dethrone the king, but under pretence to reform religion, or the laws, or to remove evil counsellors, or other grievances whether real or pretended. For the law does not, neither can it, permit any private man, or set of men, to interfere forcibly in matters of such high importance; especially as it has established a sufficient power, for these purposes, in the high court of parliament: neither does the constitution justify any private or particular resistance for private or particular grievances; though in cases of national oppression the nation has very justifiably risen as one man, to vindicate the original contract subsisting between the king and his people.[1514]

As long as those taking up arms were bent not simply on "private or particular resistance for private or particular grievances", but instead were intent upon rectifying political grievances stemming from "national oppression" under which their society as a whole groaned, and in so doing aimed at "vindicat[ing] the original [social] contract" (presumably by restoring its provisions in their purest form), their resistance, howsoever "forcibl[e]", would be "very justifiabl[e]".

C. "The right of restoration" in America's *pre-*constitutional experience. Although all politically and legally literate Americans in the *pre-*constitutional period were familiar with the substance of both Sidney's and Blackstone's exegeses, all observant Americans of that era would have come to the very same conclusions on their own, from personal experience. After all, all adult able-bodied free males were subject to service in the Militia of all but one of the Colonies and then all of the independent States—in which service the duty to possess arms was imposed by law. Thus, from the earliest days, Americans themselves controlled—indeed, were required by law to control—the ultimate instruments of resistance to usurpation and tyranny. Always keen to protect their liberties, they had the incentive to employ those instruments for political self-defense whenever a justifiable instance for doing so arose. And holding in their own hands the most effective remedies for usurpation and tyranny in fact, they would have extrapolated from that circumstance the right to resistance in law.

[1514] Id., Volume 4, at 81-82 (footnote omitted) (emphasis supplied).

Granted, Americans initially formed their Militia for the primary purpose of enabling them to defend the Colonies against hostile Indians and foreign enemies on behalf of their Mother Country as well as themselves. Yet, had their first concern been the need to prepare to resist domestic rogue public officials, they would have organized, armed, and disciplined themselves in Militia in the very same way, because such institutions were eminently suitable, if not indispensable, for that purpose.

Furthermore, the limitations in English law on the right "of having arms for the[people's] defence" to which Blackstone referred were always inapplicable in *pre-*constitutional America. Average Americans did not possess only such arms as were "suitable to their condition and degree"—rather, every adult able-bodied free man was required to possess at least one firearm suitable for Militia service, without concern for his personal wealth or social status. (And if his lack of economic means had precluded his purchase of a firearm, one would have been provided to him at public expense.) Average Americans did not possess only such arms as were "allowed by law"—rather, they were required to possess certain arms specified by law, and perfectly free to acquire such other arms as they desired. And average Americans' possession of firearms was never imagined to be merely "a public allowance, under due restrictions"—rather, it was a personal duty imposed and enforced by statute as far as service in the Militia was concerned, and otherwise a personal liberty with essentially no "restrictions", statutory or otherwise. So, as a matter of American law and practice, no one in America would have considered either the right and duty to resist oppression by rogue officials, or the right and duty to possess the implements necessary to that end, as in any way even arguably *extra-*legal, let alone illegal.

Although the *pre-*constitutional American Militia statutes did not explicitly invoke the people's right and duty of resistance to usurpation and tyranny, they certainly prepared the people for such resistance to the maximum degree, not just materially but also mentally and morally. For free men with firearms in their hands under the aegis of law will naturally conclude, not simply that they have the ability, but also that they have the authority, to deploy with their arms in defense of their liberties. After all, why should the remedy be available without the right it effectuates? Free men possessed of and trained to arms will never conclude that in order to secure their liberties they should proceed only without arms even though arms might be necessary, let alone should first surrender their arms to the very rogue public officials and other domestic enemies who threaten those liberties. And when the occasion for decisions and actions on that score finally arrived at the end of the *pre-*constitutional era, Americans drew precisely the correct conclusions from their decades of personal experiences in the Militia.

D. "The right of restoration" in the Declaration of Independence. When that time came, the Declaration of Independence explicitly recognized and relied upon a "right of restoration" derived from the "self-evident" "truths":

> • "that all men * * * are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights";
>
> • "[t]hat to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed";
>
> • "[t]hat whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness"; and particularly,
>
> • that "when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security".

This "right" and "duty" "to throw off [an abusive] Government, and to provide new Guards for the[People's] future security" was plainly not an unlimited "right of revolution", but instead a carefully defined and therefore constrained "right of restoration". For, although "the People", in "institu[ing] new Government", could "lay[ ] its foundations on such principles and organiz[e] its powers in such form, as to them sh[ould] seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness", nevertheless they could infuse that "new Government" only with "just powers" that comported with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". Every act of "throw[ing] off [an abusive] Government" would require a return to and restoration of the first principles of government.

In such wise, the Declaration repudiated the false and vicious dogmas of legal positivism that a governmental apparatus is anterior and superior to "the People"; that particular individuals who fortuitously happen to occupy offices in that apparatus constitute the sources and supreme judges of "law"; and that abuses and usurpations—or worse yet, outright tyranny—cannot deprive an entire "Form of Government" of its legitimacy, or particular rogue public officials of their authority. Surely, too, if the Declaration sanctioned as "self-evident" "the Right of the People to alter or to abolish" "any [abusive] Form of Government" in toto, it also recognized their lesser included right to condemn and set aside the mere adventitious statutes, judicial opinions, and other purported public acts of usurpers or tyrants—and to condemn and set aside those miscreants themselves—without "alter[ing] or * * * abolish[ing]" the basic institutions of what otherwise, in proper hands, could be a reasonably good government. Furthermore, the Declaration recognized that "the People's" need to exercise their "Right * * * to alter or to abolish" could likely arise not just from questionable statutes, judicial opinions, or other acts that amounted to mere serial acts of imprudence, oversights, or errors on the part of insouciant or incompetent public officials, but also from actual political conspiracies rogue officials and their allies hatched against "the People's" liberties in the form of "long train[s] of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object [that] evince[ ] a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism".

Most importantly, "the right of restoration" is not merely a fancy of political theorists of the *pre-*constitutional era, or the hobby horse of the windy radicals who have cropped up throughout American history thereafter, but instead constitutes the foundational precept of American law, proven by actual experience, and without which neither the Constitution of the United States, nor the constitution of any State, nor any statute enacted under color of those organic laws could claim the least validity. After all, the Declaration of Independence was "[t]he first official action of this nation", which "declared the foundation of [a new] government" on the basis of the most fundamental of all legal principles derived from "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".[1515] As such, the Declaration must have had, and must perpetually have, the full force of organic law in America.[1516] For if "[t]he first official action of this nation" had proven nugatory—if the Colonies had failed to secure the legal status the Declaration asserted for them of "Free and Independent States" with "full Power * * * to do all * * * Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do"—no one then or thereafter could rationally have contended that the patriots' revolt against the Crown and its loyal subjects rested upon any legal foundation.[1517] Therefore, the original State constitutions, the original Constitution, and the Bill of Rights all qualify as proper "laws" only because of the Declaration's legal efficacy—and only to the extent that they confirm and conform with what the Declaration itself identified as the "self-evident" "truths" of political life—including especially "the right of restoration" which forms the foundation of the entire federal edifice.

E. "The right of restoration" in the Constitution. The Constitution confirms and conforms to "the right of restoration", both implicitly and even explicitly.

1. It is impossible to conceive, let alone to believe, that the American patriots who had won their independence by overthrowing British oppression through force of arms, and whose ability to govern themselves derived from that overthrow, would a mere twelve years later have disapproved, disclaimed, and even

---

[1515] Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company v. Ellis, 165 U.S. 150, 159 (1897).

[1516] See ante, at 22-27.

[1517] See Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U.S. 176, 186 (1878).

legally denied to themselves and their progeny the "right of restoration" if and when the same circumstances described in the Declaration of Independence once again arose. After all, the Declaration recognized that "whenever any Form of Government"—not just monarchy in general or the rule of King George III in the late 1700s in particular—"becomes destructive of the[ ] ends [of Government], it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it".[1518] The Founders were too shrewd students of political science and human nature arbitrarily to exclude from the reach of this "Right of the People" an apparently representative republic, even one of their own creation. Quite the contrary: History had taught them that "Governments have their Infancy, their Meridian, and their Decay; and the Preludes to their Destruction are generally Luxury, Pride, Sloth, Prodigality, Cowardice, Irreligion, Self-interest, and an universal Neglect of the Publick".[1519] Patriots in the Founding Era were well aware, and therefore surely anticipated, that even democratically elected representatives could succumb to arrogance, avarice, ambition, and the appetite for abusive powers. So, had they desired in and through the Constitution to repudiate on behalf of themselves and their posterity "the right of restoration" which they had just broadcast to "a candid world" in order to sway "the opinions of mankind" through the Declaration of Independence, they would have done so in some explicit and unequivocal manner that unmistakably placed them at the mercy of the new governmental apparatus they created, so that any attempt at popular "revolution" (in any sense of that term) would thereafter be, if not utterly impossible, then undeniably illegal, even if rogue public officials were unquestionably guilty of the most heinous acts of usurpation and tyranny that marked them, no less than King George III, as "unfit to be the ruler[s] of a free people". For this reason, one must presume—until the contrary is proven beyond any reasonable doubt—that the Constitution does embody "the right of restoration" in some efficacious form.

2. Of course, no such proof exists. The original Constitution delegated to the General Government no license whatsoever to aggress against the States or their people, or for any of the governments of the States to aggress against their own people, or for either the General Government or the governments of the States to strip the victims of any such aggression of the legal authority or the material ability to defend themselves. To the contrary:

a. The original Constitution explicitly recognized that WE THE PEOPLE are superior to both the General Government and the States, because WE THE PEOPLE created the General Government from nothing when they "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution"[1520] and in the course of that creation diminished the preëxistent powers of the States as well.[1521] Because the General Government received its "just powers from the consent of the governed" and from no other source, it must be exposed to the legal correlative that, should it "become[ ] destructive of the[ ] ends [for which it was instituted], it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it".[1522] For those who consent may withdraw their consent when the condition upon which it was originally granted is vitiated. And so, too, for the States.

---

[1518] Emphasis supplied.

[1519] Anonymous [John Trenchard with Walter Moyle], THE SECOND PART OF AN ARGUMENT, Shewing, that a STANDING ARMY Is inconsistent with a Free Government, and absolutely destructive to the Constitution of the English Monarchy (London, England: [no publisher identified] 1697), at 17-18.

b. Moreover, the original Constitution explicitly distinguished the "Republican Form of Government" that must exist within each of the States from the State herself.[1523] And the Second Amendment then emphasized that each of the States must always remain "a free State", if necessary through the application of armed force by "the people" themselves. Because the original Constitution commanded the United States to "guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government",[1524] and because, perforce of the Second Amendment, each "Republican Form of Government" must so conduct itself as to preserve its State as "a free State"—therefore the General Government must so conduct itself as to preserve "a free State" in every State, and by extension to preserve the United States as a collective "free State". Thus, in principle, tyranny is constitutionally impossible. In addition, the fundamental principle of the original Constitution and all of its Amendments is that any act by a public official which contradicts the Constitution is unlawful.[1525] Thus, in principle, usurpation is constitutionally impossible.

To ensure this outcome in practice—when "the great difficulty" is that "you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself"[1526]—the Constitution explicitly incorporates numerous specific rights and remedies against rogue public officials' attempts at usurpation and tyranny. For instance:

> • The supremacy of the Constitution: "This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties * * * shall be the supreme Law of the Land[.]"[1527]

[1520] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1521] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10.

[1522] Declaration of Independence.

[1523] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[1524] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[1525] E.g., Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 176-178 (1803); Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886); Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 288 (1885); Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 97, 101-102 (1887); Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408-409 (1963).

[1526] The Federalist No. 51 (James Madison).

[1527] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

• Public officials' fidelity to the Constitution: "The Senators and Representatives [in Congress] * * * , and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution[.]"[1528]

• Limitations on legal immunities for public officials: "The Senators and Representatives * * * shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place."[1529] Because the Constitution recognizes no other immunities for any public officials of the General Government, no other immunities can exist. As for all of the States' officials (and for all officials of the General Government other than Members of Congress as well), they "shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution".[1530] Self-evidently, no official could be "bound" in any meaningful sense if, when he transgressed the Constitution, he could nonetheless evade punishment by interposing some purported immunity supposedly derived from his office. An "Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution", taken as a condition of holding office, cannot grant a license to violate it. Therefore, no such immunity can exist for *an*y official.

• Removal from office of rogue public officials: "The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors."[1531] "Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States[.]"[1532] "Each House [of Congress] may * * * punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member."[1533] And "[t]he Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour[.]"[1534]—the necessary implications being that such "Judges" may lose "their Offices" for "[bad] Behaviour", and that this "[bad] Behaviour" need not descend to the depth

---

[1528] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1529] U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 1.

[1530] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1531] U.S. Const. art. II, § 4.

[1532] U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 7.

[1533] U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, cl. 2.

[1534] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

of an impeachable offence (for otherwise this clause would be unnecessary).[1535]

•No permanent political superordination and subordination: "No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States[.]"[1536] And "[n]o State shall * * * grant any Title of Nobility."[1537]

•No corrupting foreign influences: "[N]o Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under the[United States], shall, without the Consent of Congress, accept any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State."[1538]

•No subversion or violent overthrow of the governments of the States: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government * * * ; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence."[1539] "[D]omestic Violence", of course, could be fomented and carried on by rogue public officials, as well as by private parties. Indeed, the former perpetrators would likely be far more dangerous than the latter if they coöpted police and other law-enforcement agencies into their conspiracies.

•Treason: "Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort."[1540] Rogue public officials are certainly capable of committing "Treason" against WE THE PEOPLE.[1541] Indeed, they are probably more capable of committing "Treason" than any other group imaginable.

•All of the provisions of the Bill of Rights.

[1535] See E. Vieira, Jr., Imperial Judiciary, ante note 188, Part II, Chapter 14.

[1536] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8.

[1537] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[1538] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8. The noun "present" means "[a] gift; a donative". S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions. And "Emolument" means "[p]rofit; advantage". Id., the only definition given in both editions. A financial contribution to a politician's campaign for any public office "under the[United States]" surely fits these definitions. So does the promotion of a candidate in the big print or electronic media through "slanted" news coverage. The same conclusion follows even if the noun "Emolument" is narrowly defined as "[t]he profit arising from office * * * ; compensation; * * * perquisites, fees, or salary". Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 485. For one reason a candidate for public office would accept foreigners' support would be to assure himself of such monetary benefits. Therefore, any such contribution or promotion made directly or indirectly by, through the influence of, or for the ultimate benefit of, any "foreign State" violates the Constitution. The present statutory curbs and controls on these practices, however, are woefully insufficient. See 22 U.S.C. § 611 et seq. and 11 C.F.R. § 110.20.

[1539] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[1540] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

[1541] See ante, at 814-821.

• The President's duty to enforce the laws: "[H]e shall take Care that the Laws by faithfully executed[.]"[1542]

• The Militia's authority and responsibility: Congress is "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union" and "suppress Insurrections".[1543] Beyond doubt, rogue public officials—whether civilian, military, or both—can violate "the Laws of the Union" and participate in widespread "Insurrections".[1544]

All of these rights and remedies deter wrongdoing by rogue public officials, protect against the effects of such wrongdoing as does occur, and ultimately by suppressing that wrongdoing restore the situation to the status quo ante. Therefore, they are rights and remedies of "restoration"—not rights and remedies to be applied only in extremis "to alter or to abolish" a "Form of Government [which has] become[ ] destructive of the[ ] ends" for which it was "instituted" by "the consent of the governed",[1545] but instead rights and remedies to put into proper order and preserve the present government in its present "Form" in accordance with "the [original] consent of the governed". For that reason, this could be called the enforcement of "the right of restoration" in its ordinary aspect.

In the normal course of events, these remedies would be enforced by officials or agencies of the General Government other than the President and the Militia "call[ed] forth" to "be employed in the Service of the United States" "to execute the Laws of the Union" and "suppress Insurrections".[1546] But most if not all of these remedies also could be enforced, even in the first instance, by "calling forth the Militia" under the President's command. For the United States Code now provides that "[w]henever the President considers that unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages, or rebellion against the authority of the United States, make it impracticable to enforce the laws of the United States in any State by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, he may call into Federal service such of the Militia of any State * * * as he considers necessary to enforce those laws or suppress the rebellion".[1547] Thus, it would be for the President to decide, in the course of fulfilling his duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed",[1548] whether the situation warranted "calling forth the Militia". Even were the center of the "unlawful obstructions, combinations or assemblages, or rebellion against the

---

[1542] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[1543] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1544] Compare Texas v. White, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 700, 718-726 (1868), with 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[1545] Declaration of Independence.

[1546] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[1547] 15 U.S.C. § 332.

[1548] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

authority of the United States" located uniquely within the District of Columbia, among rogue public officials and within rogue agencies of the General Government, this statute would still apply, because the effect of the center's malign operations would undoubtedly be to "make it impracticable to enforce the laws of the United States in [one or more] State[s]".

3. What, however, if in instance after instance these rights of restoration had proven to be unenforceable because rogue public officials had refused to apply the remedies, so that at length the entire General Government were taken over by usurpers and aspiring tyrants—thoroughly permeated with "unlawful obstructions, combinations or assemblages, or rebellion against the authority of the United States"—and being run as a "racketeering enterprise" engaged in the systematic "terrorism" of "government * * * by intimidation" directed against WE THE PEOPLE,[1549] perhaps even to the extent that the General Government's para-military police-state apparatus could fairly be described as actually committing "Treason" by "levying War against the United States" in the persons of huge numbers of its victims among average Americans?[1550] And what if this were the product of a massive flow of campaign contributions by political-action committees, and an incessant drumbeat of political propaganda and agitation by the big media, all orchestrated by some "foreign State" and its helpers within America, which had turned most Members of Congress and the President into mere marionettes of and mouthpieces for that foreign power—such that WE THE PEOPLE had little to no chance to overcome the corruption either through "petition[ing] the Government for a redress of grievances"[1551] or through the ballot-box? Even if they were not sympathizers or otherwise stooges of that "foreign State", the judges would probably find themselves helpless to correct the problem, because the Pinocchio in the White House would not allow the Department of Justice to bring civil actions or criminal prosecutions to enforce any part of "the right of restoration" in its ordinary aspect. And as the chief malefactor in the "unlawful obstruction[ ], combination[ ], or assemblage[ ] into which the General Government had degenerated, the disloyal President would not command the Militia to support the Constitution, but instead would try to coöpt, cajole, or coerce them into serving the conspiracy. In such a situation, Americans would have to resort to "the right of restoration" in its extraordinary aspect.

a. True enough, the original Constitution did not explicitly address any "right of restoration"—that is, "the Right of the People to alter or to abolish" the "Form of Government [when it] becomes destructive of the[ ] ends" for which it [1549] Compare 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961(1)(G), (4), and (5); 1962(b) and (d); and 1963(a), with Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1489.

---

[1550] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1. See ante, at 814-821.

[1551] U.S. Const. amend. I.

was instituted,[1552] or even the lesser-included "Right of the People" to prevent, correct, and punish widespread official criminality, and thereby avoid having "to alter or to abolish" the entire "Form of Government" itself. But the apparent silence of the original Constitution on this score did not obviate the problem that, if so many officials of the General Government turned rogue that the normal processes of investigation, prosecution, adjudication, and punishment of political malefactors—or their replacements through the electoral process—proved unavailing, then either: (i) The present "Form of Government" of the United States must be deemed to have failed, this country must revert into essentially the situation of political flux that immediately preceded the Declaration of Independence, and WE THE PEOPLE must endeavor to set up an entirely new government in the course of what will surely amount to a civil war. Or (ii) THE PEOPLE must find somewhere within the present "Form of Government" a right enforceable through the States or at their own hands to indict, try, and execute judgment upon rogue officials. The former alternative being unacceptable on its face, the latter must be adopted if any legal justification for doing so can be found. And certainly the original Constitution itself encouraged the belief that such a justification exists. For the Preamble asserted that one of its goals was "to form a more perfect Union"—not to suffer the Union to fly to pieces because faithless or feckless public officials fail, neglect, or refuse to administer it properly. The Preamble asserted that another of its goals was "to * * * establish Justice"—which is impossible of attainment so long as rogue officials can cover up their wrongdoing, and even when exposed can immunize and exonerate themselves from punishment. The Preamble asserted that yet another of its goals was "to * * * insure domestic Tranquility"—which must remain a hopeless fantasy while rogue officials construct and deploy a nationwide para-military police-state apparatus, effectively "levying War" upon common Americans. And the Preamble asserted that perhaps its most important goal was "to * * * secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"—which the existence of rogue officialdom as an inoperable cancer in the body politic renders inconceivable.

b. Moreover, the apparent silence of the original Constitution with respect to "the right of restoration" is only apparent. If the original Constitution was less than pellucid on this score, the Bill of Rights clarified the situation. For "[t]he first ten amendments to the Constitution * * * were adopted in order to quiet the apprehension of many that without some such declaration of rights the government would assume, and might be held to possess, the power to trespass upon those rights of persons and property which by the Declaration of Independence were affirmed to be unalienable rights".[1553] The Declaration asserted that, "as Free and

---

[1552] Declaration of Independence.

[1553] Monongahela Navigation Company v. United States, 148 U.S. 312, 324 (1893).

Independent States, the[Colonies] ha[d] full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do". Perforce of the original Constitution, WE THE PEOPLE required the States to surrender some of these "full Power[s]" conditionally or unconditionally;[1554] or to share authority concurrently with the General Government, subject to the latter's supremacy in appropriate situations.[1555]

Nonetheless, as the Tenth Amendment witnesses, THE PEOPLE did not indiscriminately strip the States—or especially their citizens—of all "Power[s] * * * to do all * * * Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do". To the contrary, that Amendment explicitly recognizes and guarantees that "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." And through "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", the Second Amendment secures to "the people" the means to make effective those prohibitions of power to the United States and those reservations of power "to the States respectively, or to the people".

One right central to the Declaration of Independence which WE THE PEOPLE never surrendered—and never could have surrendered—either to the United States or to the States is "the right of restoration": "the Right of the People to alter or to abolish" an abusive "Form of Government" "and to institute new Government"; "their right, * * * their duty, to throw off [an abusive] Government" by force of arms (threatened or actual), and "to provide new Guards for their future security". Because "the good People" of America were entitled under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" "to throw off" the abusive "Form of Government" of the British Empire under which they lived in order to become citizens of "Free and Independent States" of their own with entirely new "Form[s] of Government", then as citizens of those "Free and Independent States", and of the Union those States comprise, they remain no less entitled, under similar circumstances, "to throw off" their new "Form[s] of Government", too. For "the good People" of America derived then, and still derive today, the authority "to throw off [an abusive] Government", [1554] Compare the Declaration's reference to the States' powers of "levy[ing] War, conclud[ing] Peace, [and] contract[ing] Alliances" with the Constitution's prohibitions on these matters—U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3 ("[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * enter into any Agreement or Compact * * * with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay"), and art. I, § 10, cl. 1 ("[n]o State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation"); and with the Constitution's corresponding grants of authority to the General Government—U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 11 (exclusive power of Congress "[t]o declare War"), and art. II, § 2, cl. 2 (joint power of the President and the Senate "to make Treaties").

---

[1555] Compare the Declaration's reference to the States' "establish[ing] Commerce" with Congress's power under the Constitution "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes". U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3; and art. VI, cl. 2. See, e.g., Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 53 U.S. (12 Howard) 299, 315-321 (1851); Simpson v. Shepard (Minnesota Rate Cases), 230 U.S. 352, 397-412 (1913).

not from the laws of any "Free and Independent State[ ]", but from "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", the rights and obligations of which no people may ever "throw off". And because "the good People" always retain the right and the duty "to throw off [an abusive] Government" entirely, they necessarily always retain the right and the duty to correct, dislodge, and punish rogue public officials and to amend, repeal, or simply set aside those officials' improper acts taken under color of law, thereby restoring "the good People['s]" "Form of Government" to its original pristine condition, so that it need not be "thrown off" after all.

True enough, in the original Constitution WE THE PEOPLE delegated a partial "duty of restoration" to the General Government, in the requirement that "[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and * * * against domestic Violence".[1556] And, of course, this duty necessarily implies a right in the General Government to defend and if necessary reinstate a "Republican Form of Government" in any State in which that "Form of Government" has been attacked or torn down, along with the ancillary powers sufficient to fulfill that duty and enforce that right.[1557] So, should rogue public officials attempt to subvert or overthrow by force the "Republican Form of Government" of a State, or to achieve the same end by surrendering their State to foreign invaders, the General Government would share in THE PEOPLE'S "right of restoration", as their designated agent. Nonetheless, in such a situation, the Constitution foresees THE PEOPLE'S direct participation in the process. For subversion of a State's "Republican Form of Government" would doubtlessly involve multiple violations of "the Laws of the Union" as well as of that State; "domestic Violence" sufficient to threaten the "Republican Form of Government" itself would doubtlessly amount to "Insurrection[ ]" of one form or another; and an "Invasion" would doubtlessly put the "Republican Form of Government" in jeopardy, whether it manifested itself in a direct attack by foreign armed forces, a Volkerwanderung by masses of illegal aliens, or the capture of the governmental apparatus by foreign agents of influence and their home-grown helpers—and for each of those troubles, let alone any combination of them, the Constitution authorizes the Militia to be "call[ed] forth".[1558] Yet, even in the case of an assault on a State's "Republican Form of Government", THE PEOPLE could not have delegated the entirety of the right, the duty, and the allied powers of restoration to the United States, because rogue public officials within the General Government itself, as well as within the State, might be among the villains against whom THE PEOPLE would have to contend—and so many of them, in so many important positions, that for all intents and purposes the

---

[1556] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[1557] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[1558] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

General Government and the government of the State would be in abeyance in fact, whatever their formal existences in law.[1559]

Beyond doubt, too, THE PEOPLE must have delegated part of "the right of restoration" to their States, for assertion against rogue officials within the General Government, that being the very pattern by which that right was first exercised against the British government directly under the Declaration of Independence. Yet, once again, not the entirety of that right could have been delegated, because THE PEOPLE might find themselves confronted by a plethora of rogue officials in both the General Government and the States. So, the balance of "the right of restoration" applicable in such dire situations THE PEOPLE must have retained for themselves—out of self-evident necessity, there being no one else who would or could exercise that right on their behalf if both the General Government and the States became infested with rogue officials. That is, some sufficient part of "the Right of the People" under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" to "throw off [an abusive] Government" must always remain in the People's hands, to be exercised by them directly.

Thus, applying the constitutional taxonomy of the Tenth Amendment, if the General Government refuses to "call[ ] forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union", because its offices are under the control of rogues, then the power "delegated to the United States" for that purpose has been rendered temporarily dormant. (For no power can be delegated both for use and for the abuse of non-use precisely when it should be used.) Under those circumstances, though, the power of the States to call forth "the Militia of the several States" has not been "prohibited by [the Constitution] to the States", so it must be "reserved to the States respectively". And if the States' governments refuse to call forth the Militia, because their offices, too, have been captured by rogues, then the States' power as well has been rendered temporarily dormant. At that point, the only parties who still possess any legitimate reserved power with respect to the Militia are "the people" themselves. Indeed, in this eventuality, when every other form of legal control over rogue public officials has failed, it would be WE THE PEOPLE'S constitutional duty to call themselves forth in their Militia, under their own command, because that would be the only way in which the constitutional authority and responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union" and "suppress Insurrections" could be exercised and fulfilled. Otherwise, by standing idly by, THE PEOPLE would render themselves accomplices to rogue officialdom's wrongdoing: Nam qui non prohibet cum prohibere possit iubet.[1560] In fact, any American who did stand idly by could rightly be deemed a traitor, because his inaction would amount to "adhering to the[PEOPLE'S] Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort".[1561] Yet, in calling themselves forth in their [1559] Compare Texas v. White, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 700, 718-726 (1868).

---

[1560] "For he who does not prohibit [something] when he can prohibit [it thereby] commands [or ratifies] it."

[1561] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

own Militia, THE PEOPLE would obviously not be claiming any "right of revolution", because they would proceed according to and in vindication of the Constitution, not in disregard or violation of it. The power THE PEOPLE asserted—ultimately by appeal to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" through the Declaration of Independence—they would employ to protect and preserve, not to "throw off", the Constitution.

4. In light of the foregoing, it would be bootless for rogue officials to complain of any alleged "irregularity" in THE PEOPLE'S self-deployment in their Militia. For, as Algernon Sidney taught America's patriots of the *pre-*constitutional era, a rogue official > cannot be protected by the law which he has overthrown, nor obtain impunity for his crimes from the authority that was conferred upon him, only that he might do good with it.

>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * The law that gives the power, regulates it; and they who give no more than what they please, cannot be obliged to suffer him to whom they give it, to take more than they thought fit to give, or to go unpunished if he do. The agreements made are always confirmed by oath, and the treachery of violating them is consequently aggravated by perjury.[1562]

Neither could rogue officials rightfully complain that THE PEOPLE lacked authority to set themselves up as judges. For, to the question of "who shall judge, whether [public officials] perform[their] duty, or whether [they] govern[ ] tyrannically? Can the people be judge in their own cause?" Burlamaqui answered that "[i]t certainly belongs to those who have given any person a power, which he had not of himself, to judge whether he uses it agreeably to the end for which it was given him".[1563] In which answer Blackstone concurred—"whenever a question arises between the society at large and any magistrate vested with powers originally delegated by that society, it must be decided by the voice of the society itself: there is not upon earth any other tribunal to resort to".[1564]

F. "The right of restoration" effective because reliant upon WE THE PEOPLE in the Militia. Nonetheless, an important distinction does exist between "the right of restoration" as it had to be asserted at the time of the Declaration of Independence and as it can be asserted today under the Constitution. Not, of course, that the exercise of that right in some significant degree may never become

---

[1562] Discourses Concerning Government, ante note 54, at 223, 225. Compare U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1563] THE PRINCIPLES OF POLITIC LAW, ante note 1025, Part II, Chapter VI, § XXXIV, at 132.

[1564] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 212.

necessary in modern times. The Declaration takes it for granted that "any Form of Government [can] become[ ] destructive of the[ ] ends" for which proper "Governments are instituted among Men"—and not on the basis of a single historically peculiar incident alone, but rather on general grounds that have applied, and always will apply, throughout the sad chronicle of humanity's political failures and folly. America's Founding Fathers may not have had the advantage of the succinct statement in the now-familiar epigram that "all power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely".[1565] But they certainly shared the insight that epigram encapsulates and that their own personal experiences validated: namely, that the more political power can be misused without swift, sure, and severe exposure of and repercussions to the malefactors, the more it will be; and the more public offices will be colonized by individuals who lust to pervert those positions to the vilest ends of usurpation and tyranny—until sociopaths and psychopaths infest, subvert, and at length come to dominate the governmental apparatus to society's sorrow.[1566]

The Founders' approach to a solution of this problem was to surround and infuse the governmental apparatus, at every level, with interlocking "checks and balances". As James Madison correctly observed, > the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers [of government] in the same department consists in giving to those who administer each department the necessary constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments of the others. The provision for defense must * * * be made commensurate to the danger of attack. Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interests of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place. It may be a reflection on human nature that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government. But what is government itself but the greatest of all reflections on human nature? If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself. A dependence on the people is, no doubt, the primary control on the government; but experience has taught mankind the necessity of auxiliary precautions.[1567]

[1565] John E.E. Dalberg-Acton, Essays in Religion, Politics, and Morality [Volume III of Selected Writings of Lord Acton, J. Rufus Fears, Editor] (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Fund, Inc., 1988), at 519.

[1566] See, e.g., Andrew M. Łobaczewski, Political Ponerology: A Science on the Nature of Evil Adjusted for Political Purposes (Grande Prairie, Alberta, Canada: Red Pill Press, Second Edition, 2006).

[1567] The Federalist No. 51.

Of course, Madison focused narrowly on "checks and balances" between and within the General Government and the States:

> In the compound republic of America, the power surrendered by the people is first divided between two distinct governments, and then the portion allotted to each subdivided among distinct and separate departments. Hence a double security arises to the rights of the people. The different governments will control each other, at the same time that each will be controlled by itself.[1568]

To render his prescription more useful, though, he should have concentrated his attentions on "the power [not] surrendered by the people". For, in the final analysis, a "dependence on the people" is the only reliable "check and balance". Inasmuch as "Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed",[1569] and from nowhere else, there is nothing in the material world beyond "the people" upon which anyone can rely to control governmental personnel when they go awry.

To be sure, in the first instance a "dependence on the people" can be achieved through reliance on "the republican principle", under which the people elect representatives to administer their governments.[1570] This reliance remains realistic, however, only while elections are conducted honestly. But when, as is the case today, "two" professional political parties enjoy oligopolistic control of the electoral process—when these "two" parties invariably cater to factions and other selfish special interests, disdainful of "the general Welfare"—when the big media, controlled by some of the same factions, spew out little more than rank propaganda, agitation, and disinformation in support of "the party line"—and especially when rampant, systematic, and officially condoned fraud corrupts the elections themselves—then something more than "the republican principle" is needed, because "the republican principle" has been thoroughly subverted and turned against itself to its own destruction.[1571] In addition, even if the contemporary political-party system were not corrupt, and elections often rigged, something more than "the republican principle" would always be needed between elections. For individuals who appear to be acceptable candidates can turn rogue once safely ensconced in public office—and then during their terms can inflict perhaps

---

[1568] Id.

[1569] Declaration of Independence.

[1570] A republic is "a government in which the scheme of representation takes place". The Federalist No. 10 (James Madison).

[1571] With good reason, some observers would describe this situation as one of truly monopolistic control, because the "two" parties and their adherents and allies really form but a single party that exhibits two different faces, for the purpose of duping the electorate into imagining that voters enjoy a meaningful "choice" among candidates.

irreparable harm on the community, unless somehow restrained before the next election supervenes. And although a "check and balance" such as impeachment, conviction, and removal from and disqualification for any future office might suffice in the case of one or a few such miscreants,[1572] it can hardly be expected to provide relief when a majority of the legislature administering that remedy is itself composed of rogues.

One form—and only one form—of "dependence on the people" does not suffer from these disadvantages: namely, "dependence on the people" in their capacity as the Militia:

> • The Militia do not trace their existences and authority to the outcomes of elections of any kind.
>
> • The Militia are permanent "department[s]" of government, exercising full constitutional authority within both the General Government and the States, yet in extremis independent of all of them.
>
> • The members of the Militia all share "the necessary * * * personal motives to resist encroachments" by rogue public officials, factions, and special-interest groups: namely, to maintain "the security of a free State" in which they may exercise to the fullest degree their "unalienable Rights" to "Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness".[1573] And those "personal motives" are inextricably "connected with the constitutional rights of the place", because such is the constitutional responsibility, authority, and ability of the Militia as institutions of government.
>
> • The Militia enjoy "the necessary constitutional means * * * to resist encroachments" by rogue public officials, factions, and special-interest groups: namely, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms".[1574]
>
> • The Militia's "provision for defense" is "commensurate to the danger of attack", because "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[1575] And,
>
> • The Militia are the only institutions capable in extremis of making good on the principle that, "[i]f the representatives of the people betray their constituents, there is then no resource left but in the exertion of that original right of self-defense which is paramount to all positive forms of government".[1576] So,

---

[1572] See, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5 and § 3, cls. 6 and 7; and art. II, § 4.

[1573] U.S. Const. amend. II and Declaration of Independence.

[1574] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1575] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1576] The Federalist No. 28 (Alexander Hamilton).

• Although in form one part of the government appears to serve as a "check and balance" on the rest—thus not avoiding Madison's paradox that "you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself"—in substance the problem is completely solved, because the Militia are the only parts of the government that are at the same time outside of and always superior to the government, because they are composed of the source (in human terms) of all governmental authority, WE THE PEOPLE themselves.

Therefore, as long as THE PEOPLE keep a firm grasp on "th[is] power [not] surrendered by the people"—remaining organized, armed, and disciplined in the Militia, and always willing to employ the Militia for their intended purposes—they will live in "a free State", with a properly controlled government.

WE THE PEOPLE retained a firm hold over this power at the time of the Declaration of Independence. Today, in legal principle their grip is even more secure. Immediately preceding the Declaration, "the good People of the[ ] Colonies" defended themselves through their Militia in an arguably *extra-*legal manner. The Militia were establishments settled and regulated by statute, and as such integral parts of the British Colonial governments. But in standing up to rogue officials, "the good People" were soon driven to overthrow the authority of the British government in America, not to preserve, perfect, and protect it. (Although one could conclude that they nevertheless did preserve, perfect, and protect the best parts of the British "constitution" and the most valuable of the traditional "rights of Englishmen".) In the course of that struggle, the Militia had to accept the charge of illegality within the British political system in order to achieve legality within the new American political system. Now, distinguishably, "the Militia of the several States" are permanent constitutional establishments. So any actions they might be compelled to take against rogue public officials would occur fully within the present political system, justified by the highest law, and empowered under the authority delegated to the Militia "to execute the Laws of the Union".[1577] For that reason, contemporary Americans need never again face the situation that confronted the Founding Fathers, in which (as the Declaration of Independence attested) their "Form of Government" had failed, and could not be resuscitated and renovated, but needed to be replaced with something entirely new.

G. "The right of restoration" protective, not destructive, of the Constitution. Critics will carp that no "right of revolution"—even understood precisely as a "right of restoration"—can exist within the Constitution, because if WE THE PEOPLE could assert a true "right of revolution" then public officials would labor under a corresponding "duty" to allow the "revolution" to succeed, which would be to accede to anarchy and thereby destroy the Constitution. Setting themselves up as superior to public officials, THE PEOPLE could take the government into their own hands, and thus supersede the present "Form" of government, whenever they saw fit. This criticism mistakes the true political relationship between THE PEOPLE and their government. WE THE PEOPLE always have been, are, and always will be superior to public officials. THE PEOPLE are the permanent principals in the political system—the sovereigns—while public officials are merely THE PEOPLE'S temporary agents. Officials merely "represent", and therefore can never rule, THE PEOPLE in any way. THE PEOPLE never need to "take the government into their own hands", because in a self-governing society as a matter of final authority and responsibility the government is already in their hands at all times. Upon occasion, THE PEOPLE may need to wrest the day-to-day workings of the governmental apparatus from the grasps of rogue public officials. The question then becomes, however, not whether THE PEOPLE enjoy the absolute right to take such action (which they do), but in what manner they should exercise their authority. The issue is one, not of power, but of prudence. So, in resisting and repelling the aggression of rogue public officials and removing them from the offices they were abusing, THE PEOPLE would not destroy the present "Form of Government", but instead would vindicate it—for the right, power, and duty of THE PEOPLE to defend themselves against "a long train of abuses and usurpations" by rogue officials form the legal foundation upon which the Declaration of Independence declares that every legitimate "Form of Government" stands.

---

[1577] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

Criticism of "the right of restoration" is also anachronistic. It reads into the Constitution of the United States the essential but defective principle of the British "constitution", and thus reads out of the Constitution the essential and curative principle of the Declaration of Independence. Americans' fundamental complaint against the English "Form of Government" in *pre-*constitutional days was that Parliament, although composed of the people's mere "representatives", nevertheless claimed to be supreme and uncontrollable. As Blackstone approvingly explained the situation, > [T]HE power and jurisdiction of parliament * * * is so transcendent and absolute, that it cannot be confined, either for causes or persons, within any bounds. * * * It hath sovereign and uncontrollable authority in making, confirming, enlarging, restraining, abrogating, repealing, reviving, and expounding of laws, concerning matters of all possible denominations, ecclesiastical, or temporal, civil, military, maritime, or criminal: this being the place where that absolute despotic power, which must in all governments reside somewhere, is entrusted by the constitution of these kingdoms. * * * It can change and create afresh even the constitution of the kingdom and of parliaments themselves * * * . It can, in short, do every thing that is not naturally impossible * * * .

> True it is, that what the parliament doth, no authority upon earth can undo. So that it is a matter most essential to the liberties of this kingdom, that such members be delegated to this important trust, as are most eminent for their probity, their fortitude, and their knowledge; for it was a known apothegm * * * "that England could never be ruined but by a parliament:" and * * * this being the highest and greatest court, over which none other can have jurisdiction in the kingdom, if by any means a misgovernment should any way fall upon it, the subjects of this kingdom are left without all manner of remedy. * * *
>
> IT must be owned that Mr. Locke, and other theoretical writers, have held, that "there remains still inherent in the people supreme power to remove or alter the legislative, when they find the legislative act contrary to the trust reposed in them: for when such trust is abused, it is therefore forfeited, and devolves to those who gave it."[1578] But however just this conclusion may be in theory, we cannot adopt it, nor argue from it, under any dispensation of government at present actually existing. For this devolution of power, to the people at large, includes in it a dissolution of the whole form of government established by that people; reduces all the members to their original state of equality; and, by annihilating the sovereign power, repeals all positive laws whatsoever before enacted. No human laws will therefore suppose a case, which at once must destroy all law, and compel men to build afresh upon a new foundation; nor will they make provision for so desperate an event, as must render all legal proceedings ineffectual. So long therefore as the English constitution lasts, we may venture to affirm, that the power of parliament is absolute and without control.[1579]

Americans of that era could not and would not accept, and therefore rose in defiance against, this assertion of absolute and uncontrollable governmental supremacy over the people.

Obviously, under the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, the authority of the General Government, or of any State's government, or of all of the States' governments combined, or of the General Government and all of the States' governments put together, is not "so transcendent and absolute, that it cannot be confined, either for causes or persons, within any bounds". Quite the opposite. The questions remain, though, "What institutions can keep the General Government and the governments of the States within their rightful bounds? What remedies are available to WE THE PEOPLE for 'misgovernment' when public officials turn out not to be 'the most eminent for their probity, their fortitude, and their knowledge'—but instead are exposed as ignorant, slothful, cowardly, arrogant, avaricious, ambitious, dishonest, and insolent asses?"

---

[1578] This material appears in Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XIII, § 149 and Chapter XIX, §§ 221-227 and 243.

[1579] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 160-162 (footnotes omitted).

WE THE PEOPLE can exercise their supreme political power—their sovereignty—directly against rogue public officials in three different ways: (i) on a regular basis through elections of representatives;[1580] (ii) on an irregular basis through "petition[ing] the Government for a redress of grievances";[1581] and (iii) in extraordinary circumstances through the Militia's exercise of the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[1582] (A fourth method—amendment of the Constitution—cannot be considered a direct exercise of popular sovereignty against rogue officials, because it depends entirely upon the coöperation of Congress and the States' legislatures, which may be controlled by rogues, and is a tortuous and tedious method of reform to boot .[1583]) When the voters succeed in "throwing the bums out", no one calls that turn of the electoral card a "revolution". But what happens when election after election fails to throw enough of the bums out, because the bums rig the polls—so that the ballot, although it lists entries for candidates from "two" major political parties, still amounts to a Stalinist ballot, where in effect a single slate and a single party always win? Does that not amount in fact to a surreptitious revolution by means of "electoral theater", through which the Constitution has been temporarily overthrown?[1584] Similarly, when petitions, demonstrations, and even extensive acts of civil disobedience at "the grass roots" convince or frighten public officials into behaving properly for a little while, no one calls that turn of events a "revolution". But what happens when rogue public officials set their sights squarely on usurpation and tyranny, and the inutility, inanity, and even political insanity of "freedom of petition" then becomes apparent to every thinking man and woman? It was said of old that Parliament was "the Grand Inquest of the Kingdom, where the People speak boldly their Grievances, and call to account over-grown Criminals, who are above the reach of ordinary Justice".[1585] So, too, should Congress and every State legislature be, ideally. In reality, though, Congress and all too many of the States' legislatures have, as of this writing, become the cozy dens of "over-grown Criminals" and their co-conspirators and accomplices in wrongdoing. When those in public office ooze with disdain for THE PEOPLE'S liberties, when they openly hold THE PEOPLE in contempt, when they brazenly oppress THE PEOPLE in order to fatten the purses of domestic special-

---

[1580] See, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cls. 1 and 2; art. I, § 3, cl. 1; art. II, § 1, cls. 1 and 2; and amends. XII; XIV, § 2; XV; XVII; XIX; XXIII; XXIV; and XXVI.

[1581] U.S. Const. amend. I.

[1582] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1583] See U.S. Const. art. V.

[1584] See, e.g., J. Locke, Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XIX, §§ 216 and 222.

[1585] AN ARGUMENT, Shewing, that a Standing Army Is inconsistent with a Free Government, ante note 27, at 3.

interest groups or to advance the agenda of some foreign power, what good will it do for THE PEOPLE to petition them? None.[1586]

Such is the lesson American history teaches. As the Declaration of Independence recounted the Colonists' experiences to "a candid world", "[t]he history of the * * * King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations". "In every stage of these Oppressions We have Petitioned for Redress in the most humble terms: Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated injury." These petitions proved impotent, not just because the King was recalcitrant, but also because Anglo-American society was riven by mutually antagonistic factions. As the Declaration reported, > [n]or have We been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. * * * We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which, would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity.

Who then were the "revolutionaries" of that time? The American patriots who petitioned again and again; or the King, his Ministers, Parliament, and many among the British public who refused to "promote the spirit of peace" within the Empire by paying attention to these petitions, in violation of the Mother Country's "constitution"?[1587] And is not the same surreptitious "revolution" taking place today in violation of the Constitution of the United States when rogue public officials at every level of the federal system turn deaf ears and blind eyes to citizens' fully documented complaints of "repeated injuries and usurpations"?[1588]

If rogue officials refuse to listen to the peaceful voices THE PEOPLE raise in the specific manner the Constitution provides, and if such officials cannot be replaced in person or in kind because they have corrupted the electoral process, then only one alternative remains for THE PEOPLE: the Militia. For the Militia to sally forth to put rogue officials in their proper places would not, however, constitute a "revolution". Rather, it would amount only to what could be called a "police action"—"suppress[ing] Insurrection[s]" by "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union" against political criminals.[1589] To adopt Blackstone's phrase, the Militia are the ultimate "dispensation of government at present actually existing"—for they

---

[1586] See, e.g., J. Locke, Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XIX, §§ 221 and 217.

[1587] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 143.

[1588] See, e.g., J. Locke, Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XIX, §§ 224 through 229.

[1589] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 with, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

and they alone place immediately and directly within THE PEOPLE'S own hands the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'". Contrary to Blackstone, however, deployment of the Militia to police rogue public officials would not "annihilat[e] the sovereign power"—but instead would constitute the exercise of that power by the sovereigns themselves. It would not result in "a dissolution of the whole form of government established by th[e] people"—but instead would mobilize THE PEOPLE within the most puissant part of that "form", in order to save both the government and themselves. It would not "destroy all law", "repeal all positive laws before enacted", and "render all legal provisions ineffectual"—but instead would execute the laws against the very worst criminals from which any republic can suffer: namely, faithless public officials who violate their "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution".[1590]

Yet, in eliminating the unconstitutional misrule of political élitists, factions, and special interests both domestic and foreign, deployment of the Militia would "reduce[ ] all members [of the society] to their original state of equality"—that is, the state of affairs mandated by the Declaration of Independence in which "all men are created equal" in political status, and forever treated that way. This is the right which every true American can and must claim, both for himself and for every other American, because upon it the entire political edifice of national sovereignty and limited government rests. For this to be a true "right", though, it must have an effective "remedy" for its "infringement". "'[E]very right, when withheld, must have a remedy, and every injury its proper redress'".[1591] That remedy must be the Militia. For the Second Amendment declares the Militia to be "necessary to the security of a free State". And inasmuch as political equality is the hallmark of "a free State", the Militia must be necessary to that, too. Indeed, the very nature of the Militia compels this conclusion. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution understand WE THE PEOPLE to be one indivisible body, because each and every member is the political equal of every other member. The Militia are "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".[1592] Therefore, the Militia are in their members the embodiments, and in their members' self-interests the guarantors, of political equality.

H. The capability of the Militia to enforce "the right of restoration" today. Naysayers will carp and whine that mere "parchment guarantees" inscribed in the Declaration of Independence, the original Constitution, and the Bill of Rights

---

[1590] Compare U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3 with J. Locke, Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XIX, § 230.

[1591] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 163 (1803), quoting W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 109. Accord, United States ex rel. Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 71 U.S. (4 Wallace) 535, 554 (1867); Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 303 (1885).

[1592] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

are of little worth in the long run. In respect of the Militia, however, America's organic laws are anything but mere "parchment guarantees". Rather, they are composed of blood and iron. So, the "Form of Government" under the Declaration and the Constitution cannot fail unless the Militia—which are the key elements in that "Form", being "necessary to the security of a free State"—should fail. And such a disaster could never occur unless WE THE PEOPLE themselves—who make up the Militia—should fail in the performance of their duty of self-government. Are patriotic Americans, however, ready to conceive and concede that THE PEOPLE will so fail? That they will sink into such ignorance, sloth, and irresponsibility as to become politically impotent? That they will delude themselves into imagining that they need not participate personally in bearing the burdens of self-government, yet nonetheless will continue to enjoy its benefits? Well, surely some—perhaps even not just a few—will do so. (On that score, the reader must look into his own heart and determine in which camp he wants to be found.) But not all will, and surely not enough to allow America's present "Form of Government [to] become[ ] destructive of the[ ] ends" for which it was originally "instituted".

For not everyone eligible for service in the Militia will need to be deployed to reassert popular sovereignty and purify, protect, and preserve this country's restored "Form of Government". Against even the myriad attacks being launched by rogue public officials and their allies in various factions and special-interest groups, the Militia need and ought not to be wielded as bludgeons, to beat to a bloody pulp the entirety of the existing governmental apparatus because part of it is rotten beyond redemption. Quite the contrary. First, one ought not to hurry the operation. As the Declaration of Independence counsels, > Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shewn, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed.

Second, one ought not to undertake too much of the operation if it threatens to bring about more harm than benefit. WE THE PEOPLE may not occupy an advantageous position from which to change the "Form of Government" from top to bottom now that serious corruption has infested the body politic. Political and economic structures erected upon foundations of usurpation and tyranny over long periods of time may have become so large, so complex, and so interlocked with legitimate and necessary social institutions and mores that trying to excise them all at once will only make matters worse than they are. Third, even the political surgery that is expedient needs to be carefully directed towards the gangrenous tissue alone. THE PEOPLE'S goal must be to reassert popular sovereignty directly, in a sharply focused manner, in as many areas as possible, but without an abrupt, destabilizing, and possibly catastrophic alteration in the entire "Form of Government".

Take, for example, the Power of the Purse and the Power of the Sword, which today have largely been usurped by the Federal Reserve System, on the one hand, and by the General Government's increasingly para-militarized Department of Homeland Security, on the other. Although every thinking American realizes that these institutions in tandem are looting the Nation's wealth for the benefit of a financial Mafia and grinding its population under the heel of a National police-state apparatus, one also recognizes that this complex cannot easily be disestablished as a whole, or even disassembled major part by major part in the near term. Yet, through deployment of the Militia, both the Federal Reserve System and the Department of Homeland Security could be treated effectively as nonentities by the States and their people, who could thereby regain legal as well as practical control over the Powers of the Purse and the Sword at the Local level. (i) The Federal Reserve System could be rendered irrelevant if the States were to adopt an alternative currency which they required both their governments and their citizens, in their capacities as members of the Militia, to use in all of their day-to-day transactions.[1593] And (ii) the Department of Homeland Security could be rendered impotent if the States were to establish their own programs of "homeland security", based upon their Militia, because the Constitution would not allow any "Officers" of the Militia to come under the command of anyone in that Department; and if no one in the Department of Homeland Security could give orders to any "Officers" in the Militia, then no rank-and-file Militiamen would be subject to anyone in that Department, either.[1594]

Importantly—

- A strategy of this kind would not involve "revolution", in the sense of a sudden, shattering renversement of the political, economic, and social order, because the Federal Reserve System and the Department of Homeland Security would not be disestablished, but merely increasingly disregarded.

- Even if "secession" of a State from the Union were constitutional,[1595] no need for it would ever arise, because any State could separate herself from the Federal Reserve System and the Department of Homeland Security in this manner while still remaining within the Union.

[1593] See post, at 1208-1233.

[1594] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1595] E.g., by an Amendment of the Constitution under Article V, rescinding the State's ratification or adhesion to the Constitution under Article VII or Article IV, Section 3, Clause 1. See Texas v. White, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 700, 724-726 (1868).

•No State would need to claim a right and power of "nullification" as to any of the largely unconstitutional statutes under color of which the Federal Reserve System and the Department of Homeland Security operated, because the constitutionality vel non of those statutes would be quite irrelevant to the legitimacy of any State's adoption of an alternative currency or development of a Local program of "homeland security" based upon her Militia.[1596] And,

•No State would need to assert the doctrine of "interposition" against any such statute, either, because no direct challenge to its constitutionality would be necessary.[1597] Rather,

•Each State would engage in constitutional circumvention of the usurpation and tyranny embodied in the Federal Reserve System and the Department of Homeland Security. Thus, "the right of restoration" would be exercised within and through the federal system "from the bottom up", as it always must be in a self-governing republic.

WE THE PEOPLE need to experiment in this way, because no "Form of Government" can fairly be said to have failed when one of its central components—and arguably the most important of them, the only one explicitly recognized to be "necessary"—has not been put to use. Of course, if THE PEOPLE do succeed in revitalizing the Militia but nonetheless this country's political and economic situations do not perceptibly improve—or if rogue public officials in the General Government and the governments of the States, in league with powerful private factions and other special-interest groups, can prevent THE PEOPLE from revitalizing and deploying the Militia in the first place—then Americans will have witnessed the final step in "a long train of abuses and usurpations", and will know that their present "Form of Government" has failed, that it is irremediably, hopelessly "destructive of [men's unalienable Rights]", and that they must "throw [1596] The question of "nullification" is raised here solely to deal with all argumentative possibilities. The term "nullification" is generally taken to mean the supposed power of a State to declare invalid a purported statute or other official act of the General Government. Yet, on the one hand, if that statute or other act is constitutional, then no such power of "nullification" can possibly exist. U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3. On the other hand, if that statute or other act is unconstitutional, then it is null and void ab initio as a matter of its character; and any declaration to that effect by a State is superfluous. See Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886); Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 288 (1885); Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 97, 101-102 (1887); Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408-409 (1963). Nonetheless, for moral, political, and prudential reasons, a State might choose to publish a declaration and remonstrance exposing and denouncing the nullity of whatever purported statutes or other acts of the General Government she deemed most obnoxious. This would follow the example set by the Founding Fathers, who, out of "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind", and in order "[t]o prove" that "[t]he history of the * * * King of Great Britain [wa]s a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny", "let Facts be submitted to a candid world" in a lengthy catalogue of the Monarch's abuses in the Declaration of Independence.

---

[1597] "Interposition" refers to the right and power of a State to protect her citizens against the application to them of an unconstitutional statute by rogue agents of the General Government.

off such Government" as soon as possible by whatever means they can master and at whatever price they must pay.

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

"[T]he Militia of the several States" consist of separate and independent establishments which must always exist in each and every State throughout the United States.

In the nature of things, the Militia must be permanently in existence, throughly organized, and prepared at all times by dint of equipment and training to perform their functions, because: (i) A fundamental axiom of political philosophy is that "sovereignty is never in abeyance". (ii) In America, WE THE PEOPLE are the sovereigns.[1598] (iii) Sovereignty is the highest form of political power; and the sovereigns are the supreme executors of that power. (iv) "'Political power grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[1599] (v) Through their Militia, THE PEOPLE hold the guns, and therefore maintain control over the ultimate political power in their own hands. (vi) To the degree that THE PEOPLE do not hold the guns in their own hands, they forfeit political power. (vii) Once THE PEOPLE have forfeited enough political power, popular sovereignty will be in abeyance—in which case some other "sovereign" will inevitably assert its dominance over society. And (viii) inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State",[1600] and the only politically reliable group in "a free State" consists of THE PEOPLE themselves, this new "sovereign"—for which "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of * * * gun[s]'" other than those held by the Militia—will be the tool of factions and other special interests inimical to a free society.

With the temporary exception of Pennsylvania (and that because of the dominance of pacifistic Quakers in her legislature),[1601] throughout the pre-constitutional era the Militia existed as "settled" institutions in and of each of the individual Colonies and then the independent States. During that period, no single, unified Militia of the Colonies or the independent States as a whole was ever established—even under the Articles of Confederation, which provided, not for a [1598] See Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 454, 456 (opinion of Wilson, J.), 471-472 (opinion of Jay, C.J.) (1793). Chief Justice John Jay's recognition of popular sovereignty in this opinion evidences that no one of any consequence living at that time could have seriously doubted that doctrine as a fundamental premiss of the Constitution—or at least would have dared to contradict or disparage it in an official statement. For Jay himself was no friend of the people, but instead was personally contemptuous of democracy and the common man. See Claude G. Bowers, Jefferson and Hamilton: The Struggle for Democracy in America (Cambridge, Massachusetts: The Riverside Press, 1925), at 248-250.

---

[1599] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 142, at 61.

[1600] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1601] See ante, at 87-88 and 845-848.

"militia of the United States", but instead that "every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred".[1602] The original Constitution incorporated "the Militia of the several States" into its federal system in conformity with the comprehensive definition of "Militia" that nearly one hundred fifty years of American *pre-*constitutional history provided. Therefore, under the Constitution, the Militia must be separate and independent institutions permanently established within and for each and every one of "the several States" (albeit with certain specific responsibilities to and authority within the General Government).

And so they are. For the original Constitution "settled" the Militia once and for all, in the sense of "establish[ing]" and "fix[ing them] unalienably by legal sanctions,"[1603] by recognizing and confirming their existences as permanent State institutions within the federal system—leaving them only to be "regulated", in the sense of being "adjusted by rule or method",[1604] in accordance with the principles of the *pre-*constitutional Militia as the specific needs of later times might dictate.[1605] When the original Constitution referred specifically to "the Militia of the several States",[1606] it presumed that individual Militia then were and thereafter always would be "settled" within, by, and under the jurisdiction and ultimate control of each of the States. And when the Second Amendment later declared in general that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State",[1607] it presumed that a Militia capable of such regulation would always be "settled" in each State needing such "security"—which, self-evidently, included every State then in the Union as well as every State which would join thereafter.

When the original Constitution empowered Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States",[1608] it delegated only an authority for regulating "the Militia". And because the original Constitution nowhere delegated to Congress any power whatsoever to "settle" any species of supposed "militia" different from "the Militia" to which it referred, it thereby absolutely precluded Congress from purporting to create any such institution anew. For, inasmuch as "[t]he government * * * of the United States, can claim no

---

[1602] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

[1603] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 4 and 9 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[1604] Id., definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[1605] The important distinction between "settling" and "regulating" the Militia is discussed in more detail ante, at 100-102.

[1606] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1607] Emphasis supplied.

[1608] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

powers which are not granted to it by the constitution",[1609] "powers not granted are prohibited".[1610]

This arrangement, of course, contrasts starkly with the powers the original Constitution delegated to Congress "[t]o raise and support Armies", [t]o provide and maintain a Navy", and "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces",[1611] while prohibiting the States from "keep[ing] Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress".[1612] For pursuant to these provisions, the authority both to "settle" and to "regulate" what the Constitution denotes "the Army and Navy of the United States",[1613] and to "regulate" through its "Consent" whatever "Troops, or Ships of War" Congress permits the States to "keep * * * in time of Peace", remains the prerogative of Congress, similar to what it was under the Articles of Confederation. The Articles mandated that

> [n]o vessels of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any state, except such number only, as shall be deemed necessary by the united states in congress assembled, for the defence of such state, or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any state, in time of peace, except such number only, as in the judgment of the united states, in congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defence of such state[;][1614]

> [t]he united states in congress assembled shall have authority * * * to build and equip a navy—to agree upon the number of land forces, and to make requisitions from each state for its quota, in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in such state; which requisition shall be binding, and thereupon the legislature of each state shall appoint the regimental officers, raise the men and cloath, arm and equip them in a soldier like manner, at the expence of the united states[.][1615]

Under the Constitution, too, the States may not maintain their own "bod[ies] of forces" ("Troops") or "vessels of war" ("Ships of War") "in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress". And when Congress does give that "Consent", it may [1609] Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheaton) 304, 326 (1816). Accord, McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 316, 405 (1819).

---

[1610] United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 68 (1936).

[1611] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12, 13, and 14 (emphasis supplied). See also U.S. Const. amend. V, which explicitly reinforces what should be the obvious distinction between "the land or naval forces" and "the Militia".

[1612] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1613] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1614] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

[1615] Arts. of Confed'n art. IX, ¶ 5.

annex thereto otherwise constitutional conditions—including the requirement that the States' "Troops" serve in "the land * * * Forces" of the United States, or that the "Ships of War" produced by the States become part of "the * * * naval Forces" of the United States, under some circumstances.[1616] Moreover, when Congress "raise[s] Armies" directly under its constitutional power to do so,[1617] it may (as did the Congress under the Articles) "make requisitions from each state for her quota" of "land forces".[1618] On the other hand, the Constitution does not require the States to obtain "the Consent of Congress" before they "keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of [War]". And, inasmuch as the latter power had always been the prerogative of the States, both before and even under the Articles of Confederation, the absence of any express limitation on it in the Constitution—and especially the express reservation to the States of the further power to "engage in War" when "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay",[1619] which might prove useless without the ability to "keep Troops, or Ships of War" under those circumstances—proves that the power to "keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of [War]" without "the Consent" or subjection to the interference of Congress remains "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people".[1620]

The obvious reason for the different treatments of "the Militia" and "the land and naval Forces" in the original Constitution was that, in 1788, WE THE PEOPLE saw no need to empower Congress to "settle" "the Militia", because "the Militia" were already "settled" by and within each of "the several States", and had been for generations; and for political reasons THE PEOPLE desired "the Militia" to remain as permanent institutions within the federal system, yet always as the establishments of "the several States". It sufficed, then, solely to empower Congress to "regulate" "the Militia" for the purpose of inducing reasonable uniformity in their "organiz[ation], arm[s], and disciplin[e]" when they "m[ight] be employed in the Service of the United States".[1621] Whereas, inasmuch as THE PEOPLE desired to continue the prohibition against the States' raising their own "Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" without Congressional "Consent", they needed to delegate to Congress the exclusive authority to "settle" ("raise" and "provide") "Armies" and "a Navy" in the first instance—either by Congress's own actions or through its approval of actions taken by the States—or else "the land and naval Forces" of the United States would not have come into existence at all.

[1616] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14. This is doubtlessly the shaky constitutional basis upon which the modern National Guard and the Naval Militia rest. See ante, at 786-793.

[1617] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1618] See post, Chapter 49.

[1619] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1620] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[1621] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

Congress, the States, and in default thereof WE THE PEOPLE themselves must ensure that each and every one of "the Militia of the several States" is fully organized, armed, disciplined, and trained at all times.

By whatever permutation or combination of unpreparedness may obtain, an "unorganized", "unarmed", "undisciplined", or "untrained" Militia is little better than no Militia at all—and perhaps worse, because it deceives THE PEOPLE into accepting the shadow for the substance. But no Militia at all within any of the several States, whether the product of actual nonexistence or simply insufficient preparation, is a legally impossible state of affairs under both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

A. The requirement of fully organized Militia perforce of the Declaration of Independence. The Declaration categorically asserts that, "when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government". Plainly enough, confronted by usurpers and tyrants aiming at "absolute Despotism", "the good People" (as the Declaration identifies them) can secure their own liberation and protection only through the threat or at length the actual application of overwhelming force—by organizing, arming, disciplining, training, and deploying themselves in some variety of Militia sufficient to the purpose. Just as plainly, though, "the good People" need not wait until "absolute Despotism" has nearly fastened its strangulating grip upon and sunk its fangs into their throats before they mount a defense against it. If "it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such [a bad] Government" when the malignancy fully appears—accepting all of the evil consequences that will inevitably arise out of the struggle—then it must be even more imperatively their right and their duty to support and sustain a good government in the first place and thereby avoid those evils altogether. "[T]he good People" need not, dare not, remain quiescent in the face of crescent usurpation and tyranny until, perhaps too late to be effective, desperation finally prompts action. Rather, at all times, even in those of apparent tranquillity, they must prepare themselves to detect, to deter, to resist when deterrence fails, and ultimately to defeat every "design to reduce them under absolute Despotism". Across such a wide range of circumstances—from calm, through crisis, even to calamity—what institution can invariably best serve "the good People['s]" needs?

Again, the answer is some variety of Militia. A "right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances"[1622] will not necessarily prove efficacious, because self-assured usurpers and tyrants with no fear of "the people" will contemptuously disregard the petitioners—whose futile endeavors will produce only new "grievances", new petitions for the "redress" of which will remain unanswered in their turn. The next elections may prove equally futile as means of reform, if the usurpers and tyrants have corrupted the process by (say) coöpting the major political parties, subverting the big media, and arranging for the use of rigged voting machines. In any event, elections occur only periodically—and the times between elections may prove sufficient for the malefactors' purposes.[1623] Inasmuch as "the good People" cannot expect usurpers and tyrants to prosecute themselves even when their misdeeds are exposed and made the subjects of public denunciations, and inasmuch as "the good People" must be able to investigate and police such malefactors between elections, therefore "the good People" require instruments with the organization, equipment, training, and legal authority to serve that purpose under their own control at all times. Only the Militia, fully prepared to do whatever is necessary, when it is necessary, fill the bill.

Obviously, prior, permanent, and complete organization of the Militia is mandatory in the case of a natural disaster, because the consequences of any such catastrophe will not wait for the people to prepare themselves to deal with a situation that may prevent such preparation altogether or at least may render it more difficult than it otherwise would have been. Such organization is even more important, though, in the case of threats by such domestic and foreign human enemies as usurpers, insurrectionists, or invaders. For, on the one hand, natural disasters are usually of limited duration and geographic scope, whereas the subversion or conquest of an entire country by internal or external enemies may consign all of "the good People" to the darkness of despotism for generations. But, on the other hand, unlike natural disasters, threats from human enemies may possibly be deterred in the first place. Deterrence, however, is a chancy business. Deterrence depends upon aggressors' perceptions of the extent of the community's actual ability to deploy sufficient forces effectively at a particular time and place. Being public institutions, the Militia's level of readiness will be generally known; so potential aggressors cannot possibly mistake what they may be taking on. Conversely, if "the good People" are largely disorganized, usurpers or invaders will not be deterred by the expectation that individuals or small groups might oppose them. Rather, their anticipation that resistance will be limited and uncoördinated will encourage their aggression. To constitute an effective deterrent, then, the Militia must have the maximum feasible organization, arms, discipline, and training necessary to deal with every reasonably foreseeable threat. This requires foresight, planning, preparation, and testing well in advance of the appearance of danger. The hope to improvise or "muddle through" after a crisis strikes cannot make up for what should have been, but was not, done beforehand.

---

[1622] E.g., U.S. Const. amend. I.

[1623] For example, a rogue President has four uninterrupted years of incumbency. Even if after two years in office his partisans lose control of Congress, he may nonetheless be able to accomplish his goals, without new legislation, through the use of purported "executive orders", "proclamations", "nationals security decision directives", "signing statements", and like dictatorial devices. And unless the new Congress overwhelmingly turns against him, he may continue his depredations without fear of impeachment, conviction, and removal from office for "high Crimes and Misdemeanors". See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5 and § 3, cls. 6 and 7; and art. II, § 4.

The question then becomes, "Who will organize such fully prepared Militia?" Under the Declaration of Independence, it must be either the government or "the good People" themselves, because the Declaration recognizes only those two categories of political actors. A good government—"deriving [its] just powers from the consent of the governed" and intent upon exercising those powers to forefend "a long train of abuses and usurpations"—will properly organize the Militia. But if incompetent or rogue public officials fail, neglect, or refuse to do so, then "the good People" themselves must take the initiative. In neither case can the Militia simply be held in abeyance or desuetude.

B. The requirement of fully organized Militia under the Constitution. No "well regulated Militia"—whether from the absence of such an establishment altogether or from its debilitating deficiencies—is even more plainly impossible under the Constitution than under the Declaration of Independence. First, the Constitution explicitly incorporates "the Militia of the several States" into its federal system. Second, any other than "[a] well regulated Militia" in each of the several States is a constitutional impossibility, because the Second Amendment declares that such a Militia is "necessary to the security of a free State" everywhere without exception. Third, by historical definition, "[a] well regulated Militia" is a Militia fully "regulated" at all times according to *pre-*constitutional principles. For just as never during that period did a single one of the Colonies (other than Pennsylvania) and then the independent States not maintain her own Militia at all, neither did a single one of the Colonies or States (including, at last, Pennsylvania) not "regulate[ ]" her Militia "well"—in terms of fully organizing, arming, disciplining, and training it for the "homeland-security" tasks then at hand—let alone even admit the possibility of jury rigging only an oxymoronic "well [but un]regulated Militia". Fourth, the Constitution licenses neither the States nor Congress to set up truncated "select militia", leaving "the body of the people"[1624] "unorganized". The States lack any such discretion, because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States" as those Militia existed before and at the time the Constitution was ratified. And during that period of almost one hundred fifty years, no Militia of any Colony or independent

[1624] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

State had been other than fully organized. Congress, too, lacks any such discretion, because its relevant power is solely "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia", not "[Part of] the Militia" only.[1625] And "the Militia*" means the Militia just as they existed in pre*-constitutional times—in which every eligible individual was subject to some form of organization.* If Congress were at liberty "[t]o provide for organizing" only "[Part of] the Militia"—that is, effectively to redefine "the Militia" ad libitum without reference to American legal history—rogue Members of Congress: (i) could reduce the Militia to impotence by enlisting only a tiny fraction of eligible individuals, which would not serve "the security of a free State", or (ii) could create a Praetorian Guard or Schutzstaffel out of those legislators' political cronies, partisans, and hangers-on, which would subvert that "security". Yet the question remains, "If the Militia are to be 'well regulated', who has the authority and the responsibility to 'regulate' them?" That is, who is to ensure that the Militia are fully organized, armed, disciplined, and trained at all times, according to *pre-*constitutional principles?

1. The responsibility of Congress. The initial answer is "Congress", because the original Constitution explicitly delegated to Congress the powers "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections, and repel Invasions" and "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States", whenever it might be "necessary and proper" to do so.[1626] Even under the original Constitution, these were not simply powers, but also and especially duties, too. For, self-evidently, the very terminology "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" excludes not providing at all for those states of readiness, or providing for their very opposites—because "[a]ffirmative words are * * * , in their operation, negative of other objects than those affirmed".[1627] And unimaginable are the circumstances in which: (i) it would even arguably not be "necessary and proper" "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections, and repel Invasions"—and therefore (ii) it would not be "necessary and proper" to "call[ ] forth" the only establishments that the Constitution explicitly authorizes to take such actions—yet (iii) it would be allowable for those establishments to be less than sufficiently "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]" when they were "call[ed] forth" for such purposes.

To be sure, the necessity and propriety of some "Laws" the original Constitution left to Congress to determine. For, then as now, with respect to some subjects in some situations WE THE PEOPLE'S representatives must be allowed a reasonable political latitude to determine for themselves the expediency of

---

[1625] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[1626] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15, 16, and 18.

[1627] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803).

legislation—remaining liable, of course, at least to censure by the electorate if they misuse or abuse their discretion. Not so with respect to "the Militia of the several States", however. From the very beginning, the Militia were constitutionally required establishments which, absent amendment, the "supreme Law of the Land"[1628] conclusively presumed: (i) would exist as components of its federal structure no less permanent than the States themselves; and (ii) would always operate according to the pre*-constitutional principles and practices that define* "[a] well regulated Militia", just as (for the most relevant parallel) "[t]he definition of 'a state' is found in the powers possessed by the original states which adopted the Constitution".[1629] After all, it could not have been lost on the Founders that, more than any other establishments, the Militia as they had come to exist in the 1770s served the foundational purposes of the Declaration of Independence. In asserting that, "when a long train of abuses and usurpations * * * evinces a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty to throw off such Government",[1630] the Declaration presumed that WE THE PEOPLE would always retain the ability, by force of arms if necessary, to succeed in that endeavor, and that therefore they would always have available to them armed establishments sufficient for that purpose. These would not likely be "standing armies", because no régime pursuing "a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism" would allow its victims to command or to call upon the protection of such forces. Instead they would have to be "well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[1631] and as fully organized, armed, and disciplined as circumstances allowed. So, deriving its authority from the Declaration, the original Constitution naturally embodied this principle.

Moreover, the original Constitution emphatically required that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government".[1632] No exception to this duty existed then or exists now. Every State government in America between 1776 and 1788, though, was already "Republican" in form or would have had to be modified upon the noncompliant State's accession to the Constitution. And every Colony but one in America prior to 1776, and every independent State thereafter, established by statute and always maintained a Militia of a certain type as an integral part of her governmental structure. Therefore, a Militia of that type constituted an essential and integral component of "a Republican Form of Government", because such an unbroken legislative cavalcade provides "unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form, within the meaning of that [1629] Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 566 (1911).

---

[1628] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[1630] Emphasis supplied.

[1631] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1632] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4 (emphasis supplied).

term as employed in the Constitution".[1633] That being so, as part of the duty imposed upon the United States, Congress was required always to "guarantee to every State" a Militia sufficiently "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]" to meet these historical standards. Thus, from this perspective as well, the powers of Congress with respect to the Militia under even the original Constitution translated into absolute duties.

Not surprisingly, then, the Second Amendment as well treated those powers as duties, those duties as absolute, and their full execution as always "necessary and proper", when it declared, categorically and without any exception, that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State".[1634] Thus, even if under the original Constitution Congress might have enjoyed some leeway to decide for itself that "provid[ing] for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" was not "necessary and proper" at some time or to some degree, ratification of the Second Amendment denied it that latitude by declaring with finality for every circumstance to which the original Constitution might have applied and would thereafter apply that "[a] well regulated Militia"—that is, one properly "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]"—is always "necessary", and for the highest purpose of all, "the security of a free State". Indeed, the phraseology of the Amendment's nominative absolute clause in the present tense—"[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary", right now, at every moment—precludes any other interpretation.

2. The responsibility of the States. Nonetheless, although absolute, Congress's power and duty "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" are neither limitless nor exclusive. True, they must be construed to enable Congress fully to prepare the Militia to perform the three vital constitutional tasks for which the latter may be "call[ed] forth" to "be employed in the Service of the United States". But, in the nature of things, they are not suited to address the myriad other tasks of "homeland security" that would surely need to be performed in different States at various times. Rather, the most expansive power and duty for statutory regulation of the Militia must rest with the individual States, because: (i) The Militia are "the Militia of the several States", not "the Militia of the United States". (ii) True "homeland security"—"the security of a free State"—must be provided within the "homeland", which is within the States themselves and amongst their own people at the Local level. And (iii) as a practical matter, neither Congress nor some "national-security" bureaucracy can possibly provide uniformly and in a timely fashion for—or even be apprised of, let alone itself foresee—all of the purposes of "homeland security" that the Militia might serve within individual States (beyond the responsibilities "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"), each of which other purposes would require the rapid mobilization of diverse resources in the service of various and variable needs.[1635] Therefore, each of the several States must exercise authority for statutorily organizing her own Militia, not simply concurrent with that of Congress with respect to the three explicit constitutional purposes for which the Militia may be "call[ed] forth", but in all other respects exclusive, with broad discretion to proceed in her own way, so long as what she prescribes for "homeland security" within her own territory does not frustrate, operate at cross-purposes towards, or otherwise impermissibly interfere with what Congress has mandated for "the Service of the United States".

---

[1633] See Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wallace) 162, 176 (1875) (dictum).

[1634] Emphasis supplied.

3. The responsibility of WE THE PEOPLE. The Second and Tenth Amendments' focus on "the people" emphasizes that not just Congress and the States labor under an affirmative obligation in this regard. Indeed, the fundamental responsibility for seeing to the proper "regulation" of the Militia in each State rests squarely upon WE THE PEOPLE: (i) Because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", the responsibility for proper "regulation" of the Militia cannot be delegated to possibly incompetent or rogue public officials in a government the survival and even the legitimacy of which depends upon constitutionally sufficient "regulation" of the Militia in the first place. (ii) THE PEOPLE themselves comprise the Militia, and therefore have the greatest insight into, interest in, and incentive to insure the Militia's proper functioning. (iii) THE PEOPLE, not the General Government or the States, are America's true sovereigns; and in practical politics "the buck stops" on the desk of the highest authority.[1636]

That the ultimate driving and controlling force behind "[a] well regulated Militia" in each State consists of WE THE PEOPLE themselves is particularly fitting in a federal system that is designed to operate from "the bottom up" not from "the top down". In the normal course of human events, THE PEOPLE may be content merely to vote for representatives in State legislatures and in Congress who then are expected to enact appropriate legislation. But when the electoral and legislative processes become clogged with factionalism and the manipulations, corruptions, and frauds fostered by calcified political parties and conniving special-interest groups, must THE PEOPLE meekly suffer "the security of a free State" to be jeopardized? Hardly. If Members of Congress will not act when they should with respect to "regulating" the Militia, the States' legislators must; and if both Congressmen and the States' lawmakers will not act when they should, THE PEOPLE must. No one else can. And they will be justified in taking whatever action may be necessary to [1635] "The slave patrols"—which existed in Virginia but not in Rhode Island—exemplify the widely different purposes the Militia served in different Colonies and States during pre-constitutional times. See ante, at 339-343, 392-395, and 718-723.

---

[1636] See A Dictionary of Americanisms on Historical Principles, Mitford M. Mathews, Editor (Chicago, Illinois: University of Chicago Press, 1951), at 198-199.

achieve that end. Because salus populi suprema lex,[1637] "[h]e that has virtue and power to save a people, can never want a right of doing it".[1638]

4. No "unorganized", "unarmed", or "undisciplined" "Militia of the several States" constitutionally possible. If minor details of "regulation" may be altered in order to obtain "[a] well regulated Militia" in each State under varying conditions,[1639] nonetheless Congress or the legislatures of the several States must exercise such discretion as they enjoy in this regard with scrupulous concern for fixed constitutional principles. Presumably, being "bound by [their] Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution",[1640] Members of Congress and State legislators will both know the law and discharge their duties to it faithfully under changing circumstances.[1641] Nothing could be more important, because the least departure from the fundamental principles of "regulation" can never be allowed without transmogrifying the "regulated" entity into something other than a true constitutional "Militia", with whatever deleterious consequences will surely follow from upsetting the "checks and balances" that true Militia provide within the Constitution's federal system.

a. For example, because the population eligible for enlistment in "[a] well regulated Militia" must be fully "organized", such a Militia can never be divided into one relatively small "organized", "armed", and "disciplined" component with every other eligible individual shunted off into some other, "unorganized", "unarmed", and "undisciplined" component. Such a dichotomy between subsets within the Militia was neither known nor even imagined during *pre-*constitutional times. True enough, *pre-*constitutional statutes allowed various exemptions from some Militia duties.[1642] But that did not place the individuals thereby excused from such service into an "unorganized militia". Exemptions actually constituted one method of organizing and disciplining the Militia,[1643] and in any event never authorized a general exclusion of otherwise eligible individuals, but instead were severely limited in scope and always justified by some special purposes consistent with the common defense and the general welfare. And in most cases, the individuals exempted (other than conscientious objectors) were required to arm themselves or to provide arms for others.[1644]

[1637] "The health [or welfare] of the people is the supreme law."

[1638] A. Sidney, Discourses Concerning Government, ante note 54, at 227 (emphasis supplied).

[1639] See post, at 926-928.

[1640] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1641] Compare Cannon v. University of Chicago, 441 U.S. 677, 696-697 (1979), with Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 183 (1926) (McReynolds, J., dissenting).

[1642] See ante, Chapters 11 and 22.

[1643] See ante, at 274 (Rhode Island) and 643-646 (Virginia).

[1644] See ante, at 259-261 (Rhode Island) and 419-423 (Virginia).

Americans in *pre-*constitutional times would have recoiled from the suggestion that their Militia could, to any degree, be "unorganized", "unarmed", or "undisciplined". And with good reason: In effect, any form of "militia" in that parlous state can be no more than a ruse rigged for the purpose of enabling those who do not want to serve to avoid their constitutional duties, or of denying the right to serve to those who wish to do so but whom the contrivers of the "unorganized militia" desire to exclude from the authentic Militia. Existence of an "unorganized militia" also rationalizes "gun control"—for if individuals can be statutorily declared to be "unorganized" in the full sense of that term, as a consequence they can also be declared to be "unarmed", and then perhaps even deprived of the firearms they have acquired on their own unconnected with Militia service. Weak minds may fixate upon the illusion that individuals consigned to an "unorganized militia" are still somehow "in" the Militia in an imaginary "reserve" capacity, because they could perhaps be transferred by some later statute to an "organized militia". This illusion is particularly stupid, though, inasmuch as even individuals whom some statute deemed to be part of no "militia" at all could nonetheless always be summoned for service in the Militia under some subsequent statute, if they met the standards for eligibility at that time. On the other hand, if rogue Congressmen or State legislators may purport to "organize" the Militia by consigning to an "unorganized militia" individuals in unlimited numbers whom they are not required and never deign to transfer to an "organized militia", they can effectively disestablish the Militia entirely. That being its potential consequence, the notion of an "unorganized", and therefore "unarmed" and "undisciplined", "militia" must be one of the most perverse and dangerous subterfuges and subversions of the Constitution ever to be insinuated into America's legal system.

b. All this notwithstanding, today a Congressional statute describes "the National Guard and the Naval Militia" as constituting "the organized militia", and everyone else who might be eligible for service being relegated to "the unorganized militia"—with no opportunity, let alone requirement, to be "armed" or "disciplined".[1645] Of course, inasmuch as this statute also treats the so-called "organized militia" and "unorganized militia" as the two components of something it calls "[t]he militia of the United States",[1646] it can be dismissed as being "not a law" at all with respect to a true Militia.[1647] Nonetheless, it is barely possible to construe this statute in an arguably constitutional manner. Namely, that: (i) "The militia of the United States" is the peculiar name Congress has assigned to the set of individuals eligible for the National Guard and the Naval Militia. (ii) "[T]he organized militia" is Congress's misnomer for the set of individuals actually enrolled

---

[1645] 10 U.S.C. § 311(b).

[1646] 10 U.S.C. § 311(a).

[1647] See, e.g., Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886).

in the National Guard and the Naval Militia. And (iii) "the unorganized militia" is Congress's term for the set of individuals not so enrolled.[1648] Thus, in fact, "the unorganized militia" also consists of individuals eligible for "the Militia of the several States" who (were the Militia revitalized) presumably would be required to be enrolled therein. As members of "the Militia of the several States" perforce of the Constitution itself, though, these individuals ought to be organized as a matter of law right now, not left "unorganized". Because piercing this kind of statutory conundrum depends upon a detailed understanding of what constitutional Militia actually are, it is probably beyond the unaided ability of most Americans today, however. So the fanciful trilogy of "organized militia", "unorganized militia", and "militia of the United States" will continue to confuse readers of the United States Code—as one among many examples of purported statutes that embody the propensity of incompetent or rogue public officials to attempt to evade the Constitution's requirements by semantic legerdemain, so as to avoid having to conduct the intense National debate necessary to amend the Constitution.

c. Although this propensity is pernicious with respect to any part of the Constitution, it is especially perilous with respect to the Militia, because the primary purpose of the Militia is not simply military, but ultimately political in nature. After all, it is "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[1649] The Militia are "necessary to the security of a free State"—and therefore without the Militia either "a free State" will lack "security", or the "security" that does arise from some other source will support a "State" that is other than "free". Indeed, precisely because the Militia are not only "necessary to the security of [every] free State" but also integral parts of the Constitution's federal system, the likelihood is that, without the Militia, the entire Constitution will fail, and America's present form of government will become destructive of the ends for which it was instituted.

5. The allowance for some flexibility in "regulation". Although the constitutional duty to provide "[a] well regulated Militia" is absolute, and although the constitutional principles that define "[a] well regulated Militia" have been historically determined once and for all, and although "[a] well regulated Militia" must be fully "organized", "armed", and "disciplined according to these principles at all times, nonetheless what satisfies that standard at any particular point in time will inevitably depend to some degree upon changing circumstances—including the threats the community faces, the population that makes up the community, the economic resources the community can command, the availability of new technology useful for "homeland security", and so on. To be "well regulated", a Militia must be fully "regulated" at all times, but not necessarily fixedly "regulated" for all time. For, although the "meaning [of all constitutional provisions] is changeless", "their application is extensible" throughout the ages.[1650] For an obvious example, although in principle "[a] well regulated Militia" must always be "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[1651] in practice the arms and training that passed muster in the late 1700s will not suffice today. Of course, not all adjustments necessary to produce "[a] well regulated Militia" under changing conditions will be as straightforward. Nevertheless, no matter how challenging the problem, the proper response to changes in the needs of and means to promote "homeland security" should always be carefully to adjust the Militia's "regulations", not (as Congress has done since the early 1900s) simply to reduce the Militia to an "unorganized", "unarmed", and "undisciplined" nonexistence. Eliminating the Militia may obviate the essentially technical difficulties of "regulating" and "re-regulating" them in an ever-changing environment—but only at the cost of creating the far more severe political danger that "free State[s]" deprived of the establishments the Constitution declares to be "necessary to the[ir] security" will not remain "free" for long.

---

[1648] See ante, at 786-793.

[1649] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61 (emphasis supplied).

Making prudent adjustments in the "regulation" of the Militia from time to time is constitutionally required, because it is the lesson History teaches. During the *pre-*constitutional period, complaints arose again and again that the Militia were not functioning as they should. For example, as early as 1664, Rhode Island's General Assembly deplored "the great neglect and defficiency in the vse of the military exercise in most townes in this Collony".{EN-1966} In 1665, it took "into consideration the great defect in training, occasioned by the remissnes of some vnder the pretence of the burden in training soe often as eight dayes in the yeare".{EN-1967} In 1666, it gave "searious consideration [to] the great neglect of the due exicution of the enacted lawes of this Collony concerninge the militia".{EN-1968} In 1726, it worried that "through the dissatisfaction and discontent * * * in the choice and election of commissioned officers, to lead and conduct them, and the smallness of the fine on delinquents, the militia is of late visibly declining".{EN-1969} And in 1755, its conclusion was that "the several Fines for Neglect of Military Duty are found by Experience to be too low".{EN-1970} Virginia's General Assembly, too, found cause for concern in 1738 and 1755 that "the laws heretofore made, for the settling and better regulation of the Militia, have proved very ineffectual, whereby the colony is like to be deprived of its proper defence, in time of danger".{EN-1971} Yet, even with these and other problems, neither Rhode Island, nor Virginia, nor any other Colony (other than Pennsylvania) or any independent State ever dispensed with her Militia, or divided it into active and "organized" versus inactive and "unorganized" parts. Instead, as did "the good people of Virginia" in their Declaration of Rights in 1776, Americans throughout the *pre-*constitutional era learned from personal experience that "a well regulated militia", *alway*s "composed of the body of the people", with all of them "trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state".{EN-1972}

---

[1650] Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 451 (1934) (Sutherland, J., dissenting).

[1651] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

Thus, when difficulties arose during the *pre-*constitutional period, Americans took remedial action to improve their Militia as entireties, rather than attempting to fracture them into "organized" and "unorganized" components, or to eliminate them completely. Plainly, they adhered to the basic principles of the Militia in statute after statute over several generations because the utility of those establishments so outweighed their inconveniences as to render them, not merely expedient, but indispensable in the fully "organized" form in which they had always operated. At length, this was proven beyond peradventure by WE THE PEOPLE'S elevation of the Militia from the statutory to the constitutional plane: first, by incorporation of "the Militia of the several States" into the original Constitution's federal system, which implicitly acknowledged the necessity of those establishments for the purposes set out in the Preamble; then, by the Second Amendment's explicit declaration that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" in all circumstances and for all purposes whatsoever.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE

Near-universal membership, compulsory participation, and reasonable equality in individuals' burdens of service are necessary characteristics of "the Militia of the several States".

Ubiquity and continuity are fundamental principles of "the Militia of the several States", not just in terms of place and time—in that "[a] well regulated Militia", capable of dealing with every reasonably foreseeable danger, must exist within every State at all times; but also in relation to personnel—in that everyone who is eligible for duty must always participate to some appropriate degree.

A. Near-universal membership. "A well regulated Militia" is neither a private organization—and therefore exclusive in character; nor a governmental entity in which only a few select members of the community may participate—and therefore élitist in character. Instead, it is the one and only governmental institution in which everyone who is physically able to perform a useful function is expected to serve in one way or another—and therefore near-universal in character. In this, the Militia differs from every other public establishment and institution. To be sure, "[a] well regulated Militia" is always smaller than the community as a whole. But the community as a whole performs no particular governmental function. The electorate, too, may outnumber the Militia, depending on demographic circumstances. But, as explained below, service in the Militia is compulsory, whereas voting almost never is. And in any jurisdiction the Militia is always much larger than the aggregate of all other governmental entities.

1. Membership in "[a] well regulated Militia" must be near-universal, because the provision of "security [for] a free State"—in terms (say) of "execut[ing] the Laws * * * , suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions"[1652]—must be everyone's responsibility, everywhere, at all times. After all, in "a free State" the people govern themselves. A self-governing people exercise political power by and for themselves. "'Political power grows out of the barrel of a gun.'"[1653] Therefore, a self-governing people in "a free State" must control all of the "gun[s]" necessary to maintain political power in their own hands against all conceivable enemies, both foreign and especially domestic—and, when necessary, must be willing and able to use those "gun[s]" at a moment's notice, with neither hesitation nor compunction. In the normal course of events, public officials who have proven incompetent or otherwise unworthy of their positions can be voted out peacefully at the next election. But if an insurrection or an invasion succeeds, no new election may thereafter be possible. And if the laws are not enforced against aspiring usurpers and tyrants, upon their seizure of power such miscreants will substitute their own arbitrary dictates for the laws, to everyone else's detriment.

---

[1652] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1653] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

For society to depend upon professional "police" and other "law-enforcement" and "internal-security" forces separate from, independent of, and perhaps antagonistic to the people would be irresponsible in the extreme. Although such forces might provide adequate support for a police state concerned only with maintaining an élitist leadership-class in power, the Constitution itself declares that they cannot possibly guarantee "the security of a free State", to which instead "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary".[1654] For even if such forces did not prove to be too few in numbers, too deficient in training, or too bereft of equipment to put down insurrectionists or invaders, they could—and, as History repetitively teaches, probably would—treacherously cast their lots with, or themselves spawn, usurpers and tyrants. After all, "[t]he seizure of power by armed force * * * is the central task and the highest form of revolution".[1655] And armed force will likely be applied successfully by those who are best armed. In a self-governing "free State", no matter how heavily armed they may be, the people will not conduct revolutions against themselves. But when the balance of armed force shifts decisively into in the hands of others, some "form of revolution" is at least empowered, if not invited, encouraged, and facilitated.

For these reasons, every "free State" throughout America—in order to remain free—must enlist in her Militia essentially every free adult citizen of any age who is physically, mentally, and emotionally capable of performing any useful public service in that respect. "A well regulated Militia" consists of every eligible man and woman within the community, completely organized, equipped, trained, and assigned to particular duties according to statutes that define the types of service for individuals may volunteer or to which they may be assigned.

2. Generally, "[a] well regulated Militia" will have at least seven major components:

> (i) Those individuals from (say) sixteen to fifty or so years of age who are assigned to Local Militia Companies; are fully equipped at all times—usually with their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements; who undergo intensive regular training; and who assume the primary responsibility for whatever service in the field may be necessary.

---

[1654] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[1655] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

(ii) Those able-bodied individuals from (say) fifty to sixty or so years of age, and partially disabled individuals from sixteen to sixty years of age, who are assigned to their own Local Militia Companies; who are fully equipped at all times; but who are subject to only an intermediate degree of training; and who may be called forth for active service in the field only during "alarms" or in other exigent circumstances.

(iii) Those able-bodied individuals from (say) sixteen to sixty or so years of age who are exempt from other than minimal training and from all regular service in the field because of their important public offices or specialized private professions or trades which the community considers crucial to its functioning; but who are fully equipped at all times; and who may be called forth during "alarms" or in other exigent circumstances.

(iv) Those individuals who fulfill all of their Militia responsibilities by serving as full-time State or Local policemen, firemen, emergency-services personnel, or other specifically "homeland-security" operatives, according to the particular qualifications established for those specialized units within the Militia.

(v) Those individuals, otherwise eligible for Militia service, who voluntarily recruit, organize, equip, and train themselves in their own "Independent Companies", separate from other Local Militia units; who are subject to control by the regular Militia chain of command only for periodic inspections of their personnel and reviews of their activities, and when called forth for actual service in the field; and one of whose primary purposes is to devise and experiment with new methods of organizing, equipping, training, and deploying Militia in their particular States and Localities.

(vi) Those individuals, otherwise eligible for Militia service, who raise religious or other conscientious objections to their own possession or use of firearms, and who for that reason are assigned special Militia duties of an entirely "noncombatant" nature.

(vii) Those individuals who are to some degree not able-bodied, or who are beyond sixty years of age, but who can perform some useful service in the Militia, and who volunteer for such duty.

Cumulatively, these categories will embrace every adult free citizen from sixteen years of age—in or of whatever public office, private occupation, or religious conviction—other than those with absolutely incapacitating physical or mental disabilities. So membership in the Militia will be as near to universal as is practicable. Everyone who reasonably can serve will serve in some capacity. No inactive "unorganized militia" or "reserve militia" will exist. Neither will any "private militia" (assuming arguendo its legitimacy on other grounds) be likely to develop—because no one will be left to form it, except individuals less than sixteen years of age, who would be physically or mentally immature; or the physically or mentally disabled of every age, who could do little or nothing useful; or the few people with relatively sound minds and bodies over sixty years of age who would not want to volunteer for the real Militia, even in some "Independent Company".

B. Compulsory participation. "A well regulated Militia" is near-universal in composition because individuals eligible for enrollment in it are not just expected to serve, in the sense of a having merely a moral obligation to do so, but are required to serve, in the sense of being subject to a legally enforceable personal duty in that regard.

1. This duty is not indefinite, nor inchoate, nor contingent, but very specific and always operative. It attaches as soon as an individual becomes an adult and is capable of serving in some useful capacity, and continues for as long as he remains capable of participating productively, unless the legislature decides that special circumstances warrant some exemption for him in the public interest.

2. Although all of the "well regulated Militia" in every "free State" are establishments founded upon compulsory enrollment of their members—and therefore the very embodiments of the political power to impress, conscript, or draft most of the citizenry—such Militia do not derive from that power. Rather, the political power to impress arises out of the necessity for the Militia under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", and must be exercised so as and only to preserve the Militia as "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state".[1656] Impressment is no independent power of government, to be employed for any purpose whatsoever, but solely the means to ensure adequate enrollment in "[a] well regulated Militia" which makes all of the just powers of government in "a free State" possible. Impressment is a power of government solely because the Militia are constitutional establishments of government that consist of nearly all of "the people"; and therefore government may never exercise the power of impressment for any purpose that might disable the Militia from functioning at a high level of efficiency according to constitutional principles.[1657]

[1656] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1657] See ante, Chapters 3, 5, 14, and 16, and post, Chapter 49.

3. The justification for impressment should be self-evident. Almost all free men live, not in isolation, but in society. And in society, as Benjamin Franklin observed, "we must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately"[1658]—not just figuratively, but possibly literally as well if society succumbs to foreign invaders or to domestic usurpers and tyrants. For the preservation of his freedom within society, each man depends upon everyone else. To defend himself he must also defend them, and they him. To be sure, free men should always volunteer to do their duty. But if they refuse, they can and should be compelled to defend—if needs be, with their very own lives—the society in, through, and by the aid of which they enjoy their freedoms. No man may, in justice, partake of society's benefits while shirking the share of its burdens that he is capable of assuming.

America's Founders knew that the most prevalent as well as the most insidious internal threat to "a free State" is factionalism. As James Madison observed, "[t]he friend of popular governments never finds himself so much alarmed for their character and fate as when he contemplates their propensity to this dangerous vice". By his definition, a "faction" consists of "a number of citizens * * * who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community".[1659] Typically, both in Madison's era and thereafter, the goal and method of every faction have been and are to pervert the government into an engine for redistributing real wealth from society as a whole to the faction's members as a privileged class—today, for example, in violation of the unmistakable constitutional limitation that "Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes * * * to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States",[1660] not to provide particular and exclusive benefits to narrow special-interest groups at everyone else's expense. Yet, although blatantly anti-social in character and operation, factions enjoy a tremendous practical advantage as against the rest of the community, because of the perverse structure of economic incentives inherent in factionalism.[1661] A given amount of wealth to be redistributed to some faction through some proposed governmental program may amount to a significant sum for each individual member of that group. Therefore, the adherents of the faction will have a powerful incentive to organize themselves for aggressive electioneering, lobbying, and other political action in order to secure the program's enactment—with the ultimate measure of their commitment of time, effort, and money being roughly equal (at the margin) to the total amount of wealth they

---

[1658] Quoted in, e.g., John Bartlett, Familiar Quotations (Boston, Massachusetts: Little, Brown and Company, Thirteenth Edition, 1955), at 331b.

[1659] The Federalist No. 10.

[1660] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1661] See generally, e.g., Mancur Olson, The Logic of Collective Action: Public Goods and the Theory of Groups (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, Revised Edition, 1971).

expect to siphon off from that program. Conversely, even if the program results in the redistribution of huge amounts of real wealth, each solitary individual in the great mass of average citizens who are exposed to the increased taxes or monetary depreciation necessary to pay for the program will perceive his own potential losses as relatively minor—if he even becomes aware that the program may be enacted, what it may cost, or that it really costs anything when politicians and propagandists for special-interest groups ceaselessly advertise all governmental "services" and "social programs" as being "free". Therefore, the incentives for individual taxpayers or victims of monetary depreciation to oppose enactment of the program will be minimal, and their disincentives against forming protest organizations or engaging in defensive lobbying or political campaigns will be correspondingly large. Similarly, a proposed reduction in some ongoing governmental program that especially enriches some faction will threaten that faction's members with personal losses wholly disproportionate to the minuscule gains that might accrue to average individuals if cancellation of that program actually resulted in lower taxes for citizens in general. So, in this case, too, the economic incentives will always be essentially one-sided in operation. Thus, most of the members of a faction will not need to be coerced into participating in its anti-social activities, because they will understand that their involvement can be hugely profitable to each of them. Whereas, even if he comprehends what is going on, the average citizen will usually not voluntarily undertake activities designed (in Madison's evocative phrase) "to break and control the violence of faction", precisely because the cost of the necessary political activism will far exceed the economic benefits he may ultimately derive from it.

Obviously, though, the long-term stability of society cannot be secured when short-term economic incentives grounded in selfishness are constantly enhancing the wealth and political power of the very groups that are intent upon looting, and thereby *de*stabilizing, the community. Yet WE THE PEOPLE cannot simply sit back and expect public officials to correct this situation. As Madison pointed out, "[i]t is in vain to say that enlightened statesmen will be able to adjust these clashing interests [of factionalism] and render them all subservient to the public good. Enlightened statesmen will not always be at the helm."[1662] Besides, as he added, "[i]n framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself".[1663] And, of course, the government may not be able to "control itself" precisely because powerful factions exert undue influence over simple-minded, corrupt, or rogue public officials, gaining ever-increasing power as each iteration of their parasitism succeeds.

[1662] The Federalist No. 10.

[1663] The Federalist No. 51.

This is a fundamental reason why compulsory participation by all eligible individuals in the Militia is, as a purely practical matter, "necessary to the security of a free State"—because only compulsory participation can overcome the sizeable economic disincentives that discourage average citizens from otherwise organizing themselves effectively against factionalism. Indeed, in the long run, compulsory participation in the Militia is more likely "to break and control the violence of faction" than any other possible remedy. First, all legitimate social groups will be represented in the Militia—and ought to be, because cumulatively they all constitute "a free State". Second, being required to work together in and through the Militia for common goals will demand and bring about conciliation and compromise among the various groups, or at least compel by dint of circumstances each group to act as a "check and balance" on the possibly *anti-*social proclivities and pretensions of every other group. Third, properly disciplined, all of the component groups within the Militia will become mutually interdependent. Fourth, recognizing their mutual responsibility to provide for "the security of a free State" in every way, the groups so unified in the Militia will provide the most extensive and intensive "checks and balances" possible against anyone outside of the Militia who attempts to pervert the government for the purposes of factionalism—whereas, without the Militia, the factions will be highly organized but not subject to any significant "checks and balances" by the unorganized remainder of society.

4. By its very nature, the power of impressment for service in the Militia supports the principle of subsidiarity, that an ostensibly "higher" level of government (in the sense of its position on an organizational chart) should be delegated only those powers that "lower" levels of government cannot adequately perform, reserving all other powers for division among each of the "lower" levels on the basis of their particular competences.[1664] So, by empowering those "lower" levels, impressment into Militia service is profoundly federal in structure and operation.

a. The Constitution delegates to Congress the power and the duty "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution" all of its powers, including the power "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1665] Thus, Congress may draft the Militia for those purposes, and "provide * * * for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may [thus] be [compulsorily] employed in [1664] See U.S. Const. amend. X. This is the recognition, in the political realm, of something akin to what economists call "the problem of rational economic calculation"—essentially, that the information necessary to operate a complex social organization is usually created at the lower levels of the organization, and only slowly and imperfectly (if at all) filters up to the higher levels well after the fact; so that, whenever possible, the lower levels are positioned, and therefore should be allowed, to act on the information immediately available to them, without interference from the relatively ignorant higher levels. For a good introduction to the economic analysis involved, see, e.g., Trygve J.B. Hoff, Economic Calculation in the Socialist Society, M.A. Michael, Translator (London, England: William Hodge and Company Limited, 1949).

---

[1665] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 18 and 15.

the Service of the United States".[1666] But Congress need "make [no] Law[ ]" to authorize "the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions" in the first place—for the Constitution so declares the Militia's authority. And that declaration being "complete in itself, it executes itself".[1667] Congress's sole task is simply to provide the standards and procedures necessary and sufficient under normal circumstances "for calling forth the Militia" in order to perform one or more of those specific functions.

b. In the exercise of her concurrent powers over "the Militia of the several States",[1668] each State may draft her own Militia for two reasons: (i) the narrow purpose of "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections, and repel[ling] Invasions" when Congress has failed, neglected, or refused "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" to fulfill one or more of those assignments; and (ii) the broad purpose of performing any and all other tasks of "homeland security" that may possibly arise within the State.

c. If both Congress and the States should fail, neglect, or refuse to draft the Militia for any service the performance of is "necessary to the security of a free State", then WE THE PEOPLE not only could and should, but also would be required by "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" to, impress themselves into duty. For, if the Militia are composed and may enforce the participation of every eligible adult in the community, and are truly "necessary to the security of a free State", then, if public officials default on their duties to draft the Militia into service when "homeland security" at any level requires it, WE THE PEOPLE must order themselves into the field—if necessary, even "to throw off" "a[ ] Form of Government [that has] become[ ] destructive" of men's "unalienable Rights"[1669]—because, at that point in time, the command must be given, and no one else can or will give it.

5. Yet, although thoroughly compulsory in nature, "well regulated Militia" do not threaten Americans' "unalienable Rights". Quite the contrary:

a. The original Constitution and the Bill of Rights formed the charter of what the Declaration of Independence described as a "Government[ ] * * * instituted among Men, deriving [its] just powers from the consent of the governed" and intended "to secure [men's unalienable] rights". Both the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights provide for Militia based upon compulsory membership. Therefore, such Militia must be consistent, in both principle and practice, with their members' "unalienable Rights". And the power "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" by draft must be a "just power".

[1666] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1667] See Davis v. Burke, 179 U.S. 399, 403 (1900).

[1668] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied), and amends. II and X.

[1669] Declaration of Independence.

b. The Second Amendment assures Americans in so many words that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State"—that is, only by obliging all free men to defend their State can her freedom, and theirs, be secured. Moreover, the Constitution's Preamble identifies as two of its goals "to * * * provide for the common defence * * * and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"—and through the conjunction "and" the Preamble attests that WE THE PEOPLE expect both of these goals to be achieved simultaneously. The Second Amendment and the Preamble cannot contradict one another—for the Constitution must be construed "in such a manner, as, consistently with the words, shall fully and completely effectuate the whole objects of it".[1670] Therefore, inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", and inasmuch as the Constitution identifies no other establishment as "necessary" (or even useful) for this purpose, "[a] well regulated Militia", even though compulsory in nature, must be uniquely capable of providing for both "the common defence" and "the Blessings of Liberty".

c. The original Constitution authorized Congress "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union". The preëminent of these "Laws" (after "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" and the Declaration of Independence) is the Constitution itself. Its Preamble identifies the Constitution's overarching purposes, to which in their interpretation and application all of the powers of the General Government must be referred, and with which any and every such interpretation and application must be harmonized.[1671] So, whenever "the Militia of the several States" "execute the Laws of the Union", they must do so consistently with the Preamble's mandate to "provide for the common defence * * * and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity". Inasmuch as the Constitution explicitly delegates to no other institution the authority and responsibility "to execute th[os]e Laws", it implicitly identifies the Militia as "necessary" for that purpose. But "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union" in favor of "the common defence * * * and the Blessings of Liberty" is precisely providing for "the security" ("the common defence") "of a free State" (one in which the citizenry enjoys "the Blessings of Liberty"). So, on this score, the Second Amendment and the original Constitution are in perfect accord.

6. Compulsory service is an apparent exception to the "Liberty" which the Declaration of Independence considers so important that it explicitly lists it among men's "certain unalienable Rights". If justifiable at all, then, compulsory service must be closely confined to those purposes absolutely necessary to secure such "Rights". The Second Amendment identifies the Militia as "necessary to the security of a free State". The Militia are compulsory establishments. The Militia are the only establishments that enjoy such an explicit and sufficient constitutional justification for the power of impressment. (The only other explicit constitutional justification for compulsory service of any sort appears in Section 1 of the Thirteenth Amendment, which tolerates "slavery [ ]or involuntary servitude * * * as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted". In this case, though, compulsory service derives from an individual's own forfeiture of his "Liberty" as the consequence of his own serious anti-social misbehavior.) Therefore, the justification for compulsion in the case of the Militia arises, not from any purpose of depriving Americans of their "Liberty", but from the intent to secure "Liberty" for all through their own efforts. Rather than being an exception to "Liberty", in reality compulsory service in the Militia is an indispensable condition precedent to, the instrument for achieving, and perhaps even the most important component of "Liberty".

---

[1670] Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Peters) 539, 612 (1842).

[1671] See W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Volume 1, at 374-379.

For example, in "a free State" individuals must enjoy the "Liberty"—in the forms of the freedoms of speech, assembly, and petition[1672]—to debate, within constitutional bounds, the particular policies that such a State should adopt. But first there must be "a free State" in which such discussions can take place openly and without undue restraint. The Militia guarantee "the security", and thereby the existence as well as all of the political operations, of "a free State". So the Militia—and the requirement, inherent in their nature and consistently applied throughout American pre-constitutional history, that they be formed through near-universal impressment—are necessary to secure everyone's freedoms of speech, assembly, and petition. Which is hardly surprising, in light of the juxtaposition of the First and the Second Amendments in the Bill of Rights.[1673]

In their regular operations, the Militia also provide fora for investigations specifically by Militiamen of the extent to which public officials in particular and even Americans in general in every community are living up to the ideals of freedom, and what the people need to do in order to rectify any perceived shortcomings in these particulars.[1674] The purpose of these investigations is two-fold. Members of the Militia: (i) peaceably assemble in regular meetings of their Companies or other units in order to collect evidence in support of any "grievances" which they should "petition the Government" to "redress";[1675] and (ii) with such evidence in hand, then petition either the Militia itself or some other governmental body to take appropriate action. That attendance at these meetings is compulsory cannot detract from, but instead maximizes, their utility, by assuring that everyone who should participate does so.

[1672] U.S. Const. amend. I.

[1673] See ante, at 851-857.

[1674] See post, at 956-963 and 1134-1135.

[1675] U.S. Const. amend. I.

7. Compulsory enrollment of citizens in the Militia should terminate after (say) sixty years of age, in light of the unlikelihood that many individuals that old would be physically capable of continuing to perform some useful service. Nonetheless, no modern Militia statute should preclude anyone beyond such an age from volunteering for whatever Militia duties he could still fulfill. That is, any age-limit should be treated as an exemption, not an exclusion.[1676]

C. Equality in the burdens of service. Near-universal membership in the Militia implies that every able-bodied free adult has an equal duty of public service in principle. In practice, however, the actual substance of that duty, in terms of each individual's day-to-day activities, must vary according to the principles of the division of labor—the advantages of which accrue to society in the political as well as the economic field. So, the exact terms of a particular person's service will depend upon numerous contingencies, such as the numbers of eligible individuals of various ages and abilities available; the immediacy and severity of the threats that confront the community; the types of service deemed necessary in one Locality or another from time to time; and any important responsibilities to their community, other than Militia service, that particular individuals may have to fulfill.

The ultimate desideratum, though, should be to temper equality with discernment and discrimination, so that the burdens of service within reason weigh no more heavily on some than on others, unless disproportionate duties will promote the common defense and the general welfare better than something approaching strict equality of service. For this purpose (as explained immediately below), a general burden of service applicable initially to all must be tempered by various exemptions suitable to individuals differentiated on the basis of gender, age, critical public office or private occupation, specialized training or experience, and so on.

[1676] See post, at 948-950.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SIX

Service in each of "the Militia of the several States" is subject only to limited exemptions, all of which in principle must be consistent with the fundamental standards of "[a] well regulated Militia" and in application must advance "the common defence" and "the general Welfare".

Although the Militia are to be "well regulated" under the principles of near-universal enrollment and compulsory service, in practice some individuals may be exempted from some duties on the basis of other fundamental principles.

A. Exemptions a means to organize the Militia. In general, "to exempt" means "[t]o privilege; to grant immunity from".[1677] More specifically here, "to exempt" means "[t]o release or deliver from some liability which others are subject to; to except or excuse from the operation of a law * * * to free from obligation * * * as, to exempt from military duty"[1678]—or "[t]o relieve, excuse, or set free from a duty or service imposed upon the general class to which the individual exempted belongs; as to exempt from militia service".[1679] An exemption from some Militia service presumes that the individual to which it applies is a member of the Militia, and grants him an immunity from some duty for the performance of which he otherwise would be liable, but as a result of the exemption is then privileged not to perform. Thus, exemptions constitute a means, not for excluding people from the Militia ab initio, but for organizing and disciplining people within the Militia by assigning varying burdens of service to them. As such, exemptions must be consistent with the existence of Militia in which every eligible individual is "organized" in some way. Even those who may be granted some exemption are nonetheless required to serve, or at least are always made subject to service, in some specifically defined capacity. So, typically, exemptions are to be coupled with the performance of particular duties—such as the requirement to possess firearms and ammunition, or to serve in some noncombatant capacity; or with conditions—such as the exempted individuals' provision of substitutes, payment of some monetary compensation, or [1677] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

---

[1678] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 523, definition 2. Accord, N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15; The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 1, at 922, definitions 4. and 4.d.; Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 795, definition 2.

[1679] Black's Law Dictionary, ante note 368, at 681.

provision of firearms to others; or with limitations—such as an exemption's not being applicable during such "alarms" as insurrections or invasions.

Purported exemptions may never be employed to create an oxymoronic "*un*organized militia" composed of large numbers of individuals with no duties whatsoever, other than to do nothing almost all of the time, as is the all-too-typical statutory pattern for neglect (or, perhaps, intentional suppression) of the Militia today.[1680] During the pre-constitutional era, the Colonies and then independent States enjoyed the power to grant statutory exemptions from duties in their Militia that were themselves the products of statutes. Even so, as Rhode Island's experience illustrated, "th[e] Principle of general Utility" which legislators consulted in fashioning exemptions was always applied so as to serve the common defense, and always reserved and preserved for "the Public, in Cases of Necessity," its "Right to claim [every man's] personal Services" in the Militia.{EN-1973} Perhaps legislators in that era could legitimately have disregarded these purposes in fashioning exemptions for the benefit of factions and other selfish special interests. Even if so, after the Constitution was ratified in 1788 and the statutory duty of service in the Militia become constitutional in nature, the authority of both Congress and the States' legislatures to grant exemptions became explicitly limited by the Preamble's purpose to "provide for the common defence" and "promote the general Welfare".[1681] And that limitation was emphasized, if not extended, when the Bill of Rights was ratified in 1791, by the Second Amendment's declaration that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State".

B. No "right" to any exemption. Because of the principles of near-universal and compulsory membership, no eligible individual may claim an inherent (or unalienable) "right" to any exemption from duty in the Militia. Within constitutional boundaries, exemptions are matters solely of legislative discretion to define, grant, expand, contract, withdraw, limit, condition, or withhold entirely on such terms as policymakers may deem expedient. Therefore, exemptions must always appear in some statute, either explicitly or by necessary implication. Of course, once granted, an exemption may be claimed as a statutory right, privilege, or immunity. But, arising out of statutes alone, exemptions are always subject to change as circumstances demand. No one can claim a permanently "vested" right, privilege, or immunity in any statutory exemption (other than while the statute remains in force). Furthermore, because "the Militia of the several States" are not private organizations or in any way the products of "contracts" among their members or between a State's government and those members, a State's legislature is not prohibited by the constitutional constraint that "[n]o State shall * * * pass any * * * Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts"[1682] from rearranging individuals' terms and conditions of Militia service, as embodied in exemptions.

---

[1680] See, e.g., 10 U.S.C. § 311(b)(2); General Laws of Rhode Island §§ 30-1-4(4) and 30-1-5; Code of Virginia §§ 44-1, 44-4, 44-75.1(A), and 44-88.

[1681] See generally W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Volume 1, at 363-379. See post, at 943-945.

C. Exemptions limited by "the common defence" and "the general Welfare". Yet, although no "inherent", "unalienable", or permanently "vested" right to any exemption from Militia service can exist, exemptions can never be simply arbitrary and capricious in nature. Rather, every exemption must be consistent with both the structure of the Militia as "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms", and the purpose of the Militia as "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state",[1683] and otherwise must arise out of, depend upon, and serve some principle of general social utility that advances "the common defence" and "the general Welfare".[1684]

1. First and foremost, exemptions must not be suffered to undermine "the Militia of the several States" either in their fundamental legal principle, by denying the duty of every eligible individual to provide some service, or in their practical deployment, by removing too many individuals from the pool of those immediately available for service in the field. Inasmuch as exemptions must advance important public purposes, not cater to the parochial and ephemeral special interests of politically or economically influential factions, those who importune the legislature for relief from Militia duties generally applicable to others must establish either: (i) Their participation in the Militia is in fact not necessary and proper at all—because, for example, they are physically unable to perform those duties. Or, (ii) their fulfillment of duties in the Militia that many others could carry out just as well should give way to particular services to the community that only they can adequately deliver, and without their performance of which "homeland security" in the State or some Locality would suffer—because, for example, they occupy critical public offices or are engaged in essential private occupations. Or, (iii) in rare situations, their fulfillment of duties in the Militia is actually excluded by the nature of their civilian offices or occupations.

For an example of the last of these situations, the only official of the General Government whom the Constitution makes a member of "the Militia of the several States" is the President, whom it designates as their "Commander in Chief * * * when [they are] called into the actual Service of the United States" (but not otherwise).[1685] All other officials of that government Congress could completely exempt from the Militia, on the grounds of federalism: namely, that all of "the

---

[1682] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[1683] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13. Accord, U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1684] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1685] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied). See ante, at 871-880

Officers" of the Militia (other than the President) are appointed by the States, and thus are the States' "Officers";[1686] and officials of the General Government cannot be subjected to control by any of the States' "Officers" perhaps at all, and certainly where such control might interfere with their performance of their duties for that government.[1687] Yet, on the other hand, Congress could also conclude that no total exemption from Militia duty for officials, employees, and agents of the General Government would ever be necessary, because when the Militia were "call[ed] forth" for one or more of the three constitutionally permissible purposes,[1688] all of their members so activated—including the "Officers" appointed by the States—would be "employed in the Service of the United States"; and therefore commands from State "Officers" would constitute directives from "Officers" "excut[ing] the Laws of the Union" on behalf of the General Government itself.

Of course, because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State",[1689] any purely civilian function, whether in public office or private occupation, can justify an exemption from Militia service only if it, too, is reasonably "necessary to the security of a free State". That being so, individuals exempted on this score are not excluded or removed entirely from the Militia. Rather, the functions they perform are recognized as part and parcel of the overarching Militia duty that all citizens owe to their community. Certain public offices and private occupations are "necessary to the security of a free State" because "a free State" absolutely requires such offices to be filled and such occupations to be carried on if the community's normal political and economic life is to continue. Therefore, the exemptions individuals receive from particular Militia duties, in order to enable them to perform these critical public duties and private tasks, in effect operate as their assignments to forms of Militia service peculiar to them.

2. Of equal importance, though, a dearth of exemptions must not be suffered overly to weaken society by calling forth too many individuals too often for too much service in the Militia. "[W]ell regulated Militia" are to provide the "security" that is "necessary" for "a free State", not transform America into a gaggle of little "garrison states". So, the degree to which the plenitude of the near-universal duty to serve in the Militia needs to be enforced will depend upon the actual dangers confronting the community balanced against its ability to muster forces

---

[1686] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1687] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. See Wise v. Withers, 7 U.S. (3 Cranch) 331, 337 (1806), applying An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, § 2, 1 Stat. 271, 272: An officer of the United States, exempted from Militia service by Congress, "could never be legally enrolled" in a State's Militia, and therefore a court-martial could never have jurisdiction over him for his purported violation of any Militia duty. Actually, such a officer could and should be constitutionally "enrolled", but could interpose the exemption against performance of any duty.

[1688] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1689] U.S. Const. amend. II.

sufficient to deal with those threats while simultaneously maintaining "the home front" in a condition not too far removed from normalcy.

D. Pre-constitutional exemptions the norm. Because exemptions must have a largely empirical, experimental, and pragmatic cast—looking to what is workable in specific circumstances—the list adopted under the pre-constitutional Militia statutes is particularly useful as a guide.

As a matter of law fixed at the time of the ratifications of the original Constitution in 1788 and the Bill of Rights in 1791, the pre-constitutional list established the set of constitutionally permissible general categories of exemptions. For these categories—and only these categories—were part and parcel of the working definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" during that era. So no other categories of exemptions are consistent with such a Militia. Which means that no new categories can be added, and none of the original categories can be removed, from the set, except by a constitutional Amendment that redefines "[a] well regulated Militia" to that extent. Therefore, any specific exemption proposed for recognition today must fit with exactitude into one of the pre-constitutional categories, and then be shown as well to be consistent with "the common defence" and "the general Welfare" in these times.

Happily, contemporary social arrangements being not wildly dissimilar from those in the pre-constitutional era, as a matter of fact the pre-constitutional list provides a set of practical, well-tested categories of exemptions that should work as well today as they did then. The focus must be on categories of, rather than particular, exemptions drawn from the pre-constitutional lists, because some flexibility must be allowed for variances in social, economic, and political conditions over time. For example, not all of the public offices or private occupations included in those two categories during the pre-constitutional era would be considered critical (or, in the case of "overseers" of slaves on plantations, even allowable) today; whereas some offices or occupations which might be deemed essential today did not even exist then.

Neither Congress nor a State legislature is constitutionally bound, however, to grant a modern statutory exemption within every pre-constitutional category. For legislators could find that, under peculiar contemporary conditions, no need exists for any exemption within a certain category, or that the recognition of any such exemption would overly weaken the Militia and therefore must be refused. Thus, in keeping with the principles of near-universal enrollment and compulsory service, exemptions cannot be expanded in principle (by category), but can be greatly reduced in practice (by particular examples within a category, until perhaps the entire category lies dormant).

On the other hand, although exemptions from Militia duties must be consistent with "the common defence" and "the general Welfare" and in some significant manner conducive to "the security of a free State", they need not be restricted simply for the sake of restriction. Although America now faces perhaps more widespread and potentially catastrophic emergencies than at any time in the past—including nuclear, biological, and chemical attacks or accidents; epidemics or even pandemics; other environmental disasters; and, perhaps most likely of all, serial crises in her monetary and banking systems, with concomitant economic and social upheavals—and therefore needs more, and more thoroughly trained, Militiamen than ever before to provide adequate "homeland security", she also enjoys such a large population that a smaller percentage of her people than in *pre-*constitutional times needs to be mobilized in order to provide forces sufficient for immediate deployment. Therefore, a significant number of eligible individuals could be exempted from most or even all duty, other than the acquisition of primary equipment and basic training, upon the payment of some reasonable composition in the form of notional "fines". And the moneys thereby collected could largely finance the Militia—thus making the exemption of such superfluous manpower, upon adequate payments by those exempted, an actual and very useful form of service.[1690]

E. The categories of constitutionally permissible exemptions. Based on the foregoing, the following categories of exemptions stand out—

1. Disability. A significant disability must always exempt an individual, on the ground that his performance of the required duty is simply not possible, either at that time alone (as the consequence of some temporary infirmity) or at all (as the consequence of some irremediable condition).

a. In *pre-*constitutional times, exempting individuals with serious disabilities from "listing" in the Militia was the course common sense dictated, and no rational legislator would have refused to follow. Today, in revitalized "Militia of the several States", it would be a matter both of common sense and of constitutional requirement, because no one can be compelled to attempt to perform any duty that is simply beyond his physical, mental, or emotional abilities. In cases involving total disabilities as the result of which the individual can do nothing whatsoever that could contribute to the community's "homeland security", an exemption amounts to a true "unalienable right" (or, perhaps more pointedly put, an "unalienable immunty"), because—inasmuch as "Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed"[1691]—the community cannot in reason and therefore in justice demand from any of its members any service, no matter how slight, that he simply cannot perform. Such an individual is perhaps not so much "exempted from" as simply ineligible for the Militia.

[1690] See post, Chapter 43.

[1691] Declaration of Independence (emphasis supplied).

After all, impressment into Militia service can result in particular denials of an individual's "liberty", and perhaps the specific denial of his "life", too, if he is compelled to obey the orders of his superiors to a personally fatal conclusion. "No person", however, shall * * * be deprived of life, [or] liberty * * * , without due process of law"; "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, [or] liberty * * * without due process of law".[1692] If an individual can in fact perform some useful service in "[a] well regulated Militia", then statutorily compelling him to do so is, in a sense, the perfection of "due process of law", because "[a] well regulated Militia" cannot function without impressment, and a Militia so constituted is "necessary to the security of a free State",[1693] without which "due process of law" would not long continue. If, however, perforce of some disability, an individual simply cannot perform any useful service for the Militia, or the value of his provision of any such service is vastly outweighed by its cost, then the deprivation of his "liberty" by "listing" him in the Militia can achieve no rational purpose, and thus violates the first principle of due process, which outlaws "all substantial arbitrary impositions and purposeless restraints".[1694] So, certainly the impossibility—and arguably the substantial impracticability—of an individual's performance of any useful duty provides him with a constitutional immunity from compulsory service.

b. In cases involving severe disabilities as the result of which individuals cannot perform Militia services themselves but can still direct their own personal affairs, such individuals may be exempted from fulfilling any duties through their own individual efforts, but nonetheless may be required to finance the provision of suitable substitutes for themselves, or to pay the expenses their minor sons or wards may incur in the course of the latters' own Militia duties. Being limited to monetary obligations, these disabled individuals' duties would be only indirect—but withal they would be services in and for the Militia.

c. In keeping with the principle of near-universal enrollment, standards for physical and mental eligibility for the Militia must be prone neither to lax nor to arbitrary and capricious enforcement. Only after individuals have been called for enrollment in the Militia should suitably qualified officers exempt such as they may adjudge incapable of service—their decisions to be made on the basis of personal observations of the individuals' abilities or other dispositive evidence, coupled with

---

[1692] U.S. Const. amends. V and XIV, § 1.

[1693] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1694] Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 543 (1961) (Harlan, J., dissenting). Although the absence of a disability provides a so-called "rational basis" for denying an exemption, an individual aggrieved by such a denial would always be entitled to prove that he did in fact qualify for the exemption. See, e.g., United States v. Carolene Products Company, 304 U.S. 144, 152 (1938). On the other hand, where an individual denied that he was in fact disabled, the parties seeking to impose such an exemption on him would be required to make out at least a prima facie case. Compare Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railroad, 295 U.S. 330, 347-348 & note 5 (1935), and Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 525 (1934), with Mayflower Farms, Inc. v. Ten Eyck, 297 U.S. 266, 274 (1936).

the officers' own knowledge of what would probably be required of those Militiamen in the field. Moreover, any exemptions on the grounds of disability should be periodically reviewed to determine whether the individuals' underlying conditions have changed.

2. Age. The principles of near-universal enrollment and compulsory service demand that every able-bodied individual, of any age, who can perform some Militia services be subject in principle to some sort of Militia duty. For in extremis the security of the community may require la levée en masse, down to the last man and boy. In normal practice, however, as a matter of deference to the physical or mental immaturity of individuals of tender years and to the foreseeable degenerative consequences of superannuation in others, a legislature should enjoy some discretion to set reasonable statutory upper and lower limits of age, with individuals above or below those limits declared (or at least understood) to be exempt from enrollment in the Militia.

a. These boundaries cannot be merely arbitrary or capricious, but instead must rest upon empirical observations and scientific judgments concerning the typical physical and mental maturities, physical abilities, and continuing mental acuities among different groups—from which sound estimates can be made as to the likely capabilities of representative individuals within those groups to perform the duties to be required of them. Human experience since early *pre-*constitutional times suggests that under sixteen and over sixty years of age are reasonable outer boundaries within which, at the various stages of his life, the average individual can be presumed able to perform most Militia duties. Minor contractions at either end of that range—for example, up to eighteen and down to fifty-five years of age—might be justifiable in some special circumstances, provided that they did not adversely affect the total pool of individuals immediately available for Militia service. But otherwise they are inadvisable. Better to create specific and narrow exemptions for particular categories of individuals when and where necessary within the broadest possible range of ages, so as to secure for the Militia the largest possible pool of enrollees, than to exempt large numbers initially on the basis simply of age only to discover in times of "alarm" that the remaining pool proves too small to enable the Militia to provide the necessary level of security. And surely no major contractions in the range of eligibility are constitutionally allowable—for example, exempting from Militia service every eligible individual less than twenty one and more than thirty years of age—because, if this were permissible in principle, the range of ages could be so reduced as to render the Militia nothing but skeletal forces, if they survived at all.[1695]

[1695] The ages given in the example were not selected randomly, but because one State court actually held that a State could exempt from enrollment in her Militia all individuals outside of that range. Opinion of the Justices, 39 Mass. 571 (1838). Revealingly, this ill-considered decision was handed down but a few years after

b. If below or above the statutory limits on ages, individuals should not be compulsorily enrolled in the Militia. Presumably, the lower boundary of sixteen years of age would be sufficiently justifiable to the community that individuals known to be below it would never be allowed to volunteer for Militia duty—such exemption to be relaxed only in the event of an actual insurrection or invasion, massive natural disaster or industrial accident, or other catastrophe. Of course, such a fixed minimum age for enrollment in the Militia proper would not preclude mandatory education and training of young people in Militia principles and practices in all secondary schools.[1696] Indeed, it ought to compel such instruction, in order to ensure that individuals less than sixteen years of age were at least minimally prepared for compulsory enrollment in the event of such a calamity (as well as being ready to enter the Militia when they came of minimum statutory age). At the other extreme, though, an exemption from compulsory enrollment for individuals above sixty years of age should never prevent or discourage their voluntary service in whatever capacities they might prove useful, subject when appropriate to a Militia board of inquiry's assessment of their actual suitability for duty. After all, once the Militia had been revitalized for several years, the majority (if not all) of the individuals over sixty who were still physically and mentally fit would already have served at one time or another, and therefore would remain trained, equipped, and ready for some further service. History and common sense also suggest that many Militia officers in the higher ranks would likely be more than fifty or even sixty years old, so that mandatory retirement would foolishly deprive the Militia of the services of precisely those individuals with arguably the most extensive and useful experience.

c. Furthermore, just as in the case of physical disabilities, no limitation based solely on age should excuse the superannuated father or guardian of a minor from being required to pay the expenses the minor incurs in the course of his own Militia service. So even some individuals who themselves could perform no Militia services

---

Justice Joseph Story had observed that, although "the importance of a well-regulated militia would seem so undeniable, it cannot be disguised that, among the American people, there is a growing indifference to any system of militia discipline, and a strong disposition, from a sense of its burdens, to be rid of all regulations". Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646. And only two years after the decision had appeared, Massachusetts abolished compulsory service in her Militia altogether. See, e.g., John K. Mahon, The History of the Militia and the National Guard (New York, New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 1983), at 83, referring to Chap. 92, An ACT in addition to the several Acts concerning the Militia [Approved by the Governor, March 24, 1840.], §§ 1, 5, and 11, ACTS AND RESOLVES PASSED BY THE Legislature of Massachusetts IN THE YEAR 1840 (Boston, Massachusetts: Dutton and Wentworth, 1840), at 233, 234, 235. Thus, only one long lifetime had been required for the political leaders in Massachusetts, and apparently her common people as well, to forget the lesson of the 19th of April, 1775. Although the significance of this statute is just as lost on most Americans today, some college students can appreciate it. See Dominic Vieira, "The World Turned Upside Down: The Militia of the Several States, the National Guard and the Constitution", A Thesis Submitted to Dr. Adam Schwartz in Candidacy for the Degree of Bachelor or Arts, Department of History, Christendom College (Front Royal, Virginia: 30 April 2012).

[1696] See, e.g., B. Stentiford, The American Home Guard, ante note 1058, at 182-183, describing the so-called "Junior State Guard" program in Mississippi, immediately following World War II.

at all would nonetheless remain vicariously liable for the performance of some Militia duties.

3. Gender. As with age, the principles of near-universal enrollment and compulsory service require that every able-bodied individual, of either gender, who can perform some Militia services be subject in principle to some kind of Militia duty. For in extremis the security of the community may require la levée en masse totale, down to even the very last woman and girl. Yet the application of that principle as to women cannot, in the nature of things, be exactly the same as its application to men.

a. Because no Colony or independent State formally enrolled women in her Militia during the *pre-*constitutional era, some superficial students of this subject might advance the syllogism: anyone excluded from the Militia during *pre-*constitutional times should (or at least may) be excluded from the Militia today; women were excluded from the Militia in that era; therefore, women should (or at least may) be excluded from the Militia today. That conclusion is false, however. For although women typically were almost entirely exempted from *pre-*constitutional Militia service, they were never absolutely excluded. Here again, definitions are important. As has already been explained, "to exempt" means to grant someone an immunity or freedom from a liability that otherwise would attach to that individual.[1697] Whereas, "to exclude" means "[t]o shut out; to hinder from entrance or admission";[1698] "to debar from participation;[1699] and "to prohibit".[1700] Thus, "to exclude" means to shut out an individual from the relevant group in the first place, so that no liability related to membership in that group can ever attach to her; and therefore she requires no "exemption" from any particular liability. If the individual is subject to even a single liability related to membership, then she is not "excluded" from the group, even though she may be "exempted" from all other such liabilities.

In fact, that was the case for free adult women during *pre-*constitutional times. That *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes did not mandate the enrollment of women was not the product of legislators' legal disability to enroll them. No legislature of any Colony or independent State ever explicitly abjured a power to call forth adult able-bodied free women for some kind of service in, with, or for the Militia, at least in situations of direst necessity. Indeed, any such renunciation of authority would have been ridiculous on its face. For, in circumstances of direst

[1697] See ante, at 941.

[1698] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions. Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 890, definition 1.

[1699] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 521, definition 1. Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 1, at 918, definition 1; Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 793, definitions 1a and 1b.

[1700] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 2 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

necessity, every individual other than a pacifist or a coward will fight for his or her freedom even without an order to do so from public officials, because the alternative of sheepish submission to murder, rapine, and subjugation is suicidal and dishonorable.

Confusion on this score arises because *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes never explicitly exempted women from most duties. Rather, women's exemption was implicit in the statutes' directives to enroll "men" or "male persons", with no mention of women, and then assignments of various duties to the individuals so enrolled. But that some statutory duties did attach to women proves that the statutes' silence as to them in all other particulars constituted only a very broad exemption sotto voce, not an iron-bound exclusion a priori. For example, widows and other independent women were obliged to provide firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements for those of their minor sons and male apprentices and servants who served in the Militia, and to ensure that the latter performed their other Militia duties, by being made personally liable in monetary fines for any defaults in those particulars;[1701] and female "house keepers" such as widows were required to procure suitable male substitutes to serve on behalf of their houses in the Watch and the Ward.[1702] Had women been excluded from the Militia in the first place, these (or any other) Militia duties would never—indeed, in principle could never—have been imposed upon them. Whereas, because women were included in the Militia in principle albeit not to any great degree in practice, they could be exempted from almost all duties, yet nonetheless required to perform the few duties that legislators considered appropriate for them.

After all, women's broad exemption from most Militia service in *pre-*constitutional times derived from neither a physical impossibility for most women to perform at least some of those functions nor a lack of legislative power to require them to do so if the need arose. Instead, it embodied a judgment of social policy—based primarily on considerations of feminine physiology, together with then-prevailing religious, legal, and cultural mores—that women could not effectively serve in most of the capacities required of men, and in deference to societal values should not be impressed to serve in any but a very few of them.

b. Today, no purely legal rationale precludes either the inclusion of women in the Militia in some capacities, or their complete exemption from various duties not deemed suitable for them—in particular, service in the field as combatants.[1703] Each one of "the Militia of the several States" must be constitutionally "well

---

[1701] See ante, at 244-245 (Rhode Island) and 606-607 (Virginia).

[1702] See ante, at 242-244 (Rhode Island).

[1703] See Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57 (1981) (Congress may limit registration for the Selective Service System to men, because Congressional policy excludes women from combat assignments in the Armed Forces).

regulated"—and "[a] well regulated Militia" consists of "the people", because the basis of such a Militia is "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms".[1704] During the pre-constitutional period, the term "the people" could have been construed in at least two ways: first, physically, to include every adult human being in the community; second, politically, to include only those adult human beings who could have participated in the political process through their eligibility for exercise of the franchise. On the one hand, if the first interpretation is assigned to "the people" in "[a] well regulated Militia", then in pre-constitutional times women were always subject to duty in the Militia in principle, but were generally exempted from almost all duties in practice. And today their eligibility for service, and for exemptions from service, would continue, just as before. This is the more likely of the two interpretations, because during the pre-constitutional era women were subject to some Militia duties, if only of a financial nature. And if a legislature could have assigned to them some of those duties, it could have assigned all such duties. Moreover, during that era many men who could not vote—such as minors—were nonetheless subject to Militia service. So an individual's actual ability to participate in the political process was not the criterion for her, or his, mandatory participation in the Militia. On the other hand, if the second interpretation is assigned to "the people", then in pre-constitutional times "[a] well regulated Militia" included only adult able-bodied men, because only men were eligible to vote in principle (even if not all of them actually were allowed to vote for one reason or another). Presumably, that definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" continued in every State until women were included among "the people" by being granted the right to vote—a process that ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment completed in 1920.[1705] So, even if the provisions relating to the Militia in the original Constitution and the Second Amendment needed revision in order to bring women within "the people" and therefore within "[a] well regulated Militia", the Nineteenth Amendment arguably performed that task. Therefore, today, as part of either the physical or the political definition of "the people", women may serve, and because of the Militia's compulsory nature may be required to serve in suitable capacities, in "well regulated Militia".

c. Nonetheless, contemporary arbiters of public policy in this regard must not allow modern ideological blinders to close their eyes to the differences between the sexes, to the unique and indispensable separate contributions to a stable and well-ordered community that each sex makes, and otherwise to the profitable application of the economic principle of the division of labor based upon the distinctions between the sexes that biology and culture render inescapable.

[1704] Compare U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 with amend. II.

[1705] U.S. Const. amend. XIX provides that "[t]he right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex".

Whether and to what extent women may desire to serve in the Militia, or not to do so, and in what numbers they may vote for legislators who will effectuate such desires, however, remain political questions that can be answered only in the course of the electoral campaigns that will occur as part of the process of revitalizing "the Militia of the several States". Women are participants in self-government who contribute many votes. The ability to vote, though, is not enough. True self-government implies and demands self-knowledge, self-restraint, and self-defense, too. It is not unlikely that the vast majority of modern women, applying foresight and discernment from their special perspective, will conclude that compelling large numbers of women to undergo "combat training" in the Militia, let alone acually to engage in real combat, will be highly detrimental to women as individuals as well as destabilizing of the society in which most women want to live. And therefore they will agree that women's involvement in the Militia should be limited to providing financial support—for example, by being exempted from most duties upon payment of various fees—or to serving in staff, administrative, service, or like capacities well insulated from any assignment directly related to combat.

d. In any event, in keeping with the *pre-*constitutional practice that defines "[a] well regulated Militia" in this regard, the overarching principle remains that women enjoy no constitutional "right" to serve in the Militia on the basis of strict equality with men across the board, and therefore may constitutionally be exempted from essentially all Militia service, and certainly all Militia service that might result in their direct deployment into the field in the capacity of combatants. So, in dealing with women in the Militia, contemporary legislators should consider selectively crafting and applying absences of exemption—by setting out in the statutes explicit, specific, and limited assignments of duty, with all other service at least implicitly exempted—rather than adopting overly broad statutory language that requires women to serve on an unattainably "equal" basis with men unless subject to some explicit exemption.

4. Public offices. During the *pre-*constitutional era, public officials as a class were never excluded from the Militia perforce of their positions in civil government. Rather, some officials were granted statutory exemptions from some Militia duties. The existence of these exemptions proves that, in their absence, even while holding public offices those individuals would have been required to serve in the Militia to the fullest extent mandated by law as a consequence simply of their being otherwise eligible for service. Inasmuch as these exemptions substituted one public service (in the civil government) for another public service (in the Militia), they should be deemed in effect not really "exemptions" from the Militia but only reassignments of duties within the Militia—that is, by serving in certain public offices the incumbents were performing part of their Militia duty. All that being the case in *pre-*constitutional times, it remains the case today as part of the constitutional definitions of "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" and "[a] well regulated Militia".[1706]

a. That performance of the tasks connected with certain public offices may substitute for ordinary types of Militia service is an application of the fundamental operative principle of the Militia that everyone owes a duty of personal service to the community, but not necessarily in or through the selfsame institution or establishment that serves the community. For most individuals, this duty must be fulfilled through actual Militia service, because "a well regulated militia * * * is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state",[1707] and the only one that the Constitution declares to be "necessary to the security of a free State" (or, for that matter, "necessary" for any purpose at all).[1708] But the legislature may grant exemptions from some, even most, forms of Militia service to those individuals who perform certain other, purely civilian functions in the government. The criterion for any such exemption is those functions' practical necessity in relation to the overarching purpose of the Militia—that is, the degree to which they contribute to "homeland security". For inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", service in a particular public office can justify an exemption from Militia service only if it, too, is reasonably "necessary to the security of a free State".

Some exemptions from Militia duties for incumbents in certain public offices are "necessary to the security of a free State", at least in tranquil times, because "a free State" absolutely requires such offices to be filled if its normal political and legal life is to continue. As a quasi-military establishment, "[a] well regulated Militia" can be neither the full embodiment of "a free State", nor the purpose of "a free State", nor a sufficient means for governance of "a free State" during the peaceful course of human events. Civil government is necessary, too. Any Militia would actually prove detrimental to the "safe defence of a free state" if its demands for manpower, training, and deployment seriously undermined the efficacy of civil government. And "a free state" does not exist if the entire community is subject at all times to even the attenuated form of "martial law" applicable to the Militia.[1709]

b. The mere existence of a public office, however, does not necessarily entail the automatic exemption of its occupant from all, or even any, of the Militia duties to which that individual would otherwise be subject. This should be self-evident, inasmuch as all members of the Militia are to some degree "public officials", because they are part of a governmental institution with the authority and responsibility "to

---

[1706] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 and amend. II. See ante, at 63-81.

[1707] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1708] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[1709] See post, Chapter 48.

execute the Laws of the Union" on behalf of the General Government,[1710] and the laws of the several States and their myriad Localities on the States' behalf.[1711] Surely, though, incumbents in all public offices in charge of absolutely "critical" governmental functions should qualify for exemptions that will enable them to perform those functions to their full extent. Most reasoning minds would agree that a "critical" function is one of such supreme importance to the community that, as a practical matter, it would have to be taken in hand by the Militia itself under some form of "martial law" if it were not being performed to a minimally satisfactory degree by civilian officeholders. That is, a "critical" governmental function is one the performance of which obviates even the arguable necessity for such "martial law". Public officials who perform those functions should be granted exemptions from the Militia so that they can single-mindedly concentrate on those tasks, and thereby can relieve the Militia from being deployed to fulfill them in the course of a crisis that threatens "the security of [their] free State".

The primary "critical" functions of contemporary government (and the officers performing them) fall under two heads: The Power of the Law (namely, legislators, judges, and such executive officers as the Governor and Attorney General)—for if the government cannot make and enforce the laws that may be indispensable in a crisis, how is public order to be maintained? And the Power of the Purse (namely, the Treasurer or equivalent official)—for if the government cannot tax and spend, who is to collect and disburse the public resources necessary to secure the common defense and promote the general welfare under catastrophic conditions? Although undeniably the font of perhaps the most "critical" governmental functions of all—because "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'"[1712]—a third great power of government, the Power of the Sword, would not support "exemptions" in the strict sense from Militia duty for civil law-enforcement officers. For, in properly revitalized "Militia of the several States", State and Local police forces, Sheriffs' departments, and like agencies would be subdivisions of the Militia that enforced civilian law throughout the federal system, but the members of which were themselves always subject to regulation by their Local Militia for the sake of their own training and especially discipline.[1713]

c. Of course, not just public officials who perform absolutely "critical" functions could be granted some exemptions from Militia duty. Contemporary American society being more complex than was society in the *pre-*constitutional era, and therefore the rôle of government being more extensive and intricate now than then, many public offices exist today which were unknown in *pre-*constitutional

---

[1710] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1711] See U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

[1712] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1713] See ante, at 327-328, and post, at 1135-1138, 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488.

times, but for which a reasonable argument in favor of some exemption for their incumbents can now be advanced on the grounds simply of public convenience. Inasmuch as contemporary society also has far more than enough people to provide effective Militia in most Localities, the expansion of exemptions to officeholders in "important" albeit not "critical" positions, and perhaps in "highly useful" albeit not even "important" positions, would maintain the efficiency of civil government while not undermining the Militia. The controlling criterion for any such exemption, though, must always be the existence of evidence of an overall positive return between what is taken from the Militia, on the one hand, and what is transferred to the civil government, on the other—namely, that society receives more in public service by granting the exemption than by denying it. Therefore, *pre-*constitutional lists of particular public offices for which exemptions of their incumbents were allowed in no way limit legislators' discretion today, because those lists, while illustrative of application of the principle that must always control such exemptions, were not independent of the peculiar circumstances of those times, but were themselves drawn up on the basis of legislators' pragmatic judgments that, under those circumstances, those offices were in some sense "critical", "important", or "highly useful".

d. Obviously, the nature and extent of any public officeholder's exemption from Militia service should be proportioned to the nature and extent of the duties the officeholder performs in the civilian government. Yet, no matter how "critical" those duties may be, no such exemption should ever excuse any such individual entirely from all aspects of Militia service. Typically, this was the case in *pre-*constitutional times, usually with different limitations or conditions attaching to different exemptions. And, during that era, what sometimes appeared on the face of a statute to be an exemption from certain types of service as a matter of law was not always so as a matter of fact. For example, many of the individuals whom the statutes explicitly exempted from compulsory attendance at Militia "musters" on account of their public offices might have served as high-ranking officers in the Militia and therefore would have attended "musters" as a matter of course, albeit voluntarily. Today, statutes for revitalizing "the Militia of the several States" should not depend upon such voluntary participation, but instead should specify with exactitude that no individual, no matter what public office he may hold, is to be exempted from certain minimum terms of service. To wit—

(1) No public officials should ever be exempted from the basic duty to attend a designated number of the regularly scheduled meetings of the Local Militia Companies in which as individual private citizens they were enrolled. The "meetings" proposed here should be distinguished from "musters". "Musters" would involve some kind of formal instruction, training, or actual deployment in the field, the form and substance of which would vary, depending upon precisely what type of Company happened to be involved.[1714] "Meetings", on the other hand, would entail essentially the same activities for all types of Companies: namely, (i) performing the ordinary business of maintaining and operating the Company (such as electing officers, planning activities distinct from "musters", and authorizing the disbursement of discretionary funds), and then (ii) disseminating and discussing democratically in committee of the whole whatever political, economic, and other information the Militiamen deemed relevant to the Militia's functions—including what public officials were doing, why they were doing it, what were the present and likely future consequences of their actions for good or for ill, and what WE THE PEOPLE should do about the matter.[1715]

The requirement that, as a condition of their exemptions from Militia duties in other respects, all public officials must attend such meetings and participate in disclosure of and critical inquiry into their behavior in office will be vital to the proper functioning of all "well regulated Militia" in these days in which public administration is so complex (and often so corrupt). Notwithstanding that the Militia are always "necessary to the security of a free State" in principle, they will inevitably prove to be ineffective for that purpose in practice unless they can avail themselves of all the information that may be necessary for them to carry their functions to fruition in a timely and efficient manner. Self-evidently, the performance of its duties by civil government—whether good, bad, or indifferent, and particularly in the latter two cases—is one critical component of "the security of a free State". For "the two greatest securities the[people] can have for the faithful exercise of any delegated power [are], first, the restraints of public opinion * * * and, second, the opportunity of discovering with facility and clearness the misconduct of the persons they trust, in order either to their removal from office or to their actual punishment in cases which admit of it".[1716] Therefore, to discharge their own responsibilities, the Militia will need to be continuously and completely apprised of officials' performances in office. And to guarantee that they are so informed, the Militia themselves will need to exercise the authority to compel public officials—who comprise the source of arguably the best evidence on that score—to describe, explain, and justify their actions to the Militia on a regular basis. To be sure, even today public officials should have a responsibility to prove (say) that they are [1714] For example, "musters" for an Engineering Company would differ from "musters" for a Communications Company, a Transportation Company, or some other specialized Company—all of which would differ from "musters" for unspecialized "line" Companies.

---

[1715] Inasmuch as revitalized "Militia of the several States" would be organized on a Local basis, a particular public official would be enrolled in the Militia Company in his own neighborhood. But the territory his office served might include many neighborhoods, a Town, a City, a County, or even the entire State. So his appearance before his own Militia Company would likely interest many other Companies. Modern technology, however, would allow for virtual participation in the Local Militia Company's meeting by as many Companies as had access to telephones or the Internet.

[1716] The Federalist No. 70 (Alexander Hamilton) (bold-face emphasis supplied).

complying with their "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution" whenever "the people * * * petition the Government for a redress of grievances" that arguably arise from violations of those "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s]".[1717] In fact, however, petitions from "the people" typically fall upon deaf ears and mute lips, because no mechanism exists to compel wayward officials' to respond to common citizens' complaints or related inquiries, no matter how serious the "grievances" at issue may be. Conditioning public officials' exemptions from other Militia duties upon their fulfillment of a duty to respond to "the people" in their own Local Militia Companies will put teeth into the right to petition.

In particular, the requirement that public officials must participate in regular Militia meetings and submit to inquiries concerning their behavior in office will enable the Militia to fulfill their constitutional responsibility to execute the laws against incompetents, adventitious lawbreakers, and aspiring usurpers and tyrants who somehow insinuate themselves into public office. That the Constitution explicitly delegates to the Militia the specific authority and responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union", and implicitly reserves to the Militia that same authority and responsibility with respect to the laws of the several States,[1718] proves that the Militia are not just military or *para-*military establishments, but above and beyond that are legal and political institutions. For the Constitution assigns to the Militia the duty "to execute the Laws" ahead of the duties to "suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions". So, in furtherance of this vital purpose, under its authority "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia" and "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union" Congress should mandate that, as part of their regular organizational routine, the Militia conduct investigations into the consistency of public officials' behavior with those laws.[1719] And the States should do the same with respect to their own laws, under their concurrent authority to organize their Militia.

This would hardly constitute a startling legal innovation. After all, each and every legislature in America—composed, not of WE THE PEOPLE themselves, but merely of their supposed, yet all too often disloyal, "representatives"—is empowered to conduct investigations:

> [T]he power of inquiry—with process to enforce it—is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function. * * *
>
> * * * A legislative body cannot legislate wisely or effectively in the absence of information respecting the conditions which the legislation is intended to affect or change; and where the legislative body does not itself

---

[1717] Compare U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3 with amend. I.

[1718] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 with amends. II and X.

[1719] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

> possess the requisite information * * * recourse must be had to others * * * . Experience has taught that mere requests for such information often are unavailing, and also that information which is volunteered is not always accurate or complete; so some means of compulsion are essential to obtain what is needed.[1720]

The Constitution assigns three specific responsibilities to the Militia when "employed in the Service of the United States",[1721] and implicitly recognizes an indefinite list of responsibilities for the Militia's provision of "the security of a free State" to each of their States. With respect to the fulfillment of all of these responsibilities—

> • Because no "well regulated Militia" could possibly function "wisely or effectively in the absence of information respecting the conditions" under which they were to operate, the Militia must enjoy the inherent authority to perform whatever investigations may assist them in the performance of their duties. And,
>
> • Because Congress or a State's legislature would always be authorized to investigate matters relating to the Militia's activities, Congress or a State's legislature could delegate authority for the Militia to conduct such investigations.[1722]

In either event, "[t]he scope of the power of inquiry" would be "as penetrating and far-reaching as the potential power" the Militia might exercise,[1723] enabling the Militia to examine into and expose political subversion, malfeasance, fraud, corruption, misfeasance, nonfeasance, and incompetence; to survey how effectively the laws relating to "homeland security" were being executed; and to consider what actions were needed to improve "homeland security" in the political, economic, and social realms.[1724] Moreover, because public officials are also members of the Militia whose exemptions from Militia service are conditioned upon their full, faithful, honest, and competent performance of official duties, the Militia may investigate their official conduct as a matter of internal Militia discipline.[1725] And even if such [1720] McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 174-175 (1927) (Congress). See also id. at 165-166 (the States' legislatures).

---

[1721] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[1722] See, e.g., Hanna v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420, 440-451 (1960); Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U.S. 447, 472-474 (1894).

[1723] See, e.g., Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 111 (1959).

[1724] See, e.g., Wilkinson v. United States, 365 U.S. 399, 407-415 (1961); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187-188 (1957); Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 117-132 (1959); Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263, 294-295 (1929); McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 177-178 (1927).

[1725] See, e.g., In re Chapman, 166 U.S. 661, 668-670 (1897); Barry v. United States ex rel. Cunningham, 279 U.S. 597, 612-617 (1929).

investigations could pour the foundations for eventual criminal prosecutions, they would be constitutionally valid[1726]—although, depending upon the scope of the Militia's statutory mandate, they might require investigators to afford witnesses the full panoply of procedural protections the Constitution guarantees in other contexts.[1727]

At the least, the requirement that public officials submit to such inquiries will exert both a salutary educative and a sanitizing deterrent effect. Officials who must regularly appear before their own Local Militia Companies—on which occasions their behavior in office will become the subject of investigation, evaluation, and (if appropriate) face-to-face criticism or even condemnation by their true peers among common Americans—will not be able to imagine themselves separate from, independent of, and superior to WE THE PEOPLE. And knowing that they will be inescapably subject and answerable directly to THE PEOPLE—with no opaque layers of governmental bureaucracies, political parties, or special-interest groups to shroud them from searching scrutiny—they will be deterred from any but the most recondite misbehavior. Deterrence is the more important the more powerful the public office and the more-expansive the extent of other exemptions from Militia duty its incumbent has been granted, because: (i) The more powerful the office the greater the temptation to the officeholder to abuse his authority, inasmuch as (according to Lord Acton's familiar dictum) "all power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely".[1728] (ii) The more powerful the office the greater the peril to society from its perversion. And (iii) the more extensive his other exemptions, the less the incumbent will otherwise find himself under close observation by WE THE PEOPLE in the Militia. Furthermore, nothing will deter rogue public officials' negligence, recklessness, willful blindness, or intentional misbehavior more effectively than the requirement, directly enforceable though Militia discipline, that they periodically provide, and personally at that, an exposition, explanation, and if necessary exculpation of their conduct to fellow-citizens for whom their mere incumbency in public office may very well constitute probable cause for suspicion. (This situation will be beneficial for competent and scrupulous officeholders, too, because they will have an incentive continuously to inquire into and improve their performances.)

To be sure, deterrence is never perfect, and may fail. But then the requirement that public officials participate in regular Militia meetings wherein they must respond to complaints and submit to inquiries concerning the performance of their duties during their tenures in office will allow for timely exposure of their [1726] See, e.g., In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330, 332-335 (1957); Anonymous Nos. 6 and 7 v. Baker, 360 U.S. 287, 290-298 (1959).

---

[1727] Contrast Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420 (1960), with Jenkins v. McKeithen, 395 U.S. 411 (1969).

[1728] Essays, ante note 1563, at 519.

wrongdoing, with appropriate censure and correction not far behind. At the least, serious misbehavior in public office should be treated as an offense within and against the Militia itself, and therefore subject to Militia regulations, so that such wrongdoing could be punished just as soon as it were ferreted out. The rationale would be that misconduct in public office violates the condition implicit in any exemption from other Militia duty that the individual should carry out the responsibilities of his public office properly. After all, it would be irrational to grant an exemption that in principle weakened the Militia which is "necessary to the security of a free State", and at the same time license the beneficiary of that exemption to undermine through his own misconduct the civil government which is a vital component of "a free State". This principle could easily be extended to any and all misbehavior in public office, of whatever degree, by anyone whose exemption from any Militia duties derived from his incumbency. And, as a further safeguard, all varieties of egregious misconduct in office which were first exposed and punished as offenses specifically against the Militia would be then subject to further investigation, trial, and punishment outside of the Militia as normal civil or criminal offenses.

This approach would offer unique advantages: It would be effective at all times—for critical review of public officeholders' conduct by the Militia would take place not just every few years during normal election-cycles, but on many days in every year in every Local Militia Company. It would be quicker, easier, and surer to apply than other means of detection and punishment—such as the process of impeachment, which has proven too cumbersome to be useful in the general case, no matter how desperately it may be needed;[1729] or private civil-rights lawsuits, which are at best adventitious and always time-consuming and expensive, even if they succeed in the face of judges no less rogue than the officials being sued;[1730] or public prosecution for crimes committed under color of law,[1731] which may be thwarted by some "good old boy" network of malefactors within the governmental apparatus. It would tend to nip potentially serious problems in the bud, by exposing incipient misbehavior before the negligence, recklessness, or outright criminality of politically entrenched rogue officials rose to a level that could cause egregious, perhaps irreparable, damage to individuals, the Local community, the State, or even the country as a whole. It would constantly, pointedly, and very personally remind public officials that they are WE THE PEOPLE'S servants, not THE PEOPLE'S masters; that they are answerable to THE PEOPLE for every aspect of their conduct, not immune from inquiry to any degree; that their behavior will always be under the closest scrutiny; and that their wrongdoing will be swiftly and surely exposed, and

---

[1729] See, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5, and § 3, cls. 6 and 7; and art. II, § 4.

[1730] See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (officials and employees of State and Local governments); Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971) (officials and employees of the General Government).

[1731] E.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

severely punished.[1732] Above all, it would build and enforce the only constitutionally correct form of political consensus within the community. Through inquiry as to officials' behavior, exposure of their wrongdoing, admonitions, and (where necessary) punishments, "well regulated Militia" would "well regulate" THE PEOPLE'S ostensible "public servants" according to THE PEOPLE'S conceptions of propriety, responsibility, and efficacy.

That some public officials might take offense at being taken down a peg in this way from the exaggerated heights they imagine themselves to occupy would prove only how little they understand their constitutional positions as against the Militia. To be sure, during the *pre-*constitutional era, the Militia were the creatures of Colonial or State statutes—and for that reason could be seen as somehow inferior in status to the officials who enacted those laws. The people constituted the Militia; but, outside of the tumultuous times that began in the 1770s, their rôle in governance was limited to their involvement in elections as voters, in the judicial process as jurors, and in the legislative arena as petitioners. The Constitution, however, elevated the Militia from primarily onlookers to full and permanent participants in its federal system. They—and WE THE PEOPLE who comprise them—are no longer simply creatures of Congress's and the States' laws, presumably subordinate to legislators, but are now component parts of "the supreme Law of the Land", by which "the Judges in every State shall be bound * * * , any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding", and to which "[t]he Senators and Representatives [in Congress] * * * and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation".[1733] This being so, public officials should no longer be suffered to contrive to channel THE PEOPLE'S political voices through the artificially narrow and insulated confines of elections, too often rigged by career politicians, professional activists from the "two" major political parties, string-pullers of special-interest groups, propagandists in the big media—and, if the truth be faced courageously, systematic and pervasive fraud in the counting of votes. Perforce of their constitutional position, the Militia have become permanent and powerful political fora, too—perhaps, if intelligently employed, the most influential and efficacious political fora of all.

Thus, the requirement that public officials must participate in Militia meetings as a condition of any exemption from other Militia duties is yet another

---

[1732] The rule that public officials should be subject to stringent policing, no less (and perhaps even more) strictly than other citizens, is nothing particularly novel, but has been adopted and enforced to good effect in relatively simple societies. For example, among the Lakota people, when even the most respected chief misbehaved, he could be severely disciplined by the camp police, the akicita—and when in the wrong would quietly submit. See, e.g., Thomas Powers, The Killing of Crazy Horse (New York, New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2010), at 224.

[1733] U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3.

very important way in which organization in revitalized "Militia of the several States" will enable WE THE PEOPLE to exercise self-government effectively. For ultimately the success of self-government depends upon THE PEOPLE'S timely access (i) to all material information as to how their representatives in government are performing—or are failing, neglecting, or refusing to perform—the responsibilities of office, and (ii) to an efficient process by which those representatives can be compelled to conform their behavior to their "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution", or be exposed and punished for not doing so.

(2) In addition to attending regular meetings of their Local Militia Companies, public officials, if not already expected to serve as Militia officers, should be required to appear in the field during the type of grave emergencies pre-constitutional Militia statutes designated as "alarms". Perverse would be an exemption that, for example, licensed legislators to sit blathering in their chamber in the capitol while an enemy's forces goose-stepped into the capital. What purpose would their exemptions then serve—other than making them available to cobble together some cowardly instrument of surrender at the point of the invaders' bayonets? If, however, the performances of those officials' functions in the civil government at that time were actually indispensable to the community's response to the threat underlying the "alarm", the officials should be suffered to send suitable substitutes in their stead[1734]—especially in the case of judges and the staff necessary to keep the courts open, so that no possible excuse for any form of "martial law" could be drummed up.[1735]

(3) In order to be able to serve the Militia in the field during "alarms", all public officials otherwise exempted from the full panoply of Militia training should be required to satisfy some minimal standards of personal preparedness. None of them (nor anyone else, for that matter) should be exempted from the requirements that: (i) every member of the Militia (other than conscientious objectors) must possess, in his own home and in readiness for use at all times, one or more firearms suitable for Militia service, together with sufficient ammunition and appropriate accoutrements; (ii) every member of the Militia (including conscientious objectors) must be trained in basic firearms' operations and safety; and (iii) every member of the Militia must pass a test of proficiency in at least one discipline related to emergency services, such as fire-and-rescue work, first aid, survival under primitive conditions, community hygiene, and so on.

The emphasis on requiring public officials to arm themselves obviously derives in part from the very nature of "the Militia of the several States" as armed establishments: Anyone who participates in the Militia in any way must become thoroughly familiar with firearms, because the quintessence of the Militia is "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms".[1736] But this emphasis also takes into account that well-financed subversive groups operating both domestically and internationally are attempting through mass propaganda and agitation, lobbying, and judicial activism to eliminate that "right of the people", and with it the possibility of any "well regulated Militia", and then "the security of a free State"—until no "free State" exists or can exist anywhere in America. Although this campaign for "gun control" must be countered everywhere, and the mentality it has sown among all too many Americans must be pulled up by the roots and the contrary, constitutional point of view planted and cultivated in its place in everyone's mind, nowhere is this work more necessary or urgent than among public officials who—precisely because they have direct access to the powers of civil government and through ignorance or malice might misuse those powers to promote "gun control"—are the main targets of "gun controllers'" efforts. These efforts will be thoroughly thwarted, however, if public officials are compelled to learn the truth about "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" through personal, "hands-on" involvement with firearms in the Militia. Knowledge born of actual experience, after all, is usually the best prophylactic against goofy ideologies.

---

[1734] See post, at 977-981.

[1735] See post, Chapter 48.

5. Private occupations. Carefully crafted limitations exempting individuals in some, but not all, private occupations from some, but not all, Militia duties were always part of the statutory definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" during the *pre-*constitutional era, and therefore became and today remain part of that constitutional definition. Some, but not all—because Americans of that era knew not to put the cart before the horse: that, as important as the free market may be to society, private enterprise is not separate from, independent of, and superior to the community, but is only one component of the totality of human activities that make up, and first and foremost must always serve, the res publica.

a. By itself alone, an individual's mere gainful employment in some private occupation obviously cannot justify an exemption from Militia service, or else no Militia of significant size would ever be possible in America. For most people are employed, by themselves or others, in some manner for a large part of their time. Yet exemptions for some individuals in deference to the special natures of their particular private occupations make eminently good sense. For, although "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State",[1737] such a Militia is neither the entirety nor the purpose of such a "State". Rather, most of the activity in "a free State" consists of private enterprise, the purpose of which is to assist the people, as producers and consumers, in their personal "pursuit of Happiness"—for the security of which "unalienable Right[ ]", the Declaration of Independence attests, "Governments are instituted among Men" in the first place. And although "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state",[1738] being "trained to arms" in the Militia cannot by itself provide "a free state" with the economic support necessary even to guarantee the people a rudimentary day-to-day existence, let alone to secure for them anything approaching prosperity. Moreover, "train[ing the people] to arms" to an exorbitant degree could actually prove detrimental to the economic life of the community, and therefore to the "safe defence of a free state", by seriously restricting the provision of essential private services, including those upon which the Militia depended. Therefore, because "[a] well regulated Militia" is a governmental establishment, one of its main purposes must be to protect the people in their personal "pursuit of Happiness" through private enterprise. And because flourishing private enterprises are vital organs in "a free state", and in particular are necessary to provide logistical support to "a well regulated militia" as the "safe defence of a free state", one of the Militia's main purposes must be to protect the functioning of those enterprises. This purpose "a well regulated militia" can best serve in its normal operations by not impinging upon private enterprises through demands that every eligible individual should "train[ ] to arms" and perform other Militia duties to the same degree.

---

[1736] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1737] U.S. Const. amend. II.

b. To that end, appropriate limitations on the Militia's ability to impress men out of essential private pursuits must be established, in the form of specific, explicit statutory exemptions from Militia service. This, because—

(1) Individuals engaged in merely private enterprise can claim no special "rights" whatsoever as against the Militia. Absent some exemption, all otherwise eligible individuals are required to serve in the Militia to the fullest extent mandated by law, notwithstanding their occupations. The reason for this is plain enough: Inasmuch as no mere part of "a free State" can be allowed to jeopardize the security of the whole; and inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State"; and inasmuch as the Constitution designates no private enterprise of any sort as being "necessary" to that "security"—therefore the interests of no private enterprise can in principle be superior to the needs of the Militia. (Indeed, that even individuals holding public offices require exemptions in order to avoid normal Militia service should be conclusive on this point.)

(2) In and through the Militia, an essential unity exists between private enterprise and public service for the interlocked purposes of "the common defence" and "the general Welfare".[1739] The fundamental principle of the Militia is that everyone owes a duty of personal service to the community in its defense. The private occupations with respect to which individuals may be granted exemptions from normal Militia service take the place of such part of that service as the exemptions allow. Thus, their exemptions are actually directives by virtue of which these individuals perform some of their Militia duties in the specialized form of their private occupations. Inasmuch as exemptions of this type substitute a private activity (in some enterprise) for a public service (in the Militia), they could be deemed not so much "exemptions" of those individuals from the Militia as implicit inclusions of those individuals' occupational activities within the Militia and designations of those activities pro tanto as "public services".

---

[1738] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1739] See U.S. Const. preamble.

c. The source and character of these exemptions establishes that, in the Militia, private enterprise must be subordinated to the community's security. In principle, the interests of no private enterprise can be superior to the needs of the Militia, because no private enterprise is superior to "the security of a free State". In practice, though, the purposes of the Militia may best be served, depending upon circumstances, by granting exemptions to individuals occupied in this or that enterprise. Yet it is not society's premier economic institution—the free market—that determines, simply by a calculation based upon monetary profit and loss, whether some private occupation is sufficiently important to the community to warrant an exemption from normal Militia duties for those engaged in it. The free market is ill-suited for this purpose, because private occupations for which there may be little economic demand in tranquil times may become absolutely critical in times of "alarm", and therefore in the exercise of political foresight need to be promoted at all times so as to be always in readiness even if apparently never actually employed for the community's defense.[1740] Because "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[1741] not out of the stock market, the institution composed of the representatives chosen by the community according to political procedures and charged with the exercise of political authority fo the community's benefit should determine in the first instance what exemptions should apply to the individuals who are "to keep and bear Arms" are to be "well regulated", in the sense of being "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]" for "the general Welfare". [1742]

d. The criterion on the basis of which the legislature must decide whether and on what conditions it should grant an exemption from Militia service to individuals in a particular private occupation is the degree to which, in light of all the relevant circumstances and reasonable expectations at the time, the individuals'

[1740] "Apparently", because (for example) although in many cases the mere preparation of some defensive measures may serve to deter aggression, their eventual efficacy in that regard usually can only be assumed, not strictly proven before the fact.

[1741] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1742] See U.S. Const. amend. II; art. I, § 8, cl. 15; and preamble.

employment in that occupation can fairly be predicted to contribute sufficiently to "the security of a free State". That is, inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", an individual's employment in some private occupation can justify an exemption from Militia service only if that employment is deemed to be at least as "necessary to the security of a free State" as the service from which it exempts that individual. In the nature of things, then, because every such exemption must be the product of such a complex political-cum-economic judgment, any exemption can and should be withheld, amended, or withdrawn entirely whenever in the legislators' opinion justifiable conditions for it do not or no longer obtain. So any exemption on the basis of private occupation must always be a matter of legislative discretion alone, never the product of any "inherent right" ab initio, or the source of any "vested right" after having once been granted (except, of course, perforce of the statute which grants it).

More exemptions on the basis of private occupations should be expected today than were allowed (or even imaginable) during the pre-constitutional era, though, simply because society is more complex—and in many ways more fragile—now than then. Many more things can go wrong in the modern economy; and the effects can be far more widespread, severe, and long-lasting than ever before. Fortunately, because contemporary Militia can draw upon pools of eligible individuals far broader in numbers and deeper in skills than existed in pre-constitutional times, more exemptions can be granted without unduly weakening the basic structure.

Nonetheless, legislators will need to convince themselves that proposed exemptions in favor of private occupations actually support the common defense to the requisite degree. In contrast to public offices today, the existences and operations of which are the plainest matters of public record, and to private occupations in earlier days, which were relatively few in number and the inner workings and contributions to society of which almost everyone could comprehend, private occupations in modern America are many in number and varied in type, often complex in operation, and in myriad instances even unknown and often unintelligible to the average person. So what they do, how they contribute to the community, and whether they are as or more vital than particular types of Militia service will have to be painstakingly investigated.

In this regard, the legislature may (and probably should) determine that broad classes of exemptions are warranted, not just for individuals, but also for particular private organizations or establishments as a whole. For example, private universities, colleges, and other institutions of higher education often occupy singular positions in their communities, in many instances operating as virtual towns or small cities themselves. Many of the needs of "homeland security" and the resources that can be devoted to them within an extensive campus will likely differ to some significant degree from those of the surrounding community. So these institutions should be allowed to design, test, and put into practice techniques of "homeland security" tailored to their particular circumstances, largely unfettered by requirements to conform to normal Militia regulations. In this way, they would serve not only their own interests, but also the interests of their Localities and States by experimenting under closely controlled conditions with new techniques of "homeland security" that could prove applicable elsewhere. Thus, such institutions would function as huge "Independent Companies".[1743]

e. Except in the most extraordinary cases, though, an exemption in favor of some private occupation should never result in an individual's total release from all Militia duties, but from only those duties the performance of which would be absolutely incompatible with his employment. Moreover, any exemption must always be conditional. Even if exempted from all regular Militia duties, the individual remains a member of the Militia, subject to being called forth at any time and for any purpose as the legislature may deem necessary and proper. And, in any event, just as with public officials, no one exempted from any Militia service on account of his private occupation should ever be released from three basic duties:

(1) Individuals so exempted should be required personally to attend regular meetings of their Local Militia Companies unless these meetings occurred at times and places that unavoidably conflicted to a significant degree with their private employments. Even in that eventuality, though, these individuals should be obliged to watch video recordings of (or otherwise to apprise themselves of what transpired at) those meetings shortly after the events have taken place, and then in a timely fashion to provide their Companies with such personal comments, answers to questions, and so on as may be appropriate. If an individual's occupation is sufficiently important to warrant his exemption from some aspects of Militia service, then the operations of the enterprise in which he is employed and the opinions on matters relating to that enterprise of persons (such as himself) who are engaged in it will be of significant interest to every member of the Militia Company in which he is enrolled—which justifies compelling that individual, and all others similarly situated, to participate in some manner in the Company's meetings.

(2) In addition to attending regular meetings of their Local Militia Companies, individuals who have been granted exemptions from other Militia service on the basis of their private occupations should be required to appear in the field during "alarms". Unless, of course, their employment at that time were actually indispensable to the community's response to the specific threat underlying the "alarm", in which case they should be licensed to provide suitable substitutes in their stead.[1744]

[1743] See post, Chapter 44.

[1744] See post, at 977-981.

(3) In order to be able to serve the Militia in the field during "alarms", all individuals otherwise exempted from Militia training on the basis of their private occupations should be required to satisfy the same minimum standards of personal preparedness as apply to public officials who are granted exemptions from Militia service.[1745]

6. Conscientious objection. This denotes a personal refusal, not to serve in the Militia at all, but only to engage in activities that might require the objector to use such weapons as firearms in a manner that could result in death or bodily injury to others, even though those others might be domestic or foreign enemies of the community against whose aggressions any citizen's resistance would qualify as self-defense. Thus, conscientious objection covers at least all of the Militia's military, para-military, and police functions of a combatant or otherwise armed nature. An exemption on such grounds allows the objector permanently to disarm himself, but does not immunize him from the duty applicable to everyone else to perform some services in the Militia, so long as those services do not involve him personally in the use of arms against someone else.

a. Today, for the same reasons adduced in pre-constitutional times, any grant of an exemption from Militia service based exclusively on conscientious objection of any sort should remain discretionary with Congress or the States' legislatures:

> Government, federal and state, each in its own sphere owes a duty to the people within its jurisdiction to preserve itself in adequate strength to maintain peace and order and to assure the just enforcement of law. And every citizen owes the reciprocal duty, according to his capacity, to support and defend government against all enemies.[1746]
>
> All [citizens] alike owe allegiance to the government, and the government owes to them the duty of protection. These are reciprocal obligations, and each is a consideration for the other.
>
> * * * * *
>
> That it is the duty of citizens by force of arms to defend our government against all enemies whenever necessity arises is a fundamental principle of the Constitution.
>
> The common defense was one of the purposes for which the people ordained and established the Constitution.[1747]

[1745] See ante, at 963-964.

[1746] Hamilton v. Board of Regents of the University of California, 293 U.S. 245, 262-263 (1934).

[1747] United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644, 649-650 (1929). See U.S. Const. preamble; art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II. Arguable, though, is that if perforce of the First Amendment "Congress shall make no law * * * prohibiting the free exercise" of religion, and "no law" means "no law", then "the common defence" as a whole must yield in an individual case to the religious scruples of a complete pacifist.

> [W]hether any citizen shall be exempt from serving in the armed forces of the nation in time of war is dependent upon the will of Congress and not upon the scruples of the individual, except as Congress provides. That body * * * has seen fit * * * to relieve from the obligation of armed service those persons who belong to the class known as conscientious objectors; and this policy is of such long standing that it is thought by some to be beyond the possibility of alteration.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * Of course, there is no such principle of the Constitution * * * . The conscientious objector is relieved from the obligation to bear arms in obedience to no constitutional provision, express or implied; but because, and only because, it has accorded with the policy of Congress thus to relieve him. * * * The privilege of the * * * conscientious objector to avoid bearing arms comes not from the Constitution, but from the acts of Congress. That body may grant or withhold the exemption as in its wisdom it sees fit; and if it be withheld, the * * * conscientious objector cannot successfully assert the privilege.[1748]

Therefore,

> [i]t is impossible * * * to conclude that the insistence of [a State] that an officer who is charged with the administration of justice must take an oath to support the Constitution of [the State] and [the State's] interpretation of that oath to require a willingness to perform military service [in the State's Militia] violates the principles of religious freedom which the Fourteenth Amendment secures against state action * * * .[1749]

And "th[e] proposition must at once be put aside as untenable" that "the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as a safeguard of 'liberty' confers the right to be students in [a] State University free from obligation to take military training as one of the conditions of attendance".[1750] Rather, in such a case there exists no > obstruction by the state to "the free exercise" of religion as the phrase was understood by the founders of this nation, and by the generations that have followed.

>
> * * * * *

[1748] United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605, 623-624 (1931), quoted with approval in part in Hamilton v. Board of Regents of the University of California, 293 U.S. 245, 263-264 (1934).

[1749] In re Summers, 325 U.S. 561, 573 (1945) (conscientious objector applying to the State Bar denied admission because he could not take an oath to support the State's constitution insofar as it required service in the State's Militia, even though that constitution allowed for exemption from actual Militia service for conscientious objectors).

[1750] Hamilton v. Board of Regents of the University of California, 293 U.S. 245, 262 (1934).

> * * * Instruction in military science is not instruction in the practice or tenets of a religion. Neither directly nor indirectly is government establishing a state religion when it insists upon such training. Instruction in military science * * * is not an interference by the state with the free exercise of religion when the liberties of the constitution are read in the light of a century and a half of history during days of peace and war.
>
> *The meaning of those liberties has striking illustration in statutes that were enacted in colonial times and later. * * * From the beginnings of our history, Quakers and other conscientious objectors have been exempted as an act of grace from military service, but the exemption, when granted, has been coupled with a condition, at least in many instances, that they supply * * * a substitute or * * * the money necessary to hire one.*[1751]

This, of course, is never to denigrate the services that conscientious objectors can and do provide to their country:

> The bearing of arms, important as it is, is not the only way in which our institutions may be supported and defended, even in times of great peril. Total war in its modern form dramatizes as never before the great cooperative effort necessary for victory. The nuclear physicists who developed the atomic bomb, the worker at his lathe, the seamen on cargo vessels, construction battalions, nurses, engineers, litter bearers, doctors, chaplains—these, too, made essential contributions. And many of them made the supreme sacrifice. * * * And the annals of the recent war [i.e., World War II] show that many whose religious scruples prevented them from bearing arms, nevertheless were unselfish participants in the war effort. Refusal to bear arms is not necessarily a sign of disloyalty or a lack of attachment to our institutions. One may serve his country faithfully and devotedly, though his religious scruples make it impossible for him to shoulder a rifle. Devotion to one's country can be as real and enduring among non-combatants as among combatants. One may adhere to what he deems to be his obligation to God and yet assume all military risks to secure victory. The effort of war is indivisible; and those whose religious scriples prevent them from killing are no less patriots than those whose special traits or handicaps result in their assignment to duties far behind the fighting front. Each is making the utmost contribution according to his capacity. The fact that his role may be limited by religious convictions rather than by physical characteristics has no necessary bearing on his attachment to his country or on his willingness to support and defend it to his utmost.[1752]

[1751] Id. at 265-267 (Cardozo, J., concurring in the opinion of the Court) (emphasis supplied).

[1752] Girouard v. United States, 328 U.S. 61, 64-65 (1946).

b. In particular, an exemption based on conscientious objection should consist of three elements:

(1) The claimant must prove that his objection is in fact a matter, not merely of convenience, but instead of bona fide personal convictions that conform to the statutory standards for an exemption on that ground. During *pre-*constitutional times, Colonial and State legislatures granted exemptions only to sectarians such as Quakers and Mennonites. Although this amounted to exemption on exclusively religious grounds, it posed no legal problem in those days, because first the Colonies and then the independent States often established official religions and discriminated by law among different faiths. Today, however, an explicitly religious basis for conscientious objections would raise thorny constitutional problems due to the injunction that public officials "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion".[1753] Therefore, where an exemption for conscientious objection is offered, the inspiration for an individual's convictions may now arise, not just from religious precepts, but also from purely secular moral, ethical, or philosophical beliefs.[1754] Inevitably, though, the more diffuse the sources from which an individual may draw in defense of an alleged conscientious objection, the more searching the inquiry to which he must submit in order to validate his claim. One person may prove easily enough that he is (say) a practicing Quaker, while another, no less sincere, may find it exceedingly difficult to produce testimony or documents to establish his own idiosyncratic philosophical beliefs against the personal use of arms. On the other hand, that a State refuses to allow an exemption for conscientious objection, even to those with the strongest religious scruples, does not amount to a denial of any "right" whatsoever, including the constitutional right to "the free exercise" of religion.[1755] For inasmuch as "the free exercise" of religion in *pre-*constitutional days entitled no one to an automatic immunity from Militia service, it can entitle no one to any more in that regard now. Nonetheless, in the final analysis granting exemptions to every possible conscientious objector would be far more practical than denying such exemptions altogether. For committed conscientious objectors cannot be compelled to fight effectively if at all, but can only be punished for refusing to fight. Which incurs a large expense with no gain, because being penalized for their own consciences' sake will neither change their behavior nor deter others of like fixity of mind. But conscientious objectors usually will perform Militia services of a noncombatant nature. And if some simply refuse

---

[1753] U.S. Const. amend. I, applied to the States through amend. XIV in, e.g., Abingdon School District of Abingdon Township v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 215 (1963).

[1754] On the many complexities and conundrums this expansion of the grounds for the exemption has caused, see generally, e.g., Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437 (1971); Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 (1970); United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965).

[1755] See U.S. Const. amend. I, applied to the States through amend. XIV, in, e.g., Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 300, 303 (1940).

to do so, their punishment will deter others whose consciences cannot justify such obstinacy.

(2) Being that a conscientious objector's primary concern is usually to avoid any personal involvement with firearms or other weapons, the legislature should specify exactly what an objector's exemption entails in that regard. Although an exemption should excuse an objector from having to maintain personal possession of a firearm in his place of abode at all times (as is normally required of all other members of the Militia[1756]), it need not and probably never should excuse him from all training with firearms. For no less than everyone else, conscientious objectors will need instruction in basic firearms operations and safety because, within the Militia (if not elsewhere throughout a society in which firearms are widely distributed among the people at large), unavoidable exigent circumstances may compel conscientious objectors to take charge of other individuals' firearms, unload and perhaps deactivate those firearms, and secure them against access by unauthorized persons—and they must learn how to perform these functions in a manner that does not endanger either themselves or others, before some unexpected situation suddenly calls upon them to do so. Then, too, an exemption allowing a conscientious objector to abstain from the personal possession of arms might usefully be conditioned upon the requirement that he purchase a firearm for some other member of the Militia who cannot afford it, or that he pay for the provision of an armed substitute to perform some duty that requires the bearing of arms and that absent his exemption the objector would be obliged to perform.

(3) Inasmuch as an exemption on the ground of conscientious objection licenses no one to avoid Militia service altogether, but simply substitutes various noncombatant for combatant tasks, the legislature must take care to assign to objectors specific noncombatant duties the satisfactory performance of which is the condition sine qua non of their exemptions. Of course, although these duties may themselves be noncombatant in nature when considered in isolation, each of them when performed within the Militia will further the Militia's purposes in every way, combatant as well as noncombatant, because the performance by conscientious objectors of noncombatant duties that individuals other than conscientious objectors would have had to perform will make those individuals available to perform combatant services.

7. Time to comply with statutory requirements. The legislature may grant exemptions from the performance of particular Militia duties for limited lengths of time in order to enable individuals, as conveniently as possible in relation to their other pursuits and economic conditions, to use their best efforts: (i) to enroll in the appropriate Local Militia Companies when they become eligible for service in particular communities—which may involve some degree of choice among regular Companies or even Independent Companies; (ii) to obtain the standard equipment necessary to perform the Militia duties to which they are assigned—which may allow for their temporary use as "substitute standards" of firearms and other personal property they already happen to possess or can readily obtain; (iii) to fulfill the initial requirements for basic Militia training; and (iv) to deal with various special circumstances, such as establishing their entitlements to other exemptions.

---

[1756] See post, Chapter 38.

Exemptions of this type would be especially useful during the initial phases of revitalization of "the Militia of the several States", in order to advance the process with the least practicable disruptions in the normal course of the community's economic and social activity. After all, in contrast to the *pre-*constitutional era in which the Militia were both ubiquitous in the territory and near-universal in their membership, today most Americans have next to no familiarity with even the concept of "[a] well regulated Militia", let alone actual experience with such an institution. Many will need time to learn how the system operates; to accept and acclimate themselves to its requirements; to reorient and reorganize their personal lives (albeit probably only to a minimal degree) so that they can perform their Militia duties along with their other responsibilities in the most effective and efficient manner; to acquire and become familiar with the use of their equipment; to complete their basic training; and overall to integrate themselves into a new political environment in which for the first time in their lives they are called upon to participate to the fullest possible degree in self-government by themselves providing "the security of [the] free State" in which they live.

Also, after revitalization of the Militia had been successfully completed in States with populations large in comparison to their communities' requirements for "homeland security", probably only a relatively few individuals would be needed for active service most of the time in the condition of greatest immediate readiness. The remainder, therefore, could be assigned to various categories of lesser readiness to be defined, in part, by different lengths of time allowed before they were required to perform their first tours of certain types of regular duty in the field—the lesser the group's level of readiness, the longer its exemption from its initial service of that kind, so as to allow its members more time to prepare themselves for each level of readiness. This would not create a permanent, but only poorly prepared "reserve militia", let alone an "unorganized militia", because the entirety of the Militia would be constantly in the process of being organized, armed, disciplined, trained, and deployed according to fixed schedules, such that everyone in the Militia who were capable of serving in each category of readiness would at some time find himself in each such category, and at all times in some such category, with respect at least to training if not to actual duty in the field.

8. Payment of fines. In keeping with the practice which all but one of the Colonies and then every one of the independent States applied throughout pre- constitutional times, the imposition of fines should be the preferred means of discipline for routine infractions of regulations within revitalized "Militia of the several States" today.[1757] As they were then, fines (or the absence of fines) also could be employed to create certain special exemptions.

a. A statute could license a member of the Militia to pay a stipulated fine as the cost of absenting himself from some required service by his own personal choice for some entirely personal reason. (Were he involuntarily absent, the circumstances would likely provide good cause for his not being fined at all.) In effect, fines of this type would enable individuals to grant themselves ad hoc exemptions from certain Militia duties. Obviously, though, for purpose of maintaining morale, discipline, and the overall effectiveness of the Militia, this practice would need to be treated as an "honor system" which individuals would use their best efforts not to abuse for light and transient causes. And, in any event, it should apply only to statutory duties of other than a critical nature, and fix an absolute limit on the number of times any individual would be permitted to claim a particular ad hoc exemption by payment of a fine.

Today, during the initial stages of revitalizing "the Militia of the several States", allowing individuals to exempt themselves from various duties upon their payments of fines would be particularly advisable, because:

- Generous exemptions purchasable with modest fines would garner support for the program from many individuals who, although unwilling to participate in the Militia personally, would not be loathe to contribute small sums to defray the costs of others' participation if those payments excused their own reluctance to become directly involved

- With far more individuals eligible for Militia service than were necessary to mobilize outside of the most serious "alarms", even widespread exemptions from certain routine duties at reasonable costs to the individuals excused would not seriously impair the readiness or effectiveness of the Militia, but would provide significant, if not wholly sufficient, revenues to finance them directly. "Directly" is the key adverb. For, if their operations were largely self-financed through fines generated internally (as well, perhaps, as through voluntary subscriptions and subsidies secured from their members), the Militia to that extent would be independent of the rest of the government, and thereby protected against rogue public officials who might attempt to disable them by cutting off appropriations from the public treasury. Indeed, nothing would conduce more to "well regulated Militia" than financial independence guaranteed by the people themselves, without the intermediation of possibly incompetent or untrustworthy public officials.

[1757] See post, Chapter 43.

b. Especially during the early stages of revitalizing "the Militia of the several States", Militia Companies and other units should be encouraged to go beyond the statutorily required minima for arming, training, and other discipline. Yet, except in true "Independent Companies",[1758] no fines should be allowed to be imposed on individuals who failed to appear for duty of a particular type in excess of the number of times the applicable statute required. Militia officers keen on maximizing their units' performances might ask individuals under their commands to perform extra, or even non-statutory, duties; but those individuals would have to volunteer for such activities, and could not be fined if they refused. This absence of coercive enforcement through fines would frustrate aspiring martinets among Militia officers, while still allowing esprit de corps and peer pressure to encourage shirkers among the rank and file to perform extra duty whenever a large majority of the unit desired it—and in the course of the process to identify unreliable individuals, so that they might eventually be corrected or if they proved incorrigible even weeded out of the unit in some manner.

Nonetheless, for the sake of overall preparedness, the mere payment of a fine should never exempt anyone from certain critical requirements, such as:

- studying the Militia's history, law, organization, discipline, and duties;
- learning how safely and effectively to operate and maintain in good order the major types of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service;
- training to provide basic emergency medical and related assistance to themselves and others;
- preparing to furnish shelter, food, water, sanitation, and like necessities to themselves and others in the course or aftermath of a natural disaster, massive industrial accident, or similar calamity; and
- learning how to cope with a major breakdown of the monetary and banking systems; the electric grid; transportation networks; the supply of food, water, and medicines; and other critical elements of the State and Local economic and social infrastructure.

Moreover, no Militiaman who has simply refused, failed, or neglected to perform duty in his proper rotation in the modern equivalent of the Watch or the Ward should ever be suffered to incur no penalty other than a fine. To be sure, a fine should be imposed, its amount graduated according to the seriousness of the default and degree of the defaulter's wilfulness—but, in addition, the delinquent should be required to perform at least two further consecutive tours of equivalent (or even more exacting) duty for which no excuse other than impossibility would be accepted. After all, the Watch and the Ward are the most important in principle of all Militia functions—because advanced intelligence of danger is always critical, and its absence not infrequently fatal; yet also the simplest functions to perform in practice—because every Militiamen can be trained to fulfill some useful task in the chain of surveillance and communications through which intelligence is obtained, evaluated, and transmitted. Therefore, if any Militia service should be compulsory, in the fullest sense of that term, it should be participation in modern forms of the Watch and the Ward.

---

[1758] See post, Chapter 44.

9. Provision of substitutes. In keeping with the common practice in *pre-*constitutional times, members of revitalized "Militia of the several States" today should be allowed, under carefully defined circumstances, to proffer substitutes, both for themselves as individuals when called to active duty in the field, and for particular equipment and training they were required to maintain in their personal possession at any time.

a. Inasmuch as revitalized Militia will be able to draw upon populations of sizes unimaginable in *pre-*constitutional times, many fully capable individuals (including those who might be the recipients of various exemptions from service for less-than-critical public offices or private occupations) could be allowed to volunteer as substitutes for others. Indeed, at the margin, in a well-populated State the allowance of substitutes would provide a means for constituting a Militia largely of volunteers. To obviate possible problems, however—

(1) Except on the grounds of personal physical disability, no substitutes at all should be allowed in such circumstances of "alarm" as "Insurrections", "Invasions", and "domestic Violence".[1759]

(2) No Militiaman should be allowed to proffer a substitute—even one no less skillful than himself—for any duty in modernized forms of the Watch or the Ward, except on the grounds of personal physical disability or extreme familial crisis, or for some other truly extraordinary excuse.

(3) Inasmuch as no conceivable justification exists for imposing a heavier burden of service in revitalized Militia on relatively poor individuals in favor of relatively rich ones simply on the basis of wealth, a person unable to afford to hire a substitute when called forth for particular duty should not be required to serve as long as substitutes were allowed with respect to that duty for those who could afford them. Then, if rich individuals wanted to avail themselves of substitutes in those circumstances, they would, one way or another, have to arrange to help in providing substitutes for the poor, too.[1760]

---

[1759] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 and art. IV, § 4.

Admittedly, disallowing discrimination in the provision of substitutes based on Militiamen's personal wealth would complicate the Militia's administration. For instance, the Militia itself or Local governmental bodies would need to verify the straitened economic status of men claiming an inability to hire substitutes. But the selfsame type of inquiry would be necessary in the case of men claiming an inability to purchase the firearms, ammunition, and other accoutrements required for their Militia service. So, inasmuch as the two groups would very largely (if not entirely) overlap, the added administrative burden in relation to substitutes would likely be minuscule.

To be sure, disallowing discrimination in the provision of substitutes based on Militiamen's personal wealth was not the practice in *pre-*constitutional times. But the Constitution imposes various constraints on governments, at every level of the federal system, that did not exist in that era. Among these is the restriction in Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment that "[n]o State shall * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws". According to the Supreme Court, the substance of this limitation reaches the General Government as well, through the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.[1761] Actually, as relevant here, it applies to the General Government through the principles of "the common defence" and "the general Welfare" set out in the Preamble to the Constitution,[1762] which controls the construction and application of the entirety of the document, and did so before the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments were enacted.[1763]

Plainly enough, a statutory scheme which enables some individuals to purchase exemptions from their statutory (indeed, constitutional) duties while other individuals, because of their lack of financial wherewithal, cannot do so, denies equal treatment on the basis of wealth alone. Whether it denies "equal protection of the laws", though, is another matter. To be constitutional under even the most [1760] For example, consider such a rule applied to a Militia unit in which two rich men, R1 and R2, and one poor man, P, are enlisted among many others, and two men are to be impressed for some special duty. R1 is the first man impressed. Rather than serve, he hires a substitute. P is the second man in line for impressment; but under the prevailing rule he cannot be drafted and therefore must be passed over. So, in P's place, R2 is impressed. He also hires a substitute. The overall effect is that R2 has provided a substitute for P. Similarly, all those Militiamen whose wealth exceeded some minimum amount could be required to pay into a fund to hire substitutes for poor Militiamen, substitutes for the rich being allowed only to the extent that the fund were sufficient to subsidize substitutes for the poor. Once the fund were exhausted, substitutes for the rich would no longer be allowed.

---

[1761] See, e.g., Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U.S. 312, 331-332 (1921); Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 100-101 (1943); Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 499-500 (1954).

[1762] Emphasis supplied.

[1763] See W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Volume 1, at 374-379.

constrained construction of that principle, a statutory "classification must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation".[1764] Where the allowance of a substitute for Militia service is concerned, "the object of the legislation" is to guarantee that some qualified individual will actually perform that service when needed. The statute is perfectly indifferent as to whether a rich or a poor Militiaman, or either one's substitute, does so. In principle, both the rich and the poor Militiaman labor under the selfsame duty. In practice, though, the effective burden on the wealthy individual is merely the monetary cost of hiring a substitute. He suffers no disruptions of his personal life other than may arise from the unavailability of that amount of money; and even those inconveniences he can minimize by rearranging his normal pattern of expenditures. Moreover, the cost to a rich individual of hiring a substitute will be inconsequential in comparison to the value of his avoidance of the danger and other personal discomfort arising out of service in the field. Conversely, the effective burden on the poor individual is his actual personal deployment—with disruption of his ordinary domestic existence, curtailment of his already limited income, and possibly the loss of life or limb as well. Self-evidently, the special privilege the statute affords the rich man, on account of his wealth alone, bears no "fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation". That the rich man supplies a substitute does not, in some unique manner, advance the goal of providing sufficient suitable men for the service—because, if he were not allowed to shift the burden of his duty onto a surrogate, he would have to perform that duty himself, just as the poor man always must.

(4) Every substitute should have essentially the same equipment, basic training, and physical conditioning—and, where necessary, the very same education, specialized skills, and experience—required for performance of the particular duty as has the Militiaman who proffers him as a replacement. Although hiring in the free market should generally be the means for obtaining substitutes, the process of substitution should never be suffered to become a loose laissez-faire procedure. The purpose of the process, after all, is to provide substitutes actually qualified to perform the duty of the individuals seeking exemption. Therefore, strict standards and close supervision will be necessary to ensure that the substitutes are at least as competent in that regard as the Militiamen originally posted to duty. Final judgement as to whether a proffered substitute is in fact an effective man for the service at issue, then, can be left neither to the individual proffering the substitute nor to the substitute himself (both of whom are self-interested in having the substitute accepted), but instead must be the prerogative of the presumably objective Militia officers in the unit to which the substitute is to be assigned.

[1764] F.S. Royster Guano Company v. Virginia, 253 U.S. 412, 415 (1920) (emphasis supplied).

(5) At his own cost, the Militiaman proffering a substitute should provide him with the firearm, ammunition, and all other accoutrements necessary for his performance of the specified duty, should the substitute lack any of that equipment, whether in kind or quality.

(6) In addition to whatever stipend a Militiaman paid a substitute for the latter's services and the use of his equipment (the minimum rates of compensation to be set by the Militia itself), the Militiaman should also reimburse the substitute for all of the ordinary and necessary expenses the latter might incur in his performance of the Militiaman's duty. Full and timely payment and reimbursement in one instance of substitution should be a condition precedent for allowance of any further instance.

(7) A Militiaman employing a substitute on one occasion should be listed first for the next call-up of or from his unit. And, absent some extraordinary excuse sounding in personal disability or extreme familial crisis, only (say) two substitutions in sequence should ever be allowed.

b. With respect to the basic mandate that members of the Militia should furnish themselves from the free market with firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements suitable for Militia service if they are capable of doing so,[1765] at least during the initial period of revitalization of the Militia any Militiaman should be allowed to substitute for the particular equipment specified by statute whatever similar equipment he possessed that would be at least minimally suitable for the purpose.[1766] Similarly, at least during the initial period of revitalization, individuals might be allowed to substitute various forms of civilian training for specific Militia training until the latter became available. Indeed, some types of civilian training could prove so efficacious that the Militia might simply adopt them in lieu of "reinventing the wheel" in those particulars. In both cases, for the Militia to rely to the greatest possible degree on what their members could obtain through the free market in terms of equipment and training would accrue to everyone's advantage, because that approach would integrate the market and the Militia, thereby not only closely allying economic freedom with the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of gun'",[1767] but even rendering the latter power dependent upon the former freedom, as it always should be in "a free State". Doubtlessly, this would confound both ultra-"libertarians" who disapproved of the Militia's compulsory nature and bureaucrats who favored rigid "top-down" organization over the flexible "bottom-up" organization of the market. The Constitution, however, was not designed to please ideologues of either an anarchistic or a collectivistic cast of mind, or political [1765] See post, at Chapters 38 through 40.

---

[1766] See post, at 1103-1111.

[1767] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

careerists whose only concern is their individual advancement in the governmental apparatus, but instead to provide WE THE PEOPLE with an effective means for using their freedoms to obtain the power that would guarantee those freedoms.

10. "Criminal" behavior. As to whether individuals who have been convicted of certain "crimes", and having served their sentences have then returned to society as free men, should be prohibited from possessing firearms—and then be barred from participation in the Militia on the strength of that disability—two mutually opposed policies exist: (i) the exclusory policy of modern "gun controllers", which infects contemporary statutes on the subject of firearms, and (ii) the inclusory policy of the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes, which the Constitution incorporated into its federal system.

a. Under the tenets of present-day "gun control", an individual's serious "criminal" behavior in a single instance would entail his almost complete exclusion (not just exemption) from revitalized "Militia of the several States", because conviction for (or often simply a charge of) such a "crime" generally results throughout America in permanent forfeiture of the alleged "criminal's" right to possess a firearm after he has been released from custody and returned to society, thereby making it impossible for him personally to fulfill the fundamental requirement that every member of the Militia (not a conscientious objector) should be possessed at all times of a firearm suitable for his Militia service. Moreover, such an individual could not satisfy his Militia duty through the provision of a substitute who did not suffer from such a disability, because substitution can be allowed only on relatively few particular occasions, not in every single instance in which that individual is required to serve. Of course, modern "gun control" is not concerned specifically with the Militia in general, or with the duties of any individual Militiamen, because "gun controllers" hardly ever think about the Militia any more than do most other Americans. The goal of "gun control" is simply to disarm as many ordinary Americans as quickly and completely as possible, leaving firearms in the hands of only the regular Armed Forces and élitist professional *para-*militarized "law-enforcement agencies" at the National, State, and Local levels—for what dark ulterior purpose only "gun controllers" can say, although it is obviously not to provide for "the security of a free State". So, "gun control" is served by constantly expanding the numbers of "crimes" and "criminals", and indictments for and other charges and allegations of "crimes", thereby swelling the set of individuals disqualified either temporarily or permanently from the possession of firearms. That this also results in making the revitalization and maintenance of "[a] well regulated Militia" increasing difficult provides an added dividend.

(1) Although formulations may vary somewhat in different jurisdictions, generally an individual will lose his right to receive, ship or transport, or even merely possess a firearm and ammunition upon conviction of "a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year".

(a) This is the standard the Government Government now applies.[1768] Whoever knowingly violates this restriction may "be fined * * * , imprisoned not more than ten years, or both".[1769] As a consequence of the length of imprisonment which may be imposed, this prohibition on possession of a firearm can be said to arise out of an individual's conviction for what nowadays is loosely termed a "felony".

At present, the General Government treats as some class of "felony" any "offense" for which "the maximum term of imprisonment authorized" is "more than one year".[1770] Only one class of "felony" is punishable by death, however.[1771] And no "felony" in any class is punishable by the perpetrator's forfeiture of all of his goods (except insofar as the penalty of death works that result indirectly). Congress is, however, not very consistent in its employment of the terms "felony" (for major crimes) and "misdemeanor" (for lesser crimes). For example, one important statute dealing with emergency restrictions on banking provides that "[a]ny individual, partnership, corporation, or association, or any director, officer or employee thereof,

---

[1768] Originally AN ACT To assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes ("Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968"), Act of 19 June 1968, Pub. L. 90-351, TITLE IV—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 902 [§ 922(e) and (f)], 82 Stat. 197, 230-231; followed by AN ACT To amend title 18, United States Code, to provide for better control of the interstate traffic in firearms ("Gun Control Act of 1968"), Act of 22 October 1968, Pub. L. 90-618, TITLE I—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 102 [§ 922(g)(1) and (h)(1)], 82 Stat. 1213, 1220; amended by An Act To amend chapter 44 (relating to firearms) of title 18, United States Code, and for other purposes ("Firearms Owners' Protection Act"), Act of 19 May 1986, Pub. L. 99-308, § 102(6) [§ 922 (g)(1)], 100 Stat. 449, 452; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1).

Although the most important pieces of legislation of this kind to date, the two Acts of 1968 were not the first to impose a permanent prohibition of possession of any and all firearms upon an alleged "criminal" solely on the basis of the type of "crime" he had supposedly committed, or the length of sentence he could have been ordered to serve. In 1926, the American Bar Association approved a "model act" that prohibited any individual "convicted * * * of a crime of violence" from possessing handguns, but not long guns. A Uniform Act to Regulate the Sale and Possession of Firearms, § 4, Uniform Firearms Act Drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (1926), at 3. See generally, "The Uniform Firearms Act", 18 Virginia Law Review 904 (1932). In 1938, the General Government made it "unlawful for any person who has been convicted of a crime of violence * * * to receive any firearm or ammunition which has been shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce, and the possession of a firearm or ammunition by any such person shall be presumptive evidence that such firearm or ammunition was shipped or transported or received * * * by such person in violation of this Act". AN ACT To regulate commerce in firearms ("Federal Firearms Act"), Act of 30 June 1938, CHAPTER 850, § 2(f), 52 Stat. 1250, 1251. And in 1961, this prohibition was extended to "any person who has been convicted of a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year". AN ACT To strengthen the Federal Firearms Act, Act of 3 October 1961, Pub. L. 87-342, § 2, 75 Stat. 757, 757.

[1769] Originally Act of 19 June 1968, § 902 [§ 924(a) ("imprisoned not more than five years")], 82 Stat. at 233; followed by Act of 22 October 1968, § 102 [§ 924(a)], 82 Stat. at 1223-1224; continued by Act of 19 May 1986, § 104(a)(1) [§ 924(a)(1)], 100 Stat. at 456; penalty increased by An Act To prevent the manufacturing, distribution, and use of illegal drugs, and for other purposes ("Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988"), Act of 18 November 1988, Pub. L. 100-690, TITLE VI—ANTI-DRUG ABUSE AMENDMENTS OF 1988, Subtitle N—Sundry Criminal Provisions, § 6462(4) [§ 924(a)(2)], 102 Stat. 4181, 4374 ("be fined * * * , imprisoned not more than 10 years or both"); now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 924(a)(2).

[1770] 18 U.S.C. §§ 3156(a)(2) and (3), and 3559(a)(1) through (5).

[1771] 18 U.S.C. § 3559(a)(1).

violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or, if a natural person, may, in addition to such fine, be imprisoned for a term not exceeding ten years. Each day that any such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."[1772] Inasmuch as a violation that continued for (say) a mere ten business days could incur for the perpetrator a penalty of one hundred thousand dollars and one hundred years in prison, Congress's use of the term "misdemeanor" for such an infraction seems ill-conceived at best. No less peculiar, in its major "gun-control" statute, Congress declares that "[t]he term 'crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year' does not include * * * any Federal or State offenses pertaining to antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, restraints of trade, or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices".[1773] Which leads one to speculate as to whether Members of Congress believe that offenses capable of prostrating broad sectors of America's economy are inconsequential, or whether politically influential factions among crooked businessmen have suborned legislators in order to carve out for themselves a special immunity from the draconian penalties that apply to everyone else who allegedly commits some "crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year".

Moreover, the connection that can be drawn in various statutes between the phrase "a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year" and the word "felony" is more emotive in purpose than grounded in Anglo-American legal history. After all, during *pre-*constitutional times, the definition of the noun "Felony" was "[a] crime denounced capital by the law"[1774]—that is, punishable by the perpetrator's death, and consequently his loss of all conceivable rights. As Blackstone explained, "[F]ELONY, in the general acceptation of our English law, comprizes every species of crime, which occasioned at common law the forfeiture of lands or goods. This most frequently happens in those crimes, for which a capital punishment either is or was liable to be inflicted[.]"[1775] "THE idea of felony is indeed so generally connected with that of capital punishment, that we find it hard to

---

[1772] AN ACT To provide relief in the existing national emergency in banking, and for other purposes, Act of 9 March 1933, CHAPTER 1, § 4, 48 Stat. 1, 2; now codified at 12 U.S.C. § 95(a).

[1773] Originally AN ACT To assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes ("Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Acts of 1968"), Act of 19 June 1968, Pub. L. 90-351, TITLE IV—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 902 [§ 921(b)(3)], 82 Stat. 197, 228; followed by AN ACT To amend title 18, United States Code, to provide for better control of the interstate traffic in firearms ("Gun Control Act of 1968"), Act of 22 October 1968, Pub. L. 90-618, TITLE I—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 102 [§ 921(20)(A)], 82 Stat. 1213, 1216; amended by An Act To amend chapter 44 (relating to firearms) of title 18, United States Code, and for other purposes (Firearms Owners' Protection Act"), Act of 19 May 1986, Pub. L. 99-308, § 101 [§ 921(20)(A)], 100 Stat. 449, 449; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20)(A).

[1774] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[1775] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 94.

separate them; and to this usage the interpretations of the law do now conform."[1776] Hawkins, too, opined that among "Capital" offenses in pre-constitutional English law "[t]hose by the Common Law come generally under the Title of Felony"; and "[t]he Judgment against a Man or Woman for Felony of Death, hath always been the same * * * That he or she be hanged by the Neck 'till dead".[1777]

Of course, not every conviction of "[F]ELONY" inevitably resulted in the death of the perpetrator. For under English law it was "a settled Rule, That the King may pardon any Offence whatever, whether against the Common or Statute Law, so far as the Publick is concerned in it".[1778] And "the effect of * * * pardon by the king, is to make the offender a new man; to acquit him of all corporal penalties and forfeitures annexed to that offence for which he obtains his pardon".[1779] Pardons might "also be conditional", such as "transportation to some foreign country (usually to some of his majesty's colonies and plantations in America) for life, or for a term of years".[1780] (Americans might have been transported to the British West Indies.)

To be sure, because "the offender also forfeit[ed] all his chattel interests absolutely" in "felonies of all sorts" "by conviction",[1781] an American adjudicated guilty of a "[F]ELONY" who had avoided execution or transportation, and not received a pardon, would nonetheless likely have been deprived of the Militia (or any other) firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements he had possessed at the time of his conviction. By itself, however, that result would not have precluded him from lawfully acquiring new "chattel interests"—in some other firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service—after his return to society. Certainly it would not have excused him from the duty the pre-constitutional Militia statutes imposed upon all adult, able-bodied free men (other than conscientious objectors) to acquire and thereafter permanently possess such equipment. The Militia Acts of Rhode Island and Virginia, for example, never mandated any exception from that duty for any otherwise eligible man on the ground of his previous conviction of a "[F]ELONY" (or any other infraction, for that matter).

The Framers, the Founding Fathers, and WE THE PEOPLE in general were certainly familiar with the term "Felony", and its meaning, because the Constitution employs that noun in the singular or the plural in three places—first, providing that "[t]he Senators and Representatives [in Congress] * * * shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their [1778] Id., Book II, Chapter XXXVII, § 33, at 391 (footnote omitted).

---

[1776] Id., Volume 4, at 98.

[1777] A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter XXV, § 1, at 65, and Book II, Chapter XLVIII, § 7, at 444 (footnotes omitted).

[1779] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 395.

[1780] Id., Volume 4, at 394.

[1781] Id., Volume 4, at 378-380.

Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same";[1782] second, delegating to Congress the power "[t]o define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas";[1783] and third, requiring that "[a] Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up".[1784] Now, as a general rule of constitutional construction and application, "[w]hat [the Constitution] meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation"[1785]—and no branch of the General Government, or any of the States, or even the electorate as a whole is authorized to change the meaning of any constitutional term outside of the formal process of amendment.[1786] More specifically, the Fifth Amendment provides that "[n]o person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger[.]"[1787] Because the term "infamous crime" is not explicitly defined anywhere in the original Constitution or the Bill of Rights—as, in sharp contrast, the term "Treason" is[1788]—its meaning must be determined by reference to pre-constitutional law.[1789] And, so determined, it is not open to modification by any Congressional statute.[1790] Being the most familiar of all "capital * * * crime[s]" at the time, a "Felony" was also necessarily an "infamous crime" within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment's phrase "capital, or otherwise infamous crime". Therefore, the meaning of the term "Felony" is no more subject to transmogrification by some Congressional enactment than is the meaning of the term "infamous crime".

So, today, neither Congress nor any State's legislature may constitutionally treat a "crime" as a "Felony" simply by labeling it as such. For constitutional issues turn on substance, not sounds.[1791] Rather, for a modern statutory "felony" to qualify as a true "Felony", the punishment for the "crime" must meet the constitutional

---

[1782] U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1783] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 10 (emphasis supplied).

[1784] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 2 (emphasis supplied).

[1785] Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 227 (1920), quoted in Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 365 (1932). Accord, South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 448-449 (1905).

[1786] See, e.g., Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189, 206 (1920).

[1787] Emphasis supplied.

[1788] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

[1789] See, e.g., W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 363-364; W. Hawkins, A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book II, Chapter XLVI, § 19, at 432.

[1790] Ex parte Wilson, 114 U.S. 417, 426 (1885).

[1791] See, e.g., Craig v. Missouri, 29 U.S. (4 Peters) 410, 433 (1830); NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 429 (1963); New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 268-269 & notes 7 to 12 (1964); Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809, 826 (1975); City of Madison, Joint School District No. 8 v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission, 429 U.S. 167, 173-174 & note 5 (1976).

standard for a "Felony". During the *pre-*constitutional era, however, that standard was never simply "a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year". As a result, even if the permanent prohibition of an individual's possession of a firearm after his release from incarceration and return to society could constitutionally to tied to his conviction for a true "Felony", convictions today for ersatz statutory "felonies" cannot support that result. Furthermore, as just pointed out, a conviction for some "[F]ELONY" in *pre-*constitutional times did not necessarily result in the perpetrator's permanent excusal from his statutory duty to possess a firearm for purposes of service in the Militia once he had returned to society as a free man. And if that individual was subject to a statutory duty to be armed, then he had at least an implied statutory right to be armed as well.

Partisans of "gun control" might contend that modern statutes loosely fit the *pre-*constitutional pattern, because the disabilities they impose apply only until an individual convicted of an ersatz "felony" receives a sufficient pardon, after which he may once more lawfully possess a firearm. For example, the General Government's leading "gun-control" statute provides that "[a]ny conviction which has been expunged, or set aside or for which a person has been pardoned or has had civil rights restored shall not be considered a conviction for purposes of [denying that person a right to possess a firearm] * * * , unless such pardon, expungement, or restoration of civil rights expressly provides that the person may not ship, transport, possess, or receive firearms".[1792] This contention would have to overlook, though, that no Militia statute in the *pre-*constitutional period conditioned anyone's duty to possess a firearm on his having received a pardon for some "Felony" he may theretofore have committed.

The only relevant example this study has uncovered in the records for Rhode Island and Virginia appears in Virginia's Militia Act of 1738 which, after commanding "[t]hat * * * the * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons, above the age of one and twenty years, * * * under the command of such captains as he shall think fit", provided

> [t]hat nothing * * * shall * * * compel any persons herein aftermentioned, to a personal attendance at musters: that is to say, Such as are, or shall have been, members of his majesty's council, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary, receiver-general, auditor, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, attorney-general, clerk of the council, clerk of the house

---

[1792] An Act To amend chapter 44 (relating to firearms) of title 18, United States Code, and for other purposes ("Firearms Owners' Protection Act"), Act of 19 May 1986, Pub. L. 99-308, § 101(5) [§ 921(a)(20)], 100 Stat. 449, 450; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20). To similar effect, An Act Making omnibus consolidated appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1997, and for other purposes, Act of 30 September 1996, Pub. L. 104-208, TITLE VI—GENERAL PROVISIONS, § 658 [§ 921(a)(33)(B)(ii)], 110 Stat. 3009, 3009-372; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(B)(ii).

> of burgesses, clerk of the secretary's office, a justice of the peace, clerk of any county court, or any person that shall have borne any military commission as high as that of a captain, or any of the people commonly called Quakers: Yet all the persons aforesaid, shall * * * send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters.{EN-1974}

As this evidences, Virginia's pool of able-bodied "free male persons, above the age of one and twenty years" during the period from 1738 to at least 1755 (when the next Militia Act was passed), and probably well before 1738 (if a statute had to be enacted in that year to deal with the matter), must have included more than a few "convict[s]" who, notwithstanding their past "criminal" behavior, were not deemed automatically incapable of serving as substitutes in the Militia—otherwise, an explicit prohibition to that end would not have been necessary. Doubtlessly, too, exclusion of "convict[s]" as substitutes under the Act of 1738 was a matter more of social and political propriety than anything else. Plainly, it would have been unseemly for public officials and conscientious objectors of good repute to have sent "convict[s]" to musters in their stead. (Although, apparently, some of these good citizens would have done so, had not the statute precluded that choice.) Yet, in this very same Act, Virginia's legislators did not treat it as unseemly, or in any manner undesirable, to compel "convict[s]" to serve alongside "all [other] free male persons" in the Militia:

> First, "convict[s]" were not included (except in the capacity of substitutes) within the narrow sets of persons who were not "compel[led] * * * to a personal attendance at musters" or who were "exempted from being any ways concerned in the militia".{EN-1975}
>
> Second, Caucasian "convict[s]" were not excused from the duty of "every person * * * (except free mulattos, negros and Indians)" to "be armed and accoutred" with a "carbine or fuzee" and "a case of pistols" (if a "horse-man"), or with "a firelock, musket, or fuzee, well fixed, with a bayonet fitted to the same" (if a "footman").{EN-1976}
>
> Third, in contradistinction to "all such free mulattos, negros, or Indians, as are or shall be listed" in the Militia, Caucasian "convict[s]" were not commanded to "appear [at Militia musters] without arms", to "be emploied [only] as drummers, trumpeters, or pioneers, or in such other servile labour, as they shall be directed to perform".{EN-1977} To the contrary, as was everyone else, they were expected to appear with arms, and were fined if they filed to do so.{EN-1978}

Thus, the most extensive disability imposed upon any "convict" in all of Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia Acts merely prohibited such an individual from serving as someone else's substitute, not from serving in propria persona to fulfill his own Militia duty—and, of course, not from personally possessing one or more firearms for that (or any other legitimate) purpose. The true burden of this disability was borne more by the person seeking a substitute than by the "convict" who could not perform that function. Self-evidently, then, this statute provides no precedent whatsoever in favor of the sweeping disabilities that modern "gun control" emanating from the General Government imposes on today's "convict[s]". Instead, it conclusively proves that, from the historical and constitutional perspectives, those disabilities are utter bunkum.

(b) Similarly, Virginia's own contemporary law broadly disarms every adult who has ever been convicted of a so-called "felony", and juveniles who have been convicted of "a delinquent act which would be a felony if committed by an adult", unless they fall into certain specially favored categories:

> A. It shall be unlawful for
>
> (i) any person who has been convicted of a felony;
>
> (ii) any person adjudicated delinquent as a juvenile 14 years of age or older at the time of the offense of murder * * * , kidnapping * * * , robbery by the threat or presentation of firearms * * * , or rape * * * ; or
>
> (iii) any person under the age of 29 who was adjudicated delinquent as a juvenile 14 years of age or older at the time of the offense of a delinquent act which would be a felony if committed by an adult, other than those felonies set forth in clause (ii),
>
> whether such conviction or adjudication occurred under the laws of the Commonwealth, or any other state, the District of Columbia, the United States or any territory thereof, to knowingly and intentionally possess or transport any firearm or ammunition for a firearm, * * * or to knowingly and intentionally carry about his person, hidden from common observation, any [firearm] * * * . Any person who violates this section shall be guilty of a Class 6 felony. However, any person who violates this section by knowingly and intentionally possessing or transporting any firearm and who was previously convicted of a violent felony * * * shall be sentenced to a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of five years. Any person who violates this section by knowingly and intentionally possessing or transporting any firearm and who was previously convicted of any other felony within the prior 10 years shall be sentenced to a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of two years. * * *
>
> B. The prohibitions of subsection A shall not apply to
>
> (i) any person who possesses a firearm, ammunition for a firearm * * * while carrying out his duties as a member of the Armed Forces of the United > States or of the National Guard of Virginia or of any other state,

>
> (ii) any law-enforcement officer in the performance of his duties, or
>
> (iii) any person who has been pardoned or whose political disabilities have been removed pursuant to Article V, Section 12 of the Constitution of Virginia provided the Governor, in the document granting the pardon or removing the person's political disabilities, may expressly place conditions upon the reinstatement of the person's right to ship, transport, possess or receive firearms.
>
> C. Any person prohibited from possessing, transporting or carrying a firearm * * * under subsection A, may petition the circuit court of the jurisdiction in which he resides for a permit to possess or carry a firearm * * * ; however, no person who has been convicted of a felony shall be qualified to petition for such a permit unless his civil rights have been restored by the Governor or other appropriate authority. * * * The court may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, grant such petition and issue a permit.[1793]

In rather stark contradistinction to *pre-*constitutional law, in Virginia's contemporary law the term "felony" embraces six classes of crimes for which the punishment may be: (i) imprisonment for more than one year and possibly some monetary fine; or (ii) imprisonment for not more than twelve months, or a monetary fine, or both.[1794] The term "misdemeanor" includes four classes of crimes for which the punishment is a fine and possibly imprisonment for not more than twelve months.[1795] But only one class of "felony" in this body of statutory law is punishable by death.[1796] And none is punishable by forfeiture of all of the perpetrator's real and personal property. So, at best, only that one class of so-called "felony" in Virginia which provides for the penalty of death today would arguably have constituted a "[F]ELONY" anywhere in America during the *pre-*constitutional era. For, as Blackstone observed, "[F]ELONY, in the general acceptation of our English law, comprizes every species of crime, which occasioned at common law the forfeiture of lands or goods. This most frequently happens in those crimes, for which a capital punishment either is or was liable to be inflicted[.]"[1797] "THE idea of felony is indeed so generally connected with that of capital punishment, that we find it

---

[1793] Code of Virginia § 18.2-308.2 (emphasis supplied).

[1794] Code of Virginia § 18.2-10(a) through (f).

[1795] Code of Virginia § 18.2-11(a) through (d).

[1796] Code of Virginia § 18.2-10(a).

[1797] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 94.

hard to separate them; and to this usage the interpretations of the law do now conform."[1798]

In those instances in which an individual adjudged guilty of a "[F]ELONY" in *pre-*constitutional Virginia would have been executed, any claim he might have had to possession of a firearm would have been terminated along with him. Similarly, while an individual in that era remained in custody on suspicion of criminal behavior, or awaited execution of his sentence, naturally he would not have been allowed to retain personal possession of a firearm. In those circumstances, the consequences of applying Virginia's modern law, on the one hand, and her *pre-*constitutional law, on the other hand, would be the same. But, in fact, not all individuals convicted of a true "[F]ELONY" in pre*-constitutional Virginia were executed, or suffered permanent forfeiture of all their property*. For example, in 1731, two men convicted of "Felony" were "pardoned & transported out of th[e] Colony into some other of his Majesties Plantations for the Term of Seven Years".{EN-1979} Presumably, after that period of exile ended, they could lawfully have returned to Virginia and resumed the common activities of normal civilian lives, including the acquisition of real and personal property. And in 1742, a man who had been "convicted of Felony" and "thereby forfeited all his Effects" was restored to the possession of a boat by which he earned his living.{EN-1980}

Even a conviction in *pre-*constitutional Virginia for a true "[F]ELONY" that resulted, not in execution, but in the forfeiture of all of the property the perpetrator possessed at the time would not have prohibited him, after his release from incarceration and return to society, from acquiring new goods—including a firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service. For, just as "the forfeiture of goods and chattels ha[d] no relation backwards" to the time of the crime committed, "so that those only which a man ha[d] at the time of conviction shall be forfeited",[1799] so too did "the forfeiture of goods and chattels" not relate forward in time to all the property into the possession of which a man might come after his conviction and return to society. Indeed, Virginia's Militia statutes would have required such an individual to acquire a firearm as his personal property, inasmuch as those laws extended no exemption from possession of arms to any individual simply because he had happened to have lost all of his possessions in the past, for whatever reason. Rather, the laws directed Militia officers or other public officials to provide the necessary equipment to any man too poor to obtain it on his own.[1800] And if a prior conviction for a true "[F]ELONY" did not necessarily preclude an individual from later possessing a firearm for service in the Militia, conviction for some less serious crime surely did not, either.

[1798] Id., Volume 4, at 98.

[1799] Id., Volume 4, at 380.

[1800] See ante, at 424-428.

Thus, in most instances, the effect of Virginia's present-day statute is to deprive of the possession of firearms those persons who have been convicted of crimes now designated as "felonies", but which are not "felonies" as that term was understood in *pre-*constitutional times—and this, when a conviction for even a true "[F]ELONY" in *pre-*constitutional times would not necessarily have resulted in a convict's permanent exclusion from such possession after his release from custody. Furthermore, in most cases, the modern statute precludes individuals once convicted of "felonies", but who have returned to society, from performing their constitutional duties under both the Second Amendment to the Constitution—by denying those individuals "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", and Article 13 of Virginia's own Declaration of Rights—by excluding them from "the body of the people, trained to arms".

To be sure, the modern statute is not absolute in its prohibitions. But the limitations on its reach do nothing for most of the individuals it penalizes. Constitutionally, every able-bodied adult Virginian from sixteen to sixty is in principle a member of the Militia today. As such, and absent some exemption of a type recognized during pre-constitutional times, he is constitutionally required to possess a firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service. No general exemption (or exclusion or disability) predicated solely upon an individual's prior conviction for even a true "[F]ELONY" existed during the *pre-*constitutional era, however. The only individuals never "listed" in the Militia were slaves.[1801] This, perhaps, is more realistically explained as an actual "exclusion", rather than an "exemption", because it plainly was intended, not to benefit the slaves by limiting their burdens of service, but instead to prevent them from providing themselves with the wherewithal forcibly to challenge their bondage. Free persons of color were not called upon to bear arms during their Militia service, either; but neither were they—nor, for that matter, even some slaves—entirely denied access to firearms in other contexts.[1802] Virginia's contemporary statute, however, decrees that an individual who has been convicted of a modern ersatz "felony" may not possess a firearm for some or all of the remainder of his life, and therefore cannot possibly function as a full-fledged member of Virginia's Militia during the term of such disability. Rather, such an ersatz "felon" could appear at a Militia muster only in the degraded position to which "free mulattoes, negroes, or Indians" were often relegated in *pre-*constitutional times —that is "without arms".{EN-1981} Or in the disgraceful position of an individual branded by his own conduct as disloyal—who, although "disarmed", was "nevertheless * * * obliged to attend musters".{EN-1982} Worse yet, he could not possess a firearm at any other time—thereby finding himself more degraded than free people of color, or even some slaves.

[1801] See ante, at 607-609.

[1802] See ante, at 363-369, 468, 609-611, and 733-742.

The modern statute does allow for an individual whose disability derives from some juvenile delinquency to possess a firearm after he becomes twenty-nine years old. But from sixteen to twenty-nine years of age such possession is illegal—although his membership in the Militia, and possession of a firearm suitable for Militia service, is constitutionally required. The statute further excludes from its prohibitions an individual who is performing duties as a member of the regular Armed Forces of the United States or of the National Guard. But, those being military establishments of the General Government, or "Troops" the States may "keep * * * in time of Peace" only "with[ ] the Consent of Congress" (and therefore subject to whatever conditions Congress may impose),[1803] no State can exercise any authority to dictate how their members will perform such duties in any event—so this explicit exclusion is supererogatory.[1804] The statute also allows an individual convicted of a modern ersatz "felony" to possess a firearm as a "law-enforcement officer in the performance of his duties". Such an allowance would be mandatory were the "law-enforcement agency" recognized (as it should be) as a unit of the Militia[1805]—so this, too, merely precludes the statute's reach to a situation in which its application would be unconstitutional anyway. Finally, the statute licenses individuals convicted of ersatz "felonies" to possess firearms if they have been pardoned by the Governor, or issued a permit by a judge "for good cause shown" after their "civil rights have been restored by the Governor or other apporpriate authority". But, in general, no one in pre-constitutional times needed some permission from the Governor or some judge to be armed within the Militia—rather, the statutes themselves, without any further action from any public officials, required every Militiaman personally to possess arms at all times. Neither did anyone—except slaves and free persons of color, who had "no rights which the white man was bound to respect"[1806]—need permission from some judge to be armed for other legitimate purposes.[1807]

Although conviction for a true "[F]ELONY" during the pre-constitutional era could have resulted in the perpetrator's forfeiture of all of his property, and even his death, it would not have reduced him to full-blown slavery, or imposed upon him all of slavery's odious "badges and incidents",[1808] or even burdened him with the particular "badge and incident" of slavery necessary to preservation of a condition of bondage: namely, the bondsmen's permanent personal disarmament.[1809] So how

---

[1803] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3. See ante, at 786-793.

[1804] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. A State could, however, refuse to "keep Troops" under such a condition.

[1805] See ante, at 327-328, and post, at 1135-1138, 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488.

[1806] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 407 (1857) (opinion of Taney, C.J.).

[1807] See ante, at 733-742.

[1808] See Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 20-21 (1883).

[1809] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 416.

is it that, today, simply by labeling some crime as a "felony"—when constitutionally it is not such—Virginia's (or any State's) legislature can superadd to the punishment of a monetary fine and imprisonment for some term of years the further disability of permanent personal disarmament following the perpetrator's release from incarceration—which was never inherent in the punishment for a true "[F]ELONY" during pre-constitutional times? Simply as a matter of legislative discretion, can all contemporary crimes simply be called "felonies", and all such nominal but fictional "felonies" be punished with one or more of the classical "badges and incidents" of slavery without admitting that some degree of slavery has been imposed on the alleged perpetrator? Yet this is the effect of all modern "gun control" that depends upon an individual's violation of some law as the basis for his disarmament—including those "gun-control" statutes that rest upon convictions for mere misdemeanors, or even upon no actual convictions for any crime at all.[1810]

(c) If an individual convicted of a crime is condemned to death and executed, the question of his right to possess a firearm expires with him. Similarly, if an individual convicted of a crime is sentenced to imprisonment, he cannot reasonably claim a right to possess a firearm while incarcerated. But on what basis can a sentence of imprisonment for a limited term, let alone of a mere monetary fine, justify permanent personal disarmament after that sentence has been served or satisfied?

Section 1 of the Thirteenth Amendment provides that "[n]either slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction". It has been suggested that the limitation set out in the Amendment—"[n]either slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted"—might be read as modifying "involuntary servitude" only, so as to allow for (say) imprisonment at hard labor, but not the imposition of actual "slavery" "as a punishment for crime".[1811] Such a misinterpretation forgets, however, that the language in the Thirteenth Amendment "was not new"—rather it tracked the words of the Ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory, "and gave them unrestricted application within the United States".[1812] For its part, the Northwest Ordinance provided that "[t]here shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the * * * territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall [1810] See, e.g., Code of Virginia §§ 18.2-308.1:5 ("[a]ny person who, within a thirty-six consecutive month period, has been convicted of two misdemeanor offenses under [certain statutes relating to illicit drugs] shall be ineligible to purchase or transport a handgun" for "a period of five years from the date of the second conviction") and 18.2-308.1:4 ("unlawful for any person who is subject to" certain civil "protective order[s]" or "preliminary protective order[s]" "to purchase or transport any firearm while the order is in effect").

---

[1811] See Ex parte Wilson, 114 U.S. 417, 429 (1885) (semble).

[1812] Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219, 240 (1911).

have been duly convicted".[1813] Plainly enough, by its placement in the Ordinance, the limiting clause modified both "slavery" and "involuntary servitude". So that construction must be carried over into the Thirteenth Amendment, too. In which case, an individual convicted of a "crime" could be sentenced to slavery—one of the conditions of which could be (and probably would be) personal disarmament during his term of servitude.

If, however, every "crime"—whether a true or only an ersatz "felony", or even merely a "misdemeanor"—may be punished with imposition of the indispensable "badge and incident" of slavery, then every such "crime" may be punished with imposition of every other "badge and incident of slavery", too. If not, why not? And if every violation of every law can be made such a "crime" simply by rogue public officials' saying so, then every violation of every law can be punished with some or every "badge and incident" of slavery—thus rationalizing the entirety of the Stalinist Gulag system, in addition to universal disarmament of everyone save the regular Armed Forces and various professional "law-enforcement agencies" that would be necessary to enforce that system against the people. So, either the Thirteenth Amendment is a snare and a delusion (which conclusion cannot be accepted), or some constitutional limits must exist to the "crimes" that may be punished by imposition of the "badges and incidents" of slavery, particularly the chief one of permanent personal disarmament.

Now, with respect to some "crimes", the Constitution empowers Congress to decree whatever punishment it deems fit, provided that such punishment is not "cruel and unusual":[1814] namely, "[t]o provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States";[1815] "[t]o define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations";[1816] "to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted";[1817] and "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution th[os]e * * * Powers".[1818] Although imposing the penalties of death or imprisonment for life without parole for these crimes would entail in

---

[1813] Art. VI, AN ORDINANCE FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES NORTHWEST OF THE RIVER OHIO (13 July 1787), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 54.

[1814] See U.S. Const. amend. VIII.

[1815] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 6.

[1816] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 10.

[1817] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 2.

[1818] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18. Supposedly, this clause implicitly empowers Congress to establish criminal penalties for violations of statutes Congress enacts under powers other than those cited immediately above. Even if so, that the penalties for the crimes Congress by happenstance defines could be more severe than the penalties for the crimes the Constitution explicitly enumerates is highly implausible.

practice a complete infringement of the convicted party's "right * * * to keep and bear Arms", to contend that the Second Amendment prohibits Congress from imposing them is unreasonable. For, throughout the *pre-*constitutional era, at least some crimes in all of these categories were considered true "[F]ELON[IES]", and therefore routinely punished by death. "Offences against the Law of Nations" is perhaps the one category among the constitutionally enumerated crimes for which some instances might be imagined as to which death and life imprisonment would constitute totally disproportionate penalties, and therefore would be excluded as "cruel and unusual".[1819] Yet, as Blackstone pointed out, "offences against the law of nations can rarely be the object of the criminal law of any particular state. For offences against this law are principally incident to whole states or nations: in which case recourse can only be had to war * * * . But where the individuals of any state violate this general law, it is then the interest as well as duty of the government under which they live, to animadvert upon them with a becoming severity, that the peace of the world may be maintained."[1820] Were "the peace of the world" truly at stake, though, an individual's execution or imprisonment for life would hardly be denounced in every case as an "[un]becoming severity".

If Congress may impose death as the penalty for commission of these crimes, it may also impose slavery in lieu of execution. To determine why requires a review of one of the traditional apologies for slavery. As Blackstone explained, > slavery is held to arise * * * from a state of captivity in war * * * . The conqueror * * * had a right to the life of his captive; and having spared that, has a right to deal with him as he pleases. But it is an untrue position, when taken generally, that, by the law of nature or nations, a man may kill his enemy: he has only a right to kill him, in particular cases; in cases of absolute necessity, for self-defence; and it is plain this absolute necessity did not subsist, since the victor did not actually kill him, but made him prisoner. * * * Since therefore the right of making slaves by captivity, depends on a supposed right of slaughter, that foundation failing, the consequence drawn from it must fail likewise.[1821]

What Blackstone called "absolute slavery", in which a slave's very "life * * * [was] held to be in the master's disposal", never existed under color of law in America, however. No chattel slave could lawfully have been "wilfully, maliciously, or designedly" killed by his master.{EN-1983} And it is undeniable in principle that the General Government could from its very inception, and today still may, for some

---

[1819] U.S. Const. amend. VIII. See O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U.S. 323, 339-340 (1892) (Field, J., dissenting), position of dissent adopted in Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 367, 380-381 (1910).

[1820] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 68.

[1821] Id., Volume 1, at 423.

heinous crimes justly execute an individual after a fair trial.[1822] Inasmuch as, throughout the *pre-*constitutional era, death was deemed a just punishment for the commission of a true "[F]ELONY", and inasmuch as the crimes for which the Constitution explicitly empowers Congress to define the punishments were mostly "[F]ELON[IES]" in that era (and therefore should be classified as "felonies" today), the substitution of slavery for the penalty of death in any such case would presumably constitute a mitigation of sentence. Arguably, the same logic would apply to the punishment of imprisonment for life without parole. An individual serving such a sentence may be alive; but for all intents and purposes he languishes in a state no better if not worse than slavery, because the authorities in charge of his prison can subject his every action to controls even more extensive and intrusive that those under which the average chattel slave chafed in *pre-*constitutional America. And if Congress may impose slavery as the punishment for these crimes, in lieu of death or life imprisonment, and on the basis of such mitigation may allow a convict to return to society albeit in a servile state, it may also impose perpetual personal disarmament upon him, as one necessary "badge and incident" (as well as practical guarantee) of that status. Moreover, if enforced within the bounds of human decency, neither "slavery" nor "involuntary servitude" can constitutionally be denounced as "cruel and unusual punishments", because: (i) prior to the Thirteenth Amendment, no one ever imagined that they were outlawed by the Eighth Amendment; (ii) the Thirteenth Amendment presumes that they may be imposed today; and (iii) the Thirteenth Amendment postdates, and therefore where necessary and proper overrides, the Eighth Amendment.

As far as crimes punishable by the States are concerned: If the just penalty for some crime were death (as for a true "[F]ELONY"), or possibly imprisonment for life without parole, then slavery would in effect constitute mitigation of punishment. If the just penalty were incarceration for a term, then disarmament during incarceration would of course be valid, but not disarmament after release from prison. And if part of the punishment were for the perpetrator to make restitution to the victim, then the perpetrator could be condemned to slavery or involuntary servitude, and temporarily disarmed, until restitution were complete.

To determine for exactly what other crimes slavery (and therefore personal disarmament) might constitute just punishment, though, requires review of another of the traditional apologies for slavery. As Blackstone explained, > it is said that slavery may begin * * * when one man sells himself to another. This, if only meant of contracts to serve or work for another, is > very just: but when applied to strict slavery * * * is * * * impossible. Every sale implies a price, a quid pro quo, an equivalent given to the seller in lieu of what he transfers to the buyer: but what equivalent can be given for life, and liberty, both of which (in absolute slavery) are held to be in the master's disposal? His property also, the very price he seems to receive, devolves ipso facto to his master, the instant he becomes his slave. In this case therefore the buyer gives nothing, and the seller receives nothing: of what validity then can a sale be, which destroys the very principles upon which all sales are founded?[1823]

---

[1822] Especially in contemporary America's incompetent, politicized, and corrupt "justice system", whether a trial or subsequent appeals can ever be assuredly "fair" enough in practice where the penalty of death is involved is another matter, though.

By voluntarily remaining within the social order, however, each man impliedly agrees to make whole anyone whom he is justly convicted of having harmed. So slavery as a means of compelling restitution can indeed be imposed as a matter of quasi-contract.

Otherwise, however, no disarmament of individuals convicted of crimes who have served the sentences of imprisonment imposed upon them presumably should be allowable. Those who consider this to be a policy "soft on criminals" overlook the overarching consideration: namely, to leave as many of WE THE PEOPLE as possible sufficiently armed, by preventing rogue public officials from employing legalistic labels and mumbo jumbo to disarm ever increasing numbers of them. To be sure, some individuals released after serving sentences for their crimes might turn out to be sociopaths or even psychopaths who would misuse any firearms they came to possess. But such individuals would doubtlessly be able be obtain firearms from the underworld even were they formally prohibited from doing so in the free market. In any event, these miscreants would possess only small arms; could claim no legal authority for their future misuse of those arms; would be confronted by an entire society organized, armed, and trained in the Militia to deter, and where deterrence failed to apprehend, common criminals; and most likely could victimize only a relatively few citizens before they themselves were brought to justice. Conversely, if rogue public officials could disarm enough of WE THE PEOPLE on the grounds of their having been convicted (or worse yet, merely suspected) of some "violation of law", the result would be an anti-social order in which THE PEOPLE would find themselves at the mercy of a small but highly armed and thoroughly organized clique of sociopaths and psychopaths, who would claim under color of their public offices the legal right and power to dictate to everyone else, such that any individual's resistance to their oppression would be condemned and punished as "illegal". In such circumstances, not only would those individuals who might have been harmed by private sociopaths and psychopaths find their lives, liberty, and property at risk, but also countless others would be in jeopardy of being repressed, even unto slavery and death, by the totalitarian police state of public sociopaths and psychopaths that general disarmament of the population would render possible.[1824]

---

[1823] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 423-424.

(2) More problematic than disabilities predicated solely on convictions for "crime[s] punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year", that at least legislators feel compelled imaginatively to label as "felonies", are similar disabilities that arise from an individual's "convict[ion] in any court of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence".[1825] Although the predicate for this provision is only "a misdemeanor crime of violence", whoever violates it is subject to "be fined * * * , imprisoned not more than ten years, or both".[1826] To be sure, the statute defines "a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence" in some detail to mean an offense that

> (i) is a misdemeanor under Federal or State law; and
> (ii) has, as an element, the use or attempted use of physical force, or the threatened use of a deadly weapon, committed by a current or former spouse, parent, or guardian of the victim, by a person with whom the victim shares a child in common, by a person who is cohabiting with or has cohabited with the victim as a spouse, parent, or guardian, or by a person similarly situated to a spouse, parent, or guardian of the victim.[1827]

Nonetheless, a "misdemeanor" remains an extremely broad and protean category of "crime". For example, under the criminal code of the General Government it includes any offense for which the punishment of imprisonment can range from "one year or less" to "more than five days".[1828] And, under State law, even an offense punishable by no more than a fine could be deemed a "misdemeanor".[1829] So, in principle, nothing precludes extension of these definitions by some future Congress or State legislatures to embrace "misdemeanors" for which the penalty might be imprisonment for any length of time, no matter how short, or the imposition of any fine, no matter how small. Moreover, "violence" is itself a dangerously elastic standard, too, potentially ranging in meaning from "unjust force" and "assault" to "vehemence" and "impetuosity".[1830] If every verbal altercation that might rise to the decibel level of "vehemence", coupled with some physical interaction no more

---

[1824] See generally Andrew M. Łobaczewski, Political Ponerology: A Science on the Nature of Evil Adjusted for Political Purposes (Grande Prairie, Alberta, Canada: Red Pill Press, Second Edition, 2008).

[1825] An Act Making omnibus consolidated appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1997, and for other purposes, Act of 30 September 1996, Pub. L. 104-208, TITLE VI—GENERAL PROVISIONS, § 658(b)(2)(C), 110 Stat. 3009, 3009-372; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9). See also 18 U.S.C. § 922(d)(9).

[1826] 18 U.S.C. § 924(a)(2).

[1827] Act of 30 September 1996, § 658(a), 110 Stat. at 3009-371; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A).

[1828] 18 U.S.C. § 3559(a)(6) through (8).

[1829] See 27 C.F.R. § 478.11, Misdemeanor crime of domestic violence, ¶ (a)(1).

[1830] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1611, definitions 2 and 1. Accord, Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 2554, definitions 1a and 3b.

forceful than shoving or raising a fist in anger, could constitute "the use or attempted use of physical force" as the basis for a charge of "misdemeanor crime of domestic violence", many Americans could be permanently disarmed for doing little beyond disturbing the peace in their own homes. And who is to say, other than legislators and judges intent on imposing pervasive "gun control" throughout this country, what few and ambiguous facts would need to be proven in order to establish the type and level of "unjust force" or "assault" sufficient for conviction?[1831] On its face, then, this statute amounts to an assertion by Congress of an open-ended power to impose the salient disabilities of "gun control" itself, and to assist the States in imposing them, on anyone whose domestic behavior might be categorized as "violen[t]" in even the most attenuated sense—notwithstanding that "the threatened use of a deadly weapon", or even the presence of any "weapon", in any such instance was absent.

(3) More problematic yet are disabilities that require no conviction whatsoever, for either a "felony" or a "misdemeanor". The leading example is the General Government's statute that deprives an individual of all rights "to ship or transport in interstate or foreign commerce, or possess in or affecting commerce, any firearm or ammunition; or to receive any firearm or ammunition which has been shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce", while that individual "is subject to a court order that * * * restrains such person from harassing, stalking, or threatening an intimate partner of such person or child of such intimate partner or person, or engaging in other conduct that would place an intimate partner in reasonable fear of bodily injury to the partner or child".[1832] Although the predicate for this provision is a mere civil "court order", whoever violates it may nonetheless "be fined * * * , imprisoned not more than ten years, or both".[1833] Particularly troublesome is that a restraining order under this statute may either "include[ ] a finding that the person represents a credible threat to [another person's] physical safety", or simply "by its terms explicitly prohibit[ ] the actual, threatened, or attempted use of physical force that would reasonably be expected to cause bodily injury", apparently with no specific "finding" of any "credible threat" at all.[1834] Presumably, though, before the statute's draconian penalty could constitutionally be imposed upon an individual who possessed a firearm while under such a restraining order, not only would some safeguards of procedural due process in the

---

[1831] See, e.g., "Walter Reddy: Patriot's Guns Seized", New American, Volume 27, Number 10 (23 May 2011), at 20.

[1832] An Act To control and prevent crime ("Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994"), Act of 13 September 1994, Pub. L. 103-322, Title XI—FIREARMS, Subtitle D—Domestic Violence, § 110401(c) [§ 922(g)(8)(B)], 108 Stat. 1796, 2015; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(8)(B). See also 18 U.S.C. § 922(d)(8).

[1833] 18 U.S.C. § 924(a)(2).

[1834] 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(8)(C).

States' civil judicial systems have had to attach,[1835] but also—one would hope—the factual foundation purportedly underlying any such order would have had to have been subjected to even stricter review in the courts of the General Government under the doctrine of "constitutional fact": namely, that "[i]n cases brought to enforce constitutional rights, the judicial power of the United States necessarily extends to the independent determination of all questions, both of fact and law, necessary to the performance of that supreme function".[1836] And in the absence of sufficient evidence supporting "a credible threat", no conviction could be had in the first instance, or could be sustained on appeal. Unfortunately, nothing suggests that such will always be the case.[1837]

(4) Even more problematic is the General Government's statute that declares it "unlawful for any person who is under indictment for a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year to ship or transport in interstate or foreign commerce any firearm or ammunition or receive any firearm or ammunition which has been shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce".[1838] An individual who violates this statute may be fined, or "imprisoned for not more than five years", or both.[1839] As questionable as they are in other respects, the statutes that impose disabilities upon individuals who have actually been convicted of a "crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year" or "a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence", or who have actually been made subject to a civil restraining order, at least provide those individuals with a modicum of procedural due process, in the form of notice and an adversarial judicial hearing on the underlying issue. Also, convictions for so-called "felony" and "misdemeanor" offenses require actual proof beyond a reasonable doubt; and a civil court order must at a minimum be grounded upon no less than a preponderance of legally admissible evidence. An indictment, distinguishably, is nothing more than a bare charge issued on only the thin veneer of probable cause—perhaps by a grand jury from which unscrupulous prosecutors have withheld all the evidence that might

---

[1835] See 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(8)(A).

[1836] Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 60 (1932). Accord, Saint Joseph Stock Yards Company v. United States, 298 U.S. 38, 50-52 (1936).

[1837] See United States v. Emerson, 270 F.3d 203 (5th Cir. 2001).

[1838] Originally AN ACT To assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes ("Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968"), Act of 19 June 1968, Pub. L. 90-351, TITLE IV—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 902 [§ 922(e) and (f)], 82 Stat. 197, 230-231; followed by AN ACT To amend title 18, United States Code, to provide for better control of the interstate traffic in firearms ("Gun Control Act of 1968"), Act of 22 October 1968, Pub. L. 90-618, TITLE I—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 102 [§ 922(g)(1) and (h)(1)], 82 Stat. 1213, 1220; amended by An Act To amend chapter 44 (relating to firearms) of title 18, United States Code, and for other purposes ("Firearms' Owners' Protection Act"), Act of 19 May 1986, Pub. L. 99-308, § 102(8) [§ 922(n)], 100 Stat. 449, 452; now codified as amended at 18 U.S.C. § 922(n).

[1839] 18 U.S.C. § 924(a)(1)(D).

have tended to exculpate the target of their investigation, and before which the target probably was never allowed to testify.

(5) Most problematic of all are statutes that carve out so-called "gun-free zones" where the possession of firearms was never theretofore unlawful, and impose "criminal" sanctions on otherwise innocent individuals who transgress these forbidden geographical lines with firearms in their possession.

(a) The most familiar of these is the General Government's creation of "gun-free school zones".[1840] This statute defines a "school zone" as "in, or on the grounds of, a public, parochial or private school" or "within a distance of 1,000 feet from the grounds of a public, parochial or private school",[1841] and declares it "unlawful for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm that has moved in or that otherwise affects interstate or foreign commerce at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone".[1842] The penalty for each violation may be a fine, or imprisonment for "not more than five years", or both.[1843] Although, in its present form, this statute does contain some limitations and safeguards—such as being inapplicable "on private property not part of school grounds", if the firearm is in the possession of an individual licensed by the State to carry firearms, or if the firearm is unloaded and in a "locked container, or a locked firearms rack * * * on a motor vehicle"[1844]—the premiss of the legislation nevertheless remains that Congress may carve out extensive geographical enclaves in which possession of firearms by most Americans is flatly prohibited, except in accordance with whatever regulations Congress may dictate, and that even an otherwise innocent individual's failure to comply with those restrictions may be punished as a serious "crime". Needless to emphasize, no precedent exists in *pre-*constitutional Colonial or State law for such legislation.

(b) Quite interesting as an object lesson in the reversal of American legal history is one of Virginia's contemporary "gun-free zones". Although in many places Virginians may bear firearms openly or concealed, they cannot lawfully "carry any gun, [or] pistol * * * , without good and sufficient reason, to a place of worship

---

[1840] Originally An Act To control crime ("Crime Control Act of 1990"), Act of 29 November 1990, Pub. L. 101-647, TITLE XVII—GENERAL PROVISIONS, § 1702 ("Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990"), 104 Stat. 4789, 4844; declared unconstitutional in part by United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995); reënacted with amendments by An Act Making omnibus consolidated appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1997, and for other purposes, Act of 30 September 1996, Pub. L. 104-208, TITLE VI—GENERAL PROVISIONS, § 657 [§ 922(q)], 110 Stat. 3009, 3009-369; now codified at 18 U.S.C. §§ 921(a)(25) and (26) and 922(q).

Similar laws now exist, for example, in Rhode Island and Virginia. General Laws of Rhode Island § 11-47-60; Code of Virginia § 18.2-308.1.

[1841] 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(25).

[1842] 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(2)(A).

[1843] See 18 U.S.C. § 924(a)(1)(D).

[1844] See 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(2)(B)(i) through (iii).

while a meeting for religious purposes is being held".[1845] Violation of this provision is a "misdemeanor". In stark contrast, during pre-constitutional times Virginia's statutes required Militiamen to be armed on such occasions:

> • [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service and sermons both forenoon and afternoon, and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte."{EN-1984}
>
> • [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church uppon payne for every effence[.]"{EN-1985}
>
> • [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott[.]"{EN-1986}
>
> • [1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]t shall and may be lawful, for the chief officer of the militia, in every county, to order all persons listed therein, to go armed to their respective parish churches[.]"{EN-1987}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he * * * chief officer[ ] of the militia, shall and may order the other officers and soldiers under him to go armed to their parish churches on Sundays, and to any licensed meeting-houses, whenever he judges it necessary."{EN-1988}

And nothing in Virginia's pre-constitutional laws prohibited any other law-abiding residents from voluntarily arming themselves on Sundays, or on any other days of the week.

Presumably, were the Militia revitalized in contemporary Virginia, an order from a "chief officer" to appear armed at religious services would constitute a "good and sufficient reason" for any Militiaman. But, even in the absence of a revitalized Militia, that having at hand the ability to defend one's self and others against the possibility of violent assault—which could occur at any place and any time—always constitutes a "good and sufficient reason" for any honest individual to be armed seems not yet to have occurred to Virginia's legislators. The present Attorney General of Virginia has held in an official advisory opinion that personal protection does constitute a "good and sufficient reason".[1846] But whether the Commonwealth's judges will accept personal protection as a defense to prosecution under this statute remains to be seen.

(6) One need not be paranoiac to identify the target of all of this legislation from its obvious trajectory, according to the exterior ballistics of usurpation and tyranny.

[1845] Code of Virginia § 18.2-283.

[1846] See Letter of 8 April 2011 from Attorney General Kenneth T. Cuccinelli II to Delegate Mark L. Cole.

(a) The principle of raw power at stake is plain enough: If Congress and the States' legislatures may disqualify individuals for the permanent or temporary possession of firearms on the basis of those individuals' having once committed some "crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year" or some "misdemeanor crime of domestic violence", or being under a mere "indictment" or other charge relating to such a "crime", or even being subject to some civil court order—with legislators and judges enjoying complete discretion to determine to which "crimes" and court orders such a prohibition should attach, and under what conditions—then rogue public officials may impose such a disqualification as the consequence of a conviction for any "crime" or even in connection with any civil proceeding whatsoever. For if permanent disarmament is a constitutionally appropriate penalty for an individual's having committed a "crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year", then nothing precludes imposing that penalty for an individual's having committed a "crime punishable by imprisonment" for any lesser term. And if permanent disarmament is a constitutionally appropriate penalty for an individual's having committed one particular "felony", or one particular "misdemeanor", then nothing precludes imposing that penalty for an individual's commission of any "felony" or any "misdemeanor". And if at least temporary disarmament perforce of a civil court order is a constitutionally appropriate prophylactic device to prevent the subject from engaging in allegedly "violent" behavior in the future, then nothing precludes the use of that device in any civil proceeding in which a judge believes that one or more of the parties might pose an imagined danger to some other party at some later time.

(b) The ulterior goal of the proponents of such statutes is also pellucid: namely, step by step to remove firearms and ammunition from WE THE PEOPLE'S hands—without risking the political repercussions attendant upon attempting to outlaw possession directly—by: (i) lowering the severity of the underlying offense to which the penalty of permanent personal disarmament attaches from an ersatz "felony" to a "misdemeanor"; (ii) attaching that penalty to more and more existing offenses; (iii) inventing new offenses to which that penalty is appended; (iv) empowering civil courts to employ personal disarmament as a means of disciplining and controlling litigants; (v) employing pending indictments as the grounds for disarming the individuals charged; and (vi) defining the underlying offense as simply the otherwise lawful possession of a firearm in relation to some geographical "zone", so that mere possession itself becomes the excuse for dispossession.

(c) The last of these tactics is the most disturbing, because it offers the amplest ambit for abuse, for at least two reasons:

First, in practice, unlike the other rationales for personal disarmament, the establishment of a "gun-free zone" does not require that anyone actually commit, or even be suspected of having committed, any "felony", "misdemeanor", civil infraction, or arguably anti-social act of any sort in order for legislators to disarm whomever they wish within the "zone". Not only is proof of anyone's actual wrongdoing or even supposed malicious intent unnecessary, but also—due to the non-rational, largely emotive character of the entire enterprise, especially where children may be concerned—evidence that the creation of such "zones" does not in fact reduce the misuse of firearms in those venues (or anywhere else), but instead encourages, facilitates, and ultimately exacerbates that problem, will be disregarded.[1847]

Second, in perverse principle, a "gun-free zone" can be staked out around any type of facility (or presumably any type of real property at all) in any location to essentially any degree, because Congress's supposed regulatory power attaches, not to the facility per se, but to the "gun" to be excluded therefrom. Under the General Government's present statute, for example, a "gun-free zone" not only includes "the grounds" of every "public, parochial or private school" in America, but also extends to "a distance of 1,000 feet from th[os]e grounds".[1848] Now, presuming for ease of calculation that each school subject to this statute is no larger than a mere Euclidean point at the center of a circle, the minimum "gun-free school zone" encompasses 0.112689 square miles.[1849] Inasmuch as (for example) in 2009 some 178,949 schools were subject to this legislation,[1850] the total expanse of "gun-free school zones" within the United States at that time was no less than 20,165.58 square miles.[1851] Were the concept extrapolated from schools to circumscribe a boundary with a radius of 1,000 feet around every supposedly "sensitive" facility in the country—such as every court house, every police station, every hospital and medical clinic, every large indoor mall, every house of worship, and so on—the overlapping "zones" could prohibit possession of firearms essentially everywhere except "on private property not part of [some covered facility's] grounds", in the possession of a licensed individual, and under certain conditions in motor vehicles[1852]—and then only if legislators deigned to continue such exceptions in the statute. Rather ominously, the first exception—and politically the most likely to be retained the longest—dovetails quite conveniently and neatly with the opinions of a bare majority of the Justices of Supreme Court, that "the individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" supposedly guaranteed by the Second and Fourteenth [1847] See, e.g., David B. Kopel, "Pretend 'Gun-Free' School Zones: A Deadly Legal Fiction", 42 Connecticut Law Review 515 (2009).

---

[1848] 18 U.S.C. §§ 921(a)(25) and 922(q)(2)(A). The laws in Rhode Island and Virginia are less expansive, applying only to actual school grounds and school buses. General Laws of Rhode Island § 11-47-60(a)(2); Code of Virginia § 18.2-308.1(A) and (B).

[1849] Each "zone" contains 3.1416 times 1,000 times 1,000 equals 3,141,600 square feet. One square mile contains 5,280 times 5,280 equals 27,878,400 square feet. Therefore, each "zone" covers 3,141,600 square feet divided by 27,878,400 square feet per square mile equals 0.112689 square miles.

[1850] "K-12 Facts" at <http://www.data360.org/dsg.aspx?Data_Set_Group_Id=1389>.

[1851] 178,949 schools times 0.112689 square miles per school equals 20,165.58 square miles.

[1852] See 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(2)(B)(i) through (iii).

Amendments applies in full force only within the confines of one's own home,[1853] and especially would find support in the dicta in which every Justice of the Supreme Court explicitly or implicitly concurred, that "nothing in our opinion should be taken to cast doubt on * * * laws forbidding the carrying of firearms in sensitive places such as schools and government buildings".[1854] In accordance with these notions, then, the "individual right" to possess a firearm could be reduced to the corresponding "individual right" to possess pornography in one's own home.[1855] And, in principle, if "gun-free school zones" are valid, then nothing would preclude Congress or some State legislature from dictating that private homes, too, shall be "gun free" whenever they are occupied, or may be visited, by children.

(7) Obviously, the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution as well as the Second Amendment cannot countenance these kinds of restrictions on individuals' ability to possess the firearms they may need to perform their Militia service. No doubt, rogue public officials will claim that they intend to increase "public safety" by taking firearms out of the hands of putatively "dangerous" individuals. But the larger the number of individuals who are disarmed on the basis of their commission of "crimes" to which officials attach the penalty of disarmament for the very purpose of disarming as many individuals as possible, the greater the peril to true public safety. At some point that number will become so large that "the people" will no longer be capable of exercising "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" to a sufficient collective degree, the organization of "well regulated Militia" will become impractical, and "the security of a free State" will be left to the mercies of the very rogue officials whose policy of disarming "the people" proves them inimical to such a "State". Because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", and because "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is necessary to "[a] well regulated Militia", and because that "right * * * shall not be infringed" for any reason (for the Second Amendment admits of no exception)—therefore,"a free State" cannot be maintained when some critical mass among "the people" is disarmed for any reason. A fortiori, "a free State" cannot long survive when rogue public officials set out to disarm that mass of individuals simply by labeling them "criminals" for every minor misbehavior. "[A] free State" cannot coëxist with what amounts to a "prison state". Therefore, Congress and the States' legislatures must be severely constrained with respect to the "crimes" and other infractions to which they can affix the penalty of personal disarmament upon the perpetrators after the latter have served their sentences of incarceration (if any) and returned to society.

[1853] See District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 628, 635 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court); McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. ___, ___ (2010) (Alito, J., announcing the judgment of the Court), Slip Opinion at 1-2. The dissenting Justices in these cases contended that even such a narrow "right" is subject to extensive governmental regulation which, in some situations at least, could amount to outright prohibition.

[1854] Heller, 554 U.S. at 626 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

[1855] See Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 565, 568 (1969).

These observations are not intended to encourage the mollycoddling of individuals who have actually committed real and serious "criminal" offenses.[1856] If they have broken the law, then whether private citizens or public officials (and especially in the latter case) they should be punished with severity proportionate to their transgressions. As explained below, personal disarmament would always be appropriate were a term of "slavery", after the perpetrator's release from any incarceration, imposed as the "punishment for [some] crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted"[1857]—for personal disarmament has always been and must always be the principal "badge and incident" of slavery. But then the "crime" would need to be one so egregious that slavery would unquestionably constitute a just "punishment" in the view of the vast majority of Americans. If authentic slavery were the punishment stipulated for certain "crimes", though, disarmament of the perpetrators would comport with the fundamental principles of the Militia—for armed slaves were never enlisted on an equal basis with free men in any pre-constitutional Militia. In addition, the extent of disarmament in society as the result of the imposition of slavery on convicted "criminals" would undoubtedly be extremely limited—for no sane citizenry would allow so many "crimes" to be punished with slavery as would seriously interfere with the Militia.

If hedged with sufficient safeguards, temporary personal disarmament in connection with certain civil court orders restraining individuals from harming or threatening others where the existence of such a danger had been properly proven might be constitutionally appropriate, too, because the rationale for such orders harkens back to the doctrine of "surety of the peace" well-established in pre-constitutional times.[1858] In many cases, however, disarmament on those terms could be only temporary, or would have to be narrowly confined in terms of geography, because the subjects of such restraining orders would still be required to fulfill their Militia duties, and therefore would have to be allowed access to arms at least when called forth for training or actual service in the field. In such situations, then, the administration of restraining orders should be assigned directly to the Militia.

[1856] The nagging problems in this area that cannot be addressed here include: (i) whether, as a matter of principle, the behavior for which many individuals are routinely convicted of various "crimes" in this country should be deemed "criminal" at all in "a free State"; and (ii) whether, as a matter of practice, those individuals have been justly convicted, or instead have been framed or otherwise railroaded by unscrupulous prosecutors and judges in kangaroo proceedings. On the former issue, see, e.g., Symposium—"Overcriminalization: The Politics of Crime", 54 American University Law Review (2005), at 539-820; Douglas Husak, Overcriminalization: The Limits of the Criminal Law (New York, New York: Oxford University Press, Inc. 2008). On the latter issue, see, e.g., Paul Craig Roberts & Lawrence M. Stratton, The Tyranny of Good Intentions: How Prosecutors and Law Enforcement Are Trampling the Constitution in the Name of Justice (New York, New York: Three Rivers Press, 2008). These problems are becoming increasingly acute, because in large part they arise, not at all from "good intentions", but from thoroughly bad ones. A proper police state, after all, operates on the perverse principle that "everything is prohibited, except what is expressly permitted". So, as that principle is increasingly adopted, the ulterior intention becomes manifest.

[1857] U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1.

[1858] See ante, at 303-307 (Rhode Island) and 732-733 (Virginia).

Similarly, in cases that had resulted in some, and might result in more, domestic violence, investigation, intervention, and monitoring by the Militia could obviate future tragedies. Inasmuch as a Local Militia Company would include as members all of the adults in every family in its area, its officers would either personally know about, or would receive reports concerning, domestic disputes that had resulted in or could escalate into violence. As the adults in such a situation would be subject to Militia discipline, they could be required to receive counseling, support, and where necessary continuing observation and control that would forefend future trouble. Supervision of and support for such people by members of their own families, friends, and neighbors organized through their own Militia Companies would surely be more close, sympathetic, and effective than monitoring by lawyers, judges and other judicial personnel, and bureaucrats from "social-services" agencies who all too often focus on keeping up case loads so as to justify ever-increasing fees and appropriations, not on helping to solve individuals' personal problems.

Finally, upon revitalization of the Militia, most (if not all) "gun-free zones" should definitely be eliminated, because next to no places would exist in any community where members of the Militia would not be active in one capacity or another—and, being active, would not be armed. Actually, in principle this would not be a great departure from the present situation. First, even the statutes now in force make exceptions for individuals licensed to carry firearms, including both civilians and various law-enforcement officers.[1859] And upon revitalization of the Militia, every member will be deemed to be a "law-enforcement officer" to some degree. Second, the statutes now in force also make exceptions for programs involving firearms that are approved by and conducted in the schools.[1860] And upon revitalization of the Militia, schools will be centers for training not only students but also other members of the community in such matters as firearms safety and marksmanship, in addition to advanced courses in Militia science and related disciplines—in all of which activities firearms will have a prominent place.

b. The *pre-*constitutional Militia laws fully support these conclusions. Those laws never disqualified from Militia service in general or excluded from the personal possession of firearms in particular: (i) those individuals who had committed crimes or other offenses—including "[F]ELON[IES]"—for which they had served their sentences, paid their fines, or undergone other punishments, and thereafter had returned to society; or (ii) those individuals who had merely been charged with but not convicted of crimes, and during the pendency of any inquiry or trial had been allowed to remain at large in the community; or (iii) those individuals subject to [1859] 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(2)(B)(ii) and (vi); General Laws of Rhode Island § 11-47-60(b); Code of Virginia § 18.2-308.1, exceptions (iv), (vi), and (vii).

---

[1860] 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(2)(B)(iv); General Laws of Rhode Island § 11-47-60(b)(1) through (4); Code of Virginia § 18.2-308.1, exception (iii).

judicial orders in civil cases (except possibly in situations involving a "surety of the peace"[1861]). And if convictions for real "[F]ELON[IES]" did not always result in exclusion from the Militia in that era, then convictions for faux "felonies" or mere "misdemeanors" today certainly cannot invariably have that effect.

Only two classes of persons were routinely disarmed pursuant to law during the pre-constitutional period—namely, slaves at all times (and along with them sometimes free people of color, too) and politically disloyal individuals during tumultuous times:

(1) Slaves were always almost totally precluded from service in or for the Militia, for the self-evident reason that personal possession of firearms and ammunition, and training in how to use that equipment, by large numbers of bondsmen were utterly incompatible with perpetuation of what American slaveholders came to call their "Peculiar Institution". Because "a well regulated militia" in pre-constitutional times was "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms" as "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state",[1862] slaves obviously could take no part in the Militia on the basis of anything approaching equality with the rest of the community. For being *un*free themselves, they were not among "the people" who formed "a free state": "[N]either the class of persons who had been imported as slaves nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were * * * acknowledged as a part of the people".[1863] Furthermore, because "a well regulated militia" was always "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms", slaves could take no part in the Militia specifically as soldiers. For the bondsmen's thoroughgoing personal disarmament was the preëminent and absolutely necessary "badge and incident" of slavery. As Blackstone pointed out,

> [t]wo precautions are * * * advised to be observed in all prudent and free governments: 1. To prevent the introduction of slavery at all: or, 2. If it be already introduced, not to intrust those slaves with arms; who will then find themselves an overmatch for the freemen.[1864]

This, together with "[t]he long existence of African slavery in this country[,] g[i]ve[s] us very distinct notions of what [slavery] was, and what were its necessary incidents" in relation to slaves' possession of firearms.[1865]

If slaves were always granted a near-absolute exemption (or, perhaps more realistically in light of their degraded social status, exclusion) from the Militia out of

---

[1861] See ante, at 303-307 (Rhode Island) and 732-733 (Virginia).

[1862] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[1863] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 407 (1857) (opinion of Taney, C.J.).

[1864] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 416.

[1865] Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 22 (1883).

necessity, free people of color were conditionally exempted out of social prejudice: perhaps formally enlisted in the Militia, but (as in Virginia) usually required to perform only servile labor rather than to muster as armed soldiers on equal terms with White Americans.{EN-1989} This is hardly surprising, inasmuch as "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[1866] and during the pre-constitutional era even free Negroes and other people of color were "considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them".[1867]

(2) Similarly, in that era politically disloyal individuals were considered, not simply to be no part of "the people" because of their disaffection toward the government, but even to be actual enemies of the community (and perhaps actual alien enemies, at that). For example, in 1779 Rhode Island's General Assembly declared that,

> WHEREAS all Countries have a Right to the personal service of its Inhabitants, the greatest Exertions of whom, in their different Capacities, are especially requisite for the Defence and Protection of their Lives, Liberties and Properties, during the actual Invasion of Enemies; and a Refusal or withdrawing the same being against the Rights of human Society, and the being voluntarily adherent to public Enemies, by giving them Aid or Comfort, or the seeking of their Protection, amount to a total Renunciation of all former Rights, Privileges and Inheritances whatever: And whereas, since the King and Parliament of Great-Britain, have tyrannically framed, and attempted with Fleets and Armies to introduce into these United States, a most cruel System of Despotism, at the same Time declaring the Inhabitants thereof out of their Protection, sundry of said Inhabitants, regardless of their Ties and Obligations aforesaid, have left their Habitations, joined and been adherent to the Enemies aforesaid, thereby giving them Aid and Comfort, or continued to reside in Places invaded by or in the Power of said Enemies, and have voluntarily aided and abetted them: Therefore, > * * * every Inhabitant * * * who * * * hath levied War, or conspired to levy War, against * * * [the] United States, or who hath adhered to the said King of Great-Britain * * * , or who * * * hath withdrawn * * * into Parts and Places under the acknowledged Authority and Dominion of the said King * * * shall be held, taken, deemed and judged to have voluntarily renounced all civil and political relation to
>

---

[1866] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1867] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 404-405 (1857) (opinion of Taney, C.J.).

> each and every of the said United States, and be considered as an Alien.{EN-1990}

So disarming disloyal albeit free individuals in that era was at least as imperative as disarming slaves.

(3) Based on this history, exemptions from revitalized "Militia of the several States" grounded solely on an individual's prior "criminal" misbehavior, for which he had served his sentence, would be nonexistent today, whether his "crime" had been an ersatz "felony" as now loosely defined or even a true "[F]ELONY" as understood in pre-constitutional times (if the perpetrator had not been executed but had eventually returned to the community as a free individual), let alone some less-serious "crime" or a mere civil infraction that resulted in a court order. After all, individuals may be justly convicted of having been "criminals". And while in custody, serving their sentences, they may be disarmed as "criminals" as part of their punishment. But when they return to society and begin leading upright lives, they are "criminals" no longer, only former "criminals". So why should a status derived from their past misbehavior, for which they have already suffered a penalty, continue indefinitely into their present lives, particularly when that continuation prevents them from serving their community in the Militia on an equal basis with everyone else?

Even a prior conviction for a so-called "crime of violence" should not suffice for an individual's permanent exemption from the Militia.[1868] To be sure, "gun controllers" often contend that an individual who has committed a "crime of violence" has thereby demonstrated a personal "propensity for violence" which justifies preëmptively disarming him thereafter. Any such conclusion, though, either rests on some species of biological or psychological determinism, which is inadmissible within the legal system of "a free State", or is hopelessly speculative, because no "due process of law" with respect to purely imagined future acts can justify depriving an individual of his present life, liberty, or property. Absent the invocation of determinism, although a conviction in the past may prove that the perpetrator posed a danger to others at that time, it cannot establish to any degree of certitude that he will pose a danger to anyone in the future. If isolated past acts could prove inherent tendencies which could then justify prior restraints, any proof of evil tendencies should suffice for that result, because the tendencies, not the acts, will supposedly find new expression in the future. In that case, though, everyone should be permanently subject to preëmptive governmental controls of some [1868] See, e.g., AN ACT To regulate commerce in firearms, Act of 30 June 1938, CHAPTER 850, §§ 1(6), 2(f), and 5, 52 Stat. 1250, 1250, 1251, 1252, amended to change "crime of violence" to "crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year" in AN ACT To strengthen the Federal Firearms Act, Act of 3 October 1961, Pub. L. 87-342, 75 Stat. 757. Today, the term "crime of violence" is broadly defined. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 16 and 3156(a)(4).

---

variety, because everyone suffers from an inborn tendency to commit antisocial acts, known as Original Sin. Precisely how such a system could work in practice, when the public officials administering it were themselves as prone to the weaknesses stemming from Original Sin as the people they purported to supervise, remains the perennial mystery: Quis custodes custodiet? "Who shall guard the guardians?" Or perhaps better put, Quis custodes custodire potest? "Who is able to guard the guardians?"

In any event, with every individual who was required to serve in the revitalized Militia being thoroughly instructed on a regular basis in regard to his responsibilities as a citizen of "a free State", far less crime of all sorts would occur than society suffers now. Moreover, because revitalized Militia would maintain far closer scrutiny of their members than can present-day police forces and the judicial system over anyone not in custody, early indications of an individual's possibly aberrant behavior would likely be observed and the problem addressed before it suppurated into overt illegal activity. The Militia, after all, could constitutionally supervise, and even impose requirements on, an individual member's possession and employment of firearms—not in derogation, but in enforcement, of that individual's "right * * * to keep and bear Arms"—as they did in pre-constitutional times, when they enforced inspections, at home as well as in the field, in order to insure that Militiamen were properly supplied with arms.[1869] "[T]he right * * * to keep and bear Arms", after all, aims at guaranteeing "the security of a free State", not undermining that "security" through individuals' misuse of their "Arms" for criminal or other anti-social purposes. So "[a] well regulated Militia" could be invested with supervisory authority to ensure before the fact that all of the "Arms" in its members' hands were not capable of being put to improper uses (for example, because they were fully accounted for and safely stored), and with investigatory authority to verify after the fact that none of those "Arms" had been involved in crimes involving firearms (for example, by conducting ballistics and other examinations of the types of "Arms" in Militiamen's possession that were suspected of having been misused).

(4) Conversely, that an individual, although out and about in the community, were being held in actual "slavery * * * as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted" would provide a valid basis for exempting him from the Militia's normal requirement that he be armed. For, absent some special legislative dispensation, the status of "slavery" always disqualified an individual to some significant degree for the personal possession of arms during pre-constitutional times; and therefore that disqualification forms part of the constitutional definition of "[a] well regulated Militia". Today, though, an individual's "crime" would have to be quite serious for the community to have decreed as the proper punishment for committing it the stigma as well as the general loss of liberty and property, and especially the specific burdens of uncompensated labor, that "slavery" would impose, perhaps for life, on the perpetrator.

---

[1869] E.g., see ante, Chapter 8 (Rhode Island), and at 472-480, 648-649, and 652-657 (Virginia).

As Blackstone instructed Americans of the pre-constitutional era, > * * * [T]he end, or final cause of human punishments * * * [is] as a precaution against future offences of the same kind. This is effected three ways: either by the amendment of the offender himself; for which purpose all corporal punishments, fines, and temporary exile or imprisonment are inflicted: or, by deterring others by the dread of his example from offending in the like way, "*ut poena * * * ad paucos, metus ad omnes pervieniat*;" [1870] which gives rise to all ignominious punishments, and to such executions of justice as are open and public; or lastly, by depriving the party injuring of the power to do future mischief; which is effected by either putting him to death, or condemning him to perpetual confinement, slavery, or exile. * * * The method however of inflicting punishment ought always to be proportioned to the particular purpose it is meant to serve, and by no means to exceed it: therefore the pains of death, and perpetual disability by exile, slavery, or imprisonment, ought never to be inflicted, but when the offender appears incorrigible: which may be collected either from a repetition of minuter offences; or from the perpetration of some one crime of deep malignity, which of itself demonstrates a disposition without hope or probability of amendment: and in such cases it would be cruelty to the public, to defer the punishment of such a criminal, till he had an opportunity of repeating perhaps the worst of villainies.

>
> * * * As to the measure of human punishments * * * the quantity of punishment can never be absolutely determined by any standing invariable rule; but it must be left to the arbitration of the legislature to inflict such penalties as are warranted by the laws of nature and society, and such as appear to be the best calculated to answer the end of precaution against future offences.[1871]

Similarly, Thomas Rutherforth, another English legal commentator influential in the pre-constitutional period, observed that > slavery may be produced by guilt, consistently with the law of nature. Amongst the other methods of restraining a criminal from offending again, this is one: he will have few opportunities of offending, where all his actions are under the absolute authority and control of another. And this

---

[1870] "That by punishment to a few fear shall reach all."

[1871] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 11-12.

> loss of liberty may be either temporary or perpetual, according as the guilt of the criminal deserves a less or a greater penalty. The punishment of a criminal may likewise end in slavery, where the guilt is such as to deserve death. They, who are to punish him, may, if they find it proper, remit the rigour of the penalty, and give him his life, upon condition of his becoming their slave.[1872]

The admonition that "perpetual disability by * * * slavery * * * ought never to be inflicted, but when the offender appears incorrigible"—and, in particular, the justification that slavery may be imposed on a criminal "where the guilt is such as to deserve death"—rather starkly frame the antinomy in contemporary mass political psychology (or perhaps psychopathology) that, on the one hand, most Americans would think long and hard before making actual slavery the punishment for some "crime", even though that would be an historically supportable and therefore strictly constitutional way to disarm an isolated perpetrator while he was allowed to be at large in the community; but, on the other hand, very few people even notice, let alone deprecate, that modern "gun controllers" aim at nothing less than reintroducing slavery pro tanto among almost the entire population, by imposing the primary "badge and incident" of the Peculiar Institution—coerced personal disarmament—on common Americans, next to none of whom has ever been charged, let alone convicted, of any "crime" worthy of punishment by slavery. This ignorance or insouciance is all the more astounding, because—even if the average citizen were not aware of the somewhat arcane points of law that the Thirteenth Amendment "denounces a status or condition, irrespective of the manner or authority by which it is created",[1873] aims at "the obliteration and prevention of slavery with all its badges and incidents", and therefore "abolish[es] all badges and incidents of slavery in the United States"[1874]—he should know that under the Declaration of Independence "all men are created equal"; that "in view of the Constitution * * * there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens";[1875] and that the Constitution itself explicitly warns everyone that without "well regulated Militia" based upon "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" the "security of a free State" is in jeopardy.[1876]

[1872] INSTITUTES OF NATURAL LAW; BEING THE SUBSTANCE OF A COURSE OF LECTURES ON GROTIUS DE JURE BELLI ET PACIS [1754-1756] (Baltimore, Maryland: William and Joseph Neal, Second American Edition, 1832), Book I, Chapter XX, § IV, at 242. On Rutherforth's importance, see, e.g, W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Volume 1, at 364-369.

[1873] Clyatt v. United States, 197 U.S. 207, 216 (1905).

[1874] Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 21, 20 (1883). See Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Company, 392 U.S. 409, 440-441 (1968); Griffin v. Breckenridge, 403 U.S. 88, 105 (1971).

[1875] Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

[1876] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

(5) Disloyalty as the basis for exempting an individual from the Militia's normal requirement that he be armed raises a slightly different problem. Not that disloyalty would not justifiably constitute such a basis today in principle. For having been so in *pre-*constitutional times, for good and sufficient reasons which the Constitution does not gainsay, it must remain so now. And not that disloyalty with very serious consequences is not possible today in practice. For although disloyal Americans could not threaten to stir up revolts among slaves, they could—and from the recent history of (say) the Communist Party of the United States probably would—engage in subversion, sedition, espionage, sabotage, and perhaps even acts of mass terrorism on behalf of a foreign power.[1877] But, unlike most "criminal" activity, disloyalty stems from and reflects a state of mind, usually grounded in some ideology, which may appear merely in words as well as in overt illegal acts.

On the face of it, any American disloyal to the Constitution as a whole would necessarily be an enemy of "a free State", and of such a State's "security", to which at a minimum he would refuse to contribute his best efforts, and which at a maximum he would affirmatively seek to subvert or destroy entirely. So, were he suffered to remain at large in society, allowing him "to keep and bear Arms" on the same extensive basis as loyal citizens would be absurd (although he might be licensed to possess a firearm in his own home, exclusively for the defense of himself and his family). Once adjudicated as disloyal, an individual would have to purge himself of that taint, at least by taking an oath or affirmation of loyalty of a legally binding nature, before he would be allowed to possess a firearm and to serve in the Militia on the same terms as loyal citizens.[1878] Plainly enough, if America can require her presumably loyal public officials to "be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution",[1879] she can require individuals of proven disloyalty to do as much in order to rehabilitate themselves.

F. Exemptions not compulsory Other than with respect to "slavery [ ]or involuntary servitude" and disloyalty, certain critical public offices and private occupations, and participation by women and very young men in *para-*military activities of a combatant nature, exemptions from Militia service should not be compulsory. Rather, those individuals who might qualify for an exemption might always waive it.

[1877] See, e.g., Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951); American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382 (1950); and Communist Party USA v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 367 U.S. 1 (1961), confirmed by, e.g., Harvey Klehr, John Earl Haynes, & Fridrikh Igorevich Firsov, The Secret World of American Communism (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1995); John Earl Haynes & Harvey Klehr, Venona: Decoding Soviet Espionage in America (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 2000); and Ted Morgan, Reds: McCarthyism in Twentieth-century America (New York, New York: Random House Trade Paperbacks 2004).

[1878] See ante, at 297-299 (Rhode Island) and 742-746 (Virginia).

[1879] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

Also, an individual who became exempt from all compulsory Militia service upon reaching the upper limit of age would not thereby somehow lose his right to remain fully armed. Besides the possibility that he might still be able to volunteer to perform some Militia duties within his abilities, thereby waiving the exemption, the exemption itself could have no such effect. When during the *pre-*constitutional era an individual acquired a firearm, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements in fulfillment of his Militia duty, he became vested with a statutory right to maintain possession of that equipment throughout his period of service. His later automatic exemption from duty perforce of old age did not deprive him of that equipment. When thereafter each individual's statutory duty and right to possess a firearm became a constitutional duty and right, the power of any legislature to fashion exemptions from that duty and right was confined to the contours that had been previously established. Exemption on the basis of age under the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes had always extinguished the individual's duty, but had never affected his right, to possess a firearm. Therefore, under the Constitution, any such exemption could not affect that right, either. The upshot being that an individual who today takes possession of a firearm in fulfillment of his Militia duty, and then is exempted from Militia service on account of age, cannot lawfully be deprived of possession of that firearm solely on the grounds of his exemption.

G. Required payments for exemptions. Being a release from some aspect of Militia duty to which no one is entitled as a "right", an exemption may be conditioned upon the performance of some service or the payment of some compensation to the Militia, the government, or a substitute. For example, Congress's first Militia statute under the Constitution provided "[t]hat each and every free able-bodied white male citizen of the respective states, resident therein, who is or shall be of the age of eighteen years, and under the age of forty-five years (except as is herein after excepted) shall severally and respectively be enrolled in the militia by the * * * commanding officer of the company, within whose bounds such citizen shall reside", but also stipulated that "all persons who now are or may hereafter be exempted by the laws of the respective states, shall be, and are hereby exempted from militia duty, notwithstanding their being above the age of eighteen, and under the age of forty-five years".[1880] When Rhode Island reorganized her Militia in compliance with this Act, her General Assembly mandated that, > in addition to the Persons exempted from military Duty by the Act of the United States [of 1792] * * * , there shall be * * * exempted by this Act * * * , either in the Regiments of Senior Class or Infantry, the following Persons, to wit: The Members of both Houses of the Legislature, the Justices of the Superior Court of Judicature, the Justices of the Court of

[1880] An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, §§ 1 and 2, 1 Stat. 271, 271, 272

> Common Pleas, the Secretary, the Attorney-General, the General-Treasurer, One Ferryman to each stated Ferry, the Ministers and Teachers of each Church or Congregation, the President, Professors, Tutors, Students and Steward of Rhode-Island College, and all Persons who are conscientiously scrupulous against bearing Arms * * * .
>
> * * * Provided nevertheless * * * That all Persons who are or shall hereafter be exempted from military service as in the preceding Section, and shall not perform the same as directed by this Act, * * * shall pay for such Exemption, and as an Equivalent for the said Services, the Sum of Twelve Shillings annually * * * . Provided further, That every settled Minister of each Church and Congregation, the President, Professors, Tutors, Students, and Steward of Rhode-Island College, shall be exempted from paying the said Equivalent.{EN-1991}

This statute was revealing in two respects: First, even the highest public officials—"[t]he Members of both Houses of the Legislature, the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas, the Secretary, the Attorney-General, [and] the General-Treasurer"—were exempted only upon their payment of a monetary "Equivalent" for the Militia service they did not perform. Second, these individuals could waive their exemptions and perform regular Militia duty if they so chose, because the statute required payments only if they "shall not perform th[eir military Service] as directed by this Act".

This exemplifies how exemptions could be profitably employed to facilitate revitalization of the Militia today. With such large populations in most States in comparison to *pre-*constitutional times, revitalization could initially proceed with only relatively small percentages of the eligible citizenry actively participating—for instance, primarily through the formation of Independent Companies.[1881] Large numbers of individuals, then, could be exempted from almost all regular duty simply on their payment of modest "Equivalent[s]", which would be dedicated exclusively to funding the Militia's activities. Presumably, in the early days of revitalization, when formal enrollment were compulsory but active participation still largely voluntary, and perhaps as much as fifty, sixty, or seventy percent of the population chose not to participate, even an "Equivalent" of only (say) twenty-five or fifty dollars per person per year would net sizeable revenues. In this way, political pressure against revitalization of the Militia from those reluctant to serve would be attenuated; such unwilling individuals would in both law and fact be serving by paying for their exemptions; and the moneys collected would allow for rapid revitalization by enabling the foresighted patriots who did serve to obtain the necessary equipment, training, and so on with little to no financial burden on themselves.

[1881] See post, Chapter 44.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

Because the ultimate goal of "homeland security" must be WE THE PEOPLE'S own political freedom and economic well-being, and because that goal can be attained only by THE PEOPLE'S own participation where they actually reside in Local communities, "the Militia of the several States" must be organized and controlled "from the bottom up", not "from the top down".

Although revitalized "Militia of the several States" will be forces potentially as extensive as the populations of able-bodied adults living throughout America, they will be decidedly different from mere agglomerations of armed robots, ruled "from the top down" out of the District of Columbia, or even out of their State capitals, according to some latter-day variant of das Führerprinzip ("the Leader Principle"). Quite the contrary: In keeping with the pattern consistently followed throughout America during *pre-*constitutional times, "[w]ell regulated Militia" must be organized on the basis of, have their members recruited from, be equipped and trained for the purpose of protecting, and have their authority centered in, Local communities.

A. Localities the focal points for revitalization of the Militia. Self-evidently, true and lasting "homeland security" for "a free State"[1882]—"ordain[ed]" and "establish[ed]" by WE THE PEOPLE themselves to "provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"[1883]—demands the maintenance of both political freedom and economic stability. Not for some disembodied "polity" or "economy" in the abstract, but for the real Americans who are the "polity" and the "economy" in action. Not for some self-selected élite, either—for "in view of the Constitution * * * there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens"[1884]—but instead for all common Americans. And not simply for the sake of some mere symbol of the "homeland", but in the actual home towns and even family homes where average Americans actually work and live, and expect their governmental institutions to protect their "unalienable Rights", including "Life, Liberty and the

---

[1882] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1883] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1884] Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

pursuit of Happiness".[1885] The purpose of the "defence of a free state"[1886] and "the security of a free State"[1887] is to enable the people to live peaceful, prosperous lives, according to their own purposes—when, where, and how they themselves choose. That being so, the primary locus of that "defence" and "security" must be in Local communities, because there the people, the places, the things, and the ways of life to be defended are to be found. Thus, true American "homeland security" is not about the District of Columbia—although that is this country's political capital; or about New York City—although that purports to be this country's economic (or at least financial) capital. It finds neither its genesis, nor its terminus, nor its being or purpose or justification in either or both of those places. For America can survive perfectly well without either of them, and especially the two of them when they are conspiring together. Rather, just as charity begins at home, so too does self-defense, not only for each individual but also for the particular community in which that individual lives, as well as the Nation which is the "homeland" to them all.

1. Each of the revitalized "Militia of the several States" must be "well regulated" pursuant to some Congressional or State statute. Initially, Congress could "provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" by itself stipulating a fully detailed set of regulations.[1888] Or it could "provide for" those purposes by doing nothing more than allowing individual States to establish their own regulations, consistent with constitutional principles, but specifically tailored to their particular circumstances. Or it could promulgate some basic regulations to which the States would be free to and should add such complementary and supplementary regulations as their peculiar needs might require. And in default of Congressional action, the States could provide for all those matters themselves pursuant to their concurrent powers over their Militia.

Except in extreme circumstances, however, "well regulated Militia" by that name may not be revitalized directly by Local communities. During *pre-*constitutional times, Militia were always "well regulated" pursuant to some Colonial or State statute which emanated from the General Assembly or other supreme legislative authority. This requirement was carried over into the Constitution, when it incorporated "the Militia of the several States"—not the Militia of innumerable Local jurisdictions—into its federal system. And for good reason. Throughout the United States, Localities are mere creatures of their States, exercising only such limited governmental powers as the States' constitutions and laws delegate to them. Inasmuch as "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'", and her "well regulated Militia" is the highest because the most puissant embodiment of popular

---

[1885] See Declaration of Independence.

[1886] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1887] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1888] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

sovereignty in a State, independent control over the Militia—such as the power to revitalize it at will—can never be vested in a Locality without setting up a miniature imperium in imperio.[1889] To be sure, in principle a State's constitution or laws could delegate some carefully limited authority of that nature to her Localities—always, of course, subject to supervision and control by the State herself. But in practice that delegation would have to be rather explicit and specific, in order to avoid a charge of usurpation against Local officials. Nonetheless, in the absence of sufficient action by either Congress or a State's legislature to revitalize the Militia, presumably most Localities within a State would enjoy sufficient authority to establish community-self-defense organizations under the control of "Committees of Safety" set up by and operating subject to the Localities' normal governing bodies. Having no authorization from either Congress or a State's legislature, though, these organizations could not qualify as true Militia (although they might be able to perform many of the Local "homeland-security" functions of Militia), and therefore would enjoy none of the specifically constitutional rights, powers, privileges, and immunities that true Militia do.

2. Although Localities may not themselves provide the legal impetus for revitalization of the Militia, they should nevertheless be made the focal points of the process. In addition to preparing Local communities to act in unison, either on behalf of their State as a whole and under her direction for purposes of the State's "homeland security", or when and as "call[ed] forth" by Congress "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions",[1890] every State and Congressional statute aimed at revitalizing the Militia should devolve upon those communities both: (i) as much autonomy, authority, and ability to function independently in the operations of the Militia units within their own jurisdictions as they could prudently be entrusted to assume and exercise; and (ii) the responsibility and capability to coöperate amongst themselves in aid of the "homeland-security" needs of neighboring communities within their State—so that, to the greatest degree practicable, the people within each State would be prepared, in the face of any plausibly foreseeable emergency, to provide themselves with at least minimally adequate "homeland security" for some reasonable period of time without assistance from the General Government, the central government of their own State, or the government of any other State.[1891] Because no substitute for self-reliance exists when reliance on others proves unavailing, a prudent people must always be ready, willing, and able to rely upon themselves.

[1889] Figuratively, "a state within a state".

[1890] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[1891] Of course, if Congress required the States to supply some "Part[s] of the[ir Militia]" to "be employed in the Service of the United States", selection of the units to be "call[ed] forth" would not be subject to either State or Local control unless Congress so authorized. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. VI, cl. 2.

3. In the initial stages of revitalization of the Militia—when imagination, flexibility, experimentation, and maximal use of minimal resources will be most necessary—Local governmental bodies, in conformity with general Congressional and specific State standards, should be authorized, encouraged, enabled, and equipped inter alia to:

- Place the Militia in each Locality under the immediate overall command of a Local "Committee of Safety" composed of designated members of the Local governing body and selected Captains of the regular Militia Companies and "Independent Companies" organized within that body's jurisdiction—with the understanding that: (i) Local "homeland security" is the Militia's primary responsibility. (ii) The State's Governor (or other official appointed as her Militia's "commander in chief") may call out the Militia of any Locality for service in another Locality within the State, or possibly within another State, only pursuant to specific authorization in the State's Militia laws. And (iii) the Militia may come under the command of the President only "when called into the actual Service of the United States" for the sole purposes of "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions".[1892]

- Inform residents of the community of their duty to serve in the Militia, and the options available to them for fulfilling that duty.

- Establish special categories of exemptions responsive to peculiar Local conditions.

- Determine the numbers, types, structures, and sizes of Militia units appropriate for each region in the Locality.

- Encourage the formation of Independent Companies in order to supply highly specialized units and to provide working models for organizing the remainder of the Militia.[1893]

- Ascertain where various Militia units composed of specialists, or requiring the use of specialized equipment, should be based.

- Promulgate the initial procedures by which Militiamen within each unit may select their officers.

- See to it that: (i) All individuals eligible for Militia service (other than conscientious objectors) who are financially capable of providing themselves with suitable firearms, ammunition, and related accoutrements obtain that equipment within some reasonable period of time, and

---

[1892] On the last of these points, see U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1, discussed ante, at 871-880 thereafter at all times maintain personal possession of it, in good order, in their places of abode. And (ii) the Militia itself or for some agency of Local government will provide or otherwise assist in the provision of firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements, on fair conditions, to those individuals who are financially unable to purchase that equipment.

[1893] See post, Chapter 44.

• Devise and put into practice a method for regularly assessing Militiamen's compliance with the requirement that at all times they maintain personal possession of firearms, ammunition, and related accoutrements suitable for Militia service and in good order.

• Secure adequate reserves of firearms, ammunition, accoutrements, and other matériel in conveniently situated arsenals, magazines, and depots under the Militia's direct and exclusive supervision.

• Allow through normal judicial process for fines to be assessed against or other sanctions to be imposed upon Militiamen who default in their duties (with all fines so collected to be turned over to the Militia to defray its necessary and proper expenses), until Militia courts-martial have been established (and even thereafter for dealing with misbehavior during Militia service that cannot constitutionally be subject to courts-martial).[1894] And,

• Arrange for regular courses of training and instruction, and field exercises, to be conducted according to schedules and in manners that do not overly interfere with Militiamen's normal employment and other necessary social activities, with special emphasis to be placed on the particular threats to "homeland security" that confront the Locality.

One absolutely necessary exception to the limitation on "field exercises" would be a mandate that the Militia in each community, in concert with the Militia in all other communities throughout the Locality and the State, should conduct a continuous and intensive exercise aimed at: (i) the introduction into the State's public financial transactions and her private economy as a whole of an alternative currency consisting of silver and gold fully capable of competing with Federal Reserve Notes; and (ii) the creation of an alternative structure of prices denominated in that alternative currency; so that (iii) in the event of a catastrophic failure of the Federal Reserve System the State's government and private economy could abandon the use of Federal Reserve Notes and continue to function with the least possible disruption. This operation might be seen as a "field deployment" of [1894] See U.S. Const. amend. V: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger[.]" the Militia, rather than a "field exercise", inasmuch as its purpose would be to replace one set of "normal activities" (based on the use of Federal Reserve Notes) with another set (based on the use of an alternative currency) as soon as economic conditions warranted the change. In the context of a National economy permeated with ham-handed political interference and sophisticated financial fraud organized and perpetrated at the highest levels in the District of Columbia and New York City, other instances of such "field deployments" can easily be imagined.

---

After revitalization of the Militia has been accomplished, the highest commanders of the Militia in each Locality will take on most of these responsibilities, where appropriate in consultation and coöperation with the Local governing bodies.

B. Local control of the Militia the facilitator and guarantor of popular sovereignty. Although such painstaking Local organization and command can be mandated easily enough in a State statute, they cannot be made to work in the field unless their source, sustenance, and structure derive from WE THE PEOPLE themselves, as a result of THE PEOPLE'S recognition that "homeland security" imposed "from the top down" is unsupportable as a matter of constitutional law, unworkable as a matter of fact, and unacceptable as a matter of political principle.

1. Local control a fundamental constitutional principle. Local organization and command are inherent in the historical understanding of the term "[a] well regulated Militia"—which understanding, of course, controls the constitutional definition of that term.[1895] Not surprisingly, therefore, in numerous ways the Constitution recognizes the primacy of Local control over the Militia.

a. Rather than creating an unitary "Militia of the United States", the Constitution incorporates within its federal system the multiple "Militia of the several States"[1896]—which is why the Constitution refers to the Militia in the plural, in the power of Congress "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States".[1897] Thus, the Constitution recognizes that there are as many "Militia" as there are "States", and that each of these "Militia" has, perforce of the Constitution, as permanent an existence as the State to which it appertains. In contrast to the "Troops, or Ships of War" that "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * keep * * * in time of Peace",[1898] no State needs "the Consent of Congress" to maintain her own Militia. To the contrary: For public officials in any State to neglect or refuse to maintain "[a] well

---

[1895] See ante, at 63-81.

[1896] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1897] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[1898] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

regulated Militia"—particularly if Congress fails, neglects, or refuses "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"[1899]—constitutes the most serious possible violation of their "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution",[1900] because it endangers "the security of a free State",[1901] upon which all constitutional rights, powers, privileges, and immunities depend.

b. The Constitution allows the Militia to be "call[ed] forth" into "the Service of the United States" for only three specific reasons: namely, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1902] Otherwise, the Militia serve State and Local purposes alone, because they are the several States' own establishments.

c. The Constitution authorizes Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"—but with the explicit restriction on that power: "reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress".[1903] In the final analysis, "organizing, arming, and disciplining" may often prove to be largely matters of form. More consequential to the actual performance of the Militia may be the identities of their "Officers", and particularly the "Officers[']" attachments to the Militiamen and the Militiamen's attachments to them, which arise out of everyone's close association in such activities as "training", and which make for loyalty to and cohesion of those institutions in the midst of adversity. So, with "the Appointment of the Officers" (other than the President of the United States himself[1904]) left to the States, the real power of command and control will reside there, in the hands of THE PEOPLE themselves.

Of crucial importance, the language—"reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers" in the Militia—establishes an absolute Congressional disability. Congress can claim no power whatsoever with respect to "the Appointment of th[os]e Officers". As the Tenth Amendment makes clear in relation to this type of situation, "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States * * * are reserved to the States respectively"—so, inasmuch as "the Appointment of the Officers" is explicitly "reserv[ed] to the States respectively", the power to appoint such "Officers" is just as explicitly "not delegated to the United States". The absolute constitutional disability for Congress to exercise this power also entails an absolute constitutional disability for the States to cede this power to Congress:

[1899] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1900] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1901] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1902] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[1903] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1904] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

Having been explicitly "reserv[ed] to the States" by the Constitution, absent an Amendment of the Constitution it cannot under any circumstances be transferred, directly or indirectly, by any one or even all of them to Congress.

For that reason, Congress cannot condition grants of public moneys to the States—for the ostensible purpose of "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"—upon the States' agreement to allow Congress to dictate terms for "the Appointment of the Officers" in the Militia. True enough, Congress has the "Power to lay and collect Taxes * * * to * * * provide for the common Defence",[1905] and may expend "Money" collected for that purpose and then "drawn from the Treasury [of the United States], * * * in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law".[1906] The term "common Defence", however, must be construed consistently with the rest of the Constitution. For all constitutional "principles are of equal dignity, and n[one] must be so enforced as to nullify or substantially impair [any] other".[1907] Constitutional reservations of various powers to the States—and corresponding disabilities in both Congress and the States as to the subjects of those powers—define in part what the Constitution intends "the common Defence" to protect. So rogue Congressmen cannot "provide for the common Defence" by usurping powers directly, or by bribing rogue public officials in the States into assisting them in doing so. Any requirement purportedly enacted by Congress that, as the condition of the States' receipt of "Money * * * drawn from the Treasury [of the United States]" for the purpose of "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the[ir] Militia" (or for any other purpose, for that matter), the States must acquiesce in "the Appointment of the Officers [in their Militia]" other than by themselves alone would be null and void ab initio as in direct conflict with Congress's and the States' constitutional disabilities with respect to such "Appointment[s]". And any purported "Appropriations" to that end, being intended to facilitate rogue Congressmen's usurpation of power and rogue State officials' complicity therein, would not be "made by Law", because they would be in direct violation of "the supreme Law of the Land",[1908] and therefore would be null and void ab initio, too.[1909]

For generations, however, the pellucidity of the Constitution on this score has escaped both Congressmen and public officials in the several States. As explained above,[1910] as part of a scheme for surreptitiously disestablishing the

---

[1905] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[1906] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 7.

[1907] Dick v. United States, 208 U.S. 340, 353 (1908).

[1908] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[1909] See, e.g., Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886); Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 97, 101-102 (1887); Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 376-377 (1880), quoted with approval in Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408 (1963).

[1910] See ante, at 786-793.

Militia, in 1916 Congress purported to define "[t]he militia of the United States" as "be[ing] divided into three classes, the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the Unorganized Militia".[1911] For the first time, too, although Congress treated the National Guard as some sort of "militia", this same statute established distinct Congressional standards for this supposed "militia's" officers—in effect, stripping the States of the power the Constitution reserves to them for "the Appointment of the Officers [in the Militia]".[1912] Congress brought about the States' compliance by threatening to withhold from defiant States all financial and other assistance in relation to the National Guard: "Whenever any State shall, within a limit of time to be fixed by the President, have failed or refused to comply with or enforce any requirement of this Act, or any regulation promulgated thereunder and in aid thereof by the President or the Secretary of War, the National Guard of such State shall be debarred, wholly or in part, as the President may direct, from receiving from the United States any pecuniary or other aid, benefit, or privilege authorized or provided by this Act or any other law."[1913] Thus, in as plain an exhibition of legislative psychosis as one could imagine, Members of Congress purported to exercise one of that body's constitutional powers—namely, "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"—by refusing to abide by one of its constitutional disabilities as to the selfsame subject matter, explicitly set out in the very same clause of the Constitution—namely, to "reserv[e] to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers".[1914]

Worse yet, in that same statute Congress required each "enlisted man" in the National Guard to "sign[ ] an enlistment contract" and take an "oath of enlistment" that he would "'obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the governor of the State of —— , and of the officers appointed over me according to law and the rules and articles of war'".[1915] The President, however, is "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States", not at all times, but only "when [they are] called into the actual Service of the United States", for one or more of the three purposes the Constitution enumerates.[1916] So a purported "militiaman's" "oath of enlistment" as to the President, not qualified by the requirement that it can apply only during such "actual Service", is deceptively

---

[1911] An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 57, 39 Stat. 166, 197; now codified as amended at 10 U.S.C. § 311.

[1912] Act of 3 June 1916, §§ 74 and 75, 39 Stat. at 201-202; now codified as amended at 32 U.S.C. §§ 305(a), 307 through 310, and 313(b).

[1913] Act of 3 June 1916, § 116, 39 Stat. at 212; now codified as amended at 32 U.S.C. § 108.

[1914] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1915] Act of 3 June 1916, § 70, 39 Stat. at 201; now codified as amended at 32 U.S.C. § 304 (which extends the enlistment contract and oath to "[e]ach person enlisting in the National Guard"). This Act included a similar "oath of office" for "[c]ommissioned officers of the National Guard". § 73, 39 Stat. at 201; now codified at 32 U.S.C. § 312.

[1916] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied) and art. I, § 8, cl. 15. See ante, at 871-880.

overbroad. Similarly, a "governor of [some] State" is no constitutional "Officer[ ]" in the Militia simply because he happens to be the "governor", but only if some constitutional provision or statute of that State invests him with such an "Appointment". So a purported "militiaman's" "oath of enlistment" as to the "governor", not qualified by the requirement that it can apply only to a "governor" actually under "Appointment" by the State as an "Officer[ ]" in her Militia, is deceptively overbroad. And the statutory requirement that each enlisted man agrees to "obey the orders * * * of the officers appointed over me according to law and the rules and articles of war"—when the same statute requires those "officers" to be "appointed" according to National standards—is patently overbroad, too.

Nonetheless, one cannot condemn the Act of 1916 as necessarily unconstitutional—for were the various States' components of the National Guard and the Naval Militia taken to be constitutional Militia, the statute might be narrowly construed by THE PEOPLE and the courts to permit the "oath of enlistment" to apply only under the specific conditions just considered.[1917] On the other hand, the statute might be construed to treat those components of the National Guard and the Naval Militia, not as any parts of "the Militia of the several States" at all, but instead as some of the "Troops, or Ships of War" the States may "keep * * * in time of Peace" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress".[1918] Were that the true character of the National Guard and the Naval Militia (which is far more plausible than their being any kind of constitutional Militia), Congress arguably could condition its "Consent" on the States' compliance with various regulations, and could revoke its "Consent" by withholding funds or other assistance from those States which refused to comply. In the absence of such constructions, however, and especially in the presence of the misperception public officials assiduously foster among common Americans that the National Guard especially (and the Naval Militia, too) constitute some species of "militia", the whole matter is a veritable unconstitutional shambles which makes a hash of the principle of Local organization and command.

d. The Second Amendment declares that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed". No matter to what else it may pertain, first and foremost "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" aims at enabling "the people" to serve in "well regulated Militia". Inasmuch as this "right", having that purpose, "shall not be infringed" by public officials, "the people" must enjoy the component rights: (i) to demand that Congress "provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" in such wise as to enlist full participation by "the people" therein;[1919] (ii) in the event of default by Congress in this regard, and even in the face of opposition from rogue public officials in the General Government, to demand that the States organize, arm, and discipline their Militia independently of that government; and (iii) in the event of default by both Congress and the States, and even in the face of opposition from rogue public officials in both the General Government and the States' governments, to organize, arm, and discipline themselves in "well regulated Militia". None of these component rights may be "infringed" by public officials, either—because, if any of them were, then that "infringe[ment]" would effectively nullify the composite right that embraces them all (that is, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms") as to its primary purpose.

[1917] See, e.g., Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932); National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, 301 U.S. 1, 30 (1937); Lynch v. Overholser, 369 U.S. 705, 710-711 (1962); United States v. Thirty-seven (37) Photographs, 402 U.S. 363, 369 (1971).

[1918] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3. See ante, at 786-793.

These component rights, and the composite right which melds them all, must be exercised by individuals within the "militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".[1920] Therefore, "the Militia of the several States" must be organized in each State where "the body of the people" is actually to be found; where "the people * * * keep * * * [their] Arms"; where "the people" can conveniently and efficiently "train[ ] to arms"; where "the people" can be expected to "bear Arms" in their own hands in quick and decisive deployments in the event of sudden emergencies; and where, in the final analysis, the actual "bear[ing] of Arms", pursuant to "the right of the people" to do so, "shall not be infringed" by rogue public officials—which in all of these respects is where "the people" themselves live, and under their own Local organization and command.

e. The Tenth Amendment resoundingly confirms all of this. It provides that "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people". And, in any particular case, "[t]he burden of establishing a delegation of power to the United States or the prohibition of power to the states is upon those making the claim".[1921]

(1) The Constitution explicitly delegates to Congress the power "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions" only.[1922] This enumeration of just three specific purposes would be senseless were Congress licensed to "provide for calling forth the Militia" for every imaginable purpose. In that case the power would read "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" simpliciter. Therefore, the power "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" for any other than one or more of those three purposes

---

[1919] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[1920] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[1921] Bute v. Illinois, 333 U.S. 640, 653 (1948).

[1922] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

is "not delegated to the United States". Inclusio unius exclusio alterius.[1923] And "it is * * * imperative that where * * * limitation is placed upon the power of Congress that * * * limitation should be enforced in its spirit and to its entirety".[1924]

Moreover, Congress's power to "provide for calling forth the Militia" cannot be doubly exclusive, in the sense that only Congress may so "provide", and then only for those three purposes. For, were that the case, the Militia would be "the Militia of the United States", rather than (as the Constitution actually denotes them) "the Militia of the several States".[1925] But the Constitution explicitly empowers Congress "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of them [that is, the Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States", not all of the Militia at all times.[1926] This is at once both the delegation of a power and the imposition of a disability. And the Constitution designates the President as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States", not (as with "the Army and Navy of the United States") at all times.[1927] Again, this is at once both the grant of an authority and the conditioning of that grant upon contingent facts. Thus, the Constitution explicitly recognizes that only "Part" of the Militia might be "call[ed] forth"; that only the "Part" "call[ed] forth" will be "employed in the Service of the United States"; and that "the actual Service of the United States" includes only one or more of the three constitutional purposes (because no other possible purposes for that "Service" are allowable). Therefore, the Constitution does not delegate to—but explicitly withholds from—Congress any power "[t]o provide for calling forth" any "Part" of the Militia at all times and for all possible purposes; and it does not delegate to—but explicitly withholds from—the President the authority of "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia" at all times and for all possible purposes. Which means that, whenever they are not "call[ed] forth" in whole or in "Part" for one or more of the three constitutional purposes, the Militia will not be "in the Service of the United States", or under the command of the President, in any way. As, of course, should be obvious from their very designation as "the Militia of the several States".

The Constitution does not contemplate that, when not in "the actual Service of the United States", the Militia will simply be idle as a matter of fact, let alone incapable of employment as a matter of law. Self-evidently, the three purposes for which Congress may "provide for calling [them] forth" are not the only purposes that the Militia in principle can serve, or in fact did serve during *pre-*constitutional times. Indeed, the set of other possible purposes includes every imaginable activity

---

[1923] "Inclusion of the one is exclusion of the other."

[1924] Fairbank v. United States, 181 U.S. 283, 289 (1901).

[1925] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1926] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[1927] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

within the modern concept "homeland security". Nowhere in the Constitution is the power to call forth their Militia for such purposes "prohibited * * * to the States". Rather, that the Constitution denotes the Militia as "the Militia of the several States" excludes the possibility of such a prohibition.

Furthermore, it would be ridiculous to suggest that the States could not employ their own Militia to execute their own laws—when Congress's power "to provide for calling forth the Militia" is limited in that general respect "to execut[ing] the Laws of the Union". Or to suggest that the States could not employ their own Militia to "suppress Insurrections" within their own territories. For although the Constitution imposes upon the United States the duty to "protect each of the[States] * * * on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence",[1928] and although the United States might fulfill this duty as to one State by "calling forth the Militia" of other States, the Constitution obviously foresees that no State need make any such "Application" when she can suppress "domestic Violence" by herself. Which implies that the States must always retain the ability to do so, at least in principle. But, because the States are prohibited from "keep[ing] Troops * * * in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress",[1929] that ability must depend upon their Militia, and the power "reserved to the States respectively" to employ their Militia for that purpose.

It would as well be the very apogee of absurdity to suggest that the States could not employ their own Militia to "repel Invasions" of their own territories. For although the Constitution imposes on the United States the duty to "protect each of the[States] against Invasion",[1930] and although the United States might fulfill this duty as to one State by "calling forth the Militia" of other States (as well as the regular Armed Forces), the Constitution cannot guarantee that succor from these sources will arrive in good time. Which again implies that the States must always retain the ability to protect themselves, at least in principle. In this situation, although only Congress is constitutionally authorized "[t]o declare War",[1931] the States are not prohibited from "engag[ing] in War" when "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay".[1932] Nonetheless, inasmuch as the States are prohibited from "keep[ing] Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress", and inasmuch as a sudden invasion would leave them scant time to raise "Troops" or launch "Ships of War", the States' ability to repel invasions must in the final analysis depend upon their own Militia, and the

---

[1928] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[1929] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[1930] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[1931] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 11.

[1932] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

"power reserved to the States respectively" to employ their Militia for that purpose.[1933]

In addition, the power to employ the Militia for purposes other than the three vouchsafed to Congress—and even with respect to those, if Congress fails, neglects, or refuses "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia"—is "reserved" not only "to the States respectively" but also to "the people". Self-evidently, the power to call themselves forth in the Militia for all of these purposes must always inhere in "the people", because they are the Militia. Congress enjoys no power to declare who comprises the Militia. Neither do the States. For the definition of "Militia" is constitutional in nature, and therefore not subject to statutory modification.[1934] And the basic constitutional definition of "a well regulated militia" is "the body of the people, trained to arms", and exercising "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" without "infringe[ment]" by public officials.[1935] Thus, the ultimate authority of "the people" over themselves in the Militia cannot have been "delegated to the United States" or even "reserved" to the States, and cannot have been "prohibited" to "the people". Instead, because "the people" are the Militia, "the people" must always retain—and therefore have permanently "reserved" to themselves—every authority and competence necessary for the full functioning of their Militia.

In particular, then, if usurpers and tyrants take over the apparatus of the General Government—such that all of "the Laws of the Union", especially "the supreme Law of the Land",[1936] are being mocked and violated—the States together with "the people" can call forth the Militia, and through the Militia can "execute the Laws of the Union" against such miscreants, no matter what those usurpers and tyrants might say or do. Perhaps of even greater consequence, if usurpers and tyrants seize control over the apparatus of both the General Government and the States' governments, "the people" by themselves and on their own initiative can call themselves forth in the Militia "to execute the Laws of the Union" and of their own

---

[1933] This is hardly as far-fetched a concern as it might seem at first blush. For, as of this writing, the States which share the international border with Mexico have long been suffering from a massive influx of illegal aliens. Whether this Volkerwanderung is being orchestrated by what passes for a "government" in Mexico, and therefore constitutes an "invasion" in international law, may be debatable. But that it constitutes an "invasion" in fact cannot be doubted. Yet rogue officials in control of the General Government seem intent upon doing as little as possible to stem the tide—even preventing the States from engaging on their own in such obviously justifiable self-defensive measures as enforcing the laws of the Union that Congress has enacted, and presumably therefore desires to be enforced, but which the Executive Branch refuses to execute. See Arizona v. United States, No. 11-182, ___ U.S. ___ (2012). In principle, these States might be able to deploy their contingents of the National Guard to stem this tide. But in practice many of those contingents have already been or could be called up for duty with the regular Army in foreign military adventures, and therefore are or would be unavailable for duty along the border; and those remaining at home might be "federalized" and then required to obey orders from the President to stand down from any such operations.

[1934] See, e.g., Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189, 206 (1920). See ante, at 63-81.

[1935] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied) and U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[1936] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

States against all rogue public officials, in vindication of constitutional government. Otherwise, "the good People" of America (as the Declaration of Independence styles them) would have no alternative but "to throw off such Government" entirely.

(2) The Constitution also delegates to Congress the power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", so that "such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States" will be prepared to achieve the three purposes for which Congress may "provide for calling [them] forth".[1937] Congress cannot possibly determine, however, what may be necessary—in terms of "organizing, arming, and disciplining"—for all of the other purposes of "homeland security" for which the States may need to employ their Militia under ever-varying circumstances in the indefinite future. So, given the impossibility of Congress's accurately foreseeing, let alone adequately providing for, every eventuality, the States must enjoy the "reserved" power to "organiz[e], arm[ ], and disciplin[e]" their Militia for every purpose other than the three purposes the Constitution enumerates—and even for those purposes, in the event that Congress somehow defaults on its duty in that particular. And, if both Congress and the States default, then "the people" themselves must be able to exercise such a power.

The legal evolution from the Articles of Confederation to the Constitution supports no other conclusion. The Articles provided that "every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred".[1938] The Articles delegated no power to Congress with respect to the Militia. Thus, the States' jurisdiction was exclusive, Congress's jurisdiction nonexistent. The Constitution transferred part of the States' jurisdiction to Congress—namely, "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", so that the Militia would be prepared to be "call[ed] forth to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions" (for, once again, the Constitution identifies no other purpose for which the Militia "may be employed in the Service of the United States"). The remaining part of the States' original jurisdiction, embracing every other possible employment of the Militia, and every form of "organiz[ation], arm[ament], and disciplin[e]" necessary and proper for such employment, the Constitution must have "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people", because none of it is "prohibited * * * to the States", and none of it is or could be prohibited to "the people", inasmuch as "the people" are the Militia.

To be sure, if Congress enacts legislation relating to the Militia that is "in Pursuance" of its constitutional authority, all public officials in the States "shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding".[1939] But if incompetent or rogue Members of Congress fail, neglect, or refuse "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" in a manner adequate for the three purposes the Constitution lists, or "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" in a manner sufficient for those purposes, their default is not "in Pursuance" of the Constitution, but in dereliction or defiance of it. And if any such delinquency exposes the States to danger—which presumably it always will—then they are not bound supinely to acquiesce in it unto their own hurt. After all, America cannot long endure with "the Laws of the Union" unenforced and her populace exposed to "Insurrections" and "Invasions". Indeed, if such a situation were within the authority of Congress to allow, and actually came to pass, it would prove the utter failure of the Constitution to "establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, [and] provide for the common defence",[1940] and thereby would justify WE THE PEOPLE in exercising their ultimate reserved "Right * * * to alter or to abolish [the Government], and to institute new Government".[1941] So, as to "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" with respect to the three constitutional purposes for which they can be "call[ed] forth, the States enjoy a contingent concurrent jurisdiction—that is, one they can (and should) exercise if Congress is somehow derelict in the exercise of its jurisdiction.

---

[1937] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 15.

[1938] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

Similarly, if incompetent or rogue Congressmen simply do nothing with regard to "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" in a manner suitable for achieving purposes of "homeland security" other than the three the Constitution enumerates, the States are not thereby constrained to do nothing themselves. After all, Congress's inaction could evidence simply its Members' belief (erroneous in law but harmless in fact) that Congress and the States enjoy concurrent jurisdiction in this regard, and that it is politic for Congress to encourage them to take the lead in legislation because of the complexity of the matter. Under the supposition of concurrent jurisdiction, Congressional silence can mean no more than acquiesce in the status quo ante. But the status quo ante for concurrent jurisdiction entails the right and power of the States to enact legislation concerning their Militia unless that legislation is inconsistent with legislation that Congress has the right to enact and has actually enacted (not merely might possibly enact). For only "the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance [of the Constitution] * * * shall be the supreme Law of the Land".[1942] "Laws" which are not "made" at all are, of course, not "Laws" at all, but simply nullities. On the other hand, Congress's inaction could evidence its Members' correct recognition that the subject lies entirely within the "reserved" powers of the States, and that therefore Congress is bereft of power to [1939] U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3. In lawyers' jargon, this is often called the principle of "preëmption".

---

[1940] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1941] Declaration of Independence.

[1942] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2 (emphasis supplied).

enact any "Laws" on that subject "which shall be made in Pursuance [of the Constitution]". In either event, absent an express Congressional command for the States to abstain from such legislation, they are entitled to go ahead as they choose, on the basis of the legal maxim qui tacet consentire videtur.[1943] If, however, inaction by Congress is taken as a tacit directive that the States cease and desist from all legislation in that area, or if Congress issues an explicit directive to that effect, then either order must fail as being not "in Pursuance" of the Constitution, because Congress is disabled from compelling the States to refrain from "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the[ir own] Militia" with respect to any and all of the purposes as to which Congress lacks any authority "[t]o provide for calling [the Militia] forth". So, in either case, public officials in the States may act as they alone see fit. And if, for whatever reason, officials in the States do not act appropriately or especially at all in these situations, then "the people" themselves must take up the slack.

All of which proves that the powers to organize and command "the Militia of the several States" must be exercised to the greatest degree practicable at the Local level. For if these powers flowed from "the top down"—either from the General Government or from the States' governments, as public officials might find expedient—then no power at all would truly be "reserved * * * to the people", which contradicts the very definition of a constitutional "Militia". Whereas, because these powers flow "from the bottom up", they are capable both: (i) of being delegated by "the people" to Congress for the purposes of "provid[ing] for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" and "provid[ing] for calling [them] forth" to "be employed in the Service of the United States" for the purposes the Constitution species, and to the several States for the purpose of enacting statutes to organize and call forth "well regulated Militia" in every other way; and (ii) of being "reserved", in the sense of being subject to being recalled and reasserted by "the people" themselves at a moment's notice for their own use, if Congress or the States prove derelict in their duties.

2. Local control the only workable arrangement in practice. American constitutional law, of course, did not arise in a vacuum. The original Constitution and then the Second Amendment did not adopt and guarantee a system of Local organization and command for "the Militia of the several States" for no good reason. Throughout the *pre-*constitutional era, Americans distilled from their own practical experiences principles which they later infused into the declarations that "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state",[1944] and that "[a] well regulated Militia", based squarely upon "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", is "necessary to the security of a free State".[1945] These statements were no mere ideological fancies, but instead were eminently realistic conclusions drawn from careful observations of real life. They became axioms of American constitutional law because they had been verified through the hardest of human experiences over many generations.

---

[1943] "He who is silent"—in this case, Congress—"is seen to consent." Or, figuratively, "one's silence betokens his consent".

[1944] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

a. As pointed out above, "homeland security" must secure the true "homeland". Being the very places in which population, property, natural resources, industry, general economic activity, education, and accumulated wealth are concentrated, Localities need and deserve the most protection. America's Localities are America. They can survive perfectly well without hubristic political or economic "leadership" from the District of Columbia or the financial centers in New York City. Conversely, these cities are largely irrelevant without America's Localities.

b. All dangers initially arise Locally—everything that happens, after all, has to begin somewhere in particular. Therefore, the responses to threats against "homeland security" must initially be directed Locally, too. In the first instance, that must be accomplished with the people actually available at the times and in the places the threats arise. All other things being equal, the highest state of readiness in any community demands the greatest degree of self-reliance, self-sufficiency, and self-confidence on the part of ordinary people themselves, where they live and work. Only Militia organized and commanded from "the bottom up" will always be on the scene even before dangers strike, and then quickly and easily mobilized and deployed to where the dangers prove to be most acute.

c. Because threats against "homeland security" will affect the lives, liberties, and property of the people on the scene before and to a more serious degree than they affect anyone else, those people should be afforded as much control over the responses to those threats as practicable, consistent with the common defense and the general welfare of the larger community.

d. Because almost every American lives in one Locality or another, the Militia will be most easily organized, armed, disciplined, trained, and commanded at the Local level. "'Political power grows out the barrel of a gun'"[1946] in an effective manner, not simply to the extent that individuals adventitiously possess firearms, or to the extent that they fortuitously know how to use the arms they possess in isolation, but instead to the degree that each of them can employ his own arms together with others' arms in a collective and organized fashion. As Virginia learned from her pre-constitutional experience, "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free

---

[1945] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[1946] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

State".[1947] The goal is always near-universal, comprehensive, and thoroughgoing preparedness. But to approach such a high degree of readiness in any State will require that "the body of the people" be "trained to arms" in geographical proximity to where they live and work, so as to maximize their practical ability to muster and exercise on a regular basis while simultaneously minimizing the disruption of their normal lives. Organizing and instructing a State's Militia on a Local basis will enable its various units to be integrated into the basic economic and social fabrics of the communities in which they are based—perhaps not effortlessly, but more effectively and efficiently than could otherwise be accomplished.

e. Just as in pre-constitutional times, every "well regulated Militia" must be a governmental establishment today.[1948] And inasmuch as counties, cities, and towns are still America's foundational governmental subdivisions, basing the Militia on these already existing units of Local government will maintain political continuity, serve administrative regularity and convenience, and allow for the closest possible coördination of activity among the commanders of the Militia and other public officials.

f. The very opposite of decentralized Local organization and command based upon the principles of federalism, subsidiarity, and the division of labor is organization and command centralized in the District of Columbia, in some agency such as the Department of Homeland Security. Central control necessarily entails "bureaucratic central planning". And "bureaucratic central planning" raises the intractable problem of "rational economic calculation", even in this era of ever-more-powerful computers.[1949] "Rational economic calculation" involves the intelligent assessment and application of means to ends. Most broadly defined, economics is the science of human action. The essence of human action is behavior informed by some rational purpose.[1950] And behavior in that sense depends upon timely and accurate information from which can be made sound judgments by the individuals who have the greatest personal incentives to be correct and therefore to work together harmoniously and effectively in their mutual self-interests—and who have the authority and the ability to act upon their judgments as soon as they may deem it necessary. Thus, in pre-constitutional Virginia and today as well, "a well regulated militia" is the "proper * * * defence of a free state",[1951] because such a Militia is particularly "[f]it; accommodated; adapted; suitable; [and] qualified" for

---

[1947] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[1948] See ante, Chapter 31.

[1949] See, e.g., Trygve J.B. Hoff, Economic Calculation in the Socialist Society, M.A. Michael, Translator (London, England: William Hodge and Company Limited, 1949); Ludwig von Mises, Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth (Auburn, Alabama: The Praxeology Press of the Ludwig von Mises Institute, 1990).

[1950] See Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (Chicago, Illinois: Henry Regnery Company, Third Revised Edition, 1966), at 11.

[1951] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

that purpose,[1952] inasmuch as a Militia "[b]elongs to the natural or essential constitution" of "a free State".[1953] To wit—

> • Even before a crisis strikes, Militia organized and commanded "from the bottom up" will already be well versed as to Local conditions, as well as being uniquely knowledgeable as to the personnel at hand, the resources available to them, the equipment actually in their possession, and their levels of preparedness. Moreover, organization "from the bottom up" will allow for the discovery, recruitment, training, and seasoning of many potential leaders whom organization "from the top down" would inevitably overlook. After all, individual imagination, innovation, and initiative cannot be derived from perusal of compendia of bureaucratic "position papers" and "guidelines" about "security", but must be developed, practiced, and perfected in the field.[1954]
>
> • When a crisis does break out, Local Militiamen will necessarily be the first to obtain detailed intelligence identifying and assessing the character, extent, and seriousness of the danger. And they will have immediate access to other critical information as it becomes available. Indeed, because any distant center of command can receive the most accurate and timely information only from Local sources in proximity to the danger—and probably will not receive all of the information those sources collect, or at least will not receive it as quickly as it is collected—no distant gaggle of "central planners" can possibly devise responses to the threat as expeditiously or as comprehensively as the Militia units on the scene.
>
> • Being fully apprised of the situation, Local Militia units will be able to intervene as soon as dangers became imminent, without having to await the tardy approval—let alone to abide the misinformed intervention, then correct the misjudgments—of distant and less knowledgeable "higher authorities". Indeed, Local Militia will be the only ones capable of taking effective remedial action immediately. Because they will know more about the situation sooner and in more detail than anyone else, they will be able to act more quickly and decisively than emergency personnel dispatched from the outside according to ill-formed notions concocted too late from too little information at some remote "command headquarters". And the ability

---

[1952] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 5 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions. Accord, Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1817, definitions 1, 1.d, and 1.e.

[1953] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1148, definition 2.

[1954] "We are not fit to lead an army on the march unless we are familiar with the face of country * * * . We shall be unable to turn natural advantages to account unless we make use of local guides." Sun Tzu on the Art of War, Lionel Giles, Translator (London, England: Luzac & Company, 1910. Reprinted in Taipei, Taiwan, China: Literature House, Ltd., 1964), at 60, ¶¶ 13 and 14.

to deploy effectively on the spot in a timely fashion will justify the Local units' assumption of initial command.

•The responses of Local Militia units will likely produce the maximum effects, because the people actually on the scene will be intimately familiar with the lay of the land, thoroughly versed in their own plans for Local "homeland security", and as a result of regular training throughout the area prepared to implement those plans immediately. The sooner the danger is comprehended, confronted, and contained, the more quickly it can be eradicated.

•Local organization and command will work, because it will promote, as well as rely upon, social solidarity and sympathy. Militia Companies will be composed of individuals who know not only the lay of the land in terms of geography, patterns of residence, and economic activities, but also each other, as well as particular social and even inter-familial arrangements and understandings. And inasmuch as Militia officers, too, will be residents of the Localities, they will be especially familiar with the Militiamen under their command; and the Militiamen will have greater confidence in Local residents who have attained sufficient social standing to be selected as Militia officers than in strangers suddenly assigned to take charge from "the top down".

•Perhaps most importantly, in crisis situations Militiamen who are subject to Local organization and command will be highly motivated—not simply by concerns of personal self-interest, because they are defending their own homes and families, but also by an assurance of community self-reliance: that they know and can depend upon the individuals whom they have selected to lead them and with whom they have trained for just such eventualities.

3. Local control WE THE PEOPLE'S ultimate political protection. Yet, that Local organization and command of the Militia have been incorporated into "the supreme Law of the Land" in multiple ways, precisely because they work well in practice, is not sufficient to explain their preëminent importance. Also necessary is close examination of the overarching political purpose they serve—which is that Local organization and command of the Militia embody and guarantee WE THE PEOPLE'S sovereignty and the freedoms that flow from it.

a. Not surprisingly, both the Second Amendment in 1791—"[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed", and Article 13 of Virginia's Declaration of Rights in 1776—"a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state", made exactly the same point. For all relevant American pre-constitutional history demonstrates that, by both definition and uniform practice, "a well regulated militia" was always "composed of the people"; "the people" in such a "militia" always exercised "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", without "infringe[ment]" from public officials; and "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" was always perfected by "the people's" being "trained to arms" with the very arms they personally possessed.[1955]

Going further, during the pre-constitutional era "security" (as that word was used in the Second Amendment) meant "freedom from fear", "[p]rotection; defense", and "[s]afety".[1956] "[S]afe" (as that word was used in Virginia's Declaration of Rights) meant "[f]ree from danger" and "[c]onferring security".[1957] And "free State" and "free state" in those two places self-evidently shared the identical meaning. So those two pronouncements—that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" and that "a well regulated militia * * * is the * * * safe defence of a free state"—were precisely equivalent, too. In addition, "the security of a free State" and the "safe defence of a free state" entailed more than simply security and safety in a purely physical sense, to the effect that the Militia would protect merely the structure of the "State". Rather, those words promised security and safety in a political sense, to the effect that the Militia would guarantee the substance of "a free State"—"the Blessings of Liberty"[1958]—to WE THE PEOPLE from generation to generation .

Thus, these two textual statements can justifiably be conflated to set out in fullest detail the precept of American political science that they both express: namely, "A well regulated Militia", "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms," and exercising "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" without "infringe[ment]" by public officials, is "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state", and therefore is "necessary to the security of a free State".

b. But why should Americans during pre-constitutional times have concluded that "[a] well regulated Militia" is the "natural * * * defense of a free state"? Simply because, as they knew, the relationship between "[a] well regulated Militia" and "a free state" is "[p]roduced or effected by nature"[1959] and [1955] In addition to the close scrutiny given to the Militia Acts of Rhode Island and Virginia in the present study, see generally The Selective Service System, Backgrounds of Selective Service, Military Obligation: The American Tradition, A Compilation of the Enactments of Compulsion From the Earliest Settlements of the Original Thirteen Colonies in 1607 Through the Articles of Confederation 1789, Special Monograph No. 1, Volume II (14 Parts) (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1947).

---

[1956] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 1, 3, and 5 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[1957] Id., definitions 1 and 3 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[1958] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1959] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

"[d]iscoverable by reason" because "according to truth and reality".[1960] "A well regulated Militia" and "a free State" are the products of human laws. As the Declaration of Independence affirmed, all valid human laws derive from and must conform and be construed according to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". And, as Blackstone explained, "the law of nature" contains "certain immutable laws of human nature, whereby * * * [men's] freewill is in some degree regulated and restrained"—and "in order to apply this [law] to the particular exigencies of each individual, it is * * * necessary to have recourse to reason: whose office it is to discover * * * what the law of nature directs in every circumstance of life; by considering, what method will tend most effectually to our substantial happiness".[1961] The American definition of "a free State" is one in which WE THE PEOPLE are not subject to command by others. Under the aegis of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", WE THE PEOPLE "institute new Government, laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness".[1962] And WE THE PEOPLE "do ordain and establish" their own "supreme Law of the Land".[1963] Yet the "defence of a free state" requires more than that THE PEOPLE "institute new Government", "ordain and establish" laws, arrange for someone else to protect them through the use of arms, or even possess arms on their own as individuals. Rather, THE PEOPLE must organize themselves in order to control the use of their own arms, in their own hands, wherever they are, for their own purposes. The "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'"[1964] must always flow in a coördinated fashion "from the bottom up", not "from the top down".

Then, too, in America "a free State" and "a Republican Form of Government" are inextricably interconnected.[1965] By constitutional definition, "a Republican Form of Government" is "one constructed on th[e] principle * * * that the Supreme Power resides in the body of the people".[1966] True enough, "a Republican Form of Government" is based upon "the republican principle"—being "a government in which the scheme of representation takes place".[1967] But, being only "representative", THE PEOPLE'S representatives do not and can not exercise the highest authority in "a free State". Not at all. Immediately, they are bound by the [1960] Id., definition 1 in the First (1755) Edition and 7 in the Fourth (1773) Edition.

---

[1961] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 39-40, 41.

[1962] Declaration of Independence.

[1963] U.S. Const. preamble and art. VI, cl. 2.

[1964] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[1965] Compare U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4 with amend. II. See ante, at 890-893 and 921-922, and post, at 1301-1307, 1451-1453, and 1497-1499.

[1966] Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 457 (1793) (opinion of Wilson, J.).

[1967] The Federalist No. 10 (James Madison).

principle of constitutionalism, which precludes them from even attempting to exercise governmental powers which THE PEOPLE have not delegated. And ultimately, they are subject to the power THE PEOPLE have reserved to themselves alone, in the Militia, through the principle that "'[p]olitical power grows out the barrel of a gun'". Under that principle, THE PEOPLE act directly as governors, seeking and needing approval from no "representatives" or anyone else. They are both the source and the executors of the supreme political authority in "a free State"; and from their decisions no possible appeals (in strictly human terms) lie. So, on that ground, too, power always flows "from the bottom up", never "from the top down".

c. In addition, why should Americans during *pre-*constitutional times have believed that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", in the sense of being "indispensably requisite" to that end?[1968] Simply because they knew that "sovereignty"—in human terms, the supreme political power in every polity—is never in abeyance, but must always reside somewhere, to be executed by someone. As Blackstone explained, the creation of some sovereignty > in nature and reason must always be understood and implied, in the very act of [men's] associating together: namely, that the whole should protect all it's parts, and that every part should pay obedience to the will of the whole; or, in other words, that the community should guard the rights of each individual member, and that (in return for this protection) each individual should submit to the laws of the community; without which submission of all it was impossible that protection could be certainly extended to any[.][1969]

So, inasmuch as "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'", whoever determines the direction in which "the barrel[s] of [the community's] gun[s]" point thereby wields unchallengeable political power; and whoever wields such power, so that his directives are effectively "law", is the "sovereign". If WE THE PEOPLE fail to exercise that power by and for themselves—collectively to "guard the rights of each individual member [of the community]"—inevitably others will take advantage of their default, inexorably to THE PEOPLE'S harm. On this ground, then, THE PEOPLE themselves must control the use of their arms "from the bottom up". Here again, reason supports only this result.

d. And why should Americans during *pre-*constitutional times have believed that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed"? Simply because they knew that if—as a consequence of their living in "a free State" with "a Republican Form of Government" and under popular sovereignty—WE THE PEOPLE themselves are entitled as of right to wield the highest measure of "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'", then public officials must labor under an absolute duty to refrain from any attempt to hinder THE PEOPLE in mobilizing, organizing, and deploying themselves in the "well regulated Militia" to which the exercise of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" primarily pertains. Such a duty is utterly inconsistent with control over THE PEOPLE'S possession and use of their arms by rogue officials "from the top down". Instead, such control must flow "from the bottom up", precisely in order to deter, resist, and put down such officials' machinations. Once again, reason excludes any alternative.

---

[1968] See S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[1969] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 47-48.

e. What Americans knew during the *pre-*constitutional era still applies today. Popular sovereignty in "a free State" with "a Republican Form of Government" remains impossible without "[a] well regulated Militia". Popular sovereignty starts with each able-bodied adult personally possessed of his own firearm, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements in his own home at all times—and trained to employ those arms (together with whatever specialized skills he may have) in a coördinated fashion with everyone else in the community for all of the purposes of "homeland security". This is Local control in physical fact, at the very grass roots. With Local control comes Local independence in fact—because organization of a fully articulated, armed, and trained citizenry "from the bottom up" provides an effective "check and balance" against any form of officious interference with the people's lives "from the top down". With Local independence comes Local political authority—for, as a consequence of holding the means of their own defense securely in their own hands, the people also possess the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun", and will realize that in law, morality, and reason they and no one else should exercise that power. With Local political authority that can be enforced comes sovereignty. The people themselves are sovereigns because they have the numbers, the armaments, the organization, the training, the physical possession of most of the property, and the political authority sufficient to protect their community as a whole from all enemies. To be sure, not every Locality that can muster "[a] well regulated Militia" will be capable of exercising effective sovereignty, because not every Locality will actually be able to defend itself by itself against all enemies. But a sufficiently extensive group of contiguous Localities, working together, will achieve that capability. Thus, Local organization and command of the Militia will create the conditions necessary for popular sovereignty in the same manner as separate dots or strokes of various colors, properly coördinated on a canvas through the technique of pointillisme, produce a picture when viewed as a whole.

f. Even popular sovereignty that finds its source and strength at the Local level does not do away with the need for higher levels of government, but indeed requires them—properly constrained by a constitution embodying the principles of federalism and subsidiarity. The bane of all constitutional government, however, is usurpation, usually followed in short order by tyranny. So the question must always be asked: Quis custodes custodire poterit?[1970] The answer is: With Local organization and command of "well regulated Militia" committed to constitutional principles, usurpation and tyranny can be detected, deterred, and defeated in short order.

The Members of Congress, "and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution".[1971] In addition, the President is required, "[b]efore he enter on the Execution of his Office", to "'solemnly swear (or affirm) that [he] will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of [his] Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution'".[1972] For public officials to be "bound by Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution" implies a legally enforceable duty—for which the statutes of the United States now provide.[1973] In the final analysis, compliance with this duty in individual cases must be had through the imposition of physical force against the miscreants. But in extreme circumstances of usurpation and tyranny, no public officials may be available or willing to apply this force, either because they are usurpers and tyrants themselves, or because they do not dare to challenge the rogue elements of the Armed Forces or various para-military "police" agencies which the usurpers and tyrants have recruited or suborned. That leaves enforcement to WE THE PEOPLE. Which is highly appropriate, inasmuch as public officials are "bound by Oath or Affirmation", not to themselves alone, because then they would be "bound" only to the extent that they chose to treat themselves so; and not to other public officials alone, because then no "check and balance" would exist if the rot of usurpation and tyranny had spread sufficiently far throughout the governmental apparatus, when such a "check and balance" would be needed most; and not to the Constitution in abstracto, because it cannot enforce itself—but instead to THE PEOPLE, because an "Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution" is necessarily an "Oath or Affirmation" of fidelity to WE THE PEOPLE who "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e]

[1970] "Who will be able to watch the guardians?" Figuratively, "Who will govern the governors?"

[1971] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[1972] U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 7.

[1973] E.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242. And this, with respect not only to individuals actually holding public offices, but also to private individuals who conspire with them. See, e.g., In re Quarles, 158 U.S. 532 (1895); Logan v. United States, 144 U.S. 263, 293-295 (1892); United States v. Waddell, 112 U.S. 76, 77-81 (1884); Ex parte Yarborough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884).

Constitution".[1974] Thus, "[a] well regulated Militia"—organized and commanded "from the bottom up" at the Local level—is "necessary to the security of a free State", because "the security of a free State" demands that public officials always be "bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution", and because ultimately only THE PEOPLE can guarantee that officials always are so "bound". For if the Militia were organized and commanded "from the top down", control would necessarily concentrate in the hands of the very public officials against whom such control might need to be directed.

So today, just as in *pre-*constitutional times, decentralization remains the desideratum for revitalized "Militia of the several States". For Local enlistment, organization, training, command, and deployment will bring about maximum participation, preparedness, and effectiveness. Most importantly, only in Militia thoroughly organized at the Local level can WE THE PEOPLE protect themselves effectively against the most dangerous—as well as the most likely—form of breakdown in this country's political structure: what could be generalized as "the Dunmore scenario".[1975] If History is any guide, rogue public officials at the apex of America's political pyramid will attempt to transmogrify WE THE PEOPLE'S constitutional Republic into a puppet régime—misusing the law to break the law under color of the law for the benefit of avaricious factions and other selfish special-interest groups, domestic and foreign, while stridently defaming as "extremists" and even "terrorists" the patriots who expose and oppose them in the name and with the true support of the law. Predicting exactly how they will proceed is, of course, problematic. But knowing what American patriots' response must be is not. For the Constitution—properly construed to apply old but timeless principles to new problems—provides it, in no uncertain terms:

> Legislation, both statutory and constitutional, is enacted, it is true, from an experience of evils but its general language should not, therefore, be necessarily confined to the form that evil had theretofore taken. Time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes. Therefore a principle, to be vital, must be capable of wider application than the mischief which gave it birth. This is particularly true of constitutions. They are not ephemeral enactments, designed to meet passing occasions. They are * * * "designed to approach immortality, as nearly as human institutions can approach it." The future is their care, and provision for events of good and bad tendencies of which no prophecy can be made. In the application of a constitution, therefore, our contemplation cannot be only of what has been, but of what may be. Under any other rule a constitution would indeed be as easy of application > as it would be deficient in efficacy and power. Its general principles would have little value, and be converted by precedent into impotent and lifeless formulas. Rights declared in words might be lost in reality.[1976]

---

[1974] U.S. Const. preamble.

[1975] See ante, at 567-597.

"Rights declared in words" will inevitably "be lost in reality", if THE PEOPLE do not take care to ensure that the "words" are translated into whatever actions are necessary to overcome the dangers confronting them. Properly organized in Militia in their Local communities, though, common people need not, and will not, sit still while their country is subverted, looted, debauched, and destroyed before their very eyes. Instead, they can and will apply the self-reliance, self-sufficiency, and self-confidence they have developed through their Militia training to the vital task of reëstablishing true constitutional federalism, by building upon its irreplaceable foundation in self-government. For Local participation in the Militia will convince ordinary Americans, month after month and year after year in the most direct manner possible, that they should be and are in charge of their communities, and ultimately of their country as a whole, not just practically, but legally and politically as well—and that in the final analysis their "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'" that each of them holds in his own hands as a consequence of his membership in the Militia.

[1976] Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 373 (1910).

CHAPTER THIRTY-EIGHT

Unless specifically exempted, all members of "the Militia of the several States" must acquire and thereafter at all times must maintain—and must be supported by public officials in their maintenance of—personal possession (and usually their own private ownership) of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable in any manner for Militia service.

Precisely because "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'", Local organization of the Militia, although necessary to assert WE THE PEOPLE'S ultimate political authority in the most effective manner, is not sufficient to that end. *Equipment suitable for performing the Militia's tasks must also be at hand—and always in the right hands. Local control of the Militia, and of America's entire political system for which the Militia provide security, begins and ends with who actually holds the guns. Indeed, the possession of such equipment may arguably be more important than, or at least have priority over, organization—because no variety of mere organization can guarantee to provide suitable equipment; whereas proper equipment in THE PEOPLE'S own hands will inevitably serve whatever form of organization its possessors may choose to adopt. Thus, the conditions sine qua non to put into effect the organizational principle that "a well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[1977] are: *(i) THE PEOPLE themselves are required as a matter of law personally to, and as a matter of fact do, possess sufficient quantities of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable specifically for their Militia service. And (ii) THE PEOPLE'S permanent possession of that equipment is guaranteed by their absolute "right * * * to keep * * * Arms".*[1978]

A. The duty of permanent personal possession of firearms by all individuals eligible for service in the Militia. Other than as to conscientious objectors generally, and a few other exempted individuals rarely, *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes throughout America invariably required members of the Militia, within some fixed periods of time after their enrollments, to acquire and thereafter permanently to possess in their own places of abode at least one firearm, a supply of ammunition, and necessary accoutrements suitable for Militia service—to bring that equipment along with themselves to Militia musters, training, and the performance of other duty in the field—and then to return it to their homes, where it was to remain subject to their own control at all times.[1979]

---

[1977] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[1978] U.S. Const. amend. II.

Usually, the arms each Militiaman was required to obtain and possess were to be his own private property, which he purchased for himself in the free market out of his own resources, and thereafter kept in his own home under his own dominion, not arms owned, supplied, or controlled by any government or public official. Individuals exempted from normal Militia musters and training by dint of their critical public offices or private occupations were often required to arm themselves personally in the same manner as other Militiamen, or (as were some conscientious objectors) to provide arms to the Militia for other Militiamen's use. At their own expense, parents, guardians, masters, and mistresses with the ability to pay were expected to supply arms to the minor sons, wards, apprentices, and servants under their supervision who served in the Militia, and who (no differently from adults) kept their arms in their own homes. Even Militiamen who were too poor to purchase their own arms, and therefore to whom public arms were distributed, were usually required to maintain personal possession of that equipment. Thus, most Militiamen's actual personal possession (and usually private ownership) of arms in their own homes at all times, mandated by law, constitutes one of the indispensable elements of the definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" among "the Militia of the several States".[1980]

1. That requirement renders pellucid the meaning of the power WE THE PEOPLE delegated to Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", so that they can be "call[ed] forth * * * to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions";[1981] as well as the nature of "the powers reserved to the States respectively, or to the people" with regard to arming the Militia.[1982] To wit—

a. The Constitution imposes a permanently enforceable legal duty to be armed upon every individual who is eligible to be a member of "the Militia of the several States" and who has not been granted an exemption.[1983] During the pre-

[1979] In addition to the comprehensive survey of the Militia Acts of Rhode Island and Virginia presented in the present study, see generally The Selective Service System, Backgrounds of Selective Service, Military Obligation: The American Tradition, A Compilation of the Enactments of Compulsion From the Earliest Settlements of the Original Thirteen Colonies in 1607 Through the Articles of Confederation 1789, Special Monograph No. 1, Volume II (14 Parts) (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1947).

[1980] U.S. Const. amend. II and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[1981] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 15.

[1982] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[1983] Conceivably, the members of a private para-military organization could agree by contract to arm themselves, with some penalty stipulated for those who failed to do so whilst they maintained their memberships in the group. But, even were such an organization legitimate under the laws of the jurisdiction in which it operated, and could obtain against dissident members an enforceable judicial decree for specific performance of such a contract, it could not require individuals to join in the first place. Lacking this power of impressment, constitutional era, the duty of each individual, not otherwise exempted (such as conscientious objectors), to obtain and maintain personal possession of at least one firearm, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements was merely statutory in nature, and therefore presumably always subject to amendment, alteration, or even repeal by legislators. And that duty arose only with the actual enactment of some statute. As soon as through the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights "the Militia of the several States" became constitutional establishments that were required to be "well regulated" in accordance with *pre-*constitutional principles, the duty of each individual merely eligible for service in the Militia to possess arms became constitutional, too. Thereupon, an individual was required to fulfill the duty to possess firearms as soon as he became eligible for Militia service in principle, whether or not an actual statute provided for organizing and arming the Militia in practice where he lived. So, today, the right to possess arms—which most Americans consider to be embodied in "the right of the people to keep * * * Arms" in the Second Amendment, although it actually inheres in every mention of the "Militia" in the original Constitution, too—is the one constitutional right that everyone eligible for the Militia must exercise on his own, and can be compelled to exercise by statute, unless justifiably exempted. For, as the Second Amendment makes clear, "the security of a free State" depends upon the existence of "[a] well regulated Militia", and "[a] well regulated Militia" can exist only when "the people" actually and fully exercise "the[ir] right * * * to keep and bear Arms". Therefore, that "right" is necessarily a permanent personal duty as well. And, being a constitutional duty, it must be fulfilled by each and every individual subject to it whether or not a specific statute to that effect has been enacted. After all, "a free State" without "security" cannot effectively legislate anything. Thus, no statute, nor even the Constitution itself, can be the source of the duty to possess arms. Rather, the Constitution recognizes the duty to possess arms as the legal embodiment of the raw political power that is the foundation for all laws.

Of course, individuals not possibly eligible for Militia service at all have no constitutional duty to possess firearms. And the constitutional duty of those eligible for such service but statutorily exempted on proper grounds from that requirement is somewhat attenuated, in that they need to possess only such arms as they might be required to bring into the field in the event their statutory exemptions were repealed altogether or temporarily rescinded during an "alarm".[1984] Nonetheless, all of these individuals may still insist on a constitutional "right * * * to keep * * * Arms", to the extent that they are physically capable of doing so, for the purpose of personal self-defense. For self-defense constitutes execution of the law against an aggressor. And inasmuch as execution of the law is one of the primary functions of it would not qualify as a "militia". See ante, at 932-939.

---

[1984] See ante, at 222-224 and 257-258 (Rhode Island).

the Militia, an individual even preparing himself for, let alone actually engaged in, personal self-defense thereby performs a Militia service, and therefore should be entitled to all of the constitutional protections that appertain to members of the Militia in that regard, even if he is not himself a member of the Militia or although a member is exempted from the duty to possess a firearm.[1985] Indeed, on this ground, it would be proper to construe the Constitution as imposing a duty upon every adult who is physically and mentally capable of using a firearm responsibly (other than conscientious objectors) always to possess a firearm for purposes of personal self-defense. For example, an individual over (say) sixty years of age would normally be exempt from regular Militia service, and on that account not required to possess a firearm. But if he could use a firearm for self-defense he could be required to possess one for that purpose.

b. On its face, the power the Constitution delegates to Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" authorizes Congress to arrange in some efficacious manner to have arms put into the hands of as many eligible individuals among WE THE PEOPLE as possible, so that they will be prepared at any and all times to be "call[ed] forth * * * to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[1986] This, for two reasons: First, the term "Militia" imports "the standing force of a nation" as a whole.[1987] And the Constitution intends "the Militia of the several States" to be the only constitutionally permanent "standing force of [the] nation", inasmuch as "no Appropriation of Money to [raise and support regular Armies] shall be for a longer Term than two Years".[1988] Second, "the Militia" to which the powers of Congress refer are "the Militia of the several States",[1989] which in their composition must always conform to the *pre-*constitutional principle recognized and applied in all of the States, that "a well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people".[1990]

If these verbal considerations are not enough, both a positive and a negative purpose compel construing Congress's power so as to allow its Members scant discretion with respect to how extensive "arming * * * the Militia" must be. Positively, the Constitution ensures that Congress will "provide for * * * arming" nearly the entirety of "the Militia of the several States", because nearly the entirety of the Militia, adequately equipped, may need to be "call[ed] forth" for one or more [1985] To this extent is justified the result—albeit certainly not all of the reasoning set out—in District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court).

---

[1986] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 15.

[1987] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions (emphasis supplied) .

[1988] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12.

[1989] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[1990] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

of the three constitutionally mandated tasks. Negatively, the Constitution commands that Congress will "provide for * * * arming" nearly the entirety of the Militia in order to prevent rogue Congressmen from attempting to disarm and thereby destroy the Militia by limiting WE THE PEOPLE'S access to arms. So, unless the Constitution can be read to license Congress to arrange for the impotence of the Militia under the very circumstances in which the Constitution declares them to be most needed, or to enable aspiring usurpers and tyrants to deny THE PEOPLE the tools necessary to deter and defeat usurpation and tyranny, Congress's power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" must amount to a duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * [nearly the entirety of] the Militia".[1991]

The qualification "nearly the entirety" is necessary because Congress must enjoy some discretion to allow for some exemptions consonant with *pre-*constitutional principles, under its power "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia".[1992] So, although Congress must "organiz[e]" the entirety of the Militia,[1993] it may "arm[ ]" slightly less than the entirety of the Militia, with the difference being made up of those members of the Militia whom Congress may justifiably exempt from the requirement personally to possess arms. (Yet arguably these individuals would still be subject to a personal constitutional duty to possess arms, in the event their exemptions were repealed or otherwise rescinded, and for purposes of personal self-defense.) This legislative latitude, however, must be exceedingly narrow, because vanishingly few individuals other than conscientious objectors could conceivably put forward any rational basis consistent with "the common defence" and "the general Welfare"[1994] for requesting an exemption from the simple requirement to acquire and possess firearms and ammunition (particularly if the Militia itself or some other governmental agency were to supply them with that equipment, using moneys collected from Militia fines or general taxes).

The Second Amendment renders impossible any other interpretation of Congress's power.[1995]

c. If incompetent or rogue Members of Congress fail, neglect, or refuse to perform their duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", then the several States must provide for arming their own people, because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States". Here, Congress's power must be construed with reference not only to the Second Amendment, but also to the Tenth: "The powers not delegated

---

[1991] See ante, at 50-54.

[1992] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16. See ante, Chapter 36.

[1993] See ante, Chapters 34 and 35.

[1994] See U.S. Const. preamble.

[1995] See post, Chapters 45 and 46.

to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

True enough, the Constitution does delegate to Congress the power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", without any mention of the States. But the mere delegation of that authority does not render it exclusive, in the sense that under no circumstances may any one of the States, on her own initiative, provide for arming her own Militia—let alone that WE THE PEOPLE may not arm themselves. In general, the Constitution itself recognizes that not every power it "delegate[s] to the United States" is exclusive perforce of its delegation alone, because it explicitly prohibits the States from exercising some of them—and never explicitly prohibits THE PEOPLE from exercising any power that they are capable of exercising on their own. For example, the Constitution delegates to Congress the powers "[t]o coin Money" and "[t]o * * * grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal"[1996]—and explicitly prohibits the States from exercising those selfsame powers[1997]—but does not expressly prohibit THE PEOPLE from "coin[ing] Money", which they certainly have the ability to do without any governmental support. And the Constitution delegates to the President the "Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties"[1998]—and explicitly prohibits the States from "enter[ing] into any Treaty"[1999]—a power, of course, which in the normal course of events THE PEOPLE cannot exercise on their own. If their delegations to the General Government alone made the powers in these examples exclusive, the corresponding prohibitions as to the States would be unnecessary. But it is inadmissible to "interpret the clause[s] in question as if th[e words] were not to be found in th[e Constitution]",[2000] or to "presume[ ] that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect".[2001] Rather, "effect [must] be given to each word of the Constitution".[2002] So, inasmuch as the power of Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" is accompanied by no prohibition against any State's exercising an equivalent power as to her own Militia, and inasmuch as the power to arm "the Militia of the several States" was always the exclusive power of the Colonies and then the independent States prior to ratification of the Constitution, even under the Articles of Confederation,[2003] then in principle the

---

[1996] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 5 and 11.

[1997] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[1998] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[1999] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2000] Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 261 (1898).

[2001] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803).

[2002] Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 87 (1900).

[2003] See Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4 ("every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred").

power of Congress and the power of the States in that regard must be concurrent, not exclusive on the one side and nonexistent on the other.

In general, too, the Constitution itself recognizes that, where no explicit prohibition exists, the States may legislate on many subjects that fall within the powers of Congress so long as "the Laws of any State" are not "to the Contrary" of "the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance [of the Constitution]".[2004] After all, only once among its list of Congressional powers does the Constitution explicitly declare that Congress's authority is always to be exclusive: namely, in the power "[t]o exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District * * * as may * * * become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings".[2005] The unique use of "exclusive" in this clause establishes that, with respect to all of those other powers that the States might exercise in principle,[2006] Congress's legislative authority is presumptively concurrent with the legislative authority of the States—unless and until Congress actually enacts a "Law[ ] * * * in Pursuance [of the Constitution]", at which point that "Law[ ]" takes precedence over the contrary legislation of any State. For "[i]t is not the existence of the power [of Congress], but its exercise, which is incompatible with the exercise of the same power by the States".[2007] Otherwise, the States are ousted of legislative authority only where (as noted before) the Constitution contains an express prohibition to that effect,[2008] or where the very nature of Congress's power precludes its exercise by the States.[2009]

So, if Congress has simply not exercised its power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", a State's law for arming her own Militia cannot be "to the Contrary" of "the Laws of the United States", there being nothing in the form of any actual "Law[ ] of the United States" to contradict. After all, to come into existence, "Laws of the United States" demand certain specifically prescribed

---

[2004] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2005] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 17 (emphasis supplied).

[2006] See, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 3, 6, 7, 8, 10, 15, and 16; and compare art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 14 with art. I, § 10, cl. 3 (when a State is "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay").

[2007] Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 122, 196 (1819).

[2008] See U.S. Const. amend. X. Compare, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I § 8, cls. 1, 5, 11, 12, 13, and 14 with art. I, § 10, cls. 1 through 3.

[2009] See, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 1 ("[t]o lay and collect Taxes * * * to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States"), 2 ("[t]o borrow Money on the credit of the United States"), 4 ("[t]o establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States"), and 9 ("[t]o constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court").

constitutional actions, and therefore cannot arise out of *in*action.[2010] Indeed, if Congress took no action at all "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", the logical conclusion would be that it had decided "[t]o provide for" that purpose by leaving the matter of devising appropriate legislation entirely to the individual States, not that it had determined to leave the Militia utterly *un*armed (and therefore no "Militia" at all) and to coerce the States into acceding to that policy.

On the other hand, if rogue Members of Congress violate the Constitution by enacting a purported statute that "provide[s] for * * * [dis]arming * * * the Militia", a State's law for arming her own Militia cannot be "to the Contrary" of "the Laws of the United States", there being no such "Law[ ]" to contradict. True "Laws of the United States", after all, must be "made in Pursuance [of the Constitution]", not in defiance of it. And "[a]n unconstitutional act is not a law", in any sense of that term.[2011] So nothing a State does with respect to enacting and enforcing otherwise valid laws of her own within her own jurisdiction can be "to the Contrary" of a purported "Law[ ] of the United States" that "is not a law" at all.

In particular, the Constitution recognizes circumstances that would compel the States to arm their Militia on their own if for whatever reason Congress had not done so. In the power of Congress "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions",[2012] the Constitution identifies three crucial functions "the Militia of the several States" are authorized and responsible to perform. These, however, are not functions that appertain solely to the United States. For example, in the course of a nationwide crisis which overwhelmed the law-enforcement capabilities of the General Government and prevented its courts from functioning, or in which rogue public officials in that government ran amok in an orgy of usurpation and tyranny, the States would be forced "to execute the Laws of the Union" within their jurisdictions if those "Laws" were to be enforced at all.[2013] Inasmuch as the Constitution foresees that the United States as a whole might need to "call[ ] forth" the Militia for that purpose, it must also foresee that one or more States might need to do so as well, if

---

[2010] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 7.

[2011] Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886). Accord, Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 101-102 (1887); Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 376-377 (1880), quoted with approval in Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408 (1963).

[2012] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[2013] On the authority of the States to do so, compare U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3, with, e.g., Tafflin v. Levitt, 493 U.S. 455, 458-460 (1990), and Testa v. Katt, 330 U.S. 386, 389-394 (1947). In such circumstances, the States' executive and judicial officials would simply have to disregard as impertinent to the situation a statute such as 18 U.S.C. § 3231, which purports to give to "[t]he district courts of the United States * * * original jurisdiction, exclusive of the courts of the States, of all offenses against the laws of the United States", and 28 U.S.C. § 1442(a)(1), which permits "any officer (or any person acting under that officer) of the United States or of any agency thereof, sued in an official or individual capacity for any act under color of such office" to remove a lawsuit against him from a State court to a court of the General Government. For no mere statute can be suffered to frustrate enforcement of the Constitution.

for whatever reason the General Government proved impotent. Moreover, the Constitution neither delegates to Congress any power "[t]o provide for calling forth * * * the Militia to execute the Laws of the individual States" nor prohibits that power to the States themselves—thereby, as the Tenth Amendment declares, "reserv[ing that power] to the States respectively, or to the people". Yet, are the States to be denied the ability to "execute the Laws", particularly their own laws and in their own territories, because their own Militia are bereft of arms through some default by Congress?

Similarly, the Constitution does not prohibit the States from "suppress[ing] Insurrections" within their own territories. The Constitution does require that "[t]he United States * * * shall protect each of the[States] * * * on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence",[2014] in performance of which duty the Militia might be "call[ed] forth * * * to suppress Insurrections". But, in its very requirement of an "Application", the Constitution presumes that, under some circumstances, the States will be desirous and capable of marshaling the force necessary to put down "domestic Violence" by themselves. Yet, are the States to be denied the ability to quell "domestic Violence" on their own ground in their own way, because their own Militia are bereft of arms through some default by Congress?

Finally, an "Invasion" of any State—to "repel" which the Militia might be "call[ed] forth"—would in most cases constitute an act of "War". The Constitution expressly reserves to each State the power to "engage in War" when "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay"—yet it also prohibits all of the States from "keep[ing] Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress".[2015] Self-evidently, the authority to "engage in War" under those pressing circumstances would be useless if the States had at their immediate disposal no effective military forces to deploy, because Congress had withheld "Consent" for them to "keep Troops, or Ships of War in [the preceding] time of Peace" and had not "provide[d] for * * * arming * * * the Militia". And even had Congress licensed the States to "keep [some] Troops, or Ships of War", one or more States might justifiably fear such an allowance be to insufficient. No constitutional purpose consistent with "the common defence"[2016] could possibly be served by denying the States the ability to prepare their Militia to meet the anticipated level of danger. Indeed, such a denial would be illogical: If Congress allowed the States to "keep Troops, or Ships of War"—as an exception from the Constitution's prohibition of such forces—each State would have to arm her own "Troops" and outfit her own "Ships" if Congress did not. So why should the

---

[2014] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2015] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[2016] U.S. Const. preamble.

Constitution deny each State the power to arm her own Militia—all of which the Constitution permanently incorporates into its federal system—if Congress does not? Could the power to arm "Troops" and fit out "Ships" that might not be allowed to exist at all be more important than the power to arm the Militia the existence of which the Constitution requires as "necessary to the security of a free State"?[2017]

d. WE THE PEOPLE ordained and established the Constitution for certain purposes as critical as they are concrete—with the expectation that everything which was necessary to be done to achieve those purposes would be done. The "security of a free State" is the Constitution's overriding goal. For that, "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary" in every State. "A well regulated Militia" requires that everyone eligible for service and not specifically exempted on proper grounds be personally possessed of arms at all times. If incompetent or rogue Members of Congress and of the States' legislatures fail, neglect, or refuse to perform their duties "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", then the Constitution requires THE PEOPLE to arm themselves.

In the beginning, WE THE PEOPLE did not stake everything on the perpetual competence or loyalty of public officials. Quite the contrary: THE PEOPLE knew that public officials can default on or even betray their responsibilities. Indeed, not just the possibility but the actuality of that betrayal led to the Declaration of Independence. The British imperial "Form of Government bec[a]m[e] destructive" of Americans' "unalienable Rights" through serial misuses and abuses of power. "The history of the present King of Great Britain", the Declaration charged, "is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States." The Colonists tried to employ the means for peaceful redress of these grievances available under the British "Form of Government"—but their "repeated Petitions * * * [were] answered only by repeated injury". At that point, it became both "their right" and "their duty, to throw off such Government". That being so, as a practical matter it became imperatively their duty to take into their own hands the equipment necessary to accomplish that task. But this duty they had already fulfilled for generations prior to 1776, in obedience to the requirement of the pre-constitutional Militia Acts that every able-bodied free man be armed. And that experience supplied the principles that became the premisses of all government in America thereafter.

In these particulars, the world has changed not one iota for the better since 1776, 1788, or 1791. Public officials arrogant in their ignorance and infused with avarice, ambition, an appetite for abusive powers, and an aggressive antagonism towards THE PEOPLE are just as prevalent now as they were then, perhaps even more so. Contemporary Americans, however, find themselves in a better position than did their *pre-*constitutional predecessors, because the present constitutional "Form of Government" contains within itself what America's Founders believed, on good and sufficient grounds in their day, to be the best possible means to deter, and (when deterrence fails) to resist and overcome, usurpation and tyranny: namely, WE THE PEOPLE "well regulated" in "the Militia of the several States". Yet the protection the Militia can provide to "a free State" must remain purely theoretical until "the people" actually exercise their "right * * * to keep * * * Arms"—not just as a right, but especially as a duty.

---

[2017] U.S. Const. amend. II.

2. In the final analysis, neither the Militia Clauses of the Constitution, nor the Second and Tenth Amendments, nor any statutes of Congress or the States' legislatures are necessary to impose upon WE THE PEOPLE a duty, and to guarantee their right, to possess firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service. After all, the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights did not arise out of nothing in a political and legal vacuum. They were not self-validating. Neither were they intellectually self-sufficient—in particular, they did not invent, but only adopted, the concepts of "[a] well regulated Militia" and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", and the federal principles that the Militia are "the Militia of the several States" and "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people". Rather, the legitimacy of these concepts and principles derived from the Declaration of Independence, and their substance from its precepts as earlier applied throughout America's *pre-*constitutional history.[2018]

In and through the Declaration, WE THE PEOPLE did not exercise an unfettered discretion to delegate to the States (and later, through THE PEOPLE in their States, to the General Government under the Constitution) whatever powers they wished. For THE PEOPLE drew their authority, not from themselves as the ultimate lawgivers, but from "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" to which they themselves were (and remain) always subject. Under that eternal corpus juris, the "Governments" THE PEOPLE "instituted" could "deriv[e]" only "just powers from the consent of the governed". The "just powers" of government, though, cannot include a power to disarm THE PEOPLE. To the contrary: The only "just power[ ]" in that regard is to see to it that THE PEOPLE are fully armed at all times—because "whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of [men's unalienable Rights], it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it", which task often cannot be accomplished except through THE PEOPLE'S participation in armed struggle. Certainly no "Form of Government" not already "destructive" of men's rights would ever attempt to prevent THE PEOPLE from possessing the very implements they would need to oppose a "Form of Government" which was or might become so "destructive". Rather, a "Form of Government" protective of men's rights would require THE PEOPLE to be armed, and facilitate their being armed, precisely in order to enable them "to alter or to abolish" their "Form of Government" should that course of action become necessary.

---

[2018] See ante, at 22-27.

Furthermore, the Declaration did not stop at the "just powers" of government as a basis for the duty of THE PEOPLE to be armed. Instead, it identified this as a duty which attached to THE PEOPLE as a political community even when—especially when—their "Form of Government" affirmatively and aggressively denied that duty (and any concomitant right which flowed from it): namely, "when a long train of abuses and usurpations * * * evinces a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security". "[T]o throw off such [an abusive] Government", however, must entail main force, because aspirants to "absolute Despotism" rarely surrender without a fight. And inasmuch as "the Sword and Soveraignty always march hand in hand",[2019] THE PEOPLE cannot fulfill their "duty, to throw off such Government" and retain sovereignty in their own hands without the armed might to do so, also in their own hands. Therefore, THE PEOPLE must labor under a duty to be armed at whatever time and in whatever manner may be necessary to accomplish that end. In practice, this entails their maintaining personal possession of sufficient arms at all times—because, even though "a long train of abuses and usurpations" is the necessary predicate for invocation of their duty, the straw that finally breaks the camel's back may be piled on suddenly and without warning.

Now, WE THE PEOPLE'S duty to be fully armed cannot derive from the abusive "Government" they intend "to throw off"—which naturally wants them to be disarmed. It cannot derive from the "new Guards" THE PEOPLE hope "to provide * * * for their future security"—which do not yet exist. And it cannot derive autonomously from THE PEOPLE—who are powerless to impose a true duty on themselves. Therefore, it must derive from the only source of law the Declaration acknowledges, "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". Thus, even if rogue public officials so thoroughly corrupted the Constitution as to transmogrify it into a "Form of Government * * * destructive of [men's unalienable Rights]", the higher law would nonetheless require THE PEOPLE personally to possess arms suitable for Militia service. Nothing either THE PEOPLE or their disloyal "representatives" could do could absolve THE PEOPLE of that duty.

B. The absolute right of permanent personal possession of firearms by all individuals eligible for service in the Militia. If, as the adage has it, "possession is nine points of the law", the tenth and decisive point with regard to WE THE PEOPLE'S personal possession of firearms suitable for Militia service must be to guarantee that possession by law against all adverse claimants, public or private.

---

[2019] AN ARGUMENT, Shewing, that a Standing Army Is inconsistent with A Free Government, ante note 27, at 7.

1. During *pre-*constitutional times, the firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements Militiamen purchased in the first instance for purposes of their Militia service, or dedicated to that service from equipment they already owned, did not thereby become some species of "public property". Nonetheless, as a consequence of their employment in that service such arms were impressed with a public interest that transformed them into a special form of private property of which their owners could not easily be dispossessed.

a. In the nature of things, the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes precluded public officials from dispossessing members of the Militia of their arms. Self-evidently, no individual could have been be required by statute to acquire and possess firearms yet also have been subject to dispossession under color of law at the very same time. Although those statutes often granted or were applied so as to allow members of the Militia periods of grace in which to acquire firearms before fines or other penalties were enforced,[2020] they nowhere even suggested that anyone eligible for the Militia might be excused altogether from satisfying the requirement of personally possessing firearms because some form of "gun control" prohibited him from doing so.

b. Either by explicit prohibitions or implicitly under applicable rules of the common law, *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes protected Militiamen's possession of the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements they owned, by providing them with immunities from seizures of that equipment in satisfaction or security for the payment of civil debts or other judgments against them.[2021] Poor Militiamen, too, were equally protected, because, although held in their personal possession, the firearms distributed to them by the Militia or some other governmental agency nonetheless remained public property, and therefore could not have been taken from them by private parties in order to satisfy private claims in any event.

Thus, a legal guarantee of the personal possession of firearms while an individual is eligible for any service in the Militia constitutes one of the indispensable elements of the definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" among "the Militia of the several States".

2. In addition, although the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes were silent on the subject, nothing in the law of that era precluded anyone eligible for the Militia from possessing either more or better arms than were necessary for his own Militia service, or arms not suitable for Militia service but that might have been put to other lawful purposes. Other than persons of color, who formed a peculiar class because of the existence of Negro chattel slavery,[2022] loyal Americans who happened to have been exempted from possessing arms suitable for Militia service were never prohibited from possessing those or any other arms for any legitimate purpose. Neither did the requirement that Militiamen personally possess arms entail disarmament of any members of the Militia who reached the upper limit of age at which their compulsory participation was no longer statutorily mandated, or who became too disabled to serve at any age. Nor were such individuals ever prohibited from acquiring new firearms after their compulsory participation in the Militia ceased. Nor, for that matter, as a general rule were adult women, whose gender exempted them from almost all Militia duties,[2023] ever prohibited from possessing firearms for any legitimate purpose. Indeed, it is well-nigh impossible to imagine how the goal of modern "gun control"—dispossessing as many common Americans of as many firearms as possible—could have operated in communities in which every free adult able-bodied male was required by statute to possess in his own home at least one firearm and a large supply of ammunition—and in which the law held that the natural right of self-defense, effectuated with whatever lawful implements were at hand, "is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[2024] So, in those days, possession of firearms was generally considered a personal "right", whether its exact provenance were traceable to statute, common law, custom, or "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".

---

[2020] See ante, at 289 (Rhode Island) and 705-712 (Virginia).

[2021] See ante, at 295-296 (Rhode Island); 460-463 and 715-717 (Virginia).

3. During the pre-constitutional era, the explicit duty and ancillary implicit right of each member of the Militia to obtain and maintain personal possession of suitable firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements found their sources only in statutes, and therefore were always subject to amendment, alteration, or perhaps even repeal by legislators (although "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" would have imposed limits on how far any such repeal could have gone in justice). As soon as through the Declaration of Independence, the original Constitution, and the Bill of Rights "the Militia of the several States" became constitutional establishments that were to be "well regulated" in accordance with pre-constitutional principles, the duty of each individual eligible for service in the Militia to possess arms—and his concomitant right not to be dispossessed of them—became constitutional, too.

Indeed, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" recognized in the Second Amendment—which right had always enjoyed far less emphasis than the corresponding statutory duty embodied in the Militia Acts during the pre-constitutional period, when unbridled legislative supremacy was the hallmark of the [2022] See ante, at 363-369, 468, and 733-742 (Virginia).

---

[2023] See ante, at 242-245 (Rhode Island) and 601-607 (Virginia).

[2024] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

British idea of a "constitution"—became the explicit legal relation, because the Founders' concern was to put an end to arbitrary legislative (or any other type of governmental) supremacy. To be sure, by 1788 and 1791 every legally and historically literate American was already well aware that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" was the reciprocal of the duty of each eligible individual to serve in "[a] well regulated Militia". The original Constitution made crystal clear to everyone—and especially to public officials—that the duty could be statutorily "regulated" by legislators only within narrow limits, because it was imposed and defined in the first place through the incorporation of "the Militia of the several States" into the federal system. And in order to insure that the duty would be fulfilled to the letter, the Second Amendment declared that the reciprocal right "shall not be infringed".

This right is plainly absolute in character. Not simply because the injunction that it "shall not be infringed" is without exception or qualification, but also because "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" alone enables the corresponding duty to be fulfilled; fulfillment of that duty alone makes "well regulated Militia" possible; and "well regulated Militia" alone are "necessary to the security of a free State". Thus, because no "infringe[ment]" of "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", of any kind and to any degree, can coexist with "a free State", no "infringe[ment]" can ever be justified—and therefore no power to "infringe[ ]" that "right" can exist.

C. The political significance of permanent personal possession of firearms by all individuals eligible for service in the Militia. Not surprisingly, as with other principles of the constitutional Militia, the right and duty (or the duty and right, depending upon which legal perspective one adopts) of each Militiaman personally to possess in his home at all times one or more firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service are of profound political significance.

1. In any society, for good or ill, "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[2025] Thus, the firearm in any individual's hands represents his own personal portion of political power. To be effective, however, that basic quantum of power must be aggregated with the similar tiny particles of power possessed by many others. For only those people who hold guns in sufficient numbers, and employ them in an organized manner, are able to wield decisive power within any society. At that point, though, each individual's personal possession of a firearm represents, not simply some mere "individual right", but his participation in, responsibility for the exercise of, and benefit from the community's political authority.

In a society formed in accordance with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", "[a] well regulated Militia" is rightly considered "necessary to the security of a free State". For when firearms are dispersed throughout the community to the selfsame degree that Militiamen are—and thereby are always ready for immediate use in each Militiaman's own hands, rather than in public arsenals or magazines controlled by public officials—the "'[p]olitical power that grows out of the barrel of a gun'" is dispersed among the people and remains under their control. In "a free State" the people themselves maintain in their own hands as individuals the instruments of physical force for the purpose of protecting their freedom—not just as isolated individuals, because "a free State" is not anarchic, but through collective effort. Each individual must possess his very own gun so that the whole community will be armed and therefore capable of remaining free.

---

[2025] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

2. In addition, the right to and duty of personal possession (and usually the possessor's private ownership) of firearms by the largest possible number of eligible adults throughout the community creates a special kind of personal property that serves a public, governmental, and ultimately sovereign function as the means by which the community as a whole exercises the most fundamental and important of all political and legal powers: the Power of the Sword. Firearms privately possessed guarantee that the sovereign power truly and permanently resides with WE THE PEOPLE, who hold in their own hands the implements necessary to exercise that power in the gravest extreme. So, firearms privately possessed are the most important of all property, private or public, because in the final analysis the security of all other property depends upon them.

D. Ensuring the permanent personal possession of firearms by all individuals eligible for service in the Militia today. America's *pre-*constitutional Militia laws aimed at a near-universality of armament among her able-bodied free adult male inhabitants, preferably through their own efforts, but otherwise with the assistance of public institutions. Had the term been current in those days, "gun control" would not have denoted (as it does today) keeping firearms and ammunition away from as many common Americans as legislators, judges, bureaucrats, and officious private special-interest groups might contrive to disarm or to prohibit from the acquisition of arms in the first place, but instead would have meant seeing to it that as many citizens as possible acquired through the free market and thereafter at all times possessed in their own abodes their very own arms.[2026] So, revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" in the immediate future will require: (i) devising a suitable strategy for ensuring that all Americans eligible for the Militia personally possess firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements suitable for their Militia service; and (ii) eliminating all forms of modern "gun control" that could possibly interfere with that goal. That strategy will be considered here.

1. At least five alternatives are available: namely,

[2026] See ante, Chapters 6, 7, 9, 17, 18, 19, and 20.

{1} Militiamen financially able to purchase their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements are required to do so, and those who are too poor are loaned public arms for as long as they remain in the Militia—but all Militiamen retain personal possession, in their own homes and at all times, of the arms they own or borrow.

{2} Militiamen financially able to purchase their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements are required to do so; and those who are too poor instead receive from the Militia or some other governmental agency, as a donation to "the common defence" and "the general Welfare",[2027] actual title to sufficient arms to perform their service in the Militia—and all Militiamen retain personal possession, in their own homes and at all times, of the arms they own.

{3} Some governmental agency other than the Militia themselves supplies public arms to all Militiamen—and all Militiamen retain personal possession of those arms in their own homes at all times, although the government retains formal title to the arms.[2028]

{4} The Militia or some other governmental agencies supply public arms only to Militiamen who cannot arm themselves satisfactorily through their own efforts—and only when public officials determine that those arms are needed for those individuals' actual service—and otherwise store those arms in public armories and magazines.

{5} The Militia or some other governmental agencies supply public arms to all Militiamen—but only when public officials determine that those arms are needed for the men's actual service—and otherwise store those arms in public armories and magazines.[2029]

a. Choice among these alternatives requires prudent reflection, in terms not only of pre-constitutional practices but also of the Second Amendment's strictures. The Amendment demands that a constitutional "Militia" be "well regulated"—and a fair measure of "[a] well regulated Militia" in pre-constitutional times (and therefore today) is what was actually done, pursuant to statute, not just what might

---

[2027] U.S. Const. preamble and art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[2028] Although this alternative was never adopted in any Colony or independent State during pre-constitutional times, it arguably does comport with the constitutional power of Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" (provided that certain safeguards are established), and could have been the manner in which State officials applied An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 13, 32 Stat. 775, 777.

[2029] This alternative, too, was never adopted in any Colony or independent State during pre-constitutional times, and does not comport with the constitutional power of Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", but apparently was the manner in which State officials actually applied the Act of 21 January 1903, § 13, 32 Stat. at 777.

possibly have been done by a Colonial or State legislature but was never put to the test. So, in some cases, the correct conclusion would be to excise from the definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" what the *pre-*constitutional statutes never ordered to be done. For example, although Rhode Island and Virginia (and the other Colonies and independent States as well) might have created solely "select militia" composed exclusively of some politically influential or reliable factions and their hangers-on, instead they always included in their Militia just about every able-bodied adult free man resident within their jurisdictions. Happily, this result is in perfect accord with the Second Amendment, which protects "the right of the people", without exception, "to keep and bear Arms" in relation to "well regulated Militia".

Yet to conclude that the definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" cannot embrace what the *pre-*constitutional statutes never happened to command in so many words—or cannot exclude some of what they did explicitly mandate or implicitly allowed—would not necessarily be correct in every situation, either. Certainly that is the case with respect to racial discrimination in the Militia, which persisted throughout the *pre-*constitutional era and even during a good portion of the immediate *post-*constitutional period, too, but subsequently became unconstitutional.

b. So, for examples pertinent to the matter at hand, options {4} and {5} both limit the possession of firearms by some Militiamen or all Militiamen, and assign control and usually physical custody over those particular arms to public officials. The latter option finds no foundation in *pre-*constitutional practice. And that the former might have met legal muster to some degree at some times and in some places during that era does not necessarily immunize it against condemnation in the face of the Second Amendment today.

In order to support "well regulated Militia", the Second Amendment guarantees "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". Not to public officials as distinct from "the people"; not just to some of "the people"; not just as to only some "Arms"; and not just some of the time. Beyond question, the actually dominant practice in *pre-*constitutional America was for Militiamen, of whatever financial status, to maintain personal possession, in their own homes and at all times, of the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements they owned outright or borrowed from the community for their Militia service. Beyond doubt, too, this practice is perfectly congruent with "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". Indeed, it perfectly defines that "right": For an individual alone—let alone all individuals taken collectively as "the people"—can hardly "keep * * * Arms" unless he does, in fact, personally possess those "Arms" himself at all times. Moreover, the conjunction "keep and bear Arms" in the Second Amendment signifies in practical application personal possession in readiness for immediate action. Actually, "keep[ing]" arms in one's personal possession in readiness for immediate action is a form of "bear[ing]" them. Conversely, although an individual could "bear Arms" after they had been handed out to him by public officials from some governmental arsenal or magazine, before that moment he could not "keep * * * Arms", because they would be under someone else's control. Plainly enough, too, "the government" or "public officials" are not "the people". To the contrary, the Constitution invariably distinguishes among them—as in the First Amendment, which contrasts "the people" who enjoy "the right * * * peaceably to assemble", from "the Government" which "the people * * * petition * * * for a redress of grievances"; or in the Tenth Amendment, which contrasts the governmental entities "the United States" and "the States" with "the people", with respect to powers "delegated", "prohibited", or "reserved". So if in practice "the government" or "public officials" "keep * * * [the] Arms", "the people" do not. In addition, rogue "public officials" constitute the primary set of miscreants who, the Amendment expects, would attempt to "infringe[ ]" "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". In their capacities as disloyal officials, they are not among the individuals whose possession of "Arms" the Amendment protects from "infringe[ment]". Indeed, rogue public officials should always be disarmed. And, outside of the Militia, even loyal public officials should be armed in their official capacities only to the extent that WE THE PEOPLE allow. Overall, then, options {4} and especially {5} are not permissible today. If a contemporary Congress or State legislature desires to supply Militiamen with public arms, it must entrust each and every Militiaman who receives such arms with personal possession thereof throughout his entire period of eligibility for service. Public arms may always remain public property in terms of ownership. But while they are being used for Militia service, they must be treated as Militiamen's personal property in terms, not only of actual possession, but also of absolute possessory right.

This result makes perfect practical and political sense. The Founders recognized that a true Militia requires the full participation of all eligible individuals within the community, which demands that each and every individual be guaranteed a "right * * * to keep" as well as "to * * * bear Arms". For any individual's ability to "bear Arms" could easily be frustrated if rogue public officials simply denied him possession of "Arms" by sequestering them in public armories or magazines, from which they would be handed out only to the officials' cronies and partisans, thereby destroying the Militia and replacing it with a species of Praetorian Guard or Shutzstaffel. The only way to insure that everyone in the community is able to "bear Arms" in the Militia whenever his service is "necessary to the security of a free State"—which may be at any time and specifically in opposition to rogue public officials—is to insure that everyone in the community is able to "keep * * * Arms" by him at all times. And so the Second Amendment provides.

c. As for the remaining three options, {1} provides for ownership and possession of arms by some Militiamen, and simply possession of arms by others; {2} for ownership and possession of arms by all Militiamen; and {3} for ownership of arms by no Militiamen, but possession by them all. All of these options are compatible with the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution and with the Second Amendment, because permanent possession of, not mere title to, "Arms" by individual Militiamen is the crucial matter. Militiamen personally possessed of public arms could effectively refuse an illegal command by rogue public officials to "lay down their arms". But if their own arms were sequestered in public armories and magazines under the control of such officials' heavily armed myrmidons, Militiamen with the best of legal titles could vociferously "petition the Government for a redress or grievances"[2030] and assert their paper rights in the kangaroo courts until the cows came home without much hope of ever gaining access to the property they desperately needed to resist oppression.

All other things being equal, though, option {2} is so much more desirable than the others that it ought always to be adopted. Each Militiaman's permanent personal possession of suitable firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements is, of course, of the utmost importance. For, self-evidently, only actual possession will enable a Militiaman to provide "the security of a free State" whenever, wherever, and howsoever it may become "necessary". Less obviously but no less truly, only actual possession will enable a Militiaman to care for his "Arms", and to train with them, on a basis sufficiently regular that he becomes competent to perform the tasks that may be required of him at a decisive moment. (To be sure, the Constitution delegates to Congress the power and the duty "[t]o provide for * * * disciplining, the Militia, * * * reserving to the States respectively * * * the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress".[2031] Nonetheless, WE THE PEOPLE must be fully prepared and equipped to train themselves in the event of defaults by both Congress and the States.)

2. The requirement that Militiamen financially able to do so should supply their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements made good sense during the *pre-*constitutional period, and should be continued today as part of the discipline of revitalized Militia, for at least four reasons:

a. Historically, as this was the general practice throughout *pre-*constitutional America, and therefore part and parcel of the very definition of "Militia", it should not be superseded unless to continue it were utterly impractical.

b. Economically, to tax the people in general, and then expend the receipts to purchase firearms for distribution mostly to the very same people, would make little sense—for, on average, those who were not too poor to buy their own arms in the first place would simply pay for those arms in a different manner (and not unlikely pay more, given the excessive costs the public treasury and armories would inevitably run up as the profligate "middle men" in the process).

[2030] U.S. Const. amend. I.

[2031] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

c. Politically, if the General Government or the States' governments retained ownership of the firearms, such a procedure would be potentially dangerous—for although public officials would not possess the arms after their distribution, and ought never to be suffered to assert a legal claim to repossess any of them except when a Militiaman expired or expatriated, aspiring usurpers and tyrants might misassert the government's paper title in order to rationalize every Militiaman's physical surrender of his arms, for the purpose of effectively destroying the Militia entirely. True enough, if the General Government or the States owned the arms, WE THE PEOPLE would own them, too, because the General Government and the States are merely WE THE PEOPLE'S creatures, agents, and in the ultimate analysis dependencies. But THE PEOPLE'S ownership would be "one step removed" in law, which could give coloration to rogue public officials' claim to expand governmental ownership into a right to possess, or at least a right comprehensively to regulate THE PEOPLE'S possession and use of, the arms.

d. Psychologically, WE THE PEOPLE'S personal ownership as well as possession of arms is critically important. Imposing directly on each Militiaman the financial burden of supplying himself with his own firearm creates a strong personal incentive to obtain the very best firearm he can afford, and to maintain it in serviceable condition at all times—for men are always more interested in preserving what is theirs, than in preserving what is someone else's. Moreover, ownership reminds every single Militiaman that his "Arms" are both symbols and guarantors of his political status as a free man—that rogue public officials cannot command him to "lay down his arms", because those arms and what they represent are truly his, not in any way theirs.

3. Were "the Militia of the several States" properly revitalized today, the *pre-*constitutional practice of using public funds to supply firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements to Militiamen too poor to purchase such equipment themselves would have an especially firm constitutional basis, too.

a. This was one way in which many poor Militiamen were armed, in both Rhode Island and Virginia (as well as in other Colonies and independent States).[2032] Therefore, the constitutional definition of "[a] well regulated Militia",[2033] drawn (as it must be) from these *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes,[2034] necessarily includes this practice.

b. The cost to the community of adding ownership to possession in the case of impecunious Militiamen will likely be minimal. In practical terms, possession and ownership will amount to the same thing while impecunious individuals remain in

---

[2032] See ante, at 157-162 (Rhode Island) and 424-428 (Virginia).

[2033] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[2034] See ante, at 63-81.

the Militia, under the requirement that they must always have those firearms ready at hand. And if they continue to possess them as their owners even after their years of Militia service end, the firearms' residual value to the Militia will be too small to be a serious consideration. But, throughout the process, the Militia will have demonstrated how to build social solidarity across the lines of economic classes.

c. The relevant powers the Constitution delegates to Congress support the practice of supplying arms to poor Militiamen. Congress is affirmatively authorized "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia".[2035] And "[a]ffirmative words are often, in their operation, negative of other objects than those affirmed".[2036] Thus, these words not only delegate a power, and also impose a duty,[2037] but even establish an absolute disability as to their opposites. That is, Congress not only may "arm[ ]" the members of the Militia, and also must "arm[ ]" them whenever that course is "necessary and proper",[2038] but may never take any action intentionally to compel them to remain "[un]arm[ed]", let alone to "[dis]arm[ ]" them. Thus properly construed, Congress's own power in the premises and the Second Amendment's command that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed" embody precisely the same mandate. In this particular, "the [original] Constitution is itself, in every rational sense, and to every useful purpose, A BILL OF RIGHTS".[2039] Now, obviously, by definition poor individuals cannot easily, effectively, or perhaps even ever provide themselves with arms suitable for Militia service. So, for someone else to supply them with arms is plainly "necessary and proper". To be sure, revitalized "Militia of the several States" themselves could arm their poor members (through the use of fines assessed against delinquents or fees collected from persons exempted from various duties); or the States' governments could do so (through the use of treasury funds)—and Congress could legitimately "provide for * * * arming [poor Americans serving in] the Militia" by entrusting that task directly to the States and WE THE PEOPLE. Although this course would comport well with federalism (because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States" and are composed of WE THE PEOPLE themselves); and although it would provide the best way to determine by experimentation how most expeditiously to go about arming newly revitalized Militia—nevertheless, it would not be incumbent upon Congress to proceed in only that way. Congress could also draw on the General Government's tax receipts for this purpose. That would be a particularly apt use of such moneys. For another of Congress's powers is "[t]o lay and collect taxes * * * to * * * provide for the common

[2035] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2036] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803).

[2037] See ante, at 50-54.

[2038] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[2039] The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton).

Defence and general Welfare of the United States"[2040]—a purpose so important that the Founders took care to repeat it in the latter clause even though it already appeared in the Preamble to the Constitution, which they knew controlled the construction of everything that followed.[2041] "To provide for * * * arming * * * [any part of] the Militia" is unquestionably to "provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States" pro tanto. Therefore, expending the General Government's funds to "arm[ ] * * * [poor Americans serving in] the Militia" would be eminently constitutional. For the reasons given in favor of retaining the requirement that Militiamen financially able to do so should supply their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements, though, the recipients of such subsidies should be limited to those individuals certifiably too poor to purchase their very own arms.[2042]

[2040] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[2041] See Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheaton) 1, 188-189 (1824). See generally, W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Volume 1, at 374-379.

[2042] See ante, at 205-207 (Rhode Island) and 424-428 (Virginia).

CHAPTER THIRTY-NINE

Every individual possibly eligible to be a member of "the Militia of the several States" may acquire, possess, and own as of right any firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements possibly suitable for any type of Militia service.

Self-evidently, if every individual possibly eligible to be a member of one of "the Militia of the several States" is subject to a constitutional duty, and enjoys a constitutional right, to possess firearms as a consequence of such eligibility, then those firearms must be of the types that subserve the constitutional purposes for which they are possessed—namely, "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia",[2043] and to effectuate "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" so as to enable them to operate in "well regulated Militia" that can provide "the security of a free State".[2044] But who is to define what firearms are suitable—let alone required or permissible—for those purposes? Inasmuch as the "Arms" that "the people [are] to keep and bear" are necessary for the Militia, and the Militia are "necessary to the security of a free State", WE THE PEOPLE would never have left the term "Arms" without a clear definition in 1788 and 1791, and cannot afford to leave that matter unsettled today. For, in practice, that term must be correctly defined by someone.

A. No exclusions from or exceptions to the term "Arms" in the Constitution. Actually, the Constitution itself goes a long way towards supplying a definition. Pursuant to its power "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution" its power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia",[2045] Congress may "provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" with anything and everything that could in principle, and in light of the particular circumstances could reasonably be expected to, "arm[ ] * * * the Militia" in a proper fashion. And in the absence of or to complement or supplement Congressional action, the States may do so as well, under their reserved powers to maintain and regulate their own "Militia of the several States". Similarly, because "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" enables "the people" to serve within "well regulated Militia", public officials in either the General Government or the States cannot deprive anyone among "the people" of any "Arms" with which a member of

---

[2043] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[2044] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[2045] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 18 and 16.

such a Militia could reasonably be expected to perform his duties under whatever plausibly anticipated circumstances might confront him. For, in each of these cases, "where no exception is made in terms, none will be made by mere implication or construction".[2046]

B. WE THE PEOPLE the source of the definition of "Arms". Although the Constitution does not explicitly define "arming" and "Arms" more specifically than that, it does not leave those words undefinable in more detail, or fail to identify the parties who are authorized to define them, or in any manner license those definitions to be committed to the discretion of other parties whose pernicious self-interests would disqualify them from exercising any such authority within "a free State".

1. If Members of Congress could define in whatever idiosyncratic manner they chose what "arming * * * the Militia" means, they could thereby define in any way—or even define away—the Militia. "[T]he Militia of the several States", however, preëxisted the Constitution, and were incorporated into its federal system as they existed in 1788, just as they were incorporated into the Articles of Confederation as they existed in 1781,[2047] and just as they had existed pursuant to statutory regulation within the Colonies and independent States for more than a century theretofore. In all relevant particulars, their history fixes their definition. The Constitution delegated to Congress no authority to change that definition, directly or indirectly, any more than it delegated to Congress any license to change the definition of the noun "State" (or of any other constitutional term).[2048] Therefore, when Congress "provide[s] for * * * arming * * * the Militia", it must see to equipping the Militia with what Militiamen are supposed to possess in conformity with the constitutional definition of "Militia". That is, the constitutional definition of "Militia" fixes the constitutional definition of "arming". And the several States' legislators, too, are no less constrained in the exercise of their concurrent powers in this particular.

2. The definition of "Militia", of course, points, not to legislators, but to WE THE PEOPLE. "If, from the imperfection of human language, there should be serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, * * * the objects for which it was given, especially when those objects are expressed in the instrument itself, should have great influence in the construction."[2049] As far as "the Militia of the several States" are concerned, everything which "WE THE PEOPLE * * * ordain[ed] and [2046] Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. (12 Peters) 657, 722 (1838). Accord, Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheaton) 304, 338-339 (1816).

---

[2047] See Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

[2048] Compare, e.g., Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 566-568 (1911), with Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189, 206 (1920).

[2049] Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheaton) 1, 188-189 (1824).

establish[ed in] th[e] Constitution"[2050] identifies one overriding "object": namely, to field a self-actuating, self-reliant, and self-sufficient armed force, for the purpose of community self-defense, composed of and ultimately answerable only to WE THE PEOPLE themselves. So, in the final analysis, only THE PEOPLE themselves can define what "arming * * * the Militia" means, not only because THE PEOPLE "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution" in the beginning, and have sustained it every day thereafter, but also because they were "the Militia of the several States" then and are "the Militia of the several States" now. More than anything else, "arming" makes THE PEOPLE into "Militia". So how and with what they are to be "arm[ed]" implicates their very own identity in that particular, which THE PEOPLE themselves must, in the nature of things, know better than anyone else. Who else could possibly be competent to tell THE PEOPLE whether they are so suitably "arm[ed]" as to qualify as "Militia"—particularly when the very "security of a free State" is concerned?

3. In addition, because the Second Amendment is a "declaratory and restrictive clause[ ]" that "prevent[s] misconstruction or abuse of [the original Constitution's] powers",[2051] "arming * * * the Militia" must always be interpreted and applied so as to ensure and effectuate the "right of the people to keep and bear Arms". That "right" is "the right of the people", not of public officials. In their capacity as such, public officials enjoy no right at all under the Second Amendment, but instead labor under a duty not to "infringe[ ]" "the right of the people". "[T]he right of the people to keep and bear Arms" would not be a "right" in any meaningful sense if public officials enjoyed discretion to define the types of "Arms" that "the people" would be licensed to "keep and bear". For, in that case, no "infringe[ment]" of the supposed "right" could ever occur, because the "right" would be measured by what public officials allowed—their own willingness to limit themselves would be the extent of their duty—and thus the Second Amendment would be reduced to nothing but a snare and a delusion. Worse yet, if rogue public officials enjoyed the unalloyed discretion to define both the power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" with respect to the very "Arms" that "the people" might need to oppose those disloyal officials' own acts of usurpation and tyranny, then that power would provide the means for, and that right would prove impotent to prevent, subversion and then destruction of "the security of a free State". Therefore, if "the people" are to enjoy a true "right" and public officials are to labor under a true duty in this regard, only "the people" themselves, whose "right" it is "to keep and bear Arms", can decide what "Arms" they should "keep and bear".

[2050] U.S. Const. preamble.

[2051] RESOLUTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS SUBMITTING TWELVE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION (4 March 1789), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1063.

Thus, the power of Congress in the original Constitution "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" is precisely equivalent in effect to "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in the Second Amendment—proving through this particular that the original "Constitution is itself, in every rational sense, and to every useful purpose, A BILL OF RIGHTS".[2052]

C. The broadest possible standards for "Arms". Even WE THE PEOPLE, however, must be guided by standards beyond their ability to change. Where "Arms" are concerned, the standards are both objective and relative. For example, the technical competence of a firearm for an intended use is what counts, not someone's personal opinion, let alone political attitude, about it. Thus, armchair critics may deny that a handgun so cheaply and crudely made as to be more or less disposable is of any value for a Militia—but, in the hands of a résistant, something as apparently primitive as the "Liberator" .45 ACP pistol of World War II may prove to be the perfect implement for the job.[2053] This demonstrates how the usefulness of any type of workable firearm will strongly depend upon circumstances. To be sure, no one can predict what any particular member of the Militia may be called upon to do in the future. Some general considerations can provide guidance, though.

1. No type of "Arms" necessarily unsuitable for Militia service. Self-evidently, whatever the circumstances, some firearm at hand is always better than no firearm at all. The Constitution understands this to be the case; or it would neither require "arming * * * the Militia" nor guarantee "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". For this reason, prohibition of "the people['s]" possession of every class of firearms suitable for Militia service is obviously unconstitutional, because it renders the very existence of "[a] well regulated Militia" impossible. Prohibition of "the people['s]" possession of a particular class of firearms suitable for Militia service is equally unlawful, because whether the Militia is "well regulated" in particular circumstances may depend upon the availability of just such firearms. And prohibition of an individual Militiaman's possession of some specific firearm within a particular class of firearms suitable for Militia service is no less unconstitutional, because such a firearm may be the only one available with which to arm that Militiaman in an emergency; and without familiarity with it, the Militiaman may be unable to use it effectively, if at all, leaving him essentially disarmed.

In addition, no firearm is useful as a firearm without a plentiful supply of ammunition. So, except in some peculiar circumstances, no limitations are allowable on "the people['s]" possession of ammunition, with respect not just to type and quality but also to quantity.[2054]

---

[2052] The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton).

[2053] See, e.g., Encyclopedia of Firearms, ante note 428, at 114, 190; Francis Russell, World War II, The Secret War (Chicago, Illinois: Time-Life Books, Inc., 1981), at 129; Bruce N. Canfield, "Desperate Times: The 'Liberator' Pistol", American Rifleman, Volume 160, No. 8 (August 2012), at 48.

2. "Arms" suitable for the three explicit constitutional purposes. "Arms" suitable for "the Militia of the several States" must be those that are necessary and sufficient for performance of at least the three responsibilities the Constitution explicitly assigns to the Militia: namely, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions" when "call[ed] forth" for those purposes.[2055] By implicit constitutional definition, "[a] well regulated Militia" is one that is suitably armed for at least those purposes. (The qualification "at least" is necessary, because the States are not bound to employ their Militia for only those three tasks, and therefore may assign to their Militia further responsibilities in the performance of which other types of "Arms" may be necessary and proper.) Certainly, no Militia can be "well regulated" if due to a lack of suitable armament it is incapable of performing one or more of the tasks the Constitution expressly assigns to the Militia and the Militia only.

Of those three duties, the first is primarily a "police" function; the third is almost exclusively a "military" function; and the second is a "police" function, a "military" function, or both, depending upon circumstances. Perforce of the constitutional requirement that the Militia be armed, and of the constitutional delegation to the Militia of the authority and responsibility to perform those three tasks when "call[ed] forth" "in the Service of the United States", the Militia everywhere throughout America must possess whatever "Arms" may be necessary and sufficient to perform any and all of them at any time. There does exist, however, an obvious practical hierarchy within the types of "Arms" suitable for those purposes. To wit—

a. "Arms" suitable to "repel Invasions". It is, of course, possible to denote massive illegal immigration, even when unaccompanied by the organized use of arms on the part of the aliens, as an "invasion", in the sense of an "[h]ostile entrance upon the rights or possessions of another" by foreigners against the [2054] E.g., limitations on the amounts of black powder that individual Militiamen might store in private businesses and dwellings in densely populated urban areas, or special requirements with respect to the mode of storage, might be as permissible today as they were in pre-constitutional times, on the grounds of public safety, because black powder is an explosive. See ante, at 310-311 (Rhode Island). But modern "well regulated Militia" would have scant occasion to stockpile large quantities of black powder, because far safer alternatives are available for use in muzzle-loadings firearms. Some limitations on the amounts and facilities for safe keeping of smokeless powder and primers might be justifiable on the grounds of public safety, too. It is difficult, however, to imagine any stockpile of modern fixed ammunition, or components for handloading such ammunition, that a typical, properly trained Militiaman might possess that would pose significant safety problems. See Sporting Arms and Ammunition Manufacturers Institute, Publications No. 200, "Smokeless Powder—Properties & Storage"; No. 201, "Sporting Ammunition Primers—Properties, Handling & Storage for Handloading"; No. 202, "Small Arms Ammunition—Properties & Recommendations for Storage & Handling"; and No. 212, "Sporting Ammunition Fires".

---

[2055] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

country's legal residents.[2056] And, doubtlessly, "the Militia of the several States" could be "call[ed] forth" to suppress such immigration, by "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union" against the interlopers. It is also possible to denote widespread incursions by guerrilleros or other irregular fighters dispatched from some foreign country as an "Invasion[ ]", which doubtlessly the Militia could be "call[ed] forth" to "repel" as well. But the Constitution seems to contemplate that in almost all cases "Invasions" will involve large numbers of fully armed and highly trained troops from some foreign nation's regular armed forces. Confronted with such an attack, Militiamen would be compelled to function as "soldiers"; their service would be military service, no different in principle or practice from the service of regular troops; and therefore they would need to be equipped with firearms specifically suitable for soldiers in such military service—indeed, "Arms" at least as good for military purposes as the "Arms" carried by the invaders, and therefore at least equivalent to the "Arms" carried by America's own regular Armed Forces which presumably Congress would supply with all the "Arms" sufficient to repel likely invaders. Certainly the Constitution does not foolishly assume that foreign troops actually mounting an "Invasion[ ]" would themselves be so poorly armed that just any old armaments the Militia brought to the field would suffice to defeat them. Neither does it presume that America's regular Armed Forces would always be able to drive out the invaders without assistance—for, if it did, it would not explicitly assign that responsibility to the Militia. Nor does it contemplate "calling forth the Militia to * * * repel Invasions" when the Militia were too poorly armed to have a reasonable chance to survive those encounters.

In addition, "repel[ling] Invasions" can occur through deterrence as well as actual combat. "[A] well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms" is, first and foremost, to provide military protection to "a free state", so that, as much as possible, "standing armies, in time of peace, * * * [can] be avoided, as dangerous to liberty".[2057] But if standing armies are to be avoided, while foreign aggressors—no less "dangerous to liberty"—are to be deterred from attacking, then the Militia must be armed to the point that their ability to "repel Invasions" is credible in those aggressors' estimations. This requires that the Militia be armed and trained with military-grade firearms of the highest order at all times and in an highly visible manner.

So, inasmuch as "Invasions" constitute the direst threat—because, if successful, they would destroy not only "a free State" in America but even America herself—the first priority in "arming * * * the Militia" and the main focus of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" must be to arm "the people" in the [2056] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2057] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

Militia with, and to protect "the people" in their ability to acquire and thereafter their permanent possession of, first-class military-grade firearms.

Nonetheless, even for the purpose of "repel[ling] Invasions", the Militia's arsenal should not be limited to military-grade firearms. A firearm suitable for Militia service is one with which a Militiaman can perform his duties in any conceivable situation. The Constitution cannot and therefore does not exclude the possibility that an "Invasion[ ]" of America will temporarily succeed in some significant part, or even the entirety, of the country. At that point, "the people" in the Militia (as well as what remains of the regular Armed Forces) will be reduced to operating as guerrilleros, irregulars, partisans, and résistants—perhaps in small groups, perhaps even as lone individuals. In such circumstances, every workable firearm and all of the ammunition that the enemy has not confiscated will be useful and will be used—from what remains of the stock of modern military-grade arms in patriots' hands, to "sporting" rifles and shotguns, to the cheap handguns subject to derision by "gun controllers" as "Saturday-night specials", and even to muzzle-loading firearms for which black powder can be compounded and lead balls fabricated in secret basement arsenals. In such times, the constitutional term "Arms" will be as broadly defined as necessity requires. Which means that now, too, it must be just as broadly defined—because "the people" must be prepared now for what may happen then. "[T]he people" cannot suffer some arbitrarily narrow definition of "Arms" applied today to result in effectively disarming the Militia in the face of necessity tomorrow. The power and duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" cannot be limited to what may be done to meet the obvious needs of the moment, but must encompass as well what should be done today to forefend the dangers that may possibly arise in some dim and distant future time.

That "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" includes military-grade "Arms" in the very first position may surprise and unsettle some who conceive of the Militia as essentially civilian establishments. This basic understanding is not wrong—for, throughout American history, "well regulated militia" have always been contrasted with "standing armies". The Militia are the ultimate embodiment of civil power; whereas "the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power".[2058] But the civilian character of the Militia does not preclude their performance of military functions. And the types of "Arms" suitable for the Militia in any particular circumstances must depend upon those functions. Thus, the contention of contemporary "gun controllers" that "civilians" should not have "military"-grade firearms is simply nonsensical. Every "civilian" who is eligible for Militia service (and not properly exempted) may at any time be required, and should at all times be prepared, to perform services in which the possession of a "military"-grade firearm is essential. Therefore, every such "civilian"—which includes most of the population of able-bodied adults throughout America—has a constitutional right and duty to possess such "Arms", and a right to look in the first instance to Members of Congress and the States' legislators to provide some means by which he can acquire them.

---

[2058] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13. Accord, e.g., Ratification of the Constitution, by the Convention of the State of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations (1790), ¶ 17th, in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1055.

Confusion on this score would abate if it were recalled that during the pre-constitutional era as a practical matter the distinction between "civilian" and "military" firearms was vanishingly small. Firearms that might have been characterized as "civilian" in nature, because they were initially designed or marketed as such, or because "civilians" happened to carry them, were not simply, let alone exclusively, "civilian" as to function. Many firearms in the hands of "civilians" were actual "military"-grade firearms, used both to satisfy the individuals' public Militia duties and for private "civilian" purposes. Most "civilian" firearms were capable of "military" uses—and (more to the point) were legally accepted as such, because no pre-constitutional statute ever excluded such firearms as a class from being used to fulfill a Militiaman's duty to possess a firearm. In fact, apart from the capability to mount a bayonet, no functional difference between typical "civilian" and "military" muskets existed; and many "civilian" muskets were modified to take bayonets. Moreover, rifles, which in America were generally produced for "civilian" uses at first, were superior in range and accuracy to any "military" muskets. So, man for man, in many circumstances "civilians" armed with rifles were arguably better equipped than regular "soldiers" armed with muskets.

b. "Arms" suitable to "suppress Insurrections". By "Insurrections", the Constitution usually envisions violations of the laws that residents perpetrate within the country on a relatively large scale—what it denotes in another place as "domestic Violence", and assumes may become so serious within a State as to require "protect[ion]" by the United States.[2059] In the late 1700s, "insurrection" meant "[a] seditious rising; a rebellious commotion".[2060] "Seditious" meant "[f]actious with tumult; turbulent".[2061] "Rebellious" meant "[o]pponent to lawful authority".[2062] And "factious" meant "[p]roceeding from publick dissensions; tending to publick discord".[2063] So, in its most typical manifestation, an "Insurrection[ ]" in the constitutional sense would entail widespread social disorder set in motion by private citizens, perhaps in opposition to the government's policies or even to the government itself, but in any event proceeding in a lawless and

---

[2059] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2060] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2061] Id., in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2062] Id., in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2063] Id., definition 2 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

probably violent manner. Depending upon the size and degree of organization of the "Insurrection[ ]", in "suppress[ing]" it and "executing the Laws of the Union" against its perpetrators the Militia would perform a "police" or a "para-military" function, and therefore would need to be equipped with firearms suitable for those purposes. Presumably, military-grade firearms would always suffice, although they might not always be necessary. In many instances the less-extensive modern police armamentarium of handguns, shotguns, various types of stun-guns, tear-gas launchers, and so on would prove adequate. (Because these would typically be included in the table of equipment of any military-police unit, however, they could fairly be considered "military" as well as "police" "Arms", too.)

"Insurrections" can also consist of organized violations of the laws by rogue public officials who are "rebellious" in the sense of "[o]pponent to lawful authority"—specifically, to the Constitution and their own "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support [it]".[2064] When usurpations and tyrannical acts by rogue officials set off "publick discord"—in particular, justifiable defensive resistance on the part of their victims—they become, not simply crimes in their own right,[2065] but also nothing less than "Insurrection[ ]" under color of but in opposition to law. And if the rogue officials perpetrating those crimes then deploy armed contingents, whether rogue members of civilian police agencies or the regular Armed Forces, in the field against WE THE PEOPLE, thereby "levying War against them", those officials and their myrmidons commit "Treason" in the full constitutional sense of that term.[2066]

The great danger that "Insurrections" of the latter type pose lies in the likelihood that the Militia will be required to "suppress", not only the rogue public officials themselves, but also their henchmen and deluded supporters among the police and the regular Armed Forces. Yet that type of confrontation is precisely what the Constitution foresees may occur when it declares that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State".[2067] For, as Joseph Story pointed out in that very regard, "large military establishments and standing armies in time of peace" afford > facile means * * * to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people. The right of the citizens to keep and bear arms has justly been considered as the palladium of the liberties of a republic, since it offers a strong moral check against the usurpation and arbitrary power of rulers, and will generally, even if

---

[2064] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[2065] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[2066] See ante, at 814-821.

[2067] U.S. Const. amend. II.

> these are successful in the first instance, enable the people to resist and triumph over them.[2068]

So, in this case, too, the "Arms" WE THE PEOPLE must possess, and the possession of which "shall not be infringed" by public officials, must be of such a nature as to be sufficient at least to deter, to resist when deterrence fails, and if at all possible then to put down, usurpation and tyranny supported even by rogue elements of the civilian para-militarized police agencies and the Armed Forces. Which means "Arms" as least as good technologically as, and far more plentiful than, those THE PEOPLE'S domestic enemies wield.

To those modern-day "gun controllers" who contend that American "civilians" should never be as well armed as "the authorities"—that is, the regular Armed Forces and para-militarized professional police departments or other armed governmental agencies—the short answer is that "the Militia of the several States" are as much legal "authorities" as any such establishment. Indeed, far more so, because the Militia are the only establishments to which the Constitution explicitly delegates the authority and responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union". Moreover, the Militia's ultimate constitutional responsibility is to provide for "the security of a free State" domestically, by deterring rogue public officials from, and if necessary seeing them swifty, surely, and severely punished for, misusing the law to break the law under color of the law. That is, the Militia are "the authorities" the Constitution explicitly assigns to keep watch at all times over all other "authorities"—thus solving the perennial conundrum of political philosophy, "Quis custodes custodire poterit?"[2069]

Conversely, it can never be the responsibility, right, privilege, power, or even arguable claim of the Armed Forces or any professional police agency to supervise the Militia, let alone to prevent WE THE PEOPLE from asserting their sovereignty in and through their Militia. Americans in the pre-constitutional era were agreed that "standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty".[2070]

[2068] Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646 (footnote omitted).

[2069] "Who will be able to watch the guardians?" Figuratively, "Who will be able to govern the governors?"

[2070] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13. Accord, e.g., Declaration of Independence (King George III "has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies without the Consent of our legislatures" and "has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power"); Ratification of the Constitution by the State of New Hampshire (1788), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1026 ("no standing Army shall be Kept up in time of Peace unless with the consent of three fourths of the Members of each branch of Congress"); Ratification of the Constitution by the State of Virginia (1788), in id., at 1030 ("standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty, and therefore ought to be avoided, as far as the circumstances and protection of the Community will admit"); Ratification of the Constitution by the State of New York (1788), in id. at 1035 ("standing armies in time of Peace are dangerous to Liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in Cases of necessity"); Ratification of the Constitution by the State of North Carolina (1789), in id. at 1047 ("standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to Liberty, and therefore ought to be avoided, as far as the circumstances and protection of the

And had they been familiar with the type of professional police agencies commonplace today, they doubtlessly would have included them as well in the category of "dangerous" establishments, perhaps even in the very front rank. Certainly the recent history of such totalitarian states as Hitler's Germany and Stalin's Russia teaches that such ostensibly civilian secret police as the Gestapo and the NKVD were more to be feared as the enforcers of official political terrorism than the regular armed forces; and that, indeed, even officers at the very highest levels of those country's armed forces often fell victim to them. Nothing suggests that any change has occurred in the relative danger that establishments of this kind pose at the present time.

To the contrary: Everything attests that the situation has become far worse. Today, professional careers in "law enforcement" too often appeal to the aberrant type of individual who yearns to wield the brute power, but not fulfill the constitutional responsibility, that accompanies his receipt of an official badge and gun. And, as human psychology teaches, all power tends to be abused, especially by the very individuals who actively seek it. Moreover, those who spend much time among the rank and file within contemporary American "law enforcement" soon realize that their co-workers, superiors, prosecutors, judges, and other public officials will often, if not usually, "look the other way" when police powers are abused in favor of the governmental apparatus. So they come to believe that they can always get away with more than the apparatus would ever tolerate in the average citizen—which doubtlessly tempts all too many of them to engage in reckless, abusive, wanton, and even criminal behavior.[2071] In addition, the stresses on questionable personalities inherent in modern "law enforcement" inevitably bring to the surface various psychic weaknesses and even disabilities that would lay repressed for longer periods (or even permanently) in average citizens. That these would typically manifest themselves in irresponsible, abusive, sadistic, and even violent behavior should hardly be surprising. To be sure, most individuals seeking employment in "law enforcement" are subjected to some psychological screening, and are put through various programs of instruction and on-the-job training. But, in light of the increasingly repressive and even feral misbehavior of American police towards private citizens, many of the latter entirely innocent of any infraction of the law, one is entitled to question what such screening, instruction, and training actually seek to, or in fact do, discover and promote. Are those who recruit and supervise the police looking for individuals who believe that the purpose of the police is not to control WE THE PEOPLE in aid of the political, economic, or social agenda of some hidden faction, but instead to protect THE PEOPLE in the enjoyment community will admit"); Ratification of the Constitution, by Convention of the State of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations (1790), in id. at 1055 ("standing armies in time of peace, are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in cases of necessity").

---

[2071] All intentional violations of Americans' civil rights are criminal acts. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

of their liberty as they choose to enjoy it—who are willing to "take a bullet" from some criminal rather than to oppress (let alone kill) an innocent citizen (that is, who will think first, and shoot only second, if at all)—who will disobey all overtly criminal orders, and firmly question "authority" in borderline cases—who will refuse to perjure themselves, suppress evidence, and otherwise obstruct justice in order to protect "the Department", to cover for "their brothers and sisters" on "the Force", or to keep within the good graces of prosecutors and judges—and who will expose and oppose police oppression of the citizenry, internal corruption in their own agency, and other wrongdoing by rogue public officials? Or, are the recruiters and supervisors seeking to enlist individuals who subscribe to the amoral principle that "the ends justify the means"—who imagine that a badge and a gun license them to oppress others—who harbor an "us versus them" mentality that contemptuously puts police, prosecutors, and other officials at odds with common "civilians"—who will obey orders from their superiors in the mechanical manner of thoughtless robots—who are willing to deprive of constitutional rights, inflict pain upon, or even kill, anyone who physically challenges their supposed authority—and who will affirmatively cover up misbehavior by rogue officials?

On the basis of these considerations, every prudent American should conclude that the very last individuals who should be entrusted with what amounts to a monopoly of firearms are to be found in any form of "standing army", whether openly designated as such or cloaked in the mantle of a civilian, but *para-*military, "law-enforcement agency". Of course, that is exactly what the Second Amendment to the Constitution teaches: "A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed."[2072] Nowhere does the Constitution suggest that any "standing army" or professional "police force" is "necessary to the security of a free State", or even "necessary" for any purpose whatsoever. Rather, by not just implicit but even studied exclusion, the Amendment teaches the very opposite. Furthermore, when the Amendment categorically declares that "the right of the people * * * shall not be infringed", it leaves no room in its prohibition for any exception—whether of legislative, executive, or judicial concoction—to its prohibition in favor of a "standing army" or any professional "police force". No less than anyone else are such establishments prohibited from "infring[ing]" "the people['s]" "right". Therefore, with respect to the "keep[ing] and bear[ing of] Arms", any "standing army" and all "police forces" must always remain inferior and thereby subordinate to the Militia.

For such subordination to be enforced, though, two conditions must be met: First, the Militia must always be able to "outgun" every one of the General Government's professional police agencies, and all such agencies in the States until upon revitalization of the Militia the latter are incorporated within the Militia as specialized units akin to the Minutemen or Rangers of *pre-*constitutional times. Second, if the Militia cannot be expected to "outgun" the Armed Forces in some important respects, because the latter will inevitably possess various types of heavy equipment perhaps not suitable for the Militia, nonetheless the Militia must always be sufficiently organized that they will vastly outnumber any rogue elements within the Armed Forces, so that quantity will have a reasonable chance to overwhelm quality at least with respect to deterring those relatively few renegades from combining with aspiring usurpers and tyrants to oppress THE PEOPLE.[2073] Moreover, upon revitalization of the Militia, a Militia liaison officer should be attached to every major unit in the Armed Forces, in order to promote the closest coördination, coöperation, mutual understanding, and sympathy between the two establishments.

---

[2072] Emphasis supplied.

As in the case of "Invasions", the Constitution cannot presume that an "Insurrection[ ]" will not in fact temporarily succeed, ensconcing usurpers and tyrants in control of a puppet "government" propped up by armed agents of repression. Should such a calamity occur, patriotic Americans would be reduced to outlaws in their own land, their only alternative to surrender and slavery being to take the field as guerrilleros, partisans, résistants, and other types of clandestine fighters. At that point, any and all firearms—and whatever ammunition was available—would be usable, and used, for "suppress[ing] Insurrections" in whatever ways patriots could devise. Again, because necessity would define the scope of the constitutional term "Arms" in that future day, that term must be just as broadly construed in the present, so that WE THE PEOPLE can prepare now for what may happen then.

Moreover, if, under such adverse circumstances, THE PEOPLE are to be capable of any effective resistance, they must have access to some "Arms" about which, before the outbreak of open defiance of the régime, the oppressors have no knowledge. Therefore, long before aspiring usurpers and tyrants come anywhere near their goal, THE PEOPLE will need to secrete in long-term storage firearms and ammunition for which no official "registration" exists, along with the tools and the raw and *semi-*finished materials necessary to manufacture new (even if only crude) firearms and especially ammunition. Therefore, "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" requires loyal public officials not to interfere with THE PEOPLE'S acquisition and retention of firearms, ammunition, gunsmithing tools, and related resources about which those officials know, and except through constitutional judicial processes can ascertain, nothing.

If no governmental records of who possesses this equipment exist, and no private records are easily accessible, rogue public officials eager to confiscate THE [2073] See The Federalist No. 46 (James Madison), quoted ante, at 41.

PEOPLE'S "Arms" cannot know where to look. Except everywhere. But no régime can deploy the manpower to look everywhere. To be sure, after revitalization of the Militia, rogue officials would know that every member of the Militia not specifically exempted by statute possessed at least one firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service. Even if those officials were able to confiscate every one of these first-line "Arms", however, they could never be sure of who among Militiamen—if not all of them—possessed other "Arms" in well-hidden caches. For that reason, all public officials should always be kept in the dark on that score, so that their ignorance, uncertainty, and insecurity will deter them from disloyal acts.

Self-evidently, WE THE PEOPLE cannot secrete stockpiles of "Arms" adequate for effective resistance only at the last minute, when tyranny has ascended to its zenith and can clamp down on them in full force. For the very first thing successful usurpers and tyrants will do, if they have not already done so on their road to power, will be to confiscate from THE PEOPLE whatever firearms and ammunition have not yet been hidden. Thus, the contingency "if they have not already done so" becomes quite important, because the steps usurpers and tyrants take on that road are not always obvious. Their full-blown puppet "government" will probably not be set up overnight in one fell swoop. The political system will not undergo a sudden devolutionary saltation from apparent freedom to undeniable oppression. More likely, the corruption will insinuate itself through a gradual degenerative process that imposes incremental deprivations of liberty on an unsuspecting public (as the saying goes, "slowly boiling the frog"). Under one guise or another, "gun control" will be introduced in a step-by-step fashion so as not to arouse too much opposition from too many individuals too soon.

For WE THE PEOPLE successfully to combat this stratagem, they must cultivate instincts intensely inimical to "gun control". They must recognize "gun control" as no less contrary to "the security of a free State" than "well regulated Militia", based upon "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", are "necessary". Of course, THE PEOPLE must know that "an unconstitutional act is not a law",[2074] and that "[a]n offense created by it is not a crime".[2075] More than that, they must also recognize that any supposed "law" the effect of which is to hinder their ability to resist oppression by force of arms is itself a component part of "a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism", and therefore not simply unconstitutional and void, but even beyond the "just powers" that any "Government" can "deriv[e] * * * from the consent of the governed".[2076] And if a rotten Judiciary crawling with the maggots of usurpation will not strike down such a "law", then THE PEOPLE themselves must do so by systematic and thoroughgoing [2074] Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886).

---

[2075] Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 376 (1880), quoted with approval in Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408 (1963).

[2076] Declaration of Independence.

noncompliance, employing whatever means are available—secreting the firearms and ammunition they already possess; setting up clandestine factories; smuggling; and finally, at the onset of open resistance, liberating arms from the usurpers' and tyrants' puppet troops and police. Indeed, fraudulent judicial decisions unashamedly whitewashing such a "law" would supply the final indicia that "due process of law" aimed at "the security of a free State" no longer existed—and thereby would constitute an occasion and reason in fact, and a sufficient justification in law, for resistance, and call into being a duty of resistance aimed at "throw[ing] off such [an abusive] Government, and * * * provid[ing] new Guards for the[People's] future security".[2077]

True enough, even a duty under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" "to throw off" tyranny must be fulfilled with prudence, circumspection, and (if possible) moderation. Depending upon circumstances, WE THE PEOPLE perhaps may not need to resort to "Arms", but instead may successfully employ tactics of nonviolent resistance.[2078] Yet the Constitution nowhere identifies unarmed, nonviolent resistance as the primary means, or even an alternative means, by which THE PEOPLE can and should effectively oppose tyranny. "A well regulated Militia", which the Second Amendment declares to "be[ ] necessary to the security of a free State", is not an agglomeration of pacifists. And if the Constitution implicitly allows for unarmed resistance—because the Militia, although always trained to arms, need not invariably turn to arms in every situation in which their intervention might be required—it renders nonviolent action credible by requiring and securing the possibility of mass, concerted, fully armed resistance if all other recourse fails. But only if THE PEOPLE actually possess whatever firearms may be necessary under the circumstances can they exercise an option to use them.

c. "Arms" suitable to "execute the Laws of the Union". As far as the Militia are concerned, the modern-day dichotomy between "military" and "police" functions is an artifact of lawmakers' failure over many generations past properly "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[2079] During the pre-constitutional era, no professional "police departments" or equivalent governmental "law-enforcement agencies" existed. Large-scale "police" operations, such as "slave patrols", were the job of the Militia.[2080] Following this pattern, in the future all "police" in the several States should be specialized units within the

---

[2077] Declaration of Independence.

[2078] See, e.g., Gene Sharp, Civilian-Based Defense: A Post-Military Weapons System (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part One, Power and Struggle (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part Two, The Methods of Nonviolent Action (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part Three, The Dynamics of Nonviolent Action (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973).

[2079] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2080] See ante, at 339-343, 392-395, and 718-723 (Virginia).

revitalized Militia, akin in principle to the Minutemen and Rangers of pre-constitutional times.[2081]

Because (as just explained) the Constitution requires that "the Militia of the several States" be equipped with firearms at least equivalent to those the regular Armed Forces carry, revitalized Militia will be more than suitably armed to perform their duties as "police" who "execute the Laws of the Union". For even today's most highly para-militarized police and other civilian law-enforcement agencies are not anywhere near as well equipped as the regular Armed Forces. And, of course, nothing would prevent the Militia from being armed, not only with firearms of the highest "military" grade, but also with firearms of some lesser (or at least different) "police" grade, so that they could select the very best tools for the particular purposes at hand.

3. "Arms" suitable for individual self-defense. Individual self-defense amounts to personal execution of the laws on the spot, being justifiable as such because no alternative exists other than ceding to criminals free reign over their victims. Thus, individual self-defense is quintessentially a Militia function, albeit one performed at the level of each solitary individual. In principle, then, any and all "Arms" at all suitable for individual self-defense come within the set of "Arms" suitable for the Militia, and therefore are constitutionally protected as such for "the people to keep and bear".

Many instances could be cited in which personal "execut[ion of] the Laws of the Union" would constitute an integral part of a case of individual self-defense. For example, Title 18, United States Code, Section 241declares it a crime "[i]f two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right of privilege * * * secured [to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States]", and embraces situations in which "death results from the acts committed * * * or * * * such acts include kidnapping or an attempt to kidnap, * * * or an attempt to kill"—any of which heinous "acts" would justify a victim's resort to deadly force with a firearm to repel such aggression. Similarly, Title 18, United States Code, Section 242 declares it a crime for anyone, "under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, willfully [to] subject[ ] any person in any State * * * to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States", and includes situations that involve "bodily injury"; "the use, attempted use, or threatened use of a dangerous weapon, explosives, or fire"; "death result[ing] from the acts committed"; "kidnapping or an attempt to kidnap"; or "an attempt to kill"—again, any of which [2081] See ante and post, at 202, 214-215, 217, 472, 511-512, 514-515, and 559-563 (Minutemen); 563-564 (Rangers); and 327-328, 1135-1138, 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488 (incorporation of law-enforcement agencies into, and performance of law-enforcement functions by, the Militia).

---

threats would justify a victim's resort to deadly force in self-defense.[2082] And numerous laws of the several States fit this general pattern, too.

Now, any small arms suitable for typical "military" or "police" purposes can be employed for personal self-defense in a pinch. In most cases, though, where a criminal assault on an individual occurred at close quarters, the use of a high-powered rifle for self-defense would be unlikely, because the average American would not keep such a firearm immediately at hand on a routine basis; and where any choice among different firearms were possible such use would probably be contraindicated, because in any populated area the bullet fired from such a rifle, even having struck an assailant, might nonetheless travel a long distance farther on and perhaps injure some innocent bystander.[2083] Of course, a semiautomatic or even a fully automatic rifle might be the preferable firearm where the victim faced a pack of heavily armed jack-booted thugs from some rogue governmental agency, acting "under color" but in violation of law, whose illegal acts "include[d] the use, attempted use, or threatened use of a dangerous weapon, explosives, or fire", or "kidnapping or an attempt to kidnap", or "an attempt to kill".[2084] On the other hand, many firearms that would be considered substandard for modern "military" or "police" use—even a single-shot handgun chambered in .22 LR caliber—could suffice for self-defense in the absence of something better. And "the right of the people to keep" such "Arms" would already be guaranteed because of their potential usefulness to patriotic guerrilleros, partisans, or résistants engaged in last-ditch efforts to "repel Invasions" or "suppress Insurrections".

This matter is especially worthy of comment because of the currency of the utterly wrong-headed notion that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in the Second Amendment should be construed and applied without controlling reference to the clause preceding it (that is, "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State"), and therefore that average Americans are constitutionally entitled "to keep" only such "Arms" as happen to be "in common use" at the time for personal self-defense against private criminals.[2085] Individual

---

[2082] For the purpose of this analysis, presumably the "bodily injury" being threatened would be of so severe a nature as to permit the use of lethal force in order to prevent it.

[2083] One of the basic rules for the safe use of firearms, which applies even in situations involving self-defense, is to "know your target and what is beyond it."

[2084] 18 U.S.C. § 242. The thugs' possession of badges would afford them no defense. For example, a rogue officer who attempts an unlawful arrest, even under color of a claim of "good faith", is an aggressor whom his victim may resist in self-defense with whatever force is reasonable in relation to the harm threatened under the circumstances. See John Bad Elk v. United States, 177 U.S. 529 (1900); Brown v. Commonwealth, 27 Va. App. 111, 116-117, 497 S.E.2d 527, 530 (1998), citing Foote v. Commonwealth, 11 Va. App. 61, 69, 396 S.E.2d 851, 856 (1990), and Diffendal v. Commonwealth, 8 Va. App. 417, 421, 382 S.E.2d 24, 26 (1989). If by some overt act indicative of imminent danger the rogue officer threatens his victim with death or severe bodily injury, the victim may respond with lethal force. See Commonwealth v. Sands, 262 Va. 724, 729, 553 S.E.2d 733, 736 (2001); McGhee v. Commonwealth, 219 Va. 560, 562, 248 S.E.2d 808, 810 (1978).

[2085] E.g., District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 595-600, 626-628 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court).

self-defense is the fundamental purpose neither of the Second Amendment itself nor of the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution, "in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse" of which the Amendment was adopted.[2086] For individual self-defense can enforce but a few laws, and then only in adventitious situations. And individual self-defense cannot "suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"—or deter, let alone effectively resist, a rogue "standing army" or professional para-military police forces which afford "facile means * * * to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people".[2087] In fact, if individual self-defense is the sole, or even the primary, purpose for which "the people" can claim a "right * * * to keep and bear Arms", then that ostensible "right" is in actuality an open invitation to aspiring usurpers and tyrants, to insurrectionists, and to invaders—because these jackals, who invariably hunt in packs, will expect from experience that "the people's" sporadic and uncoördinated resistance to aggression as mere individuals will assuredly prove feckless and futile.

4. "Arms" suitable for target shooting, hunting, and other "shooting sports". Self-evidently, inasmuch as Militia service is not a "sport", "Arms" that were suitable only for "sporting purposes" would not be suitable for Militia service, by definition. In fact, however, throughout American history, essentially all firearms designed primarily for "sporting purposes" have always been capable of being and in many instances have been employed for Militia service if nothing better were available. And during the initial stages of revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" in the near future, reliance will have to be placed upon then-current stocks of primarily "sporting" firearms in average Americans' hands, because nothing better will be available in sufficiently large quantities.

Of course, the designation of many of these "Arms" as being of "sporting" character will be nothing but an artifact of the efforts of "gun controllers" to strip Americans of the right to possess "military-" and "police-grade" firearms, and the counter-efforts of those Americans to evade that restriction by the use of semantics. For example, common Americans now possess very large numbers of well-made, highly accurate, and dependable modern rifles that are grudgingly classified by the General Government's Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives as "sporting arms", but which, only a few decades ago, would have been considered of first-class "military" character in any country in the world—in particular, various semiautomatic, magazine-fed rifles of the domestic "AR" and "M1A" types, in .223 (5.56 x 45) and .308 (7.62 x 51) caliber, as well as no less effective rifles of the foreign "AK" type, in 7.62 x 39 and 7.62 x 54R caliber, more of which are being produced and purchased every year. And if the list is enlarged to encompass the M1 Garand, M1 Carbine, FN-FAL, and other semiautomatic rifles of "military" pedigree that are no longer being produced for military use, but in large numbers have come into "civilian" hands and are most unlikely to wear out in the foreseeable future, the "sporting" rifles that are fully capable of "military" uses must constitute a significant percentage of all the "sporting" arms extant. All of these rifles differ from the corresponding "military" versions only in their rate of fire: the "sporting" arms being semiautomatic only, many of the "military" arms being fully automatic or capable of burst fire. And inasmuch as a well-trained rifleman with a semiautomatic firearm can be just as effective as one with a fully automatic arm—and far less wasteful of ammunition, too—the practical difference between "sporting" and "military" arms is probably too small to measure.

---

[2086] RESOLUTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS SUBMITTING TWELVE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION (4 March 1789), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1063.

[2087] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

Moreover, even after revitalization of the Militia is complete, firearms designed for target shooting, hunting, and other of "the shooting sports" will always prove useful for training individuals in the safe and effective use of arms. Such has been recognized since the very earliest days, when (for example) Virginia's General Assembly declared that "any man be permitted to kill deare or other wild beasts or fowle in the common woods, forrests, or rivers in regard that thereby the inhabitants may be trained in the use of theire armes".{EN-1992} So, because "a well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[2088] all firearms capable of being employed for training are properly categorized as "Militia arms" and therefore come within the protection of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". To be sure, universal training with standard military rifles should be the goal, as it long has been in principle if not always in practice.[2089] But until such a comprehensive program can be instituted, WE THE PEOPLE can at least learn the fundamentals of the safe and effective usage of firearms with the "Arms" they happen to have at hand.

5. "Arms" to be as technologically advanced as possible. Because the Militia have been in the past and may be in the future called upon to fulfill any or all of the three responsibilities the Constitution explicitly assigns to them—namely, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"[2090]—under widely divergent conditions, the specific types and examples of "Arms" within the various categories of "Arms" suitable for Militia service are not and cannot be historically fixed. Rather, they must include whatever "Arms" may be necessary and sufficient for performance of those tasks under the particular conditions that exist at the time.

[2088] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[2089] See, e.g., An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 113, 39 Stat. 166, 211; now codified as amended at 10 U.S.C. § 4309.

[2090] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

a. Construing the Constitution according to the principle of "original intent" does not require that the phrase "provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" in the original Constitution[2091] and the noun "Arms" in the Second Amendment must embrace only single-shot muskets, rifles, and pistols with flintlock actions that employ black powder as a propellant and lead balls as missiles. Many constitutional terms address sets of activities or things the contents of which can, and must be expected to, change with the times—for example, "Commerce";[2092] "the Securities and current Coin of the United States";[2093] "any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State";[2094] and "any Title of Nobility".[2095] "Arms" suitable for the Militia constitutes one of these compendious categories.

To credit the contention that the meanings of "arming" and "Arms" were unalterably fixed as of 1788 and 1791 to include only such "Arms" as "the people" of that day brought to their Militia service, one would be obliged to accept two propositions bordering on the absurd:

(1) One would have to assume that, if Americans immediately after 1791 (or at any time during the entire pre-constitutional period, for that matter) had enjoyed access to modern firearms, they would not spontaneously have adopted them for their Militia service, and beyond that would even have denied the power of Congress or the States' legislatures to require them to keep and bear such "Arms" for that purpose. Yet, no doubt can exist that, as eminently practical people, Americans of that era would have adopted any "Arms" that could have improved the performance of their Militia. Indeed, although technology advanced slowly during the 1700s, the category "Arms" was not closed to significant improvements—as proven by the adoption of rifles in place of smoothbored muskets.[2096]

(2) One would have to assume that WE THE PEOPLE in the late 1700s intended through the Constitution to deny any right to possess new types of "Arms" to the very "Posterity" for whom they claimed to "provide for the common defence", to "secure the Blessings of Liberty", and to guarantee what is "necessary to the security of a free State".[2097] Yet WE THE PEOPLE surely knew that no self-denying ordinance in their own Constitution could withhold improvements in "Arms" from

---

[2091] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2092] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

[2093] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 6.

[2094] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8.

[2095] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1. Accord, U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8.

[2096] See ante, Chapter 7 (Rhode Island) and Chapter 19 (Virginia).

[2097] U.S. Const. preamble and amend. II.

whatever enemies might aggress against their "Posterity" in an uncertain future. Rather, they had to (and surely did) expect that such enemies, both foreign and domestic, would rush to adopt the most modern "Arms" possible, so as to make their aggressions effective. Which meant that, for "the common defence" and "the security of a free State", THE PEOPLE'S "Posterity" also needed access to such "Arms"—and well before any aggression occurred, so as to be able to deter it, if at all possible. Nothing suggests that the practical requirement for WE THE PEOPLE'S "Posterity" to be at least as well armed as any potential aggressors is any less imperative today than it was in America's Founding Era. Indeed, it has become of far greater concern in the present era than at any time in the past, because the technology of armaments, and the ability of industry to produce and distribute them are making more rapid strides now than ever before.

b. In more than one way, the Constitution recognizes that the "Arms" which "the people" enjoy "the right * * * to keep and bear" for Militia service must be up to date, and their effectiveness improved whenever and however possible in lockstep with technological developments:

(1) Congress's power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" and the Second Amendment's declaration, "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State", are both phrased in the present tense. What Congress is to "provide" at the present time must be available if it is to be "provide[d]"; and what is "necessary" at the present time must be capable of performing the assigned task at the present time, in the face of opposition that presumably will employ the best armaments available to it at the present time. Therefore, the most suitable, and thus the preferable, "Arms" for the Militia will be the very best armaments available at the present time. (Of course, if the best armaments are unavailable, then whatever happens to be at hand has to suffice.)

(2) The Constitution expects and encourages technological advances in all fields, including armaments, which it why it empowers Congress to "secur[e] for limited Times to * * * Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective * * * Discoveries".[2098] So, when Congress "make[s] all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution" its power "[t]o provide for * * * arming the Militia",[2099] it can—indeed, it must—see to it that the Militia are "arm[ed]" with the best armaments available at that time, which should be at least equivalent to the "Arms" the regular Armed Forces carry. And, for a while, this is what Congress did.

Originally, following the pre-constitutional pattern precisely, in 1792 Congress simply ordered

---

[2098] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 8.

[2099] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 18 and 16.

> [t]hat every citizen * * * enrolled [in the Militia] * * * shall, within six months thereafter, provide himself with a good musket or firelock, a sufficient bayonet and belt, two spare flints, * * * a pouch with a box therein to contain not less than twenty-four cartridges, suited to the bore of his musket or firelock, each cartridge to contain a proper quantity of powder and ball: or with a good rifle, * * * shot-pouch and powder-horn, twenty balls suited to the bore of his rifle, and a quarter of a pound of powder[.][2100]

As the technology of small arms advanced very little during the first half of the Nineteenth Century, these requirements were modified only slightly by 1874, when Congress ordained that

> [e]very citizen shall, after notice of his enrollment [in the Militia], be constantly provided with a good musket or firelock of a bore sufficient for balls of the eighteenth part of a pound, a sufficient bayonet and belt, two spare flints, * * * a pouch with a box therein to contain not less than twenty-four cartridges, suited to the bore of his musket or firelock, each cartridge to contain a proper quantity of powder and ball; or with a good rifle, * * * shot-pouch and powder-horn, twenty balls suited to the bore of his rifle, and a quarter of a pound of powder[.][2101]

Arguably, these specifications were partly obsolete at the time, because locks using percussion caps had replaced flintlocks in standard military arms even before the Civil War; and during that conflict firearms using so-called "fixed" ammunition composed of a copper or brass case, primer, powder, and bullet all combined in one cartridge became commonplace—sometimes as the result of the intervention of gifted amateurs in high office, such as President Abraham Lincoln's promotion of the Spencer repeating rifles and carbines.[2102] Yet this statute was at least capable of constitutional application; for it did not preclude any member of the Militia from arming himself with "a good musket" or "a good rifle" of some type more up-to-date than the flintlock.

In any event, between 1874 and 1903 major improvements in small arms came about—primarily, the adoption of repeating in place of single-shot rifles, the substitution of smokeless powder for black powder, and the introduction of jacketed bullets in spitzer configuration which enabled high-velocity ammunition to be produced. So, from 1874 to 1887, Congress appropriated money "for the purpose

---

[2100] An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, § 1, 1 Stat. 271, 271.

[2101] Revised Statutes of the United States (1873-1874), TITLE XVI, THE MILITIA, § 1628, 18 Stat. 285, 285.

[2102] See James M. McPherson, Tried by War: Abraham Lincoln as Commander in Chief (New York, New York: Penguin Books, 2009), at 191.

of providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, by and on account of the United States"[2103]—"arms and equipments" which presumably were superior to any "good musket or firelock" allowable under the Militia Act of 1792. Then, from 1887 to 1903, Congress authorized appropriations "for the purpose of providing arms, ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, and camp equipage for issue to the militia", with the requirement that "the purchase or manufacture" of this equipment "shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of War, as such arms, ordnance and quartermaster's stores and camp equipage are now manufactured or otherwise provided for the use of the Regular Army"[2104]—thus securing for the Militia a parity in basic personal armament with "the Regular Army". At last, in 1903 Congress authorized the Secretary of War > to issue, on the requisitions of the governors of the several States and Territories, or of the commanding general of the militia of the District of Columbia, such number of the United States standard service magazine arms, with bayonets * * * and such * * * necessary accouterments and equipments as are required for the Army of the United States, for arming all of the organized militia * * * and to exchange * * * ammunition * * * suitable to the new arms, round for round, for corresponding ammunition suitable to the old arms theretofore issued[.][2105]

In keeping with this historical pattern, today members of "the Militia of the several States" who are not exempted as conscientious objectors from being armed should have access to every type of rifle, handgun, and shotgun, including both *semi-*automatic and fully automatic rifles and machine pistols at least equivalent to the "standard service magazine arms" with which the regular Armed Forces are equipped.

[2103] Revised Statutes of the United States (1873-1874), TITLE XVI, THE MILITIA, § 1661, 18 Stat. 285, 290.

[2104] An act to amend section sixteen hundred and sixty-one of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia, Act of 12 February 1887, CHAP. 129, §§ 1 and 3, 24 Stat. 401, 401, 402. Continued with an increase in appropriations, An Act To amend section one of the Act of Congress approved February twelfth, eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, entitled "An Act To amend section one of the Act of Congress approved February twelfth, eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, entitled "An act to amend section sixteen hundred and sixty-one of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia", Act of 6 June 1900, CHAP. 805, 31 Stat. 662.

[2105] An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 13, 32 Stat. 775, 777. Congress also purported, however, to bifurcate the Militia into components unknown to American history and therefore to the Constitution—"the organized militia, to be known as the National Guard * * * , and the remainder to be known as the Reserve Militia"—and to provide for arming only "the organized militia". Compare Act of 21 January 1903, § 1, 32 Stat. at 775, with § 13, 32 Stat. at 777. This was the first time that a significant part of the Militia—indeed, the major part in terms of numbers—was not required to be armed. In effect, by affirmatively arming "the organized militia" while completely neglecting "the Reserve Militia" (or, as it was later styled, "the unorganized militia"), Congress created a "select militia" more narrowly exclusive than even Alexander Hamilton had recommended. See ante, at 786-793, and post, at 1435-1441.

c. In addition, that "the Militia of the several States" should always be equipped with the best "Arms" available at the time should not preclude them from developing and adopting even better "Arms". Rather, WE THE PEOPLE must have direct access, not only to "Arms" that are particularly suitable for the military and law-enforcement aspects of Militia service according to the standards of the day, and not only to various substitutes that THE PEOPLE can stockpile against any conceivable emergency arising in the future, but also to new types of firearms that exceed current military and police requirements. This, for two reasons, one political the other practical:

(1) In America "a Republican Form of Government"[2106] is "constructed on th[e] principle, that the Supreme Power resides in the body of the people",[2107] who are the true sovereigns[2108]—WE THE PEOPLE are "the Militia of the several States"—the salient characteristic of the Militia is that their members are armed—and "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[2109] Therefore, in order to maintain their political power as sovereigns in the face of every foreseeable vicissitude in the course of human events, THE PEOPLE by their own efforts in and through their Militia must be able continuously to increase the quantity and especially to improve the quality of the guns they possess. As a consequence of their sovereignty THE PEOPLE cannot be required to, and under the counsel of prudence never should, depend exclusively upon public officials to supply them with the "Arms" they need. For public officials may simply neglect or fail properly to perform their duty "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"[2110]—as they have since 1916, when Congress purported to divide the Militia into a "regularly enlisted" component consisting of the National Guard and the Naval Militia, on the one hand, and "the Unorganized Militia", on the other hand; and declared that, "while in the service of the United States" the National Guard would "stand discharged from the militia" and become part of "the Army of the United States".[2111] And public officials may even turn rogue, with the assistance of disloyal elements in a "standing army" or para-military police forces, and affirmatively seek to disarm THE PEOPLE.

(2) The Constitution allows Congress to promote the invention, perfection, and production of new types of "Arms" through the exercise of its powers "[t]o lay and collect Taxes * * * to * * * provide for the common Defence", to "secur[e] for

---

[2106] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2107] Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 457 (1793) (opinion of Wilson, J.).

[2108] See id. at 454, 456 (opinion of Wilson, J.), 471-472 (opinion of Jay, C.J.).

[2109] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2110] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2111] An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, §§ 1, 57, 58, 111, and 117, 39 Stat. 166, 166, 197, 211, 212.

limited Times to * * * Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective * * * Discoveries", "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", and "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers".[2112] This approach, however, can be successful only to a limited degree, because Congress simply cannot foresee, let alone "plan", what amount to evolutionary (let alone revolutionary) developments in firearms, ammunition, and related accoutrements that will depend largely upon a process of "natural selection" through experimental trial and error by the people in the field who will actually discover the need and work out designs for new equipment. In the long run, "central planning" for establishments as large, geographically dispersed, and diversified in activities as "the Militia of the several States" must prove no more workable than "central planning" in any other field of complex human endeavor.

Congress and the States' legislatures as well can best "provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" with the most technologically advanced and useful firearms by encouraging the freest and closest possible interaction between WE THE PEOPLE in the Militia and private manufacturers of arms. Far more than any legislators or bureaucrats, revitalized "Militia of the several States"—with membership in the tens of millions throughout the country, including large numbers of individuals with imagination, intelligence, and practical skills—with widely differing "homeland-security" missions and challenges in each State—with large discretionary budgets drawn from internal fines—with the ability and incentive to experiment—and capable of drawing upon the resources, expertise, and experience of the armaments industry—should be concerned with and capable of developing an extremely wide variety of new firearms, ammunition, accoutrements, and other equipment, as well as tactics for employing them in the most effective manner. But such a coöperative endeavor requires that THE PEOPLE be free to demand, and the manufacturers free to develop and distribute, whatever THE PEOPLE consider necessary for Militia service; and that the manufacturers be free to offer, and THE PEOPLE free to adopt, whatever the manufacturers devise that may prove useful for that purpose. Only with such freedom can emerge the on-going and even accelerating application of imagination, innovation, invention, and improvement with respect to the "Arms" that THE PEOPLE not only can possess but, more importantly, want to possess because they themselves have determined the need to possess such "Arms".

D. Errors as to "Arms" in the Supreme Court's majority opinion in District of Columbia v. Heller. The foregoing should put paid to the absurd suggestions explicitly or implicitly endorsed by every Justice of the Supreme Court that "the Second Amendment does not protect those weapons not typically possessed by law-abiding citizens for lawful purposes"; that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is somehow limited to "the sorts of weapons * * * 'in common use at the time'"; that "weapons that are most useful in military service—[fully automatic] M-16 rifles and the like—may be banned", even though "[i]t may well be true today that a militia, to be as effective as militias in the 18th century, would require sophisticated arms that are highly unusual in society at large"; and that these "limitation[s are] fairly supported by the historical tradition of prohibiting the carrying of 'dangerous and unusual weapons'".[2113] Yet something more should be added, because panegyrists for "gun control" doubtlessly will seize upon these loose assertions in order to continue to deny to most of "the people" the very firearms necessary for Militia service.

---

[2112] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 1, 8, 16, and 18.

1. The Justices failed to ask why certain types of firearms, and not others, happen to be "'in common use at th[is] time'" "by law-abiding citizens". For example, why are firearms "most useful in military service—M-16 rifles and the like" not "'in common use'" by average Americans today? The answer surely is not that such firearms are unsuitable for Militia service. Indeed, the Justices correctly presumed that such firearms would be eminently suitable for that purpose.

Rather, the answer is that: (i) Because of public officials' serial neglects, failures, and refusals to fulfill their "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution",[2114] "the Militia of the several States" are effectively nonexistent throughout America. (ii) As a result, common Americans are not required by statute (as they should be) to acquire and permanently to possess the "Arms" best suited for Militia service. Therefore, (iii) such "Arms" are not "typically possessed by law-abiding citizens for lawful purposes" and are not "'in common use at th[is] time'". In addition, (iv) various "gun-control" statutes drastically limit the supply of such "Arms" in the free market,[2115] and impose taxes and requirements for registration on average "law-abiding" Americans who desire to manufacture, distribute, and possess "Arms" of that type[2116]—restrictions that would not apply were the "Arms" in question being used "by law-abiding citizens" for the "lawful purposes" of "the Militia of the several States", because then those "Arms" would [2113] District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 625, 627 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court). These remarks, however, were mere obiter dicta, because "the right of the people to keep and bear" "weapons * * * most useful in military service" was not sub judice.

---

[2114] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[2115] See An Act To amend chapter 44 (relating to firearms) of title 18, United States Code, and for other purposes ("Firearms Owners' Protection Act"), Act of 19 May 1986, Pub. L. 99-308, § 102(9) [§ 922(o)(1)], 100 Stat. 449, 453; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 922(o)(1).

[2116] See AN ACT to amend title 18, United States Code, to provide for better control of the interstate traffic in firearms ("Gun Control Act of 1968"), Act of 22 October 1968, Pub. L. 90-618, TITLE II—MACHINE GUNS, DESTRUCTIVE DEVICES, AND CERTAIN OTHER FIREARMS, § 201 [§§ 5801, 5802, 5811, 5812, 5821, 5822, 5841, 5844, and 5845(a)(6) and (b)], 82 Stat. 1213, 1228-1231; now codified at 26 U.S.C. §§ 5801, 5802, 5811, 5812, 5821, 5822, 5841, 5844, and 5845(a)(6) and (b).

be involved in "a transfer to or by, or possession by or under the authority of * * * a State, or a department, agency, or political subdivision thereof",[2117] or would be "being imported or brought in for the use of * * * any State or possession or any political subdivision thereof".[2118] Thus, precisely that such "Arms" are not "'in common use'" constitutes a blatant "infringe[ment]" upon "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"—which renders the Supreme Court's misinterpretation of the Second Amendment based upon the absence of such "'common use'", not just a further, but even an aggravated, "infringe[ment]" of that "right".

Underlying this situation, no doubt, is that for many generations past (just as Joseph Story pointed out as early as the 1830s), "it cannot be disguised that, among the American people, there [has been and] is a growing indifference to any system of militia discipline, and a strong disposition, from a sense of its burdens, to be rid of all regulations".[2119] Whether they have willingly embraced or been unwittingly deceived by propaganda in favor of "gun control", all too many Americans have neglected, failed, or refused to recognize their constitutional duty to serve in the Militia, to possess "Arms" especially suitable for Militia service, and even to possess any "Arms" capable of being employed in that service. This apathy among the citizenry helps to explain how incompetent and rogue public officials have been able to get away with effectively suppressing the Militia for so long. Nonetheless, as long as the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution and the Second Amendment exist, private convenience and political prejudices cannot override "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" and particularly their constitutional duty to do so. Short of an actual constitutional Amendment, no amount of public acquiescence and even approbation—whether spontaneous and genuine or contrived by the subtle brainwashing of corrupt mass media—can license rogue officials of either the General Government or the States to claim a power to disarm the people in general on the grounds that many individuals already have been fooled into disarming themselves.

2. The majority of the Justices in Heller explicitly, and the minority implicitly, rather grotesquely twisted the "historical tradition" upon which all of them purported to rely. True enough, as Blackstone observed, under *pre-*constitutional English law "[T]HE offence of riding or going armed, with dangerous or unusual weapons, is a crime against the public peace, by terrifying the good people of the land; and is particularly prohibited by * * * statute * * * upon pain of forfeiture of the arms, and imprisonment during the king's pleasure".[2120] And as Hawkins elaborated on the subject, "any Justice of Peace may * * * bind all those [2117] 18 U.S.C. § 922(o)(2)(A).

---

[2118] 26 U.S.C. § 5844(1).

[2119] Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[2120] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 148-149.

to the Peace, who in his Presence * * * shall go about with unusual Weapons or Attendants, to the Terror of the People", and may grant "the Surety of the Peace" to any "Person [who] has just Cause to fear that another will * * * do him a corporal Hurt, as by killing or beating him, or that he will procure others to do him such Mischief".[2121] These descriptions, however, evidence that the concern at that time was not with "dangerous or unusual weapons" in and of themselves, or with such implements in the hands of responsible persons who employed them for legitimate purposes, but with individuals who went about with such weapons so "terrifying the good people of the land" that some of "the good people" could reasonably anticipate bodily harm if the armed interlopers were not restrained. The problem was not the character of the thing, but the lack of character of the person misusing it.

Hawkins also touched on this matter in his discussion of "affrays". "[T]he Word Affray", he explained, "in a legal Sense * * * is * * * a publick Offence, to the Terror of the People".[2122] And "in some Cases there may be an Affray where there is no actual Violence; as where a Man arms himself with dangerous and unusual Weapons, in such Manner as will naturally cause a Terror to the People".[2123] Yet, no one would incur any "Penalty * * * for assembling his Neighbours and Friends in his own House, against those who threaten to do him any Violence therein, because a Man's House is as his Castle".[2124] Neither was the mere "Wearing of Arms" an offense, "unless it be accompanied with such Circumstances as are apt to terrify the People"—so "Persons of Quality are in no Danger of offending * * * by wearing common Weapons * * * for their Ornament or Defence, in such Places, and upon such Occasions, in which it is the common Fashion to make use of them, without causing the least Suspicion of an Intention to commit any Act of Violence or Disturbance of the Peace"; and "Persons armed with privy [that is, concealed] coats of mail to the Intent to defend themselves against their Adversaries" did not violate the law, "because they do nothing in terrorem populi".[2125] Moreover, "no Person" would be liable "who arms himself to suppress dangerous Rioters, Rebels, or Enemies, and endeavours to suppress or resist such Disturbers of the Peace or Quiet of the Realm".[2126] And, of course, if a man might legitimately arm himself (and his "Neighbours and Friends", too) with "dangerous or unusual Weapons" for individual self-defense "against [his] Adversaries", and for collective self-defense against Rioters, Rebels, or Enemies", then he and others similarly situated must [2121] A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter LX, §§ 1 and 6, at 126, 127.

---

[2122] Id., Book I, Chapter LXIII, § 1, at 134.

[2123] Id., Book I, Chapter LXIII, § 4, at 135.

[2124] Id., Book I, Chapter LXIII, § 8, at 136.

[2125] Id., Book I, Chapter LXIII, § 9, at 136.

[2126] Id., Book I, Chapter LXIII, § 10, at 136.

already have had, or must have been able to acquire, lawful access to such weapons in the first place.

In his discussion "Of Riots, Routs, and unlawful Assemblies", Hawkins further observed "[t]hat Persons riding together on the Road with unusual Weapons, or otherwise assembling together in such a Manner as is apt to raise a Terror in the People, without any Offer of Violence to any one in Respect either of his Person or Possessions, are not properly guilty of a Riot, but only of an unlawful Assembly".[2127] For, he explained, "any Meeting whatsoever of great Numbers of People with such Circumstances of Terror, as cannot but endanger the Publick Peace, and raise Fears and Jealousies among the King's Subjects, seems properly to be called an unlawful Assembly; as where great Numbers, complaining of a common Grievance, meet together, armed in warlike Manner in order to consult together concerning the most proper Means for the Recovery of their Interests; for no one can foresee what may be the Event of such an Assembly".[2128] Once again, though, the gravamen of the problem was, not all assemblies of men who happened to be armed, but only those groups that, for whatever reasons, "assembl[ed] together in a Manner as is apt to raise a Terror in the People".

Now, no matter how in other situations the English prohibition against the employment of "dangerous or unusual Weapons" in perpetration of a "crime against the public peace" might have carried over into pre-constitutional American law, it plainly did not apply and could not have applied either: (i) in general, to rationalize broad prohibitions against the possession by common Americans of whole categories of "Arms"; or (ii) in particular, to render "well regulated Militia" effectively impossible by prohibitions directed towards those "Arms" specifically suitable for Militia service.

In general, the rule applied only to "dangerous or unusual Weapons" displayed or otherwise used by particular individuals in particular circumstances so as to "terrify[ ] the good people of the land"—typically, by creating some "just Cause to fear * * * a corporal Hurt" to a particular person or persons. By itself, an individual's mere possession of a purportedly "dangerous or unusual Weapon[ ]" was not enough to impose liability on him. Rather, some overt act "in terrorem populi" was necessary, too. In addition, the punishment for such an offence was forfeiture of the weapon the particular perpetrator improperly employed, not disarmament of "the good people" en masse. That some individual might misuse certain types of firearms or other weapons for criminal purposes never served as a pretext for disallowing possession of those implements to any class of law-abiding citizens—let alone as a rationalization for "gun control" of the modern variety that seeks to limit possession of all firearms to the regular Armed Forces and various civilian "law-enforcement agencies".

---

[2127] Id., Book I, Chapter LXV, § 4, at 157.

[2128] Id., Book I, Chapter LXV, § 9, at 158.

Moreover, carrying "dangerous or unusual Weapons" did not amount to a "crime against the public peace" when the weapons were employed for personal self-defense, either by an individual himself or even by assemblies of "Neighbors and Friends" gathered together in his home. Neither was the carrying of concealed arms (such as "privy coats of mail") for that purpose a "crime against the public peace", because being concealed they "do nothing in terrorem populi". And, besides personal self-defense, participation in collective self-defense "to suppress dangerous Rioters, Rebels, or Enemies" also constituted a legitimate reason for any citizen's carrying—and, indeed, actually using—"dangerous or unusual Weapons".

In particular, the rule could not possibly have applied, even in principle, to "dangerous or unusual Weapons" individuals possessed for purposes of their Militia service. This should be obvious just from comparison of the last-noted exception in favor of individuals' "suppress[ing] dangerous Rioters, Rebels, or Enemies" to the Constitution's recognition of the basic responsibilities of the Militia, drawn from pre-constitutional practices throughout America, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[2129] Because it was no "crime against the public peace" for individuals adventitiously to take up "dangerous or unusual Weapons" for those purposes, it could hardly have been a crime for them to do so in an organized fashion in the Militia—presumably, too, even if no statute had explicitly sanctioned such action.

Just as obviously, all Militiamen not exempted on the basis of conscientious objection were required to possess "dangerous * * * Weapons", although many of these, because of their ubiquity, were not "unusual". At least initially, however, rifles were both particularly "dangerous" and "unusual" in comparison to typical smoothbored muskets. Nonetheless, no one ever claimed that therefore common people should have been prohibited from possessing rifles. Indeed, it was precisely the common people's possession of rifles, and through that possession the perfection of the design by experimentation in day-to-day usage, that eventually made rifles sufficiently "[ ]usual" for Militia service. In addition, if during that era someone had invented a reliable rifle capable of firing modern metallic cartridges, initially such a firearm would have been both exceedingly "dangerous" and extremely "unusual". Indeed, had it been perfected, perhaps even the Ferguson breachloading rifle might at first have been considered such.[2130] Yet as quickly as any such firearm of improved design could have been produced in quantity, it would have been adopted by the Militia (and no doubt everyone else), thus making it anything but "unusual".

[2129] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2130] See ante, note 799.

Which compels the conclusion that no firearm that is superior to the firearms individuals carry for Militia service can be considered "unusual" in any permanent sense unless its cost of production remains so high as to render it simply unavailable in practice. That is, whether a particular firearm is truly "unusual" depends not only on how many happen to be extant at the present moment (the immediate supply), but also on how many are capable of being produced and distributed (the rate of production), or perhaps how many should be produced if any level of production were possible (the actual, albeit unsatisfied demand). Also questionable is whether such a superior firearm could be considered "unusual" as a matter of law if a statute required members of the Militia to possess it, even though, because of economic constraints, few had yet been able to do so.

Obviously, too, no Militia statute ever subjected members of the Militia, for any reason, to forfeiture of whatever firearms—no matter how "dangerous" or "unusual"—they brought to Militia service. To the contrary, the statutes generally immunized Militiamen's possession of their firearms from legal claims.[2131] If in principle under the legal theories of the day legislators could have outlawed private possession of "dangerous or unusual Weapons" across the board, in practice they never did so where such possession served the interests of the Militia. (The few prohibitions in effect in that era applied solely to hostile Indians, slaves, other persons of color, and disloyal individuals.[2132]) Rather, the Militia statutes required Militiamen to possess "dangerous * * * Weapons" and often further encouraged them to possess "unusual Weapons" suitable for Militia service. Thus, today, inasmuch as "the people" are the Militia, and inasmuch as "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" embodies the principles on which the *pre-*constitutional Militia operated, that "right" must embrace possession by "the people" of whatever "dangerous or unusual Weapons" "the people" find suitable for Militia service.

No less obviously, whatever firearms members of the Militia possessed in *pre-*constitutional times were never borne "against the public peace", but to secure it. No one could have imagined that the Militia were even capable of "terrifying the good people of the land", because they themselves made up most of "the good people". Thus, any American of that era would have rejected as absurd the modern-day notion that the people should be disarmed of "dangerous or unusual Weapons" in order to protect the public from the public.

Obviously as well, no "well regulated Militia" can ever constitute "an unlawful Assembly" (as Hawkins defined that term), because each and every such Militia assembles pursuant to—indeed, according to the direct commands of—law. Now, "the Militia of the several States" are constitutionally authorized "to execute the Laws of the Union", and to execute the laws of their respective States, too. So surely, when "complaining of a common Grievance", Militiamen are entitled to "meet together, armed in warlike Manner in order to consult together concerning the most proper Means for the Recovery of their interests" through exercise of their authority to execute the laws. In fact, every muster and other regular meeting of a Militia Company in revitalized "Militia of the several States" would be dedicated in part to this very purpose.[2133]

---

[2131] See ante, at 715-717 (Virginia).

[2132] See ante, at 297-302 (Rhode Island); 363-369, 468, and 733-742 (Virginia).

In one sense, any such Militia muster or meeting would amount to no more or no less than an exercise, albeit a formal one under specific statutory authority, of the constitutional right of all Americans "peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances".[2134] The peculiarity of this situation, however, is that, because the Militia are constituent parts of "the Government" at every level of the federal system, they need not necessarily wait for some other part of "the Government" to redress their "grievances", but in appropriate circumstances may themselves take direct remedial action on their own initiative. That is, their "petitions" can function as self-authorizations. In the most common cases, when public officials' misbehavior results from their mere incompetence or insouciance, it may suffice as a corrective for the Militia simply to admonish those officials or their superiors, who will then straighten out the situation on their own. When confronted with aggressive and adamantine rogue public officials, though, "a redress of grievances" will usually not be obtained simply by remonstrating with the malefactors to cease and make restitution for their very own wrongdoing, but only by removing them from their offices entirely. If WE THE PEOPLE as voters cannot accomplish this through the normal electoral process because the next elections are too far off and the danger to the public welfare is too serious and close at hand, then WE THE PEOPLE as the Militia must forcibly separate the rogue officials from their positions of power. Such action will not "endanger the Publick Peace"—for by breaking the law under color of the law the rogues will already have done that. Rather, it will restore "the Publick Peace" through the exercise of THE PEOPLE'S sovereign authority. For, as Hawkins himself explained, > in the Grant of every Office whatsoever, there is this Condition implied by common Reason, that the Grantee ought to execute it diligently and faithfully: For since every Office is instituted, not for the sake of the Officer, but for the good of some other, nothing can be more just, than that he, who either neglects or refuses to answer the End for which his Office was ordained, should give way to others who are both able and willing to take Care of it. And therefore it is certain, That an Officer is > liable to a Forfeiture of his Office, not only for doing a Thing directly contrary to the Design of it, but also for neglecting to attend his Duty at all usual, proper, and convenient Times and Places, whereby any Damage shall accrue to those, by or for whom he was made an Officer. * * * [I]t cannot but be very reasonable, That he who so far neglects a publick Office, as plainly to appear to take no manner of Care of it, should rather be immediately displaced, than the publick be in danger of suffering that Damage, which cannot but be expected some Time or other from his Negligence.[2135]

---

[2133] See ante, at 956-963 and 968.

[2134] U.S. Const. amend. I.

3. Notwithstanding all of this, it cannot be gainsaid that some contemporary Americans are frightened by some types of firearms—such as fully automatic rifles—in all instances, or by some types of firearms specifically in the hands of mere "civilians" as opposed to the regular Armed Forces and professional law-enforcement agencies. Irrational as fears of inanimate objects may be, and unreasonable as confidence in public officials and their myrmidons for protection has proven to be in society after society,[2136] these delusions lead the individuals suffering from them to accept at face value the strident propaganda and agitation touting "gun-free schools" and other "gun-free zones", "zero tolerance" for firearms, and kindred slogans designed for mass brainwashing in aid of mass disarmament through pervasive "gun control". These individuals apparently are unable to recognize the absurdity of seeking safety by dispossessing themselves as well as everyone else around them, except the very groups most likely to oppress them all, of the very implements essential for the operations of the only establishments that the Constitution declares are "necessary to the security of a free State". This combination of paranoia with myopia is particularly grotesque when the rationalization for "gun control" is "to save the children" (or some equivalently emotional fatuity), because the Preamble to the Constitution declares its concern for America's children down through the ages—namely, to "secure the Blessings of Liberty for ourselves and our Posterity"; and the Second Amendment attests that this goal can be achieved from generation to generation in "a free State" only through the agency of "well regulated Militia" in which all of "the people" exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms".

In the short run, though, nothing can be done with such individuals except to remind them as often as possible that the principles commonplace in defense of the freedoms protected by the First Amendment—which they themselves invoke when proselytizing in favor of "gun control"—fully apply to the Second Amendment, too. For example,

---

[2135] A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter LXVI, § 1, at 167-168.

[2136] See Rudolph J. Rummel, Death by Government: Genocide and Mass Murder in the Twentieth Century (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction Publishers, 1994).

• That "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" of one sort or another may be offensive to some—even to many—individuals cannot license public officials to "infringe[ ]" it.[2137]

• That some individuals are afraid of certain types of firearms is not sufficient to override "the right of the people to keep and bear [such] Arms".[2138]

• The desire to prevent the commission of crimes cannot license public officials to "infinge[ ]" upon "the right of the people to keep and bear [particular types of] Arms".[2139]

• That the availability of certain types of firearms in society might inspire some unidentified individuals to commit crimes with such firearms at some time in the indefinite future cannot rationalize "infring[ing]" upon "the right of [all] the people to keep and bear [those types of] Arms" now.[2140]

• "[T]he right of [all of] the people to keep and bear [particular types of] Arms" cannot be "infringed" simply because some individuals may keep and bear arms of those types for the purpose of doing wrong.[2141] And,

• Public officials can deny an individual "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" of any variety only if he is actually misusing those "Arms" in some lawless fashion.[2142]

On the other hand, in particular contexts some types of firearms may justifiably inspire concern. For instance, center-fire rifles loaded with high-velocity ammunition are arguably overpowered for personal self-defense, and thereby pose [2137] Compare Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726, 745 (1978) ("that society may find speech offensive is not a sufficient reason for suppressing it"). Accord, Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678, 701 (1977). See, e.g., Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518, 527 (1972); Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 22-25 (1971); Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415, 419 (1971).

---

[2138] Compare Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503, 508 (1969) ("undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance is not enough to overcome the right to freedom of expression").

[2139] Compare Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 245 (2002) ("[t]he prospect of crime * * * by itself does not justify laws suppressing protected speech").

[2140] Compare id. at 253 ("[t]he mere tendency of speech to encourage unlawful acts is not a sufficient reason for banning it"), citing inter alia Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105, 108 (1973).

[2141] Compare Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 255 (2002) ("[p]rotected speech does not become unprotected merely because it resembles the latter").

[2142] Compare Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969) (advocacy of the use of force can be suppressed only when it "is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action").

a distinct danger when so employed in highly populated urban and suburban environments. Yet, in those same areas, such rifles would be necessary for collective self-defense against usurpation, insurrection, or invasion. So, to deny "the right of the people" in cities and dense suburbs "to keep and bear [such] Arms" would entail destroying the effectiveness of the Militia for their primary purposes, simply because those "Arms" were not entirely suitable for a secondary purpose. Moreover, the straightforward solution to the problem would be thoroughly to train Militiamen in those areas in the properly restricted use of such "Arms", while providing them with other "Arms" more suitable for individual self-defense in densely populated areas, such as handguns with ammunition of law penetrative power.

E. All "Arms" potentially suitable for some service in revitalized Militia. That essentially all working firearms are in some ways suitable for some types of Militia service is a conclusion which will have significant consequences when "the Militia of the several States" are revitalized.

1. Use by "the people" of the "Arms" they already possess. Ideally, Militia "Arms" should satisfy some rigorous standards. Obviously preferable would be for Militiamen's firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements to be designed specifically for "military" usage, to be up to date in every way, to be of first-class quality, and to be produced in quantities sufficient to supply everyone. In practice, however, these standards are unlikely to be met in the initial stages of revitalization of the Militia. For most Americans today do not possess such firearms; and it will take time for manufacturers to design, produce, and distribute enough of that equipment to meet the Militia's needs. Nonetheless, the Militia must be revitalized as soon as practicable, which will require providing at least minimally suitable "Arms" for "the people to keep and bear" now.

The only way this can be accomplished is for "the people" to use the firearms they actually have at hand. Common Americans today possess hundreds of millions of firearms, and a huge supply of ammunition. Admittedly, many of these firearms are not of purely "military" type; and of the ones that are, many are of old designs. Yet, "in a pinch", all of them could find some useful employment in the Militia. After all, the suitability of a particular firearm for some intended service depends upon circumstances, the most important of which is its availability. If a firearm is not at hand, it cannot be used for any purpose. And if it is the only one available, it will have to be put to use for whatever purpose needs to be accomplished.

Reliance upon the firearms "the people" already possess during the initial period of revitalization of the Militia would fit the *pre-*constitutional pattern. In that era, explicitly or implicitly the Militia statutes called upon Militiamen to bring to their service the best firearms they could obtain—whether these were "military"-grade arms in their original design, or "dual-purpose" or "civilian" arms that could be put to or modified for "military" use. In the final analysis, because almost all working firearms in those days could have served some Militia purpose, availability became the test of suitability.

For example, Rhode Island looked to her Militiamen to arm themselves properly, relying in the first instance on their own sound judgment. Sometimes the statutes afforded them a specific choice of arms—that they were to appear "complete in arms * * * with a good or sufficient muskett or fuse" (1701);{EN-1993} or "with a sufficient Gun, or Fuzee" (1774);{EN-1994} or "with a good Fire-Arm * * * or * * * a Rifle-Gun" (1778).{EN-1995} At other times, the statutes mandated more generally that each and every Militiaman should appear "with a good fire-arm" (1776);{EN-1996} or "with one good Musquet" (1779 and 1781);{EN-1997} or with "a good Gun, being his own Property" (1781).{EN-1998} And at still other times, the statutes were even less specific, requiring Militiamen to appear "with arms and ammunition" or simply "Arms" (1701, 1705, and 1755);{EN-1999} or "completely with arms and ammunition" (1775){EN-2000}—thereby presuming that the men themselves would know perfectly well what was wanted without being told once again. In some instances, the statutes did explicitly call upon Militiamen to appear "with one good Musket, or Fuzee * * * to the satisfaction of the * * * Officers of the Company" (1718, 1730, 1744, and 1766).{EN-2001} This safeguard was doubtlessly implicit in all of the legislation, however. For a Militiaman was hardly "armed" if his firearm was not sufficiently "good" to satisfy an officer who knew the difference between "good" and "bad". But, in any event, reviewing officers would have had to be satisfied with even a merely marginally "good" firearm if that was all the man had, or could afford, and the Town or the Militia itself could not supply him with something better.

Similarly, in Virginia the statutes presumed that each of her Militiamen would bring to his service a suitable firearm, by requiring simply that each one of them be provided or furnished with "a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed" (1705, 1723, and 1738);{EN-2002} "a firelock well fixed" (1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771);{EN-2003} "a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise * * * a * * * common firelock" (1775);{EN-2004} "a rifle * * * or good fire-lock" (1777);{EN-2005} or "a good clean musket * * * provided, that the militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining thereto, shall not be obliged to be armed with muskets, but may have good rifles" (1784 and 1785).{EN-2006}

Virginia's statutes went even further than Rhode Island's in their specificity as to this matter, though, providing "[t]hat eighteen months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition [required by the statute] * * * So as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters with such arms as he is already furnished with" (1723 and 1738);{EN-2007} "[t]hat twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition [required by the statute] * * * , so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with" (1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771);{EN-2008} "[t]hat the soldiers shall be allowed six months after enlisting to provide themselves with arms [as required by the statute], and in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have" (1775);{EN-2009} and "[t]hat twelve months" or "two years" "after the commencement of th[e statutes] shall be allowed for providing the arms and accoutrements * * * directed; but in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them the best arms and accoutrements they can get" (1784 and 1785).{EN-2010}

Thus, throughout the pre-constitutional period, the statutes set standards for firearms that Militiamen initially could meet with the firearms they already possessed or were able easily to acquire on their own. These might not have been the absolutely best firearms for the purpose; but as long as they were suitable to a reasonable degree they were satisfactory, until Militiamen were in a position to replace them with something better.

2. The "Arms" that "the people" already possess to be immunized against "gun control". The same practice should be applied today. Indeed, adopting this practice, properly adapted to modern conditions, would materially assist in revitalizing "the Militia of the several States", because it would provide a very strong incentive for the tens of millions of Americans who own firearms to press for revitalization.

a. Patriotic Americans detest and fear "gun control", some insightfully and the rest implicitly recognizing that its proponents aim at nothing less than the thoroughly unconstitutional goal of confiscating all firearms and ammunition in private hands, and prohibiting the future possession of firearms, except under the most stringent controls, by anyone not in the Armed Forces or various ostensibly "civilian" para-militarized "law-enforcement agencies". Yet, as utterly at odds with the true construction of the Second Amendment as well as the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution as typical "gun-control" schemes are, common Americans can do little as isolated individuals to protect themselves, if the General Government's courts in duplicitous opinions uphold those purported statutes and regulations as supposedly valid exercises of Congress's powers "[t]o lay and collect Taxes"[2143] and "[t]o regulate Commerce * * * among the several States".[2144]

It is useless to protest that the Supreme Court has recently upheld the right of private citizens, under both the Second and the Fourteenth Amendments, to possess certain types of firearms for purposes of individual self-defense in their own homes.[2145] For these were bare five-to-four decisions, which can easily be reversed

---

[2143] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[2144] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

[2145] See District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court); McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. ___ (2010) (Alito, J., announcing the judgment of the Court).

upon the replacement on the Bench of a single Justice, or even the mere change of mind of a single Justice now sitting, whenever a new case comes up for review. Moreover, no change in the composition of the Court or revision in the thinking of any Justice is necessary to continue the enforcement of all sorts of draconian "gun controls" already on the books, which the Justices who heard those cases went out of their way unanimously to approve in principle.[2146] And advocates of "gun control" will tirelessly endeavor to extrapolate from these judicial encomia the rationales for enactment of ever more, and ever more comprehensive and draconian, statutes and regulations that will advance their goal of depriving as many common Americans as possible of as many firearms as possible as soon as possible.

Once the Militia have been revitalized, though, their members will no longer be mere "private individuals" as against the General Government, but instead will be officials of the governments of their respective States—exercising constitutional authority reserved to the States both in the original Constitution, with its incorporation of "the Militia of the several States" into its federal structure, and in the Second and Tenth Amendments—and against whom in that capacity Congress cannot direct its powers "[t]o lay and collect Taxes" or "[t]o regulate Commerce". Rather, once the Militia are revitalized, the only "gun control" that Congress may put into practice will be to exercise its power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia"[2147] so as to guarantee that, somehow or other, all eligible Americans are in permanent personal possession of firearms and ammunition suitable for Militia service. In addition (for what it may be worth), once the Militia have been revitalized, District of Columbia v. Heller and those judicial decisions following it will become irrelevant as well as erroneous, because Heller derived the so-called "individual right" it upheld—along with the limitations on that right it purported to approve—from a misreading of the Second Amendment which expressly eschewed any reliance upon the clause "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State".[2148]

b. Over the years, Congress has repeatedly recognized the immunity from typical forms of "gun control" enjoyed by the States and their Militia, or law-enforcement personnel or agencies who or which would become integral parts of "the Militia of the several States" were the latter properly revitalized today. For example—

> • [1927] "[P]istols, revolvers, and other firearms capable of being concealed on the person are hereby declared to be nonmailable, and shall

---

[2146] See District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. at 624-628 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court) (dicta); McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. at ___ (2010) (Alito, J., announcing the judgment of the Court), Slip Opinion at 39-40 (dicta). The dissenting Justices in these cases, of course, wandered even farther off course.

[2147] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2148] See 554 U.S. at 576-600 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

not be deposited in or carried by the mails * * * : Provided, That such articles may be conveyed in the mails, * * * for use in connection with their official duty, to officers of the * * * Militia of the several States[.]"[2149]

• [1934] "This Act shall not apply to the transfer of firearms (1) to * * * any State * * * or to any political subdivision thereof * * * ; (2) to any peace officer[.]"[2150]

• [1938] "The provisions of this Act shall not apply with respect to the transportation, shipment, receipt, or importation of any firearm, or ammunition, sold or shipped to, or issued for the use of, * * * any State * * * or any department, independent establishment, or agency thereof; * * * any duly commissioned officer or agent of * * * a State * * * or any political subdivision thereof[.]"[2151]

• [1968] "The provisions of this chapter shall not apply with respect to the transportation, shipment, receipt, or importation of any firearm or ammunition imported for, or sold or shipped to, or issued for the use of * * * any State * * * or any department, agency, or political subdivision thereof."[2152]

• [1968] "The provisions of this chapter shall not apply with respect to the transportation, shipment, receipt, or importation of any firearm or ammunition imported for, or sold or shipped to, or issued for the use of * * * any State * * * or any department, agency, or political subdivision thereof."[2153]

• [1968] "A firearm may be transferred without the payment of the transfer tax * * * to any State * * * , any political subdivision thereof, or any official police organization of such a government entity engaged in criminal investigations." And "[a] firearm may be made without payment of the making tax * * * by, or on behalf of, any State, * * * any political

---

[2149] An Act Declaring pistols, revolvers, and other firearms capable of being concealed on the person nonmailable and providing penalty, Act of 8 February 1927, CHAP. 75, 44 Stat. 1059, 1059.

[2150] AN ACT To provide for the taxation of manufacturers, importers, and dealers in certain firearms and machine guns, to tax the sale or other disposal of such weapons, and to restrict importation and regulate interstate transportation thereof ("National Firearms Act"), Act of 26 June 1934, CHAPTER 757, § 13, 48 Stat. 1236, 1240.

[2151] AN ACT To regulate commerce in firearms ("Federal Firearms Act"), Act of 30 June 1938, CHAPTER 850, § 4, 52 Stat. 1250, 1252.

[2152] AN ACT To assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes ("Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Acts of 1968"), Act of 19 June 1968, Pub. L. 90-351, TITLE IV—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 902 [§ 925(a)], 82 Stat. 197, 233.

[2153] AN ACT To amend title 18, United States Code, to provide for better control of the interstate traffic in firearms ("Gun Control Act of 1968"), Act of 22 October 1968, Pub. L. 90-618, TITLE I—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 101 [§ 925(a)(1)], 82 Stat. 1213, 1224.

subdivision thereof, or any official police organization of such a government entity engaged in criminal investigations."[2154]

• [1986] "[I]t shall be unlawful for any person to transfer or possess a machinegun", except that "[t]his subsection does not apply with respect to * * * a transfer to or by, or possession by or under the authority of * * * a State, or a department, agency, or political subdivision thereof[.]"[2155]

• [1990] "It shall be unlawful for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone", except that this prohibition "shall not apply to the possession of a firearm * * * if the individual possessing the firearm is licensed to do so by the State in which the school zone is located or a political subdivision of the State", or "by a law enforcement officer acting in his or her official capacity".[2156]

• [1994] "It shall be unlawful for a person to manufacture, transfer, or possess a semiautomatic assault weapon", except that this prohibition "shall not apply to * * * the manufacture for, transfer to, or possession by * * * a State or a department, agency, or political subdivision of a State, or a transfer to or possession by a law-enforcement officer employed by such an entity for purposes of law enforcement (whether on or off duty)". And "[i]t shall be unlawful for a person to transfer or possess a large capacity ammunition feeding device", except that this prohibition "shall not apply to * * * the manufacture for, transfer to, or possession by * * * a State or a department, agency, or political subdivision of a State, or a transfer to or possession by a law-enforcement officer employed by such an entity for purposes of law enforcement (whether on or off duty)".[2157]

• [1996] "It shall be unlawful for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm that has moved in or that otherwise affects interstate or foreign commerce at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone", except that this prohibition "does not apply to the possession of a firearm * * * if the individual possessing the firearm is licensed to do so by the State in which the school zone is

---

[2154] Act of 22 October 1968, TITLE II—MACHINE GUNS, DESTRUCTIVE DEVICES, AND CERTAIN OTHER FIREARMS, § 201 [§ 5853(a) and (b)], 82 Stat. at 1233-1234.

[2155] An Act To amend chapter 44 (relating to firearms) of title 18, United States Code, and for other purposes ("Firearms Owners' Protection Act"), Act of 19 May 1986, Pub. L. 99-308, § 102 [§ 922(o)(1) and (2)], 100 Stat. 449, 453.

[2156] An Act To control crime ("Crime Control Act of 1990"), Act of 29 November 1990, Pub. L. 101-647, TITLE XVII—GENERAL PROVISIONS, § 1702 ("Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990") [§ 922(q)(1)(A) and (B)(ii) and (vi)], 104 Stat. 4789, 4844.

[2157] An Act To control and prevent crime ("Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994"), Act of 13 September 1994, Pub. L. 103-322, TITLE XI—FIREARMS, Subtitle A—Assault Weapons, §§ 110102 and 110103 [§ 922(v)(1) and (4)(A) and (w)(1) and (3)(A)], 108 Stat. 1796, 1996-1997, 1999.

located or a political subdivision of the State", or "by a law enforcement officer acting in his or her official capacity".[2158]

This immunity derives primarily from three principles: (i) Almost all "gun control" issuing from the General Government is predicated upon purported exercises of Congress's powers "[t]o lay and collect Taxes" and "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States".[2159] But (ii) the General Government cannot tax the States or their instrumentalities, because "the power to tax involves the power to destroy",[2160] and the General Government has no authority to destroy the States, by taxation or otherwise.[2161] And (iii) the States and their instrumentalities do not constitute "Commerce", and therefore cannot be regulated as such.[2162] So this immunity is constitutionally absolute.

c. The procedure for immunizing from control by the General Government (other than the power of Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia") the firearms already in common Americans' possession, as well as firearms they might acquire in the future, would be straightforward:

• Once the Militia were revitalized, every able-bodied American from (say) sixteen to fifty or fifty-five years of age would be required perforce of a State statute to enroll. Those from fifty or fifty-five years of age upwards would not be compelled to enroll, but could voluntarily do so. Every individual so enrolled could then immunize all of the firearms he possessed (and, presumably, owned) simply by dedicating pro tempore those firearms to Militia service.

• The Local Committee of Safety[2163] would supply a standard form on which every individual Militiaman would list his firearms, describing each one by reference to its manufacturer, model, caliber, and serial number. In addition, the Militiaman could list various special accessories in service with his particular firearms, such as magazines, optical sights, night-vision devices, slings, bipods, spare parts, and specialized tools for take-down and repair.

• Once completed, this form would be executed by the Militiamen and notarized (or otherwise legally witnessed), and a tab imprinted with an

---

[2158] An Act Making omnibus consolidated appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1997, and for other purposes, Act of 30 September 1996, TITLE VI—GENERAL PROVISIONS, § 657 [§ 922(q)(1)(A) and (B)(ii) and (vi)], 110 Stat. 3009, 3009-370 to 3009-371.

[2159] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 2 and 3.

[2160] McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 316, 431 (1819).

[2161] See post, at 1456-1462.

[2162] See post, at 1462-1470.

[2163] See post, at 1271-1273.

unique serial number (also appropriately witnessed) would be detached and filed with the Local Committee of Safety. This tab would neither contain any information about any particular firearm, nor identify the particular individual submitting it, but: (i) would serve as conclusive evidence in any future proceeding of the completion of the form on a particular date, and the correctness of its contents with respect to all of the firearms listed thereupon; and (ii) would officially dedicate those firearms to that individual's Militia service as of that date. The individual who completed the form would retain it in his own safekeeping, to be brought forth if ever it were necessary to establish which firearms and related equipment he had dedicated to that service and when.

• As of the date the form was notarized, the firearms so listed would no longer be subject to "gun control" by the General Government (or, of course, by the State, which would hardly pursue a course of "gun control" after revitalizing her Militia), because they would then have been transformed from individual into Militia firearms, and thus into instrumentalities of the State herself, the possession of which by her citizens within "[a] well regulated Militia" the Constitution itself declares "necessary to the security of a free State".

• Any firearm and equipment an individual acquired later on could also be dedicated to his Militia service by filing an additional form at that time. Conversely, any firearm that had once been so dedicated could be returned to the individual's mere private possession. And if a firearm once dedicated to Militia use were sold, given away, permanently removed from the State, lost, or stolen, it would have to be officially deleted from that individual's list (unless and until returned or recovered).

• No limit would be imposed on the types or numbers of firearms an individual could dedicate to his Militia service, because: (i) under circumstances as they might arise any firearm might prove useful to him for that purpose; and (ii) even if someone possessed more firearms than he might need for his own Militia service at any particular moment, at a later date he might help to provide for the common defense by transferring possession of some of those firearms to others, in the meantime serving as a kind of "home arsenal" in his neighborhood.

• The same form would allow the preparer to record that he was maintaining personal possession of ammunition of calibers suitable for use in the firearms identified on the form. No requirement would exist for him to state what quantities or types of ammunition were involved, because the Militia would desire to encourage its members to operate, with the minimum amount of "red tape", according to the precept that "one can never have too much ammunition". Thus, all supplies of ammunition in citizens' hands, large or small, would be immunized from "gun control".

Obviously, once publicized as a key provision of the initial statute to revitalize the Militia, this plan should be expected to generate immense support from owners of firearms.

CHAPTER FORTY

Every individual possibly eligible for service in "the Militia of the several States" must enjoy untrammeled access to a free market in which to obtain whatever firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements may to any degree prove useful for such service.

It is not enough to assert that every individual possibly eligible to be a member of "the Militia of the several States" may acquire, possess, and own as of right whatever firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements are suitable for any type of Militia service. Adequate and permanent sources of that equipment must be identified and secured as well. The primary source must be the free market.

A. A primary reliance on the free market for arming the Militia the pre-constitutional pattern. This, of course, is not simply idle "conjecture, supposition, or mere reasoning on the meaning or intention of the writing" in the Constitution,[2164] but instead the proper interpretation of that document based upon undeniable pre-constitutional legal history.

1. During the entire pre-constitutional era, most Americans obtained the firearms and ammunition necessary for their Militia service through private purchases in the free market. Nowhere throughout America did any of the relevant statutes order most (or even many) Militiamen to be supplied with public arms that they then kept in their private homes, let alone to repair to some public arsenal, magazine, or other facility in order to retrieve public arms, and then to return those arms to such a place after they had performed their Militia service. Rather, in the overwhelming majority of cases, the firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements each able-bodied adult free male (not otherwise exempted) was required to obtain and thereafter permanently to possess in his own home in order to fulfill his Militia duties were to be his own personal property, which he was to purchase for himself in the free market if he were financially capable of doing so—not equipment manufactured, supplied, owned, or controlled by any level of government or by any public official.

Of course, some exceptional situations did exist. When individuals were too poor to acquire firearms through their own efforts, the Militia (through fines imposed on defaulters) or Local governments (through general taxes) might supply, and then possibly control access to, the necessary equipment. For example, in 1776 Rhode Island provided that > • "each town" should supply all of its "inhabitants * * * who are not able to purchase" arms "with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box, at such town's expense, to be lodged with the captains of such district wherein such poor persons belong, for their use upon any proper occasion";{EN-2011} and

---

[2164] See Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. (12 Peters) 657, 723 (1838).

>
> • "the Colony" would purchase "Two Thousand Stand of good Fire-Arms", to be "distributed to each Town, in Proportion to the Number of Polls upon the Alarm List therein", with the Town Councils "to determine what Persons * * * shall have the Benefit and Use of the Arms provided * * * , and be exempted from providing themselves as the Law requires".{EN-2012}

Similarly, throughout the 1700s, small portions of Virginia's Militiamen who had not armed themselves were issued public arms for active service during certain emergencies:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, 1753, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[I]t may be needful, in time of danger, to arm part of the militia, not otherwise sufficiently provided, out of his majesty's magazine, and other stores, within this colony[.]" {EN-2013}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he militia or volunteers * * * , if not well armed, shall be furnished with arms out of such as belong to the county or corporation, to be returned as soon as they shall be discharged from the service."{EN-2014}
>
> • [1777] "The several divisions of the militia of any county shall be called into duty by regular rotation * * * . The soldiers of such militia, if not well armed and provided with ammunition, shall be furnished with the arms and ammunition of the county, and any deficiency in these may be supplied from the publick magazines, or if the case admit not that delay, by impressing arms and ammunition of private property, which ammunition, so far as not used, and arms, shall be duly returned, as soon as they may be spared."{EN-2015}

Even in these extraordinary situations, legislators expected the remainder of the Militiamen to be "otherwise sufficiently provided" and "well armed" by their own efforts and through their own resources, as the Militia laws applicable to normal times required. Importantly, too, in all of these cases, public arms were merely supplements or complements to private arms. Furthermore, there being next to no public arsenals or other manufacturing facilities in America during the *pre-*constitutional period, the various Colonial and State governments were only very infrequently the original sources of public arms, but instead generally purchased them in the first place in the Colonial free market, or obtained them from Britain, where the free market was the underlying source of arms, too.[2165]

2. Self-evidently, the veritable legion of legislators who enacted, reënacted, and reënacted yet again these statutes during the late 1600s and throughout the 1700s could never have expected most Militiamen

> • to arm themselves—for instance, to "find themselves armes" (Rhode Island, 1665);{EN-2016} "to accoutre themselves with * * * carbine and pistol" (Rhode Island, 1701);{EN-2017} "to provide himself with Arms, and other Accoutrements" (Rhode Island, 1755);{EN-2018} "to equip himself completely with arms and ammunition" (Rhode Island, 1755);{EN-2019} "to equip themselves with a good fire-arm" (Rhode Island, 1776);{EN-2020} and to "provide, and at all times be furnished, at his own Expence * * * with one good Musquet" (Rhode Island, 1779);{EN-2021} or
>
> • to bring to their service the arms the laws specified—for instance, "such arms as he is already furnished with" (Virginia, 1723 and 1738);{EN-2022} "such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with" (Virginia, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771);{EN-2023} "a good rifle, if to be had" (Virginia, 1775);{EN-2024} "such arms as they have" (Virginia, 1775);{EN-2025} "a good Gun, being his own Property" (Rhode Island, 1781);{EN-2026} and "the best arms and accoutrements they can get" (Virginia, 1784 and 1785),{EN-2027}

if no permanent, reliable, efficient, and convenient source had existed from which one generation of Militiamen after another could readily have obtained such arms. Similarly, those selfsame legislators could never have expected either the Militia as institutions or Local governments to have been able to acquire and distribute whatever additional firearms and ammunition might have become necessary in exceptional situations (for example, to supply Militiamen too poor to purchase their own arms), had no such source been available from which Militia officers and public functionaries could have acquired that equipment. Thus, all of the Militia laws and related statutes of that period presupposed, depended upon, encouraged, and implicitly protected against interference common Americans' and even their governments' access to a widespread, vibrant, and thoroughly free market in firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service. No statute of that era ever questioned the usefulness of, let alone attempted to constrain or suppress, the free market in arms. Instead, every statute implicitly took for granted, not only that the free market was adequate for the purpose of arming the Militia, but also that it was preferable to any other source of the equipment necessary to make the Militia workable establishments in all but one of the Colonies and then in every independent State.

[2165] E.g., see ante, at 451-456 (Virginia).

More than that, the *pre-*constitutional Militia laws must also have strengthened a free market in, and private ownership and possession of, both types and amounts of firearms and ammunition other those that were or could have been used for actual service in the Militia. For once the network linking suppliers of raw materials to manufacturers, to merchants, and to customers was established, it could have provided and in fact did provide whatever arms free men as consumers desired, for both public and private uses.

3. So, had the term been in then-current usage, "gun control" in the *pre-*constitutional era would have meant that: (i) the Colonial and State governments required just about every able-bodied adult free male within their jurisdictions to obtain from the free market a firearm and ammunition suitable for Militia service; and (ii) in order to effectuate and facilitate the latter policy, the governments encouraged—and certainly took no actions to impede—a free market in arms for all of their citizens. Confounding those modern ultra-"libertarians" who suppose governmental "regulation" to be necessarily antithetical to "economic freedom", the market for arms during the *pre-*constitutional period was far freer than that market is today, not because legislators in those times refrained from "regulating" common Americans' acquisition, possession, ownership, and use of firearms, ammunition, and related accoutrements, but precisely because the success of their comprehensive "regulation" of the Militia necessitated a market as widespread and efficient, and therefore as free, as it could be. That is, a free market in arms was part and parcel of "regulation" of the Militia; and "regulation" of the Militia reciprocally guaranteed a free market in arms. What Americans came to know as "well regulated Militia" were establishments in the operations of which a free market in arms was not just coincidental or optional, but instead unavoidably necessary, integral, and therefore mandatory in both a practical and a legal sense.

B. A primary reliance on the free market for arming the Militia now constitutionally required. Thus, today, because "the Militia of the several States" and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" have advanced from a statutory to a constitutional foundation, reliance on the free market for "arming * * * the Militia" and for securing "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is constitutionally mandatory, too, and therefore cannot be overridden by any mere statute.

1. During the *pre-*constitutional era, public officials' disinclination, if not disability, to interfere with the free market in arms was a consequence of the duty of almost all of the members of the Militia to provide and thereafter permanently to possess their own firearms and ammunition. On its face, that was a statutory duty—although its origin, justification, and even compulsory nature can be traced to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", and particularly to the responsibility of every government exercising "just powers" to provide adequate safeguards to "secure" to its citizens the "unalienable Rights" of "Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness"[2166]—which duty, in a self-governing community, the people themselves must fulfill through some form of Militia. Yet, even if noninterference by public officials with the operations of the free market for arms had not been deemed perforce of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" a truly "constitutional" principle during pre-constitutional times, it certainly was a statutory practice of very long standing and the utmost consistency, which became a constitutional principle when the original Constitution incorporated "the Militia of the several States" as integral and permanent parts of its federal structure,[2167] and then the Second Amendment declared "[a] well regulated Militia * * * necessary to the security of a free State". For inasmuch as the practical definition and operation of "Militia" during the pre-constitutional period included every able-bodied adult free man's access to a free market in firearms and ammunition suitable for his Militia service—and, reciprocally, public officials' disability to interfere with that access or that market—both became part and parcel of the definition of "Militia" in the Constitution.

On this basis, "[a] well regulated Militia" the Second Amendment contemplates is one the members of which can both first obtain and then maintain in readiness for immediate service all of their basic equipment through the free market. Therefore, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" includes not only the right of all of "the people" to acquire, possess, and employ "Arms", but also the right of some of "the people" to design, manufacture, distribute, sell, and repair "Arms" for everyone else's use. For how could "the people" have a "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" if they could not acquire them in the first instance by their own actions? How could "the people" acquire "Arms" that were not readily available to them? How could "Arms" be available to "the people" that were not produced for and distributed to them? And what purpose would it serve for "the people to keep and bear" unserviceable or outdated "Arms"?

2. The inclusion of access to a free market for "Arms" in the definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" neither the General Government nor any State can now deny or modify, absent some constitutional Amendment. As the mass of pre-constitutional Militia statutes renders undeniable, the term "well regulated Militia" "was not one 'of uncertain meaning when incorporated into the Constitution. What it meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation.'"[2168] Moreover, if one correctly concludes that WE THE PEOPLE'S right and duty to engage in collective self-defense against usurpation and tyranny are absolute, and therefore cannot be denied or even

---

[2166] Declaration of Independence.

[2167] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[2168] See Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 365 (1932), quoting Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 227 (1920). Accord, e.g., South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 448 (1905).

questioned by any "just government",[2169] then not even a constitutional Amendment can change that definition.

3. In particular, because the definition of "[a] well regulated Militia" cannot now be changed,

- whenever Congress enacts "necessary and proper" legislation in order "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia",[2170] it must rely as much as practicable on America's free market in armaments—for the controlling standard of "necess[ity] and prop[riety]" in that regard is the historical one;

- whenever possible in other legislation—as, for example, under its authority "[t]o lay and collect Taxes", "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States", and "[t]o promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts"[2171]—Congress must take appropriate action to facilitate and improve the workings of that market;

- Congress may not itself interfere, or suffer any agency of the General Government or the several States to interfere for any reason with the free market's provision of the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements necessary for the Militia's and operations;[2172]

- as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States", the President must especially ensure that the Constitution and laws in this regard are scrupulous enforced, under his duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed";[2173] and

- so, too, for the several States' legislatures and governors within their own respective jurisdictions.

C. A primary reliance on the free market for arming the Militia the politically prudent course. Even if a primary reliance on the free market for "arming * * * the Militia" and for securing "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" were not, strictly speaking, mandatory in constitutional law, it would be compellingly advisable in political principle.

1. After all, the ultimate purpose of "[a] well regulated Militia" is, not just "the security of a free State", but the "free State" itself. Every institution and every participant in every institution, both public and private, that constitutes part of, can

---

[2169] See Declaration of Independence.

[2170] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 18.

[2171] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 1, 3, and 8.

[2172] As to limitations on the States arising out of Congressional legislation, see U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2173] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 and § 3.

contribute to, and can support "a free State" has an interest and should be enlisted in the provision of that State's "security". Free markets of all kinds are critical components of "a free State", because economic freedom and political freedom go hand in hand. The free market consists of WE THE PEOPLE in their economic capacity. "[A] free State" consists of THE PEOPLE in their political capacity. "A well regulated Militia" integrates the market with the State through the duty and right of THE PEOPLE "to keep and bear" the guns the market produces and out of the barrels of which all political power grows. WE THE PEOPLE'S exercise of their economic freedom, channeled through the Militia, secures their political freedom, which then reciprocally ensures their economic freedom. Therefore, all other things being equal, a free market in armaments should be employed to supply the Militia with necessary equipment in preference to—and if possible to the exclusion of—any other source.

2. Conversely, public arms provide at best a shaky foundation for "a free State". If the General Government or the governments in each State were the sole or even the major suppliers of firearms and ammunition to the Militia, then incompetent, negligent, or malevolent public officials might fail to secure, or might even intentionally restrict or cut off altogether, WE THE PEOPLE'S access to that equipment. Although this would have little effect initially as far as the hundreds of millions of firearms already in private possession throughout American were concerned (because well manufactured and properly maintained modern firearms will function almost indefinitely), it would surely become critical at an early date when the supplies of ammunition in private hands became depleted. For once a steady supply of ammunition ceases, the usefulness of even the best firearms is drastically reduced. Inasmuch as "'[p]olitical power [cannot] grow[ ] out of the barrel of a gun'" for which no ammunition is available,[2174] to suffer possibly rogue public officials to control THE PEOPLE'S supply of ammunition is effectively to surrender political power to them. And, inasmuch as rogue public officials, by definition, always aspire to aggrandize their positions in the governmental apparatus through usurpation and tyranny, to surrender political power to them is to forfeit "a free State".

3. If, in contrast, the free market supplied THE PEOPLE with firearms and ammunition, the bumbling, negligence, or even intentional flouting of their duties on the part of a few members of the Militia in one or more States might gradually disarm those particular individuals, but could not debilitate the institutions as a whole. And the possible incompetence, or even the calculated wrongdoing, of public officials—National, State, or Local—would be without effect on a matter over which they could exercise no control in any event.

[2174] See Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

The lesson of political prudence is clear: "[T]he right of the people to keep and bear Arms" can never be secure unless and until—and will remain secure only while—WE THE PEOPLE have a sufficient source of "Arms" separate from, independent of, and secure against the actions of possibly rogue public officials.

D. Reliance on the free market for arming the Militia the best of the possible alternatives available. The Constitution authorizes Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia" and "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution th[at] * * * Power[ ]",[2175] but does not explicitly define exactly how Congress should so "provide". At least five alternatives are available for that purpose. Congress could:

> {1} order appropriate public officials of the General Government to supply the Militia on a nationwide basis with arms that meet certain standards;
>
> {2} direct each of the several States individually to supply such arms to her own Militia;
>
> {3} authorize the Militia in each State to supply such arms to their respective members;
>
> {4} require WE THE PEOPLE, as individuals, to obtain such arms themselves;
>
> {5} allow THE PEOPLE to use whatever arms they already possessed or could acquire for themselves, provided that those arms were at least minimally suitable for Militia service; or
>
> {6} employ some combination of two or more of the foregoing means.

In cases {1}, {2}, {3}, and {6}, the General Government, the States, and the Militia would either procure the necessary arms in the free market, produce them in public arsenals, or both; and then would donate, loan, or sell the arms to THE PEOPLE. Whatever procedure public officials chose to adopt, however, would have to ensure THE PEOPLE'S permanent personal possession of those arms in their own homes at all times.[2176] In cases {4}, {5}, and {6}, of course, THE PEOPLE themselves would manufacture, distribute, purchase, and immediately take personal possession of the necessary arms through the free market, and thereafter retain such possession (and usually ownership, too).

Should Congress fail, neglect, or refuse to fulfill its duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", each of the several States would herself put into operation one or more of alternatives {2} through {6}—and, exercising her reserved power, would do so in any event with regard to "arming" her Militia for tasks to be undertaken on behalf of and within the State in addition to the three the Constitution explicitly identifies as constituting "the Service of the United States".[2177]

---

[2175] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 18.

[2176] See ante, Chapter 38.

Should both Congress and the States' legislatures default on their obligations, then THE PEOPLE themselves would collectively and individually take the initiative under alternatives {3} through {6}. "A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State", and being "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[2178] THE PEOPLE (as Virginia mandated in 1775) "should be armed, accoutred, trained, and disciplined, in the best manner the circumstances of the country will admit of".{EN-2028} Absent adequate supplies of suitable arms forthcoming from the General Government or the governments of the several States, ex necessitate THE PEOPLE (as Virginia mandated throughout the 1700s) would have to rely upon their own devices, and put into use such arms as they are "already furnished with",{EN-2029} "such arms as they have",{EN-2030} and "the best arms and accoutrements they can get".{EN-2031} But for THE PEOPLE to succeed in arming themselves, there must always be some "circumstances" throughout the country that "will admit of [arming them]"—which means that sufficient sources of suitable "Arms" must always be directly and immediately available to THE PEOPLE everywhere, and outside of the control of possibly rogue public officials. Therefore, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" must include—indeed, must depend upon—their "right" to acquire those "Arms" in the first place, and thus must guarantee their "right" to a truly free and comprehensive market in and through which "Arms" can be manufactured and distributed.

For this reason, alternatives {1} and {2} for "arming * * * the Militia" can neiher be exclusive nor strongly preferred—because, if they were, rogue public officials could deprive THE PEOPLE of new firearms, and particularly of ammunition for use in any firearms, thus rendering next to useless whatever firearms THE PEOPLE were "already furnished with" or could somehow obtain. Alternative {3} could in principle be exclusive, because THE PEOPLE and the Militia are fundamentally identical in composition, interest, and intent. Were THE PEOPLE to rely exclusively for their arms upon arsenals operated by the Militia as a species of "socialized" industry in each State, though, they would forfeit the benefits the free market offers—for without vigorous competition in the development, production, and distribution of arms, bureaucratization would likely take hold, innovation would stagnate, and institutionalized inefficiency would insinuate itself into the process. So if alternative {3} were to be employed, the Militia should depend in the largest measure possible upon alternative {4}—that is, the Militia would supervise the process, but would depend upon its members' use of the free market to see to it that all but impecunious Militiamen armed themselves out of their own resources. Alternative {5} could take immediate advantage of the huge supply of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements already in THE PEOPLE'S hands—and therefore should be the first step in any plan for revitalization of the Militia.[2179] It could not, however, provide most of THE PEOPLE with the arms best suited for many types of Militia service required even now, let alone the new arms they would assuredly need to employ in order to meet the grave challenges of a future day. Overall, then, alternative {4} stands out as the surest and safest of all.

---

[2177] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[2178] U.S. Const. amend. II and Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

America already boasts an armaments-industry which the entire world envies and even fears. This industry runs largely on free-market principles, especially private ownership of the actual means of production. Thus, because most everyone connected with the private firms producing firearms and ammunition—from their owners and stockholders, to their directors and officers, to their employees—would be members of the revitalized Militia or closely related thereto, the armaments-industry would in effect be owned, and certainly would be subject to day-to-day oversight and control, by the Militia.[2180] Moreover, if the industry were properly harnessed in aid of arming the Militia under alternative {4}, it would render unnecessary and inadvisable any use of public arsenals under alternatives {1}, {2}, and {3}, and thereby would obviate even the possibility that rogue public officials might seize control of such establishments and cut off WE THE PEOPLE'S access to the "Arms" the Constitution requires them "to keep and bear". Indeed, with the General Government and the States dependent upon the free market for arms with which to equip the regular Armed Forces (and such of their adjuncts as the National Guard), with the market free to produce and distribute the latest and best equipment available, with THE PEOPLE free to procure such equipment from the market in whatever quantities they desired, and with the vast majority of the owners, managers, and workers in the arms industry enrolled in the Militia, rogue public officials could not even imagine themselves capable of such action.

E. Possible allowances for governmental provision of "Arms" to the Militia. Nonetheless, some governmental assistance to or supplementation of the free market in "Arms" would be plainly constitutional, politically acceptable, and advisable if not unavoidable in practice. In most contexts, of course, the General Government has no obligation to fund activities simply because they involve

---

[2179] See ante, at 1103-1111.

[2180] To ensure this, however, it would be necessary to exclude foreign interests from simultaneous ownership and control of manufacturers of armaments located within the United States. Foreign stockholders could own such an operation; but only American citizens who were members and subject to the discipline of the Militia in the State in which the operation were located would be allowed to direct its day-to-day operations.

individuals' exercise of so-called "fundamental" constitutional rights.[2181] Not only is membership in "the Militia of the several States" the most "fundamental" of all "fundamental" rights, though, but also Congress labors under the affirmative duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming" them,[2182] "arming" being always "necessary and proper"[2183] because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State".[2184] Fulfillment of this duty could take several forms:

1. Congress might expend public moneys where private moneys did not suffice, both: (i) by requiring those individuals with sufficient personal financial resources to buy their own firearms in the free market; and (ii) by subsidizing other individuals who lacked those resources through tax credits, public grants, or even outright provision of the necessary equipment at public expense.[2185] The latter course would be a legitimate exercise of Congress's power "[t]o lay and collect Taxes * * * to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States"[2186]—for the Militia, being "necessary to the security of a free State", are unquestionably central to "the common Defence and general Welfare", and therefore "all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the * * * Power[ ]" "[t]o provide for * * * arming the Militia" through the power "[t]o lay and collect Taxes" would be constitutional.[2187]

2. Congress might direct private firms to produce arms specifically suitable for the Militia. In light of the pressing need to revitalize the Militia as soon as possible, orders of this type could be quite draconian. For example, in 1916, Congress empowered

> [t]he President, in time of war or when war is imminent, * * * through the head of any department of the Government, * * * to place an order with any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry for such product or material as may be required, and which is of the nature and kind usually produced or capable of being

---

[2181] See, e.g., Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 549 (1983); Lyng v. Automobile Workers, 485 U.S. 360, 368 (1988).

[2182] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied). See ante, at 50-54.

[2183] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 (emphasis supplied).

[2184] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[2185] On the latter option, see, e.g., Revised Statutes of the United States (1873-1874), TITLE XVI, THE MILITIA, § 1661, 18 Stat. 285, 290; An act to amend section sixteen hundred and sixty-one of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia, Act of 12 February 1887, CHAP. 129, §§ 1 and 3, 24 Stat. 401, 401, 402; An Act To amend section one of the Act of Congress approved February twelfth, eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, entitled "An Act to amend section sixteen hundred and sixty-one of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia", Act of 6 June 1900, CHAP. 805, 31 Stat. 662.

[2186] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[2187] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

> produced by such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry.
>
> Compliance with all such orders for products or material shall be obligatory on any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry * * * and shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts theretofore placed with such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, and any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry * * * owning or operating any plant equipped for the manufacture of arms or ammunition, or parts of ammunition, or any necessary supplies or equipment for the Army, and any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry * * * owning or operating any manufacturing plant, which * * * shall be capable of being readily transformed into a plant for the manufacture of arms or ammunition, or parts thereof, or other necessary supplies or equipment, who shall refuse to give to the United States such preference in the matter of the execution of orders, or who shall refuse to manufacture the kind, quantity, or quality of arms or ammunition, or the parts thereof, or any necessary supplies or equipment, * * * or who shall refuse to furnish such arms, ammunitions, or parts of ammunition, or other supplies or equipment, at a reasonable price * * * , then * * * the President * * * is hereby authorized to take immediate possession of any such plant or plants, and through the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, to manufacture therein in time of war, or when war shall be imminent, such product or material as may be required[.][2188]

Although the Constitution delegates to Congress only the general power "[t]o * * * support Armies" (from which a power to provide arms in particular must be implied[2189]), it extends to Congress the explicit power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", which is complete in and of itself.[2190] So, if a statute of the latter type in favor of the Army is constitutional, an equivalent statute directed to arms produced specifically for the Militia would be equally constitutional. To be sure, one may question the constitutionality of the mandate in the statute of 1916 for "the President * * * to take immediate possession of any plant" that refused to comply with the General Government's "order[s]" for martial supplies—unless, of course, "just compensation" were to be paid for the temporary seizure.[2191] A similar statute drafted in favor of arming the Militia, however, would hardly need to rely on such

---

[2188] An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 120, 39 Stat. 166, 213.

[2189] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[2190] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12 with art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphases supplied).

[2191] Compare Youngstown Sheet & Tube Company v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952) with U.S. Const. amend. V.

a severe means of enforcing compliance. For with most of the owners, managers, and employees in such a plant already being members of the Militia—whose continued work there would depend upon their exemptions from regular Militia duty in the field, whose exemptions would have been granted upon the condition of their continued work at the plant (or at least in that industry), and who would be under Militia discipline even though they were so exempted and employed—the people in actual control of the plant would have no inclination, and little latitude, to decline to perform the tasks assigned to them. Rather, they would recognize their plant not simply as a private enterprise, but instead as a private enterprise seconded to or even integrated within the Militia, and the interests of which were coincident with the interests of the Militia. Even the customers of such a plant would recognize as much, most of them being members of the Militia, too.

3. Congress might order that the Militia be supplied with the same new types of arms being provided to the regular Armed Forces when and as sufficient supplies of those arms became available—as, for example, it did in 1903, when it authorized the Secretary of War "to issue, on the requisitions of the governors of the several States * * * , such number of the United States standard service magazine arms, with bayonets, bayonet scabbards, gun slings, belts, and such other necessary accouterments and equipments as are required for the Army of the United States, for arming all of the organized militia in said States";[2192] and in 1907, when it imposed on the Secretary of War "the duty * * * , whenever a new type of small arm shall have been adopted for the use of the Regular Army, and when a sufficient quantity of such arms shall have been manufactured to constitute * * * an adequate reserve for the armament of any regular and volunteer forces that it may be found necessary to raise in time of war, to cause the organized militia of the United States to be furnished with small arms of the type so adopted, with bayonets and the necessary accouterments and equipments, including ammunition therefor".[2193]

4. Congress might mandate the distribution to the Militia of old but still serviceable firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements no longer needed by the regular Armed Forces, pursuant to its authority "to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the * * * Property belonging to the United States".[2194]

5. Under its power "[t]o exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever * * * over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the

---

[2192] An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 13, 32 Stat. 775, 777.

[2193] An Act Making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and eight, Act of 2 March 1907, CHAP. 2511, ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT, 34 Stat. 1158, 1174-1175.

[2194] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 2.

State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of * * * Magazines, Arsenals, * * * and other needful Buildings",[2195] Congress might investigate the feasibility of establishing a few public armories or other facilities for the production, maintenance, and repair of Militia "Arms" where private services simply could not be provided.[2196] And,

6. Within their own jurisdictions, the States might themselves take in hand the first and the fourth of these activities, and could coöperate with Congress with respect to the second, third, and fifth.

F. The States the preferred actors for arming revitalized Militia through the free market. The points just set out are phrased in terms of what Congress and the States "might" do, because "the Militia of the several States" are almost entirely in abeyance throughout America today, and need to be revitalized before anything can be done.[2197] Inasmuch as the Militia are "the Militia of the several States", though, revitalization should—and perhaps as a practical matter in the contemporary political context can only—come through the States.

In the process of revitalization, not just historical continuity, constitutional requirements, and political prudence recommend the States' reliance on the free market to supply WE THE PEOPLE with the firearms and ammunition they will need. The overwhelming advantage of the *pre-*constitutional system is that, properly modernized in operation, and in the context of the widespread private possession of firearms—along with the panoply of private inventors, manufacturers, distributors, and retailers—already extant throughout contemporary America, it would be much more flexible and efficient, and far more capable of producing immediately beneficial results, than any other system for arming the Militia.

Thus, a State intent on revitalizing her Militia from the very ground up (as most of the States would be compelled to do) could follow a sequence of steps that employed the free market to the maximum extent:

1. To encourage large numbers of individuals to enroll in her Militia quickly and at the least cost to them, a State could allow Militiamen to bring to their service whatever firearms they already possessed or wanted to acquire in the free market for that purpose—with the added incentive that, by dedicating these firearms to their Militia service, individuals could immunize their equipment from most of the General Government's contemporary "gun control".[2198]

[2195] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 17.

[2196] Again, this is not a novel idea. See, e.g., An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 121, 39 Stat. 166, 214.

[2197] See Edwin Vieira, Jr., Constitutional "Homeland Security", Volume One, The Nation in Arms (Ashland, Ohio: BookMasters, Inc., 2007), especially Chapter 3.

[2198] See ante, 1105-1111.

2. To promote interoperability of ammunition once her own Militia were revitalized, a State could require Militiamen to arm themselves with firearms of particular calibers, if they were not already so supplied. And,

3. To provide for uniformity, serviceability, and high quality in all Militia equipment, to guarantee a permanent supply of that equipment, and to link service in the Militia symbiotically to the State's economy, at least some of the States could encourage private firms within their territories to produce and market specially designed firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements with which Militiamen would gradually replace or supplement whatever other arms they already possessed. In this effort, each such State would: (i) conduct an inventory of plants within her territory that were manufacturing or were capable of manufacturing firearms, ammunition, and related accoutrements; (ii) place orders with existing plants for the manufacture of such arms, these orders to take preference over any other business of those companies; and (iii) grant benefits to entrepreneurs who would agree to set up new plants within the State. Importantly, this process would encourage extensive innovation and experimentation wherever inquiring minds set themselves to work. With potentially all of the States involved, and with each of them facing different—and some of them confronted by unique—problems of "homeland security", a multitude of new designs of arms and related equipment would surely be devised in short order to fit disparate requirements. With numerous sources of manufacture, many competing or complementary prototypes could be turned out, tested, and adopted for service. And new techniques of production could be introduced, tried, and perfected. Such decentralized innovation, experimentation, and competition would minimize the likelihood that Militia throughout "the several States" would all be plagued by such blunders as the regular Army's adoption of the trouble-plagued M16 rifle and its often inadequate 5.56 x 45 mm cartridge.[2199] Conceivably, of course, this process might take place in only a few States, because once suitable new designs had proven themselves there, other States would simply adopt them. Yet, in light of the immensity of the task of properly equipping revitalized Militia throughout America—and generally of "reindustrializing" this country to repair the economic destruction "globalization" has wrought over the last few decades—it is not unlikely that new facilities for research and development, manufacturing, and allied activities could profitably be set up in almost every State.

[2199] For a recent example involving the M16-derived M4 carbine, see Kirk Ross, "What Really Happened at WANAT", U.S. Naval Institute, Proceedings (July 2010), at 38.

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE

Every member of "the Militia of the several States" must be trained to participate in the provision of some aspect of "homeland security" for his particular State and Locality as well as for the United States as a whole.

Just as men organized in a group but without arms, or men possessed of arms but without organization, do not constitute a proper Militia at all, a group of men organized and equipped with arms but without appropriate training is at best the merest shadow of a Militia. Essential to success in any martial endeavor is "training, TRAINING and M-O-R-E T-R-A-I-N-I-N-G".[2200] Not surprisingly, then, the Constitution explicitly empowers Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[2201] To the Constitution, "disciplining" includes "training", as explicitly appears in that very same clause, which "reserv[es] to the States respectively * * * the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress".[2202] This reflects the common usage of those terms during the pre-constitutional period. At that time, the noun "discipline" meant "[e]ducation; instruction" and "[m]ilitary regulation".[2203] And the verb "to discipline" meant "[t]o educate; to instruct" and "[t]o regulate; to keep in order".[2204] So, with regard to Militia in particular, "discipline" included every form of "[e]ducation" and "instruction" that appertained to "[m]ilitary regulation".[2205] These words retain essentially the same meanings today. For instance, the noun "discipline" means "[s]evere training, corrective of faults" which "aims at the removal of bad habits and the substitution of good ones";[2206] or "[i]nstruction and government, comprehending the communication of knowledge and the regulation of practice; as, military discipline, which includes instruction in manual exercise,

---

[2200] Admiral Chester W. Nimitz to Admiral Ernest J. King (February 1943), quoted in James D. Hornfischer, Neptune's Inferno: The U.S. Navy at Guadalcanal (New York, New York: Bantam Books, 2001) at 427.

[2201] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[2202] Emphasis supplied.

[2203] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 1 and 3 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2204] Id., definitions 1 and 2 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2205] See, e.g., Timothy Pickering, Jr., An Easy Plan of Discipline for a Militia (Salem, Massachusetts: Samuel and Ebenezer Hall, 1775), which contains a set of instructions for drilling Militiamen.

[2206] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 420, definitions 4 and 1. See also Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 644, definition 3.

evolutions and subordination".[2207] And the verb "discipline" means "[t]o accustom to regular and systematic action; * * * to train to act together under orders; to teach subordination * * * to form a habit of obedience * * * ; to drill".[2208] Therefore, "[a] well regulated Militia"[2209]—which each of "the Militia of the several States" was understood to be in the late 1700s, and must remain today—is a Militia all of the members of which are thoroughly "[e]ducate[d]" and "instruct[ed]" in whatever subjects may be relevant to their functions.

A. The constitutional divisions of authority and labor with respect to training the Militia. Congress is "[t]o provide for * * * disciplining, the Militia" with respect to performance of the three constitutional purposes for which "the Militia of the several States" may be "call[ed] forth" to be "employed in the Service of the United States"—namely, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"—but at all times "reserving to the States respectively * * * the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress" for those three purposes.[2210] As with "organizing" and "arming", the constitutional desideratum is to guarantee uniformity among all and within each of the Militia—so that, when "call[ed] forth" for any of the three constitutional purposes, any "Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States",[2211] no matter from which State or States it may be drawn, can be expected to perform up to some basic standard of competence.

1. WE THE PEOPLE needed explicitly to delegate to Congress the power "[t]o provide for * * * disciplining, the Militia" for the three constitutional purposes, because otherwise that power would have remained the exclusive prerogative of each of the several States, just as it had been the jealously guarded authority of all but one Colony and then of each independent State throughout the *pre-*constitutional period. For not only did the Colonies and States enact their own statutes that provided for discipline of their Militia, but even the Articles of Confederation mandated that "every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred".[2212] And although the Articles made the maintenance of "a well regulated and disciplined militia" incumbent upon the States as a legal duty, they also recognized that the power to determine how to maintain such a "militia" remained exclusively with the States, because "[e]ach

---

[2207] N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 2. Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 1, at 741, definitions 1.b. and 3.b.

[2208] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 420, definition 2. Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 743, definition 3.

[2209] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[2210] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[2211] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2212] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4 (emphasis supplied).

state retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every Power, Jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled".[2213]

To be sure, the Constitution's general language "[t]o provide for * * * disciplining" would allow Congress simply to authorize each of the individual States to discipline her own Militia, according to the *pre-*constitutional pattern. Unless Congress set out some mandatory basic principles, however, this approach would not be likely to result in the necessary degree of nationwide uniformity of "discipline". So, as a practical matter, Congress's power "[t]o provide for * * * disciplining, the Militia" for the three constitutional purposes must be preëminent, in the sense that the States cannot detract from or otherwise interfere with its exercise—provided that exercise is timely and effective.

2. Although preëminent, Congress's power is not exclusive. If Congress defaults on its responsibility, the States must themselves devise "discipline" for those purposes. For, plainly enough, although only "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people",[2214] yet if Congress fails, neglects, or refuses to exercise its powers when it ought to do so, then the States must take that exercise into their own hands, so long as the powers at issue are "no[t] prohibited by [the Constitution] to the States". And, although "the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance [of the Constitution] * * * shall be the supreme Law of the Land", binding on "the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers * * * of the several States",[2215] yet if Congress fails, neglects, or refuses to enact a "Law[ ]" for "disciplining[ ] the Militia", then no possible prohibition against the exercise of such a power by the States exists. In the case of the Militia, particularly, this concurrent, reserved authority of the States in the face of Congressional default is of crucial importance, because America cannot afford to have "the Militia of the several States" *im*properly "disciplin[ed]", let alone not "disciplin[ed]" at all, with respect to the three constitutional purposes upon the fulfillment of which this country's very survival could well depend.

As explained heretofore, that the Constitution explicitly "reserv[es] to the States respectively, the * * * Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress" implies a right in the States to require that Congress does, in fact, "prescribe[ ]" such "discipline", so that the States can exercise their exclusive "Authority" in that regard.[2216] If, however, Congress

---

[2213] Arts. of Confed'n art. II.

[2214] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[2215] U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3.

[2216] See ante, at 52-53.

defaults, then the States must assume the substance of that duty on their own, in order to fulfill their own constitutional responsibility for "training the Militia". Congress cannot command the States to refrain from fulfilling their duty—and certainly cannot absolve the States of their duty through some dereliction of its own.

3. For all purposes other than the three the Constitution enumerates for "calling forth the Militia", the States enjoy exclusive authority to devise suitable "discipline" for, and according to that "discipline" to train, their own Militia. Obviously, as to these other purposes, no alternative exists. For the Constitution delegates to Congress no constitutional authority "[t]o provide for * * * disciplining, the Militia" for any purpose in addition to the three the Constitution explicitly lists. Inasmuch as Congress can "provide for calling forth the Militia" only for those three purposes, training the Militia for any other purpose would be pointless as far as the United States are concerned. And as to "the several States" (in contradistinction to "the United States"), Congress simply lacks the competence to devise appropriate training for each State's Militia with respect to the myriad distinct problems of "homeland security" that may arise in different Localities. (Which doubtlessly is why the Constitution does not authorize Congress even to try its hand at such a hopeless task.) So, because as a matter of both legality and practicality Congress cannot act, then the States must, unless—which can never be conceded—the Local problems in preparation for which the Militia should be "disciplin[ed]" are not to be addressed at all, and "the security of a free State" in each State is to be jeopardized.

Finally, if both Congress and the States fail, neglect, or refuse "to train the Militia" according to any "discipline", then the right, power, privilege, and duty fall to WE THE PEOPLE, for two reasons: First, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" for the purpose of participating in "well regulated Militia" in order to provide "the security of a free State" "shall not be infringed".[2217] For "the people to keep and bear Arms" effectively for that purpose necessitates their being "trained to arms".[2218] In turn, being "trained to arms" necessitates the prescription of some "discipline". Inasmuch as "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed", neither may their implied right to be "trained to arms" according to adequate "discipline" be infringed. Of course, no "infringe[ment]" would occur if Congress, the States, or both should provide sufficient training and discipline (as it is their constitutional duties to do). And in the first instance it is for the Members of Congress and the States' legislators, presumably proceeding with their constitutional responsibilities firmly in mind, to determine what training is sufficient. But neither

---

[2217] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[2218] See Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

Congress nor the States may both fail, neglect, or refuse to train the Militia and purport to prohibit THE PEOPLE from training themselves. That state of affairs would plainly constitute an "infringe[ment]" of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". Second, even without consideration of the Second Amendment, the intended beneficiaries of the duty of Congress "[t]o provide for * * * disciplining, the Militia" and of the States' "reserv[ed] * * * Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress" are WE THE PEOPLE in their Militia. The Constitution does not allow training to be withheld—because, if it were, "the Militia of the several States" would effectively be incapable of functioning . But the only way in which training will not be withheld in fact, in the event of defaults by Congress and the States, is if THE PEOPLE train themselves. Therefore, under such circumstances THE PEOPLE must be constitutionally authorized to train themselves according to a discipline which they themselves prescribe.

Thus, in this regard the Constitution establishes clear divisions of authority and labor along federal lines: (i) Congress "prescribe[s]" "discipline" for the three constitutional purposes. (ii) The several States supplement "the discipline prescribed by Congress" with "discipline" of their own for all other purposes (or, in the case of a default by Congress, for the three constitutional purposes as well). (iii) The States actually train their Militia for all purposes. And (iv) if rogue public officials in the General Government and the States fail, neglect, or refuse to take all of the steps necessary and proper for training the Militia, then WE THE PEOPLE take the initiative and train themselves, so that "the security of a free State" everywhere in the country will always be preserved.

B. Adequate training for all of the Militia constitutionally required. The Constitution did not set up this comprehensive and complex arrangement for ensuring that "the Militia of the several States" would be adequately trained with any expectation that the Militia would degenerate into ineffective (or, as is the case today, mostly invisible) establishments; or, worse yet, that rogue public officials, politicians, the big media, and various subversive private special-interest groups would successfully discredit, deride, and even demonize the Militia among all too many credulous Americans. No rational constitution would assign responsibility to both Congress and the States to see to the training of the Militia unless it expected—yea, commanded—that such responsibility would be fulfilled. Neither would any rational constitution expect that such responsibility would be fulfilled unless it expected—yea, commanded—as well that, as the result of such training, the Militia would be made fully capable of performing the tasks assigned to them. Least of all would any rational constitution declare that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" unless it expected—yea, commanded—that such a Militia would be entirely sufficient to that end. So, as "[a] well regulated Militia", each and every one of "the Militia of the several States" must be sufficiently trained to accomplish all of the reasonably anticipated tasks to which it may be assigned.

This is yet another reason (if any more were needed[2219]) why each and every so-called "*un*organized militia" in existence anywhere in America today is thoroughly *un*constitutional.[2220] After all, by practical definition an "*un*organized militia" is an *un*trained "militia", inasmuch as a gaggle of individuals without some mutual organization can hardly be educated and instructed so as to function as a coherent collective; and any group without some sufficient training directed towards its purposes can hardly be described as "organized".

C. The basic constitutional principles of training. "Discipline" and "training", of course, are general terms the precise applications of which are inevitably relative to the needs and possibilities of particular times and places. Because "homeland security" addresses the specific threats confronting the community today, and seeks to deter or defeat them with the resources available to the community today, the selfsame training that proved necessary and sufficient for the Militia during the 1600s and 1700s will not be adequate in the early decades of the Twenty-first Century. Certain overarching principles, though, are not historically bound.

1. Political training for self-government. Training in the Militia's political rôle as institutions of popular self-government must be first and foremost. So, whether or not the subject of some occupational exemption, every individual without exception should be obliged to attend regular meetings of his Local Militia Company. After all, inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" and "a free State" in America is one characterized by popular self-government, "[a] well regulated Militia" is an instrument of popular self-government. And inasmuch as "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'" and every "well regulated Militia" must be an armed establishment, "[a] well regulated Militia" is ultimately a political institution in its own right, too. Therefore, each and every meeting of a Local Militia Company can and should perform a political function for a political purpose on the basis of popular self-government—at a minimum, by providing the community with a formal forum for the people's inquiry, discussion, education, and proposals for action with respect to such matters as the behavior of public officials and the workings of critical private enterprises. The jurisdiction of this forum, moreover, is potentially without bounds. For "[a] well regulated Militia" is not just a quasi-military establishment that prepares itself to deal solely with rare "emergency" situations. Rather, "being necessary to the security of a free State" in every way (because the Constitution identifies no way in which the Militia is not "necessary"), "[a] well regulated Militia" must delve into every aspect of the day-to-day functioning of the Republic—at the Local, State, and National levels—that could possibly affect "the security of a free State", and thereby impact upon the Militia's constitutional mission, in any way. The proof of this appears most plainly in the Militia's authority and responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union" at the level of the General Government,[2221] and to execute the laws of the several States and their Localities at those levels of the federal system,[2222] without any limitation as to time, place, or circumstances. For vanishingly few areas of social existence, from the very ordinary to the most extraordinary, are not affected on a daily basis by the execution of the community's laws.

---

[2219] See ante, Chapter 34.

[2220] See, e.g., 10 U.S.C. § 311(b)(2); General Laws of Rhode Island §§ 30-1-4(4) and 30-1-5; and Code of Virginia §§ 44-1 and 44-4.

Popular self-government, however, cannot succeed as merely "a spectator sport", but depends instead upon WE THE PEOPLE'S personal participation to some large and persistent degree. "A well regulated Militia"—which can compel its members' attendance at regular meetings where they will air the vital political issues of the day, and through that ventilation train themselves for self-government—can maximize that participation. Indeed, "[a] well regulated Militia" is potentially the most effective of all political institutions in a self-governing republic. It is the most inclusive of all political institutions, because it enrolls as members almost every adult living within its jurisdiction. It is the most intensive of all political institutions, because it is in operation every day of the year. It is the most extensive of all political institutions, because no subject arguably related to "the security of a free State" is beyond its ken and concern. It is the most influential of all political institutions, because through its members its deliberations and decisions can reach out to everyone in the community. And it is the most open and honest of all political institutions, because it is beholden to no political parties, special-interest groups, or narrow factions.[2223]

2. Training for "military" and "police" service. Training of the Militia for "military" and "police" functions must always be emphasized in any era, not only

---

[2221] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[2222] See U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

[2223] Although all of this can be proven only by a "thought experiment", it is certainly far more plausible than the alternative—namely, that America would be better off without fully functional Militia in every State, and thereby with WE THE PEOPLE hopelessly disorganized and defenseless against their opponents' political tactic of "divide and rule" which has brought THE PEOPLE to the mess in which they find themselves mired today. For instance, who can doubt that, had "Militia of the several States" been properly revitalized even as late as the last quarter of the Twentieth Century in order to investigate and criticize America's inherently unworkable monetary and banking systems, and to propose substitutes that would serve THE PEOPLE'S best interests, the disastrous breakdown of those rotten schemes in the early Twenty-first Century would probably never have occurred at all, or at least not to the extent that it did. In the absence of close scrutiny by the nonexistent Militia, however, public officials and politicians in the District of Columbia, speculators in New York City, and the big financial and other media that shilled for them were able to cover up the catastrophe they themselves had caused, until it was too late to correct at less than an exorbitant cost.

perforce of the common sense of how every polity preserves itself against foreign and domestic enemies, but also because the explicit authority and responsibility the Constitution assigns to the Militia are plainly of a character appropriate for—indeed, require—true "military" forces ("suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions") and "police" units ("execute the Laws of the Union" and "suppress Insurrections"). Exactly what "military" and "police" training will entail in practice, however, will depend upon various and variable circumstances. Nonetheless, some rough guidelines can be sketched:

a. Those units of revitalized Militia assigned to service of a military or para-military nature should train in close conjunction with, and receive extensive assistance from, the regular Armed Forces. Ideally, too, some member of some State's Militia with appropriate rank should be seconded as a liaison officer to each and every unit of consequence within the Armed Forces. Through these connections, the Militia—and thereby WE THE PEOPLE—will gain invaluable experience with and insights into how and why the Armed Forces operate as they do, in terms of their structures of command, strategies and tactics, armaments, logistics, intelligence, and so on, as well as becoming familiar with the intentions, plans, and capabilities of the anticipated enemies of America that the Armed Forces are preparing themselves to fight. Overall, such coöperation—and the constructive criticisms and suggestions that the Militia and the Armed Forces will exchange with one another as a result—will promote mutual understanding, sympathy, and respect.

On the other side, intimate involvement with the leading personalities and operations of the Armed Forces at every level will enable the Militia to deter, detect, expose, root out, and if necessary defeat rogue individuals and cliques attempting to transmogrify parts of the Armed Forces into instruments of subversion, usurpation, and tyranny. More than any other expedient, then, this will advance the fundamental principle of constitutional government that, "in all cases, the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power".[2224] For "the civil power"—that is, ultimately WE THE PEOPLE—cannot hope to "govern[ ]" "the military" unless it knows at all times precisely what "the military" is doing and why. And no more detailed knowledge on the subject can be gained than by means of WE THE PEOPLE'S direct personal involvement in the Armed Forces' day-to-day activities in the form of liaison through the Militia. Furthermore, every patriotic member of the Armed Forces should welcome, appreciate, and even encourage this arrangement, because it will mitigate the historically validated concerns that "large military establishments" afford "facile means * * * to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people",[2225] and therefore that "standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty"[2226]—concerns which have ripened into fully justified fears that America's "military-industrial complex" has overstepped its constitutional bounds.[2227]

[2224] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

Of course, any arrangement of this kind would necessitate explicit approval from Congress as well as the States, because Congress alone can "make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces" that would require or even allow for those "Forces" to receive liaison "Officers" from the Militia;[2228] and inasmuch as the individuals performing the liaison would be Militia "Officers", they would have to be selected by the States, to which the Constitution "reserv[es] * * * the Appointment of [all of] the Officers" in the Militia, except for the ultimate "Commander in Chief".[2229] Also, no matter what Congress wanted, arguably the States could effectively veto any such arrangement in large measure, because, although Congress could always require the Armed Forces to accept liaison "Officers" from the Militia, it could not require the Militia to second such "Officers" at all times, but only at such times during which it was justified in exercising its power "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States",[2230] and even then arguably only with respect to the "Part" so "employed". At all other times Congress would have to depend upon the States' voluntary accession to the plan. Possibly, even without agreement from the States, Congress could require Militia "Officers" to serve as liaison with the regular Armed Forces on the ground that it was "calling [them] forth * * * to execute the Laws of the Union"—by assigning them to supervise compliance of the Armed Forces with Congress's "Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces". This rationale would be somewhat porous, however, unless Congress authorized the Militia's liaison "Officers" actually "to execute" those "Rules" against wayward members of the Armed Forces. And the performance of such oversight might generate friction and perhaps arouse animosity between the Militia and "the land and naval Forces". Perhaps, too, in the absence of action by Congress or the States' legislatures, the President—as "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States"[2231]—could establish such liaison while the Militia (or some "Part" thereof) were in "the actual

---

[2225] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[2226] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2227] See post, Chapter 47.

[2228] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

[2229] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[2230] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2231] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

Service of the United States", and otherwise could prevail upon the various commanders in chief of the Militia in the several States voluntarily to despatch liaison "Officers" to the "Army and Navy of the United States" if the laws of their States so permitted. Howsoever it could be brought about, though, such an arrangement would be uniquely valuable, because, although the Militia are constitutionally separate from and superior to the Armed Forces, being permanent parts of the federal system,[2232] both the Armed Forces and the Militia are constitutional establishments the purposes of which to a large degree can overlap in practice, and which therefore should cultivate and maintain a symbiotic relationship.

b. When State and Local police forces, Sheriffs' departments, and kindred law-enforcement agencies are wholly absorbed (as they should be) into the revitalized Militia,[2233] their present training-programs will form something of a foundation for future Militia instruction and practice. But only "something", not everything. Experience teaches that many if not most of those programs must be radically improved, and some of them eliminated. In all too many police agencies in all too many Localities, absences of standards, loose practices, and a general lack of transparency and especially accountability to WE THE PEOPLE—the dearth of true "discipline"—have metastasized into systematic corruption, arbitrary conduct, violations of citizens' constitutional rights, and especially rogue officers' brutality.[2234] These aberrant conditions must be vigorously stamped out wherever they exist, and strict regimens of specialized training imposed to prevent their recrudescence. New forms of training will be necessary, not so that members of the Militia can become future police officers, but so that contemporary police officers can become proper members of the Militia or be discharged from the police. Upon incorporation of the police into the Militia, the Militia will have far less to learn from the police than the police will need to learn from the Militia. Police are undoubtedly "necessary to the security" of a police state, a national-security state, or a totalitarian state. But the Militia are "necessary to the security of a free State". And once incorporated into the Militia, existing police departments will have to satisfy that exacting standard. And,

c. Because the "military" and "police" functions of revitalized Militia will rank among their most important tasks, and be ubiquitous throughout the several States; and because training for, as well as the actual performance of, those functions will unavoidably involve the use of firearms, ammunition, and related accoutrements by tens of millions of average Americans; therefore, training for the Militia will necessarily entail thoroughgoing education and instruction against the

---

[2232] See ante, at 773-793.

[2233] See ante, at 327-328, and post, at 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488.

[2234] See, e.g., Radley Balko, Overkill: The Rise of Paramilitary Police Raids in America (Washington, D.C.: Cato Institute, 2006).

theory, the practice, and the individual and institutional proponents of "gun control". In short order, "gun control" of the modern variety—which slavers after the complete disarmament of as many "civilians" as possible—will become generally recognized as unnecessary, counterproductive, stupid, perverse, and obviously unconstitutional. For example—

> • The contention that "gun control", by making firearms increasingly unavailable to average citizens, somehow reduces the level of violent crimes—which counterintuitive notion scientific investigation has already thoroughly debunked[2235]—will be roundly dismissed as utterly nonsensical by every thinking person when the Militia become the primary law-enforcement establishments throughout the States, and are composed of almost the entire adult population in each community.
>
> • The contention that "gun control", by reducing the number of firearms in private hands, minimizes accidents with firearms and thereby promotes public safety has always begged the question of the actual causes of such accidents—which almost universally can be traced to various individuals' lack of the proper attitude, knowledge, and skills necessary for safe usage of such implements. For that reason, that claim has always been subject to the commonsensical refutation that sufficient training of the citizenry in the safe use, rather than draconian prohibitions of private possession, of firearms is the sensible course to follow. When the Militia are revitalized throughout the several States, any purported link between "gun control" and public safety will be exposed as childishly ludicrous, because everyone eligible for the Militia (other than conscientious objectors) will be thoroughly trained in the safe and effective use of firearms.
>
> • Because "the body of the people" eligible for service in the Militia will include minors from at least sixteen years of age, and because minors of even more tender years will receive instruction in schools as to the fundamental principles of the Militia in anticipation of their later enrollment, revitalization of the Militia will put paid to the deceptive plea that "gun control" is necessary "for the children". As with most arguments for "gun control", this claim is more heavily freighted with raw emotionalism than with historical scholarship. For, in *pre-*constitutional times, the notion of contemporary "gun controllers" that children capable (or soon to be capable) of using firearms in their community's defense should not have access to or training with such equipment would have been pilloried as the dangerous nonsense it is. Certainly the Militia statutes of that era aimed, not at the modern "gun controllers'" goal of "zero tolerance" for minors' possession of firearms, but at putting firearms and ammunition directly into the hands of minors at least as soon as they reached the minimum age for enrollment in the Militia. A modern policy of maximum practical exposure of children to firearms would also minimize accidents with arms throughout those individuals' lifetimes—for "as the twig is bent, so grows the tree". This undeniable advantage of systematically training children with firearms as part of or in preparation for their Militia service exposes the incoherence and irresponsibility of "gun control"—that on the one hand demands enforced ignorance of firearms among America's youth, while on the other hand decries the number of accidents with firearms arising out of that very ignorance and the irresponsibility it fosters. And,

---

[2235] See, e.g., John R. Lott, Jr., More Guns, Less Crime: Understanding Crime and Gun Control Laws (Chicago, Illinois: University of Chicago Press, 3d Edition, 2010).

•Most importantly, "gun control" will be exposed, not simply as ridiculous in fact, but also as politically illogical, subversive of constitutional government, and potentially fatal to a free society. After all, other than a very few true pacifists among their number, the proponents of "gun control" do not advocate the banishment from society of all firearms. No, indeed. They seek to disarm the great mass of average Americans, but to retain a surfeit of arms of the most lethal varieties in the hands of "standing armies", para-militarized "law-enforcement agencies", and other assorted organized myrmidons in the pay of "ambitious and unprincipled rulers" who might come to desire "to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people".[2236] Thus, the propaganda and practices of "gun control" are (objectively at least) the inevitable leitmotifs in the prelude to the establishment of a totalitarian state. So even if, by suppressing the private possession of arms among Americans, "gun control" could eliminate the purported dangers that firearms in private hands conjecturally posed to public safety, it would thereby simply enable a different and exceedingly more serious danger to appear. Instead of accidents with firearms that arose from the adventitious negligence of individuals here and there, America would be confronted with, and stripped of any deterrence or defense against, the intentional and systematic employment of firearms by organized bands of political criminals terrorizing common Americans "from sea to shining sea". That is, disarming WE THE PEOPLE ostensibly for reasons of general public safety will inevitably and inexorably undermine their specifically political public safety. No one of good will can be safe, nor can "a free state" exist in "security" in the political sense, unless "the body of the people" be "trained to arms".[2237]

[2236] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[2237] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

D. Specific types of training for specific classes of individuals. Overall, the specifics of training within revitalized "Militia of the several States" will depend in every particular situation upon the peculiar "homeland-security" needs of each separate State and Locality, viewed in the context inter alia of: (i) the seriousness and immediacy of the threats against which the Militia must be deployed—that is, what must be done as soon as practicable; (ii) the size and composition of the population—that is, how many eligible individuals are available and may need to be trained; (iii) the ability of the Militia to draw upon individuals, groups, and organizations with specialized education, knowledge, skills, and experience—that is, the persons who may already be trained in some useful discipline, or be qualified to provide training to others; and (iv) the extent of funding or in-kind contributions to be expected from Congress, the Armed Forces, the States, Localities, the Militia themselves, and possibly other sources—that is, how extensive and intensive a program of training can the Militia afford to carry on.

In modern revitalized Militia, probably not everyone in the community will need to be extensively trained, and certainly not everyone will receive exactly the same training. What training may be required of or offered to any particular individual will usually depend upon his age and physical condition; his specialized education, knowledge, skills, and experience; and whether he is actually needed to perform a particular Militia function at a particular time and place.

1. Most obviously, an individual's physical and mental abilities to be trained will determine what training he may be required, or may volunteer, to undergo. In general, because basic physical ability and age are fairly well correlated, age-limits for various types of service in revitalized Militia, and therefore for training in that regard, would be reasonable as rough guidelines. But only as guidelines, because in any era differentiations in types of Militia service, and therefore training, made on the basis simply of a Militiaman's age must inevitably fall back upon statistics and generalized commonsensical appreciations that, although perhaps useful for preliminary judgments, cannot form the basis of any conclusive presumption where an individual's constitutional right, let alone duty, to serve in the Militia is concerned.[2238]

For instance, during the pre-constitutional period, the limits for active Militia service in Rhode Island and Virginia, and therefore for required training, were from sixteen to fifty or even sixty years of age, because the urgent goal was to be able in times of "alarm" to mobilize the largest possible number of men in at least minimally sufficient physical condition to serve in the field. Today, with significantly greater populations of able-bodied adults in many individual States than ever lived in the Colonies and independent States taken as a whole during the 1700s, revitalized Militia could easily muster very extensive forces suitable for the most rigorous deployment in the field by drawing upon adults within a range of ages significantly narrower than from sixteen to fifty—which would argue for limiting full field training in the first instance to those in some suitably restricted range, such as eighteen to forty or forty-five years of age. On the other hand, though, because most individuals in modern times live longer and enjoy better physical and mental health than did their predecessors in the pre-constitutional era, large numbers of adults over forty, forty-five, or even fifty years of age today could profitably serve revitalized Militia in the field—and therefore should at least be allowed to volunteer for such duty, and if not proven to be disqualified then to be trained for it.

---

[2238] See, e.g., Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441, 452 (1973); United States Department of Agriculture v. Murry, 413 U.S. 508, 514 (1973).

So, three conclusions as to limitations on training with respect to age can be drawn immediately:

a. Because—in keeping with the Militia's explicit constitutional responsibilities—training for and performance of "military" and "police" functions must be their first and foremost priority; and because such training and service in the field demand a great deal of physical exertion and therefore strength, stamina, and conditioning on the part of the individuals being trained and then so serving; therefore, the most physically rigorous training should presumptively be required only of Militiamen who could be anticipated to be in or be capable of developing the best physical condition: say, from eighteen to forty or forty-five years of age. This would not constitute "selection for the Militia", in the sense of the creation of an élitist "select Militia", but rather the exercise of an initial "selection from the Militia", in the sense of singling out particular individuals for certain duty and therefore training, allowable because of biologically determined circumstances and probably a superabundance of potentially qualified enrollees. For, in the gravest and most pressing emergencies, whoever could in fact possibly serve in the field would in law be required to do so, notwithstanding his youth, advanced age, or partial disability, and his relative lack of training on those grounds.

b. Members of the Militia from forty or forty-five to sixty or sixty-five years of age would be presumptively excused from the training required of members from eighteen to forty or forty-five, but required to undergo other training that matched their particular abilities. Modern Militia, after all, would offer many positions in intelligence, planning, logistics, education, training, maintenance of equipment and facilities, management of records, and general administration that would require individuals with specialized education, knowledge, skills, and experience, but who would not necessarily have to appear for duty in anything akin to field-grade physical condition. Moreover, whatever the statutory termini in age might be for various forms of or even all compulsory service, anyone of advanced years ought to be allowed to volunteer for training in whatever Militia duties he would be capable of performing. Thus, training in any particular subject would be open to all who could perform the service to which the training was directed.

c. If some flexibility exists at the upper ends of the ranges of age in which individuals may be subject to mandatory training, the lowest boundary should be fixed at the very commencement of adulthood, so as to maximize the amount of training that the youngest Militiamen would receive during their physically, intellectually, and morally most formative years. As pre-constitutional history demonstrates, sixteen is not an unrealistic age at which to begin. Today, though, fifteen or even fourteen might prove satisfactory, too, if the required training and related duties were carefully tailored to what might be appropriate for individuals of those ages. In any event, basic Militia education and training should begin as soon as practicable. And it should focus primarily on inculcating, not simply rudimentary knowledge and skills, but especially the proper attitude towards the subject. These youngest adults will need to develop the correct four-sided frame of reference in which to situate and judge everything that comes thereafter: namely, that (i) self-government is not a "spectator sport"; (ii) participation in the Militia is the quintessential activity of self-government; (iii) the Militia constitute a great school, teaching the theory and operations of "a free State"; and (iv) only by every Militiaman's learning and applying these lessons throughout his life can the security of "a free State" be preserved. Of course, some (perhaps many) precocious young Militiamen might have special skills that could best be exploited right away in other, higher-level duties, and therefore would qualify those individuals for certain types of advanced training. In such cases, if a lack of emotional maturity did not stand in the way, mere chronological age should not.

2. Training and organization are intimately interrelated. In a large sense, training is actually the foundation for the Militia's organization, because individuals will be assigned various operational duties according to their training or capacity for it. It certainly would be useless to create parts of an organization that required the performance of duties of which no one was or could be made capable. Of course, any proposals in this regard can be, at best, suggestions and recommendations rather than requirements. For revitalizing the Militia under contemporary conditions will necessarily be an experimental endeavor. Different structures and regimens for organization and training will undoubtedly have to be tried in different States, and the ones that prove themselves best adapted or adaptable to Local conditions will be adopted, even though they differ from State to State and perhaps from Locality to Locality within a particular State. Nonetheless, a basic structure should probably consist of at least four groups:

{i} The first group might consist of Militia "cadets"—individuals of sixteen and seventeen years of age who would receive foundational instruction and preliminary training in all of the basic subjects germane to the Militia, and would be continuously evaluated with respect to their suitability for later assignments within groups {ii} and {iii}. If the facilities were available, some parts of this program could be offered to precocious individuals of fourteen and fifteen years of age as well ("cadets-aspirant"), in preparation for their enrollment into the Militia in group {i}.

{ii} The second group might consist of individuals from eighteen to forty or forty-five years of age who were adjudged particularly fit to perform military, para-military, police, emergency-response, fire-fighting, and search-and-rescue duties; to participate in engineering and heavy construction; to provide food security by working on farms, ranches, and like facilities; to protect natural resources; or to engage in other "homeland-security" services in the field that required physical strength, conditioning, and endurance. The qualification "particularly fit" is necessary here, because in a dire emergency—what Americans of the pre-constitutional era would have designated an "alarm"—individuals in groups {i} and {iii}, and perhaps {iv} as well, who were even minimally fit might be drafted to perform duties normally assigned only to individuals in group {ii}. Also, the qualification "in the field" is necessary, because at all times some duties with respect to these activities could adequately be performed in an armory, a depot, an office, or some other administrative facility by individuals who were incapable of arduous service. For example, armorers—gunsmiths, in their private lives—would certainly be necessary to maintain Militiamen's firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements in good working order, and therefore would normally be assigned to the Militia's military, para-military, and police units; but the particular individuals fulfilling that function would not be expected, and therefore would not normally be required to be trained, actually to perform regular military, para-military, or police duty outside of their workshops.

{iii} The third group might consist of all individuals from forty or forty-five to sixty or sixty-five years of age, as well as those individuals between eighteen and forty or forty-five years old who did not qualify or were not needed for duty in group {ii}, or who were especially qualified for some other duty. Thus, group {iii} would include all otherwise eligible individuals already forty-six years of age or older when the Militia in their State was revitalized, who did not volunteer or were not accepted for service in group {ii}; all the members of group {i} who upon reaching eighteen years of age did not qualify for group {ii}; and all the members of group {ii} who reached forty-six years of age, excepting those who volunteered and were accepted for continued service in that group. Presumably, all women of eighteen years of age and older would be assigned to group {iii}, unless some special reason required their reassignment to group {ii}—such as that they possessed some unique and indispensable skills necessary for a Militia unit in group {ii}, or that a unit in group {ii} simply lacked enough men to perform certain routine duties for which some women in group {iii} were arguably qualified.

{iv} The fourth group might consist of those individuals of any age who had been granted some exemption from Militia service—such as conscientious objectors, or individuals who filled various important public offices or engaged in certain critical private occupations. Or, at least at the onset of revitalization of the Militia, when people were being gradually acclimatized to the new system, those individuals who purchased exemptions from Militia service.[2239] Membership in group {iv} would be something of a nominal status at best, though, because conscientious objection alone would not exempt anyone from performing the duties possible in groups {ii} or {iii} that did not require the use of firearms; and not only those individuals who purchased exemptions for reasons of personal convenience, but also those in offices or occupations that precluded most or all active service, would nonetheless be required to take a minimal course of training. An exemption from some aspects of Militia service presumes membership in the Militia, and limits only the duties thereof; it neither removes one from the Militia altogether nor provides a blanket immunity from all forms of service.

3. One of the main constitutional duties of membership in the Militia is for each individual to receive some training. Presumably, immediately upon revitalization of the Militia, although some individuals would have had the benefit of experience in the regular Armed Forces, in various law-enforcement agencies, or in other occupations relevant to Militia service, many other (perhaps most) individuals eligible for the Militia would lack any training with respect to any aspect of that service. The particular substance of the training these individuals would need to undergo would depend upon the duties they might be expected to perform.

a. The individuals who comprised group {iv} would be required to study: (i) in general, the history of "the Militia of the several States" and of their own State, and the Militia's contemporary constitutional and statutory status, purposes, structure, and operations; and (ii) in particular, how the Militia can secure "a free State" and guarantee "a Republican Form of Government" in each State and thus throughout the Union as a whole, can maintain the continuity of representative, constitutional government throughout the federal system in the face of whatever may threaten it, can promote a sound and vibrant economy in each State, and overall can bring about social solidarity. Specifically, because revitalized "Militia of the several States" would be vested—perforce of the Constitution of the United States, the various constitutions of individual States, and whatever implementing statutes might be forthcoming—with legal rights, powers, privileges, and immunities that authorized them to enforce the laws, deter and quell domestic violence, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions in whatever form,[2240] and otherwise to take whatever actions might be necessary for maintaining "the security of a free

---

[2239] See ante, at 974-977, and post, at 1242-1243.

[2240] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; and art. IV, § 4.

State" in each of the several States,[2241] every member of the Militia who might be called forth to active duty would be required fully to understand the constitutional provisions, statutes, and regulations that applied to the Militia. Laws consistent with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" that are enacted by "Governments * * * deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed" form the foundation for "the security of a free State".[2242] So, if "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State",[2243] it must be composed of people who know their country's laws. WE THE PEOPLE cannot rely upon public officials to instruct them in this regard—not simply because some of those officials may turn out to be incompetents or even rogues, but more importantly because it is WE THE PEOPLE'S own right, power, and duty, through the Militia, to enforce the laws, and therefore WE THE PEOPLE'S personal responsibility to know what the laws are and how they are to be applied.

This course of study—encompassing when and where the Militia originated, why and how the Militia should function today according to *pre-*constitutional principles, and what critical rôle the Militia must always continue to play in America—would at first primarily involve each Militiaman's learning at home from books, CDs, DVDs, the Internet, and other resources.[2244] But, as revitalized Militia became increasingly well organized and funded, it could be supplemented with and probably even superseded by formal classes held at or by local schools, colleges, libraries, or various community, veterans', and other organizations, including those religious bodies which subscribe to the doctrine of Romans 13.

Education as to the history, constitutional status and authority, and political, economic, and social responsibilities of the Militia will be of signal importance, because initially upon revitalization of the Militia many of the individuals in group {iv} will likely have sought exemptions as a result of their misconceptions about the Militia. Whether these faulty ideas will originally arise out of black propaganda put out by rogue public officials, politicians, and subversive factions and special-interest groups eager to suppress WE THE PEOPLE'S assertion of their sovereignty, or will simply rationalize individuals' own insouciance towards their patriotic duty—or perhaps reflect just their narrow self-interest, self-indulgence, and sloth—they will need to be dispelled as quickly, as widely, and as thoroughly as possible. For, as Joseph Story recounted already in the 1830s, such attitudes must always be the primary cause of the degradation the Militia in any era,

---

[2241] See U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

[2242] Declaration of Independence and U.S. Const. amend. II.

[2243] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[2244] See, e.g., as an example of this genre, Edwin Vieira, Jr., "The Purse and the Sword: Imminent Dangers of U.S. Economic and Homeland Security Policies" (Metamora, Michigan: DVDs produced by the Heritage Research Institute, 2010).

and therefore must be guarded against in every era.[2245] Nothing should be suffered to encourage Americans to infer from the open-handedness with which exemptions will be granted during the first stages of revitalizing the Militia—when that liberality will be intended specifically to smooth the transition from today's oxymoronic "unorganized militia" to tomorrow's constitutionally required "well regulated Militia"—that the Militia should be taken to be somehow optional establishments the burdens of which the average man would be well advised and justified in trying to avoid.

In addition to a study of American history and political-economic theory, individuals in group {iv} would be required to undergo a very basic course of practical training at appropriate facilities. First, they would familiarize themselves with the types (and where possible the specific models) of firearms most likely to be found in Militia service in their Locality—including how effectively and safely to load and unload, shoot, clean, maintain, and store each kind of arm—together with associated ammunition and accoutrements. They would become thoroughly conversant with all relevant laws relating to the employment of firearms in Militia service (particularly the justifications for the threat to use, and the actual use of, deadly force). And they would develop, demonstrate, and maintain at least a minimum level of personal proficiency with the particular firearms they were to keep always at hand in their own homes, in the anticipation that they might be called forth to bear those arms in Militia service during an "alarm".[2246] Second, they would undertake a course of "continuing Militia education" in which during each year they became certified in one or another different speciality useful for community protection under adverse conditions—including, for example, first aid and other basic para-medical skills; fire-fighting and emergency-rescue techniques; nuclear, chemical, and biological containment and decontamination; protocols for imposing quarantines; mass evacuations and support of displaced persons; traffic and crowd control; and related disciplines and methods—so that, after some reasonable period of time, they all would be well rounded in the fundamental skills necessary for them to assist one another in providing their own Locality with basic, but effective "homeland security" during any reasonably foreseeable crisis. Of course, third, none of these individuals would be rigidly confined solely to these entry-level forms of instruction, but instead could take such further and more extensive training as they might choose—and would be encouraged to do so.

b. The individuals who comprised group {i} would be required to absorb all of the training mandated for group {iv} with: first, the added assistance that would come from their instruction's being part of a high school's or secondary school's regular curriculum to which the students could afford to devote more time and the faculty could provide more direction than would be available to (say) the average public official (or other exempted individual) trying to digest the material in his spare time at home; and, second, the added incentive that the students' mastery of the subject-matter would be reflected in formal grades that would stand them in good stead in their later applications for acceptances at colleges and universities at which "Militia science" would also be part of the mandatory courses of study. Importantly, too, the schools themselves could function as laboratories in which students and faculty not only could learn, practice, and perfect basic skills, but also could devise and experiment with entirely new types of Militia structures, equipment, and operations particularly pertinent to the territories in which the schools happened to be situated—so that the fundamental principles of truly Local "homeland security" would be, not only learned, but even actually invented and implemented, "from the bottom up" by each generation of Militiamen themselves in their very own backyards.

---

[2245] See Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[2246] Initially, this training could be provided at private firearms ranges, at State facilities (such as those now used for training State and Local police), and at ranges maintained by the Armed Forces. As to the availability at the present time of the last of these for use "by persons capable of bearing arms", see 10 U.S.C. § 4309.

c. The individuals who comprised group {iii} would master all of the material mandated for group {i}, and in addition would be required: First, in general, to become well versed in the strategies and tactics the Militia were then employing in their various military, para-military, police, and emergency operations. Second, in particular, to understand at least the rudiments of the Militia's intelligence and counterintelligence work, including the nature, ideologies, structures, strategies, tactics, and operations of international and domestic "terrorists", subversives, and other criminal elements; methods for identification and surveillance of "terrorists'" cells, subversive networks, criminal enterprises, and other illicit conspiratorial groups within each State and Locality; plans for deterrence, detection, and defense against infiltration of and influence over the Militia, other State and Local governmental agencies, and key private businesses by "terrorists", subversives, and other criminal elements. Third, to go beyond what the Militia had already learned and put into practice, and to develop wherever possible entirely new means at the State and Local levels to predict, to prepare for, and to respond to all manner of reasonably foreseeable political, economic, and social crises, including various types of "terrorists'" attacks and subversion; industrial accidents or sabotage; epidemics and pandemics; natural disasters; catastrophic failures in the monetary, banking, and financial systems; and like events or conditions that involved sudden, widespread, and serious dangers to large numbers of people.

d. Finally, the individuals in group {ii} would receive instruction in all of the subjects mandated for group {iii}, in addition to which they would train in various disciplines related to actual service in the field: First, of a military and para-military nature, in conjunction with the regular Armed Forces, the Coast Guard, and the Border Patrol—including repelling invasions by regular or irregular forces of foreign nations; suppressing insurrections or other extensive domestic violence; and suppressing illegal immigration, apprehending aliens not lawfully albeit physically within this country, and interdicting traffic in illicit commodities at America's international borders. Second, of a police nature, aimed at enforcement of the laws as part of or in coöperation with regular State and Local law-enforcement agencies that had already been absorbed into the Militia as specially uniformed units—including surveillance; ascertainment of probable cause; stop, search, arrest, and seizure of persons and things; identification, custody, and preliminary interrogation of suspects; forensic and other investigatory techniques; and general criminology (especially as it relates to "terrorism", subversion, large-scale criminal enterprises, gangs, and so on). Third, in the areas of intelligence and counterintelligence—including identification, surveillance, infiltration, exposure, and destruction by all legal means of "terrorists'" cells, subversive networks, criminal enterprises, and other illicit conspiratorial groups within each State and Locality. Fourth, in the field of emergency response to any situation that might involve sudden, widespread, and serious dangers to large numbers of people—including enforcing quarantines; sealing off areas made dangerous by hazardous conditions or substances; transporting individuals to safety by evacuating them from those places; supplying endangered individuals in the affected areas with radiological, chemical, and biological decontamination equipment, water, food, temporary shelter, medical services, sanitation, basic communications and informational services, and engineering personnel and heavy equipment to remove debris and restore transportation networks; and patrolling against and suppressing rioters, looters, and other disorderly persons.

4. Although in keeping with *pre-*constitutional practices some substantial training of all Militiamen will be mandatory when "the Militia of the several States" are revitalized, the particular subjects, frequency, extent, and intensity of training will in the nature of things depend upon circumstances, including: (i) the level and immediacy of the perceived threats to the community; (ii) the knowledge, skills, and discipline to be imparted to a particular State's Militia as a whole, and to whatever specialized subgroups were established within it, in light of the peculiar problems of "homeland security" that the State and her Localities might face; (iii) the time, effort, and expense that might be required to train mere "civilians" whose education or experience had not prepared them for any type of Militia service; and (iv) the resources available for various programs of instruction. Also, although some redundancy would no doubt be unavoidable, if only in order to maintain adequate numbers of properly instructed reserves and replacements, "[a] well regulated Militia" should not train individuals simply for the sake of training. Moreover, during the initial stages of revitalizing the Militia, some individuals in groups {ii} and {iii} would already be at least partially trained for the special services to which they probably would be assigned, such as police, Sheriffs' deputies, fire-fighters, emergency-medical personnel, emergency-services workers, and employees of various other community-defense and community-service organizations who would be absorbed into the Militia directly in those capacities. These people would need only to undergo further general training in the basic principles of the Militia, along the lines of the instruction required for group {iv}, in order to become fully functional as Militiamen.

5. Training for members of "the Militia of the several States" would vary with the subject, the student, the situation, and the surroundings—being designed not only for specific tasks in a particular Locality but also in relationship to each individual's age, physical abilities, level of education, knowledge, skills, experience, aptitudes, and personal interests. But overall, in every jurisdiction, the goal would be to maximize Local preparedness and self-sufficiency by developing and deploying within each Local area a cluster of Militia Companies (or other small units) that contained a well-balanced mix of personnel—all sufficiently trained in every necessary discipline, and some exceptionally trained in certain selected disciplines—who were collectively capable of dealing in a timely and effective manner with whatever types of problems might most likely confront them, until more help arrived. Were a particular Locality too sparsely populated or otherwise unable to accomplish such a deployment, it would have to associate with one or more other Localities to that end. After all, ultimately self-government demands that WE THE PEOPLE themselves assume full responsibility for the public health, safety, and welfare within their own territory. The Militia are the primary instruments of self-government in America—the only establishments the Constitution identifies as "necessary to the security of a free State".[2247] Therefore, members of the Militia in each Locality (or group of cöoperating Localities) must be sufficiently trained so that they not only can assume that responsibility in principle but also can carry it out to a successful conclusion in practice.

[2247] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

CHAPTER FORTY-TWO

"[T]he Militia of the several States" are vested with the authority and responsibility to, and therefore must, provide every type of protection—whether political, economic, or social in character—that may be "necessary to the security of a free State" in every State, for the United States as a whole, and ultimately for WE THE PEOPLE under whatever form of government they may establish.

Organizing, arming, disciplining, and deploying "the Militia of the several States" can and should provide all of the protective services—in the contemporry jargon, "homeland security"—that may be "necessary to the security of a free State"[2248] at all times everywhere throughout America.

A. The Militia's supra-constitutional and constitutional protective authority and responsibilities. In American political philosophy and practice, "a free State" is not uniquely the product of a temporary constitution and laws enacted pursuant thereto, but embraces as well WE THE PEOPLE'S permanent status as sovereigns under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", even in the absence of a formal constitution and other positive laws, and in some circumstances in opposition to the constitution and laws that do exist. Thus, the Militia's protective authority and responsibilities—that is, WE THE PEOPLE'S authority and responsibility to provide "homeland security" in and through the Militia—arise and must be exercised in three political domains: (i) the supra-constitutional domain, under the aegis of the Declaration of Independence; (ii) the explicit constitutional domain of the General Government's delegated powers; and (iii) the explicit and implicit constitutional domains of the States' reserved powers.

1. Under the Declaration of Independence. The Militia are entitled to—indeed, must—supply political protection of a supra-constitutional character in at least two situations:

a. When WE THE PEOPLE'S existing "Form of Government becomes [actually and immediately] destructive of [men's unalienable rights]"—specifically, "when a long train of abuses and usurpations * * * evinces a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism"—then "it is the[People's] right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security". At that point, whatever purported constitution and laws "such Government" may affect will no longer merit, let alone command, THE PEOPLE'S obedience. Rather, politics will temporarily revert to an extra-constitutional state, ruled directly by the supra-constitutional principles of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". Because, in that state of affairs, it is THE PEOPLE'S "right" and "their duty, to throw off such Government", it must as well be "their right" and "their duty" to organize, equip, and deploy themselves collectively to do so with whatever protective forces they can muster on their own behalf. Self-evidently, THE PEOPLE will not be able "to provide new Guards for their future security" through the abusive "Form of Government['s]" own armed forces and professional law-enforcement agencies, which undoubtedly will attempt to aid and abet rogue public officials' march towards "absolute Despotism". No new "Form of Government" will exist. So THE PEOPLE will have no alternative except to brigade themselves in Militia imbued with the authority and responsibility, under the aegis of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", to protect their "unalienable Rights" by "throw[ing] off such Government" through the application of whatever force may be necessary in opposition to whatever parts of the rogue armed forces and police side with the aspiring despots.

---

[2248] U.S. Const. amend. II.

b. The Militia may also intervene directly under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" to provide themselves with political "homeland security" when THE PEOPLE'S "Form of Government" exhibits unmistakable tendencies in the direction of serious "abuses and usurpations", or perhaps simply serial blunders of a critical nature, which if not corrected will likely lead to infringements of men's "unalienable Rights", but which public officials fail, neglect, or refuse to correct—not perhaps to such a degree that their actions prove an actual "design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism", but to a degree sufficient to evidence willful blindness to or reckless disregard of the dangers those actions pose. Officials may simply be too ignorant to recognize that a serious problem exists. They may be unwilling to face up to the existence of the problem, because they do not know what to do about it. They may be loathe to admit that they have no idea as to how to proceed, because they fear to lose political face and suffer defeat at the next election. Or they may be less eager to consider what "the general Welfare" requires than to follow the directions of those special-interest groups that actually benefit from continuation and even exacerbation of the problem and will finance their campaigns for re-election on that basis. Whatever the underlying cause, if THE PEOPLE, through their Militia, may of right "throw off [an incorrigibly abusive] Government" entirely, with all the travail and even destruction and death that course may entail, then surely they may take extra-constitutional action to return a dangerously wayward "Form of Government" to its proper constitutional boundaries before that "Form" becomes so hopelessly corrupt that it must be "throw[n] off". For example, (i) when no statutes "provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union" or to "suppress Insurrections" under the particular circumstances at hand;[2249] or (ii) when the courts of both the General Government and the States have erroneously ruled that public officials have not violated the Constitution or laws, so that under the statutes in existence the Militia cannot be "call[ed] forth", and no officials dare to deploy the Militia in defiance of these aberrant judicial opinions—but in either case when THE PEOPLE know that the Militia must be "call[ed] forth" immediately, because irreparable harm is on the wing, and too much time remains for disaster to strike before the next elections.

Even in such a dire situation, THE PEOPLE through their Militia need not always resort immediately to physical force. Legal and moral force exercised through "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances"[2250] may, and in many cases will, suffice to correct the difficulties through nonviolent means.[2251] No "long train of abuses and usurpations" will ever occur if the first of them become the subjects of successful petitions for "redress". But for such petitions to be assured of success under the conditions in which their success is most critical, they must assert more than mere prayers for relief from abject subjects of "the Government". Mere remonstrances will not suffice. Rather, THE PEOPLE'S petitions must affirm their willingness and ability, as sovereigns over "the Government", to back up their demands for "redress", not simply by the threat, but by the certainty, of actual resistance on the part of masses of organized, armed, and disciplined individuals who know the nature and extent of their authority, and are willing to employ whatever physical force may be necessary to compel their "representatives" in public office to bow before that authority.

To be sure, for the Militia to return a wayward "Form of Government" to its proper constitutional boundaries through effective exercise of the freedom "to petition th[at] Government for a redress of grievances" may constitute intra- rather than *extra-*constitutional protective action, because the freedom "to petition", being guaranteed by the Constitution, is one of "the Laws of the Union" which the Constitution empowers the Militia "to execute".[2252] Yet, because the stupidity of public officials may shade imperceptibly into actual subversion which approaches the point where the "Form of Government" is irretrievably undermined, the Declaration of Independence should always be invoked along with the Constitution

---

[2249] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[2250] U.S. Const. amend. I.

[2251] See, e.g., Gene Sharp, Civilian-Based Defense: A Post-Military Weapons System (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part One, Power and Struggle (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part Two, The Methods of Nonviolent Action (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973); idem, The Politics of Nonviolent Action, Part Three, The Dynamics of Nonviolent Action (Boston, Massachusetts: Porter Sargent Publishers, 1973).

[2252] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

as the basis for the Militia's action. For, if "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[2253] one should "always use enough gun"—and the Declaration is Americans' political armament of the largest caliber available.

2. In service of the General Government. For the United States, the Constitution explicitly sets out the Militia's authority and responsibilities: namely, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"; and to "guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and * * * protect each of them against Invasion * * * or * * * against domestic Violence"—when "call[ed] forth" to be "employed" for one or more of those purposes "in the Service of the United States".[2254] To "guarantee * * * a Republican Form of Government" is part and parcel of "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union" (the Constitution itself being one such "Law[ ]"), and therefore comes squarely within the Militia's competence. To protect the States against "Invasion" and "domestic Violence" comes within the Militia's authority to "repel Invasions" and "suppress Insurrections".

3. On behalf of the several States. Finally, the Constitution addresses implicitly a very broad area of protective services that the Militia—and, for all practical purposes, only the Militia—can provide in aid of fulfillment of their States' duties to THE PEOPLE. The Militia are "necessary to the security of a free State".[2255] But no "free State" among the several States may simply sit back and enjoy her institutional "security" in insipid isolation, insouciance, indolence, and inactivity. To the contrary: "[I]t is not only the right, but the bounden and solemn duty of a state, to advance the safety, happiness and prosperity of its people, and to provide for its general welfare, by any and every act of legislation, which it may deem to be conducive to these ends".[2256] Each State, moreover, enjoys the full measure of legal authority necessary and sufficient to fulfill her duties to THE PEOPLE.

a. At the most basic and general level, that authority inheres in her "Police Power": "The police power of a State * * * springs from the obligation of the State to protect its citizens and provide for the safety and good order of society."[2257] The Police Power "is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the general government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive".[2258] The Police Power "is not granted by or derived from the Federal Constitution but exists independently

---

[2253] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2254] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; and art. IV, § 4.

[2255] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[2256] The Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty of the City of New York v. Miln, 36 U.S. (11 Peters) 102, 139 (1837) (emphasis supplied).

[2257] Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company v. State Highway Commission, 294 U.S. 613, 622 (1935).

[2258] In re Rahrer, 140 U.S. 545, 554 (1891).

of it, by reason of its never having been surrendered by the State to the General Government".[2259] The States possess the Police Power "in their sovereign capacity touching all subjects jurisdiction of which is not surrendered to the federal government".[2260] Thus, the Police Power is the primary subject of the Tenth Amendment with respect to the States, because it embraces all of "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, [which] are reserved to the States respectively". That being so, the Police Power is "one of the most essential of powers, at times the most insistent, and always one of the least limitable of the powers of government".[2261]

As with every other governmental power, though, the Police Power must be enforced in order to amount to something of practical consequence. Precisely because it is "one of the most essential of powers, at times the most insistent, and always one of the least limitable of the powers of government", the Police Power is most capably and reliably enforced by the Power of the Sword. Within the States, for all practical purposes the Power of the Sword lies ultimately in the hands of their Militia—because, of course, the States cannot constitutionally "keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress"; and if "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay", the States would hardly have the time to raise sufficient "Troops".[2262] In contrast, the Militia are "the Militia of the several States", permanent components of the Constitution's federal system, which the States must maintain at all times, whether Congress grants its "Consent" or not. For Congress's "Consent", or its disapproval for that matter, is as irrelevant to the existence of the Militia as it is to the existence of the States themselves.

The Militia and the Police Power, moreover, are perfectly matched as means and end. For just as with their Police Power, the States' duty to maintain and right to deploy "well regulated Militia" are "not granted by or derived from the * * * Constitution, but exist[ ] independently of it, by reason of [their] never having been surrendered by the State[s] to the General Government". The Constitution does delegate to Congress the powers "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" and "[t]o provide for * * * governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States", when they are "call[ed] forth to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[2263]

[2259] House v. Mayes, 219 U.S. 270, 282 (1911). Accord, California Reduction Company v. Sanitary Reduction Works of San Francisco, 199 U.S. 306, 318 (1905).

[2260] Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 524 (1934).

[2261] District of Columbia v. Brooke, 214 U.S. 138, 149 (1909), quoted in Eubank v. City of Richmond, 226 U.S. 137, 142-143 (1912).

[2262] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[2263] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 15.

But otherwise—and that entails the vast majority of imaginable instances—the power to organize, arm, discipline, and govern their Militia is, as with the Police Power, "a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the general government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution * * * and essentially exclusive". Thus, the States retain the plenary authority "in their sovereign capacit[ies]" to deploy their Militia "touching all subjects jurisdiction of which is not surrendered to the [General G]overnment". Which means all conceivable subjects other than "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions"—and even in those three cases whenever the Militia are in fact and law not "called into the actual Service of the United States".[2264]

b. All this being so, the practical reach of the States' Police Power—and therefore of the Militia's authority, responsibility, and usefulness for effectuating the various objects of that power within each of the several States respectively—is broad indeed. The power and the Militia's potential rôle in executing it "extend to the protection of the lives, health, and property of the[ir] citizens, and to the preservation of good order",[2265] and "embrace[ ] regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general prosperity, as well as regulations designed to promote the public health, the public morals or the public safety".[2266]

> An attempt to define [the Police Power's] reach or trace its outer limits is fruitless * * * .
>
> Public safety, public health, morality, peace and quiet, law and order—these are some of the more conspicuous examples of the traditional application of the police power to municipal affairs. Yet they merely illustrate the scope of the power and do not delimit it.[2267]

Nonetheless, although, in keeping with the admonition of the Tenth Amendment, the States traditionally have been afforded "great latitude" to legislate with respect to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet enjoyment of property of and by of all persons within their territories,[2268] no more than any other governmental power can the Police Power be wielded in a manner inconsistent with due process of law. Yet, in most of the typical situations of this type, "the guaranty of due process * * * demands only that [a State's] law shall not be unreasonable,

---

[2264] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 and art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied). See ante, at 871-880.

[2265] Beer Company v. Massachusetts, 97 U.S. 25, 33 (1877).

[2266] Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway Company v. Illinois ex rel. Grimwood, 200 U.S. 561, 592 (1906). Accord, Bacon v. Walker, 204 U.S. 311, 317 (1907); Eubank v. City of Richmond, 226 U.S. 137, 142 (1912); Sligh v. Kirkwood, 237 U.S. 52, 59 (1915).

[2267] Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 32 (1954).

[2268] Metropolitan Life Insurance Company v. Massachusetts, 471 U.S. 724, 756 (1985). Accord, Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr et vir, 518 U.S. 470, 475 (1996).

arbitrary or capricious, and that the means selected shall have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained".[2269]

c. Historically, the Police Power has focused on "[t]he dominant interest of the State in preventing violence and property damage".[2270] "The promotion of safety of persons and property is unquestionably at the core of the State's police power, and virtually all state and local governments employ a uniformed police force to aid in the accomplishment of that purpose."[2271] Self-evidently, when "the Militia of the several States" are revitalized, and "uniformed police force[s]" are absorbed into them as specialized units,[2272] this aspect of the States' Police Power will merge into and coalesce with their power to maintain "well regulated Militia".

But "[t]he promotion of safety of persons and property" under the Police Power does not stop with a State's simply "preventing violence and property damage" within her jurisdiction through deployment of her Militia. Every State's Police Power extends also to matters of "economic policy".

> So far as the requirement of due process is concerned, and in the absence of other constitutional restriction, a state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, and to enforce that policy by legislation adapted to its purpose. The courts are without authority either to declare such policy, or, when it is declared by the legislature, to override it.[2273]

And a State's "economic policy" may be as extensive and comprehensive as her legislature deems the prevailing conditions warrant.[2274] Moreover, the Constitution's federal system empowers and encourages the States' legislatures, within broad limits, to experiment with innovative policies in their efforts to achieve socially desirable results.[2275] In such endeavors, too, the Militia can and should play a key rôle.

Of particularly urgent concern today is the matter of how to maintain "the general prosperity" throughout America—when the National economy, and therefore the economies of every State, are increasingly threatened by the institutionalized fraud, corruption, and incompetence permeating this country's monetary and banking arrangements and the allied financial, business, and political

---

[2269] Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 525 (1934).

[2270] Auto Workers v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 351 U.S. 266, 274 (1956).

[2271] Kelley v. Johnson, 425 U.S. 238, 247 (1976).

[2272] See ante, at 327-328 and 1135-1138, and post, at 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488.

[2273] Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 537 (1934).

[2274] See Greene v. Frazier, 253 U.S. 233 (1920).

[2275] See, e.g., Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 597-598 (1977); Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726, 729-732 (1963); Fay v. New York, 332 U.S. 261, 294-296 (1947).

networks and enterprises centered around the Federal Reserve System. Most ominously, the best-informed experts in the theory and practice of money, banking, and both public and private finance predict the inevitable and unavoidable collapse of the Federal Reserve System's currency (Federal Reserve Notes) through hyperinflation in the foreseeable future, most likely accompanied or followed by a depression far more serious than took hold of the National economy during the 1930s.[2276] Some may dismiss predictions of this kind as too darkly pessimistic to be credited. But, as the folk wisdom has it, "a pessimist is actually an optimist who knows the facts". Undoubtable, though, is that, in the event of hyperinflation, depression, hyperinflation followed by depression, depression coupled with hyperinflation, or some other economic calamity arising out of the breakdown of the Federal Reserve System, every State's governmental finances and private economy will be thrown into chaos, with gravely detrimental effects upon the lives, health, safety, and prosperity of her citizens, and with consequences fatal to the preservation of good order throughout her territory. As of the present writing, however, no State is adequately prepared (if at all) to deal with this problem—because vanishingly few, if any, State officials can provide an immediate, unequivocal, and realistic answer to the questions: "If the Federal Reserve System collapses in hyperinflation in the near future, exactly what will the State and her citizens then use as their currency? And if no alternative sound currency is available, how will the State's government and her private economy continue to function with any semblance of normalcy?"

Fortunately, this question can be answered through application of the Police Power. For > the police power extends to all the great public needs. * * * It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage, or held by * * * strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare. Among matters of that sort probably few would doubt that both usage and preponderant opinion give their sanction to enforcing the primary conditions of successful commerce.[2277]

In particular, because "the prevention of deception is within the competency of government" through exercises of the Police Power,[2278] that power can be invoked

---

[2276] A good practical definition of "hyperinflation" is depreciation in the purchasing-power of a currency at the rate of 50% or more per month. On the likelihood of such a calamity occurring in the United States in the near future, see, e.g., the prescient analysis by Laurence J. Kotlikoff, "Is the United States Bankrupt?", Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis Review (July/August 2006), at 235, and especially at 241-242. Since the latter article was published, the scholarly and popular literature warning of such an eventuality has grown by leaps and bounds.

[2277] Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U.S. 104, 111 (1911).

[2278] Hall v. Geiger-Jones Company, 242 U.S. 539, 551 (1917).

and applied so as "to require honest weights and measures in the transaction of business" and "in the sale of articles of general consumption",[2279] "with a view to preventing fraud and facilitating commercial transactions".[2280] Moreover, > the power of the State to prevent frauds and impositions * * * applies as well to securities as to material products * * * . As to material products the purpose may be accomplished by a requirement of inherent purity. The intangibility of securities, they being representatives or purporting to be representatives of something else, * * * requires a difference of provision and the integrity of the securities can only be assured by the probity of the dealers in them and the information which may be given of them.[2281]

Importantly in this regard, modern paper currency is not, as many naive Americans imagine, really "money", but only a "security" (that is, a purported promise to pay "money") issued in lieu of "money".[2282] As the Supreme Court explained with respect to the legal-tender United States Treasury Notes of the Civil War (the first governmental paper currency issued in America since the War of Independence), > these notes are obligations of the United States. Their name [that is, "notes"] imports obligation. Every one of them expresses upon its face an engagement of the nation to pay to the bearer a certain sum. The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coined dollar of the United States; a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the government. No other dollars ha[ve] before been recognized by the legislation of the national government as lawful money.

>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [T]hese notes are obligations. They bind the national faith. They are, therefore, strictly securities.[2283]

No less important is that the Police Power can be employed for "the protection of a large class of laborers in the receipt of their just dues and in the promotion of the harmonious relations of capital and labor engaged in * * * industry in the State".[2284] For no segment of modern society is as dependent upon "honest

---

[2279] McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U.S. 539, 550 (1909); Schmidinger v. City of Chicago, 226 U.S. 578, 588 (1913).

[2280] Merchants Exchange of St. Louis v. Missouri ex rel. Barker, 248 U.S. 365, 368 (1919).

[2281] Hall v. Geiger-Jones Company, 242 U.S. 539, 552 (1917).

[2282] "Purported", because the promisor may renege on the promise.

[2283] New York ex rel. Bank of New York v. Board of Supervisors, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 26, 30-31 (1869).

[2284] McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U.S. 539, 550 (1909).

weights and measures in the [specifically financial] transaction[s] of business" as wage-earners, whose disposable wealth tends largely to consist of the money they acquire from one pay-period to another, either held as such in their personal possession or deposited in bank accounts.

Certainly no one can doubt that all of these principles and purposes of the Police Power apply with particular force to contemporary Federal Reserve Notes. For, although statutorily designated as "obligations of the United States" and "legal tender",[2285] Federal Reserve Notes do not constitute "honest weights and measures in the transaction of business", not only because they are not redeemable in any legally fixed amounts of either gold or silver,[2286] but also because both those Notes and the Federal Reserve System that emits them are unconstitutional.[2287] So the Police Power can and should be employed, as soon as practicable, to establish and put into common use in every State a new, constitutional, and economically sound medium of exchange that can serve as an alternative to, and compete with, Federal Reserve Notes before, and in any event without delay in the event of, the self-destruction of that currency. And an eminently practical—in the final analysis perhaps the only practical—way to accomplish this end would be to mobilize the Militia in each State to execute appropriate laws enacted under the Police Power.[2288]

d. Execution by the Militia of laws the States enact pursuant to their Police Power—whether in aid of fundamental monetary reform or otherwise—is constitutionally authorized, because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States"[2289]—that is, State establishments—and therefore, unless somehow precluded by the Constitution, can be called upon by the States and their people to serve all appropriate State and Local purposes.

(1) Plainly, the Constitution does not expressly prohibit the States' employment of their own Militia for purposes of executing their own Police Power. Neither does the Constitution do so impliedly of its own force. True enough, the Constitution specifies that the Militia may be "call[ed] forth" "to be employed in the Service of the United States"—but only for three particular purposes.[2290] Obviously, this express delegation of specific, limited authority impliedly prohibits the United States from "calling forth" the Militia for any other purpose. And it impliedly prohibits the States from "calling forth" their Militia "in the Service of the United States" for any other purpose, or even for those three purposes—unless

---

[2285] 12 U.S.C. § 411 and 31 U.S.C. § 5103.

[2286] Compare 12 U.S.C. § 411 with 31 U.S.C. § 5118(b) and (c).

[2287] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 1403-1524.

[2288] See post, at 1208-1233.

[2289] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[2290] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

Congress has failed, neglected, or refused "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" and a crisis (such as an "Invasion[ ]") demands that someone with at least residual authority "call[them] forth" immediately. But it could hardly mean that the States may call upon their own Militia for no other purposes whatsoever. For, were that the case, then the States could not employ their own Militia to enforce their own laws—for which purpose, of course, Congress could not "provide for calling forth the Militia", being limited to so providing only "to enforce the Laws of the Union". In addition, the States could not deploy their own Militia to suppress "domestic Violence" within their own borders—even though the Constitution foresees that the States might choose to do so on their own initiatives, inasmuch as it requires the United States to "protect each of them against * * * domestic Violence" only "on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened)".[2291] And the States could not muster their own Militia to "engage in War, * * * [when] actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay", even though the Constitution would permit them to raise or outfit regular "Troops, or Ships of War" at such junctures "without the Consent of Congress"[2292]—and notwithstanding that under such exigent circumstances regular "Troops, or Ships of War" could not possibly be made ready in time, whereas the Militia would always be organized, armed, and trained, and therefore could be activated at a moment's notice. So, unless one imagines that the Constitution requires the States to permit their own laws to remain unenforced—when their own Militia could enforce them; to allow their societies to be riven by "domestic Violence" unless they submit to occupation by the United States—when their own Militia could put down the disturbances directly; and to suffer their territories to be "actually invaded"—when their own Militia were the sole forces capable of opposing the invaders in time, the conclusion is inescapable that the States may call forth their Militia for any legitimate purpose of their own.

Furthermore, although Congress may "make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution" its "Power[ ]" "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia",[2293] it cannot preclude the States, under the guise of "necessary and proper" legislation, from employing their own Militia for their own protection. First, so precluding the States would not "call[ ] forth * * * the Militia" for any of the three constitutionally mandated purposes, and therefore would not "carry[ ] into Execution" that "Power[ ]" of Congress at all. Second, even if in such legislation Congress assigned priority to "employ[ing] the Militia in the Service of the United States" over the Militia's employment for any other purpose, as it would

---

[2291] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2292] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[2293] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 18 and 15.

be constitutionally entitled to do,[2294] it would not have to exclude the States' employment of their Militia for other purposes when the Militia were not needed "in the Service of the United States"—so any such general exclusion would not qualify as "necessary and proper" to establish or enforce such a priority. Third, were Congress to prohibit the States' employment of their own Militia for their own purposes under all circumstances, the Militia would hardly deserve designation as "the Militia of the several States", because, except for "the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress" so that the Militia could engage in "the Service of the United States",[2295] the Militia would retain no significant State character. They would, in effect, become "the Militia of the United States", because they could serve no specifically State purpose at all. Legislation that so transmogrified the constitutional character of the Militia and turned the Constitution's federal structure upside down could not possibly be "necessary and proper" or binding in any way upon the States, because it would not be a "Law[ ] * * * made in Pursuance [of the Constitution]", but instead an usurpation of authority in defiance and even destruction of "the supreme Law of the Land".[2296]

Thus, on the basis of the express terms of the constitutionally delegated powers of Congress, and of the controlling principle of constitutional construction that "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people",[2297] the States retain the authority to employ their Militia for any legitimate purpose of their own.

(2) Were more proof of this conclusion necessary, the Second Amendment would supply it. Because the Amendment declares the Militia to be "necessary to the security of a free State", they must be capable both in law and in fact of providing, in each and every State, whatever protective services are "necessary to the security of a free State" in addition to the three constitutionally enumerated services for which Congress is "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" (and even those services, too, in the event of a default by Congress). These three services, after all, are not the only protections that "the security of a free State" needed in the late 1700s or that it needs today. For example, at the present time, serious economic problems have arisen that probably the Militia alone can solve, and then perhaps only one State at a time.[2298] In addition, the exact challenges of "homeland security" will likely be different in each State, and will vary from time to time with changing

---

[2294] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 and art. VI, cl. 2.

[2295] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2296] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2297] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[2298] See post, at 1208-1233.

circumstances—and only the people of each State, who are closest to the scene and most highly motivated to succeed, will be qualified to identify those challenges, to determine who and what may be necessary to meet them, and to mobilize the necessary personnel and resources to do the job.

(3) That is not all. The Constitution provides that "[t]his Constitution * * * shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding", and that "the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers * * * of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution".[2299] In order to have actual functioning "Militia of the several States" and to provide whatever is "necessary to the security of a free State" in each State, the States must employ their Militia for all the possible purposes of "homeland security" other than the three the Constitution enumerates, because Congress lacks authority "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" for any of those other purposes. And to that end, "the Members of the several State Legislatures" must enact suitable legislation providing for "well regulated Militia" to perform all of the functions of "homeland security" appertaining to their respective States; the States' "executive * * * Officers" must execute such legislation; and the States' "judicial Officers" must hold such legislation constitutional and enforce it. Thus, rather than providing a pretext or an excuse for preventing the States from using their Militia for their own purposes, the very supremacy of the Constitution over State law compels them to do so.

(4) The foregoing, of course, are largely legal considerations. The same conclusion arises, though, from consideration of practicalities. At any particular time, there might exist no "Armies" or "Navy" capable of providing sufficient "homeland security" to all, or even any, of the several States.[2300] Or rogue Members of Congress or a rogue President might prevent the "Armies" and "Navy" that did exist from protecting one or more of the States—as is the case at present, when both Congress and the President refuse to employ the Armed Forces to seal America's border with Mexico against an inundation of illegal immigrants, let alone to threaten the narco-gangsters in the Mexican ruling class with forcible "régime change" if they do not deploy Mexico's own armed forces along her northern border for that purpose. Or the "Armies" and "Navy" might prove themselves to be the "large military establishments and standing armies" that afford "facile means * * * to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people"[2301]—as is the case at present, when the Department of Homeland Security is increasingly integrating units of the regular Armed Forces

---

[2299] U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3.

[2300] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13.

[2301] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

into its domestic para-military police-state apparatus with, suspiciously, nary a dissenting voice being heard in the Pentagon.[2302] And Congress might withhold its "Consent" for the States to "keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace"[2303]—which it has done, except for those raised for the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and so-called State "Defense Forces".[2304] In such circumstances, only the Militia would and do remain as permanent constitutionally mandated establishments capable of providing the States with forces adequate for self-defense.

It would be inane to contend that the States could be deprived of the independent use of their own Militia because they could always fall back upon State and Local police departments and kindred law-enforcement agencies for at least Local "homeland security". Typical police departments today are simply too small and too inadequately trained and equipped in too many areas to provide "the security of a free State". Besides being unable to "repel Invasions" by any foreign forces that could actually mount "Invasions", they cannot defend their communities against truly extensive "Insurrections" or outbreaks of "domestic Violence", particularly the massive social dislocations that would surely erupt out of a National economic breakdown characterized by hyperinflation, depression, or especially depression preceded by or coupled with hyperinflation. More to the point, the Constitution does not mention "police" establishments at all, let alone mandate them as "necessary to" (or even suggest that they might be sufficient for) "the security of a free State". To be sure, if police departments were not separate entities at all, but instead were subunits of the Militia (as they ought to be), then they could claim to be "necessary to the security of a free State"—but only because they were integral parts of the Militia, not in their own right.[2305]

B. The Militia more necessary today than ever before. Such detailed consideration of the federal structure and responsibilities of "the Militia of the several States" with respect to active service is not of merely academic interest. Contrary to the rationalizations seized upon by those citizens who are simply too slothful to contribute their due efforts to the defense of their community, and to the black propaganda generated by special-interest groups the nefarious political schemes of which depend upon suppression of the Militia, the Militia are not the

---

[2302] See post, Chapter 47.

[2303] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[2304] 32 U.S.C. § 109(a) and (c). For the historical development, see An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 61, 39 Stat. 166, 198; AN ACT To amend section 61 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, by adding a proviso which will permit States to organize military units not a part of the National Guard, and for other purposes, Act of 21 October 1940, CHAPTER 904, 54 Stat. 1206; and AN ACT To amend section 61 of the National Defense Act to permit the States to organize military forces, other than as parts of their National Guard units, to serve while the National Guard is in active Federal Service, Act of 27 September 1950, CHAPTER 1058, 64 Stat. 1072.

[2305] See ante, at 327-328, 1135-1138, and post, at 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488.

somehow outdated, obsolete, impotent, and even slightly comical vestiges of a bygone era. Quite the contrary.

1. As a matter of law. The Second Amendment declares that "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed".[2306] That the Amendment phrases its nominative absolute clause in the present tense compels the conclusion that "[a] well regulated Militia" is required now, whenever "now" may be. To the same effect, the powers of Congress, the status of the President, and the powers reserved to the States and to the people with respect to the Militia are all couched in the present-cum-future or the present imperative tense ("[t]he Congress shall have Power" and "[t]he President shall be Commander in Chief")[2307] or in the simple present passive tense ("are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people").[2308] The original Constitution and the Second Amendment have never been amended in any of these verbal particulars, and therefore mean today precisely what they meant in 1788 and 1791. And that meaning requires Americans in this era—whether public officials or private citizens—to maintain "the Militia of the several States" to exactly the same extent and in exactly the same state of readiness as Americans maintained their Militia during the pre-constitutional era, changing only what needs to be changed to comport that degree of readiness with the novel contemporary challenges of "homeland security" and to take advantage of the technological advances available in modern times.

Moreover, WE THE PEOPLE who "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution"[2309] still constitute both the sole sovereigns in this country and "the Militia of the several States". For that reason, to disparage the Militia as obsolete is to condemn popular self-government and "a free State" as obsolete, too—or, at a more basic level, to contend that the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'"[2310] should be held in the hands of someone other than THE PEOPLE themselves, so that THE PEOPLE become the abject subjects of the gun, not its absolute masters. "Governments * * * deriv[e] their just powers from the consent of the governed" from day to day only when and to the degree that THE PEOPLE are fully capable of withdrawing that "consent" and making that withdrawal effective, even to the extent of "alter[ing] or * * * abolish[ing the Government], and * * * institut[ing] new Government".[2311] Self-evidently, that may require THE PEOPLE to

---

[2306] Emphasis supplied.

[2307] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (applicable to all other clauses in that section), and art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphases supplied).

[2308] U.S. Const. amend. X (emphasis supplied).

[2309] U.S. Const. preamble.

[2310] See Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2311] Declaration of Independence.

take up arms in their collective self-defense, perhaps sooner rather than later. So, Americans labor under a duty imposed by both the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence to find a way to make the Militia work in the contemporary context.

If such is not the case—if the Militia are in fact useless for the Constitution's and the Declaration's purposes, or if those purposes are no longer relevant for modern Americans—then the Constitution and the Declaration should not simply be disregarded and the Militia left in disarray and desuetude, but instead the Constitution should be amended, or the Declaration should be abrogated, or both, after full and fair debate throughout the several States.

2. As a matter of fact. Properly revitalized Militia would be anything but useless today. It is not accurate to claim that "things were simpler" in the *pre-*constitutional era than they are now. In fact, the things most important to "homeland security" were not simpler. The technology in the service of the enemies who confronted Americans during *pre-*constitutional times—in terms of the armaments and tactics of pirates, hostile Indians, the French, and later the British—was essentially the same as the technology that Americans themselves brought into the field in response to those threats. Americans' enemies enjoyed the signal advantage, though, that systems of communications and transportation were primitive. If they struck suddenly in one vulnerable place, other places would be informed only much later, and could not always dispatch timely assistance even after the alarm had reached them. Thus, the disadvantages imposed simply by distance and the ignorance that distance caused greatly complicated planning for "homeland security". Which is why Americans in those days organized themselves in Militia units at the Local levels throughout their territories—so as to be sure to have some forces already on the ground whenever and wherever dangers might suddenly arise. Today, as long as modern forms of communications and transportation continue to function, the difficulties posed simply by distance have been largely attenuated, if not entirely obviated. In that respect, "things are simpler" now than they were then. In addition, if America's contemporary enemies, both at home and abroad, can dispose of advanced technology, so can her defenders, and probably to a far greater degree. Moreover, America can enlist far more men—and women, too—in revitalized "Militia of the several States" at the present time than at any other. So, to the extent that problems of "homeland security" can be solved through the dispersal of large numbers of well-trained Militiamen in Local communities with the commitment and ability not only to defend themselves but also to support one another in any conceivable crisis, this country is far better able to make such a system work today than it was ever before in its history.

Indeed, in this respect (as in so many others) the Constitution has proven to be, not anachronistic, but amazingly prophetic—for Militia revitalized today would be uniquely suitable for the provision of America's "homeland security". True enough, much more so than the original thirteen Colonies and independent States, the contemporary United States are of immense size in terms both of territory and population, and of elaborate geographical, economic, and social diversity, containing great cities, small towns, suburbs of every description, rural areas, and extensive tracts of uninhabited land. Properly organized, however, revitalized Militia would have some physical presence everywhere that some of WE THE PEOPLE were to be found and could make their presence felt. Being essentially omnipresent, the Militia would enjoy excellent intelligence that would enable them to discern threats to "homeland security" in good time—and so forewarned they could employ the most modern means of communications and transportation to mobilize, bring forth, and deploy at a moment's notice the maximum forces available. Firearms, ammunition, and various accoutrements suitable for the Militia's first responsibility—that is, military, para-military, police, and in extreme situations guerrilla and other irregular operations—are already widely dispersed among tens of millions of individuals who know basically how to use them, and would require only a little more training to become reasonably proficient in their new duties. For the performance of all other responsibilities, an extremely wide variety of knowledge, skills, and experiences is diffused throughout the populace in every State, so that revitalized Militia drawing upon those talents could tailor-make their responses to whatever situations confronted them. Not only would revitalized Militia be extremely flexible and efficient, and therefore economical, because they were actual residents of the affected areas who intimately knew the lay of the land in every respect, but also and perhaps most importantly they would not constitute what people on the scene might consider an alien force of occupation (as would, for instance, detachments from the regular Armed Forces deployed for the first time in some area in which a major threat to "homeland security" had arisen). The Militia would uniquely sympathize with and enjoy the support of the Local population, and would carry out their duties with scrupulous regard for Local rights, customs, traditions, and mores, precisely because they were the Local population.

3. As a matter of permanent political principle. Even a passing conversance with contemporary political reality will convince any thoughtful American that revitalized Militia are needed now more than ever before. The Constitution has proven prophetic with regard to what is "necessary to the security of a free State" precisely because human nature—especially its darker side—has not changed since the end of the pre-constitutional era (or, for that matter, since the dawn of recorded history). The response to the threat is different today—for example, modern equipment and methods of deployment have supplanted flintlock firearms and linear battlefield tactics—but the ultimate source of the most pressing danger is always the same and always at work: namely, that "all power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely".[2312] Revitalized Militia would provide the best security that could be devised for "a free State" not only against invasions, insurrections, rebellions, widespread domestic violence, and wholesale violations of the laws by common criminals, but also against those especially dangerous political violations of the laws by faithless public officials known as "usurpation" and "tyranny". That, after all, is the Militia's perpetual task—the people's eternal political vigilance always being the price of their liberty.

As Americans of the *pre-*constitutional era learned from the English political philosopher John Locke (among others), > Usurpation is a kind of Domestick Conquest, with this difference, that an Usurper can never have Right on his side, it being no Usurpation but where one is got into the Possession of what another has Right to.[2313]

> In all lawful Governments the designation of the Persons, who are to bear Rule, is as natural and necessary a part, as the Form of the Government it self, and is that which had its Establishment originally from the People. Hence all Common wealths with the Form of Government established, have Rules also of appointing those, who are to have any share in the publick Authority; and settled methods of conveying the right to them. * * * Whoever gets into the exercise of any part of the Power, by other ways, than what the Laws of the Community have prescribed, hath no Right to be obeyed, though the Form of the Commonwealth be still preserved; since he is not the Person the Laws have appointed, and consequently not the Person the People have consented to.[2314]

Usurpers, therefore, include not only those who contrive to insinuate themselves unlawfully into public office, but also those lawfully in office who purport to exercise powers that belong, not to their own offices, but to some other offices or persons altogether.

The latter circumstance is obviously more problematical than the former. The rule is simple enough: "The doing of one thing which is authorized cannot be made the source of an authority to do another thing which there is no power to do."[2315] Application of this rule, though, is not always self-evident. An individual brazenly impersonating a public official is usually easy enough to unmask and punish.[2316] But exposing an otherwise legitimate official's calculated misconstruction

---

[2312] J. Dalberg-Acton, Essays, ante note 1563, at 519.

[2313] Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XVII, § 197 (emphasis in the original).

[2314] Id., Book II, Chapter XVII, § 198 (emphasis supplied).

[2315] Wilson v. New, 243 U.S. 332, 345 (1917).

[2316] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 912.

and misapplication of the laws relating to his office may require complex legal analysis and the amassing of a detailed evidentiary record to make out a case against him.[2317] Yet, in any constitutional republic, ceaseless and resolute vigilance in this regard is essential, because an unremedied usurpation in the latter sense amounts to a denial and defeat of a government of delegated, and therefore limited, powers. For when a rogue public official attempts to exercise powers not delegated to him, he necessarily disregards some of the definitions of power, destroys some of the limitations on power, and thus circumvents a portion of the "checks and balances" against misuses or abuses of power built into the Constitution. If uncorrected, his misbehavior stands as a contradiction to, if not a mockery of, constitutionalism itself. For example, if some official in the General Government purports to exercise—for any purpose and to any degree—a particular power that WE THE PEOPLE have not delegated to the General Government, he is an usurper, because "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people".[2318] The particular power such an individual wrongly tries to exercise is not invalid in and of itself; and his exercise of other powers appurtenant to his office may still be proper; but his exercise of that particular power is illegitimate and without effect ab initio and in toto, because that particular power is capable of being exercised, not by anyone in the General Government (himself included), but only by the States or the people.

As Americans in *pre-*constitutional times also absorbed from such as Locke,

> [a]s Usurpation is the exercise of Power, which another hath a Right to; so Tyranny is the exercise of Power beyond Right, which no Body can have a Right to. And this is making use of the Power any one has in his hands; not for the good of those, who are under it, but for his own private separate Advantage. When the Governour, however intituled, makes not the Law, but his Will, the Rule; and his Commands and Actions are not directed to the preservation of the Properties of his People, but the satisfaction of his own Ambition, Revenge, Covetousness, or any other irregular Passion.[2319]
>
> 'Tis a Mistake to think this Fault is proper only to Monarchies; other Forms of Government are liable to it, as well as that. For where-ever the Power that is put in any hands for the Government of the People, and the Preservation of their Properties, is applied to other ends, and made use of to impoverish, harass, or subdue them to the Arbitrary and Irregular Commands

[2317] See. e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

[2318] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[2319] Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XVIII, § 199 (emphasis in the original).

> of those that have it: There it presently becomes Tyranny, whether those that thus use it are one or many.[2320]

Thus, tyranny may amount simply and obviously to a claim of some power that no one ought to have—a denial of the fundamental principles that governments may exercise only "just powers" derivable by right reason from "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God",[2321] and that "there are * * * rights in every free government beyond the control of the State", "limitations on * * * [the] power [of public officials] which grow out of the essential nature of all free governments. Implied reservations of individual rights, without which the social compact could not exist and which are respected by all governments entitled to the name".[2322] In this sense, tyranny does not qualify as a proper form of government at all, but instead amounts to the very negation of government.

More subtly, tyranny also may consist of the exercise of otherwise "just powers" for the manifestly unjust purpose of subordinating the public good to the selfish gain of the tyrant and his cronies. For example, if some official in the General Government purports to exercise a particular power that WE THE PEOPLE have actually delegated to the General Government, but in such wise as intentionally or recklessly to defeat, frustrate, or subvert "the common defence" or "the general Welfare",[2323] in order to feather his own nest and the nests of his hangers-on, he is a tyrant. To forefend which, no doubt, explicit limitations of governmental authority to "the common defence" and "the general Welfare" appear twice in the Constitution—once in the Preamble, which applies to all governmental powers, and once as a specific constraint on Congress's power "[t]o lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States".[2324]

Of crucial importance in American jurisprudence is that, because by hypothesis neither an usurper nor a tyrant enjoys any license to misappropriate someone else's powers, to misuse "just powers" for malign ends, or to attempt to exercise unjust powers, therefore his supposed commands—whether labeled "statutes", "joint resolutions", "executive orders", "proclamations", "national-security decision directives", "administrative regulations", "judicial decisions", or the even more problematic "judicial opinions"—are purely and simply void. The acts of an usurper or tyrant as such are necessarily unconstitutional. And "an unconstitutional act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords [2320] Id., Book II, Chapter XVIII, § 201 (emphasis supplied).

[2321] Declaration of Independence (emphasis supplied).

[2322] Loan Association v. City of Topeka, 87 U.S. (20 Wallace) 655, 662-663 (1875).

[2323] U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

[2324] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed"[2325]—"it binds no one, and protects no one".[2326]

This was the principle that animated the Declaration of Independence. Yet, long before the Declaration, Locke had already taught Americans that, > if either the[ ] illegal Acts [of public officeholders] have extended to the Majority of the People; or if the Mischief and Oppression has light only on some few, but in such Cases, as the Precedent, and Consequences seem to threaten all, and they are perswaded in their Consciences, that their Laws, and with them their Estates, Liberties, and Lives are in danger, and perhaps their Religion too, how they will be hindered from resisting illegal force, used against them, I cannot tell.[2327]

> But if all the World shall observe Pretences of one kind, and Actions of another; Arts used to elude the Law, and the Trust of Prerogative (which is an Arbitrary Power in some things left in the Prince's hand to do good, not harm to the People) employed contrary to the end, for which it was given: if the People shall find the Ministers, and subordinate Magistrates chosen suitable to such ends, and favoured, or laid by proportionably, as they promote, or oppose them: If they see several Experiments made of Arbitrary Power * * * : if a long Train of Actings shew the Councils all tending one way, how can a Man any more hinder himself from being perswaded in his own Mind, which way things are going; or from casting about how to save himself * * * ?[2328]

Towards the close of the *pre-*constitutional era, Americans experienced serial usurpations by the British government—at that time, their very own government—that traveled the tortuous trail towards tyranny: As the Declaration of Independence charged, "[t]he history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States". This conduct, the Declaration averred, warranted the most serious political conclusion: namely, that "[a] Prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people". As a consequence, Americans were "Absolved from all Allegiance" to, and could "totally dissolve[ ]" "all political connection" with, him. Moreover, they might forcibly resist his efforts to regain control over them. For, the Declaration asserted, "when a long train of abuses and [2325] Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886) (emphasis supplied).

---

[2326] Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 97, 102 (1887) (emphasis supplied).

[2327] Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XVIII, § 209 (emphasis in the original).

[2328] Id., Book II, Chapter XVIII, § 210 (emphasis in the original).

usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security".

Neither Locke nor the Declaration, however, specified how American patriots could or should "resist[ ] illegal force" and exercise their right and fulfill their duty "to throw off such Government". By July of 1776, though, every patriot already knew without being told. At the outbreak of hostilities, because no Colonial army existed anywhere from New Hampshire to Georgia, the Colonial Militia formed the indispensable first line of defense. Indeed, what had sparked the initial actual shooting in the War of Independence had been the attempt by British General Thomas Gage on 19 April 1775 to render the Massachusetts Militia impotent—and thereby to place that Colony at the mercy of her oppressors—by seizing the Colonists' martial stores at Concord. No patriot needed further evidence as to "which way things were going"—and of where he stood and what he stood to lose unless he stood to—when Captain John Parker commanded the Militiamen on Lexington Green to stand their ground: "Don't fire unless fired upon, but if they mean to have a war let it begin here."[2329]

The Declaration of Independence and the American Militia were perfectly matched as the purpose to its instruments, the reason to its resources—not just circumstantially and operationally, but also legally. The Declaration maintained that "it is the[People's] right, it is their duty, to throw off" any government that aimed at "reduc[ing] them under absolute Despotism", and then "to provide new Guards for their future security". Easily enough could the Colonists have found the "right" of resistance in "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God": specifically, the privilege of communal self-defense, against not only common criminals, but also and especially political criminals. For, as Blackstone taught, "[s]elf-defence * * * as it is justly called the primary law of nature, so it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[2330] So no purported "government" could lawfully disarm its citizens that it might the more easily plunder, oppress, and slaughter them. Even more readily could patriotic Americans have discovered their duty of resistance in the requirements of all the pre-constitutional Militia Acts that every able-bodied free man should keep and bear arms in his community's defense. Whether all men everywhere, in every society, then labored under such a duty in some theoretical sense, Americans certainly did as a matter of their actual traditions, history, experience, and personal practices—all codified and enforced by law, generation after generation. Therefore, even if the Declaration of Independence had exaggerated, and resistance to usurpation and tyranny had been a duty "natural" to no one else on earth, yet it surely was a duty peculiarly suited to and incumbent upon Americans, because their social and political order had long presupposed it and put it into operation.

---

[2329] See, e.g., E. Forbes, Paul Revere, ante note 127, at 268.

[2330] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

In 1775, Lexington and Concord demonstrated more than that the Militia were necessary and sufficient for opposing usurpation and tyranny with lead and steel. For more had been at stake than simply brute force against force. The contest begun there was one of right against might. As Captain Parker warned his men, "if they mean to have a war let it begin here". The soldiery the British usurpers and tyrants sent into the field were agents of aggression and oppression. The Militia's resistance was defensive. That was the complete answer to Major John Pitcairn's contemptuous commands: "Ye villains, ye Rebels, disperse; damn you, disperse!" "Lay down your arms; damn you, why don't you lay down your arms!"[2331] Because free men with a duty to keep and bear arms never willingly lay down their arms. And at Lexington, none of them did.[2332]

As one of the patriots who mustered that day later recalled, "what we meant in going for those Redcoats was this: we always had governed ourselves and we always meant to. They didn't mean we should."[2333] So, this being the ultimate political lesson that Lexington teaches, one must conclude that le plus ça change le plus c'est la même chose—except that things have decidedly deteriorated since 1775. America is still plagued by actual usurpers and aspiring tyrants—now ensconced in both the General Government and the governments of many States, or grasping for unmerited public offices in the future—who most definitely do not want WE THE PEOPLE to govern themselves. And already the excesses of King George III's ministerial government pale in comparison to these modern miscreants' misdeeds. But far worse is near at hand, because even the King's most malevolent minions never set themselves to impose totalitarianism of the modern stripe on their American subjects. They were neither practitioners nor even students of Marxism, Leninism, Stalinism, Naziism, socialism, fascism, or other of the entries in the dark litany of convoluted ideologies and malignant political "isms" cobbled together during the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries in order to rationalize looting, oppressing, and enslaving the mass of common humanity, and kidnapping, falsely imprisoning, or even murdering those who might dare to resist under the aegis of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". The most fanatical proponents of expanding the British Empire in the Eighteenth Century never imagined in their

---

[2331] Jonas Clark, The Fate of Blood-thirsty Oppressors, and GOD's tender Care of his distressed People. A SERMON PREACHED AT LEXINGTON, April 19, 1776, TO WHICH IS ADDED, A Brief NARRATIVE of the principal Transactions of that Day (Boston, Massachusetts: Powers and Willis, 1776), reprinted in The Battle of Lexington: A Sermon & Eyewitness Narrative (Ventura, California: Nordskog Publishing, 2007), at 57. See, e.g., E. Forbes, Paul Revere, ante note 127, at 268; David H. Fischer, Paul Revere's Ride (New York, New York: Oxford University Press, 1994), at 190-191.

[2332] D. Fischer, Paul Revere's Ride, ante note 2331, at 191.

[2333] Quoted in id. at 164.

wildest reveries that they could create a single global engine of complete political, economic, and social control, eclipsing the nations and amalgamating all of the peoples of the earth into one homogeneous crowd of submissive peons endlessly toiling for the benefit of a tiny ruling class of self-selected élitist masters. Yet that mad dream animates today's usurpers and tyrants, in America and throughout the world.[2334]

Inasmuch as the political dangers that confronted Americans in the past have not changed, or even abated, but rather have intensified in the modern era, contemporary patriots' responses to those dangers must not change either, but must become even more systematic, more thorough, and more determined than ever they were. If "well regulated militia" of the pre-constitutional pattern proved necessary then, they must be absolutely indispensable now—for, even more now than then, they constitute the only means to mobilize, organize, arm, discipline, and deploy "the body of the people, trained to arms" in self-defense against the monstrous machinery of repression and exploitation which the people's enemies have set up and set in motion.[2335] No compromise with these enemies is possible. One side in the struggle must emerge on top, the other must go under. WE THE PEOPLE—or at least the patriots who will come forward to lead them—can prevail because they enjoy the advantage of constituting "the big battalions" in overwhelming numbers; they are in, or are capable of easily taking, actual physical possession of almost all of the valuable property in America; they are already armed, and at least rudimentarily trained, to a very large degree; they are convinced of the justice of their cause; and they realize that this is America's and even the world's last stand. For if America of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution falls, then the whole world will enter a dark age without historical parallel, because no other country or people can possibly fend off the forces of global tyranny.

C. Next to no limitations on who must actually serve in the Militia. The Militia could not provide every type of protection that might be "necessary to the security of a free State" unless they consisted of sufficient numbers of individuals who could actually be deployed in each and every form of service required, whenever and wherever required, for such "security". So limitations on Militiamen's duty to perform personal service must be few and far between. For that reason, although the principles of "[a] well regulated Militia" derived from pre-constitutional practices do allow for Congress and the States to exercise some discretion in organizing, arming, equipping, disciplining, and training the Militia, they simultaneously impose strictures on that discretion.

[2334] See, e.g., an early candid summary of the basic teleology of and technology for this scheme, with illuminating charts, in Hans Heymann, Plan for Permanent Peace (New York, New York: Harper & Brothers Publishers, 1941).

[2335] See Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

1. Performance of some useful service required of everyone capable of performing any service in the Militia. Because every "well regulated militia" consists of "the body of the people, trained to arms",[2336] and because training of so many individuals would be wasteful if not useless were each of them not to be called forth for some service at some time during his enrollment, Congress and particularly the States must take care to ensure that everyone eligible for the Militia actually serves in some capacity at some time. To fulfill the Militia's purpose of maximizing "homeland security", service must be in some manner near-universal, ubiquitous, and compulsory. To be sure, there can and should be different duties that may require some members of the Militia to be far more, or far less, active than others; for "[t]hey also serve who only stand and wait".[2337] But if "only stand" they must, then "only stand" they shall.

a. During "alarms", of course, every member of the Militia may be called upon to muster and serve in some manner in the field at the same time, albeit not necessarily in the very same way, in the very same place, or in the very same Local units as his neighbors.[2338] Because on such dire occasions everyone who is physically able will probably be impressed into service somehow or other, everyone must become ready to meet the challenge before those occasions arise. This is why possession of basic equipment and some minimum amount of training in its use and in related skills must be mandatory for everyone, including even those who might qualify for exemptions from most normal duty.

b. Except in the most extraordinary cases, though, even members of revitalized Militia who were excused from the full burden of normal service and enrolled on "the alarm list" because they were too old for rigorous work or were in an exempted public office or private occupation would still have some regular duties to fulfill. This, for two reasons. First, as a matter of principle, every member of the community who can do so should personally contribute in some degree to the provision of its security so that he can rightfully claim by his own efforts a share in the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'" through the Militia.[2339] Second, as a practical matter, not all Militia services would need to be performed in the field, by individuals in top-flight physical condition, or every day. For example, personal possession of firearms and ammunition suitable for Militia service, and routine maintenance to assure that they were in good working order—which would be incumbent upon every member of the Militia (other than

---

[2336] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2337] John Milton, Sonnet XIX: "When I consider how my light is spent", Poems (London, England: Thomas Dring, 1673).

[2338] As used here, "in the field" refers to activities undertaken outside of Militiamen's own homes. All Militiamen (other than conscientious objectors) will always serve in their homes, too, if only by maintaining possession there of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements.

[2339] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

conscientious objectors)—would of necessity be done at home, and would require little effort. Then, too, no sound reason exists why during periods of tranquillity Militiamen of advanced years who could be assigned to or who would volunteer for various routine administrative and other "housekeeping" duties could not perform those tasks largely over the Internet in the relative comfort of their own homes on an "as-needed" basis. So, the age-limit for a modern "alarm list" could and should be expanded well beyond the fifty, fifty-five, or even sixty years that were customary during the pre-constitutional era. Today, the test for whether a particular individual ought to perform some service in the Militia should focus, not arbitrarily on his age, but realistically on his ability. This would have the advantage of retaining within the Militia individuals of advanced years whose extensive experience would have enabled them to cultivate such virtues as discernment, prudence, wisdom, humility, patriotism, and self-sacrifice.

c. Although those members of revitalized Militia not on "the alarm list"—who during the pre-constitutional period would have been enrolled in "the Trained Bands"—would be required to perform some active service on a regular basis, they would not all be engaged in the same types of Militia activity at all times and under all circumstances. Rather, in assigning duties, the Militia would take advantage of the larger number of Militiamen with more varied skills than were available in prior eras, and would take account of the necessity to spread the burden of active service widely in order to maintain the economic and social order in a state of normalcy to the greatest degree possible. After all, the Militia would not prove "necessary to the security of a free State" if their excessive demands on the most productive segments of the populace resulted in undermining the economy or generating social friction. Duties could be allocated in several ways:

(1) Some members of the Militia would volunteer for or be assigned to special full-time duty, for which they would receive adequate compensation—such as in Local and State police forces, Sheriffs' departments, fire and rescue units, and other law-enforcement and emergency-services agencies. As the Militia were revitalized, existing bodies of these kinds would simply be absorbed into them in toto, the members' service in such specialized agencies being accounted as their full Militia service.[2340]

(2) Some, perhaps many, members of the Militia could be expected to volunteer for other duties—particularly when common Americans finally realized that their continued freedom and prosperity are impossible of attainment without self-government, that self-government is impossible without personal participation, and that effective personal participation is impossible without the institutional structure of the Militia through which to mobilize and direct individuals' efforts.

[2340] See ante, at 337-328 and 1135-1138, and post, at 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488.

Yet, because initially volunteers select themselves, reliance on them would always be a chancy business that required discernment and discrimination in any unit that might accept them. After all, on the one hand, an individual volunteer may be more valuable to the community serving in a civilian capacity than as a Militiaman serving in the field; or, on the other hand, an individual volunteer may be of little use in the civilian community, but at least minimally desirable for Militia duty. Without due care in the process of selection of volunteers, the Militia could end up absorbing too many of the bad along with too few of the good, or depriving the civilian community of too many of the good along with relieving it of too few of the bad. In any event, although anyone would be welcome to volunteer for some particular type of service in revitalized Militia, no one could claim a "right" to his own choice of service (except for conscientious objectors, who should be allowed to assert a right not to engage in any Militia service requiring them to use arms). Membership and service in "the Militia of the several States" is a constitutional duty for every eligible American—but, in each State, this is membership and service in "[a] well regulated Militia", which assigns duties according to its needs, not the personal likes or dislikes of its members.

(3) In most cases during normal times, because most Militiamen would be "citizen-soldiers" whose permanent vocations as "citizens" transcended their temporary occupations as "soldiers", actual service in the field could be neither continuous for any individual nor complete for the Militia as a whole. Rather, except for Militiamen serving in regular police and emergency-services forces, compulsory duties in revitalized Militia should be distributed throughout the membership on an equitable basis by rotation.

Where practicable, rotation would be required by the Militia's purpose—to provide "the security of a free State". In America, "a free State" has "a Republican Form of Government".[2341] "[A] Republican Form of Government" is "one constructed on th[e] principle, that the Supreme Power resides in the body of the people".[2342] So, because all, and particularly supreme, "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[2343] in "a Republican Form of Government" "the body of the people" must control the guns. By definition, "the body of the people, trained to arms" comprises "a well regulated militia".[2344] Therefore, the ultimate purveyor of physical force in such a government must be the Militia. But, consisting of "the body of the people", and acting on its behalf, the Militia should fairly represent the population not just in formal composition but also in actual modes of service. After [2341] Compare U.S. Const. amend. II with art. IV, § 4.

---

[2342] Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 457 (1793) (opinion of Wilson, J.).

[2343] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2344] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

all, the Militia constitute the great institutions for "the common defence",[2345] in that they are truly "of the people, by the people, for the people". Except during "alarms", however, the entirety or even most of the Militia can not and need not be under arms in the field all or even most of the time, if the Militia are to act consistently with "the general Welfare".[2346] The burdens of service must be so distributed as to insure that the result is, not the menticidal regimentation of a "garrison state", but the economic productivity and social stability of a "free State". Thus, those burdens must be allocated among "the body of the people" with a concern for social justice—that is, what each individual, in solidarity with all, ought to contribute to the common effort so as to subserve the common good.[2347]

Rotation is feasible, of course, only when more than enough Militiamen are available to perform the necessary duties at any particular time. That was generally the situation even during the *pre-*constitutional era, because the Militia incorporated in principle every able-bodied adult free man. Today, rotation would be an eminently workable policy, because of the exceedingly large numbers of potential Militiamen available throughout America now, in comparison to the much smaller pool of recruits then. (Today's pool, after all, would be significantly increased simply by the addition of women, who performed only very minor rôles with respect to America's *pre-*constitutional Militia.) Moreover, rotation is feasible only when the Militiamen called forth are already at least minimally qualified for their assignments. That was generally the case even in *pre-*constitutional times, too, because the statutes required almost everyone eligible for the Militia to undergo at least rudimentary training, which typically served the purposes for which any part of the Militia might have been called forth. Today, revitalized "Militia of the several States" could do just as well as, if not quite a bit better than, their predecessors in spreading the burdens of service throughout their communities on an efficient and equitable basis. For, with far larger populations composed of more highly educated and experienced people—and with greater capital investment, technology, and productivity in every area of human endeavor—than any of the Colonies or independent States ever enjoyed, the States could allow for rapid rotation in service, and could even pay reasonable compensation or provide other benefits in exchange for many of the services part-time Militiamen performed.

(4) Akin to rotation is substitution, whereby one Militiaman can obtain a temporary exemption from his normal tour of duty by providing a qualified substitute to take his place. Again, because the available pool of Militiamen today probably exceeds by a large measure the average numbers required for day-to-day

---

[2345] U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

[2346] U.S. Const. preamble.

[2347] For a good introduction to this complex and often misunderstood subject, see Heinrich Pesch, Ethics and the National Economy, Rupert Ederer, Translator (Norfolk, Virginia: IHS Press, 2004).

service under normal conditions, substitution would likely be an eminently workable procedure. Considerations of social justice dictate, however, that it would have to be carefully controlled.[2348]

2. No "select militia" allowable. Precisely because "a well regulated militia" by definition consists of "the body of the people, trained to arms",[2349] no Militiaman on his own initiative can avoid or evade performing some service, can be granted a statutory dispensation from all service, or can be precluded by statute from any service in the Militia. Howsoever routine Militia service may be apportioned equitably throughout society, neither Congress nor any of the States enjoys any license to set up a so-called "select militia" (under that or any other name) by dividing "the body of the people" who should comprise the Militia into "organized" and "reserve" or "unorganized" components, with those individuals consigned to the "reserve" or "unorganized" component effectively excluded from the Militia by being assigned no duties and required to perform no services on a regular basis. Whatever the labels attached to the two components, legislation in this form would always be faulty in constitutional principle.

Neither Rhode Island, nor Virginia, nor any other of the original Thirteen Colonies and then independent States ever established a "select militia". This history establishes that "well regulated Militia" should always be completely organized, with the selection of different categories of Militiamen for different duties (where appropriate) being part of the organizational structure. Never should any category of Militiamen intentionally be left with no duties to perform.

The original Constitution plainly precludes the possibility of any "select militia". Congress cannot set up a "select militia", because its power is solely "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia", not "[Part of] the Militia".[2350] In fact, in this very clause the Constitution differentiates between "the Militia" and "such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States". So, when the original Constitution says "the", it means "the" as a specific whole, not something indefinitely less. And "the Militia" means the Militia just as they existed during *pre-*constitutional times—when every eligible individual was subject to some form of service. If Congress did enjoy the discretion "[t]o provide for organizing" only "Part of the Militia" by assigning actual duties to but a "select" few, rogue Congressmen could reduce the Militia to impotence by enlisting only a tiny fraction of eligible individuals, which could create a Praetorian Guard or Schutzstaffel out of those Congressmen's political cronies, partisans, and hangers-on. Rather than licensing rogue Members of Congress or State legislators to set up a Schutzstaffel, the Militia

---

[2348] See ante, at 977-981.

[2349] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[2350] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

Powers provide a complete Schutzmaßregel (preventative) and Schutzstoff (antidote) to any such pretensions.

The same conclusion should also be patent from the Second Amendment, which guarantees "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in order to ensure the continuation of "well regulated Militia" throughout America. If "well regulated Militia" could be nothing more than "select militia", consisting of something far less than "the people" as a whole, then an unqualified "right of the people to keep and bear Arms" would be unnecessary. Indeed, in that case the whole concept of a constitutional "right * * * to keep and bear Arms"—that is, a "right" of individuals the substance of which is not determined by, but is fully enforceable against, public officials—would be nonsensical. For then the only "people" with a need "to keep and bear Arms" would be the particular "people" public officials singled out to constitute their "select militia". And the "right of th[os]e people" would come into existence only with, and thereafter would depend entirely upon, that selection—that is, upon the decisions of those officials. Thus, it would be no constitutional "right" at all, but rather some species of governmental grant or license.

Although the Constitution does not permit the establishment of any "select militia", it does allow, and even encourages, selections to be made within the Militia in terms of the particular services various Militia units or particular Militiamen perform. These specialized units or types of duty would not purport to supersede or operate outside of the Militia, but instead would subsist as integral parts thereof, alongside the regular formations in which most Militiamen were enlisted. Thus, revitalized "well regulated Militia" could be sufficiently flexible in organization to combine a number of different units designed and assigned to perform different tasks, and for that purpose given different training and provided with different equipment.

3. Fulfillment of the Militia's responsibilities the essence of freedom. To some, it may appear paradoxical that "well regulated Militia"—near-universal in membership, compulsory in participation, and disseminated throughout every Locality—could truly be "necessary", in fact and law, "to the security of a free State".[2351] Does not a community totally organized, armed, disciplined, and ready to serve in the field along para-military lines amount at the Local level to "a garrison state" and across the country as a whole to a "national-security state"? How can WE THE PEOPLE be "free" when they are compelled by law to perform such duties?

It could just as easily be asked, though, how can THE PEOPLE be "free" when, being self-governing, they are compelled by law to perform the governmental function of serving on juries, or compelled by circumstances if not actual statutes to perform the governmental function of voting, in order to maintain their freedom? The answer from general principles of political science, of course, is that freedom does not entail the absence of all individual and collective duties, but instead requires the fulfillment of certain responsibilities.

---

[2351] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

More specifically, is one to assume, in defiance of common sense, that WE THE PEOPLE—who constitute the Militia and exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" for that purpose—would ever become so politically deranged as to oppress themselves? Perhaps so. But, prior to the appearance of such derangement, would THE PEOPLE be better off if they lacked the power to defend themselves against oppression, on the plea that they might misuse such a power to their own destruction? Would then not oppression at someone else's hands be, not merely a possibility, but a certainty? What other lesson does History teach?

Certainly all Americans know as a matter of historical fact that the Militia have never been instruments of mass oppression. In the beginning, the States' "well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[2352] played leading rôles in securing WE THE PEOPLE'S independence and freedom. And if the Militia are not playing such a rôle today, it is only because, being almost completely unorganized everywhere, they are temporarily incapable of performing their historically proven function. Yet, what happened then could certainly happen now, if the Militia were revitalized in accordance with pre-constitutional standards.

In addition, as a matter of law, the Constitution denies that "[a] well regulated Militia" amounts to "a garrison state", because the Second Amendment declares such a Militia to be "necessary to the security of a free State", and the original Constitution incorporates "the Militia of the several States" as permanent institutions within its federal system, one of the purposes of which is to "secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"[2353]—all of which would be self-contradictory and impossible were the Militia a nascent "garrison state" lurking within the Constitution's own structural framework. So, unless the Constitution is self-contradictory, its understanding of "[a] well regulated Militia" must exclude that possibility.

Of course, the Constitution does not explain the necessity for the compulsory character of service in the Militia. This is because it presumes that every thinking American understands what has come to be called "the logic of collective action"[2354]—or what more descriptively could be styled "the perverse incentives that tend to thwart effective collective action". In the final analysis, it is the duty "to

---

[2352] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2353] U.S. Const. preamble.

[2354] See, e.g., Mancur Olson, The Logic of Collective Action: Public Goods and the Theory of Groups (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, Revised Edition, 1971).

keep and bear Arms" and to perform other services in the Militia that secures every right, power, privilege, and immunity that comprise "the Blessings of Liberty". Even absent compulsion, some of THE PEOPLE no doubt would serve voluntarily. But others would choose not to serve, in the selfish expectation that the volunteers' service would provide everyone with sufficient security, including those who contributed nothing to the effort. If, however, enough of these "free riders" refused to serve, the Militia that did exist would prove less than adequate for its purpose. That is, "free riding"—the spurious, even self-contradictory "freedom" to shirk one's duty—would subvert, even imperil, the community's security. As this would likely be discovered in practice only when in the course of some crisis that security proved insufficient, and then almost assuredly when that insufficiency could not be corrected in time, the prior elimination of "free riders" is "necessary to the security of a free State", and therefore must be part of the definition of "[a] well regulated Militia". So, in this case, compulsion turns out to be the foundation for freedom.

D. Few limitations on the Militia's requirement to serve. That revitalized "Militia of the several States"—consisting of "the body of the people, trained to arms"[2355]—are indispensably necessary to protect modern Americans' most vital individual and communal interests, and that each and every Militiamen must perform some service on behalf of the Militia during his period of enrollment, still leaves open the question of under what conditions the Militia as institutions would be required to serve. Inasmuch as the Militia must provide every type of protection "necessary to the security of a free State", the natural presumption must be that the Militia's duty of service applies under all conditions. Yet, because the Militia are constitutional establishments, they must be subject to some "checks and balances" and other principles of limitation in practice. "A well regulated Militia" it is not akin to a "garrison state" in which everyone can be impressed under arms and subjected to martial discipline for just any and every purpose and on any and every occasion whatsoever. Nonetheless, in keeping with the Militia's sweeping purposes, the constraints on their duty to serve are few in number and narrow in scope

1. Permissible purposes. The Constitution explicitly limits "calling forth the Militia" "in the Service of the United States" to only three purposes: namely, "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[2356] Congress lacks the power to require the Militia to serve in any way for any other reason. On the other hand, because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States",[2357] the States may employ their Militia for any purpose consistent with provision of "the security of a free State" that does not interfere with Congress's

---

[2355] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2356] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16. See also U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2357] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

exercise of its authority "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" for the three constitutionally enumerated purposes.[2358]

2. The limited authority of any "Commander in Chief". The Constitution expressly confines the President's authority as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States" to those occasions "when [they are] called into the actual Service of the United States"[2359]—which means "called", not just ostensibly for one or more of the three purposes the Constitution enumerates, but in "actual" fact and law for such a reason and no other. The President cannot require even a single member of any of "the Militia of the several States" to submit to his command unless for such "actual Service".[2360]

In addition, because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State",[2361] it cannot be called forth by anyone to prop up by force of arms usurpers, tyrants, or other rogue public officials who threaten WE THE PEOPLE'S freedom. So any part of the Militia of any State may (and should) refuse to obey the orders of the State's Governor (or other commander in chief) if it concludes on sufficient evidence that it is being called upon to subvert "the security of a free State". This limitation applies doubly against the President, because "the actual Service of the United States" cannot entail an attack upon "the security of a free State" in any of the several States. Indeed, that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government",[2362] that under the Constitution "a free State" and "a Republican Form of Government" are closely interrelated,[2363] and that the President "shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed"[2364] together absolutely exclude the possibility that any Militiaman's obedience to a purported order from the President to strike at "the security of a free State" in any State could constitute "the actual Service of the United States".

3. Limitation on the source of the Militia's "Officers". Because the Constitution recognizes the Militia as "the Militia of the several States" and "reserv[es] to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers", the sole "Officer[ ] of the United States"[2365] who can command the Militia is the President himself, and then only when "such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States" is in fact and law "called into the actual Service of the [2358] Compare U.S. Const. amends. II and X with art. VI, cl. 2.

---

[2359] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[2360] See ante, at 871-880.

[2361] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[2362] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2363] See ante, at 890-893, 921-922, and 1038-1040, and post, at 1301-1307, 1451-1453, and 1497-1499.

[2364] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[2365] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

United States".[2366] Even in such "Service", no "Officer[ ] of the United States" other than the President—whether of constitutional or statutory rank, and whether a civilian or a member of "the land and naval Forces"[2367]—may exercise any control whatsoever over the Militia. Moreover, as the phrase "reserv[es] to the States respectively" makes clear, each State's Militia must be commanded by that State's "Officers" and no one else. For, in this context, "respectively" means "[p]articularly; as each belongs to each"[2368]—and "as relating to each", and "as each refers to each in order".[2369] So, when a State's Militia is performing services for that State, or is deployed in coöperation with the Militia of one or more other States in all of those particular States' mutual interests, but not specifically "in the Service of the United States" as a whole, then no "Officer[ ] of the United States, including the President, may exercise any control whatsoever over the Militia. Even Congress is powerless to establish general rules for "governing" the Militia, whether by the President or the Militia's own "Officers", except as to "such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States".[2370] And any such rules for "governing such Part" cannot license any officer of the United States, other than the President (and then only when he actually serves as "Commander in Chief"), to exercise command over anyone in the Militia, because those rules are subject to the limitation that "the Appointment of the Officers [in the Militia]" is "reserv[ed] to the States respectively".

Because from its very inception the National Guard has maintained a so-called "Federal" as well as a "State" face, embodied in a specifically "FEDERAL ENLISTMENT CONTRACT" and a specifically "FEDERAL OATH FOR NATIONAL GUARD OFFICERS" (that is, a contract with or oath to the General Government in addition to such formal commitments to the States),[2371] Americans may easily become confused as to the status of officers of the National Guard in relation to the Militia. Simply put, officers of the National Guard are not, and cannot be, "Officers" of "the Militia of the several States". First, the National Guard consists, not of Militiamen, but of those "Troops" which the States may "keep * * * in time of Peace" "with[ ] the Consent of Congress".[2372] The Constitution, however, "reserv[es] to the States

---

[2366] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 and art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphases supplied). See ante, at 871-880.

[2367] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14 and amend. V.

[2368] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions. Accord, Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1227, definition 1.

[2369] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1227, definition 1. Alternatively, the constitutional phrase could have been written, "reserves to the respective States", where "respective" would have meant "relating to [each] particular [State]". N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 2.

[2370] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2371] See An Act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, §§ 70, 71, and 73, 39 Stat. 166, 201.

[2372] See ante, at 786-793.

respectively, the Appointment of the Officers" in the Militia,[2373] not the appointment of officers for any "Troops" the States may raise in conjunction with Congress. The appointment of those officers will always depend upon the terms of "the Consent of Congress" which allows the States to "keep [those] Troops" in the first place. Second, from the very beginning, officers in the modern National Guard have been appointed pursuant to standards set by the General Government, not the States. Initially, some officers in the National Guard may have been commissioned solely by the States. For in 1903 Congress declared that "the regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia in the several States * * * , whether known and designated as National Guard, militia, or otherwise, shall constitute the organized militia";[2374] and in 1916, it decreed that "[c]ommissioned officers of the National Guard of the several States * * * now serving under commissions regularly issued shall continue in office * * * without the issuance of new commissions".[2375] So, in 1916, the "[c]ommissioned officers" of "the organized militia"—which up to that point was arguably still a constitutional Militia to some degree—were all presumably the products of "Appointment[s]" by the States, as the Constitution required. But that same statute required those officers, and all others to be commissioned thereafter, to take a specifically "FEDERAL OATH",[2376] and then set out particular qualifications for any future commissions: namely, that > [p]ersons hereafter commissioned as officers of the National Guard shall not be recognized as such * * * unless they have been selected from the following classes and shall have taken and subscribed to the oath of office * * * : Officers or enlisted men of the National Guard; officers on the reserve or unassigned list of the National Guard; officers, active or retired, and former officers of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; graduates of the United States Military and Naval Academies and graduates of schools, colleges, and universities where military science is taught under the supervision of an officer of the Regular Army, and, for the technical branches and staff corps or departments, such other civilians as may be especially qualified for duty therein.

>
> * * * The provisions of this Act shall not apply to any person hereafter appointed an officer of the National Guard unless he first shall have successfully passed such tests as to his physical, moral, and professional fitness as the President shall prescribe. The examination to determine such qualifications for commission shall be conducted by a

---

[2373] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2374] An Act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 3, 32 Stat. 775, 775.

[2375] An Act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 73, 39 Stat. 166, 201.

[2376] Act of 3 June 1916, § 73, 39 Stat. at 201.

> board of three commissioned officers appointed by the Secretary of War from the Regular Army or the National Guard, or both.[2377]

Thus, after 1916, "the Appointment of the Officers" in what Congress called "the organized militia" was not "reserv[ed] to the States respectively" in the sense the Constitution employs that phrase, because the States neither settled the basic qualifications for commissions nor controlled even "the examination to determine such qualifications". From this arrangement, the only conclusion compatible with the Constitution is that, from 1916 onwards, officers of the National Guard were not "Militia" officers—which, of course, was hardly surprising, inasmuch as, from 1916 onwards, the National Guard was no constitutional "Militia" at all. Third, after 1916, Congress permitted officers from the regular Army to command National Guardsmen[2378]—which, of course, was entirely compatible with the status of the National Guard as "Troops" the States could "keep" only "with[ ] the Consent of Congress". Fourth, if the National Guard were, State by State, "the Militia of the several States", the States could not agree with Congress to allow Congress, the President, or some other officer of the General Government to control "the Appointment of the Officers", because the States cannot abjure the authority the Constitution explicitly "reserve[s]" to them. Fifth, Congress cannot grant its "Consent" to allow the States to "keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" on the condition that they allow their Militia to be commanded by officers the States themselves do not appoint. For the general rule is that public officials may not condition the grant of any benefit to a particular individual on a requirement that the recipient must waive or forfeit some constitutional right in the present or the future, or have refrained from exercising some constitutional right in the past, in order to qualify for the benefit.[2379] This rule certainly includes the explicit constitutional "reserv[ation to] the States respectively[ ] of the Appointment of the Officers [in the Militia]", which is not simply a constitutional "right", but a "power" and a "duty" as well.[2380] And this rule applies even if the benefit at issue—here, "keep[ing] Troops"—cannot properly be labeled a "right" at all, but instead is a [2377] Act of 3 June 1916, §§ 74 and 75, 39 Stat. at 201-202; now codified as amended at 32 U.S.C. §§ 305(a) and 307(a) and (b).

---

[2378] See Act of 3 June 1916, §§ 65, 100, and 111, 39 Stat. at 199, 208, 211.

[2379] E.g., Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 513-516 (1980); Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597-598 (1972); Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563, 568 (1968); Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 605-606 (1967); Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 403-406 (1963); Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278, 285, 287-288 (1961); Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 495-496 (1961); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 484-490 (1960); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 518-519, 528-529 (1958); Slochower v. Board of Higher Education, 350 U.S. 551, 558-559 (1956); Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183, 191-192 (1952); Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc., 327 U.S. 146, 154-156 (1946); West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 630-631 (1943).

[2380] See ante, at 52-53.

mere "privilege" (in the sense of an indulgence from Congress) which negates the States' constitutional "no-right" and "duty" not to "keep Troops" at all.[2381]

4. Geographical restrictions on deployments of the Militia. The Militia of any State may be required to serve outside of that State's own territory in only two instances:

a. Congress may provide for "Part" (presumably, up to the whole) of the Militia of any State to be "call[ed] forth" for the purposes of "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions" in some other place[2382]—but, in the nature of things, any of these tasks would be performed only within or very close to the United States proper. For example, if some rogue junta seized control of the Mexican government and launched an "Invasion[ ]" of the United States, the Militia from one State could be called forth to "repel" the Mexican troops from American soil in another State, even perhaps to the point of advancing temporarily some little distance into Mexico in order to secure the international border. If, though, as the result of the "Invasion[ ]" Congress declared "War" on Mexico,[2383] and set about to deploy the Armed Forces into the heart of that country in order to overthrow the junta, the Militia could not take part in the campaign. "[R]epel[ling an] Invasion[ ]" by a foreign power and attacking the heartland of that power would both amount to participation in "War" (and in the posited case a just, and therefore constitutional, "War"). But that the Constitution explicitly permits Congress to require "the Militia of the several States" to engage only in the former action proves that Congress lacks any authority to require the Militia to participate in the latter. Inclusio unius exclusio alterius.[2384] Because they are the States' own governmental institutions, Congress would have no power whatsoever over "the Militia of the several States" did not the Constitution delegate it in so many words. Thus, as to that subject, the very statement of Congress's power is at once an expression of the limitations on it. In addition, the authority of the President in this regard depends entirely upon the circumscribed power of Congress. Because Congress cannot "provide for calling forth the Militia" to be "be employed in the Service of the United States" outside of the United States, the President cannot pretend that any such duty amounts to "the actual Service of the United States" as to which he may assume authority over the Militia as "Commander in Chief".

[2381] E.g., Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 571 & note 9 (1972); Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597-598 (1972); Bell v. Burson, 402 U.S. 535, 539 (1971). See A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 167-168.

[2382] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[2383] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 11.

[2384] "The inclusion of one is the exclusion of the other."

b. Each of the several States may call forth her Militia for any proper purpose (including the three constitutionally enumerated ones, if Congress and the President default on their responsibilities in that regard) within her own territory. On an ad hoc basis, as well, one State suffering from (say) a natural disaster or industrial accident, or from a sudden attack that would justify her to "engage in War" because "actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay",[2385] may request assistance from another State, which (if that State's constitution and laws so allowed) could dispatch an appropriate part of her Militia to the stricken locality.

Such arrangements would not constitute the "Agreement[s] or Compact[s]" which "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * enter into * * * with another State".[2386] For that "prohibition is directed to the formation of any combination tending to the increase of political power in the states, which may encroach upon or interfere with the just supremacy of the United States";[2387] whereas,

> [t]here are many matters upon which different states may agree that can in no respect concern the United States. * * * So in the case of threatened invasion of cholera, plague, or other causes of sickness and death, it would be the height of absurdity to hold that the threatened states could not unite in providing means to prevent and repel the invasion of the pestilence without obtaining the consent of Congress, which might not be at the time in session.[2388]

On the other hand, if these arrangements did constitute "Agreement[s] or Compact[s]", presumably Congress would extend its "Consent", as it has in the past.[2389] And in any event, although in these situations Militia "Officers" from a responding State would no doubt coöperate closely with the Militia of the State requesting their aid, they could not come under its actual command, because (as explained immediately above) "the Appointment of the Officers" in each State's Militia is "reserv[ed] to the States respectively".

5. Allowance for deployment of "Part" of the Militia only. That the Constitution carefully authorizes Congress "[t]o provide * * * for governing such

[2385] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[2386] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[2387] Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 519 (1893).

[2388] Id. at 518. Quoted with approval in Wharton v. Wise, 153 U.S. 155, 168-169 (1894), and in Stearns v. Minnesota, 179 U.S. 223, 246-247 (1900).

[2389] See AN ACT Granting the consent and approval of Congress to an interstate compact relating to mutual military aid in an emergency, Act of 1 July 1952, Pub. L. 435, CHAPTER 538, 66 Stat. 315 (New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania).

Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States"[2390] attests that Congress may find it "necessary and proper" in some instances "[t]o provide for calling forth [only a 'Part' of] the Militia" for one or another of the three constitutionally enumerated purposes.[2391] Inasmuch as the Constitution does not strictly define the term "Part", Congress must be allowed some practical discretion in applying it. Certainly, "Part" cannot refer solely to a quantitative selectivity, limiting its ambit simply to a "portion of the whole", such as one fourth, one third, or one half of the Militia. Except during an "alarm", when everyone capable of serving in any useful manner would likely be commanded to stand to, common sense would dictate a qualitative selectivity in "calling forth the Militia" for different tasks at different times and places. For example, many Militiamen of advanced years who nonetheless could effectively "execute the Laws", or even in some situations "suppress Insurrections", would not enjoy sufficient physical strength and stamina to be relied upon to "repel Invasions" mounted by crack foreign troops. So, in the case of such an "Invasion[ ]", only that "Part" of the Militia in the best physical condition (presumably, say, composed of men from eighteen to forty or forty-five years of age) would be deployed first (if possible) with other "Part[s]" brought forward only as reserves and replacements. Obviously, this type of selection—looking to the assignment to various duties of what in *pre-*constitutional times were often termed "effective Men"{EN-2032}—would be incorporated into Congress's exercise of its power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" from the very beginning,[2392] rather than being seized upon only as an afterthought when a crisis suddenly arose. This process would not create a so-called "select militia", membership in which was intentionally restricted to less than the *pre-*constitutional standard of "the body of the people, trained to arms",[2393] so that those not enrolled in the "select militia" would be deemed not members of the Militia at all, or members of some oxymoronic "unorganized militia". Instead, it would constitute a selection from the Militia for certain purposes, so that those not selected would nonetheless remain members of the Militia for all other purposes (and for those purposes as well, in an emergency).

Congress's authority "[t]o provide for calling forth [merely Parts of] the Militia"—and therefore "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining [those Parts of] the Militia" on a qualitatively selective basis—is simply one aspect of the Second Amendment's requirement that the Militia be "well regulated" according to *pre-*constitutional principles. Flexibility in deployment is necessary, because a "well regulated Militia", by definition, must be capable of dealing effectively with any

[2390] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[2391] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 18 and 15.

[2392] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2393] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

and every reasonably foreseeable threat to "the security of a free State". Thus, the Amendment is less a restriction on than a reiteration and reinforcement of the original Constitution in this regard. In addition, inasmuch as the Militia are "the Militia of the several States" first and foremost, the Amendment emphasizes that each of the States, in the exercise of her reserved powers over her own Militia, may be just as selective as Congress. Indeed, because the States' authority extends to problems of "homeland security" beyond the three the Constitution expressly enumerates, and which though of the same general types may in practice prove to be distinctly different in different States, the States' discretion in regulating their Militia so as to deal effectively with these matters must be more extensive than that of Congress.

E. Types of services revitalized Militia should provide. Against this background can be set out a survey of some of the most important of the services to be—because they must, or should, or can only be—performed by revitalized "Militia of the several States".

1. The basic components of "homeland security". In general, revitalized Militia will seek to predict and will work to prevent situations that in any way and to any degree might threaten, endanger, or compromise "homeland security" in any State and in the Union as a whole. If events of that nature prove unavoidable, the Militia will provide immediate, massive, and comprehensive responses, specifically designed for and directed to each affected Locality by citizens who reside near the scene, are intimately familiar with Local needs and resources, and have personal ties with and sympathy for Local inhabitants, institutions, customs, and ways of life. In particular—

a. Maintenance of the sovereignty, independence, and freedom of WE THE PEOPLE of every State and of the Union as a whole. Insofar as everything else in this country's system of popular self-government in future years will depend upon preserving for the American people, as "one people", "the separate and equal station" "among the powers of the earth * * * to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them", this category of service will include the exercise of every right and power necessary for the Militia in order

- to guarantee that no group which in any manner denies the self-evident truth "that all men are created equal" will ever exercise political authority within America;
- to "secure" the "certain unalienable Rights" with which "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator";
- if necessary, to "throw off" any purported "Government" that engages in "a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object [which] evinces a design to reduce the[

People] under absolute Despotism", or to deprive them of their "separate and equal station" "among the powers of the earth";

- when appropriate, to "institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to the[People] shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness"; and, overall,

- to exercise "full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and * * * do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do".[2394]

b. Execution of the laws of both the Union and the several States. This category of service will include every right and power through the exercise of which the Militia can deter, resist, and eradicate

- tyranny—the claim of every purportedly "governmental", but actually oppressive, power to which no one enjoys any legal or moral right, or the abuse of an otherwise legitimate governmental power for the private aggrandizement of the tyrant and his adherents rather than for the common good of the people;

- usurpation—the misuse of some otherwise legitimate governmental power as to which a particular actor enjoys no legal claim;[2395]

- oppression of the citizenry by rogue public officials in violation of the Constitution of the United States, the constitutions of the several States, and various statutes protecting individual liberties and other civil rights;[2396]

- corruption among rogue legislators, executive officials, bureaucrats, judges, police, and other public officeholders at every level of government;

- attacks by "terrorists", subversives, and other domestic or foreign criminal enterprises, gangs, or conspiracies working any political, economic, social, or cultural agenda; and

- ordinary domestic and international criminal commerce and activities of all kinds.

Importantly, instead of perpetuating "gun-free zones"—in which violent criminals in any of the categories just enumerated can ply their nefarious trades without fear

---

[2394] Declaration of Independence.

[2395] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 912.

[2396] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242. See also 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961 through 1963.

of encountering armed resistance from their victims—deployment of revitalized "Militia of the several States" will establish vast zones of deterrence which minimally rational criminals will tend to avoid, and will render those areas zones of destruction for perpetrators too irrational or fanatic to be deterred.

c. Suppression of insurrections and domestic violence wherever they may break out. This category of service will address overt activities, as well as conspiracies and other covert combinations, whatever their sources and composition, that aim to overthrow the General Government or the governments of the several States, or to defeat, prevent, impede, or pervert the execution of the laws, by means of mass violence. (Violence arising in the context of individual or small-scale criminal activity falls within the category of executing the laws.)

d. Repulsion of invasions in whatever form. This category of service will embrace

- attacks against the United States by foreign powers during "declare[d] War[s]"[2397] or other open hostilities of an international nature; and
- large-scale influxes and related illicit activities of aliens not lawfully entitled to enter this country, along with those individuals and institutions, public or private and foreign or domestic, who and which incite, aid, and abet such aliens, both outside as well as at and within the borders of the United States.

Even more than repulsion of open invasions by foreign powers (which the continental United States have not suffered since the War of 1812), repulsion of invasions by aliens with no even colorable claim to entry has become critically important for maintaining the sovereignty, independence, freedom, and prosperity of every State and of the Union as a whole. For America cannot remain sovereign if she cannot control her own borders and decide who is, and especially who is not, entitled to entry and residency, let alone citizenship—particularly if, because she cannot enforce her own laws as to citizenship, individuals unqualified therefor nonetheless end up voting in elections for, or even themselves serving in, high public offices.[2398] America cannot remain independent if aliens—and citizens as well—who still account themselves loyal to some foreign state can take over important segments of her economy, can gain oligopolistic control over and thus manipulate her mass media, and can intervene in her electoral and legislative processes—either quantitatively, taking advantage of their large numbers; or qualitatively, because, albeit relatively few in number, they have concentrated in their hands disproportionate amounts of wealth or other means of exerting influence. Thus tied involuntarily but increasingly tightly by "political bands" to one or more foreign countries and alien political systems and cultures, America can no longer enjoy "among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle" her.[2399] America cannot remain free if she becomes saturated with aliens—let alone purported citizens—who fail, neglect, or refuse master the language in which her laws and history are written and to study and adopt as their own the tenets of political philosophy and science on which her government is based—and, worse yet, who may be ideologically inimical to the fundamental political, legal, economic, and social principles on which she has always operated. And America cannot remain "one people" if huge influxes of unassimilated aliens and disloyal citizens who refuse to conform their behavior to those principles Balkanize her society. Everywhere it has taken hold, Balkanization has proven to be a dynamically destructive process that proves the truth of the old admonition, "a house divided against itself cannot stand". Once they sense themselves in the ascendency, aliens and citizens hostile to America's traditional way of life will set about to demolish every native institution that they can not or will not understand, and to replace them with new, but faulty institutions that reflect the folkways in the foreign lands to which they bear true allegiance—or perhaps will simply allow native institutions to be overthrown in a flood of political, economic, and social chaos. This intense internal dissension over and disregard of fundamental principles will deprive America, first of freedom in a vain attempt to retain security, and then of security, too.

---

[2397] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 11.

[2398] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 2 and § 3, cl. 3, and art II, § 1, cl. 4 with, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 911 and 912.

The plain fact is that the flood of aliens now inundating the United States in blatant violation of the laws allowing for immigration has risen to such a height that only revitalized Militia could possible contain it, let alone deal with its consequences. Only the Militia could supply *para-*military and police forces of sufficient size to take control of America's borders (so as to keep aliens from crossing over illegally in the first place) and thoroughly to scour her heartland (so as to uncover the aliens who have unlawfully slipped in, and then see to it that they are thrown out). And only the Militia would be so completely organized throughout the country as to enable WE THE PEOPLE quickly and efficiently to determine who is rightfully resident in each Local community.

e. Protection of all aspects of "the general Welfare" subject to the States' Police Powers. The services in this category will be directed towards

- pandemics, epidemics, and other widespread dangerous conditions relating to public health;
- natural disasters;

[2399] See Declaration of Independence.

• disasters caused by some human agency, such as industrial accidents;

• famines, crop failures, and other serious shortages of basic foodstuffs;

• economic crises—of especial concern today, the social disorders and political instability that must inevitably arise out of an hyperinflationary explosion or depressionary implosion of, or other catastrophic malfunction within, America's faulty monetary and banking systems; and

• social crises—in particular, the chaos that would predictably ensue following a collapse of the Social Security System, the General Government's and the States' medical-care systems, underfunded private pension and retirement plans, and other such financially unstable entitlement schemes.

f. All permutations and combinations of the above. For example, in addition to marketing the most profitable products in modern criminal commerce, the global traffic in illicit drugs is closely tied to undeclared wars, "terrorism", political subversion, systematic governmental corruption (especially within "law-enforcement" agencies), money-laundering and other manipulations of the banking and financial systems, and illegal immigration.[2400]

2. Law-enforcement agencies to be subsumed in the Militia. In order to fulfill these tasks, upon revitalization "the Militia of the several States" will absorb all State and Local police forces, Sheriffs' departments that perform "police" functions, and other law-enforcement and kindred emergency-services and emergency-management agencies with "police" powers.[2401] New State and Local laws will stipulate that the services those forces were performing pursuant to the statutes that created them will thereafter be deemed (as rightly they should always have been deemed) Militia services, and that the personnel comprising those forces will satisfy their Militia obligations by continuing to perform those functions, and therefore will be exempted from all other Militia duties. Thus, this incorporation will define various categories of Militia services in which the personnel are differentiated from other members of the Militia by their distinctive uniforms, types and levels of training, extent and specificity of duties, and compensation and other terms and conditions of enrollment—being in such differentiation analogous to

---

[2400] See, e.g., Joseph D. Douglas, Red Cocaine: The Drugging of America and the West (London, England: Edward Harle Limited, Revised Second Edition, 1999).

[2401] Under various State and Local laws, some of the individuals in these agencies may be deemed to be public officials, others only public employees. Because which status may apply makes no difference here, they will all be treated as officials for simplicity of analysis.

specialized units such as the "Minutemen", "Rangers", and "slave patrols" that were established within the Militia during *pre-*constitutional times.

a. Nothing precludes the absorption of contemporary State and Local "law-enforcement" and kindred agencies into revitalized Militia. After all, the present hodge-podge of such agencies can claim no particular constitutional status:

(1) Although the purpose of each of these agencies is to provide some aspect of "homeland security" to the States or their Local communities, the Constitution recognizes only "well regulated Militia" as being "necessary to the security of a free State".[2402]

(2) Although many of these "homeland-security" forces are routinely armed, the Constitution recognizes only "well regulated Militia" as establishments in the several States that must be armed at all times as a consequence of their very nature. (Regular "Troops", of course, must be armed, too. But "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, * * * keep Troops * * * in time of Peace".[2403])

(3) Although many of these "homeland-security" forces are armed for the purpose of policing the general public, the Constitution recognizes only "well regulated Militia" as establishments that embody "the right of the people [as a whole] to keep and bear Arms".[2404]

(4) In contradistinction to its treatment of "the Militia of the several States", the Constitution does not incorporate any of these "homeland-security" forces as permanent components of its federal structure—nor could it have done so even in principle for any but one of them in 1788, because none of them other than Sheriffs or Constables (for the prime examples) ever existed as governmental officers or bodies in most jurisdictions during *pre-*constitutional times.

(5) The Constitution does not create any of these "homeland-security" forces.

(6) The Constitution does not ensure the continued existence of any of these "homeland-security" forces should the States or Local governments once have created them.

(7) The Constitution does not guarantee these "homeland-security" forces independence from the Militia by excluding or limiting to any degree the Militia's control over them.[2405]

[2402] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[2403] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[2404] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[2405] This is in keeping with *pre-*constitutional practice. For instance, although the office of Sheriff was separate from the Militia during that era, Sheriffs exercised no power over the Militia; Sheriffs were often required to perform various of their official functions on behalf of the Militia; and the individuals who served as Sheriffs

(8) In contrast to its explicit recognition of the Militia's authority and responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union",[2406] the Constitution extends to these modern-day "homeland-security" forces no authority or responsibility whatsoever "to execute" any "Laws", or even to perform any other activities. And,

(9) With the on-going erection of a National para-militarized police-state apparatus centered around the Department of Homeland Security, these "homeland-security" forces are being effectively removed from State and Local control and absorbed de facto into the General Government's table of organization, and thereby are becoming increasingly estranged in terms of control, direction, and even sympathy from the communities they are assigned to police. This obviously undermines federalism in general, because it substitutes bureaucratic centralism for democratic subsidiarity. But it is particularly dangerous because it weakens "the security of a free State" by depriving each State of what should be key components of her own Militia. And it threatens "the security of a free State" by deploying a nationwide apparatus capable of exerting police-state controls "from the top down" to the level of mere neighborhoods.

b. On the other hand, basic "police" functions should largely be the prerogatives of revitalized Militia, for at least three reasons:

(1) As a matter of law, the Constitution declares the Militia—and only the Militia—to be "necessary to the security of a free State".[2407] "[T]he state has no more important interest than the maintenance of law and order".[2408] The Constitution delegates to "the Militia of the several States"—and to the Militia alone—the explicit responsibility and authority "to execute the Laws of the Union" and "suppress Insurrections", when "call[ed] forth" for those purposes.[2409] In addition, the Constitution imposes on the President of the United States the duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed"[2410]—for the achievement of which purpose it designates him as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States",[2411] thus inextricably linking the President's duty with the Militia's authority. This same authority for law enforcement must reside in the Militia in each State and Locality, under those "Officers" whose "Appointment" the Constitution "reserv[es] to the were often not even exempted, in deference to their offices, from performing normal Militia duties in their own persons. E.g., see ante, at 113-116 (Rhode Island) and 319-328 (Virginia).

---

[2406] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[2407] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[2408] Sterling v. Constantin, 287 U.S. 378, 399 (1932).

[2409] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[2410] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[2411] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

States respectively",[2412] because the Second Amendment declares that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", a responsibility for the fulfillment of which the Militia must wield sufficient authority in every place to which their jurisdiction may extend.

(2) As a matter of practicality, revitalized Militia can be expected to perform basic "police" functions more satisfactorily than the contemporary hodge-podge of forces assigned those tasks. This, primarily, because contemporary State and Local law-enforcement and emergency-response agencies are relatively small, élitist units the few members of which simply cannot be everywhere at once, and usually (albeit not necessarily through any fault of their own) are absent when and where the most urgent needs for their presence suddenly arise. Revitalized Militia, conversely, will mobilize huge numbers of eyes and ears throughout their communities at all times. Being members of Militia Companies, residents of or workers in various areas will have been trained in basic law-enforcement and emergency-response techniques. Almost always on or very near the scenes of potential operations, they will be able to perform more and more useful surveillance than typical modern police units, because they will enjoy direct access to more, better, and (perhaps most importantly) more timely information, the significance of which they will be in particularly advantageous positions to understand and put to good use.

The dispersion of Militiamen throughout each Local community will inevitably enhance deterrence of anti-social behavior. And where deterrence fails, criminal activity will be subject to early detection and effective suppression. With Militiamen essentially everywhere, many criminal acts in preparation or actual perpetration will be observed immediately. Because Local residents or workers not only will know one another, but also will have been trained to be on the lookout for strangers generally and for aberrant behavior in particular, many perpetrators will likely be identified shortly after committing their crimes. If they are not, dragnets with exceedingly fine meshes will be thrown over large areas in little time, because every Militiamen will be authorized and at least minimally trained to exercise normal "police" powers to stop, question, search, and if necessary arrest suspicious characters.

Moreover, with the regular Militia performing these duties, the specialized Militia in formal law-enforcement and kindred units can be assigned to detective work, forensics, and other tasks that require the kind of extensive training, experience, and concentrated effort that cannot be expected, let alone demanded, of the vast majority of ordinary Militiamen.

(3) As a matter of fundamental political principles, an observation which has sounded from the very inception of professional police forces in America in the middle of the Nineteenth Century[2413]—and that takes on ever more cogency and urgency as they become increasingly nationalized, centralized, and para-militarized under color of providing "homeland security"—is that such forces are not just akin to, or adjuncts of, but even amount to manifestations of, "standing armies".[2414] The Second Amendment declares "[a] well regulated Militia * * * necessary to the security of a free State", because the Founding Fathers very well understood that, in the final instrumental analysis, "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[2415] and that therefore "[i]t is against sound policy for a free people to keep up large military establishments and standing armies in time of peace, both from the enormous expenses with which they are attended and the facile means which they afford to ambitious and unprincipled rulers to subvert the government or trample upon the rights of the people".[2416] The Militia constitute the ultimate constitutional "checks and balances" against "standing armies". Therefore, the only way to forefend the danger that professional police forces will become, or will misbehave in the manner of, "standing armies"—while at the same time Americans can fully avail themselves of the useful services such specially trained forces can provide—is to incorporate all State and Local law-enforcement agencies into the Militia, where in light of their purpose they inherently belong.

---

[2412] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

Even if professional law-enforcement agencies were never to degenerate into "standing armies", in their present forms they would nonetheless constantly pose a distinct threat to "the security of a free State". If tyranny ever fastens itself upon America, it will arrive in the form of a "police state". The essence of a true "police state" lies in its officials' pretensions to total control over all aspects of the political, economic, social, and even cultural activity within the territory they administer. In service of their delusions of omnicompetence—for totalitarianism, or as it is often euphemistically expressed, "central planning", is nothing if not a psychopathic state of mind—they arrogate to themselves the worldly omnipotence of arbitrary power: superseding self-government of, by, and for the people with government over and against the people, administered by self-selected, self-appointed, and self-perpetuating élitists. Such individuals do not "exercise just powers", where the adjective "just" refers to "conform[ity] to rectitude or justice", "to the truth of things", and "to reason",[2417] as well as "to the divine will",[2418] under the aegis and constraints of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".[2419] Rather, they "just [2413] See, e.g., D. Sklansky, "The Private Police", ante note 844, at 1206-1207.

---

[2414] See, e.g., C. Morris & B. Vila, The Role of Police in American Society, ante note 534, at 25.

[2415] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2416] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[2417] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 806, definitions 1 and 2.

[2418] N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definitions 5 and 6.

[2419] See Declaration of Independence.

exercise powers", where the adverb "just" imports "merely",[2420] implying the absence of any perceived requirement of "conform[ity] to rectitude or justice", "to the truth of things", "to reason", "to the divine will", or to any law higher than the vicious appetites of their practitioners. These, then, are powers the mere exercises of which purport reflexively to supply their own justifications under the doctrines of "might makes right" and "l'étât c'est moi". Although oblivious to the consent of the governed, these totalitarians are obsessed with the obedience of the governed. To that end, they build up an apparatus of psychic and physical superordination (for them) and subordination (for everyone else). Because a perfectly foolproof mechanism of control requires omniscience with respect to all of the possible variables that may affect its operation, a thoroughgoing "police state" first establishes—and then expands and improves to the limits of the available manpower and technology—constant, comprehensive surveillance of the population, in order to ferret out every manifestation of opposition, no matter how apparently trivial. Then, to compel the masses to conform to the three foundational rules of subservience under totalitarianism—"Know your place! Do as you are told! Keep your mouth shut!"—the totalitarians apply four techniques to perpetuate their dominance: fraud, favor, fear, and force. Fraud always ranks first in the litany of oppression, because people steeped in official misinformation and disinformation, and otherwise deprived of reliable information, cannot come even to conceive of and understand their predicament, let alone devise some solution for it, and therefore are relatively easy to control. On such a politically lobotomized populace, the crude behaviorism of "stimulus and response" proves quite effective. Favors shrewdly dispensed induce some to become the régime's willing servitors in the commission of any crime against their fellow countrymen. But such largesse must be strictly limited, because the ultimate purpose of centralizing all power in a totalitarian state is not to allow society to disseminate wealth fairly among the vast majority of its members through the free market, but instead to concentrate most wealth in as few hands as possible through bureaucratic governmental "planning". What totalitarians always have in excess, capable of being spread around, is fear. Indeed, fear must inevitably be emphasized and employed universally, because even those in temporary favor must constantly be reminded of the precariousness of their privileges. Chronic, gnawing fear soon instills in all but the hardiest souls the realization that the quiet enjoyment of your life—and even your life itself—depend upon living your life only as they want you to live it; the resignation that there is no way to live your life other than their way; and the negation of any hope ever to discover any way to escape from them. Finally, to render fear effective in the event that some people, fired by determination born of desperation, openly resist the régime, overwhelming force must be at hand—a brutal para-military police apparatus in every Locality, backed up by a large "standing army" which will shrink from no atrocity in "pacification" of an unruly populace. Of course, a case-hardened "police state" does not emerge from the furnace of history all at once. The people's own apathy, sloth, and ignorance pave the way for gradual inroads and restrictions on self-government. Repression of dissent then escalates, so that the few people still committed to a free society cannot organize for the restoration of self-government. Finally, oppression becomes the permanent way of life for the common man.

---

[2420] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 806, definition 3.

Self-evidently, a "police state" is the veriest opposite of a "free State". And—given that "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state"[2421]—if the Militia are the police, then a "police state" is impossible. If the Militia are not the police, though, then the impossible becomes, not only possible, but even more than likely.

The bases for these conclusions should be obvious from most Americans' everyday experiences. A free society begins its transmogrification into a "police state" when those individuals regularly performing police functions degenerate into, then affirmatively assert themselves as, a group distinct and separate from, independent of, superior to, entitled to act with supercilious disdain towards, and even in an aggressively antagonistic position as against WE THE PEOPLE. They may work and even live in the community, but are neither of it nor for it. Rather, they conceive of themselves as set over the community—after all, they constitute "law enforcement"—forgetting that THE PEOPLE, under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", are the source of law, that the purpose of law is to serve THE PEOPLE, and that therefore "law enforcement" must be subordinate to the will and welfare of THE PEOPLE. (And if significant amounts of their funding, equipment, and training come, not from the Local community, but instead from some other jurisdiction, their alienation from and disregard for the community can only intensify.) All too soon, such rogue police officers take to holding THE PEOPLE in contempt—adopting all of the disreputable and dangerous attitudes and practices Hamlet summarized in the phrase "the insolence of office".[2422] In their eyes, THE PEOPLE are not to be served, but instead controlled, by whatever means may prove expedient. All too soon, "the insolence of office" metastasizes into what Hamlet called "[t]h' oppressor's wrong": systematic bullying, harassment, and outright "police brutality". If THE PEOPLE resist this mistreatment (or even openly resent it), the police (echoed by their touts and apologists) denounce the most vociferous critics as potentially violent "extremists" and even "terrorists"—thus concocting the rationale for importuning legislators and judges to expand their powers of search, seizure, arrest, and interrogation; to provide them with heavy equipment for SWAT and "anti-terrorist" teams; to grant them immunities from lawsuits for violations of individuals' civil rights; and to impose ever-expanding "gun controls" on so-called "civilians". Inevitably, as justified hostility among the general public boils over, the police openly emerge as THE PEOPLE'S political enemies. At that point, official oppression, repression, and suppression of THE PEOPLE—without the possibility of redress in the kangaroo courts—become the order of the day. Whether this particularly benefits the police themselves, or primarily the factions and special-interest groups for which they function as mere myrmidons, the effect on THE PEOPLE is the same. Ordinary Americans are reduced from sovereigns to subjects—the degree of their subjection determined by their exploiters' amorality, arrogance, avarice, and appetite for abusive authority.

[2421] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2422] William Shakespeare, The Tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, Act III, Scene 1.

Conversely, when the Militia are the police, the first step in this descent into barbarism cannot be taken. Under those circumstances, the interests of the police will always coincide with the interests of THE PEOPLE, because the police and THE PEOPLE will be the selfsame individuals. And, in any event, the behavior of particular police officers will always be made to serve THE PEOPLE, because that behavior itself will be continually monitored "from the bottom up" by THE PEOPLE themselves. Having been absorbed into specialized units of the Militia, police personnel will be subject to continuous supervision and discipline by members of the Militia outside of those units. In that event, they will be unable to imagine for one instant that if they abuse their law-enforcement authority they will nevertheless enjoy immunity from exposure and punishment through the connivance of some "good old boy" network within the dark recesses of their Local or State government. This, because although each law-enforcement agency will organize its own specialized Militia Companies in which its personnel will be enrolled for the particular purposes of that service, the members of those specialized Companies will also be required to retain their enrollments in the regular Local Militia Companies in their own neighborhoods to which they otherwise would have been assigned as rank-and-file members of the Militia—and thereby will remain answerable to the members of those regular Companies for their behavior in their specialized capacities as law-enforcement officers. Any rogue policeman who steps even a single Ångstrom Unit out of line in his capacity as a policeman will have to answer to his friends, neighbors, and co-workers in his and their capacities as members of some Local Militia Company invested with the authority to commence disciplinary proceedings against him.[2423] Under these reforms, the modern scourge of "police brutality" will largely end, because by savaging one member of the community a rogue law-enforcement officer will be ensuring inquiry, exposure, and condemnation by everyone in his Local Militia Company, and then swift, sure, and severe punishment pursuant to Militia regulations. Similarly, the blight of "police corruption" will largely disappear as well, because to ensure the success of a scheme to suborn key law-enforcement officers a criminal will have to bribe not just a few members of the relevant special unit, but also almost everyone in the various Local Militia Companies to which those members will be required to report.

---

[2423] See ante, at 956-963.

Thus, Local policing of the community, with* Local *policing of the police, by Local people in Local Militia units will thwart the development of a "police state" at the very point at which "police-state" tactics must be applied if they are to be effective. In no way can WE THE PEOPLE be sure to remain self-governing sovereigns, other than to scotch the snake when and where it first slithers, and before it strikes. For if THE PEOPLE are permanently to exercise political power as sovereigns—if "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'"[2424]—and if in any community the first use of the gun with ostensible legal authority will usually be by the police—then THE PEOPLE themselves through their Militia must be the police, so that THE PEOPLE themselves will always control that first use of the gun, and thereby retain every scrap of "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of [its] barrel'".

3. The Militia to investigate the constitutionality of the laws they execute. The authority and responsibility "to execute the Laws of the Union"[2425]—and, inasmuch as the Militia are "the Militia of the several States", the laws of the States, too—would be next to useless if the Militia had no recourse other than to rely in the manner of automatons on sources outside of themselves to know what "the Laws" supposedly were and how to execute them. Certainly, the Militia cannot be required to accept as final and binding the mere opinions of public officials on these matters, because the Militia might be called upon "to execute the Laws" against those very officials, who undoubtedly would misadvise the Militia that under some artful misconstructions "the Laws" did not proscribe, but rather permitted, protected, and empowered even the worst of rogue officials to perpetuate and profit from their own misbehavior.

First and foremost among "the Laws of the Union" that the Militia may be "call[ed] forth to execute" must be the Constitution itself. For, inasmuch as the validity of all other "Laws" depends upon their strict satisfaction of constitutional standards, whether and how to execute any "Law[ ]" always involves (or at least should involve) a preliminary assessment of that "Law['s]" constitutionality. In particular, "[a] well regulated Militia" will not prove "necessary to the security of a free State" if it unthinkingly executes purported "Laws" that, perforce of their unconstitutionality, are no "Laws" at all.[2426] Surely a State cannot claim to be

---

[2424] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2425] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[2426] Contrast U.S. Const. amend. II with, e.g., Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886); Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 91, 101-102 (1887); and Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 376-377 (1880), quoted with approval in Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408 (1963).

"free"—or even rationally ordered—when those who enact her supposed "Laws" do so in violation of her own "supreme Law of the Land",[2427] and then disingenuously demand that their phony "Laws" be enforced by the very parties whom that "supreme Law" has explicitly designated as its executors. And surely a Militia cannot claim to be "well regulated" if it purports to perform its constitutional responsibilities in open violation or careless disregard of the very charter which assigns them. Therefore, the Militia of each State should establish a "Committee of Constitutional Inquiry and Compliance" (under that or some other suitable designation) in order to determine—independently, by and for the Militia itself—the constitutionality vel non of whatever purported "Laws" the Militia might be called forth to execute.

Although this body should include some members specifically trained in the law (of whom the Militia in any reasonably populated region will doubtlessly suffer no dearth), it should be composed primarily of laymen, serving by regular rotation, because WE THE PEOPLE intended the Constitution, not just at its inception but for all time thereafter, to be understood and applied by ordinary Americans in their every exercise of popular sovereignty and self-government. For example, conscientious voters will always decide upon the qualifications of candidates for public office by themselves assessing the compliance of those candidates' platforms, promises, and performances with the Constitution. For voters who do any less are in effect playing Russian roulette with the ballot box, particularly when the candidates are contending for high offices upon the proper administration of which America's very survival might depend. Similarly, conscientious jurors in criminal cases—which may pit the full force of the government against a solitary individual—will always render verdicts based upon their own judgments as to the constitutionality, and the justice under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", of the statutes and applications thereof at issue before them.[2428] For jurors who

---

[2427] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2428] This was the law of jurors' authority at the time of ratification of the Constitution. Even in a civil case in which "arises * * * any difficult matter of law", "the jury may, if they think proper, take upon themselves to determine, at their own hazard, the complicated questions of fact and law". W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 377-378. And in a criminal case, > the [old] practice * * * of fining, imprisoning, or otherwise punishing jurors, merely at the discretion of the court, for finding their verdict contrary to the direction of the judge, was arbitrary, unconstitutional, and illegal * * * and is treated as such * * * two hundred years ago * * * [.] For * * * it would be a most unhappy case for the judge himself, if the prisoner's fate depended upon his directions:—unhappy also for the prisoner; for, if the judge's opinion must rule the verdict, the trial by jury would be useless.

Id., Volume 4, at 354-355. So, in Georgia v. Brailsford, an early civil trial conducted within the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the following instruction was given to the jury:

> It may not be amiss, here, Gentlemen [of the jury], to remind you of the good old rule that on questions of fact, it is the province of the jury, on questions of law, it is the province of supinely accede to judges' instructions on the law are in effect denying individual defendants a "trial by jury" and, worse yet, depriving the entire judicial system and the country it serves pro tanto of the "checks and balances" that independently minded jurors can throw up against errant and arrant judges and prosecutors. So, too, conscientious Militiamen will always "execute the Laws" according to their own determinations of what "the supreme Law of the Land" requires or allows. For Militiamen who mechanically "follow orders"—even from the President as their ostensible "Commander in Chief"—are not "execut[ing] the Laws" as they understand them, in keeping with their own personal "Oath[s] or Affirmation[s], to support th[e] Constitution",[2429] but only accepting someone else's perhaps fallible, perhaps fatuous, perhaps even knowingly false opinion as to what "the Laws" may be. Surely neither voters, nor jurors, nor least of all Militiamen should neglect or > the court to decide. But it must be observed that by the same law, which recognizes this reasonable distribution of jurisdiction, you have nevertheless a right to take upon yourselves to judge of both, and to determine the law as well as the fact in controversy. On this, and every other occasion, however, we have no doubt, that you will pay that respect, which is due to the opinion of the court: For, as on the one hand, it is presumed, that juries are the best judges of facts; it is, on the other hand, presumable, that the court are the best judges of law. But still both objects are lawfully, within your power of decision.

---

3 U.S. (3 Dallas) 1, 4 (1794) (Jay, C.J.). Shortly thereafter, even the infamous "Sedition Act" provided "[t]hat if any person shall be prosecuted under this act, * * * the jury who shall try the cause, shall have a right to determine the law and the fact, under the direction of the court, as in other cases". An Act in addition to the act, entitled "An Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States", Act of 14 July 1798, CHAP. LXXIV, § 3, 1 Stat. 596, 597. And the power "to determine the law as well as the fact[s]" being a matter of the very definition of a "jury" in Anglo-American law for generations then past—as the Court in Brailsford described it, "the good old rule"—it could be changed thereafter only by a constitutional Amendment. Which points up the wisdom in Blackstone's admonition, that > the more [trial by jury] is searched into and understood, the more it is sure to be valued. And this is a species of knowledge most absolutely necessary for every gentleman in the kingdom: as well because he may be frequently called upon to determine in this capacity the rights of others, * * * as because his own property, his liberty, and his life, depend upon maintaining, in it's legal force, the constitutional trial by jury.

Commentaries on the Laws of England, Volume 3, at 350-351. To be sure, this matter has long been controversial. Contrast, e.g, Sparf and Hansen v. United States, 156 U.S. 51, 52 (1895) (Harlan, J., for the Court), with id. at 110 (Gray, J., dissenting). And the erroneous view of such as Justice Harlan appears to have prevailed today (at least among the practitioners and proponents of judicial imperialism) in the denigration as "jury nullification" of the right of jurors to decide both the facts and the law. Yet nothing in legal principle precludes WE THE PEOPLE collectively, as America's supreme lawgivers, from returning this country to the constitutionally correct rule as enunciated by Justice Gray. For "neither the antiquity of a practice nor * * * steadfast legislative and judicial adherence to it through the centuries insulates it from constitutional attack". Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235, 239 (1970). See generally Clay S. Conrad, Jury Nullification: The Evolution of a Doctrine (Durham, North Carolina: Carolina Academic press, 1999). Neither does anything in legal practice preclude WE THE PEOPLE individually, as actual jurors, from concluding in a criminal case that a "reasonable doubt" of a defendant's guilt exists, or from finding in a civil case that the plaintiff has not adduced a "preponderance of the evidence", whenever the purported "law" being applied appears to be unconstitutional or otherwise unjust. For no juror can ever be required to justify or even to explain his belief that a "reasonable doubt" exists or that a "preponderance of the evidence" is absent. After all, "[f]reedom to believe * * * is absolute". Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940).

[2429] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

refuse properly to perform their duties on the plea that the Constitution is too difficult for them to understand, or that they are too lazy to try to understand it, or that they may simply abdicate their own responsibilities by conforming their conduct to the unverified opinions of others willy-nilly. For, although they repeatedly elect the people who make this country's laws, voters labor under no constitutional duty to vote—yet no one would concede that they lack at least a political and moral obligation to educate themselves as to the candidates' (de)merits before casting their ballots. And although they decide who may have broken the laws, and are required to serve for that purpose, in the course of their lives particular jurors typically sit for only a very few cases involving a very small number of defendants—yet no one would contend that therefore none of them need consider consequential a breach of his duty to judge the law in any one case. In contrast, Militiamen labor under a constitutional duty "to execute the Laws" at any time, possibly against very large numbers of adversaries, and always in such a manner as to preserve "the security of a free State"—so no one could possibly conceive of any situation in which their neglect, let alone refusal, properly to execute the Constitution in the course of executing any other "Laws" could be excusable. And because properly executing the Constitution self-evidently requires properly understanding the Constitution, no one could possibly conceive of any justification for Militiamen to remain ignorant of what "the supreme Law of the Land" truly means, when they could easily overcome such ignorance through their own individual and especially collective efforts.

"Committees of Constitutional Inquiry and Compliance" will compel Militiamen in large numbers to educate themselves on the most important of all political subjects. Then the Committees' work will bring about the enlightenment of many others—for as Militiamen study the Constitution they will inevitably pass on their knowledge to those around them. This will usher in a veritable renaissance of constitutionalism, because once people actually understand how the Constitution secures their political liberties and economic prosperity, and why the efficacy of the Constitution depends upon their own efforts, they will demand and see to its strict enforcement in both letter and spirit. This will have two salient results. First, subversive political propagandists and agitators will no longer easily gull Americans in significant numbers. Second, routinely subjecting the words and deeds of public officials to close constitutional scrutiny will innoculate Americans against mentally and morally degenerating into zombies of authoritarianism, always ready to obey the orders of some supposed "superiors". The importance of this cannot be overemphasized. For, to succeed in their schemes, aspiring usurpers and tyrants, themselves always few in number, must recruit numerous "enforcers" to impose their wills on the people. To recruit enough actual "enforcers", they must appeal to even more "believers" who can be deluded, or will delude themselves, into accepting usurpation and tyranny as somehow "legitimate". But inasmuch as all usurpation and tyranny violate the Constitution, and are therefore patently illegitimate, popular education and vigilance in constitutional matters will radically reduce the set of potential "believers", and even more the set of potential "enforcers", thereby rendering usurpation and tyranny highly unlikely to gain any foothold in this country.

4. The Militia to supervise honest elections. For the Militia "to execute the Laws", there must be "Laws" that sometimes may require the Militia's "execut[ion]"—and therefore lawmakers and other public officials to enact and administer those "Laws" in the first instance. Rather than themselves participating in direct democracy of the "town-meeting" variety, WE THE PEOPLE throughout America typically elect legislators and most other officials as their representatives. This, because every State must have "a Republican Form of Government";[2430] and, according to American political science, "[a] republic" is "a government in which the scheme of representation takes place".[2431] Obviously, however, "a Republican Form of Government" does not exist if those who pass for "THE PEOPLE'S representatives" have not in fact been fairly chosen by THE PEOPLE at all, but instead have insinuated themselves into office despite THE PEOPLE'S true desires by means of electoral dirty tricks.

Josef Stalin was acutely aware that who is allowed to vote in an election is not as important as who counts the votes, and how.[2432] But he was not the only political gangster in modern times who translated that insight into an effective program for rigging elections. Sadly, electoral fraud has long been and even now remains endemic throughout America, at every level of the federal system. Typically, schemes to steal elections can involve simply the employment of fictitious "voters"; the fraudulent counting of paper ballots or the stuffing of ballot-boxes; or the use of rigged voting machines operated at the electronic intersection of political and corporate crime.[2433] But whatever their provenance and form, all such schemes must be stamped out.

After the Constitution itself, "the Laws" providing for honest elections are arguably the most important. For no "free State" is possible where purported public

---

[2430] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2431] The Federalist No. 10 (James Madison). No reason can be found in political or legal theory why "a Republican Form of Government" could not function as a "town meeting", in which each individual actually represented himself. The problem with such an arrangement is merely practical: namely, how in most jurisdictions to accommodate the very large numbers of individuals who would have a right to participate in the process.

[2432] See, e.g., Nikolai Tolstoy, Stalin's Secret War (New York, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1982), at 29.

[2433] See, e.g., Hacked! High Tech Election Theft in America, Abbe W. DeLozier & Vickie Karp, Editors (Austin, Texas: Truth Enterprises Publishing, 2006); Richard Hayes Phillips, Witness to a Crime: A Citizens' Audit of an American Election (Rome, New York: Canterbury Press, 2008); John Fund, Stealing Elections: How Voter Fraud Threatens Our Democracy (New York, New York: Encounter Books, Second Edition, 2008).

officials are nothing more than usurpers from the onset, because they have been fraudulently elected. So seeing to it that the election "Laws" are properly "execute[d]" should be the province of the Militia, too. Actually, delegating to the Militia the responsibility to oversee elections is the most feasible means to guarantee that they are conducted honestly. First, with the large numbers of Militiamen available in any jurisdiction, votes can be counted by hand and eye without the use of machines, not only quickly but also redundantly so as to ensure accuracy. Second, because service in polling places during each election can be assigned by lot according to some system of rotation among the entire body of the Militia, it will be virtually impossible to suborn the individuals selected at any one time, inasmuch as no one will know whom to suborn until the last minute, too many will need to be suborned to falsify the count, and in any event so many will be checking on what others are doing that no attempts at falsification will pass undiscovered—or, when discovered, will escape unpunished. Third, the Militia can devise methods of identifying eligible voters and collecting, counting, and verifying their votes that will be safe from tampering. For example, lists of registered voters can be checked and double-checked by members of Militia Companies specially assigned to that duty—first, in the course of attending regular meetings of their Companies, and then by going door-to-door in their own neighborhoods, where every resident is likely to be known by someone. The ballot could consist of an integrated set, consisting of an original and three copies, uniquely serially numbered. After being marked by the voter, the original would be turned in to be counted by the first team of tabulators, and then stored for the period of time corresponding to the statute of limitations for judicial challenges to the election. Two copies would be turned in to be counted separately by the second and third team of tabulators, for confirmation. The remaining copy would be retained by the voter. The votes would be counted immediately upon closing the polls, and the results tabulated and announced as soon as possible. In addition, within some statutorily fixed number of days following the election, data taken from each ballot cast in each polling-place would be posted there, in order of serial number, showing the votes recorded for each candidate, referendum issue, and so on, so that each voter could personally verify that his own votes had been correctly tabulated and counted, and so that all voters and other interested persons could assure themselves that the totals for all ballots had been correctly summed. Thus, as each voter finished checking the final results, there would have been four separate counts, the last of them made by the individuals most personally interested in an accurate tabulation. Each voter would then have some statutorily fixed number of days to protest the counting of his own votes (using his copy of his ballot and his own testimony as evidence). And finally the results would be certified (subject to any later judicial challenges) a few days after the period for such protests ended. Simple, effective, and nearly foolproof—but, of course, dependent upon having the manpower of the Militia available to register voters and count their votes, the training of the Militia to oversee the process, the discipline of the Militia to detect and crack down on any attempts at fraud, and the commitment of the Militia to supply the security necessary to preserve "[a] Republican Form of Government" for "a free State".

5. The Militia's authority and ability to serve as the locus and the means for the institution of a sound currency. The point of "[a] Republican Form of Government"—indeed, of all "Governments * * * instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed"—is "to secure" everyone's "unalienable Rights", among which are "Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness".[2434] "[T]he pursuit of Happiness" depends upon the ability of ordinary people to avail themselves of every advantage offered by both political and economic freedom. So "the security of a free State" must include economic as well as political security.

a. Political science has traditionally denoted the power to provide political "homeland security" as "the Power of the Sword", because "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[2435] This is the power of government to "provide for the common defence" against enemies both foreign and domestic, without the successful exercise of which WE THE PEOPLE could not hope to "establish Justice" and "secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity".[2436] The power to provide economic "homeland security" political science has traditionally located within "the Power of the Purse", which includes the powers of government to tax, to spend, and to authorize for official use the particular money in which taxes will be assessed, public funds expended, and justice dispensed in the courts, so as to "promote the general Welfare".[2437] In fact, to a large degree economic "homeland security" and "the general Welfare" could be taken as synonymous or largely coincident. Moreover, economic "homeland security" is closely linked with social "homeland security", because the preservation of "domestic Tranquility" depends upon the promotion of "the general Welfare", too.[2438]

Of crucial importance, the Power of the Purse and the Power of the Sword are intimately interrelated, because economic power grows out of political power, or at least depends upon political power for its protection—and, therefore, just as "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'" in the first instance, so too does economic power in the final analysis. To maintain economic power in WE THE PEOPLE'S own hands requires WE THE PEOPLE'S retention of political power in their own hands, and then their application of that power in aid of their own economic

---

[2434] Declaration of Independence.

[2435] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2436] U.S. Const. preamble.

[2437] U.S. Const. preamble and art. I, § 8, cl.1.

[2438] See U.S. Const. preamble.

"homeland security". Within any society, after all, "the economy" is not simply an aggregation of transactions among otherwise isolated individuals and private organizations that have no collective significance other than their coincidental occurrences in time and space. Rather, it is a complex system of mutual coöperation that results in all sorts of interdependencies among its participants. Moreover, "the economy" exists only because and to the extent that society protects it politically. For example, in America a "free-market economy" depends upon specific legal guarantees for "private property" (from theft) and for "contracts" (from fraud). If public officials were to allow transactions that partook of theft and fraud to become commonplace, "the economy" would no longer be a "free-market economy". Neither would a society tolerating such misbehavior long remain stable. For a polity which licensed theft and fraud would hardly "establish Justice", and in the absence of "Justice" could never hope to preserve its "domestic Tranquility".

Under the division of labor and the rule of constitutional law established in America, each working individual—whether in the field, the shop, the factory, the office, or the home—contributes some part to the successful operation of the economic system as a whole. Yet, in almost every case, each individual receives more extensive benefits from his participation within that system than he could ever receive from the same level of personal effort without it. In that regard, "the whole is greater than the sum of its parts". And to compensate society for the unmerited benefits he receives from it, each individual must, as a matter of justice, fulfill various moral, political, and legal obligations of social solidarity—foremost of which is never to endanger, and wherever possible to advance, "the common defence" and "the general Welfare" through his own actions. This obligation does not subordinate the individual to society, but instead perfectly incorporates him within it. For if an individual desires fully to participate in society, he must partake not only of the rights it offers, but also of the duties its proper functioning imposes. Of course, this is not to contend that Americans will never disagree as to exactly what constitutes "the common defence" and "the general Welfare" at any particular historical juncture. But if honest disagreements do arise, the disputants will have an obligation to compose them in some rational fashion, precisely in order to achieve "the common defence" and "the general Welfare".

b. Specifically, in a society operating according to the principles of the free market, in which the prices of all goods and services are denominated in monetary units, economic "homeland security" depends upon economically and politically sound money. For the free market cannot function without rational economic calculation.[2439] And economic justice in a truly free market requires that everyone participating in the market should receive remuneration according to the real value of the services he has rendered.[2440] But neither rational economic calculation nor economic justice is possible without a medium of exchange consisting of some valuable commodity the supply of which is tied directly to the workings of the market, with as little manipulation of that supply as possible by rogue public officials, speculators, or other selfish special-interest groups. (The qualification "as little . . . as possible" takes into account the historical record of ingenuity on the part of those miscreants in public office, private banking, and the underworld of financial speculation who have been ever eager and often able to subvert monetary systems for their personal gain at society's expense.) This, however, demands that WE THE PEOPLE themselves, through reliance on the market and restrictions on their government, hold control over money firmly in their own hands.

---

[2439] See, e.g., L. von Mises, Human Action, ante note 1950, Chapter XXVI. See also idem, Socialism: An Economic and Sociological Analysis, J. Kahane, Translator (London, England: Jonathan Cape, New Edition, 1971).

Historically, silver and gold have always proven to be the best commodities to use as money, because they are uniquely suited to perform the three functions of media of exchange: namely, (i) as units of value—for silver and gold coins and ingots are composed of known, fixed, and reproducible weights of elemental metals; (ii) as measures of value—for the free market can always determine rates of exchange between every nonmonetary good and service and either silver (under a monometallic "silver standard"), or gold (under a monometallic "gold standard"), or both (under a duometallic system in which one metal is the "standard" and the other metal takes its value in terms of the "standard" from the free-market rate of exchange between the two); and (iii) as stores of value—for over great expanses of time, throughout the world, silver and gold have always held their purchasing powers better than any other media of exchange.[2441] This is why the Constitution designates the (silver) "dollar" as America's standard of monetary value;[2442] delegates to Congress the powers "[t]o coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin";[2443] declares that "[n]o State shall * * * coin Money";[2444] prohibits every State from "mak[ing] any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts";[2445] grants no authority to Congress to emit "bills of credit" (the Founders' term for paper currency), with or without the character of "legal [2440] See generally Heinrich Pesch, Ethics and the National Economy, Rupert Ederer, Translator (Norfolk, Virginia: IHS Press, 2004).

---

[2441] As a store of value, silver has often seemed more volatile than gold in American experience. But that is because, although in principle the Constitution requires it, in practice America has never enjoyed a proper duometallic system in which: (i) both of the precious metals were treated as legally equivalent media of exchange; but (ii) the free market (rather than some governmental body) determined the fluctuating market value of one based upon the fixed legal value of the other. See, e.g., E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 119-126.

[2442] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 1 and amend. VII.

[2443] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 5

[2444] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2445] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

tender";[2446] and absolutely prohibits every State from "emit[ting] Bills of Credit" of any description whatsoever.[2447] Constitutional money is to be economically sound money, the only form of money that can promote economic "homeland security".[2448]

Unfortunately, Americans today do not enjoy the benefits of constitutional, economically sound money. Rather, this country's present monetary and banking systems are based upon the shaky foundation of Federal Reserve Notes and bank-deposits payable therein. Although Federal Reserve Notes are "obligations of the United States" which "shall be redeemed in lawful money", they are redeemable in neither silver nor gold.[2449] And the supply of those notes is determined, not by the free market, but by the secretive decisions and for the recondite purposes of a corporative-state banking cartel.[2450] Moreover, the entire arrangement is thoroughly unconstitutional.[2451] And its continuation endangers not only America's economic "homeland security" but also her security as "a free State" and even as an independent sovereign nation.[2452]

c. It is unlikely, however, that any public officials in the General Government—other than, perhaps, a truly patriotic President, the improbability of whose election raises the total level of unlikelihood to the second or third power—will do anything to return America to a system of constitutional, economically sound money in the foreseeable future.[2453] And although in principle WE THE PEOPLE as private individuals could introduce a new economically sound currency into the free market, and employ it as an alternative to (if not even to the exclusion of) Federal Reserve Notes, in practice various onerous "transaction costs" associated with such action would seriously retard the process.[2454] WE THE PEOPLE, on the one hand, and the General Government, on the other, are not the only components of the federal system, however.

[2446] Contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 2 with Arts. of Confed'n art. IX, ¶ 5.

[2447] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2448] See generally E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 25-177.

[2449] Compare and contrast 12 U.S.C. § 411 with 31 U.S.C. § 5118(b) and (c).

[2450] E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 689-866.

[2451] Id., Volume 2, at 1401-1524.

[2452] See generally id., Volume 2, at 1588-1600, and Edwin Vieira, Jr., "The Purse and the Sword: Imminent Dangers of U.S. Economic and Homeland Security Policies" (Metamora, Michigan: DVD produced by the Heritage Research Institute, 2010).

[2453] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 1607-1620, 1631-1636. The proposal now current among certain circles within the Establishment to return the Federal Reserve System to some sort of "gold standard" is both unworkable and undesirable. See APPENDIX A, post, at 1899.

[2454] E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 1636-1639. These costs must be exceedingly large, because in the some thirty-four years (as of this writing) since Americans have been permitted to use gold as an alternative currency, and even longer with respect to silver, next to no such use has emerged in the ordinary channels of commerce, notwithstanding both chronic depreciation in the purchasing power of Federal Reserve Notes and more recently the shocks of one banking and financial crisis after another. See id., Volume 2, at 1269-1273.

(1) The several States both enjoy the constitutional authority and can employ efficacious means to introduce alternative media of exchange consisting of silver and gold into their governmental finances and private economies.[2455] Moreover, in the absence of constitutional money that Congress "coin[s]" or adopts by "regulat[ing] the Value * * * of foreign Coin" in amounts sufficient to serve all Americans' purposes,[2456] the States labor under a plain constitutional duty to provide their citizens with proper media of exchange in aid of their economic "homeland security". For the Constitution commands that "[n]o State shall * * * make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts".[2457] This sets out not only an explicit disability—that the States may not "make * * * a Tender" out of "any Thing but gold and silver Coin"—and an explicit reservation of power for the States to "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender"—but also the mandate to do so, because the prohibition that "[n]o State shall * * * make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender" amounts to the injunction that each State "shall * * * make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender". In addition, inasmuch as the power to "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender" is explicitly "reserved to the States respectively", then an authority to negate that power cannot possibly have been "delegated to the United States".[2458]

Of course, the power of Congress "[t]o coin Money" must include an implied authority to declare that very "Money" to be "legal tender" for its constitutionally "regulate[d] * * * Value".[2459] That, after all, is an inescapable consequence of "regulat[ing] * * * Value".[2460] If (say) a particular coin contains a "dollar's worth" of silver (371-1/4 grains of pure metal), then its properly "regulate[d] * * * Value" must be "one dollar", and it must be "legal tender" for a "dollar" (being that it is a "dollar").[2461] But such an implied Congressional authority would not restrict the States in the exercise of their reserved power to "make * * * a Tender" of "gold and silver Coin" as to which Congress had failed, neglected, or refused to act. For, if Congress had so defaulted, the States could "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender" only by themselves doing what Congress should have done, not by doing nothing at all. Furthermore, inasmuch as each State must "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender", but cannot do so at an unconstitutional "Value"; and inasmuch as Congress is authorized to "regulate the Value" of "Coin"; and inasmuch as designating a "Coin" to be "legal tender" is merely another way for

---

[2455] Id., Volume 2, at 1620-1631.

[2456] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 5.

[2457] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2458] See U.S. Const. amend. X.

[2459] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 5 and 18.

[2460] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 129-133.

[2461] Id., Volume 1, at 134-141, 191-199.

Congress to "regulate the "Value" of that "Coin" as a consequence and in terms of its weight in silver or gold—therefore, the implied power of Congress to declare domestic and foreign "Coin" to be "legal tender" for their constitutional "Values" does not contradict the States' power to "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender", but instead assists the States in exercising that power properly. And, obviously, because the Constitution demands that every State "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender", Congress can neither require nor allow any State to do the opposite.[2462] So, perforce of the Constitution, the States can adopt silver and gold coins as their media of exchange, and can refuse to use Federal Reserve Notes—which neither are silver or gold coins themselves nor are redeemable in such coins[2463]—for any purpose, notwithstanding that Congress has purported to declare those notes to be "legal tender".[2464] And, constitutionally, Congress can do nothing to stop them. How in practice, though, the States can successfully go about introducing constitutional and economically sound media of exchange into their systems of governmental finance and private commerce—and maintaining them there in the face of opposition from, for example, rogue officials of the General Government—is another question altogether.

(2) That the States' adoption of silver and gold coins as their media of exchange is a matter of "homeland security" would justify calling forth their Militia for that purpose. Indeed, because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" in all respects (for the Second Amendment in no way limits that declaration), and because economic "homeland security" is surely a critical component of the "security of a free State", as a matter of law the Militia should be in the forefront of the effort. Indeed, revitalization of the Militia should precede, or at least accompany in the same statute, adoption of an alternative currency, because it is "preposterous[ ] * * * [to] attempt[ ] to seize the [Power of the P]urse, before [one is] master of the [Power of the S]word".[2465] And, as a matter of fact, revitalized "well regulated Militia" would be establishments perfectly composed, positioned, prepared, and motivated to fulfill that mission quickly, completely, and safely. In outline, the plan would be as follows—

(a) The State would select her new media of exchange. In keeping with traditional practices, these could be actual silver and gold coins.[2466] Under contemporary conditions, however, the use of actual coinage for common day-to-day transactions is both problematic and unnecessary:

[2462] Contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1 with art. I, § 10, cls. 2 and 3. See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 104-112.

[2463] Compare and contrast 12 U.S.C. § 411 with 31 U.S.C. § 5118(b) and (c).

[2464] Contrast 31 U.S.C. § 5103 with E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 1403-1422.

[2465] A. Fletcher, A DISCOURSE OF GOVERNMENT, ante note 31, at 22.

[2466] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, Appendix B, at 1664-1666.

First, The States cannot "coin Money" at all.[2467] And the General Government does not provide for coinage of either silver or gold according to the constitution pattern of "free coinage". Under that system, an individual who brings some weight of gold or silver bullion to the Mint receives, after a time, coins containing the selfsame weight of metal, struck at no charge to him; or, if he prefers immediate receipt (and the Mint concurs), he can accept coins containing in the aggregate some lesser weight of precious metal, according to a fixed formula. For example, the first Coinage Act enacted under the Constitution provided that "any person" might > bring to the * * * mint gold and silver bullion, in order to their being coined; and * * * the bullion so brought shall be * * * coined as speedily as may be after the receipt thereof, and that free of expense to the person * * * by whom the same shall have been brought. And as soon as the said bullion shall have been coined, the person * * * by whom the same shall have been delivered, shall upon demand receive in lieu thereof coins of the same species of bullion which shall have been so delivered, weight for weight, of the pure gold or pure silver therein contained: Provided nevertheless, That it shall be at the mutual option of the party * * * bringing such bullion, and of the director of the * * * mint, to make an immediate exchange of coins for standard bullion, with a deduction of one half per cent. from the weight of the pure gold, or pure silver contained in the said bullion, as an indemnification to the mint for the time which will necessarily be required for coining the said bullion, and for the advance which shall have been so made in coins.[2468]

Conversely, as of this writing, although the statutes that mandate general coinage of silver and gold provide that "the Secretary [of the Treasury] shall mint and issue" these coins "in quantities sufficient to meet public demand", they also provide that: (i) "[t]he Secretary shall sell the coins * * * to the public at a price equal to the market value of the bullion at the time of sale, plus the cost of minting, marketing, and distributing such coins"; and (ii) "[t]he Secretary shall make bulk sales of the coins * * * at a reasonable discount".[2469] This is neither identical with nor even equivalent in practice to "free coinage". For in a market wherein Federal Reserve Notes, irredeemable in either silver or gold but imbued with the status of

---

[2467] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2468] An Act establishing a Mint, and regulating the Coins of the United States, Act of 2 April 1792, CHAP. XVI, § 14, 1 Stat. 246, 249. See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 191-199.

[2469] See An Act To authorize the minting of coins in commemoration of the centennial of the Statue of Liberty and to authorize the issuance of Liberty Coins, Act of 9 July 1985, Pub. L. 99-61, TITLE II—LIBERTY COINS, § 202 [§ 5112(e) and (f)], 99 Stat. 113, 115-116; and An Act To authorize the minting of gold bullion coins, Act of 17 December 1985, Pub. L. 99-185, § 2(b) [§ 5112(i)], 99 Stat. 1177, 1177-1178; now codified at 31 U.S.C. § 5112(e), (f), and (i).

"legal tender", constitute essentially the sole currency in circulation, the demand for silver and gold coins to be held for uses other than as actual currency (such as "investment" against depreciation of Federal Reserve Notes) will never be as large as the demand for silver and gold coins to be used directly and immediately as currency in a market wherein the only currencies are silver and gold coins, and all bank notes are treated, not as actual money, the most liquid of all assets, but instead as nothing more than instruments of debt. So, not being controlled by the free market, the amount of silver and gold coinage being produced today is far from optimal. In addition, that the Secretary "shall sell the coins * * * to the public at a price equal to the market value of the bullion at the time of sale, plus the cost of minting, marketing, and distributing such coins"—with that "price", "market value", and "cost" to be measured ultimately in Federal Reserve Notes—retains Federal Reserve Notes, rather than silver and gold coins, as the effective monetary standard of value.

Second, the coins struck by the United States and by various foreign nations that are readily available in the free market would surely prove inconvenient to use, because not enough different, and especially low, denominations exist to facilitate average day-to-day commercial transactions.

Third, no State can safely rely on private mints to generate new types of coinage, because: (i) Private mints will be unable to be granted or to partake of any governmental right, power, or immunity by being made parts or agents of the State. For, inasmuch as no State can herself "coin Money",[2470] she cannot authorize any private party to do so on her behalf under the aegis of her authority. Indeed, if a private mint were to claim any governmental right, power, or immunity in the premises, then the constitutional disability would immediately come into play, nullifying the supposed right, power, or immunity. But (ii) without such a governmental right, power, or immunity, a private mint would be exposed to possible interdiction by rogue officials of the General Government.[2471] So no prudent private mint would ever commence operations without some previously acquired judicial protection (such as a declaratory judgment)—which would entail a lengthy period of expensive litigation, more than likely with an ultimately unsuccessful outcome in view of the rogue nature of the Judiciary where fundamental questions of monetary law are concerned.[2472]

[2470] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2471] See 18 U.S.C. § 486. The part of this statute which purports to apply to honest private coinage is plainly unconstitutional. See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 1532-1534. That, however, would hardly deter the type of rogue officials who have long infested the Department of the Treasury and the Department of Justice.

[2472] See, e.g., E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 339-454, 599-666, 840-862; and Volume 2, at 1127-1211, 1311-1340, 1345-1399.

Fourth, even if gold and silver coinage were available in sufficient amounts and convenient denominations, no "gold and silver banks" or equivalent institutions exist to accept deposits, offer checking and savings accounts, make loans, and provide other banking and financial services necessary not only to average citizens but especially to businesses.

(b) Better than coinage would be so-called "electronic gold currency" and "electronic silver currency". "Electronic" refers to the method for recording and transferring legal title to specific amounts of gold or silver bullion actually held for depositors in special "bailment" accounts as "currency" by "electronic currency providers". "Electronic gold currency" and "electronic silver currency" offer numerous advantages over specie coins deposited in typical banks, the foremost being:

• Security—The gold and silver on deposit are owned by the depositors themselves and not by the "electronic currency providers" that hold those deposits. The depositors are "bailors" of the specie, the providers "bailees". With a typical bank, conversely, a deposit becomes the property of the bank, with the depositor merely a general creditor of the bank for the value of his deposit.

• Ubiquity—Anyone holding an account with an "electronic currency provider" can easily acquire silver and gold through the "provider" and then deal with anyone else holding such an account, anywhere in the world.

• Convenience—Transactions in gold and silver can be effected with "debit cards" or like instruments, so that payment of silver or gold is had immediately, but the actual specie never has to leave the "electronic currency providers'" vaults. Of course, transactions also can be effected on the basis of paper receipts, and actual physical delivery of silver or gold, if the parties so desire.

• Flexibility—Transactions of very small and exact values can be made, which is impossible with coins. And

• Accuracy—The details of every transaction can be automatically recorded for purposes of accounting, including inter alia the date; time; parties to the transaction; location of the transaction; nature of transaction; and value of the transaction in silver, gold, and Federal Reserve Notes (or any other medium of exchange).

• Constitutionality—Although the Constitution provides that "[n]o State shall * * * coin Money" or "make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in payment of Debts",[2473] bullion is perfectly assimilable on a constitutional basis to coin if the government itself provides or oversees provision by a private party of an adequate certification of the weight and purity of the precious metal a bar, tael, or other form of bullion contains. This, because:

> "[T]he coined dollar of the United States" is "a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the government".[2474]

> "The design of all th[e] minuteness and strictness in the regulation of coinage * * * indicates the intention of the legislature to give a sure guaranty to the people that the coins * * * contain the precise weight of gold or silver of the precise degree of purity declared by the [coinage] statute", and "recognizes the fact, accepted by all men throughout the world, * * * that gold and silver * * * are the only proper measures of value; that these values are determined by weight and purity; and that form and impress are simply certificates of value, worthy of absolute reliance only because of the known integrity and good faith of the government".[2475]

> "Every * * * dollar is a piece of gold or silver, certified to be of a certain weight and purity, by the form and impress given to it at the mint * * * , and therefore declared to be legal tender in payments."[2476]

> "A contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold or silver coins is, * * * in legal import, nothing else than an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold [or silver], to be ascertained by a count of coins, each of which is certified to contain a definite proportion of that weight. It is not distinguishable * * * , in principle, from a contract to deliver an equal weight of bullion of equal fineness. It is distinguishable, in circumstance, only by the fact that the sufficiency of the amount to be tendered in payment must be ascertained, in the case of bullion, by assay and the scales, while in the case of coin it may be ascertained by count."[2477]

[2473] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2474] New York ex rel. Bank of New York v. Board of Supervisors, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 26, 30 (1869). Actually, by constitutional definition "[t]he coined dollar of the United States" is "a certain quantity in weight and fineness of * * * silver", not gold. United States gold coins are valued in "dollars", but are not themselves "dollars". See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 119-124, 134-141, 191-199.

[2475] Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 229, 249 (1869).

[2476] Id. (7 Wallace) at 250.

[2477] Id.

> "A contract to pay a certain sum in gold and silver coin is, in substance and legal effect, a contract to deliver a certain weight in gold and silver of a certain fineness, to be ascertained by count".[2478]

So, if gold and silver bullion in the "electronic" system can be "certified to be of a certain weight and purity" by a means at least as reliable as coinage of that amount of bullion, then that bullion is the perfect constitutional equivalent of coin, and can "therefore [be] declared to be legal tender in payments". The method of certification of a payment or other transfer of gold or silver in the "electronic" system must simply be as accurate as having: (i) "certifi[cation of a coin] to be of a certain weight and purity, by the form and impress given to it at the mint"; and (ii) "ascertain[ment] by count" of coins of the amount of gold or silver so transferred from one owner to another.

In fact, the certification of bullion could easily be made far better that the traditional certification that comes from simply counting coins that appear upon visual inspection to have the proper official form and impress, but are not actually weighed and submitted to chemical or other analysis in the course of each deposit or transfer. Because none of the gold and silver would enter the depository without the State's verification of its authenticity, none of it would be subject to substitution by counterfeits (as coins sometimes are in the course of their normal circulation in the marketplace); and because most of the gold and silver would not leave the depository, it would not be subject to diminution of value through abrasion or loss (as coins always are in circulation). So the "electronic" system would be capable of generating records of each individual depositor's holdings, and of how much was added to or subtracted from them with each transaction, that were far more accurate than a mere count of coins held on deposit and transferred from time to time—for the content of any coin in actual precious metal would always be subject to the possible minter's error in its fabrication, or to abrasion incurred through prior circulation; but the error in one coin or the cumulative error in several a count of those coins alone could not discover. Moreover, being completely computerized, the "electronic" system could record in each depositor's account an official certification with respect to each and every transaction effected through the depository—the modern equivalent of the official stamp on, together with a count of, coins, but of far greater accuracy, reliability, and especially convenience and usefulness in terms of record-keeping.

Because "mak[ing] * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender" is not distinguishable in constitutional principle from "mak[ing] * * * [an equal weight of bullion of equal fineness] a Tender", the only concern should be how to assure in practice that, in either case, an "equal weight" of metal of the same fineness is delivered. This will depend, however, upon how "equal weight" is defined—whether physically or economically. Traditionally, a coin containing a certain weight of pure gold or silver has been considered to be of somewhat greater market value than—that is, has commanded a "premium" over—gold or silver bullion of the same weight. This, because each coin is so designed as to certify its source, substance, content, and in most cases nominal legal value as "money", and therefore on its face imparts more information than an equal physical weight of mere bullion that does not bear such information on its face.[2479] Also, coins have usually been fabricated in sizes deemed convenient for commerce, with a small amount of base metal added to the gold or silver in order to harden the resulting alloy so as to facilitate its use in hand-to-hand transactions—and therefore have usually been deemed more useful than bullion in that context. Such design and fabrication add economic value to the bullion a coin contains, and therefore justify a "premium" for coinage over bullion.

---

[2478] Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 258, 260 (1869).

As explained above, traditionally the Treasury has minted gold and silver coins according to the constitutional principle of "free coinage". This, because the conversion of bullion into coinage has always been considered a prerogative of sovereignty that performs an indispensable public function,[2480] and therefore the cost of which is rightfully chargeable to the public—unless some special benefit is provided to the purveyor of the bullion, in which case any excess charge that has to be incurred may fairly be laid upon him. In addition, because "free coinage" constitutes an integral part of Congress's power "[t]o coin Money",[2481] and because recognition of any "premium" between coinage and bullion constitutes an integral part of "free coinage", that "premium" must be taken into consideration if a State chooses to employ bullion as an alternative currency in preference to or even in conjunction with "Coin", so that nothing the State does with respect to bullion conflicts with her power and duty to "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts".

Yet a further consideration must be taken into account on the other side. With "electronic gold currency" and "electronic silver currency", almost all transfers of ownership of bullion are effected not "by count", as with coins, but by weight.[2482] Nonetheless, these transfers do not require recourse to the cumbersome, expensive, [2479] Some contemporary private purveyors of gold and silver bullion fabricate small bars or other shapes stamped with such information, except for a nominal legal value. The absence of the latter distinguishes these forms from actual coins. Of course, if the legal unit of monetary value were a standard measure of weight—say, some number of troy grains—then a designation of weight on such a bar would simultaneously be a designation of its legal value in such units, and no practical difference would exist between "bullion" in that form and "coin".

---

[2480] See, e.g., Ling Su Fan v. United States, 218 U.S. 302, 310-311 (1910); and Norman v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, 294 U.S. 240, 304 (1935).

[2481] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 191-199.

[2482] Conceivably, some (but predictably few) transfers could be effected by actual physical delivery of some number of bars of bullion.

and time-consuming procedure of "assay and the scales", because the gold and silver bullion are so controlled upon entering and while within the depository that their susceptibility to improper valuation, substitution, adulteration, or other forms of accident or fraud is for all practical purposes precluded. Therefore transfers of ownership of various weights of bullion between account-holders can be effected with speed, security, accuracy, and confidence simply through electronic accounting rather than through anyone's physical transfer of the bullion. Indeed, the system can operate for most purposes without the least disturbance of the bullion at all, once it has been lodged within the depository. Also, because an "electronic currency" can be subdivided into very small units, transactions of almost any value can be conducted—a flexibility impossible to achieve with gold and silver coins alone, because coins of only a few different values are ever minted, which requires that so-called "token coinage" of base metals be generated for use in small transactions and to "make change". So, with the advent of "electronic gold currency" and "electronic silver currency", the former advantages of gold and silver coins arising out of their special designs and fabrication have largely disappeared; and the few sizes of coins available have become a liability even more distinct than ever they were. As a result, it may be that any "premium" should now run in favor of gold and silver bullion in an "electronic-currency depository" over an equal weight of such metal in the form of "Coin".

Obviously, recourse to how the free market ends up treating the matter will be necessary to determine whether any "premium" between bullion and "Coin" will arise, and if so what it may be and to the advantage of which form of specie it may accrue, when a State employs "electronic gold currency" and "electronic silver currency" as "a Tender in Payment of Debts" on an equal basis with "Coin". Whatever the answer may be, a State must so arrange her system that the "Tender" for any "Debt[ ]" will, as a matter of both fact and law, be some actual "gold [or] silver Coin" or the amount of gold or silver bullion of weight and fineness "equal" to the weight and fineness of that metal in the "Coin", corrected for the "premium" (if any) in favor of either "Coin" or bullion, as the case may be. Moreover, (i) bullion in the State's depository must always be fully and freely convertible into "Coin" (or small bars of bullion properly marked as to weight and fineness of precious metal), so that individuals may take personal possession of their own money on demand; and (ii) "Coin" in the free market must always be convertible into bullion in the depository, so that individuals may return to the "electronic" system whenever they wish. A depository might also find it convenient to employ "Coin" as well as bullion as the foundation for its "electronic currency", because the problem of inter-valuation between the two is merely a matter of arithmetic, once the formula for assigning and calculating any "premium" has been established. This, however, is a technical matter best left to experts to sort out.

To avoid the question of which way any "premium" may run is perhaps simple enough, though, by treating the system of "electronic gold currency" and

"electronic silver currency" to some degree as a public utility that provides an analogous form of "free coinage" when it puts and maintains bullion into a condition in and under controls through which the bullion can reliably be employed in "electronic" transfers. Specifically, a State could absorb the costs of: (i) exchanging depositors' gold or silver coins, or non-specie currency (say, for example, Federal Reserve Notes or bank-deposits solvable in such notes), for silver or gold bullion in the free market; (ii) certifying the weight and purity of all of the specie brought into and stored within her depository; (iii) providing the necessary security for that specie against theft, embezzlement, or other loss; and (iv) certifying the weight and purity of the amounts of specie transferred from one depositor to another electronically, or physically removed from the depository and delivered to some depositor or other customer. At most, a depositor would pay only a small fee for each actual transfer of gold or silver from his account to some other depositor's account. This would be fair, because, unlike a typical bank today, which may provide its depositors with ostensibly "free checking" while it uses their deposits as its own in order to make loans, and thus earns far more in interest on those loans than the costs of providing the "free checking"— and perhaps pays little or no interest on depositors' balances in their checking accounts to boot—a State's "electronic gold and silver depository" would operate on the principle of bailment, and thus could not itself earn anything through the use of the gold and silver it held for depositors. On the other hand, the depository's service of transferring specie from one account to another could be treated as another aspect of its rôle as a monetary public utility providing economic "homeland security", and its entire cost absorbed by the State, thereby obviating all charges to depositors (although this would have the obvious disadvantage of driving out of business private depositories attempting to compete with the State).

(c) The State would establish within her government: (i) an official "electronic silver and gold currency provider" staffed by properly trained members of her Militia who would be exempted from all other duty; along with (ii) a depository to secure the specie under the Militia's direct supervision, operation, and physical control at all times. (The State could also set up or contract out a non-profit public service for the refining, assaying, valuation, and casting into bars of convenient weights of gold and silver bullion brought to her depository by customers.[2483]) Because depositors' silver and gold would be held in separate bailment accounts, the system could not be accused of emitting unconstitutional "[electronic] Bills of Credit",[2484] or otherwise operating on the basis of economically unsound "fractional reserves". Yet the depositors' specie would also be impressed with the attributes of the State's sovereign power, because the State had designated silver and gold as her official media of exchange and had certified the weight and purity of each depositor's holdings as well as of every transaction effected through the depository.[2485] Thus, the silver and gold in the State's depository would be serving, not only the particular purposes of the various depositors, both public and private, but also the overarching public purpose of guaranteeing the State's economic "homeland security". Indeed, inasmuch as "the security of a free State" depends upon her economic "homeland security", all of the silver and gold held in the depository would serve both governmental and private purposes. The new media of exchange would be necessary to perform all of the State's governmental functions—and thereby to maintain the State as a State—as well as to protect the health, safety, and welfare of all of her citizens. And insofar as much of the silver and gold would be deposited by members of the State's Militia in satisfaction of their statutory duty to do so,[2486] those deposits would be instrumentalities specifically of the Militia—in precisely the same way that firearms owned and possessed by members of the Militia for the purpose of performing their Militia service are, at one and the same time, both private property (because of who owns them) and instrumentalities of the State's government (because of the particular use to which their owners put them). Consequently, not only the gold and silver deposited by the State herself and all of the governmental bodies and agencies within her jurisdiction, but also the specie deposited by members of her Militia in their capacities and pursuant to their duties as such—which would include the vast majority of her population—would be protected in their possession and use by the State and most of her citizens by a governmental immunity from any form of interference on the part of rogue agents of the General Government. Arguably, this immunity would extend to the silver and gold used as media of exchange through the agency of the State's depository by every one of the State's citizens, whether members of the Militia or not, because all such use would be in aid of preserving the State's economic "homeland security".

[2483] Compare 31 U.S.C. §§ 5121 and 5122.

[2484] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

(d) To introduce the new media of exchange into her public financial transactions and her private economy, the State should require the payment of a select groups of taxes in silver and gold, provide incentives for other taxpayers to pay in silver and gold voluntarily, and offer to pay the State's creditors with these tax receipts on a "first come, first served" basis until the fund of specie were exhausted. Presumably, creditors' requests for payment in silver and gold would quickly deplete the fund, whereupon the State would steadily expand the list of taxes and other public dues and charges subject to payment in specie so as to maintain a balance between receipts and expenditures. Thus, if the program were successful, after a time—and probably a short one, at that—all of the State's taxes and other receipts would be paid in silver and gold, and the State would pay out Federal Reserve Notes (or bank-deposits solvable in such notes) only to those few creditors who affirmatively refused to accept silver or gold (such as, presumably, banks in the Federal Reserve System). The State would obtain the Federal Reserve Notes necessary for this purpose by exchanging some of its silver or gold in the free market for such notes, just as she might obtain any other foreign currency. At that point, for all practical purposes the State would have separated herself from the Federal Reserve System and protected herself as much as possible from the dangers of using the System's economically unsound currency as her medium of exchange.

---

[2485] See Ling Su Fan v. United States, 218 U.S. 302, 311 (1910); and Norman v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, 294 U.S. 240, 304 (1935).

[2486] See post, at 1223-1225.

(e) To enable the participants in her private economy to insulate themselves from the Federal Reserve System, the State would require all adult members of her revitalized Militia—which would include most of her population from (say) eighteen to fifty-five or sixty years of age—to establish personal and business "electronic gold currency" and "electronic silver currency" accounts, so that they would be capable of using the new media of exchange in their day-to-day transactions, most likely through the convenient agency of "silver and gold debit cards". (Perhaps the State could require every one of her citizens, without exception, to establish such accounts—but no reason would exist to test the limits of the State's authority in this regard, because with near-universal participation through the Militia the vast majority of the population would be involved in any event.) No exemption from this duty would be allowed for any member of the Militia within that range of ages.* In addition, anyone else could volunteer to use the new currency. For economic "homeland security" demands that the State's entire private economy be protected—everyone who participates in the economy should have access to whatever protective measures are instituted—therefore, near-universal participation is necessary. And economic "homeland security" achieved through the use of silver and gold as media of exchange requires no special physical condition, knowledge, skill, or experience on the average individual's part—so near-universal participation is possible.[2487]

[2487] Admittedly, achieving near-universal participation in this program will not prove easy. But practical solutions should be available for any conceivable problem. For example—

1. Many members of the Militia might not own personal computers, or be connected to the Internet in their homes or workplaces. Such individuals, however, could apply for their "silver and gold debit cards" either through the mail, using paper applications (as do many individuals whom banks solicit by post to take out credit cards today); or through their appearances at the offices of their Local government, in which the State would maintain staffers who would input the new depositors' personal information directly into the depository system.

Once their accounts were activated, these individuals could arrange to fund their depository accounts in several ways. If they maintained regular bank accounts (presumably payable in Federal Reserve Notes), they could instruct the banks to transfer some portion of their balances to the depository, which would immediately convert those balances from notes to silver, gold, or both. This might be done on an automatic basis, such as a fixed part of every paycheck, Social Security or private pension-fund payment, or other form of regular income as it arrives at the bank—so that little of the individuals' cash balances would long remain payable in ever-depreciating Federal Reserve Notes. The State could provide to all banks within her territory simple, efficient systems to fulfill this task. Banks the State chartered could be required to perform the service as a condition

(f) The State would require all members of her Militia who did business of any kind within her borders to post the prices of their goods and services, and to inform their employees of the values of their wages and other benefits, in silver and gold as well as in Federal Reserve Notes, using free-market data supplied electronically by the State's depository. Again, no exemption from this duty would be allowed for any member of the Militia engaged in business within the State. With almost all private prices and wage-rates stated in silver and gold (and the exchange-rates among silver, gold, and Federal Reserve Notes in the free market matters of easily accessible public record), businessmen, their customers, and their employees would know when it was to their advantage to use the new media of exchange in their transactions. And nothing would preclude businessmen or employees from accelerating this process by refusing to sell their goods and services or to work for any medium of exchange other than silver and gold; or would prevent businessmen from offering discounts to customers, or employees from accepting modifications in their wages, if they were paid in silver or gold rather than in Federal Reserve Notes. Thus, the State's entire private economy could substitute sound money for Federal Reserve Notes just as quickly, easily, and extensively as WE THE PEOPLE themselves desired. To encourage this transition, the State, through the Militia, would supply businessmen and labor leaders with the requisite computer software, together with instructions in its use, for setting prices and wage-rates, and accounting for sales, expenditures, values of inventories, and so on. Further incentives might include a waiver of any fees otherwise payable to the State's depository if an individual used his "silver and gold debit card" to pay for a transaction within the State, and special discounts on State and Local sales or other applicable taxes where the transactions were conducted in the new media of exchange. Inasmuch as allocating the costs of these incentives to the State would plainly be necessary and proper for accelerating the provision of economic "homeland security", the Militia could justifiably defray them out of fines imposed upon, or from fees for various exemptions paid by, other of their charters; and banks not chartered by the State would find themselves at a competitive disadvantage if they failed to follow suit. Individuals without regular bank accounts could bring cash to any bank chartered by the State, which would be obliged, for some nominal fee, to transfer those funds to the depository. The State could also assign "tellers" in the offices of Local governments for the purpose of accepting cash from depositors.

---

To manage their accounts, individuals without access to the Internet could simply telephone the depository, and obtain necessary information on balances, transactions, and other matters, just as most banks provide such information to their customers today.

2. If the State requires nearly everyone to use the depository system, and nearly everyone eventually becomes dependent upon it for perhaps all, and surely most, of their monetary transactions, then the State must insure that depositors be maximally protected against failure of the equipment, the effects of natural disasters, and possible sabotage or external attacks by rogue governmental agencies as well as private "hackers". This will necessitate, not only that the main operating system be properly "hardened", but also that redundant backup systems be available, and that complete paper records be generated in as close to real time as possible, and thereafter securely maintained for as long as necessary. Thus, proper economic "homeland security" will require, not merely physical security for the actual silver and gold on deposit, but electronic and archival security for all of the data relating to them as well.

Militiamen.[2488] The possible costs of such incentives would be trivial compared to the benefits the State and her citizens would reap from escaping the clutches of the Federal Reserve System, particularly if it exploded in hyperinflation.

(g) To facilitate and optimize the use of the alternative currency, the State could authorize the establishment of private "credit associations" empowered to deal in so-called "real bills" by discounting notes, drafts, and bills of exchange: (i) which were payable in either "electronic gold currency" or "electronic silver currency"; (ii) which were issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes arising out of actual transactions, and the proceeds of which were used for such purposes, or which were secured by staple agricultural products or other goods, wares, or merchandise—but which were not issued or drawn for the purpose of carrying or trading in stocks, bonds, "derivatives", or other real or purported "securities" of any sort, public or private; and (iii) which had a maturity at the time of discount of no more than ninety days. In order to prevent the exchange-rate between gold and silver in the free market from being unduly influenced by their operations, these "credit associations" would be required to have their capital subscribed in gold or silver, but not both, and thus would be eligible to discount notes, drafts, and bills only in one metal. The associations would be authorized, however, to divide "the real bills" which they discounted into whatever units of smaller face-values they deemed commercially convenient, but with the same maturity dates as the original discounted paper, and to transfer these smaller units to customers in the course of their business. Farms, manufacturing concerns, and other businesses could then use the smaller units as auxiliary media of exchange in order to purchase supplies and hire labor, and workers could use the units to maintain themselves and their families, until the dates of the underlying bills' maturity, at which point they would be paid in gold or silver. The ultimate effect would be that the gold and silver with which the underlying "real bills" were to be paid would be "recycled" through the Local economy potentially many times over before the bills finally matured—thus maximizing the utility of whatever gold and silver was available for such use within the State. Of course, the State would ensure through oversight administered by the Militia that these "real bills" were in fact paid in full in gold or silver upon the bills' maturity.[2489]

[2488] See post, Chapter 43.

[2489] As of this writing, the leading expositor of the use of "real bills" in this manner is Professor Antal E. Fekete, whose extensive work the reader should consult. See <www.professorfekete.com/moneycredit.asp>. Interestingly enough, though, even in the original Federal Reserve Act Congress provided for the use of "real bills" by the banks within the Federal Reserve System, and considered this matter so important as explicitly to identify it as one of the main purposes of the statute. See An Act To provide for the establishment of Federal reserve banks, to furnish an elastic currency, to afford means of rediscounting commercial paper, to establish a more effective supervision of banking in the United States, and for other purposes ("Federal Reserve Act"), Act of 23 December 1913, CHAP. 6, §§ 13 and 14(c), 38 Stat. 251, 263-264, 265; now codified as amended at 12 U.S.C. §§ 343, 344, 356, and 358.

Such a plan would offer WE THE PEOPLE of each State the alternative of continuing to rely on the Federal Reserve System's economically unsound paper currency or of substituting silver and gold for that currency as slowly or as swiftly as THE PEOPLE themselves deemed prudent. Initially, perhaps many among THE PEOPLE, out of ignorance or inertia, might choose not to avail themselves of the opportunity. Yet merely promulgating the plan, even without significant implementation, would inevitably educate large numbers of citizens on monetary matters critical to their State's economic "homeland security" but which they had never theretofore seriously considered. Meanwhile, the plan would remain as a form of inexpensive economic insurance through which THE PEOPLE, when they finally awakened to economic reality, could expeditiously enable their State's government and her private economy to continue to function in the event of a collapse of the Federal Reserve System's banking cartel and the destruction of its paper currency.

(3) Once well in operation, such a plan would also empower WE THE PEOPLE of each State to protect themselves against a wide variety of unlawful harassment by rogue officials of the General Government. Constitutional conflicts between the States and the General Government typically take the form of a State's contending that some power purportedly being exercised by rogue officials of the General Government has not, in fact, been "delegated to the United States by the Constitution, [ ]or prohibited by it to the States", but instead is "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people"[2490]—whereas the rogue "federal agents" (as they style themselves) claim that their authority derives from some "Law[ ] of the United States * * * made in Pursuance [of the Constitution]", which is therefore "the supreme Law of the Land".[2491] Although in many situations the constitutional conundrums in these mutually conflicting assertions are complex, in the monetary field they are easily resolved.[2492] In any event, the practical question to which all such disputes invariably reduce is simple: "Which side can actually enforce its will upon the other?" Usually, rogue officials and agents of the General Government can do little to a State herself, to her governmental institutions, or perhaps even to her public officials in their capacities as such. But they can attempt to retaliate against, punish, and generally intimidate the State by harassing her citizens as ordinary individuals, usually by despoiling them of their property. Therefore, to secure what are sometimes called "States' rights"—more properly, the powers that the Constitution "reserves to the States respectively, or to the people"—with respect to money, the States must be able to protect their people against such acts of thuggery emanating from the District of Columbia at the prompting of New York City.

[2490] See U.S. Const. amend. X.

[2491] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2492] See ante, at 1212-1213.

Rogue agents of the General Government will generally target their victims' most obvious, most easily seized, and most liquid assets. For individuals in the vast majority today, that is the money they hold in an account in some bank which is probably a member of the Federal Reserve System, and therefore can be expected to coöperate fully with the rogue agents in looting its own depositors. A State could easily provide effective economic "homeland security" to her citizens in this situation, though, by engaging in a form of "interposition". Pursuant to the State's statutory law, Militiamen would be encouraged—perhaps even required—to keep all of what economists call their "cash balances" in the form of silver and gold in the State's depository. Only such money as Militiamen needed, from time to time, to pay those of their creditors who refused to receive specie would be withdrawn, converted into whatever other currency those creditors desired, and then paid out to them immediately upon conversion through some regular bank. Or, even better, the State's depository itself—functioning as a moneychanger—would convert the specie into another currency and pay its depositors' creditors directly. In either case, the rest of the Militiamen's money would remain secure in the State's depository in the form of silver and gold, guarded at all times by WE THE PEOPLE themselves in and through their Militia. Moreover, while it remained in the depository, all of the money would be performing a State governmental function, and specifically a Militia function—providing the State and her citizens with economic "homeland security"—in addition to the private function of maintaining the "cash balances" individuals deemed prudent. Under these arrangements, rogue agents of the General Government could not gain direct access to any individual's money, except perhaps for the amounts he might have deposited from time to time (and those only very temporarily) in some private bank (and even in such cases, only if the agents knew which bank to approach and when). Moreover, the State would further decree by statute that any individual Militiaman presented by such rogue agents with a purported order to surrender any of his silver or gold on deposit should refuse to comply, but instead should refer the matter to the Militia Officers in charge of the depository, who would refer the matter to the appropriate Militia Committee of Constitutional Inquiry and Compliance,[2493] which would then investigate and pass on the order's legitimacy—so that the legal question would not be limited to the General Government's alleged claim against an individual who just happened to be a Militiaman, but would encompass as well the General Government's purported right to money which, precisely because it belonged to a Militiaman, was being employed by both him and the State herself for the very highest governmental purpose, "the security of a free State".

The State could extend this protection to whatever forms of gold and silver Militiamen might choose to hold in their personal possession outside of her depository, by stipulating statutorily that any and all such specie would automatically bear the impress of the State's (that is, WE THE PEOPLE'S) sovereign power, because it served the State's economic "homeland security" by insuring that some gold and silver would always be immediately available to THE PEOPLE in the event of a catastrophic situation that might temporarily preclude normal "electronic" or other operations of the depository. All such gold and silver in Militiamen's personal possession would be declared to be instrumentalities of the Militia, and therefore of the State herself, to the selfsame extent as every Militiamen's firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements—and, as such, would be absolutely immune from seizure, taxation, regulation, or other intervention by the General Government. A Militiaman's actual personal possession of some form of gold, or silver, or both would constitute conclusive proof of such sovereign use under the State's Militia law. Arguably, Congress too could require Militiamen to maintain some holdings of gold or silver for the purpose of their possible "employ[ment] in the Service of the United States".[2494] But if Congress mandated no such action, or even affirmatively ordered Militiamen not to hold gold or silver in case of such possible "employ[ment]", it could not prohibit them from doing so in the service of their own States pursuant to those States' laws, because Congress's authority to regulate the Militia does not extend to the Militia's purely State service.

---

[2493] See ante, at 1202-1206.

(4) Besides acting negatively by preventing rogue agents of the General Government from despoiling her Militiamen of their silver and gold, a State could use her depository to take affirmative action, too. Such as by withholding in a separate "escrow" account in her depository moneys her citizens arguably owed that Government for payments of their taxes—until officials of the General Government had complied in certain particulars to the State's satisfaction with "[t]h[e] Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof".[2495] For what should be the most historically justifiable example, to the extent that rogue officials in the General Government violate the Constitution or other of "the Laws" of the Union, they are not properly "representing" either the States in which they are elected (if they are Members of Congress) or WE THE PEOPLE as individuals (if they occupy any other official positions whatsoever). After all, the Constitution commands that "[t]he United States"—including all the officials, agents, employees, and other operatives thereof—"shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government".[2496] And "a Republican Form of Government" is based upon "the republican principle": namely, it is "a government in which the scheme of representation takes place".[2497] Therefore, every

[2494] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2495] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2496] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2497] The Federalist No. 10 (James Madison).

official, agent, employee, and other operative of the United States must supply true, honest, and complete "representation" to each of the States and all of their inhabitants. Such "representation" is utterly incompatible with violations of the Constitution and other "Laws". Yet, when such violations occur, rogue officials continue to collect taxes the expenditure of which in some proportion subsidizes their illegal and therefore "unrepresentative" activities. WE THE PEOPLE have no constitutional duty to subsidize, through taxation or otherwise, the usurpation, tyranny, or both that always accompany violations of the Constitution and other "Laws". And the States have a duty, through their "Republican Form[s] of Government", to protect their citizens from being compelled to provide such subsidies. Thus, when such illegal activities are exposed, THE PEOPLE may invoke their right to oppose "taxation without representation"; and the States may assert their authority to "interpose" themselves between THE PEOPLE and those rogue officials in the General Government who attempt to oppress them. Moreover, because "[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government", honest officials of the General Government must support the States in the assertion of this authority. So, in this situation, rather than constituting a challenge to "the supreme Law of the Land", "interposition" is the highest expression of that "Law".

In the most general case, the States would hold in "political escrow" the proportion of the taxes their citizens supposedly owed to the General Government equal to the proportion of the General Government's expenditures to be funded by those taxes which the States determined were unconstitutional. If the States mandated this procedure for all members of their Militia, then the question of what constituted legitimate taxation would shift from an uneven contest between rogue officials of the General Government and solitary individuals, to one between those officials, on the one side, and the entire populations and full panoply of governmental power of the States, on the other. Thus, revitalization of the Militia and adoption of silver and gold as official media of exchange would enable THE PEOPLE, through their States, to mount effective resistance to usurpation and tyranny, thereby turning popular self-government and federalism from mere paper theories into political tigers with sharp teeth.[2498]

(5) Rogue officials of the General Government could not preëmpt or circumvent these arrangements through the simplistic expedient of promulgating a decree that purported—along the crooked lines of the Roosevelt Administration's infamous "gold seizure" in 1933 and 1934—to require all Americans to surrender their silver and gold to the Treasury of the United States.[2499] For the several States through their Militia, not isolated individuals, would be in custody of the specie, and would not comply with any such decree, on several constitutional grounds:

---

[2498] True enough, even deprived of a large proportion of its tax revenues, the General Government's Treasury could still purport to pay its bills—albeit unconstitutionally—in nominal "dollars" by expanding the supply of legal-tender paper currency, either directly by emitting "Greenbacks" or indirectly through monetization of public debt by the Federal Reserve System or some other private banking apparatus. The States that had adopted silver and gold as their media of exchange could largely avoid the economic ill effects that such "currency finance" would cause, though.

(a) Even if the Supreme Court were entitled to the final say on the matter (which it is not[2500]), it has never upheld or even considered the unconstitutionality of a promiscuous seizure of Americans' gold or silver by the General Government. Rather, when the question was squarely presented as to gold in the 1930s, the Court fraudulently refused to address it.[2501]

(b) No power to seize WE THE PEOPLE'S silver and gold has been delegated to the United States or reserved to the States, but instead all such putative power has been prohibited to the States and to the United States as well. The States, after all, are commanded not to "make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts".[2502] In order, however, to obey that explicit mandate—which all "Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support"[2503]—neither any of the several States individually nor the United States collectively can prevent THE PEOPLE from possessing the very "Thing[s]" to which the Constitution guarantees them access. Self-evidently, the States cannot "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender" while at the same time some of them individually or all of them as "the United States" collectively withdraw gold and silver from the free market and withhold them from THE PEOPLE—or, for that matter, withdraw and withhold either gold or silver, for the constitutional injunction applies equally to both.

(c) Other than "coin[ed] Money" they themselves mint and "Bills of Credit" they themselves "emit",[2504] the several States in the exercise of their reserved sovereignty may adopt any medium of exchange for their own governmental purposes.[2505] So, rogue officials of the General Government cannot prohibit the possession and use of silver and gold as media of exchange either by the States themselves or by those individuals who through their possession and use of the precious metals are performing governmental services, fulfilling governmental duties, or receiving governmental benefits. Thus, silver and gold secured in a State's depository under the jurisdiction and for the use of her Militia and its members for the governmental

---

[2499] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 867-1127.

[2500] See generally Edwin Vieira, Jr., How To Dethrone The Imperial Judiciary (San Antonio, Texas: Vision Forum Ministries, 2004).

[2501] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 1127-1207.

[2502] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2503] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[2504] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2505] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 2, at 1620-1631.

purpose of providing economic "homeland security" to the State and her citizens—or even specie held in Militiamen's personal possession to that end—would be beyond the control such officials.

(d) Any attempt by rogue officials of the General Government to seize silver or gold from a State's revitalized Militia would amount to an attempt to disarm the Militia of the means uniquely necessary to provide economic "homeland security", and would therefore constitute an attack on "the security of a free State" and "a Republican Form of Government". But the Constitution commands that "[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government"[2506]—which entails a guarantee of all of the means necessary and proper for a State to maintain the security of such a government in the face of any possible attack, be it physical, political, or economic. For if Congress, on behalf of the United States, is implicitly empowered to fulfill this guarantee by enacting such legislation as may be "necessary and proper" for that purpose,[2507] then surely the States, which are the beneficiaries of the guarantee, enjoy the reserved power to adopt whatever means they reasonably deem "necessary and proper" to that end. Furthermore, the States' choice of means must be binding on the United States. For although "[n]o particular government is designated [in the Constitution] as republican", and "neither is the exact form to be guaranteed in any manner especially designated", nonetheless

> [a]ll the States had governments when the Constitution was adopted. * * * These governments the Constitution did not change. They were accepted precisely as they were, and it is, therefore, to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the States to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form, within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution.[2508]

And all the States at that time, as sovereign governments "republican in form", enjoyed the authority to adopt their own media of exchange for both public and private uses, which power the Constitution limited in only three particulars: namely, that "[n]o State shall * * * coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; [or] make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts".[2509] So no action by any official, agent, or employee of the United States aimed at a seizure of WE THE PEOPLE'S gold or silver in any State—such that the State could not "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender"—can now or ever be even arguably legitimate.

[2506] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2507] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[2508] Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wallace) 162, 175-176 (1875).

[2509] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

To the contrary: Because the constitutional powers that the States exercised immediately prior to ratification of the Constitution, and that carried over into that document, effectively define "a Republican Form of Government", the United States are constitutionally bound to support the States in their exercise of those powers in fulfillment of the duty to "guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government".[2510] Thus, the Constitution delegates to Congress the power "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union".[2511] Those "Laws" include the Constitution. And the Constitution secures to the States the absolute right and duty to "make * * * gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts".[2512] Therefore, when Congress "provide[s] for organizing * * * and disciplining, the Militia" for the purpose of "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union",[2513] it must do so in a manner that will enable the Militia in each State—and ultimately every individual who is eligible to be a member of the Militia—to employ whatever alternative currency of silver and gold the State may adopt for her own purposes. So, Congress's duty "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia" excludes any purported authority to seize silver or gold, or to withhold either of those metals, from the Militia, or otherwise to regulate the possession or use of the metals in any manner which would interfere with their employment by the Militia.

In sum, were WE THE PEOPLE through revitalized Militia to employ silver and gold as media of exchange in aid of their respective States' economic "homeland security", possession of that specie would never be surrendered at the insistence of and to agents of the General Government unless and until WE THE PEOPLE had first fully satisfied themselves that those agents' claims were entirely justified in both law and fact. This, because the silver and gold would be physically guarded by the Militia; the Militia would be asked to turn over the precious metal for other than their States' own governmental purposes; the Militia would be bound in duty to execute their States' laws as well as "the Laws of the Union"; "the Laws of the Union" would support retaining the silver and gold in THE PEOPLE'S own hands; and much of the specie would be THE PEOPLE'S own personal property, dispossession of which they naturally would resist.

Thus, with respect to the Militia, the Constitution adopts a permanent "four metals policy": In one way or another, Congress must see to it that the Militia are properly supplied with firearms and ammunition—which entails the Militia's possession of steel and lead. And in no way may Congress dispossess the Militia of silver or gold. Of course, of the two pairs, steel and lead are, in the final analysis,

---

[2510] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2511] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[2512] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[2513] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 15.

more important than silver and gold. For, as Machiavelli wryly observed, "gold alone will not always procure good soldiers, but good soldiers will always procure gold".[2514]

6. The Militia's authority and ability to defeat the machinations of globalism. In the final analysis, the economic security of a country depends as much upon the extent of its economic independence as on the soundness of its currency—indeed, in some circumstances the former will turn out to be the precondition for the latter. And economic independence is closely linked to political independence. No country economically dependent upon others can long remain politically independent of the parties who can play upon that dependency. Perforce of the Declaration of Independence, Americans have "assume[d] among the powers of the earth[ ] the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them", and have taken unto themselves "full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do". That is, Americans assert their right to economic as well as political independence, pursuant to which their interactions with the peoples of other nations—whether political in nature (such as "to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances") or economic in character (such as "to * * * establish Commerce")—are always to be matters of Americans' own free choices and subsequent voluntary agreements with those nations. How this assertion is to be made good in the uncertain course of human events, though, poses a perennial question.

a. Maintaining America's "separate and equal station" "among the powers of the earth" might be problematic in principle if her economy were small, weak, narrow in its focus, and thus always vulnerable to internal and external shocks and pressures. Happily, this is not the case. America enjoys the inestimable advantages of a large land mass with varied types of soil and climatic conditions; abundant natural resources; the proven ability to feed her entire population adequately if her agricultural assets are properly managed; hundred of millions of educated and motived people, used to a high level of achievement and standard of living; and, especially, a constitutional republic supportive of a free market through which she can maximize the output of all of her human and material factors of production.

Nonetheless, maintaining America's "separate and equal station" "among the powers of the earth" economically as well as politically has become dangerously problematic in practice in recent years because of: (i) the dominance supra-national corporations have asserted over domestic and international finance, manufacturing, marketing, media, and entertainment; coupled with (ii) their ability, through intervention in elections and lobbying, to select, subvert, and suborn America's public officials—as well as officials of just about every other country in the world—into adopting policies that sell out the general welfare of their peoples to the globalists' special interests. In particular, Americans now find themselves in essentially the same position of economic and political subordination as did the Colonists under the English mercantile system of the 1700s. As a result of British imperial trade policies, the Colonists had to buy most of their manufactured goods from the Mother Country, while they produced mostly raw materials for export. Similarly, as the result of trade policies foisted upon this country in aid of supra-national private corporate imperialism, contemporary Americans are pressured by economic circumstances into buying whatever foreign products the globalists deign to import and sell in the domestic market. The globalists can stop Americans from buying goods manufactured within the United States either (i) by importing cheap substitutes with which American manufacturers cannot compete, or (ii) by moving domestic production of those things to foreign venues through expatriation of capital so that not even theoretical competition exists. In this manner, the globalists allow America to have only such a National economic life—in terms of education and training of her populace, extraction of natural resources from her lands and waters, creation and operation of means of mass production, manufacture and distribution of goods and services, and standards of living for individuals in all walks of life—as fits their agenda. As a result, globalism has destroyed American education, gutted this country's manufacturing base, forced more and more workers into an unsustainable "service economy", and flooded the land with illegal "guest workers" who drive down real wage-rates and overburden social services to their breaking-points. In short, America is being chocked to death economically—and politically, too—by the products the globalists shove down her throat.

---

[2514] Niccolò Machiavelli, *Discourses on the First Ten Books of Titus Liv*y (1531), Second Book, Chapter X, in The Historical, Political, and Diplomatic Writings of Niccolo Machiavelli, Christian E. Detmold, Translator (Boston, Massachusetts: James R. Osgood and Company, 1882), Volume 2, at 252.

The question is: "How can America's economy be extracted and then insulated from globalism, restored to its former state of almost complete self-sufficiency, and then preserved?"

b. To succeed, any program to confront, confound, and ultimately crush globalism will require political, economic, and social mobilization among WE THE PEOPLE. This must begin somewhere before it can be undertaken everywhere. The first step must be for THE PEOPLE to wake up to the futility of simply "petition[ing] the Government for a redress of grievances"[2515] through lobbying of legislators, litigation in the courts, and electoral campaigns that merely change the identities but never the pernicious policies of rogue public officials. These means of exercising "the right of the people * * * to petition" may let off considerable amounts of steam; but they almost never apply the pressure that steam has generated to productive political or economic work. Americans need to stop petitioning with words the efficacy of which depends upon public officials' concurrence, and start petitioning with deeds which they can accomplish on their own in the face of officialdom's incompetence or even open opposition. For example, if the plan were to constrain the inflow of cheap and shoddy foreign merchandise by having Congress "lay and collect * * * Duties, Imposts and Excises" on such importation,[2516] petitioning legislators would be useless, because common Americans do not now, and in the foreseeable future cannot expect to, control Congress; and because "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for exercising it's inspection Laws".[2517] But, as individuals, families, and groups, average Americans on their own initiatives can simply stop buying foreign products to the greatest degree possible, thus imposing "Duties, Imposts and Excises" on the globalists indirectly through diminution of sales. Just as the Continental Congress in 1774 promoted "The Association" to boycott British goods,[2518] so, too, could contemporary Americans with the intent to secure "the separate and equal station" of this country "among the powers of the earth" shift from consumption of goods supplied by supra-national corporations to consumption of goods produced in America, by Americans, for Americans. Certainly such a program would be workable, because:

[2515] U.S. Const. amend. I.

- America is a, if not the, major market for the outpouring of the globalists' merchandise—so Americans' widespread rejection of this junk will have an immediate and heavily negative impact on globalism.

- American industry once supplied this country with the types of things a boycott of globalist products would exclude from the domestic market, and could do so again were unfair competition from abroad curtailed.

- Americans need not depend upon their faithless political "representatives", but instead can resuscitate and rejuvenate their domestic industries through private action, because their country still retains a primarily free-market economy.

- While American manufacturers are expanding their production, American consumers can make do with less, or little, or even in some areas none at all of the foreign junk that high-quality American products will eventually replace. As the Continental Congress resolved in The Association, "[w]e will * * * encourage frugality, economy, and industry, and promote agriculture, arts and the manufactures of this country * * * ;

[2516] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[2517] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 2.

[2518] See Journals of the Continental Congress, ante note 42, Volume I (5 September to 26 October 1774), at 75-80. See generally, e.g., T. Breen, American Insurgents, American Patriots, ante note 447, Chapters 6 and 7.

and will discountenance and discourage every species of extravagance and dissipation".[2519] And perhaps most importantly,

> • The present situation provides Americans with the occasion and the necessity for doing what must be done sometime if their country's survival as an independent polity is to be assured.

Such action will rejuvenate America economically, politically, and morally. The economic advantage is obvious: What Americans do not spend on disposable foreign junk they can save and invest at home, thereby establishing the new and building up the old productive facilities—whether in manufacturing, construction, agriculture, energy, transportation, or social services—that will provide Americans with sound long-term employment. The political advantage is equally patent: The whole enterprise not only will educate and mobilize the people but also will finally identify the true friends and enemies of American independence. Each American's own actions in the marketplace will identify him as a patriot or a quisling. And the moral advantage is incalculable: The globalists have long employed their favorite tactic of "divide and rule" to pit American consumers against American producers to the disadvantage of both—marshaling the consumers' desires for cheap goods as the means to destroy the producers, so that eventually not only will Americans in their capacities as consumers be at the mercy of the globalists with respect to what goods are available, but also American consumers in their capacities as producers will not be able to earn the incomes necessary to buy even the cheap foreign merchandise offered for sale, thus requiring that they perpetually enslave themselves to the big globalist banks through the fetters of "credit cards" and other forms of indebtedness. A popular boycott of globalist "free trade" will replace social division in the globalists' interests with social solidarity in common Americans' interests.

c. How can such a program be enforced? As to so many other questions critical to America's survival at the present time, the answer is: "By and through revitalized Militia of the several States!"

(1) The Militia are uniquely authorized to render effective a popular boycott of foreign goods. For the Constitution assigns to the Militia the responsibilities "to execute the Laws of the Union" and to "repel Invasions".[2520] The Declaration of Independence is the most important of "the Laws of the Union", because it is the foundation for all such "Laws", as well as for the laws of the States. It announced the "separate and equal status" "among the powers of the earth" of the several States. Under its aegis, neither any of the several States individually, nor the United States collectively, can ever be subordinated to any other of "the powers of the earth". Globalism denies this "separate and equal status" in both principle and

---

[2519] ¶ 8, in Journals of the Continental Congress, ante note 42, Volume I, at 78.

[2520] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

practice, because it seeks to render the States and the United States subordinate and subservient to a shadowy cabal of supra-national private corporations and both national and international quasi-public and private institutions that support these corporations (in the monetary and banking fields, for example, the Federal Reserve System, the International Monetary Fund, and the Bank for International Settlements). After the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution is the next most important of "the Laws of the Union". The First Amendment guarantees for "the people" the rights of free speech, association, assembly, and petition; and the Second Amendment declares that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State". "[A] free State" enjoys the benefits of the Declaration of Independence—that is, is not subject to control, whether political or economic, by any foreign state or supra-national entity. Therefore, the Militia can and should be deployed to arrest the spread of globalism, by assisting common Americans in exercising their rights of free speech, association, assembly, and petition for the purpose of peacefully boycotting and ostracizing those who sell or buy foreign goods here at home.[2521]

Similarly, the Militia can and should be deployed to repel the on-going economic "Invasions" fostered by such international arrangements as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). These schemes, after all, have little or nothing to do with "free trade", but instead actually amount to licenses for supra-national corporations to attack the United States by inundating her markets with shoddy foreign goods which have been produced at minimal cost by workers exploited under terms and conditions of employment far below America's standards, and which therefore can undersell goods of higher quality produced domestically. Furthermore, the Militia can protect individual Americans' efforts at economic self-defense from illegal retaliation by supporters of globalism, be they private merchants or rogue politicians. For it is self-evidently every American's absolute right as a private citizen not to engage in commerce, be it domestic or international;[2522] and he need not answer for, justify, or explain his behavior to anyone.

(2) No State, through the actions of her Militia or otherwise, could simply close her airports and harbors to international trade, or her domestic borders to interstate trade, in undesirable goods of foreign manufacture, because: (i) Congress exercises the power "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States";[2523] (ii) no State action can override a legitimate Congressional

---

[2521] See, e.g., NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Company, 458 U.S. 886 (1982).

[2522] See National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, No. 11-393, ___ U.S. ___, ___ (2012) (Roberts, C.J., announcing the judgment of the Court), Slip Opinion at 16-30, and id. at ___ (Scalia, J., dissenting), Slip Opinion at 4-16.

[2523] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

determination to allow foreign goods to enter and be transported throughout the United States;[2524] and (iii) at the present time, Congress is firmly under the noisome influence of globalists. The Militia, however, are uniquely qualified to mediate and render effective a popular boycott of foreign goods by citizens acting in their private capacities as consumers. Ultimately, an economic boycott must be enforced at the Local level, where sales are made. Revitalized Militia would be organized and would operate primarily at the Local level[2525]—so their members would be perfectly positioned to perform the functions assigned to the "Committees of Observation" or "Committees of Inspection" under "The Association" of 1774:

> That a committee be chosen in every county, city, and town, by those who are qualified to vote for representatives in the legislature, whose business it shall be attentively to observe the conduct of all persons touching this association; and when it shall be made known, to the satisfaction of a majority of any such committee, that any person within the limits of their appointment has violated this association, that such majority do forthwith cause the truth of the case to be published in the gazette; to the end, that all such foes to the rights of * * * America may be publicly known, and universally contemned as the enemies of American liberty; and thenceforth we respectively will break off all dealings with him or her.[2526]

(Indeed, "Committees of Observation" or "Committees of Inspection"might be formed first in various Localities for the purpose of enforcing a boycott there, and through that activity could then evolve into the precursors, or otherwise promote the establishment, of Independent Companies of Militia.[2527]) With their specialized knowledge, the Militia in each Locality could easily determine how best to publicize the terms of the boycott, educate the community as to the necessity for such action, and exert social pressure upon those recalcitrant individuals who refused to behave in the public interest. Modern Militia working as or with "Committees of Observation" or "Committees of Inspection" would be far more effective today than in the *mid-*1770s, though, because they could employ the Internet and other means of mass communications for instant dissemination of information throughout their own Localities and States, among the several States, and even worldwide. Thus, a contemporary "Association" aimed at resisting the economic imperialism of *supra-*national corporations would not require instigation, direction, or even assistance

---

[2524] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3 and art. VI, cl. 2.

[2525] See ante, Chapter 37.

[2526] ¶ 11, in Journals of the Continental Congress, ante note 42, Volume I, at 79.

[2527] Compare E. Vieira, Jr., Constitutional "Homeland Security", ante note 3, Chapters 7 through 11, with the experience in Colonial Virginia, ante, at 567-597.

from a central institution such as the Continental Congress. Rather, the people in any one State could initiate the effort, widely publicize their strategy and tactics, and urge others to coöperate on the basis of Benjamin Franklin's famous slogan, "Join or Die!"—because globalism will inevitably kill this country if allowed to run its course.

To be sure, a successful boycott would require leadership by people specially trained in various types of economic management, so that the operation could be conducted in an orderly, measured, and responsible fashion, with an eye towards maintaining social solidarity to the maximum degree possible. For example, some foreign goods ought not to be boycotted until comparable goods or acceptable substitutes could be produced domestically. And individuals in economically straitened situations ought to be offered financial assistance to enable them to overcome their dependence upon cheap foreign products. In most communities, however, it should not be difficult to find competent individuals who could perform these functions through Independent Companies.[2528]

The foregoing survey suggests only a few of the vital services—both political and economic—that revitalized "Militia of the several States" could provide. Additions to this list are limited only by the infertility of a sceptic's imagination.

[2528] See post, Chapter 44.

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE

The primary method for enforcing discipline as well as raising revenue within revitalized "Militia of the several States" should be the imposition of fines for their members' failures, neglects, or refusals to perform their duties.

To ensure that they were "well regulated", America's *pre-*constitutional Militia employed many different types of penalties to enforce Militiamen's fulfillment of their duties. In addition to fines and attendant seizures and sales of their property to make payments, defaulters could face corporal punishment, imprisonment, compulsory labor, conscription into service with the regular Armed Forces, and (if they were officers) forfeitures of their commissions in the Militia.[2529] All of these varieties of discipline can and should be continued in revitalized "Militia of the several States" today, depending on the seriousness of the particular delinquencies that may occur.

For at least two reasons, though, fines should be the preferred means of discipline for routine infractions:

A. Historical basis. A heavy reliance on fines would be in keeping with the practice applied throughout the Colonies and independent States during *pre-*constitutional times. No sound reason exists to suspect that what experience proved workable then would not be just as workable now.

B. Practical utility. Particularly during the initial period of revitalization of the Militia, fines should prove to be the most useful penalties for routine infractions.

1. Fines can be made specific and fair. A separate monetary penalty, precisely graded to the circumstances and seriousness of the particular infraction, can be assigned to each and every different offense and degree of default (although, of course, some might deserve harsher punishments yet). And, if carefully tailored to the offense, no fine would be subject to credible criticism as arbitrary or excessive.

2. Fines can be made universal, both (i) as to all members of the Militia—so that everyone will be exposed to some penalty for misbehavior, and (ii) as to all infractions—so that some punishment, howsoever small, will be imposed for every violation.

[2529] See ante, Chapters 12 and 23.

3. The universality of fines would emphasize the compulsory nature of the Militia, and each individual's duty to perform some function in aid of "the security of a free State".

4. Fines are immediately and infinitely adaptable to changing circumstances. Being simply numbers, they can be modified very quickly and easily as experience indicates is necessary.

5. Fines are administratively convenient and efficient. Every fine can be imposed and enforced according to the same simple (and at some point doubtlessly fully automated) procedure, without the employment of large numbers of highly trained personnel.

6. In the case of error or pardon, a fine can be remitted, unlike corporal or other punishments which cannot be undone.

7. Besides their prophylactic effect as punishments, fines can be uniquely useful in providing the financial support that will be crucial for successful revitalization of the Militia. In these times of economic stringency, little funding for that purpose can be expected from the States' governments. And even if the General Government could provide some funds, both the States and WE THE PEOPLE would be well advised to eschew its assistance, so as to avoid both dependence upon subvention from the District of Columbia, and exposure to the attempts to impose centralized, ham-handed bureaucratic control upon the Militia that invariably would be the concomitant of such subsidization. This leaves only THE PEOPLE themselves as the source of the necessary funds. Which is highly appropriate. For THE PEOPLE are the Militia. And if THE PEOPLE pay for revitalization of their own Militia they will both control the process and be most highly motivated to make it work. The use of fines will enable THE PEOPLE themselves to finance revitalization of the Militia through revitalization of the Militia.

Initially, revitalization will not require—and would probably proceed far more smoothly without—everyone's active participation in the field. Rather, the first steps—necessarily somewhat experimental in nature—should be taken through Local "Committees of Safety" and the recruiting and testing of various "Independent Companies" composed of volunteers.[2530] The rest of the population should be granted temporary exemptions from almost all duties, for which fines in the nature of fees, or fees in the nature of fines, or monetary equivalents exacted in exchange for exemptions, would be paid.[2531] The nomenclature adopted is unimportant. After all, if a Militia statute imposes a duty D, failure in the performance of which incurs a fine F, any individual subject to D can in effect grant himself an exemption simply by paying F. So the statute could simply grant everyone an exemption from D upon the payment of an equivalent fee E in the first place, and obviate the necessity to collect a fine F from each defaulter through some separate procedure. If (as may reasonably be anticipated) large numbers of people, unfamiliar with the history and constitutional importance of the Militia, and perhaps less patriotically motivated than they should be, will desire to avoid being involved in the early stages of revitalization, proportionately large sums will be forthcoming from them as fines or fees paid for exemptions. These funds, directed especially to Local Committees of Safety and Independent Companies, will enable the process of revitalization to become self-financing, and thereby "get off the ground". Thus, the very individuals who will not want to participate personally in the Militia will participate vicariously, and their participation will make revitalization a reality.

---

[2530] See post, Chapter 44.

[2531] On the last of these, see ante, at 1015-1016.

8. For these reasons (and particularly the last-mentioned of them), legitimate excuses for noncompliance with Militia duties that do not trigger fines should be sparse, select, and stringent. Although *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes often flexibly tempered justice with mercy, by allowing officials the discretion to take into account any "reasonable" or "sufficient" excuse for a Militiaman's default in his duty, the grounds for extenuation that they did recognize all derived from circumstances largely beyond a defaulter's desires or control—such as sickness or other physical disability; impoverishment; in the case of conscientious objectors the need to comply with the higher authority of religious precepts; or some other credible excuse peculiar to the circumstances.[2532] This same test of practical necessity should apply today.

9. For the sake of overall preparedness, the mere payment of a fine should not exempt anyone not entitled to some other exemption on that score from certain critical requirements, such as:

- studying Militia history, law, organization, discipline, training, and duties;
- learning how safely and effectively to operate and maintain in good order the major types of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service;
- training to provide basic emergency medical assistance; and
- preparing to furnish shelter, food, water, sanitation, and like necessities to others in the course or aftermath of a natural disaster, major industrial accident, or other calamity.

[2532] See ante, Chapters 11 and 22.

Neither should the mere payment of a fine justify an exemption from any other particular requirement more than some reasonable proportion of the times that requirement becomes applicable to the same individual.

C. Equitable allowance. After revitalization of the Militia is well in hand, the major problem with reliance on fines to compel participation will sound, not in efficiency, but in equity. An individual's straitened economic circumstances may suffice as a valid reason (for example) why he simply cannot comply with a statutory requirement that he should provide himself with a suitable firearm, and therefore why he should not be fined for such noncompliance (and perhaps even should receive public assistance on that score). On the other hand, another individual's highly favorable economic situation should not privilege him to escape from all of his obligations—and thereby permanently deprive the community of what could be the unique benefit of his actual personal participation in the Militia—by simply paying the fines that less-affluent individuals cannot afford to pay.

Yet the reality remains that, when fines are employed as the penalties for defaults in duty, the economically well-to-do can buy their way out of personal participation in the Militia at prices they may consider cheap. To allow this to occur on a large scale in the initial stages of revitalization of the Militia is certainly expedient, and may even be necessary. And, with respect to some few duties, to suffer it thereafter may be acceptable. But it cannot be tolerated with respect to most, let alone all, duties at all times. Self-government is not "a spectator sport" in which the purse can substitute for the person. And as what the Constitution identifies as the most important instrument of self-government—the only one it describes as "necessary to the security of a free State"[2533]—"[a] well regulated Militia" requires, or at least should always strive for, the actual personal participation of all of the individuals eligible for service who live and work within its territorial bounds. The Militia is the ultimate instrument through which each individual can and should personally exercise his portion of the powers of sovereignty. The rightful use of any form of personal political power demands personal responsibility, which demands personal attention to duty. How much more so for the political power the Militia wields—the"'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'"?[2534]

One possible solution to the problem would be to graduate the amounts of fines according to individuals' disposable incomes or total wealth. Everyone below some level of monetary wherewithal (howsoever estimated) would be charged fines fixed in amounts for various infractions, whereas those above that level would be charged fines that increased—and perhaps rapidly so—in proportion to their abilities to pay. This would be eminently fair in any event, because, on the one hand, being "necessary to the security of a free State", "[a] well regulated Militia" is true "social insurance"—but, as with all insurance, the greater the value of the property protected, the larger the premiums that must be paid. On the other hand, as a matter of "social justice", the amount of service an individual ought to contribute to the community should be proportionate to the benefits he derives from it. So, the greater his wealth—which roughly reflects the value to him of his membership in the community—the greater the service he owes to the community. There being only one degree of actual personal attendance to duty, an individual who serves in propria persona can be required to do no more. But when mere money substitutes for personal service, the degree of the contribution can easily be proportioned to the amount of wealth the individual possesses—and the Militia, in which he does not want to participate personally, protects.

---

[2533] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[2534] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

Such an approach to the problem was not unknown in *pre-*constitutional times. In 1779, Pennsylvania enacted several statutes to the purpose. The first provided that > * * * [w]hereas it has been found by experience, that the fines and penalties laid on persons neglecting to perform * * * military duties * * * are insufficient for the good purposes intended:

>
> For remedy whereof:
>
> * * * Be it enacted * * * That * * * each and every person or persons within this state, who shall not do and perform his or their tour of militia duty as directed by law, shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred pounds * * * ; and for all neglects in performing the other military services required * * * shall pay six times what they were by law obliged to pay, except the inhabitants of the city of Philadelphia and the liberties thereof, who shall pay eight times the sum payable * * * for all neglects[.]{EN-2033}

Thus, Pennsylvania recognized that the especially advantageous economic positions of "the inhabitants of the city of Philadelphia and the liberties thereof" justified the imposition on them of fines fully one-third higher than the fines imposed on other Pennsylvanians.

The next statute (continued shortly thereafter) provided that > whereas nothing is more just and equitable than that persons who neglect or refuse to turn out in defence of their liberty and property, should pay an equivalent in proportion to the property which is protected by those who do turn out at their country's call. In order to enable the legislature to make some recompense to such as perform their tour of duty, greatly to the prejudice of their private affairs, and often to the great distress of their families.

> * * * Be it enacted * * * That instead of the sum of one hundred pounds, which persons refusing to perform their tour of militia duty are now by law subject to, every person and persons who shall refuse or neglect * * * to perform their tour of militia duty, * * * it shall and may be lawful for the lieutenant * * * of the city of Philadelphia and the proper county and the judges of the court of appeal to fine each and every person so neglecting or refusing in any sum [n]ot exceeding one thousand pounds nor under one hundred pounds, except in cases of inability of body and estate: and in laying and judging of the amount of the said fine the said lieutenant * * * and judges shall have a due regard to the value of such delinquents estate and circumstances[.]{EN-2034}

In this Act, "except in cases of inability of body or estate"—as to which the imposition of a fine would have been unjust or ineffective—the State explicitly linked the size of an individual defaulter's fines directly to his "estate and circumstances", with the possible payments ranging from one hundred to one thousand pounds, no doubt depending upon both the severity of the default and the defaulter's ability to pay.

As a further incentive for the rich to perform their Militia duties personally, fines imposed upon individuals in the higher brackets of wealth could be further increased for serial usage, so that an effective exemption purchased in the second year would cost (say) twice what it cost in the first year, one purchased in the third year would cost twice what it cost in the second year, and so on. Being both initially graduated and then annually multiplied, at some stage even quite well-to-do defaulters would find fines at least inconvenient if not prohibitive.

Finally, the fines that individuals have paid, and the reasons for them, could be published within the Militia, so that serial shirkers would be shamed into coming forth to do their duty personally.

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR

Under present conditions, raising Independent Companies composed of volunteers on a Local basis provides the best means to begin revitalization of "the Militia of the several States".

A. No true "Militia of the several States" extant today. The unfortunate but undeniable reality today is that "the Militia of the several States" are not constitutionally "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]", either by Congress for the three purposes the Constitution explicitly allows,[2535] or by their individual States for all other purposes (and for those first three purposes, too, should Congress continue to default in its duty in that regard).[2536] Indeed, no true constitutional Militia is "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]" for any purpose anywhere within the United States. Rather, the vast mass of Americans eligible—and therefore constitutionally required—to serve in some capacity in the Militia has been relegated to the unconstitutionally oxymoronic, impotent, and even imbecilic "unorganized militia".[2537] As a result, no "well regulated Militia" exists in any State, which means that no State can—and, in light of the National para-military police-state apparatus being elaborated as of this writing at an ever-accelerating pace around the United States Department of Homeland Security, no State now does or without affirmative action on her part will hereafter—enjoy "the security of a free State".[2538]

During the last hundred years, insouciant, incompetent, or intentionally rogue public officials have denied WE THE PEOPLE the proper organization of the Militia to which all Americans are constitutionally entitled. The history of "militia" in America during this period exhibits a sorry cavalcade of ignorance, confusion, conflicts, and exaggerated concerns for amassing institutional authority and advancing personal careers within the regular Armed Forces, the National Guard, so-called "State Guards" and "State Defense Forces", and among various public officials of both the General Government and the States.[2539] Perhaps even worse,

---

[2535] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[2536] See U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

[2537] See, e.g., 10 U.S.C. § 311(b); General Laws of Rhode Island §§ 30-1-4(4) and 30-1-5; Code of Virginia §§ 44-1 and 44-4. See ante, at 786-793.

[2538] See U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[2539] See generally, e.g., B. Stentiford, The American Home Guard, ante note 1058, especially Chapters 4 through 10.

devoid of a collective memory of the true state of affairs, deprived of relevant personal experience, and deluded by malign propaganda put out by the big media and various subversive special-interest groups, all too many Americans have come to treat the very noun "militia" as a dirty word that implies "extremism", "racism", "illegality", "violence", and even nascent "terrorism"—to the extent that not just a few patriots are reluctant even abstractly to advocate anything to do with the constitutional Militia any more, lest they be mocked, vilified, and politically ostracized for their efforts. Certainly a nadir of constitutionalism has been plumbed when constitutionalists themselves shrink from affirming the one and only institution the Constitution itself declares to be "necessary to the security of a free State".

B. Revitalization of the Militia WE THE PEOPLE'S responsibility. The main sources of this problem are two: first, the general antinomian notion that the Constitution is merely a set of "legal technicalities", many of them stodgily anachronistic, which can be disregarded whenever what passes for more modern political policy counsels the convenience of doing so; and second, the specific concern Joseph Story long ago pinpointed, that selfish individuals would desire to be dispensed from personal service in the Militia whenever they had no reason to fear the consequences—what he recognized even in the early 1830s as > a growing indifference to any system of militia discipline, and a strong disposition, from a sense of its burdens, to be rid of all regulations. How it is practicable to keep the people duly armed without some organization it is difficult to see. There is certainly no small danger that indifference may lead to disgust, and disgust to contempt; and thus gradually undermine all the protection intended by th[e Second Amendment.][2540]

The Constitution is a complex, fully integrated plan, not just for a federal system of government, but for the preservation of "free State[s]" throughout America of which that system is the primary agent. With any large edifice, though, if a supporting pillar is demolished or allowed to deteriorate—particularly if it is the one pillar the architects themselves emphasized in their blueprint as indispensable—the entire structure must first tip, then totter, then eventually tumble down. So, having pandered for far too long to the "strong disposition, from a sense of [the Militia's] burdens, to be rid of all regulations", and thereby having allowed the all-important constitutional pillar of "[a] well regulated Militia" to decay to insignificance in every one of the several States, WE THE PEOPLE now find—which should hardly surprise anyone—that their constitutional edifice has begun perceptibly, increasingly, menacingly to deviate from perpendicularity, endangering the survival of the entirety of America's "free State[s]" at the National, [2540] Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646 (footnote omitted).

---

State, and Local levels. Not only are average Americans ill-fitted in general to deal with most run-of-the-mill emergencies that break out in their own back yards, but more ominously they are unprepared in particular to protect themselves against the consequences of a collapse of this country's monetary and banking systems, and the evisceration of the National, State, and Local economies that would accompany it. And that unpreparedness exposes them to the imposition of a para-military national-security police-state apparatus which rogue public officials undoubtedly would unleash from the District of Columbia in the event of a widespread economic breakdown.

The obvious response to this danger is to return the pillars of "well regulated Militia" in each and every one of the several States to their original positions and strength—immediately, if not sooner. That accomplished, WE THE PEOPLE will benefit from "the security of a free State", in which: (i) every Locality will be adequately prepared for all eventualities, with its manpower and resources under the control of its own inhabitants; (ii) proper divisions of constitutional responsibilities and labor will exist between "the Militia of the several States" and the Armed Forces; and (iii) no burgeoning para-military national-security police state apparatus centered in the Department of Homeland Security will any longer arguably be needed, on even the most paranoiac calculus, and therefore will no longer be tolerated. The requisite reconstruction will not occur, however, until WE THE PEOPLE themselves take charge of the project. For rogue public officials, professional politicians, and the factions and special-interest groups that pull their strings will not undertake the task, but instead will oppose it at every turn.

THE PEOPLE must presume that they still have the time necessary to put these reforms into practice—if they themselves begin as soon as possible to discover the most effective and efficient ways to proceed.

> • They themselves, because THE PEOPLE can not and should not rely upon aloof and élitist self-styled "security experts" from Congress, the Department of Homeland Security, the Department of Defense, and other governmental agencies and private organizations and special-interest groups who have serially proven their inability or unwillingness to face up to, let alone solve, the problem—and no doubt at least a few of whom are the witting agents of the enemies of American freedom who have brought the situation to its present sorry pass in the first place and fully intend to prevent its rectification in the future. Instead, THE PEOPLE must draw upon THE PEOPLE—who have the greatest and most pressing personal interests in the matter; who are available in large numbers; who, being on the scene, know the peculiarities of their Localities, their needs, and their resources; who can bring a wide mix of native talents, education, knowledge, skills, and experience to the job; and, perhaps most importantly, who can be trusted to do the right thing for the right reason.

• And THE PEOPLE will need to discover the most propitious ways to proceed, because self-evidently revitalization of the Militia after so many decades of disuse will have to be largely experimental, following different paths in different States and even in different Localities within the same State in response to and taking advantage of differing circumstances. The hidebound bureaucratic formula of "top-down", "one-size-fits-all" central planning and direction will not do. Instead, revitalization will call for new, innovative, and flexible methods of organization that THE PEOPLE will need to develop in the contexts and under the exigencies and constraints of their own unique environments.

C. The contemporary Swiss militia not a usable model under American conditions. Ideally, revitalization of the Militia could look for inspiration to the Swiss militia system.[2541] Having thoroughly proven itself over many generations, it could offer an excellent model for imitation here—if both it and America's Militia were properly understood. Unfortunately, even people who should know better become confused, as in the mistaken observation that "[t]he Swiss militia system is unique and is not comparable to the present Reserve and [National] Guard forces in the United States. The basis for conscription is the constitution, which mandates military service for every Swiss male from age 20 to 50 (55 in the case of officers)."[2542] True, the Swiss militia "is not comparable to the present Reserve and [National] Guard"—but that is because those forces are not "Militia" at all, in any constitutional sense of that term.[2543] On the other hand, "[t]he Swiss militia system" is not "unique" with respect to "conscription", but is actually a mirror-image in principle of "the Militia of the several States" under America's Constitution.

More problematic, though, is that trying to adopt "the Swiss militia system" at the present time would require asking too many Americans to do too much too soon, with too little appreciation for why it should be done. In addition, the Swiss system was developed over a long period of time specifically for Switzerland. Doubtlessly, some of its gross structure could be incorporated with little or no amendment into a program for revitalization of the Militia in this country. But many of its finer points are unlikely to be directly translatable to present conditions in the United States.[2544] So, at least initially, patriots intent on revitalizing the Militia in this country need to assess their own special needs and capabilities State by State, rather than simply hoping to be able to ape what the Swiss have done.

[2541] See, e.g., George S. Patton & Lewis W. Walt, "The Swiss Report", in Safeguarding Liberty, ante note 1225, at 197.

[2542] Id. at 203.

[2543] See ante, at 786-793.

[2544] See generally John McPhee, La Place de la Concorde Suisse (New York, New York: Farrar/Straus/Giroux, 1984).

D. Independent Companies the best means to begin revitalization of the Militia. Independent Companies could play a crucial rôle in discovering how best to revitalize the Militia under contemporary conditions, State by State and even Locality by Locality. Just as Independent Companies in Virginia in 1774 and 1775 filled in until her Militia could be properly regulated in the tortuous course of the political crisis of that time,[2545] so too would Independent Companies be useful for that purpose in every State today. Moreover, Independent Companies could chart a new course for revitalization—a task not necessary during the *pre-*constitutional era because Virginians then enjoyed the luxury of continuity with respect to their Militia, which experienced an hiatus of less than two years from 1773 to 1775, rather than the decades upon decades of disuse and even derision of the Militia through which Virginia, and the rest of America as well, have suffered in recent times.

1. The historical hiatus. Admittedly, Independent Companies have suffered much the same sorry fate as the regular Militia since the early 1900s, although their suppression came somewhat earlier and has proven to be more thoroughgoing.

a. In conformity with *pre-*constitutional practices, the several States' Independent Companies were recognized by the General Government close upon ratification of the Constitution. In the Militia Act of 1792, Congress provided that, > whereas sundry corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry now exist in several of the * * * states, which by the laws, customs, or usages thereof have not been incorporated with, or subject to the general regulations of the militia:

> * * * Be it * * * enacted, That such corps retain their accustomed privileges, subject, nevertheless, to all other duties required by this act, in like manner with the other militia.[2546]

The language "such corps retain their accustomed privileges, subject, nevertheless, to all other duties required by this act, in like manner with the other militia", obviously did not purport to dissolve any then-existing Independent Companies "not * * * incorporated with, or subject to the general regulations of the militia", but simply declared that those Companies would be liable to and should be capable of being "call[ed] forth to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions", "in like manner with the other militia"—hardly a remarkable condition, in light of Congress's power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", and the practical need for imposing some

---

[2545] See ante, at 567-597.

[2546] An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, §§ 10 and 11, 1 Stat. 271, 274.

uniformity within "the Militia of the several States" as a whole so as to maximize their force and efficiency if any "Part of them" were "employed in the Service of the United States".[2547] After all, being (as the statute provided) "subject * * * to all * * * duties required by this act, in like manner with the other militia", did not impose on Independent Companies statutory "duties" that Congress could not constitutionally have required from "the other militia". Yet, in one particular the statute arguably did raise a constitutional problem. Its reference to "sundry corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry [which] now exist in several of the * * * states" might have implied that Congress intended to recognize a right to "retain their accustomed privileges" only for Independent Companies formed on or before 8 May 1792, the effective date of the Act—thus asserting a power to prohibit the formation of all other Independent Companies thereafter, notwithstanding that under *pre-*constitutional practice such Companies had often been parts of "well regulated Militia". Of course, "[t]he cardinal principle of statutory construction is to save and not to destroy",[2548] by "ascertain[ing] whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the [constitutional] question may be avoided".[2549] So perhaps the statute should have been construed to mean that not only Independent Companies already in existence as of 8 May 1792, but also those that came into existence while the Act of that date remained in force, would "retain their accustomed privileges". That is, "now" referred, not to a single moment in time, but to a present condition—the existence of the statute—which would continue until Congress took contrary action at some point in the future.[2550]

(1) Either Rhode Island (for one State) interpreted the statute in the latter sense, or she believed that, however the statute might be construed, the power to form Independent Companies within a State's "well regulated Militia" remained "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people"[2551]—so that, although Congress was authorized to subject Independent Companies "to all * * * duties * * * in like manner with the other militia" in order to suit them to be "call[ed] forth" for the three explicit constitutional purposes, it could not prohibit the States from otherwise forming and employing them as the States chose. For, from June of 1792 through October of 1799, Rhode Island's General Assembly chartered no less than

---

[2547] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[2548] National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, 301 U.S. 1, 30 (1937).

[2549] Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932).

[2550] This would have been an uncommon and strained, but not an impossible, construction. For example, such ordinary usage as "I am now ready to go" does not imply that the individual can take action within only an unique instant in the immediate present, but instead indicates a general ability under the present circumstances to act throughout some indefinite future. See Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1671, definition 1; Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1546, definition 5. If the alternative, however, had been that the statute would have had to be deemed unconstitutional, even such a strained construction should have been adopted.

[2551] U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

twenty-three new Independent Companies, evidently without any concern whatsoever that its actions might have violated the Militia Act of 1792.{EN-2035} (As this study primarily concerns itself with the history of the Militia during the pre- and immediately *post-*constitutional periods, summoning even more owls to Athens on this subject by extending the inquiry into the Nineteenth Century would be supererogatory.) These Independent Companies were not merely ceremonial or honorary outfits, either. In 1795, for instance, the General Assembly "Voted and Resolved, That every Person belonging to either of the independent Companies in this State who shall not produce a Certificate from his commanding Officer, that he is uniformed, equipped and furnished agreeably to the Charter of such independent Company, shall be subject to do Duty in the Company of Infantry, or trained Band in the District in which he lives, in the same Manner as if he did not belong to such independent Company."{EN-2036} Revealingly, too, the General Assembly required that the members of Rhode Island's Independent Companies be "uniformed, equipped and furnished agreeably to the Charter[s] of * * * [those particular] Compan[ies]", even if this went beyond what Congress's Militia Act of 1792 required.

For a prime example, the charter of "The Bristol Grenadiers", granted in 1799, provided in pertinent part as follows:

> WHEREAS the preservation of this State and the maintenance of its liberties, at all times depend, under God, in a great measure, upon an acquaintance with military discipline; and at this critical and alarming period, when our country is threatened with foreign invasions, it becomes the indispensable duty of every American citizen, to place himself in a situation where he can be useful in repelling the attacks of its enemies. For that purpose, * * * [some thirty-seven named individuals], inhabitants of the town of Bristol, in the county of Bristol, have formed themselves into a military body, and prayed this Assembly to grant them a charter of incorporation, that they, and such others as may hereafter be joined to them, not exceeding sixty-four men rank and file, may be constituted an independent company, by the name of the Bristol Grenadiers.
>
> Wherefore this Assembly, to encourage their laudable design, promote military skill and discipline, have Ordained, Constituted and Granted, * * * That the said Petitioners, and such others as may be added to them, not exceeding sixty-four men rank and file, be * * * declared to be, an independent company, by the name of The Bristol Grenadiers, by that name to have perpetual succession, and to have and enjoy the privileges and immunities hereafter granted.
>
> Imprimis. The said company shall and may, * * * in every year, meet and assemble together and choose their officers, to wit: One Captain, one Lieutenant, and one Ensign, and such noncommissioned officers as are or may be necessary for training, disciplining and well > ordering said company; at which election no officer shall be chosen but by the greater number of votes then present. The Captain, Lieutenant and Ensign, to be approved of by the Governor * * * , and to be commissioned * * * in the same manner as other military officers are in this State.

>
> Secondly. That the said company shall have liberty to meet and exercise themselves upon such days as they shall think proper, and shall not be subject to the orders and directions of the Colonel, or other field-officer of the [Militia] regiment in whose district they live, at any other time than when called into actual service, or upon regimental trainings, or general muster days; and that they be obliged to meet, at least four times a year, upon the penalty of paying, to and for the use of said company, the following fines, to wit: The Captain, for every day's absence six dollars, the Lieutenant and Ensign four dollars each, * * * noncommissioned officers three dollars each, and each private soldier two dollars; to be collected by warrant of distress * * * .
>
> Thirdly. That the said company * * * make such laws, rules and orders among themselves, as they shall deem expedient for the well ordering and disciplining of the said company: Provided that no fine exceed the sum of one dollar for any one offence * * * .
>
> Fourthly. That if any officer * * * shall be disapproved of by the Governor, or shall remove out of said town to any other place, or shall be removed by death, then and in such case the Captain of the said company, or other superior officer for the time being shall call a meeting for the election of another * * * in manner as aforesaid.
>
> Fifthly. That the persons aforesaid, and all those who shall be duly enlisted into said company, so long as they shall continue therein, shall be exempted from bearing arms, or doing other military duty, watching and warding excepted, in the several companies or training bands in whose district they live.
>
> Sixthly. that the commissioned officers of the said company * * * shall be of the Court-Martial in the district in which they live * * * .
>
> Seventhly. That the said company be accoutred, uniformed and equipped, in such manner as by a majority of them in a public meeting shall be agreed upon, at their own expense.{EN-2037}

A comparison of this charter with the Militia Act of 1792 easily demonstrates that in several respects Rhode Island's General Assembly granted The Bristol Grenadiers special privileges that would definitely have run afoul of that Act except for the allowance therein that Independent Companies could "retain their * * * privileges"—

- The Bristol Grenadiers were entitled to "choose * * * such noncommissioned officers as are or may be necessary for training, disciplining and well ordering said company"—whereas the Militia Act of 1792 required each "company" to muster "four sergeants, four corporals, one drummer and one fifer or bugler".[2552]

• The Bristol Grenadiers were licensed to "make such laws, rules and orders among themselves, as they shall deem expedient for the well ordering and disciplining of the said company"—whereas the Act of 1792 mandated "[t]hat the rules of discipline, approved and established by Congress" in 1779 "shall be the rules to be observed by the militia throughout the United States".[2553] And,

• The Bristol Grenadiers were free to "be accoutred, uniformed and equipped, in such manner as by a majority of them in a public meeting shall be agreed upon, at their own expense"—whereas the Act of 1792 spelled out in fine detail what arms and accoutrements members of the Militia, of whatever ranks, were required to furnish for themselves.[2554] Presumably, preparing themselves to be "grenadiers", the members of this Independent Company would have acquired sufficient equipment suitable for normal Militia service, yet not necessary the very same things that the Militia Act of 1792 stipulated.

(2) Distinguishably from Rhode Island, Virginia did not immediately allow for the establishment of Independent Companies in the *post-*constitutional period. Congress's first Militia Act decreed that, "out of the militia enrolled, * * * there shall be formed for each battalion at least one company of grenadiers, light infantry or riflemen"; "to each division there shall be at least one company of artillery, and one troop of horse"; and "each company of artillery and troop of horse shall be formed of volunteers".[2555] Virginia's Militia Act of the same year closely followed these directives, by creating "light companies" to be "distinguished by the denomination of grenadiers, light-infantry, or riflemen", and companies of artillery and cavalry to be filled "by voluntary enlistments".{EN-2038} In 1832, however, the General Assembly held it > desirable that * * * Virginia should have at its command an efficient corps, at all times in readiness to meet any sudden emergency; and as it is manifest that such an object can be best attained by the organization of volunteer companies, with appropriate military uniform, to be frequently trained and disciplined, and to be well provided with suitable arms and accoutrements:

[2552] Act of 8 May 1792, § 3, 1 Stat. at 272.

[2553] Act of 8 May 1792, § 7, 1 Stat. at 273.

[2554] Act of 8 May 1792, § 1, 1 Stat. at 271-272.

[2555] Act of 8 May 1792, § 4, 1 Stat. at 272.

> * * * Be it * * * enacted * * * , That it shall and may be lawful for the governor * * * to commission volunteer companies, either of cavalry, artillery, grenadiers, light infantry, or riflemen * * * , upon the certificate of the commanding officer of the regiment, within the bounds of which the company is proposed to be raised, stating the names of the persons elected to be officers * * * ; that the members have procured some appropriate military uniform; that they have consented to abide by the provisions of this act; and that * * * the organization of said company will not * * * reduc[e] below the minimum number, any existing company of militia.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * It shall be the duty of the governor * * * to furnish, as soon as practicable, to the volunteer companies * * * such suitable arms and accoutrements as may be at his disposal, under such regulations, and upon such conditions, as he may deem proper.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * It shall be the duty of the * * * volunteer companies to attend the regimental and battalion musters, and in addition thereto, to attend a regular drill at least once in each month of the year * * * ; and for any delinquency * * * fines shall be assessed as in other cases of militia fines * * * the same to be collected as other militia fines are now collected * * * and appropriated in such manner as may be authorized or required by the by-laws of such company * * * .
>
> * * * Any officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, who shall have served the term of seven successive years in one or more * * * volunteer companies, shall thereafter be exempt from militia duty of every kind, except in time of invasions, insurrection, or war.{EN-2039}

In 1834, Virginia provided that

> [t]here shall * * * be commissioned in each regiment of infantry of the line * * * not more than two light companies of volunteers, to be denominated light infantry or rifle, * * * and in the cities, towns and corporations of this commonwealth, there may be in addition to such light companies, any number of volunteer companies of infantry of the line, not exceeding four to each regiment, as may be recommended by the regimental court of enquiry * * * . All of which * * * shall be raised by voluntary enlistment within the bounds of the regiment to which they belong. And each man * * * shall enlist for a term not less than three years.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * All volunteer companies may adopt by-laws for their own government, and such laws, provided they do not conflict with the laws or constitution of the state, or of the United States, shall be obligatory upon their members.{EN-2040}

In1846, the General Assembly allowed "[volunteer] companies to fix the amount of the fines upon its members for absence from any of its musters: Provided, That no fine for absence from any regular muster shall be less than may be imposed by law for similar absences from the musters of the militia of the line"; and permitted "all fines imposed in such companies for offenses against their by-laws" to "be collected and accounted for in the same manner as * * * other fines belonging to the [regular] companies".{EN-2041} In 1851, the General Assembly provided that, "[w]henever there shall be in any of the cities or towns, with the counties adjacent thereto, volunteer companies, amounting in the aggregate to four hundred men * * * , including cavalry and artillery, the governor shall * * * organize one regiment of volunteers at each of the said cities and towns".{EN-2042} Other statutes with provisions concerning "volunteer companies" were enacted in 1852, 1853, and 1860.{EN-2043} Evidently, all of this went beyond what Congress had prescribed in the Militia Act of 1792, demonstrating that Virginia did not believe Congress's authority "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia" with relation to their "be[ing] employed in the Service of the United States"[2556] precluded the States from supplementing that organization in order to prepare their own Militia for other service within their own territories.

b. With the revision of the statutes of the United States in 1873 to 1874, Congress altered the provision of the Militia Act of 1792 to mandate that > [a]ll corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry, now existing in any State, which, by any law, custom, or usage thereof, have not been incorporated with the militia, or are not governed by the general regulations thereof, shall be allowed to retain their accustomed privileges, subject, nevertheless, to all other duties required by law in like manner as the other militia.[2557]

Of consequence here is the change in language from simply "retain their accustomed privileges" in 1792 to "shall be allowed to retain* their accustomed privileges" in 1874. The language of 1792 could and should be construed as the statutory statement of two constitutional facts: namely, (i) the specific fact that Independent Companies formed pursuant to "the laws, customs, or usages" of the States, within the latters' "well regulated Militia", enjoy a right to exist perforce of the Constitution, so of course they always "retain" whatever "privileges" their States have granted to them (albeit "subject * * * to all other duties * * * in like manner with the other militia" that Congress may constitutionally prescribe); and (ii) the general fact on which the specific fact is grounded, that the States reserve to themselves the power to form Independent Companies, no matter what Congress may want. Congress can observe Independent Companies' right to exist, but not obstruct its exercise. For, being constitutional in nature, that right neither derives from, nor needs, any "allow[ance]" from Congress. And the power to form Independent Companies being reserved to the States, Congress has no discretion to make an "allow[ance]" for it. (Indeed, any such "allow[ance]" would be more apt to sow confusion throughout the country than to clarify the situation.)

---

[2556] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2557] Revised Statutes of the United States (1873-1874), TITLE XVI, THE MILITIA, § 1641, 18 Stat. 285, 287.

On the other hand, the language of 1874 can hardly be construed as anything other than a rather heavy-handed claim of Congressional authority to override the States with respect to Independent Companies. Evidently, from examples such as Rhode Island's over the years, Congress drew the obvious conclusion, and in an exercise of legislative imperialism sought to foreclose the States from asserting their reserved power in that particular. Presumably, if the only Independent Companies that had "retain[ed] their accustomed privileges" under the Militia Act of 1792 were those in existence when that statute was passed (which the actions of Rhode Island, for one State, denied), then the only Independent Companies "now [legally] existing in any State" under the statutory revision of 1874 were those within the original set that had somehow survived. But if all of the Independent Companies formed after 1792 had legal status (which the actions of Rhode Island, for one State, affirmed), then the terms "now existing" included them, too. And without new legislative restrictions (if any could be had, constitutionally), "now existing" could be construed to embrace any Independent Companies the States formed after 1874. In either event, the rogue Congressmen of that era surely intended to preclude the States from forming new, or even maintaining existing, Independent Companies after 1874 unless Members of Congress of their persuasion "allowed" it. Moreover, on the basis of its assertion of a discretionary power to "allow[ ]", Congress could at some future date have "[dis]allowed" any or all such Companies, as well.

c. Apparently, the enemies of the Militia did not believe that the statutory revision of 1873 to 1874 went far enough in the wrong direction, because in 1903 and 1908 rogue Members of Congress openly imposed very severe restrictions on Independent Companies, stipulating that > any corps of artillery, cavalry and infantry existing in any of the States at the passage of the Act of May eighth, seventeen hundred and ninety-two, which, by the laws, customs or usages of the said States have been in continuous existence since the passage of said Act under its provisions and under the provisions of * * * the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the Militia, shall be allowed to retain their accustomed > privileges, subject, nevertheless, to all other duties required by law in like manner as the other Militia.[2558]

Under these statutes, only those Independent Companies already formed in 1792, and which had never experienced an hiatus from then until at least 1903, were "allowed to retain their accustomed privileges". Thus, a Company already chartered in 1792 which for whatever reason failed to remain "in continuous existence" (however that might have been defined) for the next hundred years could never be revived. And no State could charter a new Independent Company, for any reason. In this way, rogue Congressmen denied—just as Members of Congress continue implicitly to deny to this very day—that the States enjoy any reserved power in the premises.

2. No constitutional barrier to the raising of Independent Companies today. Where does this history of sabotage of the Militia leave contemporary America? At the point at which WE THE PEOPLE themselves, through their States, must take this matter into their own hands. The Constitution and laws of the United States place no obstacles in their path. Rather, rightly construed, they set up the clearest signposts that infallibly mark the way.

a. THE PEOPLE are not necessarily legally bound by every act that individuals who may happen to be Members of Congress may perpetrate. Whether an action taken by such individuals is entitled to be denoted an action "of Congress" depends, not upon its mere occurrence in the Capitol, but upon its strict congruence with the Constitution, because "Congress" enjoys no authority—indeed, has no legal existence—outside of, let alone contrary to, the Constitution. So, that Members of Congress may have purported to enact some statute, although necessary for that statute's bare existence, is not sufficient for its validity. "Illegality cannot attain legitimacy through practice."[2559] Moreover, if (as no one doubts) "a bold and daring usurpation might be resisted, after * * * [long and complete] acquiescence",[2560] then surely a mindless "[g]eneral acquiescence cannot justify departure from the law",[2561] no matter how long it may have continued. "[N]either the antiquity of a practice nor * * * steadfast legislative and judicial adherence to it through the centuries insulates it from constitutional attack".[2562] "[N]o one acquires a vested or protected [2558] An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 3, 32 Stat. 775, 775-776, reënacted with nonsubstantive amendments, An Act To further amend the Act entitled "An Act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes," approved January twenty-first, nineteen hundred and three, Act of 27 May 1908, CHAP. 204, § 2, 35 Stat. 399, 400.

---

[2559] Inland Waterways Corporation v. Young, 309 U.S. 517, 524 (1940).

[2560] McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 316, 401 (1819).

[2561] Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 369 (1932).

[2562] Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235, 239 (1970), quoted in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

right in violation of the Constitution by long use, even when that span of time covers our entire national existence and indeed predates it."[2563] Rather, "when the meaning and scope of a constitutional provision are clear, it cannot be overthrown by legislative action, although several times repeated and never before challenged".[2564] Constitutional questions "must be resolved not by past uncertainties, assumptions or arguments, but by the application of the controlling principles of constitutional interpretation".[2565]

As just described, since at least 1874 there has been "legislative * * * adherence" to the notion that Congress may prohibit the States from forming new Independent Companies. No occasion has arisen for "judicial adherence", however, because the issue has never come before the Supreme Court—and if it had, the Court's decision would hardly be conclusive, inasmuch as the Court has admitted error and reversed itself numerous times on constitutional questions.[2566] True enough, to one extent or another, the claim of Congressional power to prohibit the States from creating Independent Companies has persisted during a "span of time [that] covers [a large part of America's] national existence", arguably since 1874 and certainly since 1903. But such "[g]eneral acquiescence" in this claim as has festered among the public has manifested itself not as vocal approval but as ignorant silence, both because vanishingly few individuals have bothered to ponder the matter seriously as an abstract question, and because the dangers to America's [2563] Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 664, 678 (1970).

---

[2564] Fairbank v. United States, 181 U.S. 283, 311 (1901).

[2565] Wright v. United States, 302 U.S. 583, 597-598 (1938).

[2566] See, e.g., Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 828-830 & note 1 (1991). Indeed, various Justices have often candidly admitted their duty to correct the Court's misreadings of the Constitution. See, e.g., Mitchell v. W.T. Grant Company, 416 U.S. 600, 627-628 (1974) (Powell, J., concurring) ("especially with respect to matters of constitutional interpretation * * * if the precedent or its rationale is of doubtful validity, then it should not stand"); Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1, 22-23 (1970) (Burger, C.J., dissenting) (denying "that what the Court said lately controls over the Constitution"); United Gas Improvement Company v. Continental Oil Company, 381 U.S. 392, 406 (1965) (Douglas, J., dissenting) ("issues of [constitutional] magnitude are always open for re-examination"); Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 346 (1963) (opinion of Douglas, J.) ("all constitutional questions are always open"); Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, 158 U.S. 601, 663 (1895) (Harlan, J., dissenting) ("in a large sense, constitutional questions may not be considered as finally settled, until settled rightly"). This is why the Supreme Court is an especially weak reed on which to lean when inquiring into the true meaning of the Constitution. Yes, the Court can set aside an incorrect opinion for a correct one. But until that happens, most public officials will treat the incorrect opinion as a valid "precedent" under the doctrine of stare decisis. See, e.g., Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 854-869 (1992) (opinion of O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter, JJ.). Worse yet, being always subject to the fallibility of human reasoning, the Justices can arrive at an incorrect opinion in the first place, and even set aside a correct opinion for an incorrect one, and never hear another case that raises the issue on which they erred. Thus, a decision of the Supreme Court, by itself, can never answer a constitutional question definitively. Rather, each decision of the Court on such a question always poses the further conundrums of (i) whether the Justices have actually answered the original question sub judice, and if so (ii) whether what they have opined about that question is correct or incorrect. Sometimes, decisions of the Court are obviously correct, or can easily be proven to be so. In that eventuality, they can be cited as prima facie evidence on the points at issue. But more than that cannot be attributed to them.

"homeland security" have never heretofore risen to such an acute level as to render a thoroughgoing inquiry imperative.

b. So, today WE THE PEOPLE are confronted by what lawyers call "a question of first impression": namely, "May Congress constitutionally preclude the States from authorizing the formation of new Independent Companies within their own 'well regulated Militia'?" Although those who would answer this question in the negative would be justified in demanding that the affirmative case be presented first—because "[t]he burden of establishing a delegation of power to the United States or the prohibition of power to the states is upon those making the claim"[2567]—the matter is sufficiently clear that the negative can easily be proven directly.

(1) During the *pre-*constitutional era, Independent Companies were components of "well regulated Militia" in the Colonies and then the independent States.[2568] As a consequence of this historical practice, upon ratification of the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights they were implicitly subsumed within "the Militia of the several States" to which the original Constitution first referred and the "well regulated Militia" which the Second Amendment then declared to be "necessary to the security of a free State".

(2) Being component parts of "the Militia of the several States", Independent Companies derive in the first instance, as they have always derived, from the States' laws. Indeed, even Congress recognized as much in each of its relevant statutes on the subject: "which by the laws, customs, or usages [of the States] have not been incorporated with, or subject to the general regulations of the militia" (1792); "which, by any law, custom, or usage [of a State], have not been incorporated with the militia" (1874); and "which, by the laws, customs or usages of the said States have been in continuous existence" (1903 and 1908). And deriving from the States' own laws, Independent Companies are therefore the products of the States' own "powers", in the sense the Tenth Amendment uses that term.

(3) No explicit prohibition against the States' use of their own powers to establish Independent Companies can be found in the Constitution.

(4) Congress may override the States' exercise of their powers only perforce of such "Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance [of the Constitution]".[2569] The authority for Congress to enact such "Laws", of course, must be found within the Constitution, and nowhere else.[2570]

[2567] Bute v. Illinois, 333 U.S. 640, 653 (1948).

[2568] E.g., see ante, at 224-234 (Rhode Island) and 567-597 (Virginia).

[2569] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2570] E.g., Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 176-180 (1803); Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheaton) 304, 326 (1816).

(5) The Constitution delegates to Congress no power whatsoever to establish a "Militia of the United States" with characteristics different from "the Militia of the several States"—in particular, being entirely separate from and independent of the States' laws.

- Such a "Militia of the United States" finds no precedent in pre-constitutional history. Even under the Articles of Confederation, the Militia were always separate establishments of the individual States.[2571]

- The term "Militia of the United States" appears nowhere within the Constitution.

- Even the first statute which adopted the term "militia of the United States" as a studied official designation did not see the light of day until 1916, more than a century after ratification of both the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights.[2572] And,

- Although "the Militia of the several States" "may be employed in the Service of the United States",[2573] they are not thereby even temporarily transformed into "the Militia of the United States". The distinction remains fundamental.

So Congress cannot prohibit the States from forming Independent Companies as a consequence of its defining an imaginary and unconstitutional "Militia of the United States".

(6) The Constitution carefully circumscribes Congress's actual authority over "the Militia of the several States", and thereby the supremacy of its "Laws" over the laws of the States relating to their own "well regulated Militia". Inasmuch as Congress may "provide for calling forth the Militia" with no limitation as to how extensive that "call[ ]" might be, every Militia unit is potentially subject to "be[ing] employed in the Service of the United States". That being true, pursuant to its power "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia" Congress may and should require Independent Companies to satisfy standards applicable to whatever similarly situated regular Militia units might be "call[ed] forth", as it did through the proviso in the statutes of 1792, 1874, 1903, and 1908, which made Independent Companies "subject * * * to all other duties * * * in like manner as the other militia".

But so long as Independent Companies' performances of their Local duties do not interfere with their abilities to be "call[ed] forth" "in the Service of the United States" when necessary, Congress cannot prohibit the States from forming

---

[2571] See Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

[2572] An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 57, 39 Stat. 166, 197. See ante, at 771 & note 1049.

[2573] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

such Companies in order to perform "homeland-security" duties that do not fall within the three explicit constitutional purposes for which alone Congress may "provide for calling forth the Militia". For Congress's only express authority in the premises is "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" for those purposes, and "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" with respect to those purposes alone, because it cannot "call[ ] forth the Militia" for any other purpose.[2574] Thus, it would be absurd to contend that, although Congress cannot "provide for calling forth the Militia" for any other purpose, nonetheless it may deny the States the authority to call forth their own Militia for their own purposes, and to organize, arm, and discipline their own Militia in their own manner in preparation for such deployment in their own territories. For, in that case, the Militia would not be "the Militia of the several States" at all, but instead exclusively "the Militia of the United States", because they could be employed only for the three limited purposes of the United States. And it would be no less absurd to contend that, although Congress cannot deny the States the authority to call forth their own Militia for their own purposes, nonetheless it may preclude them from organizing, arming, and disciplining their own Militia howsoever they may deem necessary in order to meet their own particular Local needs. For, in that case, although the Militia would remain "the Militia of the several States" in name, in substance they would amount to "the Militia of the United States" alone, because each of them would be unfitted for use by its own State.

(7) Congress enjoys no implied power to preclude the States from forming Independent Companies. True, the Constitution delegates to Congress the power (in pertinent part) "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution * * * [Congress's enumerated] Powers".[2575] But (as explained immediately above) Congress's enumerated powers with respect to the Militia do not license its outright prohibition of Independent Companies. So, no express power for that purpose being given, no conceivable power can be implied to "make [any] Law[ ]" that could be "necessary and proper for carrying into Execution" such a nonexistent authority. Because no power, express or implied, enables Congress to outlaw Independent Companies, then no "Law[ ] of the United States made in Pursuance [of the Constitution]" can be enacted to that effect, and therefore any purported statute rogue Members of Congress enact for that purpose cannot quality as "the supreme Law of the Land" to which "the Constitution or Laws of any State" must yield.[2576]

(8) These principles take on critical importance today, when most Americans eligible for Militia service are consigned by Congress to a constitutionally

---

[2574] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[2575] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[2576] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

oxymoronic "unorganized militia".[2577] An "*un*organized militia" is constitutionally self-contradictory and impossible. Inasmuch as Congress lacks authority "[t]o provide for [un]organizing * * * the Militia",[2578] the statute which now purports to do so (or any such statute, for that matter) is no "law" at all.[2579] So, as to the constitutionally proper "organizing" of the Militia, no actual law of the United States exists at the present time—or will be enacted within the foreseeable future, because a Congress stuffed with rogue politicians beholden to selfish and subversive special-interest groups that hate and fear WE THE PEOPLE can never be expected to correct the situation.

c. As a consequence of all this, contemporary Americans find themselves confronted by circumstances not dissimilar from those Virginians faced between 1773 and 1775.[2580] Just as Virginia's Militia Act of 1771 had expired in 1773, leaving the Colony with no statutorily organized Militia, so today no statute "provide[s] for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" of any of the several States in a proper fashion, let alone recognizing the States' authority to form Independent Companies on their own initiatives. Just as Virginia's last Royal Governor, Lord Dunmore, prorogued that Colony's House of Burgesses in order to prevent the patriots from enacting a new Militia statute, so today rogue Presidents and rogue Members of Congress will not even consider the issue. And just as patriotic Virginians had to rebuild their Militia "from the bottom up" by themselves, and employed Independent Companies to begin the process of revitalization, so today must patriotic Americans follow the same course, if anything is to be accomplished before their country's "homeland security" is hopelessly compromised.

But Americans today need not engage in the arguably extra-legal actions that Patrick Henry and his associates took in the mid-1770s, because contemporary State legislatures still remain capable of providing adequate relief. Yes, the White House and Congress have largely been colonized by rogue politicians who have no idea of the true source and nature of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", or of the locus of final authority over the Militia in the States and "the [2577] See 10 U.S.C. § 311, originally derived from An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 57, 39 Stat. 166, 197. See also An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 1, 32 Stat. 775, 775, reënacted with amendments, An Act To further amend the Act entitled "An Act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes," approved January twenty-first, nineteen hundred and three, Act of 27 May 1908, CHAP. 204, § 1, 35 Stat. 399, 399, in which what later came to be styled "the unorganized militia" was called "the Reserve Militia", in contradistinction to what the statutes called "the organized militia".

---

[2578] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16. See ante, Chapter 34.

[2579] See, e.g., Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886); Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 97, 101-102 (1887); and Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 376-377 (1880), quoted with approval in Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408 (1963).

[2580] See ante, at 567-597.

people" rather than in the General Government. Nonetheless, America has not yet arrived at the point at which she must concede that her "Form of Government [has] become[ ] destructive of" the true ends of government, and that therefore "the People" should exercise their "Right * * * to alter or to abolish [that defective Form of Government], and to institute new Government, laying its foundations on such [new] principles and organizing its powers in such [new] form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness".[2581] For America's "Form of Government" is not simply the General Government, but rather the entire federal system, in which the States are capable of exercising not only legislative powers concurrent with those of Congress, but also certain critically important powers reserved exclusively to them by the original Constitution as well as the Second and Tenth Amendments. Thus, if rogue Members of Congress obstinately refuse "[t]o provide for organizing * * * the Militia", thereby jeopardizing "the security of a free State" in every State and for the United States a whole, then the States may—indeed, must—organize their own Militia in any manner they might have employed during pre-constitutional times, especially including the formation of Independent Companies.

And even if the States' governments were to default in their responsibilities in this particular, Americans today would nonetheless be better positioned than ever were Patrick Henry and his supporters. For when Virginia's legislative process ground to a halt perforce of Lord Dunmore's pigheadedness, Henry and his adherents had no choice but to operate extra-legally from the perspective of the laws then on the books, falling back on the fundamental principles that "[s]elf-defence * * * , as it is justly called the primary law of nature, so it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society", and that all men may invoke "the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression".[2582] Americans today, distinguishably, can assert their constitutional "right to * * * bear Arms" in "well regulated Militia" under the Second Amendment.[2583] So, if rogue Members of Congress were to persist in consigning most Americans to an "unorganized militia", and if in that context the States' governments were to fail, neglect, or refuse to revitalize "well regulated Militia", then "the people" would be compelled by circumstances, and legally entitled, to act on their own. Out of the necessities of the situation, the first units "the people" would form would be Independent Companies, because they would not be authorized by any particular statutes. Yet, even so, such Independent Companies would not be "private militia", because: (i) being formed pursuant to the Second Amendment they would be governmental entities; and (ii)

[2581] Declaration of Independence.

[2582] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4; and Volume 1, at 144.

[2583] See post, Chapters 45 and 46.

their goal would be to restore their States and the United States to the rule of constitutional law, whereupon their formation could be ratified and regularized through appropriate legislation.[2584]

d. Beyond doubt, both Congress and the States could constitutionally delegate to Independent Companies the authority to begin the revitalization of the Militia. This course would not only be practical, because raising Independent Companies has proven to be workable in the past; and prudent, because it would address the problem of revitalization one careful step at a time; but also shrewd from the perspective of political psychology. At present, most Americans have no idea, let alone any personal experience, of what a constitutional Militia truly is. If they are aware of the relevant statutes at all, they know of the paper existence of "the unorganized militia"—in which, contrary to the Constitution's command, no provision has been made by Congress or the States for actually "organizing, arming, [or] disciplining" anyone.[2585] In their own daily lives, the Militia are in effect nonexistent, or if existent in principle then utterly irrelevant in practice. Only a few Americans appreciate why the Militia must be revitalized, and are willing to expend the effort necessary to accomplish that end. So, if anything is to be done, the many must be educated and aroused to take action by the example of the few.

The indispensable first step in revitalization of the Militia must be to organize some Militia units, in order to prove that it can be done and that it is worthwhile doing. If confronted with compulsory organization on any large scale, though, most Americans would evince the negative attitudes that fostered the degeneration of the Militia in the mid-1800s: namely, an "indifference", if not outright hostility, "to any system of militia discipline, and a strong disposition, from a sense of its burdens, to be rid of all regulations".[2586] To obviate this problem, an initial reliance on volunteers—and, because whole Militia units must be formed from scratch, therefore on Independent Companies—is indicated. This will amount to a reversal of history. Ironically, Massachusetts was the first State largely to abolish compulsory service in her Militia, and to substitute an ersatz "militia" primarily dependent upon volunteers.[2587] Her statute of 1840 provided that

> [e]very able-bodied white male citizen, resident within this Commonwealth, who is or shall be of the age of eighteen years, and under the age of forty-five years, excepting persons enlisted into volunteer companies, persons absolutely exempted by law, idiots, lunatics, common

---

[2584] See, e.g., United States v. Heinszen & Company, 206 U.S. 370, 381-382 (1907).

[2585] Contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 with, e.g., 10 U.S.C. § 311(b); General Laws of Rhode Island §§ 30-1-4(4) and 30-1-5; and Code of Virginia §§ 44-1and 44-4.

[2586] J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

[2587] See J. Mahon, The History of the Militia and the National Guard, ante note 1695, at 83.

> drunkards, vagabonds, paupers, and persons convicted of any infamous crime in this or any other State, shall be enrolled in the militia.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * The militia, thus enrolled, shall be subject to no active duty whatever, except in case of war, invasion, or to prevent invasion * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * The active militia of this Commonwealth shall consist and be composed of volunteers, or companies raised at large; and in all cases shall first be ordered into service, in case of war, invasion, or to prevent invasion—to suppress riots, or to aid civil officers in the execution of the laws of this Commonwealth.
>
> * * * The commander in chief may grant petitions, or authorize the mayor and aldermen of any city, or the selectmen of any town in the Commonwealth, to grant petitions for raising companies at large, to the number of ten thousand men * * * .
>
> * * * The whole number of volunteers shall not exceed ten thousand men, and shall be divided, or apportioned, in each county, throughout the Commonwealth, according to population * * * .{EN-2044}

Today, the false steps that Massachusetts took down the road which eventually led to degeneration of all of "the Militia of the several States" provide a map for the retracement of that process—namely, to mandate in the initial statute that: (i) All able-bodied adult residents of a State are to be enrolled in her Militia. (ii) Most of those enrolled may be exempted from most, but not all, Militia duties by the payment of a small fee.[2588] (iii) Volunteers may form Independent Companies of various sorts, to devise and test methods for organizing, arming, disciplining, governing, and training the Militia as a whole. And (iv) as these methods are perfected, exemptions from Militia duties will be progressively narrowed, regular Militia Companies will be formed, and more and more individuals will be subject to more and more Militia duties, until the Militia in that State has been returned to at least the *pre-*constitutional level of preparedness . This process will be perfectly constitutional, too, because at no point will it recognize anything akin to an "unorganized militia" in which (as in Massachusetts' statute of 1840) the vast majority of individuals "shall be subject to no active duty whatever".

E. Practical steps for putting Independent Companies into operation. So much for the salient constitutional principles applicable to Independent Companies. The question of practical consequence today becomes how to put Independent Companies into operation on the presumption that State legislation appropriate for that purpose can be had. If Independent Companies are to be employed to revitalize the Militia, four matters need consideration: first, the need to rely on volunteers; second, the basic procedures and requirements for forming Independent Companies in the context of "[a] well regulated Militia" as a whole; third, the types and purposes of Independent Companies; and fourth, the special significance of Independent Companies as a consequence of their composition.

[2588] See ante, Chapter 43, and post, at 1274-1275.

1. During *pre-*constitutional times, Independent Companies were always composed of volunteers. Today, a primary reliance on volunteers in revitalized "Militia of the several States" would likely be more successful than ever it was, or could have been in that era.

a. Very large numbers of contemporary Americans are (or can be) imbued with education, skills, and experience more varied and comprehensive than those most (if not all) of their Colonial predecessors enjoyed—so that the average volunteer today should be able to do more, more easily and effectively, than the average Militiaman could have done in those days. (Unless, of course, as the result of some extraordinarily severe crisis, conditions degenerate to or below the Colonial level, in which case contemporary Americans will have to relearn many necessary skills people took for granted in Colonial days.) In addition, with systems of communications and transportation far in advance of those in Colonial days, and other technological advantages, volunteers in this day and age could do far more man-for-man than volunteers in yesteryears—even if the levels of skills and experience were otherwise exactly the same within the two groups. Which means that, in principle, to achieve the same degree of readiness through Independent Companies, revitalized "Militia of the several States" would need a far smaller proportion of volunteers than did the Militia during the *pre-*constitutional era.

b. Because the pool of Militiamen in every State today is far larger than in Colonial times, even if the proportion of volunteers remained the same, far more volunteers in absolute numbers than ever before could be expected to come forward. In that eventuality, other than in periods of the most severe crises, more volunteers would likely be available than would be needed, so that even the burden of volunteering could be spread across a large group by rotation and substitution, and thereby attenuated for each individual.

c. Americans are coming to realize that this country now faces a crisis far more serious than any that confronted their Colonial forebears during the *pre-*constitutional period. They also recognize that they cannot trust, let alone rely upon, self-appointed "leaders", career public officials and bureaucrats, professional politicians, political parties, factions and other selfish special-interest groups, the big media, and the intelligentsia—indeed, that these are the main sources of the problems this country faces, not of any conceivable solutions. So if WE THE PEOPLE do not rectify this situation themselves, it will only worsen. In the crises of the *pre-*constitutional era, "[a] well regulated Militia" was "necessary to the security of a free State" in almost every Colony and then in every independent State. The Constitution—and common sense informed by historical experience—teach that this practice is as valid today as it was then, if not even more so. True enough, contemporary Americans may not be able to muster volunteers for Militia service sufficient, all by themselves, to provide "homeland security" under present conditions. But without maximizing the number of volunteers as a foundation upon which to build revitalized Militia as quickly as possible, America will be finished as "a free State". Thus, the incentives for volunteering for Militia duty—at least among people who desire to live in "a free State"—are greater than ever before.

d. Reliance on volunteers from among the most highly motivated, enthusiastic, knowledgeable, skillful, and experienced individuals within the community would allow for the immediate implementation of a program for revitalizing the Militia—as well as promising the greatest likelihood of its success.

(1) Independent Companies that selected their own members from voluntary applicants would start out being composed of individuals who already knew and had confidence in one another.

(2) Such well-integrated and cohesive units would quickly settle upon what they needed to do to advance true "homeland security" in their Localities, and how they believed they could do it. After all, it would always be in the interest of the people actually on the spot to identify Local problems as accurately, to establish priorities for action as prudently, to devise solutions as quickly, and to apply those remedies as efficiently as possible. And organizing the most enthusiastic and capable of the citizenry in Independent Companies would take maximum advantage of Local incentives, interests, insights, input, and the ability to innovate through experimentation.

(3) Organized around members with common knowledge, skills, experience, and interests, and especially who know and have confidence in one another, such Independent Companies could start work with practical efficacy, as well as complete legal authority, as soon as their charters were approved.

(4) Because the public's perceptions of individuals' activities are oftentimes as important as their actual performances, Independent Companies could play a critical rôle at the very inception of revitalization of the Militia by making a good impression on the skeptics and nay-sayers among the proverbial "men in the street". Consisting of volunteers drawn from and well known within Localities throughout each State, Independent Companies would dispel the perverse propaganda peddled by the big media that members and supporters of any organization with the noun "militia" somewhere within its title are somehow "extremists", even when they faithfully comply with all applicable laws.

(5) Moreover, because their members would include many parents of children attending Local schools, Independent Companies would challenge the sensibleness of many contemporary school administrators' draconian policies of so-called "zero tolerance" regarding even the discussion of firearms by their pupils, and the heavy-handed implications from these policies that firearms are inherently evil and the people who possess them deluded, disreputable, and even dangerous. With leading citizens from the community participating in Independent Companies, even the most prejudiced administrators would be unable to continue to insist that students should learn nothing about how the Militia and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" are—as the Second Amendment declares them to be—"necessary to the security of a free State", and why average Americans who "keep and bear Arms", even outside of "[a] well regulated Militia", thereby perform an invaluable public service. In addition, where Independent Companies recruited youth from sixteen to twenty-two years of age, many of their members would be students in public high schools and private secondary schools, junior and community colleges, and State colleges and universities all of whom would be entitled under the First and Second Amendments, and the new State Militia statutes, to speak to other students, teachers, and administrators about their participation in the Militia, notwithstanding any myopic institutional policies to the contrary.

e. Reliance on volunteers to form Independent Companies during the initial period of revitalization of the Militia would allow for an incremental program.

(1) Building the foundations of the revitalized Militia upon Independent Companies would neither demand nor expect that even enthusiastic volunteers should assay too much, too fast, too soon. Independent Companies could be chartered for many and varied purposes. The extent of their activities might be broad or narrow, their goals ambitious or modest. But, in any case, their structures and operations could readily be modified as experience might dictate. And those Companies as to which the performance did not match the promise could easily be reorganized or even dissolved. Thus, Independent Companies would exemplify the scientific method in "homeland security"—namely, Local people would devise an hypothesis in the form of an Independent Company; they would test that hypothesis by experimentation in the laboratory of their own Locality; on the basis of the experimental results they would revise their hypothesis and test it anew; and they would then reiterate that procedure as often as necessary, ultimately either proving or disproving the hypothesis. This is not only the scientific method in "homeland security", but also the method of self-government—namely, if WE THE PEOPLE are to govern themselves, then they themselves must be allowed to experiment with the provision of their own security, in order thereby to gain experience, prove their own competence, and develop self-confidence. Beyond that, this is the prudential course for discovering what works in "homeland security"—for, even if a few Independent Companies should occasionally fail here and there, they would constitute but a small fraction of all the Companies within the Militia; their missteps would not necessarily cause others to stumble; and those few mistakes would teach invaluable lessons that would undergird many more successes later on.

(2) A program that initially relied mostly on volunteers in Independent Companies—and thereby did not attempt to push ahead too fast, before most average citizens were ready to accept their new duties—would avoid the "strong disposition, from a sense of [the Militia's] burdens, to be rid of all regulations" that probably would still fester in the breasts of all too many Americans when revitalization of the Militia commenced. By turning at first to enthusiastic and competent volunteers, the Militia would not need to depend to any significant degree upon the very individuals who harbored—or whose sloth might encourage them suddenly to develop—a "strong disposition" against it. For that reason, little legal coercion to participate in the Militia would need to be applied to these individuals—other than requiring their payment of modest fines or fees for effective exemptions from most Militia duties, which would be unlikely to sour them on a plan that took their negative "disposition" (real or feigned) so favorably into account. As revitalization progressed, the examples set and the peer pressure applied by their patriotic relatives, neighbors, friends, and co-workers would gradually compel them to assume their proper shares of Militia service, or become social pariahs.

2. Although they would be established by individuals acting on their own initiatives, and although they would operate separately from regularly constituted Militia units in many respects, Independent Companies would not in any sense constitute or affect the pretensions of "private militia". Rather, being integral parts of "[a] well regulated Militia" in their State, they would require and receive governmental authorization for their formation, would always be subject to governmental regulation in their operations, and would exercise governmental authority throughout the wide domain of "homeland security".

a. On a day-to-day basis, these matters should be handled primarily at the Local level. A proper statute revitalizing the Militia in one of the several States would establish (or "settle", as the *pre-*constitutional vernacular phrased it) an overall organization, consisting of: (i) a Militia Committee in each House of the State's Legislature, to review old and prepare new legislation on that subject; (ii) a Militia Department under the supervision of the State's Governor (or other Commander in Chief), to execute the Militia statutes as they are enacted; (iii) a State Militia Advisory Commission made up of selected legislators, members of the executive branch, Militia officers, and various experts in all matters related to "homeland security" (particularly in that State), to study the revitalization and operation of the State's Militia as they progress and to recommend needed reforms; and, perhaps most important of all to get the project off the ground, (iv) a Committee of Safety in each Local jurisdiction throughout the State to organize, oversee, and actually utilize on a day-to-day basis the Militia units set up there.

For purposes of illustration, assume that the Locality were a County, City, or Town with a Board of Supervisors, County Council, Town Council, Board of Selectmen, or equivalent chief governing body, with or without a County Executive or Mayor, but with a Chief of Police, Sheriff, or other chief law-enforcement officer. The Local Committee of Safety would be composed of some of these officials, who would also be members of the Militia: namely,

- Several officials selected from among the governing body and the chief executive (if one there were). Each of these individuals would be exempted from other Militia duty in deference to his normal public office and, of even more consequence, his service on the Committee of Safety.

- The chief law-enforcement officer of the Locality. His normal duty in that capacity would constitute his regular Militia duty, augmented by his service on the Committee of Safety. And,

- Representatives of the Militia Companies formed and active in that jurisdiction. These would include the Captains of whatever regular Militia Companies activated themselves and of whatever Independent Companies individuals formed on their own initiatives. At first, these individuals would play no more than an advisory rôle in their Committee of Safety; later on, they would be accorded the status of voting members. Ideally, so as to render the Local Militia a truly self-governing body, all of the Captains should be voting members of the Committee. If, however, the number of Captains with a right to vote should become unwieldy, the Captains could select from amongst themselves a less-numerous set of representatives. (The remaining Captains could always attend meetings of the Committee in the capacity of auditors and interlocutors.) An arrangement of this sort, though, would probably obtain only initially. As the number of Militiamen on active service expanded in highly populated Localities, experience might dictate the need to aggregate Companies into Battalions, Battalions into Regiments, Regiments into Brigades, and even Brigades into Divisions, each under some officer of a rank higher than Captain—and representation of Militia units on the Local Committee of Safety would then pass to these superior officers, with all of them subordinate to a Local Militia commander in chief. In any event, conclusions as to what might be the best forms of organization of a Committee of Safety in this regard must abide actual experimentation, the results of which will doubtlessly differ, perhaps significantly, in different Localities.

Howsoever it might be organized and in all of its operations, of course, the Committee of Safety and the Local Militia units it supervised would remain subject to the chief governing body of the Local jurisdiction, in the most scrupulous possible deference to the principle that, "in all cases, the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power".[2589]

b. With respect to individuals, the State statute would further regulate the revitalized Militia as follows[2590]—

(1) The Act would declare that all able-bodied legal residents of the State, from (say) sixteen to fifty or fifty-five years of age, were members of the Militia of the State and subject to service therein perforce of both the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State herself. The Act would explain that the Militia is of constitutional stature; is a permanent governmental establishment of the State; and may be "employed in the Service of the United States" only for three specifically defined purposes.

(2) The Act would mandate the official enrollment in the Militia of all eligible residents in each Locality. Enrollment would be accompanied by completion of a personal profile providing details of each individual's education, knowledge, talents, skills, experience, and interests relevant to his possible service in the Militia, so that Local and State-wide inventories of personnel could be compiled.

(3) The Act would create a system by means of which the State's Militia Department, the Local Committees of Safety, the Captains of Militia Companies, the Militia Companies, and all individual Militiamen in their respective Localities could communicate amongst themselves, rapidly and securely, with respect to any and all aspects of Militia service.

(4) The Act would instruct the chief governing body of each and every Locality within the State to assign to a regular Militia Company each individual resident within its jurisdiction who might be eligible for Militia service, by subdividing the Locality into Companies composed of from (say) fifty or sixty to one hundred twenty or so members from mutually neighboring residences, on the basis of a simple grid that could take into account geography, population, and such additional matters as Local political subdivisions. For reasons of practicality, a Local Committee of Safety might delegate this task to some other Local agency that had already compiled the necessary data for its own separate purposes, such as bureaus dealing with taxation, registration of voters, real-estate records, or public-school enrollment. The initial survey would not need to be carried out with absolute mathematical precision, either, because the first assignments to Militia Companies

---

[2589] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2590] Consideration of these few model provisions will suffice for purposes of quickly surveying the usefulness of Independent Companies. Obviously, however, to be effective in revitalizing the Militia, any actual statute would need to contain many other and far more detailed provisions, thoroughly integrated into the rest of the particular State's legislative code. The drafting of such a statute will not be a task that can with confidence be consigned to amateurs.

would be understood to be subject to amendment as experience was gained through the process of revitalization.

(5) The Act would require all individuals eligible for the Militia to perform certain essential duties, according to a set schedule, including at least—

• Foundational training. Each Militiaman would be required to complete: (i) a general course in the history, constitutional status, purpose, structure, and operations of the Militia; (ii) a specific course in the safe operation, maintenance, and storage of the firearms, ammunition, and related accoutrements that members of the Militia would be likely to encounter in the course of their service; (iii) a comprehensive course in individual and group survival under whatever adverse conditions were most likely in the Locality in question; and (iv) a concentrated course in emergency-rescue and emergency-medical procedures. Most individuals could satisfy significant portions of these educational requirements through study at home, over the Internet, at essentially no monetary cost and with little inconvenience, because automatic means of monitoring compliance with such a program are now available.

• Physical security. Every member of the Militia would be required to obtain and thereafter to maintain personal possession in his own home of at least one firearm, a minimum supply of ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for the basic para-military and police aspects of Militia service. Those individuals who could not afford to purchase such equipment could apply to their Local Committee of Safety for assistance. A "firearm suitable for Militia service" would be broadly defined, so that most people—at least during the initial phases of revitalization of the Militia—could use for that purpose just about any firearms they already possessed or could easily acquire, and as a consequence have those firearms immunized against "gun control" emanating from the machinations of rogue officials in the General Government.[2591]

• Emergency subsistence. Every member of the Militia would be required to obtain, and thereafter always to possess in his place of abode, at least a two-months' supply of basic foodstuffs and water for himself and each other individual not a member of the Militia living with and dependent upon him, together with a cache of basic survival equipment and a standard first-aid and medicinal kit sufficient for himself and those other individuals. Again, those Militiamen who could not afford to purchase such supplies could apply to their Local Committee of Safety for assistance.

[2591] See ante, at 1105-1111.

> • Economic security. Every member of the Militia over eighteen years of age would be required to establish his own individual alternative-currency account with the State depository so as to be able to use the new currency. In addition, every member of the Militia self-employed in a business, trade, or profession would be required to establish a set of prices in the alternative currency for his goods or services; and everyone who employed Militiamen in a business, trade, or profession would be required to establish a set of wage-rates and monetary benefits in the alternative currency; so that the State's private economy could use that currency as soon and as efficiently as possible should the people so desire.[2592]

No exemptions from these duties would be allowed—except for conscientious objectors, who would not be compelled personally to possess firearms, but would be required to pay a fine or fee, and perhaps perform other services, for the privilege. In the initial stages of revitalization of the Militia, "conscientious objection" could be broadly defined, so as to exempt on that score everyone who harbored any objection whatsoever to his own personal possession of firearms. This leniency would tend to minimize political resistance to revitalization of the Militia from individuals still favorable to "gun control". It would also be sweetly ironic, because the fines or fees partisans of "gun control" would pay in order to be excused from personally possessing firearms would be applied exclusively to Militia purposes, in particular the provision of firearms and ammunition to individuals financially unable to acquire such equipment on their own.

(6) The Act would establish an additional set of duties for Militiamen in a regular Militia Company which chose to become active. That the activation of regular Militia Companies should depend upon the choices of their members would be a practical necessity in the earliest stages of revitalization of the Militia. To expect individuals—suddenly assigned to Militia duties as to which neither they nor their fathers nor even their grandfathers had ever had any exposure—to enlist in that service with good grace, let alone alacrity, is too sanguine a hope to be entertained. And a program that depends upon the realization of such a hope is too ambitious to be undertaken with any expectation of success. If in Joseph Story's era—when the continuity of Militia service from *pre-*constitutional times had not yet been broken, and men who had served in the Militia during the crisis of the 1770s and 1780s were yet alive—many individuals nonetheless succumbed to "a strong disposition, from a sense of [the Militia's] burdens, to be rid of all regulations", even more individuals today would desire to avoid Militia service which was alien to their experience and the vital purpose of which had never even been explained, let alone emphasized, in the course of their education. So, until most people have become familiar with the Militia as institutions, and understand the necessity for their personal participation, active duty beyond the set of foundational requirements must be allowed to be effectively optional (although the choice not to serve need not be costless to the individual making it).

---

[2592] See ante, at 1208-1233.

Regular Militia Companies would be activated and would remain active when and for as long as more than fifty percent of the individuals assigned to them chose to fulfill the normal duties of active Militiamen (to be described immediately below). Those individuals who desired to avoid Militia service beyond the essential duties outlined above could pay fines or fees for their nonperformance, in effect purchasing exemptions from all other duties. Presumably, in the initial stages of revitalization of the Militia, a large majority of the population would select this option. So the few regular Militia Companies in which majorities could be had in favor of active service would function with what would amount to volunteers.

Upon activation, members of such Militia Companies would be required:

- to adopt and become familiar with the State's Militia Code of Justice and a set of standard Company by-laws promulgated by the State's Militia Department;
- to elect officers;
- to meet regularly at a prescribed location to conduct the Company's normal business;
- to take courses of education and training mandated by the Local Committee of Safety, some to be held at the Company's regular meetings, some to be conducted at special training sessions, and some to be assigned for study at home;
- to engage in simple field exercises of a general nature that would emphasize practical use of the education and training received; and otherwise
- simply to remain organized and active, albeit at only a low stratum of readiness, until revitalization of the Militia progressed to a higher stage.

The incentives for individuals to become active would include: (i) education and training subsidized with Militia funds; and (ii) the assumption of legal authority, such as being enrolled as auxiliary police officers or Sheriffs' deputies as a consequence of their specialized instruction.

(7) The Act would establish certain permanent Independent Companies, composed of "homeland-security" units already in existence under State or Local law. These Companies would be "independent", not because their members had formed them independently, but instead because they would perform essential specialized functions unique to them within the Local Militia. For example, before the statute was enacted, a County might have: (i) an elected Sheriff in charge of a Sheriff's Department with numerous deputies; (ii) a County police force, with a Chief of Police appointed by the Local governing body; (iii) fire and emergency-rescue units, composed of both volunteers and professional workers, assigned to various fire-houses and like facilities; and (iv) doctors, nurses, technicians, and other medical-services personnel working in a County and perhaps several private hospitals or clinics. In such a case, the statute would establish one or more Independent Companies for each of these categories, with each such Company subdivided into subsidiary units headquartered in particular offices, barracks, fire-houses, or hospitals throughout the Locality. In deference to his position as the highest elected law-enforcement officer in the County, the statute would appoint the Sheriff as the County Lieutenant in personal command of the entirety of the County Militia (subject to the Committee of Safety) in times of "alarm", and invest him at all times with: (i) actual day-to-day supervision of the Sheriff's Department (acting through a Chief Deputy Sheriff) and any separate County police force (acting through a Chief of Police); (ii) a general supervisory authority over the other permanent Independent Companies (acting through their Captains); and (iii) a right and duty to oversee as the Committee of Safety's adjutant the compliance of all other Militia Companies with statutory requirements.[2593]

(8) The Act would also allow individuals on an ad hoc basis to form other Independent Companies, composed of volunteers, which would be chartered to perform all of the duties of active Militiamen and whatever additional duties the Independent Companies specially required of their members. This will be elaborated immediately below.

(9) Finally, the Act would require each Local Committee of Safety to provide to the Militia Advisory Commission, probably on a semi-annual basis, a detailed description and evaluation of the activities of the active regular Militia Companies and Independent Companies in that Locality, including what was done; what did or did not work; how and why these results were obtained; what regulations had been provisionally adopted in the Locality on the basis of this experience; what more needed to be accomplished at the Local level; and specific proposals for any necessary amendatory or new legislation to be enacted at the State level. Using the material in these reports, the Advisory Commission would recommend further legislation to the Militia Committees of the State Legislature and to the Governor. And, after that legislation had been enacted, the same process of Local experimentation, evaluations, reports, and recommendations could be serially repeated, with each iteration gradually improving the Militia's readiness.

[2593] See, e.g., Const. of Virginia art. VII, § 4, ¶ 1: "There shall be elected by the qualified voters of each county * * * a sheriff * * * . The duties and compensation of such officer[ ] shall be prescribed by general law or special act."

c. The State Militia statute would also establish standard procedures and promulgate appropriate forms to be used: (i) to notify a Local Committee of Safety of the activation of each regular Militia Company within its jurisdiction (because each of them would already exist on paper); and (ii) to petition that Committee for authorization of each Independent Company within its territory (because each of them would be created from scratch).

(1) The realistic expectation must be, though, that early on in the process of revitalization of the Militia few regular Companies would be activated, because most of the individuals assigned to them probably would not even know each other, certainly would never have worked together, might not want to become involved in the Militia at all, and could effectively exempt themselves from most duties simply by paying the prescribed fines or fees. On the other hand, individuals who did desire to become active in the Militia right away would probably enlist in Independent Companies, because service therein would afford them many more degrees of freedom and other advantages than would participation in regular Companies.

(2) In principle, anyone eligible for service in the Militia could form or join an Independent Company.

(a) A not unreasonable surmise, though, is that the most effective organizers of and recruiters for the first Independent Companies would likely be found in and through the several prominent American veterans' organizations now in existence. These organizations are composed largely of patriots who can be expected to know what is at stake in the fight for freedom on the home front and to want to contribute to that effort to the greatest degree and in the most effective manner possible. Little persuasion should be necessary to convince those among them not already fully conversant with the problems of "homeland security" that revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" is "necessary to the security of a free State" everywhere in the United States, and that their participation in the process of revitalization could prove indispensable. Moreover, being familiar with the types of military and related subjects that would be central to many aspects of the Militia's operations, these veterans could easily be convinced of their unique abilities to serve effectively as organizers, leaders, and advisors of Independent Companies. And having many and varied social, business, and other connections throughout their communities, they could recruit friends, neighbors, and co-workers; could raise funds; could generate publicity; and could gain public support for Independent Companies more easily than members of almost any other group.

Inasmuch as the veterans' organizations themselves can boast of long and illustrious histories and deservedly enjoy high standing in their communities, their involvement would lend significant credibility and even prestige to the recruiting of Independent Companies. Also, because these organizations operate myriad posts throughout the United States, they could supply convenient and adequate facilities for planning the establishment of such Companies, organizing them, recruiting members for them, and hosting their meetings. Indeed, no good reason exists why these posts should not be in the very forefront of those helping to establish, and even serve as the foci or nucleii for establishing, Independent Companies.

In addition, the involvement of veterans and veterans' organizations in revitalization of the Militia could build a bridge between the Militia and the regular Armed Forces, which would need to coöperate closely if America's "homeland security" is to be placed on a constitutionally solid foundation.

(b) Under a proper State Militia Act, the process of establishing an Independent Company would begin with submission of a petition to the Local Committee of Safety. The petition should include no less than:

- The name of the Independent Company. Typically, Independent Companies in pre-constitutional times sported descriptive names.[2594] Today, this tradition should be continued. For example, the first Independent Company established in Warren County, Virginia, located in one of the precincts to the east of the town of Front Royal, and specializing in heavy construction, might be named The East Shenandoah Pioneers, Warren County Independent Company Number 1, Militia of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

- Complete identification of the particular individuals who would be the Company's originators and initial, provisional set of officers.

- Where within the Local jurisdiction the Independent Company would be formed, recruit its members, and operate. This might be a legally defined neighborhood (such as an incorporated homeowners' association), a precinct, or generally throughout the territory; or within some particular line of business, avocation, or profession relevant to "homeland security". For example, a large corporation or a consortium of small businesses might be the source of the personnel and might provide the basic equipment for an Independent Company specializing in heavy construction, demolition, or earth-moving.

- What type of Independent Company it would be—that is, its purpose.[2595]

- How many members—whether a particular number, a maximum or minimum number, or some range of numbers—the Company would recruit and maintain on its roster. This, of course, would depend upon the type and extent of services it proposed to provide.

[2594] See the endnotes accompanying the text, ante, at 224-234.

[2595] See post, at 1285-1290.

• A detailed statement of the standards and requirements for membership in the Company. In the nature of things, an Independent Company—particularly one that provided highly specialized services—would have to be the final judge of the qualifications, and would have to exercise untrammeled discretion in the selection, of its own members—except that no individual who was a member of any other Militia unit could become a member of a different Independent Company unless and until he had properly resigned from the unit to which he had originally belonged. On the other hand, anyone who otherwise qualified might join an Independent Company even if he were exempt from regular Militia service, as for instance by dint of age or occupation.

• The proposed set of by-laws by which the Company would be organized, regulated, equipped, trained, disciplined, mobilized, and deployed. This would probably consist of a standard set of by-laws for regular Militia Companies prepared by the State's Militia Department, with amendments, additions, or other modifications that reflected the Independent Company's special circumstances. To the extent of such departures from the standard set of by-laws, the Company's proposed by-laws would be subject to disapproval by the Local Committee of Safety, but only on the grounds that in some particular they were palpably inconsistent with the Militia laws of the State.

The by-laws would include the schedule of regular meetings the Company would hold each year, and define the circumstances under, purposes for, and procedures by which the Company's officers or membership might call special meetings. An Independent Company should meet in regular session at least once every two months in order to maintain a reasonable level of preparedness. At any meeting, a majority of the membership should constitute a quorum; and any smaller number in attendance might adjourn the meeting from day to day, and compel the participation of all absent members in whatever manner the Company might determine was appropriate, consistent with the State's Militia Code of Justice.

The by-laws would also establish the procedure for selecting the Company's officers and members after its initial organization. Most likely, officers would be elected at a regular annual meeting designated at least in part for that specific purpose. Removal or replacement of officers for whatever reason could be accomplished at other regular or special meetings. New members could be enrolled at any meeting. Once selected by the Company's membership, its officers would request commissions from the Local Committee of Safety, subject to disapproval by the State's Militia Department. If a commission were refused, adequate grounds would have to be stated, but not necessarily accepted by the Company's membership. Rather, if the Company persisted in selecting the same individual on three successive occasions, his commission would have to be granted, unless after a hearing the Local Committee of Safety (again, subject to review by the Militia Department) established clear and convincing evidence of good cause why that individual should not be a commissioned officer in the Militia.

The by-laws would further specify a suitable oath or affirmation to be taken orally and subscribed in their own hands by each and every member of the Independent Company upon his formal induction therein, such as:

> I, [...name of individual...], do hereby acknowledge and attest that I have voluntarily enlisted within the [...name of the Independent Company...] of the Militia of [...name of the State...], and in and upon so doing I solemnly swear or affirm that I shall support and defend the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution and laws of the State [...or Commonwealth...] of [...name of the State...], and the Constitution and laws of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I shall bear true, complete, and undivided loyalty and allegiance to the same, renouncing loyalty or allegiance of any kind to every foreign state, nation, or country; that I shall obey the lawful orders of the Committee of Safety for [...name of the Locality...], of the Militia Department of [...name of the State...], of those officers of [...name of the Independent Company...] and the Militia of [...name of State...] who may be superior in rank to or otherwise properly placed over me, and of the President of the United States when the Militia of [...name of the State...] may be employed in the actual service of the United States; that I shall in all other particulars well, fully, and faithfully discharge the duties which I am about to assume as a member of the Militia of [...name of the State...]; and that I take this obligation in all of its particulars upon myself freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and subject to whatever penalties the laws of the State [...or Commonwealth...] of [...name of the State...] and of the United States may impose for violation thereof.

•With what insignia, uniforms, arms, accoutrements, and other equipment the Company would be supplied, and from what sources they would be obtained. Particularly in the case of an Independent Company proposing to provide highly specialized services, the Local Committee of Safety would require a detailed description of these matters, so as to be reasonably confident that the Company would in fact be capable of effective action at some determinate time after its initial organization. Otherwise, personal insignia and basic uniforms, and Company flags or colors, would be required generally to conform to standards adopted by the State Militia Department, with allowance for identification of the Independent Company by name and by the Locality in which it is organized, so as to differentiate it from all other Militia Companies. Initially, the selection and provision of arms, ammunition, and related accoutrements would be left to the Independent Company itself to determine, so as to enable its members as much as possible to take advantage of the equipment already in their possession.

• Acknowledgment that the Independent Company's commanding officer—presumably to be designated a "Captain", in keeping with historical usage—would take primary responsibility in the normal course of events for recruiting, organizing, arming and otherwise equipping, training, and disciplining, and on active service for mobilizing and deploying, the Company's members; and that all the other officers and members of the Company would be responsible in the first instance to its commanding officer—with all of the officers and members of the Company being subject to supervision by and accountability to the Local Committee of Safety.

• The particular courses of education and training to be required of the Company's members, in terms of the subject-matters, sources and qualifications of the instructors, locations of any specialized training-facilities, schedules, and standards for judging the students' satisfactory completion of those courses.

• The schedule of regular exercises in the field that the Company would undertake to perform. The mandatory minimum of these maneuvers should be four times each year. But inasmuch as they would consist entirely of volunteers particularly enthusiastic for the duty, most Independent Companies would be expected to conduct such exercises on a more-frequent basis.

• The methods by which the Company would discipline its members for failure, neglect, or refusal to perform their duties. In most cases, discipline would be imposed by levying fines and forfeitures that would be enforced pursuant to the State's Militia Code of Justice.

• Any procedures above and beyond those mandated for regular Militia Companies by the Local Committee of Safety and the State's Militia Department that would be necessary for mobilizing the Independent Company whenever it might be called forth by any governmental body with authority over the Militia.

• A date certain by which the Company would be fully organized and operational—which ought not to exceed thirty days from the date the petition is submitted to the Local Committee of Safety.

Filing of this petition with the Local Committee of Safety would allow the Independent Company to begin the process of formation as a provisional unit in the Militia. During that period—which, absent special circumstances, ought not to extend beyond the date proposed by the Independent Company on which it would be fully operational—the Committee would review the petition and conduct whatever investigation it deemed appropriate. While the petition was under consideration, the Company could recruit and organize, and conduct such internal functions as meetings and training, but would not be entitled actually to operate within the jurisdiction with legal authority as an Independent Company. If the Company should fail to become operational by the date its petition had fixed (no application for an extension of time having been sought), its charter would be disapproved, whereupon the Company would be dissolved, but without prejudice to the filing of a future petition.

(c) Upon an Independent Company's receipt of a certificate attesting to its approval by a Local Committee of Safety—

• The Company would became fully operational, impressed with all of the legal rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and duties of a regular Militia Company, together with and augmented by any other special authority granted in or along with its charter. In the latter case, for example, an Independent Company specializing in the prevention and mitigation of industrial accidents that could endanger the general public might be invested with the power on its own initiative to instigate inspections and investigations of, and to impose immediate remedial actions as to, dangerous conditions subsisting within (say) chemical plants that operated in the Locality—an authority that would not be extended to regular Militia Companies, or even to those Militiamen serving as Sheriffs' deputies or police officers.

In all cases, the initial certificate from a Local Committee of Safety would be effective for one year after the date of issuance, at which point the Committee would review the Independent Company's performance. If that review proved satisfactory, or after any deficiencies that it disclosed had been corrected, the Committee would issue a final certificate effective indefinitely, unless revoked. The issuance of both an initial and a final certificate would be subject to review and disapproval, in whole or in part, by the State Militia Department, for good cause shown after notice and hearing, with a right in the Independent Company to a restoration of its certificate upon its correction of any deficiencies that had been established.

• The Company's members would be immune from the orders or directions of, and free from any requirement to train or deploy with or under, any other Militia Company or other unit or officer within the Local jurisdiction, other than the Local Committee of Safety, except when their Company might be called into actual service during declared "alarms", or when some or all of the Militia units in that jurisdiction might participate in a general muster, general training exercise, or other general deployment.

• The Company's Captain would be entitled to attend the meetings of the Local Committee of Safety as an advisory or voting member, as the case might be.

• The Company could apply to the Local Committee of Safety for subsidies dispersed out of the funds collected by the Militia from fines and fees collected from the individuals in that jurisdiction who sought, by paying those moneys, to obtain effective exemptions from most Militia duties during the initial phase of revitalization.

(d) Once chartered, Independent Companies would report on a regular basis—probably semi-annually—to their Local Committees of Safety with respect to the state of each Company's membership, organization, equipment, training, discipline, readiness, general compliance with the State's Militia Laws and specific compliance with any applicable directives of the Committee, and (where relevant) the details of any active service on which its members had been or were then deployed. In addition, the Local Committee of Safety would conduct its own annual review and evaluation of each Independent Company within its jurisdiction. Furthermore, each Independent Company would be subject at all times to strict inquiry and examination as to these matters by its Local Committee of Safety or by the State Militia Department. If any such reports, inquiries, examinations, or reviews disclosed that an Independent Company or certain of its members had failed to perform according to the terms of its charter, or had failed or refused to carry out directives from its Local Committee of Safety or the State Militia Department (particularly with respect to being called forth to active service), the Committee or the Department could, after suitable notice and hearing, order corrective steps to be taken within the Company, suspend the Company's authority or operations in whole or in part until reforms were implemented, discipline particular officers or members (and, in egregious circumstances, even order their expulsion from the Company), or take other actions authorized in such cases under regulations promulgated by the Department. At any time, particular officers or members of an Independent Company could also be disciplined or discharged by the Company, the Local Committee of Safety, or the State Militia Department for repeated failures or refusals to perform their duties, for consistently negligent performance of those duties, for serious breaches of Militia discipline, or for the commission of criminal acts that justified their severance from the Militia (that is, historic "[F]ELONIES" or other crimes appropriately punished by the imposition of "slavery [ ]or involuntary servitude" upon the perpetrator[2596]). Of course, an Independent Company could always surrender its charter and disband, its members then reverting to their normal status as subject to service in regular Militia Companies. And if an Independent Company should cease its operations at any time, or if it should violate the requirements of the State's Militia law in some sufficiently serious particular, its charter either would become void, or would be forfeited, whereupon the Company would be dissolved.

3. Only the infertility of one's imagination can impose limits on the types and purposes of Independent Companies that would be useful for providing "homeland security" in America today. Because possibly adverse conditions—and the abilities and resources that people possess to deal with them—vary so widely throughout the country, the possibilities are endless. So which types of Independent Companies might be established in which Localities will depend upon the particular circumstances on the ground there. But some generalizations can profitably be offered.

a. Because of their members' special education, skills, experience, and especially willingness to contribute extraordinary efforts, some Independent Companies could function as "demonstration" units—devising, testing, perfecting, and making available the most effective methods for organizing, equipping, training, and assigning different duties to Militia Companies. At least three types of "demonstration" units would be likely to emerge:

- Independent Companies engaged in planning would study theoretical standards, practical requirements, procedures, and other ways and means to revitalize the Militia.

- Independent Companies engaged in instruction would evaluate various methods for teaching subjects related to the Militia to members of the Militia. Within the Militia, they would become the teachers' teachers.

- Independent Companies engaged in education and training would supply the actual teachers for rank-and-file Militiamen. They would be trained first in the most effective techniques of instruction, then in various substantive disciplines to which they would be assigned on the basis of their own previous education, training, experience, aptitudes, and personal > interests. Some could also receive advanced training from the regular Armed Forces. Independent Companies in this category would train as units, but their members would serve as individuals, being seconded to Localities where they were needed to train the members of other Militia units. During the War of Independence, this method was adopted by Virginia,[2597] and by the Continental Army as well when, "[t]o speed the learning process, [George] Washington organized a provisional 'model company' as an adjunct to his guard. * * * Members of the model company and selected officers then spent six weeks instructing all other units at Valley Forge and later extended the system to the rest of the * * * Army."[2598] More recently, it has proven elsewhere to be an effective, time-saving technique even under extremely adverse conditions.[2599]

---

[2596] See ante, at 748-749, 993-998 and 1011-1013.

In each of these cases, a "demonstration" Company could be formed originally as a separate unit, or be composed of members drawn from other Independent Companies on account of their particular qualifications in these areas.

A good example of how one such "demonstration" unit might function today can be found in the Militia records of pre-constitutional Virginia. In 1784 and 1785, statutes created so-called "Light Companies", one purpose of which was to train some members of the Militia to a high standard, and then diffuse those Militiamen throughout the force, raising the general level of readiness:

> [W]hereas, it will be of great utility and advantage in establishing a well disciplined militia, to annex to each regiment a light company, to be formed of young men, from eighteen to twenty-five years old, whose activity and domestic circumstances will admit of a frequency of training, and strictness of discipline, not practicable for the militia in general, and returning to the main body on their arrival at the latter period, will be constantly giving thereto a military pride and experience, from which the best of consequences will result:
>
> * * * Be it therefore enacted, That the governor * * * shall * * * appoint and commission for each regiment * * * [certain officers] of the most proper persons therefor, for a light company * * * ; and the said companies shall be distinguished by the following words "Light Company of ——— regiment of ——— militia," filling up the blanks with the number of the regiment, and name of the company. Every person belonging to the said light companies, shall wear while on duty, such caps and uniforms as the executive shall direct, to be purchased by the

---

[2597] See ante, at 565-566.

[2598] R. Wright, Jr., The Continental Army, ante note 396, at 141 (footnote omitted).

[2599] See, e.g., Commandant General Tom Barry, Guerilla Days in Ireland (Dublin, Ireland: Anvil Books, 1989), Chapter 4. See generally Meda Ryan, Tom Barry: IRA Freedom Fighter (Cork, Ireland: Mercier Press, 2003).

> commanding officer of the county, out of the monies arising on delinquents. The captain * * * shall * * * enroll in his company a sufficient number of young men * * * , and shall have a private muster twice in every three months. And as the men of such light company shall * * * arrive at the age of twenty-five years, * * * the county lieutenant * * * shall order them to be enrolled in the [regular] company whose districts they may respectively live in, and deficiencies shall be supplied by new enrollments. And the said companies shall in all respects be subject to the same regulations and orders as the rest of the militia.{EN-2045}

The principles that animated these statutes can profitably be applied today: namely,

- incorporating into Independent Companies individuals whose ages, abilities, and other qualifications and characteristics render them peculiarly fit to perform particular special duties;
- requiring these individuals to undergo frequent and comprehensive training in their specialities, to bring them to a very high standard of performance and readiness; and then,
- after their tours of duty are completed, returning them to the regular Militia, so as—in the manner of "folding leaven into the dough"— to diffuse their élan, expertise, and experience throughout the force.

b. In addition, because of their members' education, experience, extensive training, and elevated states of preparedness, Independent Companies engaged in day-to-day operations could serve as modern-day "Minutemen", ready and able on a moment's notice to deploy throughout their Localities and States in numerous capacities. For example, Independent Companies could provide the following specially trained personnel and perform the following functions:

- Line infantry—that is, frankly para-military ground forces, both mechanized and on foot, with at least basic training to levels of proficiency approaching those of the regular Armed Forces.
- Line cavalry. In many parts of America forces of this kind could prove to be both indispensable and invaluable, particularly in times of economic breakdown. "Cavalry" would include horses and mules as mounts for fully armed and trained Militiamen (in the historic jargon, "dragoons"), and as pack and draft animals. The "cavalry" could also serve as a base for training people in the raising, training, and use of draft animals for farming, certain light-industrial activities, and transportation under adverse conditions that prevented the use of normal motorized equipment.
- Sheriffs' special deputies, police auxiliaries, and other reserve law-enforcement officers attached to the then-existing Sheriffs' departments and police forces that would be incorporated into the Militia as regular, albeit specialized, units immediately upon revitalization.[2600]

• Auxiliary fire fighters trained and equipped to operate in urban, suburban, and rural contexts.

• General medical teams, with particular emphasis on recruiting personnel familiar with emergency treatment and trauma surgery.

• Intelligence and counterintelligence teams.

• Internal-security personnel, including specially trained supervisors, guards, and patrollers at strategic geographical locations and critical points in the transportation-network (such as road and rail junctions, ports, and airports), for critical infrastructure and installations (such as factories, dams, reservoirs, power lines, and pipelines), and along any international borders that bounded the Locality.

• Specialists in the maintenance of public order and safety under emergency and other adverse conditions—including mass evacuations and relocations; temporary and long-term support of large numbers of displaced persons; and riot, crowd, and traffic control in the course of natural disasters (such as floods, hurricanes, tornadoes, and prolonged droughts), industrial accidents (such as massive contamination of land, water, and air by discharges of crude oil or nuclear, chemical, or biological agents), or like crises.

• Specialists in food security drawn from the ranks of farmers, ranchers, and other producers of foodstuffs who could design and supervise the implementation of programs aimed at maximizing each Locality's production, storage, and distribution of wholesome foodstuffs under all reasonably conceivable conditions, with a goal of achieving self-sufficiency for at least one year.[2601]

• Specialists in the generation and distribution of power, who could design and supervise the implementation of programs aimed at creating and maintaining public and private facilities, equipment, and supplies of fossil and other fuels, and especially alternative sources of energy, sufficient for the Locality's minimum needs for at least one year. These programs would seek to maximize both the use of renewable energy and the conservation of energy from nonrenewable sources.

[2600] See ante, at 327-328, 1135-1138, 1194-1202, and 1276-1277, and post, at 1291-1293 and 1482-1488.

[2601] Americans, especially, should be sensitive to the crucial importance of "food security" in any system of "homeland security". See, e.g., Andrew F. Smith, Starving the South: How the North Won the Civil War (New York, New York: St. Martin's Press, 2011).

• Specialists in public health and sanitation, whose work would emphasize the prevention and control of communicable diseases, and the immediate provision of medical and nursing services during and adequate for any reasonably foreseeable emergency.

• Specialists in economic security, whose major responsibility would be to manage the State's alternative-currency system and specie depository so as to enable her government and private economy to continue to function in the event of a collapse of the National monetary and banking systems.[2602]

• Experts in communications and information-technology, whose task would be to establish and maintain redundant means of communications for the Militia—some of which would be not reliant upon electricity—throughout the State and her Localities.

• Specialists in transportation—by conventional road, rail, and air networks, as well as by off-road and other unconventional means—whose mission would be to secure the ability of each Locality during any reasonably foreseeable crisis to move large numbers of people and large amounts of things as efficiently as possible through the use of multiple means, some entirely independent of fossil fuels and motorized vehicles of any kind.

• Engineers and workers experienced in every facet of construction, reconstruction, and demolition from simple carpentry to the use of heavy equipment—somewhat along the lines of the Navy's Construction Battalions of World War II—who could be deployed to deal with any problem, from providing temporary housing for a few hundred displaced persons to reinforcing a dam that threatened to collapse.

• Environmental specialists well versed in the protection and management of farmlands, pasturage, forests, fisheries, rivers and streams, wetlands, game, and wildlife in general.

• Specialists in public relations who, among other duties, could document what was being accomplished through revitalization of the Militia in their own State, and could then broadcast that information to the people of other States in order to encourage them to revitalize their Militia.

• Administration—although paper work is prosaic and dull, it is always to some degree necessary.

And, in anticipation of and preparation for perhaps the worst situation imaginable,

---

[2602] See ante, at 1208-1233.

• Strategists and tacticians who would devise and test methods for "total resistance" unto "the last ditch" by WE THE PEOPLE as guerrilleros, partisans, irregulars, and résistants in the event of a successful invasion of the United States or a take-over of the General Government or a majority of the States' governments by insurrectionists or rogue public officials.[2603] Because the techniques résistants could employ would depend to a decisive degree on the types of geographical terrain over, economic and social structures within, and the size and composition of the populations among which they would have to operate, a great deal of very careful thinking ahead would need to be done in every Locality throughout each State in order to be adequately prepared for these sorts of eventualities.

c. The mere differentiation of Independent Companies on paper being insufficient without actual training in their different specialities, the Local Committee of Safety would endeavor to make available to such Companies the use of all such public facilities, equipment, or other property in the Local jurisdiction which could facilitate the training of those Companies' members. Through the State Militia Department, facilities in other jurisdictions could be made available as well. (For example, members of Independent Companies specializing in "law enforcement" or "fire fighting" could be trained at State policemen's and firemen's academies.) The Department could also arrange with the regular Armed Forces of the United States (including the National Guard) to provide such assistance when Independent Companies were training to perform one or more of the constitutional functions for which "the Militia of the several States" may be "called into the actual Service of the United States".[2604]

d. Whatever the specialties of Independent Companies might be, their terms and conditions of service would need to be carefully specified.

(1) Unless the State Militia Department had authorized mobilization of Militia units pursuant to an "alarm", no Independent Company would be required to serve on active duty for more than (say) fourteen consecutive days. And even during an emergency mobilization, Independent Companies should be afforded the benefit of rotation in service to the fullest extent possible.

(2) Unless the State Militia Department had authorized such deployment of Militia units, no Independent Company would be required to serve on active duty

---

[2603] See, e.g., H. von Dach, Der Total Widerstand: Kleinkriegsanleitung für Jedermann (Biel, Switzerland: Schweizerischen Unteroffiziersverband, Dritte Auflage, 1966), published in translation from an earlier edition as Total Resistance: Swiss Army Guide to Warfare and Undergrounds (Boulder, Colorado: Paladin Press, 1965); Friedrich August Freiherr von der Heydte, Modern Irregular Warfare in Defense Policy and as a Military Phenomenon, George Gregory, Translator (New York, New York: New Benjamin Franklin House Publishing, 1986).

[2604] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 and art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

outside of its own Local jurisdiction and those Local jurisdictions contiguous thereto, and in the latter case only pursuant to an agreement among those jurisdictions delineating the terms of such service.

(3) During active service, members of an Independent Company should be entitled to a per diem stipend from the Militia. They should be reimbursed for whatever ordinary and necessary expenses the Company might require its members to incur, and for the fair market value of such equipment and supplies that the Company might require its members to bring with them, and that might be lost, damaged, destroyed, or consumed, without fault on the part of the owners. They should be covered by the standard workers'-compensation insurance already provided under their State's law, or equivalent insurance procured by the Militia, for any injuries they might suffer as a consequence of active duty. If they were compelled to absent themselves from their regular employment, they should be entitled to whatever benefits of leaves of absence the State's law provided for public or private employees who were called to active service in the regular Armed Forces or the National Guard. And they should be granted immunity against personal liability in civil actions for damages to persons or property arising out of their service, except to the extent that their actions could be proven to have been grossly negligent, reckless, or criminal in nature.

(4) The entirely predictable success of Independent Companies would derive from the type of individuals who would form and join them. True enough, some material incentives would encourage certain individuals' participation—such as specialized training in their areas of expertise and access to equipment made available through the Militia and subsidized with Militia funds, as well as possibly even personal monetary compensation when they were actually on active duty. But basically their primary motivation would be patriotism, not personal profit or the satisfaction of some other narrow self-interest. Individuals inspired by patriotism to form Independent Companies would be their communities' natural leaders, who would recognize their duty, come forth on their own initiatives, take charge, and inspire others to emulate their examples. Perhaps of even greater consequence, they would be more likely than any others to possess both the foresight to discern what would be needed to provide their communities with true "homeland security" and the willingness to take appropriate action long before the necessity for it would have become painfully obvious to everybody else.

4. Even without a specific State statute, steps could be taken to lay the practical and political groundwork for revitalizing the Militia by organizing Sheriffs' posses in "independent companies". In *pre-*constitutional English law,

> [a]s the keeper of the king's peace, * * * [the Sheriff] is the first man in the county * * * . He may apprehend[ ], and commit to prison, all persons who break the peace or attempt to break it * * * . He may, and is > bound ex officio to, pursue and take all traitors, murderers, felons, and other misdoers, and commit them to gaol for safe custody. He is also to defend his country against all of the king's enemies when they come into the land: and for this purpose, as well as for keeping the peace and pursuing felons, he may command all the people of his county to attend him; which is called the posse comitatus, or power of the county; which summons every person above fifteen years old * * * is bound to attend upon warning, under pain of fine and imprisonment.[2605]

Today, in contrast, a Sheriff is not necessarily "the first man in the county", with all of the powers Sheriffs in England enjoyed during *pre-*constitutional times, but may exercise only such authority as the State's constitution and laws delegate to him[2606]—which authority must be carefully ascertained, because "it is of the utmost importance to have the sheriff appointed according to law, when we consider his power and duty".[2607] Certainly, no Sheriff can claim any authority peculiar to that office under the Constitution of the United States, in which the noun "Sheriff" does not appear. Even in his own County, a Sheriff cannot put himself forward as the supreme commander of the Militia—or as any officer of the Militia for that matter—solely by virtue of his office. Merely as Sheriff, he cannot command members of the Militia when they are in actual service, let alone override the commands of the Militia's own officers. To be sure, a State statute could empower Sheriffs as County Lieutenants of (or other officers in) the Militia—which might be advisable, inasmuch as revitalization of the Militia would in effect incorporate into the Militia essentially everyone eligible for the posse comitatus in every County. Absent such a statute, however, a Sheriff cannot under color of his own authority establish a purported "militia" in his County.

Nevertheless, prior to revitalization of the Militia, a Sheriff can mobilize and deploy a posse comitatus in his own County, if the applicable State and Local laws allow. Although a limited power, this could be just enough to catalyze revitalization of the Militia throughout the State. Initially, the Sheriff could authorize volunteers from among his posse to organize "independent companies" throughout his County, their members deputized to provide specialized services to assist the Sheriff in "keeping the peace", in the broadest sense of guaranteeing all of those aspects of Local "homeland security" which, if neglected, could result in economic, social, or political dislocations, civil unrest or disobedience, or other like threats to public safety, health, and good order. Once sufficient "independent companies" of the [2605] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 343-344 (footnotes omitted). At that time, an individual's "neglecting to join the posse comitatus * * * being thereunto required by the sheriff" was deemed a "high misprision and contempt". Id., Volume 4, at 122.

---

[2606] See, e.g., Const. of Virginia art. VII, § 4, ¶ 1.

[2607] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 343.

posse had been set up and deployed to prove the viability of the plan, the Sheriff could assign all individuals eligible for the posse but not members of any "independent company" to "regular companies" in their own neighborhoods, and then cause them to be organized, armed, and trained as might be appropriate to perform general "homeland-security" duties suitable for their County under the Sheriff's direction. Successful in one County, the plan would likely be adopted in others throughout the State. When enough Counties had adopted it, the Sheriffs in the forefront of the movement could submit to or support in the State's legislature a proposed statute for revitalizing the Militia, with Sheriffs to be designated County Lieutenants, and the "independent" and "regular companies" of the posse comitatus in each County to be dissolved as such and thereupon incorporated directly into the Militia as full-fledged Local Companies. A precedent for this exists in *pre-*constitutional Virginia law, when Virginia's Convention decreed that "the several volunteer companies, raised in pursuance of the resolutions of a former convention,[2608] shall be disbanded, as soon as the battalions [of Minutemen] in the several districts where the said volunteer companies respectively reside are fully and completely embodied".{EN-2046} Even were such a statute not enacted, though, the Counties in which the Sheriffs had mobilized the posse comitatus in "independent" and perhaps even "regular companies" would have prepared themselves as much as possible for the trying times this country will face in the years to come.

[2608] This referred to the Convention's Resolution of 25 March 1775. See ante, at 592-593.

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE

The Second Amendment explains the purpose of, and renders absolute, the position of "the Militia of the several States" in the Constitution's federal system and WE THE PEOPLE'S right to be organized, armed, disciplined, and trained for Militia service.

From what this study has already elucidated as to the accepted meanings of "the Militia of the several States" and "[a] well regulated Militia" during the pre-constitutional period—and therefore the meanings of those terms in the Constitution—the proper construction of the Second Amendment should be pellucid. Knowing what WE THE PEOPLE knew in the late 1700s, they could hardly have adopted a more succinct, straightforward, and intelligible statement than "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed"—or been in any way undecided about that statement's meaning, in each and every one of its particulars. Nevertheless, inasmuch as, in disregard and even defiance of its clarity, the Amendment has been made the subject of endless controversy, convoluted special pleading, and attendant confusion—among, for example, panegyrists of a so-called "individual right" to possess firearms, propagandists for comprehensive "gun control", and even proponents of "private militia"—it would be prudent to review and summarize in one place the most important components of the Amendment's true construction. If the principles of the Second Amendment to be set out at this point appear self-evident, it is only because this study has taken the trouble to examine the subject first and foremost through the lens of pre-constitutional legal history, which brings everything into as sharp a focus as WE THE PEOPLE of that era themselves enjoyed.[2609]

A. The relevant rules of constitutional interpretation. As with any other part of the Constitution, the Second Amendment must be construed in accordance with certain fundamental rules. Although these are more or less commonsensical, a brief review of the most important of them at this point would not be unprofitable.

[2609] If any reader wishes to wrack his brain in the sort of superficial yet tortuous exegeses and pilpulistic disputations that delight members of the contemporary legal intelligentsia, but leave the Constitution tangled in a rat's nest of conundrums (thus providing even more grist for the intelligentsia's mill), he has only to peruse the mutually conflicting opinions of the Justices in the Supreme Court's recent decisions in District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570 (2008), and McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. ___ (2010), none of which correctly construed the Second Amendment.

1. The General Government may exercise only such powers as the Constitution assigns to it. "The government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution."[2610] "[N]o department of the government of the United States * * * possesses any power not given by the Constitution."[2611] "The government * * * of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the constitution, and the powers actually granted, must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication."[2612] "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."[2613] And, perhaps most importantly, "[t]he burden of establishing a delegation of power to the United States or the prohibition of power to the states is upon those making the claim."[2614]

2. In determining what powers have been delegated to the United States, prohibited to the States, or reserved either to the States or to WE THE PEOPLE, the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights must be read and understood as they would have been parsed at the times of their ratifications by the individuals most concerned with the matter: "the good People of the[American] Colonies", in whose name and by whose authority "The unanimous Declaration of the thirteen united States of America" was put forth in 1776; and who then identified themselves as "WE THE PEOPLE of the United States", who "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution" in 1788, and whose legislatures ratified the Bill of Rights by 1791. And whatever its language might signify to modern ears, an Amendment to the Constitution must be read in the sense most obvious to the common man's understanding at the time of its ratification—for it was proposed for adoption by the public at that time.[2615] So no Americans of that era would ever have doubted that the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights said exactly what THE PEOPLE meant them to say, according to the documents' literal terms. "As men, whose intentions require no concealment, generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our constitution, and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said."[2616] "It cannot be supposed that the framers of the Constitution did not use th[e]

[2610] United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 551 (1876).

[2611] Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. (4 Wallace) 2, 136-137 (1866) (opinion of Chase, C.J.). Accord, Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 25 (1942); Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U.S. 466, 477 (1939).

[2612] Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheaton) 304, 326 (1816).

[2613] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[2614] Bute v. Illinois, 333 U.S. 640, 653 (1948).

[2615] See Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 63 (1947) (Frankfurter, J., concurring).

[2616] Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheaton) 1, 188 (1824).

expression[s they chose] with deliberation or failed to appreciate [those expressions'] plain significance. * * * To disregard such a deliberate choice of words and their natural meaning would be a departure from the first principle of constitutional interpretation."[2617] Furthermore, no Americans of that era would ever have denied that, as their country's "supreme Law of the Land",[2618] the Constitution was to be construed in none other than "the light of the law as it existed at the time it was adopted".[2619]

3. As with the Constitution in general, the Second Amendment in particular must be interpreted as a coherent whole, in which every term and phrase relates inextricably to every other. "'In expounding the Constitution * * * , every word must have its due force, and appropriate meaning; for it is evident from the whole instrument, that no word was unnecessarily used, or needlessly added.'"[2620] So, one cannot correctly construe the Amendment's clause, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed" except in connection with and in the context of the preceding clause, "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State".

B. The meaning of the Second Amendment. As with all of the Constitution, the meaning of the Second Amendment must be gleaned from its own words and phrases. These should first be examined as a whole, then considered separately.

1. The Amendment's meaning controlled by its grammatical structure. In its entirety, the Second Amendment consists of two clauses: an introductory subordinate or modifying clause—"[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the Security of a free State", followed by an independent or main clause—"the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed".

Grammatically, "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State" is denoted a "nominative absolute clause". Even contemporary American high-school students—as poorly educated as too often they are—should understand what an "absolute clause" is and does:[2621] An "absolute clause" modifies the whole of the sentence in which it is contained, adding important information,

---

[2617] Wright v. United States, 302 U.S. 583, 587-588 (1938).

[2618] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2619] Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 243 (1895). Accord, United States v. Barnett, 376 U.S. 681, 693 (1964).

[2620] Williams v. United States, 289 U.S. 553, 572-573 (1933), quoting Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Peters) 540, 570-571 (1840) (opinion of Taney, C.J.). Accord, Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803). See also Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 490-491 (1965); Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 151-152 (1926); Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 87 (1900); Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 260-261 (1898).

[2621] See, e.g., Donald W. Emery, John M. Kierzek, & Peter Lindblom, English Fundamentals, Form B (Needham Heights, Massachusetts: Allyn and Bacon, Eleventh Edition, 1999), at 114-115.

sometimes (as in the case of the Second Amendment) the most important information in the sentence. An "absolute clause" identifies relationships between ideas expressed within the sentence—quite often, the reason for or the cause of what is expressed in the main clause.

In the late 1700s, no one fluent in the English language, let alone literate in *pre-*constitutional American law, would have read the Second Amendment with any other rule of grammatical construction in mind:

> Anyone studying * * * English grammar in the eighteenth century would have understood how an absolute phrase works. And since the absolute phrase already had become a normal, naturalized English construction by then, any competent English writer at the time would have been able to use the absolute construction without having taken any formal grammar lessons.
>
> * * * * *
>
> Most American readers in the federal period, including those without formal grammar study, would have had no trouble understanding that the Second Amendment's absolute construction functioned to make the Amendment effectively read: because a well regulated Militia is necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms shall not be infringed.[2622]

This grammatical analysis is controlling, because the rule employed for construing statutes in the late 1700s required that if "the reason of the law" is "expressed in such clear and precise words, as to leave no doubt at all about the ultimate effect which the lawmaker designed to produce, or about the end which he designed to obtain", then "the meaning of the law is to be determined by the reason of it".[2623] "If, from the imperfection of human language, there should be

---

[2622] BRIEF FOR PROFESSORS OF LINGUISTICS AND ENGLISH DENNIS E. BARON, Ph.D., RICHARD W. BAILEY, Ph.D. AND JEFFREY P. KAPLAN, Ph.D. IN SUPPORT OF PETITIONERS, District of Columbia v. Dick Anthony Heller, Supreme Court of the United States, No. 07-290 (filed 11 January 2008), at 11, 14. Ironically, the Professors submitted their brief in support of denying average Americans in the District of Columbia a right to possess a handgun even for the purpose of individual self-defense in those citizens' own homes. Although they correctly observed that, as a matter of linguistics, the Amendment inextricably links "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" with "[a] well regulated Militia", the Professors apparently had no inkling that, as a matter of legal history, "a well regulated militia" is always "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms". Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied). Therefore they were unaware that, the closer the connection between "the right" and "[a] well regulated Militia", the greater the number of individuals entitled to be armed at all times—with military-grade rifles, as well as handguns—quite in contradiction of the result the Professors desired the Supreme Court to reach. Proving once again that "a little learning is a dangerous thing".

[2623] T. Rutherforth, INSTITUTES OF NATURAL LAW, ante note 1872, Book II, Chapter VII, at 415. See also W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 59-62. As elucidated by Rutherforth especially, the rules of statutory construction had antecedents both in international and in English law, and were doubtlessly well known to and accepted by Americans during the *pre-*constitutional period. See, e.g, W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution, ante note 206, Volume 1, at 364-365.

serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, * * * the objects for which it was given, especially when those objects are expressed in the instrument itself, should have great influence in the construction."[2624] Which in the case of the Second Amendment means that the pith (if not the entire substance) of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" must be ascertained by reference to the preceding clause. For, plainly enough, "the reason", "effect", "end", and "objects" of the Amendment are "expressed in * * * clear and precise words" in the Amendment itself, with an emphasis to be found nowhere else in the Constitution: "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State".

And because (as just noted), "'[i]n expounding the Constitution * * * , every word must have its due force, and appropriate meaning; for it is evident from the whole instrument, that no word was unnecessarily used, or needlessly added'", therefore, whatever else the "right of the people" might entail, it must to a decisive degree always conduce to, operate within, and advance "[a] well regulated Militia", so that "[a] well regulated Militia" can conduce to, operate within, and advance "the security of a free State". Reciprocally, "a free State" must be one with "[a] well regulated Militia". And "[a] well regulated Militia" must be one in which "the people" participate through the untrammeled exercise of their "right * * * to keep and bear Arms". "[T]he right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is not merely incidental to "[a] well regulated Militia" and vice versa; instead, each is integral to and inextricable from the other. So, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" cannot be interpreted without reference to "[a] well regulated Militia"; and "[a] well regulated Militia" cannot be understood without reference to "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms".[2625]

Moreover, neither the Second Amendment's ultimate or intermediate purposes, nor the means it singles out to effectuate them, can be dismissed as mere anachronisms or anachorisms. To the contrary, in the grammatically clearest fashion, the Amendment declares itself pertinent always and everywhere through the United States. First, in general, "we must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding".[2626] The Constitution "was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence".[2627] Therefore, every provision of the original Constitution and its Amendments is "to be adapted

---

[2624] Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheaton) 1, 188-189 (1824).

[2625] In the Wonderland of contemporary "judicial review", however, this self-evident constitutional proposition falls by the intellectual wayside. For, as of this writing, a majority of the Justices of the Supreme Court contend that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" need have no interpretive connection at all with "[a] well regulated Militia". See District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 576-628 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court).

[2626] McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 316, 407 (1819).

[2627] Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheaton) 304, 326 (1816).

to the various crises of human affairs".[2628] The Second Amendment embodies precisely this understanding: "A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State" expresses not only causation, but also temporality. The Amendment's "absolute clause" is not phrased in the past tense—"[a] well regulated Militia having been necessary to the Security of a free State"—so as to suggest that perhaps in the present or the future Congress or the several States could determine that such a Militia is not necessary. Neither is the clause phrased in the future tense—"[when a] well regulated Militia shall become necessary to the security of a free State"—so as to leave undefined under what circumstances that necessity might arise, thereby implicitly licensing Congress or the several States to deny that such circumstances obtain now, or would ever obtain. Rather, being in the present tense, "the absolute clause" sets out a relationship of cause and effect that exists now and will continue on into the indefinite future—so as to dispel any doubt that at all conceivable times the Second Amendment is and will be operative, and thereby to strip from Congress and the several States every thread of discretion to disregard the Amendment's command on the specious ground that it is somehow "out of date".

Second, because the Second Amendment is always germane, it is everywhere germane as well—not just in the original fourteen States that comprised the Union when the Second Amendment was ratified in 1791, but in the much larger territory, embracing the far greater number of States, that the Union was to and has become, through application of the provision that allows for adherence to the Constitution by new States, each with "a Republican Form of Government".[2629] The original Constitution set no limits on how large the Union might grow. But, perforce of the Second Amendment, each and every one of the new States (as well as the old) was upon her admission to the Union and forever after to be "a free State", and nothing else, and therefore would always require and be entitled to "[a] well regulated Militia" to provide for her "security".

Overall, then,

• The ultimate goal of the Second Amendment is to preserve a very special type of polity: namely, "a free State".

• As does any other polity, "a free State" requires appropriate "security".

• To provide the "security" proper for "a free State", and only for such a "State", "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary".

• For "[a] well regulated Militia" to exist, "the people" must themselves exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms".

[2628] McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 316, 415 (1819).

[2629] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 1, and art. IV, § 4.

•In order for "the people" themselves to exercise their "right" freely and fully, "the supreme Law of the Land"[2630] must prohibit any and all "infringe[ments]" upon that "right". And,

•That prohibition must not simply exist in principle, but must be perfectly effective in practice, everywhere throughout the Union, at all times and under all possible circumstances—and if it is not, as is the case today, then something is profoundly and dangerously amiss.

2. The meaning of each part of the Amendment. Whether or not the whole is greater than the sum of its parts, it must be at least equal to them in aggregation. So it is worth examining each part of the Second Amendment's components, and evaluating its particular meaning.

a. "[A] free State". The word "State" is never defined anywhere in the original Constitution or the Bill of Rights. Furthermore, the word "State" takes on various usages the differences in which are apparent from their contexts. For example, it can refer to a foreign polity (organized on whatever basis),[2631] and even to a condition, rather than a political entity.[2632] In most instances, though, the word "State" refers specifically to one, some other number, or all of "the several States".[2633] In general, as so used, the term "State" > describes sometimes a people or community of individuals united more or less closely in political relations, inhabiting * * * the same country; * * * not infrequently it is applied to the government under which the people live; at other times it represents the combined idea of people, territory, and government.

>
> It is not difficult to see that in all these senses the primary conception is that of a people or community. The people, in whatever territory dwelling, * * * and whether organized under a regular government, or united by looser and less definite relations, constitute the state.
>
> This is undoubtedly the fundamental idea upon which the republican institutions in our own country are established. * * *

[2630] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2631] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8 ("foreign State"); art. III, § 2, cl. 1 ("foreign States"). See also U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3 ("foreign Nations") and art. I, § 10, cl. 3 ("foreign Power"), in which "Nations" and "Power" appear to have been used so as to assure a clear delineation from "the several States" and "another State [in the Union]", respectively.

[2632] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3 (The President "shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union").

[2633] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cls. 1 through 4; § 3, cls. 1 through 3; § 4, cl. 1; § 8, cls. 3, 16, and 17; § 9, cls. 1, 5 and 6; and § 10, cls. 1 through 3. U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 2; and § 2, cl. 1. U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cls. 1 through 3. U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1; § 2, cls. 1 through 3; § 3, cls. 1 and 2; and § 4. U.S. Const. art. V; art. VI, cls. 2 and 3; and art. VII. U.S. Const. amends. II, VI, and X.

> In the Constitution the term state most frequently expresses the combined idea * * * of people, territory, and government. A state, in the ordinary sense of the Constitution, is a political community of free citizens, occupying a territory of defined boundaries, and organized under a government sanctioned and limited by a written constitution, and established by the consent of the governed.[2634]

As the Constitution itself makes clear, though, when it declares that "[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government",[2635] a "State" is not just, or simply to be conflated with, a "government". To the contrary, > the distinction between the government of a State and the State itself is important, and should be observed. In common speech and common apprehension they are usually regarded as identical; and as ordinarily the acts of the government are the acts of the State, because within the limits of its delegation of power, the government of the State is generally confounded with the State itself, and often the former is meant when the latter is mentioned. The State itself is an ideal person, intangible, invisible, immutable. The government is an agent, and, within the sphere of the agency, a perfect representative; but outside of that, it is a lawless usurpation. The Constitution of the State is the limit of the authority of its government, and both government and State are subject to the supremacy of the Constitution of the United States, and of the laws made in pursuance thereof. So that, while it is true in respect to the government of a State * * * that the maxim, that the king can do no wrong, has no place in our system of government; yet, it is also true, in respect to the State itself, that whatever wrong is attempted in its name is imputable to its government, and not to the State, for, as it can speak and act only by law, whatever it does say and do must be lawful. That which, therefore, is unlawful because made so by the supreme law, the Constitution of the United States, is not the word or deed of the State, but is the mere wrong and trespass of those individual persons who falsely speak and act in its name. * * *

>
> This distinction is essential to the idea of constitutional government. To deny it or blot it out obliterates the line of demarcation that separates constitutional government from absolutism, free self-government based on the sovereignty of the people from that despotism, whether of the one or the many, which enables the agent of the State to declare and decree that he is the state; to say "L'État, c'est moi." Of what avail are written constitutions whose bills of right for the security of > individual liberty have been written, too often, with the blood of martyrs shed upon the battlefield and the scaffold, if their limitations and restraints upon power may be overpassed with impunity by the very agencies created and appointed to guard, defend, and enforce them; and that, too, with the sacred authority of law, not only compelling obedience, but entitled to respect? And how else can these principles of individual liberty and right be maintained if, when violated, the judicial tribunals are forbidden to visit penalties upon individual offenders, who are the instruments of wrong, whenever they interpose the shield of the State? The doctrine is not to be tolerated. The whole frame and scheme of the political institutions of this country, State and Federal, protest against it. Their continued existence is not compatible with it. It is the doctrine of absolutism, pure, simple, and naked; and of communism, which is its twin; the double progeny of the same evil birth.[2636]

---

[2634] Texas v. White, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 700, 720-721 (1869).

[2635] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

The distinction between "a free State" and a mere governmental apparatus is critical. "A well regulated Militia" is always "necessary to the security of a free State", but not always to the security of the form of government that happens to be in existence in that State at any particular time. Indeed, under some circumstances, "the security of a free State" may depend, not upon preserving its form of government, but upon overthrowing it. For if "any Form of Government becomes destructive of the[ ] ends" for which "Governments are instituted among Men", the Declaration of Independence avows that "it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government"—which may require "the People" forcibly "to throw off such [abusive] Government" through deployment of "well regulated Militia" for the sake of preserving "the security of a free State".

The Second Amendment employs the phrase "a free State" in a dual fashion: (i) As a term of political philosophy, signifying a particular type of polity, just as it was used in Virginia's Declaration of Rights of 1776—namely, "[t]hat a well regulated militia * * * is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state";[2637] and even earlier by Blackstone—namely, "[t]he liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state".[2638] And (ii) as a term that refers to the legally obligatory character of the States which make up the Union. For the Second Amendment was added to the original Constitution as a "further declaratory and restrictive clause[ ]" "in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers".[2639] And the original Constitution was adopted into order to put into practice the [2636] Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 290 (1885).

---

[2637] Art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[2638] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 151 (emphasis supplied).

[2639] RESOLUTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS SUBMITTING TWELVE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION (4 March 1789), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1063.

principles of the Declaration of Independence. Therefore, in America's political system—

> • Every member of the Union must be "[a] free State" (as all of the fourteen States which composed the Union were taken to be when the Bill of Rights was ratified in 1791). Although "[n]ew States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union",[2640] they, too, must satisfy the specific requirements of the Second Amendment, as well as general constitutional prohibitions against schemes for perpetuating oligarchy such as "Title[s] of Nobility".[2641] Congress cannot condition admission of a new State into the Union upon the State's waiver, surrender, forfeiture, or even dilution of her right—and especially her people's right—to "[a] well regulated Militia". For the general rule is that officials may not condition the grant of any benefit to a particular individual on a requirement that the individual must waive or forfeit some constitutional right in the present or the future, or must not have exercised some constitutional right in the past, in order to obtain the benefit.[2642] And this rule applies irrespective of whether the benefit at issue can or should properly be labeled a "right" or a "privilege".[2643] So, just as Congress cannot deny the benefits of the Second Amendment to any State already in the Union, it cannot deny them to a new State as a condition of her admission into the Union. Neither can any new State affirmatively agree on her own to any such waiver, surrender, forfeiture, or even dilution of her right (and especially her people's right) to "[a] well regulated Militia"—because, as shall be discussed hereafter, that constitutional right is also a constitutional duty.[2644]
>
> • Inasmuch as every State in the original Union, the Union itself, and every new State admitted to it are legally justified only to the extent that they adhere to the Declaration of Independence as their fundamental law,[2645] "a free State" among "the several States" must fully satisfy the

---

[2640] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 1.

[2641] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8 and § 10, cl. 1.

[2642] E.g., Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 513-516 (1980); Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597-598 (1972); Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563, 568 (1968); Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 605-606 (1967); Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 403-406 (1963); Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278, 285, 287-288 (1961); Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 495-496 (1961); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 484-490 (1960); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 518-519, 528-529 (1958): Slochower v. Board of Higher Education, 350 U.S. 551, 558-559 (1956); Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183, 191-192 (1952); Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc., 327 U.S. 146, 154-156 (1946); West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 630-631 (1943).

[2643] E.g., Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 571 & note 9 (1972); Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597-598 (1972); Bell v. Burson, 402 U.S. 535, 539 (1971).

[2644] See post, at 1331-1333 and 1351-1353

[2645] See ante, at 22-27.

principles of the Declaration, in that: (i) she "deriv[es]" her "just powers"—and only "just powers"—"from the consent of the governed", for the purpose of "secur[ing]" men's "unalienable Rights" in conformity with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God"; and (ii) she never exceeds the limits that justice imposes on her powers, so as to "become[ ] destructive of these ends".

• "[A] free State" among "the several States" must have "a Republican Form of Government", because she is a member of the Union and "[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government"[2646]—presumably to preserve the "Form of Government" which the State already has, but in the event that such "Form of Government" has been subverted or overthrown then to restore it to its proper character.

• Whatever else "a Republican Form of Government" may be, it must be "constructed on this principle, that the Supreme Power resides in the body of the people".[2647]

• So "a free State" must be one in which "the Supreme Power resides in the body of the people", because the government—which is a mere instrumentality of the "State"—can hardly be "constructed on th[at] principle" if the "State" herself is not.

• And because, in every form of "State", "free" or otherwise, inevitably the full measure and force of "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[2648] when "the Supreme Power resides in the body of the people" then "the body of the people" must control the guns.

• For that reason, "a free State" must base her "security" on "[a] well regulated Militia", because, by definition in America, "the body of the people, trained to arms" comprises "a well regulated militia".[2649]

Indeed, it should be self-evident from history that, as the government of "a free State", "a Republican Form of Government" in America must include a Militia "well regulated" pursuant to statutes that embody principles drawn from pre-constitutional practice.

> No particular government is designated [in the Constitution] as republican, neither is the exact form to be guaranteed, in any manner

---

[2646] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[2647] Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 457 (1793) (opinion of Wilson, J.).

[2648] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2649] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

> especially designated. Here, as in other parts of the instrument, we are compelled to resort elsewhere to ascertain what was intended.
>
> * * * * *
>
> The guaranty necessarily implies a duty on the part of the States themselves to provide such a government. All the States had governments when the Constitution was adopted. * * * These governments the Constitution did not change. They were accepted precisely as they were, and it is, therefore, to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the States to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form, within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution.[2650]

Besides having governments, all of the States had settled what were considered "well regulated Militia" when the Constitution was adopted. The Constitution neither abolished nor even materially changed these establishments. Rather, it explicitly incorporated them into its federal structure as "the Militia of the several States". All of these Militia were components of the States' governments, formed and operated according to certain principles embodied in the States' *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes. This constitutes "unmistakable evidence" of what were then, and what must be now, "well regulated Militia"—and that "a Republican Form of Government" in each State must incorporate within itself such "[a] well regulated Militia". Moreover, inasmuch as "[t]he guaranty [of a 'Republican Form of Government'] necessarily implies a duty on the part of the States themselves to provide such a government", that guarantee alone implies a duty for each of the several States to maintain "[a] well regulated Militia" as a permanent, integral part of her government. Thus, even without the Second Amendment "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" would be constitutionally protected within the guarantee of "a Republican Form of Government".

These conclusions must be true in every conceivable case in theory, too, as well as in actual historical fact. "A well regulated Militia", the Second Amendment declares, is "necessary to the security of a free State". If a "free State" actually exists, then it must already have some "security", and therefore must already have a Militia at least minimally "well regulated" for that purpose. In the extremely rare event that "a free State" comes into existence from nothing, the people having no preceding polity or government at all, the Militia must be created prior to or contemporaneously with the "free State", because at every moment of its existence "a free State" must have some "security" that only "[a] well regulated Militia" can provide. In contrast, if the "free State" arises only out of the abolition of a previously existing but abusive "Form of Government", which allowed the people no Militia, then the Militia must precede the "free State", because it is the means to establish the "free State" on the rubble of that bad "Government". If the Militia precedes or arises contemporaneously with the "free State", its authority must derive from some body of law higher, because it must operate earlier, than the laws of the "free State". Only from the people themselves—proceeding in conformity with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God"—could arise the authority for the people themselves to call forth the Militia from amongst themselves.

---

[2650] Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wallace) 162, 175-176 (1874).

So much the Tenth Amendment confirms. It provides that "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people".[2651] Some powers of sovereignty neither the United States nor the States, but only "the people" themselves, possess. In tranquil times, "the people" may find no occasion to exercise their unique powers, because other powers they have delegated to the United States or to the States suffice for the political tasks at hand. But when the General Government and the governments of the States are subverted by rogue public officials and turned against the people—when those governments, so corrupted, lie beyond all hope of redemption by the ordinary political means of honest elections and petitions for redress of grievances—then "the people" must exercise their reserved powers independently of and in opposition to each and every one of those rogue political establishments. And because at that point the restoration of "a free State", within each State and for the Union as a whole, will critically depend upon the Militia, the power to call themselves forth in the Militia on their own recognizance—and of necessary, too, to organize, arm, and discipline themselves in order to render the Militia effective—must be among "the people['s]" reserved powers, as a matter of explicit constitutional principle, as well as perforce of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".

b. "[T]he security of a free State". The phrase "the security of a free State" has two interconnected meanings. Obviously, it means "[p]rotection" and "defence" for the "free State" herself, as an institution, against all enemies, both external and internal.[2652] Yet not just any kind of "[p]rotection" and "defence" will do. Rather, the necessary "[p]rotection" and "defence" must be characterized by the immediacy, universality, totality, and pertinacity that only "[a] well regulated Militia"can provide. More subtly, "the security of a free State" refers as well to the very special type of "security" that only "a free State" can offer to her citizens. This is not simply "[s]afety" of a generic sort, which to some degree any "state" can manage to arrange, but instead that unique form of "[s]afety" characterized by every citizen's "certainty" and "confidence" in the permanent efficacy of a specific system of collective security aimed first and foremost at guaranteeing the people's

---

[2651] Emphasis supplied.

[2652] See S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 3 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

freedom—this "certainty and confidence" being bottomed upon an "assurance" of mutual aid made by the people, to and for themselves, in and through "[a] well regulated Militia"—and that "assurance" providing every member of the community with meaningful "freedom from fear" of a wholly uncertain future, because everyone knows that, whatever crisis may supervene, anyone can always depend upon everyone else to coöperate for the common defense.[2653]

Of course, in the final analysis, both of these aspects of the "security" with which the Second Amendment concerns itself are instrumental to an higher goal. The Constitution aims at preserving "the security of a free State", not for the sake of "a free State" alone, but so that each of the "free State's" inhabitants may be able to enjoy "Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness" to the fullest. In this, the Constitution serves to fulfill the Declaration of Independence: "[T]he right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is instrumental to "[a] well regulated Militia". "A well regulated Militia" is instrumental to "the security of a free State". "[A] free State" is instrumental to a government "instituted among Men" which derives its "just powers from the consent of the governed". And a government of this sort "secures" men's "unalienable Rights", in large measure through or with the support of the Militia.

Finally, inasmuch as the Second Amendment states no limitation in this regard, it encompasses every subject and form of "security" that the Militia can in principle provide by themselves or assist others in providing. This includes:

- Physical security—maintaining the "free State's" existence against all threats, through the deployment of military, para-military, police, fire-fighting, and emergency-services personnel.

- Economic security—maintaining the community's productivity and prosperity, through a well regulated free market with a sound currency, and provisions for the greatest possible degree of Local self-sufficiency with respect to food, health care, energy, and transportation.

- Political security—maintaining popular sovereignty, and limited, accountable, and responsible government, through supervision of honest elections and the exposure, purging, prosecution, and punishment of incompetent, corrupt, and criminal public officials. And even

- Social and cultural security—maintaining common, constructive attitudes within the community concerning the best ways to judge and to achieve a good life for all, through education and activism

---

[2653] See id., definitions 5, 2, 4, and 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

aimed at defeating "the long march through the institutions" by such destructive movements of the modern political underworld as cultural bolshevism and cultural fascism.[2654]

c. "A well regulated Militia". This phrase contains two components, the noun "Militia" and the adjectival phrase "well regulated". Self-evidently, the Amendment understands that a "Militia" could conceivably not be "well regulated", but that only a "Militia" which is "well regulated" in fact and law qualifies as "being necessary to the security of a free State". Moreover, the Amendment emphasizes that a "Militia" cannot be "well regulated" unless "the people" actually exercise in fact their "right" in law "to keep and bear Arms" without "infringe[ment]" from any quarter.

(1) "Militia". Plainly enough, when the Constitution empowers Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States",[2655] "the Militia" and "them" must refer to "the Militia" in the Constitution's next relevant clause: namely, "the Militia of the several States", of which the President "shall be Commander in Chief * * * when [they are] called into the actual Service of the United States".[2656] The "Militia of the several States" must include every "well regulated Militia * * * necessary to the security of a free State" of which the Second Amendment then speaks, and every "well regulated Militia" must be one of "the Militia of the several States", because each and every State in the Union (that is, "the several States", as the Constitution always describes them collectively[2657]) must be taken to be "a free State" within the Amendment's understanding of that term. Certainly, the Amendment did not purport to create "well regulated Militia" different from "the Militia of the several States", because it is not a delegation of new powers for either the General Government or the States, but instead is a

---

[2654] The subversive "long march" is usually associated with so-called "left-wing" movements of a Marxist cast. See, e.g., Antonio A. Santucci, Antonio Gramsci (New York, New York: Monthly Review Press, 2010). But it has also been employed by "right-wing" movements which the likes of Benito Mussolini, the proponents of Franklin D. Roosevelt's National Industrial Recovery Act, and the crooked characters who control the contemporary Federal Reserve System have promoted. Compare, e.g., An Act To provide for the establishment of Federal reserve banks, to furnish an elastic currency, to afford means of rediscounting commercial paper, to establish a more effective supervision of banking in the United States, and for other purposes ("Federal Reserve Act"), Act of 23 December 1913, CHAP. 6, 38 Stat. 251, with AN ACT To encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes ("National Industrial Recovery Act"), Act of 16 June 1933, CHAPTER 90, 48 Stat. 195. Doubtlessly, this is because "left wing" and "right wing" are simply deceptive labels used to conceal from the ignorant public that these two ostensibly opposed "wings" are in fact entirely complementary and mutual coöperant parts of the selfsame political bird of prey which aims to strip every common American of the "Life, Liberty and * * * pursuit of Happiness" the Declaration of Independence guarantees.

[2655] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2656] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[2657] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cls. 1 and 3, and § 8, cl. 3; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; art. IV, § 2, cl. 1; art. V; art. VI, cl. 3.

"declaratory and restrictive clause[ ]" calculated "to prevent misconstruction or abuse of [the original Constitution's] powers".[2658]

In addition, each "well regulated Militia" among "the Militia of the several States" must consist of "the people" of each State, because the Second Amendment guarantees "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in order to provide for "well regulated Militia"; and that "right" would not extend to "the people" as a whole unless "the people" as a whole were to participate in the Militia. So, "the Militia of the several States" that Congress is empowered "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining" must also be understood as consisting of "the people" as a whole in each of the States—which, of course, is entirely consistent with the *pre-*constitutional understanding, as exemplified in Virginia, that "a well regulated militia" is to be "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".[2659]

Finally, all "well regulated Militia" under the Constitution must always be governmental establishments, because they are none other than "the Militia of the several States", which were always governmental establishments during the *pre-*constitutional era, and were incorporated into the Constitution's federal system just as the Constitution found them. No Colonial or State "Militia" during *pre-*constitutional times had ever been a merely private establishment. Indeed, in the traditional Anglo-American understanding, no private group could ever have qualified as a "militia" at all, by definition, because it would not have been "the standing force of a nation".[2660]

(2) "[W]ell regulated". To Americans during the *pre-*constitutional period, the verb "regulate" meant "[t]o adjust by rule or method" and "[t]o direct".[2661] And the adverb "well" meant "[s]kilfully; properly"—"[i]t is used much in composition, to express any thing right, laudable, or not defective".[2662] By themselves, though, these general dictionary definitions are not conclusive of the constitutional question, because they do not specify by what "rule or method" the Militia are to be "adjust[ed]" and "direct[ed]", and in comparison to what standard any particular "adjust[ment]" and "direct[ion]" should be deemed "right, laudable, or not defective".

Legal definitions tend to be more precise than ordinary dictionary definitions. For example, "to regulate" in the constitutional sense means "to foster,

---

[2658] RESOLUTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS SUBMITTING TWELVE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION (4 March 1789), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1063.

[2659] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2660] See S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2661] Id., definitions 1 and 2 in both First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2662] Id., definition 3 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions; and definitions 13 in the First Edition and 16 in the Fourth.

protect, control and restrain, with appropriate regard for the welfare of those who are immediately concerned and of the public at large".[2663] Thus, there must exist "a real and substantial relation" between the "regulation" and "the suitable maintenance of th[e] service, or * * * the discharge of the responsibilities which inhere in it".[2664] Yet these, too, amount only to generalizations that, for correct application, must be placed squarely within a specific textual or other factual context.

The bare text of the Constitution provides some assistance. Although the original Constitution did not explicitly define "[a] well regulated Militia", it did so implicitly by listing those areas in which "regulation" was always to operate, and therefore was necessary for a Militia to be "well regulated": namely, "organizing", "arming", "disciplining", "governing", and "training".[2665] Nonetheless, this litany laid out no specific standards by which the suitability or sufficiency of any particular regulation in respect of any of these matters could be judged. To be sure, the Second Amendment then focused on one regulation—and from its being singled out in an Amendment adopted so early in the life of the Republic it must be deemed to be of the very highest importance—namely, that "the people" were always "to keep and bear Arms" without any "infringe[ment]". Yet even this declaration did not obviate the need for further investigation, because the Amendment did not explicitly define its terms.

Nonetheless, although the Constitution did not supply painstakingly detailed definitions, it cannot have left the meanings of its key terms—"well regulated", "organizing", "arming", "disciplining", "governing", "training", "the people", "keep", "bear", "Arms, and "infringe[ ]"—to be settled by the editors of popular dictionaries. When ratifying the Constitution in 1787 and 1788, WE THE PEOPLE would never have assigned to "the Militia of the several States" the vital responsibility and authority "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"[2666] without some measure of certainty that the Militia would always be "well regulated" for those tasks, and therefore without some expectation, firmly based on experience, as to how they would be "well regulated". As any American of that era could see on inspection, the Constitution's federal system itself precluded a delegation to Congress of unlimited discretion to fix—in any whimsical manner its Members might choose—all of the standards to be applied within the general categories of "organizing", "arming", "disciplining", "governing", [2663] Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U.S. 1, 47 (1912) ("regulate" as used in Article I, Section 8, Clause 3 of the Constitution).

---

[2664] Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railroad Company, 295 U.S. 330, 376 (1935) (Hughes, C.J., dissenting).

[2665] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2666] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

and "training". For the Militia incorporated in that system were "the Militia of the several States", already in existence throughout the country, not some new "Militia of the United States" the characteristics of which Congress would be entitled to stipulate. Yet the federal system also precluded unlimited authority for the States to regulate their Militia in some possibly slipshod fashion, because the Militia were constitutional establishments that might be "call[ed] forth" to "be employed in the Service of the United States",[2667] and on the preparedness of which the very survival of the Union might depend. Moreover, in ratifying the Second Amendment between 1789 and 1791, WE THE PEOPLE emphasized that the Militia must always and everywhere be sufficiently "well regulated" to be capable of fulfilling all of the duties "necessary to the security of a free State". In that context, the meaning of "well regulated" could not possibly have been treated as an empty vessel into which public officials, politicians, special-interest groups, legal theorists among the intelligentsia, or anyone else could in the future pour whatever tendentious or even spurious legalistic bellywash they might wish.

Immediately prior to the Constitution, the Articles of Confederation provided that "every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred".[2668] Once again, though, the document did not specify what "well" and "sufficiently" actually entailed. Instead, the Articles left to the States the responsibilities to fix and apply the necessary standards. Such an approach was perfectly satisfactory at that time, though, because the States were then fixing and applying adequate standards—and as States or Colonies had been doing so for more than a century theretofore—in a manner that was certain, consistent, comprehensive, and completely ascertainable, because it had been and was being written down in hundreds of Militia statutes enacted throughout the pre-constitutional period. These statutes supplied the actual, fully verifiable meaning of "well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred" as Americans had understood those terms for decades and even generations prior to ratification of the Articles, the Constitution, and the Bill of Rights.

This legal history formed the context in which the Articles, the Constitution, and the Second Amendment were adopted. It provided the standards according to which Militia were judged to be "well regulated"—standards which were already fixed, which had proven eminently workable over time, and with which everyone in every State was or could easily have become familiar. Indeed, the very source of the term "regulated" in respect of the Militia is the body of pre-constitutional Militia Acts.[2669] And the principles these Acts applied uniquely defined "well regulated"—or legislators would never have persisted in employing

---

[2667] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[2668] Art. VI, ¶ 4.

[2669] See ante, at 63-81.

them in one statute after another, decade after decade. So no need existed for the Articles, then the Constitution, and finally the Second Amendment to specify in detail what these standards were. The "well regulated and disciplined militia" required by the Articles; "the Militia of the several States" which the original Constitution incorporated into its federal system under the authority of Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining"; and the "well regulated Militia" the Second Amendment identified as "necessary to the security of a free State" then existed in fact within each of the several States, "well regulated" in both fact and law according to the principles developed, proven, and universally applied during *pre-*constitutional times. Thus, because they arose out of a long and consistent history, and their meanings were well known in fact and well settled in law, the words and phrases used in the Articles, in the original Constitution, and in the Second Amendment must be taken to have been used or incorporated by reference in the exact sense they had acquired during the *pre-*constitutional era.[2670] Surely WE THE PEOPLE would never have included "the Militia of the several States" as permanent parts of their federal system, and assigned explicitly to them alone the all-important responsibilities "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions", had they not believed, for good and sufficient reasons on adequate evidence, that those very Militia, as they existed in 1788 and were anticipated to continue to exist throughout the immediate future, were "well regulated" in both fact and law.

From the *pre-*constitutional Militia Acts, four salient principles of "[a] well regulated Militia" stand out:

> First, the Militia are governmental institutions, in and through which WE THE PEOPLE themselves directly exercise the sovereign "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[2671]
>
> Second, the Militia are always thoroughly organized, disciplined, and trained. Every able-bodied resident of the community from sixteen to fifty or sixty years of age has a duty to serve in some capacity that matches his abilities with the community's needs. An "unorganized militia" is constitutionally impossible.
>
> Third, every member of the Militia, not specially exempted for some reason supportive of "the common defence" and "the general Welfare",[2672] is required at all times to possess in his home (and usually to own as his personal property) at least one firearm, ammunition, and related

---

[2670] See, e.g., Kepner v. United States, 195 U.S. 100, 121-124 (1904).

[2671] Compare Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 454, 456 (opinion of Wilson, J.), 471-472 (opinion of Jay, C.J.) (1793), with Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2672] See U.S. Const. preamble.

accoutrements ("to keep * * * Arms"), and whenever necessary to bring forth that equipment into the field ("to * * * bear Arms").

Fourth, "Arms" should be suitable specifically for the most exacting forms of Militia service—and therefore at least equivalent to those the regular Armed Forces carry. In addition, "the people" should have access to any and all kinds of "Arms" that might be useful for any type of Militia service.

All of these principles the original Constitution addressed, in its incorporation of "the Militia of the several States" into its federal system, and in its delegation to Congress of the power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[2673] The third and fourth, though, are the Second Amendment's special concerns. To be sure, the Constitution does delegate to Congress the power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia".[2674] As a "declaratory and restrictive clause[ ]" designed "to prevent misconstruction or abuse of [the original Constitution's] powers",[2675] however, the Second Amendment points out, clarifies, and renders certain what should be obvious from the power itself: namely, that Congress labors under an affirmative duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia". Congress lacks any authority to fail, neglect, or refuse to perform this duty, let alone "[t]o provide for * * * [dis]arming * * * the Militia"—and its Members should be censured and punished for any dereliction or flouting of their duty. (Perhaps only moral and political culpability should attach to a mere failure; but every willful neglect or refusal should be treated as a criminal violation of every defaulting legislator's "Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution".[2676]) Of course, this duty may be fulfilled in various ways. Nonetheless, the ultimate effect must be that "the people" are fully armed at all times. This, because "the people" have "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms, [which] shall not be infringed". And that right would be "infringed" if Congress did not provide "Arms" itself, or did not allow the States to provide "Arms", or did not allow "the people" by themselves to provide "Arms" to and for themselves.

Now, under their pre-constitutional statutes, all but one of the Colonies and all of the independent States regulated their own Militia according to such principles. Under the Constitution, the matter is more complicated. During tranquil times, regulation of the Militia is appropriately left to public officials of the General Government and the States, as temporary agents for the permanent true sovereigns, [2673] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 and art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

---

[2674] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2675] RESOLUTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS SUBMITTING TWELVE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION (4 March 1789), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1063.

[2676] Compare U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3 with 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242.

WE THE PEOPLE. Presumably, "our elected representatives * * * know the law",[2677] and enact and enforce legislation with their constitutional powers and disabilities in mind.[2678] Thus, following a standard legal definition of "regulate",[2679] they will know that:

> • They must "foster" the Militia, by treating the power of Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia",[2680] and the equivalent reserved powers of the States,[2681] not simply as powers, but also as affirmative duties.[2682]
>
> • They must "protect" the Militia in their unique constitutional position and authority by maintaining their separation and independence from, and in some regards their superiority to, the regular Armed Forces. No purported "draft" or other form of impressment can be suffered to build up State "Troops" or a National "standing army" at the excessive expense of the Militia.[2683]
>
> • They must "control" the Militia through proper governance—by the provision of Congress, when some "Part of the[Militia] * * * may be employed in the Service of the United States"; and at all other times by the States.[2684] And,
>
> • They must "restrain" the Militia, so that no "Part of them * * * [will] be employed in the Service of the United States" except "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions",[2685] which necessarily entails immunizing the Militia from Congressional interference with their organization, armament, discipline, training, governance, and employment by the States for all other legitimate purposes.

All of this must be accomplished "with appropriate regard for the welfare of those who are immediately concerned and of the public at large"—so that, in the first step as well as the final analysis, every regulation of the Militia conduces directly to "the security of a free State". For such "appropriate regard" to be had, though, there must exist "a real and substantial relation" between the regulation and "the suitable maintenance of th[e] service, or * * * the discharge of the responsibilities which [2677] Cannon v. University of Chicago, 441 U.S. 677, 696-697 (1979).

---

[2678] See, e.g., Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333, 341-342 (1981).

[2679] See Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U.S. 1, 47 (1912).

[2680] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2681] Compare U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 with amends. II and X.

[2682] See ante, at 50-54.

[2683] See post, Chapter 49.

[2684] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 with amend. X.

[2685] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 15.

inhere in it".[2686] Thus, for example, a regulation purporting to consign most Americans to an "unorganized militia", or to impose "gun controls" that hinder common Americans from "keep[ing]" or "bear[ing] Arms", does not suitably maintain the service—because "[a] well regulated Militia" is always fully organized and fully armed, to the very last man or woman with the very last firearm. And a regulation purporting to separate Local police forces and kindred law-enforcement agencies from the Militia, or to excuse or even exclude the Militia from being deployed to seal America's borders against an influx of illegal aliens, does not suitably discharge the responsibilities which inhere in the Militia—because two of their most important functions are "to execute the Laws * * * and repel Invasions".[2687]

History teaches, moreover, that, even if they know (or should know) the law, rogue public officials often flout it in service of their own and their clients' corrupt or even criminal agenda—misusing the law in the name of the law in order to break the law, while denying everyone else the protection of the law against their violations of the law. A country as strong as the United States can withstand even a horde of such political rats gnawing at its legal foundations for a long time. Nevertheless, at some point, when sufficiently eaten away those foundations will finally crumble, and the social superstructure built upon them will collapse, as the inevitable and unavoidable political, economic, and cultural ill effects arising out of disloyal officials' disregard for their constitutional responsibilities engender ever-increasing turmoil.

At that point, Prudence would counsel that the Militia should be deployed. But because rogue officials have dominated the country for such an extended period of time, such deployment may not be possible through normal statutory procedures. Perhaps the Militia are not properly organized, armed, and disciplined, because Members of Congress and the States' legislators have failed, neglected, or refused to regulate them according to constitutional principles. Perhaps next to no constitutional Militia exist at all, because most Americans have been shunted off instead into an imaginary "unorganized militia". Perhaps a National para-military police-state apparatus—equivalent to the old Nazi Reichssicherheitshauptamt or the Communist East German Stasi or Romanian Securitate—is being set up; and Americans who simply advocate revitalization of the Militia are being denounced and demonized as "extremists" or even "domestic terrorists" in the print and electronic Pravda of the big media. Perhaps (as is true as of this writing) all of these conditions obtain at once. In each case, and especially the last, "the security of a free State" will be in jeopardy.

[2686] Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railroad Company, 295 U.S. 330, 376 (1935) (Hughes, C.J., dissenting).

[2687] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

Nonetheless, even were the Constitution in practical abeyance because WE THE PEOPLE'S enemies had subverted or seized control over most of the governmental apparatus, the situation would be far from hopeless. For, through the Militia, THE PEOPLE could legitimately assert the principles of the Declaration of Independence in their own defense. The Second Amendment, after all, does not itself grant "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"—rather, it recognizes that right as independently existing. And the Amendment does not guarantee that right simply for the sake of enabling "the people" to possess firearms, but instead in order for them to participate in "well regulated Militia"—so that they themselves can exercise the "'political power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'", and thereby live in and enjoy the benefits of "a free State".

Now, inasmuch as the Constitution is "the supreme Law" of a "Union" composed of "free State[s]",[2688] and inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", therefore "well regulated Militia" throughout the States are necessary to maintain the purity, authority, and efficacy of the Constitution as America's "Form of Government". The Declaration of Independence attests, however, that "any Form of Government [may] become[ ] destructive of the[true] ends" for the attainment of which "Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed"—and at that juncture arises "the Right of People to alter or to abolish" such "Form of Government". Thus, the Declaration asserts the right of "the governed", not simply "to throw off" a bad government in its entirety ("to abolish"), but also to reform a wayward government and to restore a corrupted government to its original rectitude ("to alter"). Presumably, because "Prudence * * * will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes", any such reform and restoration should be, if they can be, accomplished as much as possible through the existing "Form of Government".[2689]

"[T]he Militia of the several States" are integral components of America's federal "Form of Government". They are quintessentially governmental establishments, because through them "the people" directly exercise the greatest power of government, the Power of the Sword. So, even if America's "Form of Government" has otherwise been corrupted, nonetheless it has not completely failed while the Militia can still be deployed in its defense. The question then reduces to: "Who may exercise the authority to regulate the Militia under such circumstances?"

The answer is not "public officials, and they alone"—so that a failure, neglect, or refusal of legislators to revitalize the Militia precludes WE THE PEOPLE from acting on their own initiative. If public officials refuse to take the steps necessary to provide for "well regulated Militia"—and particularly if they attempt to disarm common Americans through one form of "gun control" or another—they are most likely rogues who intend to usurp power and tyrannize over the citizenry. In which case, THE PEOPLE have the right and the duty to oppose them in self-defense. Effective resistance—through deterrence, defeat, and deposition of such rogues—will require the deployment of "well regulated Militia". In these circumstances, THE PEOPLE as sovereigns can regulate themselves in their own Militia under the aegis of powers the Constitution reserves to them.[2690] Rather than being in any sense illegal or even extra-legal, this will be governmental regulation by the supreme governors themselves for the purpose of protecting their own government. By this action, merely incompetent public officials may be brought to their senses. And the rogues who will not learn the error of their ways will be brought to justice.

---

[2688] Compare U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2 with art. IV, § 4 and with amend. II.

[2689] See ante, Chapter 32.

Nonetheless, before WE THE PEOPLE deploy themselves in Militia "well regulated" through their own efforts, they must explore every other available avenue of political redress and reform—particularly through exercise of "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances", by demanding the enactment of statutes to revitalize the Militia;[2691] and then through the electoral process of replacing incompetent or rogue officials with qualified and loyal ones, so that such demands will be satisfied. But if no positive results are obtained in one or two iterations of the electoral cycle and legislative sessions, while at the same time oppression continues unabated or even intensifies, then—as should be obvious to anyone conversant with American history of the 1770s—THE PEOPLE must turn to direct action.

d. "[T]he people". Who, though, are "the people" to whom the Second Amendment refers? This term, too, finds no explicit definition either in the original Constitution or in the Second Amendment (or, for that matter, in any other Amendment). For that reason, its definition must be gleaned from the textual and historical context.

(1) A variety of uses in the Constitution. Constitutional construction in this particular is not always straightforward. Other than in the Second Amendment, the original Constitution and its Amendments employ the term "the people" in various senses, indicating different groups, some more inclusive than others. Yet, in all cases, "the people" are composed of individual human beings who perform the actual actions, or enjoy the benefits, to which the document refers:

(a) The Constitution's Preamble asserts that "WE THE PEOPLE * * * do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America". These are the sovereign PEOPLE, THE PEOPLE who exercise supreme and permanent political authority—specifically, the right, power, and privilege to form and control governments on behalf both of themselves directly and of all others in the polity in a representative capacity. Typically, they are the individuals qualified to vote (as opposed as minors, resident aliens, and citizens who have been lawfully deprived of that right).[2692] In this case, the ultimate result—"ordain[ing] and establish[ing] th[e] Constitution" in 1787 and 1788—was the product of a necessarily collective effort, but was accomplished through the specific actions of identifiable individuals in and through various State Conventions.

[2690] See U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

[2691] See U.S. Const. amends. I and II.

(b) The Constitution refers to "the People of the several States" who choose the Members of the House of Representatives "every second Year"—but simultaneously it distinguishes these "People" from the actual "Electors in each State", thus establishing that the "Electors" are a sub-set of "the People" who act on behalf of "the People" as a whole (again, because "the People" includes minors and others who lack "the Qualifications requisite for Electors").[2693] Here, too, the ultimate result—choosing the Members of the House of Representatives—is the product of a necessarily collective effort, but is accomplished through the specific actions of particular individuals in voting booths throughout this country "every second Year".

(c) The First Amendment guarantees "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances". True enough, some among "the[se] people" must act collectively and coöperatively if they are "to assemble" for the purpose of "petition[ing] the Government". Yet no one has ever proffered a convincing argument that a single individual, acting alone, cannot claim the selfsame "right * * * to petition" as one of "the people".[2694] Neither has anyone ever proven that a minor, an individual citizen lawfully deprived of the right to vote, a person convicted of any crime (whether or not imprisoned), or even a resident alien cannot claim "the right * * * to petition * * * the Government", either by himself or in concert with others of like or unlike character. So they, too, must be components of "the people" for the purposes of this Amendment.

(d) The Fourth Amendment protects "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures". Here, collective action is entirely irrelevant. "The right of the people" is the right of each and every individual among "the people" who can justifiably

---

[2692] See, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 1; and amends. XIV, § 1, XV, XIX, and XXVI.

[2693] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 1.

[2694] Through its reference to "people peaceably * * * assembl[ing]" in groups of indeterminate size, the Amendment intended to break with the old English limitation "that no petition * * * for any alterations in church or state, shall be signed by above twenty persons, unless the matter thereof be approved by three justices of the peace or the major part of the grand jury * * * : nor shall any petition be presented by more than ten persons at a time". W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 143.

complain of an "unreasonable search[ ] and seizure[ ]", even if he is the only person in the entire world subjected to it. Moreover, an individual need not be an adult, a qualified voter, a person with no record of criminal convictions, or even a citizen or resident alien to avail himself of "[t]he right" this Amendment secures.

(e) The Ninth Amendment declares that "[t]he enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people". Although the Amendment identifies none of these "certain rights", some of them must be the rights of solitary individuals, unconnected to any particular groups, in the same way that "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures" is a right of individuals. Of course, the number of individuals entitled to any of these "certain rights" depends upon the nature of the particular "right" at issue.

(f) The Tenth Amendment provides that "[t]he powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people". In legal parlance, of course, the word "power[ ]" refers to an ability to create or change particular legal relations—extending from "sovereign power" (to create, alter, or abolish an entire "Form of Government"), through "legislative power" (to enact or repeal laws), to "personal power" (to make private contracts, transfer ownership or use of property, and so on). Thus, depending upon what particular "power[ ]" may be involved, "the people" in this Amendment could be taken in either a collective or an individual sense—although, ultimately, the "power[ ]", whatever it may be, will always be exercised in fact by an identifiable individual or some requisite number of individuals. And, if a group or an individual is invested with a "power[ ]", the members of that group or that individual typically may claim a corresponding "right" to exercise that "power[ ]". And,

(g) The Seventeenth Amendment declares that "[t]he Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years". Self-evidently, "the people" referenced here are the same "People of the several States" who participate directly or vicariously in elections of Members of the House of Representatives (discussed immediately above)—and therefore identical considerations of constitutional construction should apply.

(2) In the Second Amendment specifically. The Second Amendment declares that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed".

(a) The text of the Amendment establishes that the purpose of "the right" is to enable "the people" to serve in "well regulated Militia", by guaranteeing their ability "to keep and bear [those] Arms" necessary and sufficient for that result. "A well regulated Militia" is, of course, a collective undertaking; but it requires for its success individual participation of a specific kind. So, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is both "a collective right" with respect to the end ("[a] well regulated Militia") and "an individual right" with respect to the means ("keep[ing] and bear[ing] Arms"). As Virginia correctly declared, "a well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".[2695] As such, "a well regulated militia" does not necessarily include every single soul in the community. For "the body of the people" means, not all, but "[a] collective mass; a joint power" and "[t]he main part; the bulk".[2696] Nonetheless, inasmuch as "the body of the people" imports "the main, central, or principal part" and "[a] number of individuals spoken of collectively, usually as united by some common tie, or as organized for some purpose; a collective whole or totality",[2697] "the people" to whom the Second Amendment refers surely includes everyone who is capable of serving in the Militia—even if, perforce of some legitimate exemption, a particular individual is not required to serve in the same manner or to the same degree as others.

On the grounds of political philosophy, too, because "the people" to whom the Amendment refers are always to be armed as individuals, and collectively are to supply "the security of a free State"—thus exercising the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'" for a just purpose[2698]—those "people" must be identified with WE THE PEOPLE, who are the true sovereigns in this country.[2699] For, as Aristotle taught in his taxonomy of forms of government, "in a democracy the supreme power is lodged in the whole people"; "[w]hen the citizens at large govern for the public good, it is called a state"; and although it will be "almost impossible to meet with the majority of a people eminent for every virtue", "if there is one common to a whole nation it is valour * * * for which reason in such a state the profession of arms will always have the greatest share in the government".[2700]

Self-evidently, "the people" in the Second Amendment is a term more inclusive than "the people" in the typical political sense of qualified voters, because even those citizens who cannot vote at all (such as minors from sixteen to eighteen years of age), or who have lawfully been deprived of the right to vote (as the result of their convictions for some crimes), can and usually must serve in the Militia. On the other hand, "the people" in the Second Amendment is a term less inclusive

---

[2695] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[2696] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 5 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions, and definitions 9 in the First Edition and 8 in the Fourth Edition.

[2697] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 162, definitions 2 and 5. Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 303, at 301, definitions 2 and 13.

[2698] Compare and contrast Declaration of Independence ("Governments * * * deriv[e] their just powers from the consent of the governed") with Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61 ("[t]he seizure of power by armed force, the settlement of the issue by war, is the central task and the highest form of revolution").

[2699] See Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dallas) 419, 454, 456 (opinion of Wilson, J.), 471-472 (opinion of Jay, C.J.) (1793).

[2700] Politics, Book III, Chapters VI and VII, in A TREATISE ON GOVERNMENT OR, THE POLITICS OF ARISTOTLE, ante note 73, at 76 and 79.

than "the people" for whom the First Amendment guarantees "the right * * * to petition", because (for example) minors of less than sixteen years of age, individuals sentenced to "slavery * * * as a punishment for crime",[2701] and persons punished with permanent disarmament as the consequence of being "convicted of Treason"[2702] can be excluded or disbarred from service in the Militia, but nevertheless can "petition the Government for a redress of [their] Grievances". Similarly, "the people" in the Second Amendment is a concept narrower than "the people" mentioned in the Fourth Amendment, because (for instance) little children, individuals convicted of certain crimes, and otherwise eligible adults who are physically or mentally disabled may be exempted or excluded from the Militia altogether, whereas persons within all of those categories retain the right "to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures".

(b) The same conclusions flow from consideration of the historical context in which the Second Amendment arose. Under the Colonies' and independent States' pre-constitutional Militia Acts, "the body of the people" with a duty to serve included every adult able-bodied free White male from sixteen to fifty or sixty years of age. Some of these individuals were granted certain exemptions, because they held important public offices, were engaged in critical private occupations, or were conscientious objectors—but the very necessity that they be explicitly exempted proved that they labored under an original duty to serve. Children, as well as adults with severe physical, mental, or emotional impairments, were excluded from the Militia because they were simply incapable of performing any requisite duty. Superannuated free males were exempted because of the quite reasonable presumption that most of them were physically or mentally incapable of useful service (although no Militia Act ever precluded anyone of advanced years who was actually fit for duty from volunteering for it). Slaves (and often free people of color, too) were excluded from the Militia because they were considered alien to "the people" in every sense of those terms; whereas disloyal citizens through their own misbehavior forfeited any claim to be counted among "the people" for any purpose. Finally, women were never explicitly excluded from the Militia, but were exempted from all but the duty to provide certain kinds of financial assistance. This exemption was based on three considerations: namely, that (i) women were not as physically capable as men of performing arduous Militia duties; (ii) women were not considered part of "the people" politically, because of various legal disabilities, including most prominently the lack of any legal claim to a right to vote, and therefore had no claim to wield the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'"; and (iii) social, cultural, and religious mores treated women as the subjects, not the providers, of protection, and therefore strongly disapproved of women's service in the field under arms.

---

[2701] See U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1. See ante, at 748-749, 993-998, and 1011-1013.

[2702] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1. See ante, at 748-749 and 814-821.

Today, except in regard to women, the same practical definition of "the people" with respect to "[a] well regulated Militia" and "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" should obtain.

• Every able-bodied male from sixteen to sixty years of age (or perhaps beyond, because such ranges are inevitably practical matters) would always be included, notwithstanding that some of them might be granted various exemptions. Able-bodied males above sixty would always be included if they volunteered for service, and could be required to serve in times of extreme danger (or "alarms", as the pre-constitutional terminology put it).

• Children generally, and those adults with utterly incapacitating physical ailments or mental impairments, would justifiably be excluded from "the people", because of the impossibility of their participation in the Militia.

• Adults with minor afflictions would be exempted from most duties, but could still perform some Militia functions—at the least the possession of firearms suitable for personal self-defense, which, being the immediate execution of the laws against aggressors, is part of Militia service—and therefore they would be included within "the people".

• "[P]art[ies]" who were held in "slavery * * * as a punishment for crime whereof the[y] * * * shall have been duly convicted"[2703] would be excluded from "the people" (as that term relates to the Militia), because the primary "badge and incident" of slavery is personal disarmament, and with it the loss of all possible political rights, powers, privileges, and immunities.

• Individuals "convicted of Treason" could be excluded from "the people", because "Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason",[2704] which could include the imposition of slavery; and, even in the absence of such a sentence, personal disarmament often coupled with loss of a citizen's political status were typical punishments visited on disloyal persons during the pre-constitutional era, and therefore could be imposed today.

• As for women, today nothing precludes either their inclusion in the Militia in some capacities or their complete exemption from any and every duty not deemed suitable for them—in particular, actual service in the field as combatants.[2705] On the one hand, considerations of natural physical capabilities (or, more accurately put, limitations) still counsel restricting the rôles of women in any "well regulated Militia" by granting them extensive exemptions from various kinds of arduous service. On the other hand, if "the people" in *pre-*constitutional times embraced only free men—because only free men were eligible to vote in principle (even if not all of them in practice were allowed to vote for one sometimes invidious reason or another)—that constraint could apply only until women were included among "the people" in the political sense by being granted the right to vote—a process that ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment completed in 1920.[2706] So, even if the provisions relating to the Militia in the original Constitution and the Second Amendment needed revision in order to bring women within "the people" in relation to "[a] well regulated Militia", the Nineteenth Amendment performed that task. Furthermore, social and cultural mores with respect to women have changed significantly since the *pre-*constitutional era. And any purely religious tenets as to their exclusion from "the people" for purposes of "well regulated Militia" can no longer be embodied in law.[2707]

---

[2703] U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1.

[2704] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cls. 1 and 2.

(3) No "select militia" possible. This definition of "the people" proves beyond cavil the constitutional impossibility of a so-called "select militia". A "select militia" is always one composed, not of "the people" in the broad sense just explained, but of a relatively small segment of the community—with everyone else excluded from this ersatz "militia" or simply left in an "unorganized" condition. The members of a "select militia" may perhaps be chosen on the basis of some bona fide consideration for the efficiency of the service—such as that young men are better suited than old ones for arduous duty in the field. But they may also be picked on the basis of invidious economic or social discriminations—so that poor and obscure individuals end up performing the hard and dangerous work, while their rich and prominent fellow-citizens shirk those duties. Or they may be enrolled even to serve politically subversive ends—such as creating a compact armed force loyal to an entrenched Establishment in order to cow and put down dissenters. Had any such "select militia" ever been considered legally or politically desirable or even possible in *pre-*constitutional times when the regulation of the Militia was a matter purely of statute (which apparently none ever had been), it would be self-evidently unlawful now.

[2705] See, e.g., Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57 (1981) (Congress may limit registration for the Selective Service System to men, because Congressional policy excludes women from combat assignments in the Armed Forces).

[2706] U.S. Const. amend. XIX provides that "[t]he right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex".

[2707] See U.S. Const. amend. I.

(a) The Second Amendment guarantees "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in order to ensure the continuation of "well regulated Militia" throughout America. Thus, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" entails "the right of the people" to "well regulated Militia". And because "well regulated Militia" are establishments in which "the people" themselves participate, "the people" must enjoy a "right" to such participation that (as the Amendment promises) "shall not be infringed". The Amendment does not in any way limit "the people" to a select few. Therefore, all of "the people" must enjoy "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", the right to "well regulated Militia", and the right themselves to serve in such Militia with their own "Arms" in their own hands. By its very operation, though, a "select militia" absolutely denies—and therefore by any possible definition of the word "infringe[s]"—the right of many (if not most) of "the people" to participate in the Militia. Therefore, a "select militia" is unconstitutional.

If "[a] well regulated Militia" could be nothing more than a "select militia", consisting of far less than "the people" as a whole, then "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" would be unnecessary. Indeed, in that case the whole concept of a constitutional "right * * * to keep and bear Arms"—that is, a "right" of individuals the substance of which is not determined by, but is fully enforceable against, public officials—would be nonsensical. For then the only "people" with a need for a "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" would be the relatively few particular individuals public officials selected to constitute their "select militia". And "the right of th[ose few] people" would come into existence only with, and thereafter would depend entirely upon, that selection—that is, upon the decisions of those officials. Thus, it would be no constitutional right at all, but rather some species of governmental grant or license. From being a constraint on the powers of public officials, the Second Amendment would be transmogrified into a limitless expansion of those powers!

(b) The foregoing analysis undeniably applies to Congress, because everyone agrees that the Second Amendment limits Congress's powers, including its power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[2708] Because the Second Amendment applies to the States as well as to the General Government,[2709] it precludes them, too, from organizing "select militia". But even if (as some people erroneously contend) the Second Amendment did not apply to the States, they would nevertheless be powerless to organize "select militia", either on their own or with the consent of Congress. After all, through the General Government the United States enjoy the right to call upon the entirety of "the Militia of the several States" to "be employed in the Service of the United States" if the circumstances so warrant. Because "a well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms",[2710] or (from another perspective) consists of "the people" who exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms",[2711] the United States have the right to call upon "the body" of those "people" as a whole. Therefore, as against the United States, no State can claim any right, power, or privilege to create a "select militia" which would withhold any portion of "the body of the people" from "the Service of the United States".[2712] Now, the constitutional right of the United States to call upon "the people" as a whole necessarily entails a corresponding constitutional duty incumbent upon every constituent of "the people" to come forth when called forth in the Militia in order to "be employed in the Service of the United States". No State may prevent any individual constituent of "the people" within her jurisdiction from fulfilling this duty by refusing to enroll him in a "select militia". Therefore, every individual among "the people" enjoys a right as against his State not to be excluded from a "select militia"—which right, in effect, denies the State the ability to create a "select militia" at all.

---

[2708] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2709] See post, at 1504-1529.

At first blush, to denote an individual's duty to serve in the Militia as encompassing a "right" may seem strange. But fulfillment of that duty enables each individual to participate, on an equal basis with all others, in the exercise of popular sovereignty, the supreme "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'"[2713]—which is a consequential "right" by any standard. A "select militia" is "select" precisely because it does not include everyone within "the body of the people". Thus, a "select militia" necessarily deprives some of "the people"—usually, the vast majority of "the people"—of the opportunity actually to function as sovereigns in the most direct and puissant sense of that term. A "select militia", then, is a means of political discrimination which leads to effective political disenfranchisement of the individuals not "selected". Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, however, declares that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws". The "law[ ]" which protects all of "the people" from being excluded from a State's "select militia" is, of course, the Constitution itself, which implicitly defines "[a] well regulated Militia" as composed of "the body of the people, trained to arms" or "the people" who enjoy "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms", without exception. Therefore, no State can create a "select militia" without deny[ing] * * * equal protection of th[at] law[ ]" to those among "the people" whom she does not "select". Moreover, Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment delegates to Congress the "power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of [Section 1]". This power imposes a corresponding duty upon Congress

---

[2710] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2711] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[2712] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2713] See Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

to prevent any State from creating a "select militia",[2714] because Congress cannot sit idly by and suffer any State to violate the Constitution, not only when the Constitution explicitly empowers Congress to prevent such a violation, but especially when that violation undermines the power of Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia". And if Congress labors under a duty to prevent each and every State from setting up a "select militia", it cannot on any rational constitutional calculus be privileged to encourage, allow, enable, or assist—let alone command—the States to do so.

(c) All this is not to say, however, that the Constitution disallows the creation of any and all distinct subdivisions within "[a] well regulated Militia", specially organized, equipped, and trained on an appropriately selective basis—such as were the Rangers and the Minutemen in pre-constitutional times, and such as should be State and Local Sheriffs' departments, police forces, fire-fighters, and emergency-response outfits today.[2715] For these would constitute "selections from within the Militia", not "selections for the Militia". "[T]he Militia" and "well regulated Militia" would still consist of "the people" as a whole, only with some of "the people" deployed in special-service units for which they were peculiarly fitted, and the rest of "the people" assigned to more general duties.

(4) Individuals not eligible to participate in the Militia. From the foregoing, does it follow that individuals not classified as within "the people"—that is, who are not eligible to participate in the Militia—can claim no constitutional "right * * * to keep and bear Arms"? Hardly. The number of Americans who are truly not eligible to participate in "the Militia of the several States" is quite small.

(a) Few individuals are so severely physically disabled as to be utterly incapable of performing any useful service in the Militia. Of course, if they are incapable of service, then they are ineligible. Their conditions exclude them. A statute that required them to serve would demand the impossible, and therefore would be unconstitutional as patently irrational legislation.[2716] In those instances in which the debilitating conditions might be cured or mitigated, the disabilities could be treated as the bases for exemption, rather than exclusion. These, however, would be exemptions that the individuals could not waive, because their attempted participation in a State's Militia while still debilitated would create all sorts of administrative difficulties that would undermine its being "well regulated". In any

---

[2714] See ante, at 50-54.

[2715] See ante, at 327-328, 1135-1138, 1194-1202, 1276-1277, and 1291-1293, and post, at 1482-1488.

[2716] See U.S. Const. amends. V and XIV, § 1. See, e.g., United States v. Carolene Products Company, 304 U.S. 144, 152-154 (1938); Borden's Farm Products Company v. Baldwin, 293 U.S. 204, 208-213 (1934); and Covington & Lexington Turnpike Road Company v. Sandford, 164 U.S. 578, 595-597 (1896) (a statute may always be challenged on the grounds that it lacks a rational basis as applied to the particular complainant, and therefore denies him due process of law, or equal protection of the laws, or both).

event, some severely physically disabled individuals might nonetheless be able to use a firearm for self-protection in their own homes or places of employment. On that score, they would be performing a Militia service, and would have the "right" to possess that firearm as members of "the people". If, however, an individual were so physically disabled that he could not use a firearm at all, then for him to claim membership in a group with a "right * * * to * * * bear Arms" would be nonsensical. One cannot exercise a personal right to do what he physically cannot do. On the other hand, even a physically disabled individual could claim a "right to keep * * * Arms", in the sense of mere ownership and possession of personal property, for any other legitimate reason.

Individuals suffering from incapacitating mental defects or diseases are not truly "free". They are always someone's wards, subject to and needful of protection, never the source of their own or anyone else's protection. So, being unable to protect even themselves, and therefore not being part of "the people" even to the limited degree that derives from one's ability to engage in self-defense, they are not deprived of any right if they are not allowed to possess a firearm. Moreover, as their conditions preclude them from being sentient participants in WE THE PEOPLE'S sovereignty, they can claim no right to the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[2717] and therefore no right to possess "a gun" on that score, either.

(b) Children under (say) sixteen years of age have always been deemed unqualified for the Militia by dint of their presumed physical, mental, and emotional immaturity. And under normal circumstances, underage children who might happen to be sufficiently mature to serve have nonetheless not been enlisted. (Presumably, though, during "alarms" that threatened the community's survival, any child who could serve in some useful capacity would be allowed, if not required, to serve, no matter his age.) Although selecting any age in the mid-teens as the threshold for entry into the Militia draws something of an arbitrary line, the validity of some exclusion on that basis cannot be seriously questioned. Of course, this exclusion could also be seen as merely a temporary exemption, because most children do grow up.

In any event, any "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" for underage children can, and in the nature of things usually should, be different from "the right of the people". Because of their perceived immaturity, and the impracticality of making prior individualized determinations in every possibly disputable case, the possession of "Arms" by such children may be regulated in ways beyond what is allowable in relationship to "the people" who are eligible for service in "well regulated Militia". Yet the validity of any such regulation cannot be predicated upon "an irrebuttable presumption often contrary to fact",[2718] or on "a permanent and irrebuttable presumption" that "is not necessarily or universally true in fact, * * * when the [governmental official with jurisdiction over the matter] has reasonable alternative means of making the crucial determination".[2719]

---

[2717] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

During their early years children's access to firearms should be tailored to their capabilities and closely supervised. But, because most of them will eventually be integrated within the Militia, all of them should be allowed the maximum exposure to arms consistent with their abilities to profit from the training and experience. Thus, their right with respect to firearms should include a right to training in schools (both public and private), at private shooting ranges and clubs, and in governmentally sponsored Militia auxiliaries for youth. Certainly, too, all children should enjoy a thoroughgoing right not to be exposed to the libertycidal inanity (even insanity) of so-called "zero tolerance" for firearms that pervades America's public educational establishments today, and poisons the minds and hearts of youth against the one institution and its implements that the Constitution declares to be "necessary" for their "security [in] a free State".

(5) Individuals exempted from the Militia. Individuals exempted from the Militia for mild physical or mental handicaps, or simply old age, nonetheless remain eligible, and perhaps immediately liable, for service. So they are part of "the people", even if their exemptions license them not to possess any arms at all. Conscientious objectors, for example, can always change their minds. Even so, does their "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" as part of "the people" allow them to possess "Arms" not suitable for Militia service?

In pre-constitutional America, the requirement that Militiamen personally possessed arms suitable for their Militia service precluded no one from possessing either more or better arms than were necessary for that purpose, or arms not suitable for Militia service but that might be put to other lawful purposes. Neither did the requirement that Militiamen personally possessed arms suitable for their Militia service entail disarmament of anyone who reached the upper limit of age at which his compulsory participation was no longer statutorily mandated, or who became too disabled to serve at any age. Nor were such individuals ever prohibited from acquiring new firearms after their compulsory participation in the Militia ceased. Nor, for that matter, were adult women, whose gender exempted them from almost all Militia duties, ever prohibited from possessing firearms for any legitimate purpose. Indeed, it is impossible to imagine how modern "gun control" could have operated in communities in which every free adult able-bodied White male was required by statute to possess in his own home at least one firearm and a large supply of ammunition—and in which the common law held that the natural right of self-defense, effectuated with whatever lawful implements are at hand, "is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[2720] So, being part and parcel of the practical definition of "the right of the people" with respect to "well regulated Militia", what were the statutory requirements then must continue to be the rules now that those Militia and that "right" have been incorporated into the Constitution.

---

[2718] United States Department of Agriculture v. Murry, 413 U.S. 508, 514 (1973).

[2719] Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441, 452 (1973).

e. "[T]he right * * * to keep and bear Arms". The meaning of "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" has been made far more complex, confusing, and controversial than it really is.

(1) "[T]he right". A "right" can be defined most generally as "[a] legal relation between two persons" that entails "[a]n enforceable claim [by one] to performance (action or forbearance) by another".[2721] As opposed to the amorphous term "a right", which often leaves to speculation exactly whom the parties to and what the anticipated performance of a "legal relation" may be, "the right" as the Second Amendment employs that term implies "[a]n enforceable claim" (or, more descriptive of the actual complexity of the situation, "claim[s]") the specific parties to and the content, extent, and effect of which are so well understood in context that they require no elaborate explicit definition.

(2) The subjects and substance of "the right". The subjects of "the right" fall into two obvious classes: (i) the parties whose freedom of action with respect to "Arms" and to participation in "well regulated Militia" it protects—namely, "the people"; and (ii) the parties whose freedom of action in regard to those particulars it constrains—namely, in most cases rogue public officials, but potentially anyone whose aberrant behavior might "infringe[upon]" "the people['s]" freedom.[2722]

When they ratified the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights, WE THE PEOPLE knew—most of them from personal experience—that the substance of "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" was to be found in America's *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes in that pattern of behavior relative to firearms that had proven itself necessary for the formation and maintenance of "well regulated Militia" throughout this country's history. In particular, the requirement that every adult able-bodied free White male (not a conscientious objector or otherwise specially exempted) should always maintain personal possession in his own home of at least one firearm and ammunition suitable for Militia service ("keep * * * Arms"), and be ready to bring that equipment into the field whenever called forth to duty ("bear Arms").[2723]

[2720] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

[2721] A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 167.

[2722] The Amendment's prohibition against "infringe[ment]" will be analyzed post, at 1386-1398.

[2723] The specific meanings of "Arms", "keep", and "bear", will be examined in detail post, at 1353-1386.

In order to secure for themselves the permanent benefits of "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" as Americans had always understood and applied it, THE PEOPLE knew that they had to render its meaning, as well as the meanings of "[a] well regulated Militia" and "a free State", utterly independent of and immune from misconstruction and manipulation by anyone and everyone in public office in both the General Government and the governments of the several States as well—because "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" (not any discretionary power of public officials) made "[a] well regulated Militia" possible, and therefore formed the foundation for "the security of a free State". If "the right" were merely "a right" the substance of which Congress or the States' legislatures determined, those bodies could never "infringe[ ]" it, because its very definition would depend entirely upon legislators' discretion, or the prodding of factions and other private special-interest groups. And then even the meanings of "[a] well regulated Militia" and "a free State" could be transmogrified at the will of whomever happened to hold public office. To forefend this possibility, THE PEOPLE declared that "the right * * * shall not be infringed", without any limitation as to whom that prohibition extended, or any allowance for purportedly special circumstances under which it might be deemed to be inoperative, or especially any license for anyone to redefine "the right" so that it could effectively be denied through verbal legerdemain. Thus, in one fell swoop, the Second Amendment preëmptively snatched from the rhetorical armamentarium of false judges the perverse modern doctrines of "reasonable regulation", "compelling governmental interests" and "least-restrictive alternatives", and "the living Constitution" where "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is concerned.

(3) A personal constitutional "duty". Besides being "the right" of each and every individual counted among "the people", the constitutional relationship of Americans to "Arms" also sounds in a personal duty. When a Militia is "well regulated" by statute as the Constitution requires, everyone among "the people", not properly exempted, must "keep and bear Arms" suitable for his particular service, or be subject to some punishment.[2724] Indeed, because a fully armed citizenry is necessary for "[a] well regulated Militia" and "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", the primary constitutional right should be framed as the right of each constituent of "the people" to fulfill his duty "to keep and bear Arms" in order to be capable of serving in the Militia. If such a statute has not been enacted, the duty has not been perfected. Nonetheless, everyone among "the people" is liable or exposed to the creation of the duty through some future exercise of legislative authority.[2725] And everyone has a political and moral duty to press for enactment of such a statute, and in the interim to take appropriate direct action, such as by arming himself through the free market.

[2724] See A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 167.

[2725] See id. at 169-170.

Inasmuch as neither the original Constitution nor the Second Amendment defined the term "Militia", its meaning must be drawn from the great mass of pre-constitutional Colonial and State Militia statutes. A salient principle of these statutes was that every member of "the body of the people" was a member of the Militia, and every member of the Militia, not specially exempted for some good and sufficient reason supportive of the common defense and the general welfare, was required at all times to possess in his own home at least one firearm, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements suitable for Militia service ("to keep * * * Arms"), and whenever necessary to bring forth that equipment into the field ("to * * * bear Arms"). Thus, what the Second Amendment later described as "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" was first and foremost a duty. Yet it was a right as well—because, if an individual has a duty of citizenship, embodied in law, "to keep and bear Arms", he must as well have a corresponding right to do so, protected against any interference not only from rogue public officials but also from other private citizens.

When the Constitution incorporated into its federal structure "the Militia of the several States" just as they existed at that time,[2726] this explicit statutory duty and implicit statutory right became a constitutional duty and right, respectively. The first clause in the Second Amendment focuses on the locus of the duty (service in "[a] well regulated Militia") and the second clause on the right instrumental thereto ("to keep * * * and bear Arms"). "[T]he right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is simply the constitutional guarantee that "the people" can freely engage in the behavior that conduces to the presence, at all times, of "[a] well regulated Militia" in each State—namely, the personal possession in his own home by every adult able-bodied individual (not a conscientious objector) of at least one firearm and ammunition suitable for Militia service. The purpose of "the right" is to guarantee that all of "the people" possibly eligible for the Militia will always be able to fulfill their duty to serve. And inasmuch as the duty to serve in the Militia necessarily includes a duty "to keep and bear Arms" (for all but conscientious objectors), "the right to keep and bear Arms" is inseparable from—indeed, is the mirror image of— the duty "to keep and bear Arms". "[T]he people" simultaneously exercise that right and enforce that duty by and on themselves: They exercise the right by fulfilling the duty; and they fulfill the duty by exercising the right.

Thus, the Second Amendment secures to each individual "the right to keep and bear Arms", not just for his own benefit, but primarily for the benefit of everyone else. "[T]he right to keep and bear Arms", translated through the duty "to keep and bear Arms", emphasizes the obligation of each and every member of "the people", not only to himself, but also to his community. Were acquisition of a firearm simply a matter of personal choice, an individual could imagine that his own firearm in his own hands was nothing more than an instrument for preserving his own life and property.[2727] But when "the supreme Law of the Land"[2728] requires just about everyone to possess a firearm, it compels almost every individual to recognize through his own behavior that his own firearm in his own hands is not simply an efficacious means for protecting his own life, but something of social significance. Each individual's personal possession of a firearm suitable for Militia service constitutes his own participation in, responsibility for the exercise of, and benefit from the community's political power. Because, in any society, "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[2729] the firearm in any individual's hands represents his own personal bit of theoretical political power, which becomes effective when aggregated with the similar powers of many others. Only those individuals who hold firearms in sufficient numbers possess in principle, and usually will come to wield in practice, effective power over their society, for good or for ill. In a society formed specifically pursuant to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", "[a] well regulated Militia" is rightly understood to be "necessary to the security of a free State". In such a society, the people themselves must retain in their own hands the instruments of physical force necessary and sufficient to maintain their own freedom through their own efforts against every possible enemy. Each individual must possess his very own firearm, not just for himself alone, but so that the whole community will be armed—and, being armed, can remain free. So, the individual duty "to keep and bear Arms" reflects the commitment of each member of the community to the freedom of the community, because its freedom is essential to his, as well as the commitment of all members of the community to each individual's freedom, because his freedom is essential to theirs.

---

[2726] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

(4) A constitutional "privilege" and "immunity". "[T]he right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is as well both a "privilege" and an "immunity" in the strict legal senses of those terms. It is a privilege, because anyone and everyone among "the people" is always free or at liberty "to keep and bear Arms" with no need of anyone else's permission to do so and no fear of incurring some punishment or penalty for doing so.[2730] It is, however, only a limited privilege, because it embraces solely the freedom "to keep and bear Arms", but no freedom "[not] to keep and bear Arms". The duty "to keep and bear Arms" in "[a] well regulated Militia", after all, necessarily excludes any contrary privilege to behave in a manner

---

[2727] This is the so-called "individual-right" theory of the Second Amendment, which has gained a following among purported champions of the Amendment. Unfortunately, the height of its acceptance is inversely proportional to the depth of its insight into the true meaning of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". See post, at 1339-1351.

[2728] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2729] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2730] See A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 167-168.

inconsistent with proper "regulat[ion]".[2731] This is true even with respect to conscientious objectors, because WE THE PEOPLE are not constitutionally required to respect conscientious objection where "the security of a free State" is concerned.[2732]

"[T]he right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is also an immunity for "the people" as against both rogue public officials and intermeddling private parties, because everyone labors under a disability (or lack of legal power) to interfere with—in the language of the Second Amendment, to "infringe[ ]"—both "the people['s]" exercise of "th[at] right" and their compliance with their duty "to keep and bear Arms" for the purpose of service in "well regulated Militia".[2733] Other than through a formal Amendment of the Constitution[2734]—and probably not even by that route, if the principles of the Declaration of Independence are consulted—no one can repeal, alter, or otherwise claim to change the meaning of either "the right" or the duty "to keep and bear Arms".

The foregoing is no matter of merely hyper-technical theoretical legal definitions, either. The Constitution itself declares that "[t]he Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States".[2735] This provision was designed to guarantee a certain measure of legal equality for "[t]he Citizens of each State" who traveled among "the several States", so as to secure for individuals a palpably beneficial practical effect from the Union. Its precursor appeared in the Articles of Confederation:

> * * * The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different states in this union, the free inhabitants of each of these states, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states; and the people of each state shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other state, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively, provided that such restriction shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any state, to any other state, of which the Owner is an inhabitant * * * .[2736]

[2731] See id. at 167.

[2732] See ante, at 969-973.

[2733] See A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 170.

[2734] See U.S. Const. art. V.

[2735] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 1.

[2736] Arts. of Confed'n art. IV, ¶ 1. Besides the obvious linguistic link, that this was the source for the constitutional clause is evidenced by comparing Arts. of Confed'n art. IV, ¶ 2 with U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 2 and Arts. of Confed'n art. IV, ¶ 3 with U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1.

Now, in each of the several States at the time the Articles were adopted, the laws—reinforced by the Articles[2737]—required everyone among "the body of the people" (unless released pursuant to a specific exemption) to possess a firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements necessary for Militia service. This requirement embodied a duty, a right, a privilege, and an immunity for each citizen eligible for his State's Militia. When the original Constitution incorporated "the Militia of the several States" within its federal system, the substance of these State statutes acquired constitutional status, because the States were then required to maintain their "Militia" in conformity with pre-constitutional principles.[2738] At that point, under the original Constitution every "Citizen of each State" was entitled to "all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States". So, with respect to firearms in particular, if "Citizens" of one State were privileged to acquire and possess firearms, and immune from having their firearms seized by public officials—as almost all of them were, perforce of their eligibility for Militia service—so too were "Citizens" of other States who traveled to that State with their arms or to acquire arms. Drawing upon the practical effect of "privileges and immunities" as embodied in the Articles, these "Citizens" would enjoy "free ingress and regress", not only for themselves but also for their firearms, to the same degree as "Citizens" of that State could transport their own firearms within her territory. The "Citizens" of other States would "enjoy [in that State] all the privileges of trade and commerce" in firearms, "subject [only] to the same * * * restrictions as the inhabitants" of that State—which meant that if any "Citizen" of that State could purchase and personally possess firearms there, or train with firearms, or engage in other related activities (as almost all of them could, and most were required to do), then every "Citizen" of every other State could do so, too. And no "restriction" in any State's laws could "extend so far as to prevent the removal of [firearms] imported into [that] state, to any other state, of which the Owner [was] an inhabitant"—so that a "Citizen" from another State who brought his firearm with him to, or acquired a firearm in, some other State could always take that property back to his own home. Plainly, too, Congress could not interfere with this equality of "Privileges and Immunities", under color of any of its powers, because: (i) all such "Privileges and Immunities" were constitutionally reserved to "[t]he Citizens of each State"; and (ii) Congress itself labored under a constitutional duty "[t]*o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia",*[2739] which would have required it to enforce such "Privileges and Immunities" under its own authority had any State refused to honor them.

The Second and Tenth Amendments added emphasis to the "Privileges and Immunities" of "[t]he Citizens of each State" and the disabilities of the States and

---

[2737] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

[2738] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3.

[2739] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

Congress with respect to WE THE PEOPLE'S interstate acquisition, possession, and transportation of firearms. Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment went even further, though, in its declarations that "[a]ll persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside", and that "[n]o State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States". Self-evidently, inasmuch as "[t]he Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States",[2740] and inasmuch as "[t]he Citizens of each State" are also "citizens of the United States", therefore the right, privilege, and immunity of "[t]he Citizens of each State * * * to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States" is a "privilege[ ] or immunit[y] of citizens of the United States", which no State may "abridge" by "mak[ing] or enforc[ing] any law". So, inasmuch as the substance of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" to its fullest extent, and of the concomitant duty "of the people to keep and bear Arms" to a large extent, undoubtedly fall within "the Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States", and inasmuch as "the people" certainly include most of the "citizens of the United States and of the State[s] wherein they reside", therefore "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" and its associated duty are undeniably among "the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States". And because "[n]o State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States", the substance of the Second Amendment must apply to officials of the States through the Fourteenth Amendment, to the selfsame degree that it applies directly to officials of the General Government, even if it did not apply to officials of the States directly.[2741] Nonetheless, were the original Constitution accorded its obviously proper construction on this point, these Amendments would not be needed to protect "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"—proving once again that the original "Constitution is itself, in every rational sense, and to every useful purpose, A BILL OF RIGHTS" with respect to WE THE PEOPLE'S "right to keep and bear Arms".[2742]

(5) A reserved constitutional "power". Ultimately, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" derives from and supports the duty "to keep and bear Arms", which itself serves the duty and the right of "the people" to participate in

---

[2740] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 1.

[2741] See post, at 1504-1529.

[2742] See The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton). A fortiori, no mere statutory protection for interstate transportation of firearms would ever be needed, either, were the Constitution actually enforced according to its terms. So, on this score, the so-called "Firearms Owners' Protection Act" is something of a misnomer, because, although it has some useful effect, it does not provide anything equivalent to the level of protection the Constitution mandates. See An Act To amend chapter 44 (relating to firearms) of title 18, United States Code, and for other purposes, Act of 19 May 1986, Pub. L. 99-308, § 107(a) [§ 926A], 100 Stat. 449, 460; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 926A.

"well regulated Militia" in order to provide by and for themselves "the security of a free State". For most of "the people", such participation is not voluntary, but is compelled by law. To establish such an obligation requires a legal power—an act that creates, continues, alters, amends, rescinds, or extinguishes a legal relation.[2743] Typically, WE THE PEOPLE assign the day-to-day authority to create legal relations with respect to their Militia—that is, the power to "regulate", with the goal of producing "well regulated Militia"—to the General Government and the governments of the several States, which enact and enforce appropriate statutes. Thus, the Constitution delegates to Congress the power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", so that they will be prepared to be "call[ed] forth * * * to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[2744] No power with respect to the Militia is explicitly "prohibited by [the Constitution] to the States", though.[2745] And an implicit prohibition can arise only if Congress properly exercises its own regulatory power, and then only to the extent of that exercise—otherwise, all powers over the Militia "are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people".[2746] So even the power THE PEOPLE have temporarily delegated to Congress must revert in practice "to the States respectively, or to the people" if Congress defaults on its responsibility.

Legislators to whom the Constitution has delegated a power as against individuals also enjoy a right to exercise that power; and the individuals as against whom that power is exercised have a duty to comply with whatever regulations legislators enact within the scope of their power. Generally, legislators must exercise their delegated powers whenever necessary and proper to advance the public interest. After all, "WE THE PEOPLE * * * ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution" in order to empower the General Government to perform certain vital functions, not to license it to evade those responsibilities, or to allow the States to stand idly by in that eventuality that it did.

Where the Militia are concerned, moreover, legislators' power and right are controlled by an emphatic explicit duty to legislate. The Second Amendment is a "declaratory and restrictive clause[ ]" designed "to prevent misconstruction or abuse of [the original Constitution's] powers".[2747] Even if anyone, acting in good faith, could have imagined in 1788 that the original Constitution extended to Congress the discretion "[not t]o provide for * * * arming the Militia", or "[t]o provide for *

[2743] See A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 168-169.

[2744] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 15.

[2745] Contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3 as to a State's "Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace".

[2746] Contrast U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2 with amends. II and X.

[2747] RESOLUTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS SUBMITTING TWELVE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION (4 March 1789), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1063.

* * [dis]arming * * * the Militia" to some significant degree, in 1791 the Second Amendment excluded that "misconstruction" through its command that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed".[2748] This rendered undeniable that Congress has no option but "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia"—that is, to guarantee, in one manner or another, that "the people" actually possess "Arms" suitable for Militia service. In addition, inasmuch as the purpose of "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is to enable "the people" to fulfill their constitutional duty to serve in "well regulated Militia" that are "necessary to" and therefore actually capable of providing "the security of a free State", Congress has no option but "[t]o provide for organizing * * * and disciplining" "the people" for such service, too. And, with respect to these matters, the States have no greater options than does Congress, for the obvious reason that the "well regulated Militia" of which the Second Amendment speaks are "the Militia of the several States" which the original Constitution permanently incorporated into its federal system. If "the people" have a constitutional right and especially duty "to keep and bear Arms" for the purpose of serving in "well regulated Militia", and these are "the Militia of the several States" the permanent existence of which the original Constitution demands, then how could the States ever be suffered to "infringe[ ]" upon "the people['s]" right and duty, in derogation of the Second Amendment, when the necessary consequence would be to destroy those Militia?!

If Congress and the States' legislatures were to default on their obligations, "the people" might possibly still possess "Arms" as the result of their own private efforts; but they would not, as the consequence of such possession alone, be members of "well regulated Militia". If "the people" did not actually participate in "well regulated Militia", then they could not provide "the security of a free State"—and, as the Second Amendment teaches, no one else could. So, under such conditions, "a free State" could not long survive. (Of course, the situation would be far worse if the General Government, or the States, or both attempted to impose general "gun control" on "the people".) The demise of "free State[s]" anywhere, let alone everywhere, throughout America is constitutionally unthinkable, however. Therefore, WE THE PEOPLE cannot allow their Militia not to be "well regulated" (or, for that matter, not to exist at all). Or, the power to ensure that the Militia are always "well regulated" can never fall into abeyance.

No doctrine of constitutional law could require THE PEOPLE to stand idly by in the face of public officials' serial defaults in their duties. True, THE PEOPLE have delegated the power to regulate the Militia to those officials as "representatives" or (to employ the general legal term) "agents", in the normal course of human events. But no delegation implicitly carries with it the principals' abdication and irreversible surrender of their original authority to feckless agents, let alone the principals' agreement to acquiesce in disloyal agents' intentional violations of the very conditions upon which the delegation is made. Rather, the agents' failure, neglect, and especially outright refusal to employ their delegated authority in the principals' interests, especially according to the principals' explicit instructions, creates conditions the abnormality of which justifies the principals' rescission and subsequent disregard of the agents' authority and reassertion of their own direct control over the subject matter. Thus, upon public officials' defaults—and well before *those defaults can irreversibly undermine "the security of a free State"—WE THE PEOPLE can, should, and must translate their "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" into a power to regulate their Militia themselves*. This should hardly surprise anyone, inasmuch as: legislative power is one aspect of political power; "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'";[2749] "the Sword and Soveraignty always march hand in hand";[2750] and THE PEOPLE'S right to the full measure of political power—that is, sovereignty—is embodied in their very own constitutional command that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed".

[2748] Emphasis supplied.

(6) A "collective right" as well as an "individual right". The antagonists in the contemporary political debate over to what extent (if at all) "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is compatible with "gun control" fall into two major camps: (i) those who contend that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is a "collective right", to which no one who is not actually a member of some Militia has any constitutional claim, and which (should a legislature so decide) may be exercised only for the purposes of actual service in that Militia in conformity with statutory regulations; and (ii) those who assert that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is an "individual right", to which every competent free adult man and woman enjoys a constitutional claim, even if he is not a member of a Militia, or no Militia exists at all. Both of these contending factions agree that children, persons suffering from serious mental illnesses, and criminals incarcerated in prison cannot exercise "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"—the former, because the people in these groups cannot be members of a Militia; the latter, because such people are either immature, or incompetent, or unfree. Although the adherents of these two camps are numerous and noisy, neither of their positions is correct, because both groups—being composed primarily of ideologues, rather than scientific legal historians—take too narrow and tendentious a view of the matter.

To differentiate an "individual" from a "collective" "right of the people" requires more insight than is contained in the observation that "'the people' seems to have been a term of art employed in select parts of the Constitution * * * [to] refer[ ] to a class of persons who are part of a national community".[2751] Because the effective exercise of a "collective right" requires the coördinated actions of more than one individual, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" does appear to be a "collective right", as its evident purpose is to enable "the people" to participate—necessarily in a concerted and coöperative fashion—in "well regulated Militia". Because the effective exercise of an "individual right" requires no more than the action of a single individual, though, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" also appears to be an "individual right", inasmuch as each and every member of "the people" can personally possess a firearm and ammunition in his home, and personally bring that equipment into the field with him when circumstances so demand, no matter what any other person may do or not do. The right is exercised in a "collective" manner on those occasions when "the people" muster together for Militia training or service in the field. At all other times—which embrace most of the time—it is exercised in an "individual" manner by each of "the people" in his own home, even when he himself is not at home but his firearm and ammunition are.

[2749] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2750] AN ARGUMENT, Shewing, that a Standing Army Is inconsistent with A Free Government, ante, note 27, at 7.

The ambident character of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is not constitutionally unique. For the most obvious example, the First Amendment protects "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances". Taken literally, this right exhibits a "collective" character, because "people" do not "peaceably assemble" unless more than one of them are at hand. Yet no one has ever seriously contended that a single individual, solely in his own interest, cannot assert "the right * * * to petition the Government for a redress of" his own, even unique, "grievances".

A great deal of confusion has been generated within this rather ill-conceived and worse-conducted debate by the contention that the primary concern of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is the possession of firearms by isolated individuals for the purpose of personal self-defense. Hordes of intellectuals have labored for decades to obtain an opinion from the Supreme Court of the United States that squarely upheld, or rejected, this thesis. With the Court's decisions in District of Columbia v. Heller and McDonald v. City of Chicago,[2752] the proponents of the theory that "the individual right" to self-defense lies at the heart of the Second Amendment have temporarily prevailed. But theirs is a hollow victory.

First, being based upon only two interrelated five-to-four decisions from a sharply and irreconcilably divided Bench, it threatens to prove evanescent: If the composition of the Court should change by only a single Justice, or a single Justice should change his mind, contrary opinions could—and probably would—be rendered in the very next cases that raised issues under the Second Amendment.[2753]

---

[2751] United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 265 (1990).

[2752] Respectively, 554 U.S. 570 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court) and 561 U.S. ___ (2010) (Alito, J., for the Court).

Second, the Heller and McDonald opinions are exceedingly narrow in scope and niggardly in the judicial guarantees they afford: They uphold only individuals' possession of handguns in their own homes for the purpose of personal self-defense[2754]—thus exhibiting no greater concern for the personal possession of firearms under the Second Amendment than the Court has evinced for the personal possession of pornography under the First Amendment.[2755]

Third, even if in the future these decisions receive judicial adherence to the full extent of their terms, nothing in them will promote "well regulated Militia" or "the security of a free State" anywhere within America. To the contrary: By accepting as presumptively valid contemporary "gun controls" that hinder common Americans from possessing the very "Arms" most suitable for "well regulated Militia"[2756]—in which point all of the Justices concurred—these decisions will assist rogue public officials to prevent "the people" from providing themselves with "the security of a free State" as the Constitution requires. If the Justices did not knowingly intend this result, they manifested willful blindness to the true meaning of the Second Amendment and reckless disregard for the inevitably disastrous effects of deviating from it.

Fourth and most important, no matter how many jurists and intellectuals may embrace it, the theory that "the individual right" to personal self-defense lies at the heart of the Second Amendment is plainly wrong. This is not to say that the Amendment, correctly construed, does not effectively ensure for almost all individuals a right of personal self-defense with firearms. It does, but (in most cases) with every kind of firearm that is in any way suitable for any type of Militia service, not just handguns kept in one's home. Moreover, it guarantees for almost all individuals various rights to employ firearms for purposes far beyond the narrow confines of their own personal self-defense at home.

The right of individual self-defense is not mentioned in the original Constitution or in the Second Amendment—because it did not have to be. Self-defense is a foundational right. Everything else in America's legal system builds upon [2753] Such a reversal would not be particularly peculiar when the Justices were at such ideological odds. Compare and contrast, e.g., Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183 (1968); Fry v. United States, 421 U.S. 542 (1975); National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976); and Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528 (1985).

---

[2754] See 554 U.S. at 635 (Scalia, J., for the Court); 561 U.S. at ___ (Alito, J., for the Court), Slip Opinion at 33-41.

[2755] Contrast Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), with United States v. Reidel, 402 U.S. 351, 354-356 (1971); United States v. Thirty-seven Photographs, 402 U.S. 363, 375-377 (1971); and Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49, 65-67 (1973).

[2756] See Heller, 554 U.S. at 626-628 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

it. It precedes the institution of government. Finding its basis directly in "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God"—in service to and conformity with which proper "Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed"[2757]—the right of personal self-defense does not depend upon the existence of "a free State" in particular, or even of any "government" in general. It does not depend upon the existence of a Militia, "well regulated" or not. And it does not depend upon any "right to keep and bear arms" specifically enumerated in some constitution or statute. Moreover, as Blackstone emphasized, "[s]elf-defence * * * , as it is justly called the primary law of nature, * * * is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[2758]

As a matter of fact, exercise of the right of personal self-defense does not depend upon one's possession of a firearm. If an individual does have a "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" for any purpose, and in reliance on that right has happened to obtain a firearm, and has it at hand, then of course he is capable of defending himself with it when the occasion arises. Yet, if that same individual has no "right * * * to keep and bear Arms", and therefore finds himself without a firearm when danger threatens, he is still capable of defending himself with some other implement—or even with his bare hands, feet, and teeth. Thus, the exercise of the right of personal self-defense has no logically or existentially necessary connection with "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms". Banning the right of personal self-defense might provide a rationale for outlawing the possession of firearms. But banning the possession of firearms would not in and of itself deny anyone the right to defend himself.

For example, throughout American history slaves were generally denied any right to possess firearms, except under the most stringent controls. As Blackstone observed,

> [t]wo precautions are * * * advised to be observed in all prudent and free governments: 1. To prevent the introduction of slavery at all: or, 2. If it be already introduced, not to intrust those slaves with arms; who will then find themselves an overmatch for the freemen.[2759]

No one ever doubted, however, that as human beings even slaves were entitled physically to defend themselves in some circumstances. And today, under the Thirteenth Amendment, an individual who has been "duly convicted" of a crime the just punishment for which is "slavery [ ]or involuntary servitude" can constitutionally be denied the possession of firearms, without thereby depriving him

---

[2757] Declaration of Independence.

[2758] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

[2759] Id., Volume 1, at 416.

of the right of personal self-defense. Similarly, ordinary prisoners in jail are universally prohibited from possessing firearms; but, notwithstanding that, they all have a right to defend themselves against assaults by their fellow inmates or rogue officials. Children of tender years are never (or ought never to be) allowed the unsupervised possession of firearms; yet they surely enjoy a right of self-defense. And even mentally defective individuals (including homicidal maniacs) may lawfully defend themselves against aggressors, although they may lack a right to possess any implement potentially dangerous to themselves or others, let alone a firearm.

On the other hand, even a cursory reading of the Heller decision should instruct anyone that no inconsistency whatsoever exists in principle, under the Court's reasoning, between an "individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" predicated exclusively upon the right to personal self-defense in the home with some type of firearm, and exceedingly extensive "gun control". For instance, if rogue public officials enacted a purported statute that allowed common Americans to possess a break-open, single shot, .22-caliber handgun—but disallowed the possession of every other kind of firearm—they would deprive no one of the bare "right to personal self-defense with a handgun in one's home" concocted in Heller. And this would be true even if that statute also banned average Americans from possession of all ammunition except for a single anemic round that developed only the minimal power to discommode an aggressor with a shot perfectly placed.

Thus, at least insofar as it is made to rest upon the right of personal self-defense, the supposed "individual right" to possess firearms is the spawn of confusion. Worse yet, it is the source of delusion as to what actually needs to be done to enforce the Second Amendment. For, notwithstanding that all too many naive patriots believe it to be correct, and even though it may provide some protection for "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in isolated instances, at base the notion that the Amendment primarily concerns itself with only an "individual right" is part and parcel of the strategy America's enemies are employing in order so to befuddle "the people" that they will not seek to organize themselves in the one and only way the Constitution itself tells them is "necessary to the security of a free State".

Initially, these miscreants contend that no real "right of the people to keep and bear Arms" exists at all, but that public officials may impose whatever "gun controls" they deem politically expedient. When that balderdash meets too much political backlash, they concede that a "right" does exist in principle, but that it is merely an "individual right" related in practice either to personal self-defense, or to hunting, target-shooting, or some other so-called "sporting purpose"—and, being no more than an "individual right", must always yield to all "reasonable regulations" enacted in the service of "compelling governmental interests", as public officials may stretch the definitions of those elastic terms. Which inevitably results in the transmogrification of a true "right of the people to keep and bear Arms" into nothing more than a temporary license controlled by officialdom for its own purposes—thus returning the argument to its starting-point.

The goal of this black propaganda is to prevent average Americans from thinking through, and acting upon, the constitutional directive that "the security of a free State" absolutely depends upon the maintenance of "[a] well regulated Militia", and that the existence of "[a] well regulated Militia" absolutely depends upon "the people['s]" permanent personal possession of, and continuous training with, firearms and ammunition suitable for Militia service. Aspiring usurpers and tyrants expect that, if an armed people will not organize themselves for collective self-defense—that is, the defense of their community by the members of the community themselves—during times of domestic tranquility, they will be unable to organize themselves during the confusion and even panic of a major social crisis, when time is short and perhaps radical steps must be taken in the face of repression by the usurpers' and tyrants' armed forces and para-militarized police. Therefore, in order to prevail against a country in which vast numbers of private citizens already possess firearms, all contemporary schemes of usurpation and tyranny adopt as a working premise that "the people" be kept as disorganized as possible for as long as possible, so that "gun control" can gradually reduce the supplies of arms in private hands to a nadir at which "well regulated Militia" cannot be formed. This is no new stratagem. As America's Founding Fathers learned from their own hard experience, "the best and most effectual way to enslave the[people]" is to "weaken them, and let them sink gradually, by totally disusing and neglecting the militia".[2760]

If, in the course of such subversion, aspiring usurpers and tyrants for reasons of political camouflage must temporarily concede any "right of the people to keep and bear Arms", "the individual right" to possess a firearm solely for hunting, target shooting, and other purely "sporting purposes" would always be most meet for their purposes—precisely because, as a completely personal right, it would have next to no collective character of any consequence. As of this writing, however, "gun controllers" have failed to deceive a majority of Americans into swallowing the line that the right to possess firearms does not embrace personal self-defense. This complicates their task, because such an "individual right" does in practice have a useful collective aspect. After all, individual self-defense invariably amounts to enforcement of the law in a situation in which regularly constituted authorities are incapable of intervening in a timely fashion. Thus, even in the most isolated instance, individual self-defense is fundamentally a Militia function, enforcement of the law being the very first constitutional responsibility of the Militia.[2761] Moreover, the ability of individuals to defend themselves with firearms in the absence of regularly constituted authorities deters and even punishes the perpetrators of crimes of all sorts.[2762] Thus, the capability for individual self-defense among the citizenry can provide the community with some degree of protection, because every armed individual can potentially function as an ad hoc "law-enforcement officer" whenever personally confronted with criminal activity.

---

[2760] George Mason, in the Virginia Convention of 1788, in J. Elliot, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS, ante note 110, Volume 3, at 380.

[2761] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

Nonetheless, that is not enough. "The individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" based on personal self-defense does afford an immediate remedy for violations of particular persons' rights to personal security—but this amounts to the execution of only a small part of the laws and only in unique instances. In the nature of things, personal self-defense can only adventitiously, sporadically, and unsystematically contribute to "the security of a free State". To achieve that "security" to a necessary and sufficient degree demands collective action consciously undertaken by all eligible citizens on the community's behalf. WE THE PEOPLE must exercise the right of collective self-defense to the fullest. "The collective right" based on self-defense of the community by the community provides a remedy for violations of any and all rights within "a free State"—enabling "the people" to execute all of the laws, everywhere, under all circumstances, all of the time. "The collective right" generalizes, organizes, and mobilizes individual self-defense so as to marshal the full strength of the community for the community's protection. But this requires a permanent political institution infused with broad legal authority through which THE PEOPLE themselves can aggregate, direct, and deploy whatever measure of force may be required to enforce their rights. So "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" must be understood, not as pertaining only to and exercised by and primarily for the benefit of individuals as individuals, with only happenstance benefits accruing to the community, but as forming the essential legal foundation for a collective enterprise the primary purpose of which is the community's welfare, with benefits accruing to all the individual members thereof.

The Second Amendment identifies this enterprise as "[a] well regulated Militia". Now, the essence of "[a] well regulated Militia" is organization. By definition, however, an "individual right" eschews organization. And unorganized, untrained individuals typically prove helpless against organized groups of human predators—another lesson the Founders took to heart: "When, against a regular and disciplined army, yeomanry are the only defence,—yoemanry, unskilful and unarmed,—what chance is there for preserving freedom?"[2763] In both principle and practice, therefore, an "individual right" directly contradicts the purpose of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". Besides, collective self-defense often demands that individual self-defense be sacrificed for the common good. The defense of the community may require that some, perhaps many, individuals expose themselves to the risk of serious injury or even death.

---

[2762] See, e.g., John R. Lott, Jr., More Guns, Less Crime: Understanding Crime and Gun Control Laws (Chicago, Illinois: University of Chicago Press, 3d Edition, 2010); Gary Kleck, "Crime Control Through the Private Use of Armed Force", in Safeguarding Liberty, ante note 1225, at 323.

[2763] George Mason, in the Virginia Convention of 1788, in J. Elliot, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS, ante note 110, Volume 3, at 380.

Precisely because "[a] well regulated Militia" is a governmental entity, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is least of all an "individual right", and first and foremost:

> • A "collective right" that in the most dramatic terms reflects WE THE PEOPLE'S sovereignty, because it locates the repository of supreme legal authority through application of the general axiom, "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[2764] modified by the specifically American corollary that the "gun" must always be held by THE PEOPLE themselves, acting under and in conformity with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".[2765]
>
> • A "collective right" that enables WE THE PEOPLE to preserve the "Form of Government" that can "establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to [THE PEOPLE] and [their] Posterity".[2766] And
>
> • A "collective right" that provides WE THE PEOPLE with the means to impose their sovereignty on, and preserve their "Form of Government" against, rogue public officials. For both the General Government and the governments of the several States "deriv[e] their just powers from the consent of the governed"—not just once upon a time, when THE PEOPLE of the late 1700s ratified the original Constitution and then the Bill of Rights, or in later years when they ratified other Amendments, but each and every day since then, unto the present age. "[T]he consent of the governed" is a meaningless limitation on public officials, however, unless it can be asserted, enforced, and if necessary withheld entirely whenever necessary. If it cannot be asserted and enforced through elections, or by exercise of "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances",[2767] then it must be withdrawn—and, if so, probably in the face of attempts by rogue public officials' armed agents to compel THE PEOPLE to knuckle under to the oppressors' régime. An effective withdrawal of consent, then, will require collective action of the most comprehensive

---

[2764] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[2765] Declaration of Independence.

[2766] U.S. Const. preamble .

[2767] U.S. Const. amend. I.

> and tenacious sort by as large a part of the community as can be mustered, with the greatest amount of force that can be deployed. Under these conditions, no mere "individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" could possibly suffice.

So, burdened with all of these deficiencies in comparison to "the collective right" "to keep and bear Arms", how did the notion of an "individual right" ever gain intellectual currency, let alone rise to such prominence? The theory of an "individual right" emerged in its full form during the 1960s (perhaps in reaction to a discordant crescendo of "gun control" during that period), and by the mid-1990s ensconced itself as the so-called "standard model" and "new consensus" amongst intellectuals who considered themselves advocates of the Second Amendment.[2768] The efforts of these scholars are as praiseworthy as they are prodigious; and much, if not most, of their work is meritorious. Unfortunately, they have largely mistaken the point of the Second Amendment.[2769] To be sure, the errors of proponents of "the individual right" do not arise out of a slavish adherence to some malign political agenda aimed at utterly nullifying that Amendment. Presumably, all of these people (and many others of similar persuasions) were and remain motivated by good intentions. Yet good intentions, not sufficiently scrutinized, all too often end up paving the road to Hell.

[2768] See, e.g., Stewart R. Hays, "The Right to Bear Arms, A Study in Judicial Misinterpretation", 2 William & Mary Law Review 381 (1960); Ronald B. Levine & David B. Saxe, "The Second Amendment: The Right to Bear Arms", 7 Houston Law Review 1 (1969); David T. Hardy & John Stompoly, "Of Arms and the Law", 51 Chicago-Kent Law Review 62 (1974); David I. Caplan, "Restoring the Balance: The Second Amendment Revisited", 5 Fordham Urban Law Journal 31 (1976); Stephen P. Halbrook, "The Jurisprudence of the Second and Fourteenth Amendments", 4 George Mason Law Review 1 (1981); Robert Dowlet & Janet A. Knoop, "State Constitutions and the Right to Keep and Bear Arms", 7 Oklahoma City University Law Review 177 (1982); Stephen P. Halbrook, "To Keep and Bear Their Private Arms: The Adoption of the Second Amendment, 1787-1791", 10 Northern Kentucky Law Review 13 (1982); Robert E. Shalhope, "The Ideological Origins of the Second Amendment", 69 Journal of American History 599 (1982); Don B. Kates, Jr., "Handgun Prohibition and the Original Meaning of the Second Amendment", 82 Michigan Law Review 204 (1983); Joyce Lee Malcolm, "The Right of the People to Keep and Bear Arms: The Common Law Tradition", 10 Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 285 (1983); Robert E. Shalhope, "The Armed Citizen in the Early Republic", 49 Law and Contemporary Problems 125 (1986); Stephen P. Halbrook, That Every Man Be Armed (Albuquerque, New Mexico: University of New Mexico Press, 1984); Don B. Kates, Jr., "The Second Amendment: A Dialogue", 49 Law and Contemporary Problems 143 (1986); Stephen P. Halbrook, "What the Framers Intended: A Linguistic Analysis of the Right to 'Bear Arms'", 49 Law and Contemporary Problems 151 (1986); Nelson Lund, "The Second Amendment, Political Liberty, and the Right to Self-Preservation", 39 Alabama Law Review 103 (1987); Sanford Levinson, "The Embarrassing Second Amendment", 99 Yale Law Journal 637 (1989); William Van Alstyne, "The Second Amendment and the Personal Right to Arms", 43 Duke Law Journal 1236 (1994); Joyce Lee Malcolm, To Keep and Bear Arms: The Origins of an Anglo-American Right (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1994); Glenn Harlan Reynolds, "A Critical Guide to the Second Amendment", 62 Tennessee Law Review 461(1995), at 463 (using the term "Standard Model"); Randy E. Barnett & Don B. Kates[, Jr.], "Under Fire: The New Consensus on the Second Amendment", 45 Emory Law Journal 1139 (1996); Stephen P. Halbrook, The Founders' Second Amendment: Origin of the Right to Bear Arms (Chicago, Illinois: Ivan R. Dee, Publishers, 2008). The present author wishes to thank David T. Hardy for supplying references to many of the scholarly articles in the foregoing list.

[2769] A much more balanced approach appears in Robert H. Churchill, "Gun Regulation, the Police Power, and the Right to Keep Arms in Early America: The Legal Context of the Second Amendment", 25 Law and History Review 139 (2007).

Inasmuch as "the individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" as generally formulated under "the new consensus" cannot easily be reconciled with "[a] well regulated Militia", it is fair to conclude that advocates of "the individual right" seized upon it out of considerations of convenience as much as conviction, because it enabled them to avoid dealing in their analyses and advocacy with the untidy complication that the Second Amendment itself explicitly declares "[a] well regulated Militia" to be "necessary to the security of a free State". Perhaps some of them simply deceived themselves into imagining that the National Guard and the Naval Militia are the true, and only, constitutional Militia. Perhaps others of them, although better informed, were not willing to challenge what was then and still remains the errant consensus on that subject—although, of course, a few of them did.[2770] Perhaps yet others were ultra-"libertarians" who opposed in principle the sort of near-universal compulsory service "well regulated Militia" require. And perhaps some recognized that, if they once admitted in public the centrality of the Militia to the Second Amendment, they would be compelled by considerations of intellectual integrity, if not patriotism and civic duty, to speak out politically in favor of revitalization of the Militia—thus exposing themselves to ridicule, vituperation, and marginalization as "extremists" from subversive special-interest groups, the big media, rogue public officials, and even many of their erstwhile colleagues. Whatever the explanation in any particular instance, instead of thoroughly debunking with sound historical research and legal analysis the fallacies that "the National Guard is the Militia" and that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms is separate from the Militia", determining the true interrelation between "[a] well regulated Militia" and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", and concluding that "the collective right" and "the individual right" (properly defined) are the obverse and reverse of the selfsame constitutional coin, the constituents of "the new consensus" consigned to the dust-bin of utter irrelevance thirteen of the Second Amendment's twenty-seven words.

For example, one prominent academic opined that "the Second Amendment has exactly the same meaning that it would have had if the preamble had been omitted, or indeed if the preamble is demonstrably false".[2771] Of course, the first half of this observation is accidentally accurate: For if one scientifically investigates "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in *pre-*constitutional American history, as has the author and any reader of the present study, he will inevitably discover the inextricable connection between that "right" and "[a] well regulated Militia"—such that the phrases "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" and "[a] well regulated Militia" organized for the purpose of providing "the security of a free State" largely mean the same thing for all practical purposes. The second half of the statement, however, is premissed upon a ridiculous supposition: For, in constitutional analysis, "we are to place ourselves as nearly as possible in the conditions of the men who framed" the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights.[2772] Those men never doubted that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", or they never would have incorporated "the Militia of the several States" as permanent components of the Constitution's federal system. And, as a matter of law, WE THE PEOPLE today must accept that declaration as true.

---

[2770] See, e.g., David Hardy, "The Militia Is Not the National Guard", in Safeguarding Liberty, ante note 1225, at 99.

[2771] Nelson Lund, "D.C.'s Handgun Ban and the Constitutional Right to Arms: One Hard Question?", 18 George Mason University Civil Rights Law Journal 229 (2008), at 237 (footnote omitted).

Nonetheless, proving once again that simple-minded errors are always far easier to sell in the vaunted "marketplace of ideas" than are complex truths, the hierophants of "the individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" have prevailed among defenders of the Second Amendment in that cacophonous forum. Yet having been adopted as a "standard model" among a "new consensus" within some gaggle of intellectuals does not guarantee that their theory is either correct or beneficial. A bare majority of the Supreme Court in the Heller and McDonald cases did endorse "the standard model". Inasmuch, though, as the Court has opined that "[u]nder the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea"[2773]—and therefore by an equipoise of judicial logic "there is no such thing as a [true] idea", either—the Justices' acceptance of "the individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" cannot inspire an abundance of confidence. Indeed, when it comes to the Power of the Purse and the Power of the Sword,[2774] an healthy suspicion of the Judiciary's work is always in order. For the Supreme Court has uniformly been wrong, and sometimes blatantly dishonest, with respect to such vitally important matters as money,[2775] public-sector unionism,[2776] and the power to draft men for service in the [2772] Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, 12 (1887).

---

[2773] Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 339 (1974).

[2774] See generally Edwin Vieira, Jr., "The Purse and the Sword: Imminent Dangers of U.S. Economic and Homeland Security Policies" (Metamora, Michigan: DVDs produced by the Heritage Research Institute, 2010).

[2775] See, e.g., Knox v. Lee, 79 U.S. (12 Wallace) 457 (1871); Juilliard v. Greenman, 110 U.S. 421 (1884); Norman v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., 294 U.S. 240 (1935); Nortz v. United States, 294 U.S. 317 (1935); and Perry v. United States, 294 U.S. 330 (1935), discussed in E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, at 599-651, 651-666, 1127-1211.

[2776] See, e.g., Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977), and Knight v. Minnesota Community College Faculty Association, 460 U.S. 1048 (1983), and 465 U.S. 271 (1984), discussed in Edwin Vieira, Jr., "Travesty, Tragedy and Treason: Abood v. Detroit Board of Education and the Supreme Court's Betrayal of the Constitution in Public-Sector Labor Relations", Government Union Review, Volume 19, Number 2 (2000), at 27; idem, "Poltroons on the Bench: The Fraud of the 'Labor-Peace' Argument for Compulsory Public-Sector Collective Bargaining", Government Union Review, Volume 18, Number 3 (1998), at 1. See also Edwin Vieira, Jr., "Compulsory Public Sector Collective Bargaining: the Trojan Horse of Corporativism", Government Union Review, Volume 2, Number 1 (1981), at 56; idem, "To break and control the violence of faction": The challenge to representative government from compulsory public-sector collective bargaining (Arlington, Virginia: Foundation for the Advancement of the Public Trust & Public Service Research Council, 1980); idem, "Of Syndicalism, Slavery and the Thirteenth Amendment: The Unconstitutionality of 'Exclusive Representation' in Public-Sector Employment", 12 Wake Forest Law Review 515 (1976).

regular Armed Forces[2777]—with disastrous consequences for this country in the long term in every such instance.

Overall, the theory of an "individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" has done a signal disservice to America in many ways:

First, it has deflected the stream of academic discourse from the task of construing in a mutually coherent fashion all of the words in the Second Amendment together with related provisions in the original Constitution.

Second, it has dissected the Constitution by amputating "the individual right" "of the people to keep and bear Arms" from "[a] well regulated Militia", as if "the people" and "[a] well regulated Militia" were entirely different groups that ought not to be connected to each other.

Third, it has largely and dangerously disarmed "the people" by at least implicitly denying that they enjoy a constitutional right to a Militia and therefore a constitutional right to "Arms" specifically suitable for a Militia.

Fourth, it has put at imminent risk Americans' "unalienable Rights" and "the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity",[2778] by convincing all too many citizens that they need not revitalize the Militia—indeed, that they need not, should not, must not even think let alone talk, about revitalizing the Militia, or about equipping "the people" with the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements most useful to that end. Admittedly, if the courts do not contrive to eviscerate Heller and McDonald, "the individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" will leave some firearms in some people's hands for some purposes— which is better than nothing. Of more concern, though, is that the exegetes of "the individual right" offer nothing by way of explanation as to either: (i) how usually isolated, always disorganized individuals in possession of the marginally effective firearms that right protects could possibly prevail against usurpers and tyrants whose edicts were enforced by para-military "law-enforcement agencies" equipped with modern military-grade firearms; or (ii) how "the Militia of the several States" could be resurrected from disuse when they would need to be armed with the very firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements that "the individual right" does not encompass, is not capable of encompassing, and apparently was never intended to encompass. To be sure, in keeping with the old adage that "it is a poor workman who blames his tools", inventive Americans could find ways in which to employ the limited freedom "the individual right" does afford, so as to assist them in the early stages of revitalizing the Militia. But, [2777] See Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U.S. 366 (1918), discussed post, at 1807-1835.

---

[2778] Declaration of Independence and U.S. Const. preamble.

as soon as discussion of (let alone actual work on) those subjects began, it would necessarily leave the domain of "the individual right" and enter the territory of "the collective right". Thus, for all serious constitutional purposes, focusing on "the individual right" is a waste a time (of which precious little remains to squander). Worse than that, accepting "the individual right" as the highest barrier the Second Amendment erects against "gun control" and the National para-military police state "gun controllers" intend to impose upon this country amounts to little more than a half-hearted rear-guard action in a retreat along the road leading to the eradication of "a free State" throughout America.

(7) Not exclusively a "State's right". Finally, although in its most significant aspects "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is a "collective right", it is not exclusively a "State's right" in the common acceptation of that term as a right only the State herself, through her government and public officials, can exercise.

True, the original Constitution referred to "the Militia of the several States", not to any "right of the people", let alone to any "individual right", "to keep and bear Arms". And by focusing on the words "of the several States", while forgetting what the noun "Militia" actually means in terms of pre-constitutional principles, perhaps someone might have misread the Constitution: (i) to allow only the States as polities, but not their citizens as individuals, to assert any right as against the General Government to maintain their Militia; and, reciprocally, (ii) to allow the General Government to assert its powers with respect to regulation and deployment of the Militia only as against the States as polities, not as against their individual citizens who comprised the Militia. Such a misconstruction would not have been utterly implausible on practical grounds, because, if these imagined purely intergovernmental assertions of rights and powers had required judicial enforcement, they would have fallen within "[t]he judicial Power" which "extends to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under th[e] Constitution" and "to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party", and would have been required to be heard in the "original Jurisdiction" of the Supreme Court inasmuch as in all such situations "a State shall be a Party".[2779] Nonetheless, although this would have proven to be an exceedingly clumsy way to administer Militia required to perform the vital tasks of "execut[ing] the Laws of the Union, suppress[ing] Insurrections and repel[ling] Invasions" when "call[ed] forth" pursuant to some "provi[sion]" made by Congress for that purpose,[2780] it would not have been impossible for the General Government and the States to proceed in that manner.

[2779] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cls. 1 and 2.

[2780] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

Now, it certainly is true that every State does enjoy a constitutional right—and a duty, together with associated powers and immunities—as against the General Government to maintain her own Militia, precisely because they are "the Militia of the several States" and permanent parts of the federal system with constitutional status. Nonetheless, this legal authority and responsibility do not coalesce into an exclusive "State's right", because the Militia are not bloodless mechanisms, but assemblies of individuals drawn from and so historically identified with "the people" that the word "Militia" means a certain type of involvement by "the people" in public affairs. So, because "the Militia of the several States" are permanent components of the federal system, with particular rights, powers, privileges, and immunities therein, "the people" who compose them are entitled to those rights, powers, privileges, and immunities, too.[2781]

On the other side, the General Government has a right to command individuals in the Militia directly, albeit in a limited way. For the Constitution empowers Congress "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of the[Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States".[2782] To be sure, this governance must be enforced primarily through "Officers" "the Appointment" of which the Constitution "reserv[es] to the States respectively".[2783] For the only "Officer[ ]" of the General Government who is also an "Officer[ ]" in the Militia is the President, whom the Constitution appoints as "Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States".[2784] Nevertheless, the source of this governance is Congress; its operation does not require Congress to command the States, as States, to take any action; and it is directed ultimately at individuals within the Militia, not at the States. (This, in contrast to the situation under the Articles of Confederation, perforce of which every State was required "always [to] keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred", but Congress exercised no specific authority to enforce this requirement.[2785])

The Second Amendment corrects any confusion that might have arisen on this score under the original Constitution, by declaring that the ultimate right with respect to the Militia is "the right of the people" themselves, not "of the States" as representatives of "the people". If the Amendment guaranteed a "right of the States" alone, it would read (say), "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the several States respectively to maintain such Militia shall not be infringed". In that event, it would be obvious that such a right

---

[2781] See Bond v. United States, No. 09-1227, ___ U.S. ___ (2011).

[2782] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2783] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[2784] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 with § 2, cl. 2.

[2785] Compare Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4 with art. II.

ran in favor of the States as polities against the General Government. Of course, that would not mean that every individual among "the people" was powerless to enforce such a "State's right" on his own behalf in a particular case in which he could show that he had been injured by an infringement on that right.[2786] And by a parity of reasoning, the right that the Second Amendment does secure—"the right of the people [of each State] to keep and bear Arms" for the purpose of maintaining "well regulated Militia" in each State among the several States—must be a right of each State, too. If "the people" can assert the rights of a State against the General Government on the grounds of federalism, a State can invoke the rights of "the people" on those same grounds, particularly when those rights are directed towards maintaining the State herself as "a free State" within the federal system. So, in this instance, "States' rights" and "the right of the people" amount to the very same thing.

In sum, both the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution and the Second Amendment guarantee not only a "collective right" of "the people" to participate in "well regulated Militia" as establishments within the federal system but also an "individual right" of each American among "the people" who compose or could compose the Militia to acquire and possess firearms suitable for Militia service, whether he actually trains and deploys in the field or not. The significance of these simultaneous guarantees cannot be overemphasized, because they present the only instance in which the original Constitution and an Amendment cover exactly the same ground from exactly the same direction for exactly the same purpose, and thus mutually confirm and reinforce each other (rather than an Amendment's sole purpose being to impose a limitation on a misconstruction or abuse of some power in the original Constitution). Nonetheless, the Second Amendment is not merely redundant, because it explicitly highlights what is only implicit in the original Constitution: namely, that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State"—thereby making clear that "the Militia of the several States", predicated upon "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", are indispensable structural components of America's constitutional edifice.

f. "Arms". Because the "Arms" to which "the right of the people" pertains must be the kinds of "Arms" possession of which will enable "the people" to participate effectively in "well regulated Militia", the noun "Arms" in the Second Amendment must be construed in the selfsame functional sense as the verb "arming" in the power of Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia".[2787] That is, Congress must "provide for * * * arming" "the people" with the same types of "Arms" they have "the right * * * to keep and bear". And "the people" have "the right * * * to keep and bear" the same types of "Arms" with which Congress is "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia".

---

[2786] See Bond v. United States, No. 09-1227, ___ U.S. ___ (2011).

[2787] Compare U.S. Const. amend. II with art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

(1) Self-evidently, "Arms" of this sort must relate to some form of service, actual or potential, in or for the Militia, rather than to some other activity. First and foremost, "well regulated Militia" must possess "Arms" suited for the deadly serious work of community self-preservation against every possible enemy—domestic as well as foreign, from private criminals to rogue public officials to invading armies. So "the people" must enjoy "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" that are of standard military type or better, at least as serviceable for military purposes as the "Arms" carried by troops performing equivalent duties in America's regular Armed Forces. Of course, not every individual among "the people" may need to be provided with such "Arms" in order to perform the specific Militia duties to which he is assigned. But all of them must be ready and able to exercise "the right" to acquire and permanently to possess such "Arms" in order, if called forth, to perform duties for which "Arms" of that type are requisite.

(2) Although the ideal must be to provide first-class military-grade "Arms" to everyone eligible for the Militia, that goal may not always be achievable in practice. Especially during the initial stages of revitalizing the Militia today, sufficient quantities of firearms of standard military types may simply not be available. "Substitute standards" will have to be adopted, then.

Conceivably, the Second Amendment does not guarantee "a right * * * to keep and bear Arms" that are utterly unsuited to any service in or for "[a] well regulated Militia".[2788] Yet to imagine what sort of "Arms" would always prove wholly unsuitable for any Militia service is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible. Even airguns, which some contemporary statutes treat as equivalent to firearms,[2789] could be used to train Militiamen in marksmanship, which undoubtedly would enhance their ability to perform some of their duties with actual firearms. And in extreme situations airguns could profitably be employed by Militiamen deployed as irregulars, partisans, guerrilleros, francs-tireurs, or résistants.[2790] Considerations of this kind establish that a class of functional firearms (and, of course, ammunition and accoutrements to go with them) not to any degree suitable for any Militia service under any conditions probably has never existed, and certainly does not exist [2788] Such arms might well find protection under some other constitutional provision, though. See U.S. Const. amend. IX.

---

[2789] See, e.g., Code of Virginia § 18.2-282(A) (emphasis supplied): "It shall be unlawful for any person to point, hold or brandish any firearm or any air or gas operated weapon or any object similar in appearance, whether capable of being fired or not, in such manner as to reasonably induce fear in the mind of another[.]"

[2790] See, e.g., H. von Dach, Der Total Widerstand: Kleinkriegsanleitung für Jedermann (Biel, Switzerland: Schweizerischen Unteroffiziersverband, Dritte Auflage, 1966), published in translation from an earlier edition as Total Resistance: Swiss Army Guide to Warfare and Undergrounds (Boulder, Colorado: Paladin Press, 1965). See generally Encyclopedia of Firearms, ante note 428, at 141-142.

now.[2791] Rather, depending upon circumstances, essentially any working firearm can be found suitable, or can be made suitable, for some kind of Militia service.

Especially during revitalization of the Militia, "substitute standards" should include the best firearms "the people" can acquire in the free market; or, if nothing better is available, then whatever "the people" already possess. Whatever can be put to Militia use must be, whenever the need arises. For something is invariably better than nothing. After all, the first goal today must be to arm Militiamen, if necessary with whatever happens to be available, so as to enable the Militia to begin providing "the security of a free State" to a meaningful degree—and thereby enable "the people" to compel the dissolution of the National para-military police-state apparatus centralized in the Department of Homeland Security. Only after that has been accomplished should extra efforts be expended to standardize Militiamen's "Arms" as to type; then to bring all of their "Arms" to the same high level of quality; and finally to take advantage of innovations in technology. At every stage of this process, though, the rule upon which the entire sequence rests—that, all other things being equal, availability equals acceptability—must always be employed, inasmuch as something unavailable can never be acceptable. And that rule can always be satisfied, inasmuch as, in good hands, whatever is available can be made at least marginally serviceable.

So, because essentially all working firearms are or can be made suitable for some Militia service, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" embraces essentially any and every working firearm. Moreover, the sources from which "the people" obtain their firearms are irrelevant to their "right" to possess those firearms. The Second Amendment applies to whatever "Arms" "the people" may provide for themselves—whether: (i) collectively through the efforts of "the people['s]" representatives in the General Government and their States' governments, or (ii) collectively through the Militia of the several States; or (iii) individually through their own efforts in the free market; or even (iv) individually through their own manufacture in home workshops.

(3) Although certain types of firearms may be preferred for certain purposes in "well regulated Militia", nonetheless, because in the final analysis all types of firearms are suitable for some kinds of Militia service, no particular class of firearms is the unique subject of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". This is worthy of very heavy emphasis, in order to expose and overcome the disinformation "gun controllers"—in both public office and private station—regularly promulgate

---

[2791] "Functional" is the necessary qualification here, because firearms that have fallen into serious disrepair, and gunpowder that has spoiled (as black powder especially is wont to do), are unfit for Militia (or perhaps any other) service. Those firearms that cannot be put right are properly treated more as collections of possibly salvageable parts than as actual "firearms". Similarly, decomposed gunpowder is not really "gunpowder" at all, because it can neither function as such nor be restored to its previous usable state.

to the effect that the Second Amendment protects only firearms specifically designed or typically used for so-called "sporting purposes" and perhaps for personal self-defense, but does not guarantee "the people['s]" possession of "Arms" of standard "military" types or better that would be especially suitable for service with the Militia.[2792]

Firearms particularly suitable for various "shooting sports" and for personal self-defense cannot be excluded from "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", because even such firearms can be employed for Militia purposes; but neither can they be the exclusive subjects of "the right", precisely because other kinds of firearms can be employed, and to better effect, for the Militia's most important purposes. The political purpose of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"—the goal of fielding truly "well regulated Militia" that can provide "the security of a free State" against all enemies—could never be achieved if that "right" were confined to "the people['s]" possession of firearms which, in some public officials' views, were solely or even particularly suitable for "sporting" purposes or for personal self-defense. After all, firearms designed for hunting, target shooting, trap and skeet shooting, so-called "practical" competition, and personal self-defense may or may not be suitable for general use in the Militia, depending upon their caliber, rate of fire, type of sights, ruggedness of construction, ease of maintenance, initial cost, and so on. For instance, a highly accurate, single-shot target rifle in .22 long rifle caliber, or a pocket-sized semiautomatic pistol in .25 ACP caliber, could conceivably be effective for some of the clandestine activities of an irregular, partisan, guerrillero, franc-tireur, or other résistant; and either could be used for personal self-defense. But neither would be fit for service as the primary type of firearm for most members of "[a] well regulated Militia". So the ultimate test of whether a firearm qualifies for protection under the Second Amendment obviously cannot be its adequacy, let alone superiority, for some "sporting" use or even for personal protection. Nonetheless, "sporting" uses and personal protection are the criteria for "the people['s]" possession of firearms that tend to be stressed these days to the exclusion of the arms' suitability for true "Militia" service, not simply in public debate on the Second Amendment, but especially in legislation and judicial decisions.

(a) For the prime legislative example, the General Government's major "gun-control" enactments of the 1960s—the basic structures of which still dominate the legal scene today—eschewed an intent "to place any undue or unnecessary Federal restrictions or burdens on law-abiding citizens with respect to the acquisition, possession, or use of firearms appropriate to the purpose of hunting, trap shooting, target shooting, personal protection, or any other lawful activity".[2793] Apparently, however, both of these statutes implicitly reserved for Congress a supposed discretion to impose through some future enactment whatever restrictions and burdens its then-Members might desire with respect to the acquisition, possession, or use of all other firearms—or even all firearms whatsoever, if rogue Congressmen should determine that no "lawful activity" is "appropriate" for the use of any firearms by "law-abiding citizens", or that citizens in very large numbers are not sufficiently "law-abiding" to be allowed access to firearms.

[2792] The qualification "perhaps" is necessary, because the most doctrinaire "gun controllers" deny that the Amendment guarantees any right to possess firearms intended primarily for individuals' use in self-defense, such as semiautomatic pistols equipped with high-capacity magazines.

Moreover, an explicit reference to service in "the Militia of the several States" in this Congressional litany of temporarily permissive uses for firearms was conspicuous by its absence—indeed, glaringly so, in light of Congress's power and duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia",[2794] and of the "right of the people to keep and bear Arms" which the Second Amendment ties inextricably to "[a] well regulated Militia". For, taken together, these mandate that Congress "provide for * * * arming * * * the [people]". To be sure, the statutes' list of allowable purposes might be taken implicitly to embrace service in the Militia, because it included "personal protection, or any other lawful activity". After all, in each individual's own life, "personal protection" involves direct enforcement of the laws against some aggressor, which is the very first of the three functions of "the Militia of the several States" when "employed in the Service of the United States",[2795] as well as at all other times when they are employed in the service of their respective States. And service in the Militia is not only a "lawful activity" but even a constitutional duty for all free, adult, able-bodied Americans. Yet the suspicion that Members of Congress did not have common Americans' service in the Militia in mind when they adopted the phrase "personal protection, or any other lawful activity" another sub-section of the very same section of the first statute confirmed, when it complained that "the United States has become the dumping ground of the castoff surplus military weapons of other nations, and that such weapons, and the large volume of relatively inexpensive pistols and revolvers (largely worthless for sporting purposes), has [sic] contributed greatly to lawlessness and to the Nation's law enforcement problems".[2796] Surely, however, "surplus military weapons of other

---

[2793] An Act To assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes ("Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968"), Act of 19 June 1968, Pub. L. 90-351, TITLE IV—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 901(b), 82 Stat. 197, 226 (emphasis supplied). Accord, AN ACT To amend title 18, United States Code, to provide for better control of the interstate traffic in firearms ("Gun Control Act of 1968"), Act of 22 October 1968, Pub. L. 90-618, TITLE I—STATE FIREARMS CONTROL ASSISTANCE, § 101, 82 Stat. 1213, 1213-1214 (same declaration). The latter Act superseded the former with respect to its substantive provisions on "gun control".

[2794] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16. See ante, at 50-54.

[2795] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[2796] Act of 19 June 1968, § 901(a)(7), 82 Stat. at 226 (emphasis supplied).

nations" are anything but "worthless" for the purpose of arming tens of millions of Americans in "the Militia of the several States" at minimal expense. And are "relatively inexpensive pistols and revolvers" really "worthless" for the "personal protection" of individuals the statute claims to favor? Moreover, even if some "surplus military weapons" and "relatively inexpensive pistols and revolvers" do become involved in domestic "lawlessness" on the part of true criminals, how can that justify imposing any "Federal restrictions or burdens on law-abiding citizens"? The past, let alone the merely possible future, criminal behavior of one individual neither defines nor can confine the constitutional rights, let alone the constitutional duties, of any other, law-abiding citizen:

> The constitutional rights of [innocent citizens] are not to be sacrificed or yielded to the violence and disorder which have followed upon the actions of [others]. * * * "[I]mportant as is the preservation of the public peace, this aim cannot be accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created or protected by the * * * Constitution." * * * Thus law and order are not * * * to be preserved by depriving [innocent citizens] of their constitutional rights.[2797]

Indeed, stripping common Americans of firearms they can use for their Militia service will end true "law and order" by removing the possibility of maintaining in operation what the Constitution itself declares is "necessary to the security of a free State". And to what degree would "the Nation's law enforcement problems" likely be attenuated, if not largely solved, were most of those "surplus military weapons" delivered into the hands of millions of trained Militiamen deployed to execute the laws throughout every State and Locality?

Even more obviously, "the Militia of the several States" can never be adequately armed if public officials can deny private citizens the right to possess the very firearms particularly suitable for Militia service, on the ground that they are not designed for some "sporting" purpose. A notorious case in point is the now-defunct "Public Safety and Recreational Firearms Use Protection Act of 1994".[2798] The [2797] Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 16 (1958).

---

[2798] An Act To control and prevent crime ("Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994"), Act of 13 September 1994, Pub. L. 103-322, TITLE XI—FIREARMS, Subtitle A—Assault Weapons ("Public Safety and Recreational Firearms Use Protection Act"), 108 Stat. 1796, 1996. This statute expired in 2004. § 110105(2), 108 Stat. at 2000. But its noxious principles could be resurrected at any time, and therefore warrant scrutiny.

Indeed, one can expect that the fundamental poisonous principle at work in this statute—that is, "condemnation by adjective"—will be raised, again and again. The basic verbal scam is a simple application of the folk wisdom: To kill a dog, you must first call it mad. If the wordsmiths in factions and other special-interest groups can convince legislators and judges to affix an emotionally charged, opprobrious modifier to some constitutional term, then supposedly the activity subsumed within or connected with that term can be severely "regulated" or even prohibited altogether. Thus, in order to rationalize limiting WE THE PEOPLE'S possession of certain "Arms", "gun controllers" attack "assault weapons" or "cop-killer bullets". Self-evidently, however, malign animus behind this statute emerged most clearly in the portion of its title that emphasized "Recreational Firearms Use". The adjective took for granted that "the people['s]" possession of such firearms alone—on the basis of public officials' definition of them alone—is entitled to Congressional protection. In line with that unwarranted and dangerous assumption, the statute purported to ban private citizens' acquisition of newly manufactured so-called "semiautomatic assault weapons", including both certain specifically designated semiautomatic rifles then on the market "or copies or duplicates of th[os]e firearms in any caliber", and every other semiautomatic rifle that thereafter might be produced with certain characteristics typical of modern firearms used by the regular Armed Forces, including "an ability to accept a detachable magazine" and at least two other attributes from among: "a folding or telescoping stock", "a pistol grip that protrudes conspicuously beneath the action", "a bayonet mount", "a flash suppressor or threaded barrel designed to accommodate a flash suppressor", and "a grenade launcher".[2799] In conjunction with an earlier statute ironically entitled the "Firearm Owners' Protection Act" (and as of this writing still in force) which effectively precludes most private individuals from possessing machine guns and other fully automatic firearms,[2800] the "assault-weapons" ban struck—and no doubt was intended to strike—directly at the heart of "the Militia of the several States", by denying most Americans eligible for the Militia the very types of firearms undeniably most suitable for Militia service.

(b) A bare majority of the Justices put the Supreme Court's imprimatur on part of this nonsense in the Heller opinion.[2801] In its earlier opinion in Miller, the Court had correctly stated that the proper inquiry where the Second Amendment is concerned is whether the firearm in question "at this time has some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia"[2802]—which "reasonable relationship" would, upon proper analysis, encompass all firearms "at every contemporary firearm of military grade will qualify as an "assault weapon" under one or another common definition; and every type of ammunition for such a firearm—and for most high-powered rifles, for that matter—will be capable of defeating the low-grade body armor Local police forces typically use, and therefore qualifies as "cop-killer bullets". So, on the basis of this verbal legerdemain, THE PEOPLE'S possession of every type of firearm and ammunition peculiarly suitable for the Militia—and therefore in the front rank of the "Arms" "the people" enjoy "the right * * * to keep and bear"—can be severely "regulated" or prohibited. There is, of course, no limit to what classes of "Arms" can be vilified in this manner: for example, calling every common hunting rifle equipped with an optical sight a "sniper rifle", or every 12-gauge shotgun with a large-capacity magazine and a pump or semiautomatic action a "riot shotgun". Thus the Second Amendment can be nullified step by step through the application of adjectival invective.

---

[2799] Act of 13 September 1994, § 110102(b), 108 Stat. at 1997-1998.

[2800] An Act To amend chapter 44 (relating to firearms) of title 18, United States Code, and for other purposes ("Firearms Owners' Protection Act"), Act of 19 May 1986, Pub. L. 99-308, § 102(9) [§ 922(o)], 100 Stat. 449, 452-453; now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 922(o).

[2801] District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court). Heller was followed in McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. ___ (2010) (Alito, J., for the Court).

[2802] United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174, 178 (1939) (emphasis supplied).

this time" (or essentially any time). Contrary to the preposterous assertions in the majority opinion in Heller, the Court in Miller did not "uph[o]ld against a Second Amendment challenge two men's federal convictions for transporting an unregistered short-barreled shotgun in interstate commerce"; and it did not rule that "the type of weapon at issue was not eligible for Second Amendment protection".[2803] As no trial had yet been held in Miller when the case arrived at the Supreme Court, there were (and could have been) no "convictions". Rather, the Miller Court reversed a trial court's pre-trial dismissal of criminal charges on the narrow ground that, in the absence of actual evidence in the record, "it is not within judicial notice that this weapon is any part of the ordinary military equipment or that its use could contribute to the common defense"[2804]—thus leaving that issue to be decided by the trial court on remand of the case (which, in the event, it never was).

In direct contradiction of Miller, the majority in Heller opined that the "Arms" to which the Second Amendment refers need have no "reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia", but that the Amendment merely "guarantee[s] the individual right to possess and carry weapons in case of confrontation".[2805] Typically, however, this opinion then added the weasel-words that "we do not read the Second Amendment to protect the right of citizens to carry arms for any sort of confrontation"[2806]—thus reserving for the Judiciary the special license to misconstrue the Second Amendment in the future in whatever fanciful ways might suit the jurists' proclivities. According to the Heller majority, Miller "say[s] only that the Second Amendment does not protect those weapons not typically possessed by law-abiding citizens for lawful purposes, such as short-barreled shotguns" or "machineguns".[2807] Yet "machineguns"—and other modern firearms carried by infantrymen in the regular Armed Forces—are "not typically possessed by [many] law-abiding citizens for lawful purposes" today only and precisely because some statute purports to ban, or renders onerous, such possession[2808]—a situation the Heller majority plainly approved in its comments that: (i) it "would be a startling reading of the opinion [in Miller]" to suggest that "the National Firearm Act's restrictions on machineguns * * * might be unconstitutional":[2809] and (ii) because [2803] Pace 554 U.S. at 621-622 (Scalia, J., for the Court) (emphasis in the original).

---

[2804] 307 U.S. at 178.

[2805] 554 U.S. at 592 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

[2806] Id. at 595.

[2807] Id. at 625, 624.

[2808] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 922(o).

[2809] 554 U.S. at 624 (Scalia, J., for the Court). The reference is to the statute originally enacted as AN ACT To provide for the taxation of manufacturers, importers, and dealers in certain firearms and machine guns, to tax the sale or other disposal of such weapons, and to restrict importation and regulate the interstate transportation thereof, Act of 26 June 1934, CHAPTER 757, 48 Stat. 1236; now codified at 26 U.S.C. Chapter 53, §§ 5801 through 5872.

"nothing in [the Heller decision] should be taken to cast doubt on longstanding prohibitions on * * * the carrying of 'dangerous and unusual weapons'", it should not be objectionable "if weapons that are most useful in military service—M-16 rifles and the like—may be banned".[2810] Thus, the Justices in the majority in Heller excised from the Second Amendment the very firearms perhaps most suitable today for Militia service: "M-16 rifles and the like". But they held that, because "the inherent right of self-defense has been central to the Second Amendment right", and because handguns form "an entire class of 'arms' that is overwhelmingly chosen by American society for that lawful purpose", therefore "banning [handguns] from the home * * * fail[s] constitutional muster". A "ban on handgun possession in the home violates the Second Amendment, as does [a] prohibition against rendering any lawful firearm in the home operable for the purpose of immediate self-defense"; and therefore public officials "must permit [an individual] to register his handgun and must issue him a license to carry it in the home".[2811]

Although often touted as a great victory for the Second Amendment, this decision exhibits two rather sinister aspects that give the lie to its undeserved reputation among the credulous:

First, Heller did not secure for average Americans a "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" anywhere near as extensive as the right their forebears enjoyed during *pre-*constitutional times. Rather, Heller endorsed only the highly truncated "right" to possess certain types of firearms for certain limited purposes which *pre-*constitutional English and American law had allowed to the most highly disfavored classes of individuals.

For example, English Catholics as a class (disparaged as "Papists" in the idiom of that day) were suspected of disloyalty, because they were presumed to oppose the legalized Protestant monopoly over the British Crown.[2812] "As to papists", Blackstone explained, > a general toleration of them [would be allowable]: provided their separation [from the Established Church of England] was founded only upon difference of opinion in religion, and their principles did not also extend to a subversion of the civil government. If once they could be

---

[2810] 554 U.S. at 626-627 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

[2811] Id. at 628-629, 635 (emphasis supplied). Although the Justices in the minority went even further, being willing to exclude from the Amendment's protection even the handguns the majority included, their views sounded only in dissent. And inasmuch as no one's possession of "M-16 rifles and the like" was at issue in the case, even the statements on that score in the majority's opinion were merely obiter dicta. Nonetheless, a minority of four can easily enough become a majority of five through a change in one Justice's viewpoint or in the composition of the Court. And unsupportable dicta from the Court have a bad habit of becoming the bases for actual holdings in the opinions of inferior courts—and in this instance will surely serve as grist for the propaganda-mills of "gun controllers".

[2812] See, e.g., W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 210-217.

> brought to renounce the supremacy of the pope, they might quietly enjoy [the other tenets of Catholicism] * * * . But while they acknowledge a foreign power, superior to the sovereignty of the kingdom, they cannot complain if the laws of that kingdom will not treat them upon the footing of good subjects.[2813]

On the basis of their supposedly ineradicable disloyalty to the Protestant Kingdom, and to prevent them from posing any threat of effective revolt or resistance, Catholics were prohibited from possessing arms suitable for military service. Without such arms in their hands, of course, they could neither deter nor defend themselves against oppression, could not pressure the government to redress their grievances, could not demand political and religious equality with Protestants, and could not prove their loyalty by keeping and bearing arms in defense of King and country.

Hawkins described the particular "Restraint[ ] * * * which relates to the keeping of Arms" imposed perforce of a statute of King James I upon English Catholic "Recusants" who refused to attend "the Established Church":

> *That all such Armour, Gun-powder, and Munition of whatsoever Kinds, as any Popish Recusant convict shall have in his own House or elsewhere, or in the Possession of any other at his Disposition, shall be taken from him by Warrant of four Justices of Peace * * * (except such necessary Weapons, as shall be allowed him by the said four Justices, for the Defence of his Person or House) and that the said Armour, &c. so taken, shall be kept at the Costs of such Recusant * * * .* And it is further enacted, That notwithstanding the taking away such Armour, &c. yet such Recusant shall be charged with the maintaining of the same, and with the providing of a Horse, &c. in such Sort as others of his Majesty's Subjects.[2814]

This basic scheme "relating to the keeping Arms" was continued in the reign of King William I and Queen Mary against Catholics who, putting the King of Kings ahead of the King of England, "refus[ed] to make a Declaration against some of the Principal Doctrines of the Popish Religion":

> [A]*ny two Justices of Peace may and ought to tender * * * [a] Declaration to any Person whom they shall know or suspect * * * as being a Papist * * * ; and * * * no such Person so required, and not making and subscribing the said Declaration, * * * shall keep any Arms or Ammunition, or Horse above the Value of five Pounds, in his own Possession, or in the Possession of any other*

[2813] Id., Volume 4, at 54.

[2814] A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter XII, § 17, at 22, 25-26.

> Person to his Use, (other than such necessary Weapons, as shall be allowed him by the Quarter-Sessions for the Defence of his House or Person) [.][2815]

This, and no more, is precisely what* Heller *allowed to the average American as against the General Government: no complete right of a free man to possess "weapons that are most useful in military service—M-16 rifles and the like", but instead the highly constrained right of a member of a religiously and politically disfavored minority only to possess in his home a handgun "operable for the purpose of immediate self-defense", "to register his handgun" with public officials, and to be "issue[d] * * * a license to carry it in [his] home".[2816]

Similarly, during the French and Indian War, American Catholics were suspected of disloyalty throughout the Colonies, because France was largely a Catholic country and the British Empire predominately Protestant. For that reason, a Virginia statute of 1756 prescribed that,

> WHEREAS it is dangerous at this time to permit Papists to be armed, * * * it shall, and may be lawful, for any two or more justices of the peace, who shall know, or suspect any person to be a Papist, * * * to tender to such person * * * the oaths appointed by act of parliament to be taken * * * ; and if such person * * * shall refuse to take the said oaths, * * * or shall refuse, or forebear to appear * * * for the taking the said oaths, * * * such person * * * shall * * * be liable and subject to all and every the penalties, forfeitures, and disabilities hereafter in this act mentioned.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * And for the better securing the lives and properties of his majesty's faithful subjects, * * * no Papist, or reputed Papist so refusing, or making default * * * , shall, or may have, or keep in his house or elsewhere, or in the possession of any other person to his use, or at his disposition, any arms, weapons, gunpowder or ammunition, (other than such necessary weapons as shall be allowed to him, by order of the justices of the peace * * * , for the defence of his house or person) and that any two or more justices of the peace * * * may authorise and impower any person or persons in the day-time, with the assistance of the constables * * * to search for all arms, weapons, gunpowder or ammunition, which shall be in the house, custody, or possession of any such Papist, or reputed Papist, and seize the same for the use of his majesty and his successors * * * .
>
> * * * [E]very Papist, or reputed Papist, who shall not, within the space of ten days after such refusal, or making default * * * , discover and

---

[2815] Id., Book I, Chapter XIV, Introduction and § 4, at 28, 29. Blackstone mentioned but the bare bones of these prohibitions against English Catholics' possession of arms; but his reference to Hawkins enabled his reader to fill in the details. Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 54-56 & note c.

[2816] 554 U.S. at 635 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

> deliver * * * to some of his majesty's justices of the peace, all arms, weapons, gunpowder or ammunition, which he shall have in his house or elsewhere, or which shall be in the possession of any person to his use, or at his disposition, or shall hinder or disturb any person or persons, authorised * * * to search for, and seize the same; that every such person so offending * * * shall be committed to the goal of the county where he shall commit such offence, * * * there to remain without bail or mainprize for the space of three months, and shall also forfeit and lose the said arms, and pay treble the value of them to the use of his majesty and his successors * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * Provided always, That if any person who shall have refused or made default * * * shall desire to submit and conform * * * and shall * * * in open court take the said oaths, * * * he shall from thenceforth be discharged of and from all disabilities and forfeitures[.]{EN-2047}

Thus, Catholics who refused to take the prescribed oaths were not entirely disarmed, even if they were believed on good grounds to be actually disloyal. For the statute permitted them to retain "such necessary weapons as shall be allowed * * * by order of the justices of the peace * * * for the defence of * * * house or person"—the imperative "shall be allowed" indicating that perhaps the justices could not deny any such allowance at all, although they surely retained the leeway in each particular case to determine what constituted "necessary weapons" for purposes of an individual's personal defense. Again, this is precisely the "right" that* Heller *so graciously allowed to the average American as against the General Government.

Of course, Catholics were not the only individuals whom Protestant Americans during pre-constitutional times kept in a state of complete or partial disarmament. Far outnumbering them were slaves and free persons of color. To Americans of that era, "arms * * * [we]re the only true badges of liberty; and ought never, but in times of utmost necessity be put into the hands or mercenaries or slaves".[2817] Indeed, disarmament was considered the indispensable "badge and incident" of slavery.[2818] Disarmament often extended as well to free persons of color who, although emancipated, were generally considered to "ha[ve] no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them"—or, more bluntly put, "no rights which the white man was bound to respect".[2819] This was probably as much a practical necessity of the social situation as the outgrown of some sort of racialist ideology among "those who held

---

[2817] A. Fletcher, A DISCOURSE OF GOVERNMENT, ante note 31, at 43.

[2818] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 416.

[2819] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 405, 407 (1857) (opinion of Taney, C.J.).

the power and the Government". For had the slaves regularly observed free people of color moving about with arms in their hands, they might have begun to question their servile status, and to harbor dangerous ideas about "equality" and "rights" that arms in their own hands could have secured for them. So, in Virginia throughout the pre-constitutional period, disarmament of these people was the norm:

> • [1639] "ALL persons except negroes to be provided with arms and amunition or be fined[.]"{EN-2048}
>
> • [1680] "[I]t shall not be lawfull for any negroe or other slave to carry or arme himselfe with any club, staffe, gunn, sword or any other weapon of defence or offence[.]"{EN-2049}
>
> • [1705] "That no slave go armed with gun, sword, club, staff, or other weapon * * * : And if any slave shall be found offending herein, it shall be lawful for any person or persons to apprehend and deliver such slave to the next constable or head-borough, who is hereby * * * required, without further order or warrant, to give such slave twenty lashes on his or her bare back, well laid on, and so send him or her home[.]"{EN-2050}
>
> • [1723] "[N]o negro, mulatto, or Indian whatsoever; (except as is hereafter excepted,) shall * * * presume to keep, or carry any gun, powder, shot, or any club, or other weapon whatsoever, offensive or defensive; but that every gun, and all powder and shot, and every such club or weapon * * * found or taken in the hands, custody, or possession of any such negro, mulatto, or Indian, shall be taken away; and * * * be forfeited to the seisor and informer, and moreover, every such negro, mulatto, or Indian, in whose hands, custody, or possession, the same shall be found, shall * * * receive any number of lashes, not exceeding thirty-nine, well laid on, on his or her bare back, for every such offence.
>
> " * * * Provided nevertheless, That every free negro, mullatto, or indian, being a house-keeper, or listed in the militia, may be permitted to keep one gun, powder, and shot; and that those who are not house-keepers, nor listed in the militia * * * , who are now possessed of any gun, powder, shot, or any weapon, offensive or defensive, may sell and dispose thereof, at any time before the last day of October next ensuing. And that all negros, mullattos, or indians, bond or free, living at any frontier plantation, be permitted to keep and use guns, powder, and shot, or other weapons, offensive or defensive; having first obtained a license for the same, from some justice of the peace of the county wherein such plantations lie * * * upon the application of such free negros, mullattos, or indians, or of the owner or owners of such as are slaves[.]"{EN-2051}
>
> • [1748]"[N]o negroe, mulattoe, or Indian whatsoever, shall keep, or carry any gun, powder, shot, club, or other weapon, whatsoever, offensive, or defensive, but all and every gun, weapon, and ammunition, found in the custody or possession of any negroe, mulattoe, or Indian, may be seized by any person, and * * * be forfeited to the seizor, for his own > use; and moreover, every such offender shall * * * receive * * * any number of lashes, not exceeding thirty nine, on his, or her bare back, well laid on, for every such offence.

>
> " * * * Provided nevertheless, That every free negroe, mulattoe, or Indian, being a house keeper, may be permitted to keep one gun, powder, and shot: And all negroes, mullattoes, or Indians, bond or free, living at any frontier plantation, may be permitted to keep and use guns, powder, shot, and weapons, offensive, or defensive, by license, from a justice of peace, of the county wherein such plantations lie, to be obtained upon the application of free negroes, mulattoes, or Indians, or of the owners of such as are slaves[.]"{EN-2052}
>
> • [1785] "No slave shall keep any arms whatever, nor pass unless with written orders from his master or employer, or in his company with arms, from one place to another. Arms in possession of a slave contrary to this prohibition, shall be forfeited to him who will seize them."{EN-2053}

Thus, in most cases a slave was suffered to possess no firearms at all, "unless with written orders from his master * * * or in his company with arms". Those slaves who happened to be "living at any frontier plantation" were "permitted to keep and use guns, powder, and shot", but only after "having first obtained a license * * * from some justice of the peace * * * upon the application of * * * [their] owners". Free people of color were slightly better off. Not unlike the slaves, those who were "living at any frontier plantation" were "permitted to keep and use guns, powder, and shot, * * * having first obtained a license * * * from some justice of the peace * * * upon the[ir own] application". But those "being a house-keeper, or listed in the militia" were "permitted to keep one gun, powder and shot", wherever they might have lived. The latter allowance was not intended to arm these people for actual Militia service, however, as free people of color who were "listed in the militia" in Virginia were instructed not to bring their firearms to Militia musters.[2820]

Rather depressingly for the Supreme Court in "the land of the free", the majority opinion in Heller could have been written by the draftsmen who composed these oppressive statutes. Like slaves in *pre-*constitutional times, common Americans under Heller must obtain the permission of their masters, the judges, to possess such firearms as the judges condescend to allow, and that only after years of expensive litigation. Like free people of color in that era, with the permission of judges common Americans under Heller may possess firearms perhaps suitable for personal defense in their homes—but certainly not suitable for most Militia service. Actually, free persons of color in Virginia during the *pre-*constitutional period were better off than common Americans today under Heller, because the statutes did not limit them to any particular kind of firearm—so they might have possessed muskets or even rifles as good as or even better than the standard "military" types of their day. Fundamentally, then, this is the majestic "individual right" "to keep and bear Arms" protected by Heller: the narrow "right" niggardly allowed during *pre-*constitutional times to distrusted if not despised Catholics, to some slaves, and to free people of color who had "no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them". And Heller grudgingly extended this "right" to Americans by only a gossamer five-to-four majority of the Justices—with the dissenters keen on reducing it effectively to nonexistence.

---

[2820] See ante, at 468.

Second, besides truncating "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" for Americans as individuals, Heller eviscerated that right for the community. A handgun would not be considered suitable as the average contemporary Militiaman's primary firearm. And to confine the possession and use of a handgun as of "right" to an individual's home would in almost all cases exclude the possibility that the individual would be able to interact with other armed individuals in a concerted, organized fashion. So, if (as Heller held) "the inherent right of [personal] self-defense" becomes so "central to the Second Amendment right" that "M-16 rifles and the like * * * may be banned" without offending the Amendment, what happens to "the inherent right of [community] self-defense" through "well regulated Militia"? If the Second Amendment protects average Americans' possession only of handguns useful for personal self-defense, and not of firearms particularly suitable for Militia service, the possession of which public officials may ban at will; and if public officials may restrict the possession of even such handguns to the limited confines of an individual's home—then under Heller's misconstruction of the Amendment no "well regulated Militia" can ever exist as a matter of constitutional right, and soon enough as a matter of fact. In such circumstances, what must befall "the security of a free State"? Inasmuch as the personal possession of handguns solely within the walls of one's home is plainly insufficient for the operation of any "well regulated Militia", no "free State" can exist as a matter of constitutional right, and soon enough as a matter of fact, either.

These perverse consequences should hardly surprise anyone. Firearms particularly adapted to Militia service, although usually sufficient, are generally not necessary, and may even be problematic, for personal self-defense. In the *pre-*constitutional era, for instance, a musket fitted for a bayonet could have been used for personal self-defense in a "civilian" setting. Yet the bayonet, or the musket's ability to mount a bayonet, would not have been necessary for that purpose, because self-defense with that or any other firearm would not have been seriously hindered by the firearm's lack of a bayonet, or even by the firearm's incapability to mount a bayonet (and under some circumstances might even have been impeded had the bayonet been attached). Whereas, the bayonet—and therefore the firearm's ability to mount a bayonet—and therefore perhaps a particular type of firearm—would have been necessary (or at least highly desirable) for military service against regular enemy troops, particularly when they were so equipped. Similarly, today, the "Arms" to which "the right of the people" most strongly pertains are firearms that would be contra-indicated in practice for personal self-defense in most situations: For example, neither an M-16 or AR-10 type automatic rifle loaded with fully jacketed 5.56 x 45 mm or 7.62 x 51 mm ammunition would be an informed individual's first choice for defending his own home against a single burglar, when a good .40, .44, or .45 caliber pistol or revolver, or a pump-action 12-gauge shotgun loaded with (say) No. 4 buckshot were available. And being contra-indicated, the most effective of Militia "Arms" are almost always never even proposed by knowledgeable people for the purpose of personal self-defense under normal circumstances in one's abode, his place of business, or on the street. Where in the contemporary United States do typical courses for average Americans on self-defense with firearms actually teach, recommend, or even describe the use of the bayonet, let alone the fully automatic rifle or submachine gun? So, of course if firearms particularly suited for individual self-defense are the essential concern of the Second Amendment, then firearms ill-suited for that purpose do not enjoy the full (or perhaps any) protection of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", and for that reason arguably may even be banned from private possession altogether, notwithstanding that they are preëminently suitable for Militia service. Now that the Supreme Court in Heller has identified personal self-defense as the Second Amendment's focus, rogue public officials employing that legal fiction as their fulcrum will be emboldened to lever out of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" those firearms most valuable for Militia service, or at least to continue radically to restrict their use by "the people". Whereas, if all firearms in any way suitable for the performance of any conceivable Militia duties are included in that "right" (as they should be), then both personal and community self-defense will be served—and the depredations of both private and public criminals will be deterred or defeated. The only question that remains to be answered, then, is whether the majority opinion in Heller should be taken as the inadvertent product of stupidity or the intentional result of subversion.

More than idle curiosity prompts this concern. For the majority of the Justices in Heller traveled well outside of the confines of the issue before the Court in an attempt to deceive Americans into believing that the Second Amendment guarantees no "right of the people to keep and bear" "'dangerous and unusual weapons'" which are not "'in common use at the [present] time'". Unfortunately for their credibility, in this endeavor the Justices stumbled on the rocks of self-contradiction as well as perverse consistency. The self-contradiction being that they accepted as "true today that a militia, to be as effective as militias in the 18th century, would require sophisticated arms that are highly unusual in society at large"; while they also took for granted that "weapons that are most useful in military service—M-16 rifles and the like" may be rendered "highly unusual in society at large" precisely by "be[ing] banned" through some form of "gun control" from "the people['s]" possession, and thereby from their use in the Militia.[2821] The perverse consistency being that, across the board, the Justices denied that common Americans enjoy any rights in the premises: no "right * * * to keep and bear [sophisticated] Arms"; therefore no right to participate in Militia "well regulated" in that particular—and, because "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'", with the degree of power being directly proportional to the number and sophistication of the guns, no right to "the security of a free State", either.

In this instance, "[a] foolish consistency is [worse than even] the hobgoblin of little minds".[2822] It spills over into anti-constitutional absurdity. For, contrary to the majority in Heller, no so-called "modern development" could "limit[ ] the degree of fit between the prefatory clause [in the Second Amendment]"—that is, "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State"—and "the protected right" "of the people to keep and bear Arms".[2823] The Second Amendment defines "the degree of fit" as both perfect and permanent. Thus, absent a new Amendment of the Constitution, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" must relate, in the nature of cause and effect, to "[a] well regulated Militia". So of course "the people" must possess the "sophisticated arms" such a Militia requires—even if, initially, these might be considered "'dangerous and unusual weapons'" which are not "'in common use at the [present] time'". The supposed problem posed by such "arms", after all, is self-eradicating: Once "the people" have come to possess them, they will be "in common use" and thus no longer "'unusual'"; and once "the people" have trained with them, they will no longer be "'dangerous'" (except, naturally, to the enemies of "the people").

"[S]ophisticated arms" would doubtlessly include, not just fully automatic rifles (such as the M-16), but also submachine guns, heavy machine guns, hand grenades, mortars, anti-tank and anti-aircraft rockets, and even light artillery. All of these "Arms" would serve an undeniable Militia purpose. All of these "Arms" "the people" could "keep and bear" in the same sense of personal possession that they can "keep and bear" ordinary rifles and pistols. Therefore all of these "Arms" must come within "the right of the people". To be sure, many of these "Arms" would not be available for purchase by just anyone at the corner gun store, because they are specialized "crew-served" arms. Relatively few Militiaman would be assigned to use mortars, anti-tank and anti-aircraft rockets, and especially light artillery. The few who were selected would be highly trained. Their initial possession of those arms would be contingent upon their having completed comprehensive courses of instruction. And thereafter they would be subject to Militia supervision, with severe

---

[2821] 554 U.S. at 627 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

[2822] See Ralph Waldo Emerson, "Self-Reliance", in Essays (Boston, Massachusetts: James Munroe and Company, 1841).

[2823] Pace 554 U.S. at 627-628 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

penalties for any infractions of applicable regulations. Nonetheless, "the people" would have a true right to these "Arms", because such regulations would be necessary and proper for "well regulated Militia" (which "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" subserves)—would be promulgated for the benefit of the Militia—and would be executed within the Militia by members thereof, not by potentially rogue public officials with a malign interest in trying to strip the Militia of "sophisticated arms" so as to render them less than "well regulated" and thereby incapable of providing "the security of a free State". (Indeed, regulations of this sort would not differ in principle from the inspections conducted within the Militia in *pre-*constitutional times in order to ensure that Militiamen were actually supplied with adequate arms.)

(4) Just as the "Arms" "the people" enjoy "the right * * * to keep and bear" are not limited to firearms suitable only for "sport" or personal self-defense, and must include "sophisticated arms that are highly unusual in society at large" today only because of long-standing violations of the Second Amendment and the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution by rogue public officials, so too are those "Arms" not frozen in their development at the technological level of one particular era. Even the majority of the Justices in Heller mocked as "bordering on the frivolous" the argument that "only those arms in existence in the 18th century are protected by the Second Amendment"—opining instead that "the Second Amendment extends, prima facie, to all instruments that constitute bearable arms, even those that were not in existence at the time of the founding".[2824] "Prima facie", though, has nothing to do with the matter. Firearms are not simply presumed to fall within the "Arms" protected by the Second Amendment unless and until public officials contrive some argument to the contrary. For, all firearms being suitable for some conceivable Militia service, no such argument can be credited. So, too, with the technology of firearms. The proper inquiry where the Second Amendment (or any other constitutional provision relevant to the Militia) is concerned is whether the firearm in question "at this time has some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia".[2825] Therefore, where "the right of the people" to provide themselves with the most advanced "Arms" is in issue, the technological capabilities and possibilities of the particular time and place will be highly relevant.

By definition, in "well regulated Militia" "the people * * * keep and bear Arms" that are, to the greatest degree possible, fit for service according to the highest technological standards for firearms and ammunition available. Moreover, because "the security of a free State" is not a static, unchangeable concern, "well regulated Militia" that are "necessary" to such "security" must be capable of continuous, evolutionary adaptation to the threats confronting them as (or, better yet, well before) those threats actually arise. Therefore, "the people" must be able quickly to acquire up-to-date "Arms" at least equivalent, and preferably superior, in effectiveness to those that might be fielded by either: (i) foreign aggressors—which "the Militia of the several States" might have to oppose in fulfillment of their duty to "repel Invasions"; or (ii) rogue elements in this country's own regular Armed Forces or professional police departments—which the Militia might be required to confront in fulfillment of their duties "to execute the Laws of the Union" and to "suppress Insurrections".[2826]

---

[2824] Id. at 582.

[2825] United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174, 178 (1939) (emphasis supplied).

Necessarily, then, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" must allow for, encourage, and protect from "infinge[ment]" the on-going application of imagination, innovation, invention, and improvement with respect to the "Arms" "the people" possess. WE THE PEOPLE must be at liberty to demand, and the commercial market free to supply, not only "Arms" that are particularly suitable for the military, para-military, and police aspects of Militia service according to the highest standards of the present day (such as contemporary M-16 automatic rifles), and not only various "substitute standards" that "the people" can stockpile against any conceivable emergency (and perhaps use primarily for other than standard Militia purposes, such as hunting, target shooting, and personal self-defense), but also entirely new firearms or even types of firearms that exceed current military, para-military, and police requirements. No plausible reason exists why revitalized "Militia of the several States"—with membership in the tens of millions throughout the country, including large numbers of individuals imbued with originality, creativity, intelligence, and practical skills—with large discretionary budgets drawn from their collection of internal fines—with widely differing "homeland-security" challenges and consequently missions in each State—and therefore with the ability and incentive to experiment—should not be interested in and capable of developing an extremely wide variety of new firearms, ammunition, accoutrements, and other equipment, as well as tactics for employing them.

(5) Finally, should any political controversy arise over exactly what "Arms" the Second Amendment guarantees to "the people" "the right * * * to keep and bear"—for example, with public officials declaring that "'dangerous and unusual weapons'" which are not "'in common use at the [present] time'" can be banned, while "the people" demand a right to possess all "Arms" which are in any way suitable for service in "well regulated Militia", those "Arms'" supposedly "'dangerous and unusual'" character notwithstanding —"the people" themselves, rather than their mere representatives, must have the last word. After all, "the people" hardly enjoy a "right" to "Arms", if officialdom may define that term to extinction at pleasure.

[2826] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15. See J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, ante note 576, Volume 2, § 1897, at 646.

(a) As surprising as it may seem in an era in which "judicial supremacy" is widely mistaken for Holy Writ,[2827] as to "Arms" and everything else this is the fundamental rule of constitutional interpretation. As America's Founders learned from Blackstone, "whenever a question arises between the society at large and any magistrate vested with powers originally delegated by that society, it must be decided by the voice of the society itself: there is not upon earth any other tribunal to resort to".[2828] So, when WE THE PEOPLE "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution",[2829] they knew that "[t]he power to enact carries with it final authority to declare the meaning of the legislation".[2830]

THE PEOPLE never surrendered that authority to public officials. Indeed, they could not have surrendered it. The Declaration of Independence attests that "whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of [men's unalienable Rights], it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it", and "when a long train of abuses and usurpations * * * evinces a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government". Arising out of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", this "right" and especially this "duty" remain with "the People" always. Self-evidently, in such circumstances "the People" may exercise "their right" and fulfill "their duty" against rogue public officials notwithstanding whatever those officials may claim about the alleged lawfulness of their actions. But how can "the People" reliably identify such officials' actions as "becom[ing] destructive" of their "unalienable Rights", and constituting "a long train of abuses and usurpations", unless it lies within their very own "right" and "duty" to determine, by and for themselves and with finality, the extent to which those acts violate the Constitution, and therefore unless it lies within their very own "right" and "duty" to determine, by and for themselves and with finality in both fact and law, what the Constitution actually means, and how in particular circumstances it applies?

(b) In addition to the general rule, the Second Amendment explicitly reserves to "the people" the authority to determine with specificity and finality what "Arms" it protects. This is no merely whimsical license, because any such determination must comport with the pre-constitutional principles that define "[a] well regulated Militia". Yet, even subject to these standards, in the final analysis "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is "the right of the people", and of no one else. To be sure, in the necessary and proper exercise of their powers, public officials may define "Arms" in conformity with pre-constitutional principles—as, for [2827] Contrast Edwin Vieira, Jr., How To Dethrone the Imperial Judiciary (San Antonio, Texas: Vision Forum Ministries, 2004).

---

[2828] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 212.

[2829] U.S. Const. preamble.

[2830] Propper v. Clark, 337 U.S. 472, 484 (1949) (emphasis supplied).

example, when Congress "provide[s] for * * * arming * * * the Militia".[2831] But any attempt by rogue officeholders to define "Arms" in some manner not in conformity with pre-constitutional principles "infringe[s]" "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms". After all, if officials may dictate at discretion which "Arms" "the people" are allowed "to keep and bear" and particularly which they are not, then "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" reduces to nothing more than those officials' temporary and ever-mutable, ever-reducible grant to "the people". It becomes a "right" which officials cannot possibly "infringe[ ]", because they alone define its content.

(c) Finally, the general rule of constitutional construction and the Second Amendment are controlling, not for their own sakes, but because they are instruments to an higher end—namely, that the very survival of "a free State" depends upon WE THE PEOPLE'S supreme authority to define "Arms". Public office presents many temptations, opportunities, and facilities for aspiring usurpers and tyrants. And their own amorality, arrogance, avarice, ambition, and appetite for abusive powers never counsel such men to obey the law. So resistance to their schemes and shenanigans must be imposed ab extra. To prove effective, though, "checks and balances" must be entirely outside of their control, securely in the hands of other individuals with the greatest incentives to apply them seasonably and forcefully. The ultimate "checks and balances" against usurpation and tyranny are WE THE PEOPLE themselves, thoroughly armed and aware of their situation, authority, and power. This is largely a matter of necessity. THE PEOPLE are the usurpers' and tyrants' intended victims. THE PEOPLE can count on no succor other than an appeal to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God"—and in the final analysis "God helps those who help themselves".[2832] Inasmuch as "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[2833] the only way in which THE PEOPLE can adequately defend themselves against political oppression that itself grows out of the barrel of a gun is to deploy more guns, more resolutely, than the oppressors and their minions can. Such a disproportion of potential firepower can be marshaled only if THE PEOPLE are thoroughly organized and armed in "well regulated Militia". Which requires that THE PEOPLE always retain the ability "to keep and bear" whatever "Arms" they deem necessary and proper for Militia service. Which necessitates that the ultimate power to decide what "Arms" THE PEOPLE should possess remains solely in THE PEOPLE'S own hands, entirely out of public officials' control.

Political common sense counsels that, "when the contest is between the magistrate and the people * * * the question is only, whether the magistrate should depend upon the judgment of the people, or the people on that of the magistrate;

[2831] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 16 and 18.

[2832] A. Sidney, Discourses Concerning Government, ante note 54, at 210.

[2833] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

and which is most to be suspected of injustice".[2834] Today, with respect to "Arms", the "injustice" of public officials is not merely to be "suspected":

> • As a result of whose actions have the "Arms" most suitable for Militia service been demonized as "'dangerous and unusual weapons'", and so restricted and regulated that they are not "'in common use at the [present] time'", but are effectively banned from common Americans' possession? The actions of public officials.[2835]
>
> • To whom are these "'unusual weapons'" most "'dangerous'" at the present time? Where they now reside—in the hands of the regular Armed Forces and para-militarized police whose first loyalty is to the bureaucracies that pay their salaries—they are perfectly safe for public officials. But if recent political history is any guide, in those hands they may prove exceedingly "'dangerous'" to THE PEOPLE.[2836]
>
> • And why have public officials sequestered these "'dangerous and unusual weapons'" in the arsenals of their mercenaries? Out of knowledge, suspicion, and fear, surely. Rogue public officials know full well that they are oppressing THE PEOPLE, and intend to continue victimizing them as long as THE PEOPLE submit. Rogue officials suspect, however, that THE PEOPLE have awakened to what is going on, or soon will, and then will attempt to "secure the Blessings of Liberty to [them]selves and [their] Posterity", as the Constitution entitles them to do.[2837] Naturally, then, rogue officials fear "'dangerous and unusual weapons'"—even any effective arms in large numbers—that would enable THE PEOPLE to "throw off [an abusive] Government", as it is "their right" and "their duty" to do under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".[2838] That knowledge, suspicion, and fear are the root causes of the official mumbo jumbo which rationalizes banning "'dangerous and unusual weapons'" not "'in common use at the [present] time'". Indeed, that a public official supports a ban on common Americans' possession of these "'dangerous and unusual weapons" supplies conclusive evidence that he is a rogue. For no one with no good reason to fear THE

[2834] A. Sidney, Discourses Concerning Government, ante note 54, at 225 (emphasis supplied).

[2835] Admittedly, the big media, the intelligentsia, and various well-funded factions and other special-interest groups have provided so much assistance that they are all equally culpable, morally, politically, and legally. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242, and, e.g., In re Quarles, 158 U.S. 532 (1895); Logan v. United States, 144 U.S. 263, 293-295 (1892); United States v. Waddell, 112 U.S. 76, 77-81 (1884); Ex parte Yarborough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884).

[2836] Compare Rudolph J. Rummel, Death by Government: Genocide and Mass Murder in the Twentieth Century (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction Publishers, 1994), with David I. Caplan, "Weapons Control Laws: Gateways to Victim Oppression and Genocide", in Safeguarding Liberty, ante note 1225, at 307.

[2837] See U.S. Const. preamble.

[2838] Declaration of Independence.

> PEOPLE would not trust them with arms. And no one would have good reason to fear THE PEOPLE who had not harmed, or was not harming, or did not intend to harm them.
>
> To be sure, if these "'unusual weapons'" were "'in common use'" in THE PEOPLE'S hands they would inevitably prove "'dangerous'" to the rogue public officials who have usurped Heaven knows how many forbidden powers already, and lust after still more. But even successful usurpers and tyrants can lay no legitimate claim to be forever free from such peril. To the contrary: They deserve it, should expect it at any time of the day or night—and should live every moment of their lives in mortal dread of its arrival.

g. "[T]o keep and bear Arms". That the Second Amendment would not have referred to "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" unless "the right" had been quite familiar to Americans in *pre-*constitutional times does not mean that "the right" embraces only a single simple idea rather than embodying a multiplicity of perhaps complex claims. "Arms", it has just been shown, is a term easy to define. To elucidate the full meaning of "to keep and bear" requires more subtle analysis, however.

First, from one perspective, "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is plainly an unified concept: "the right [that is, one right] * * * to keep and bear Arms [that is, both actions as integral parts of the same pattern of behavior]". This is the common sense of the matter. Except for collectors and speculators, who acquire and deal in "Arms" which they themselves most likely never even consider using as such, a "right * * * to keep * * * Arms" would be pointless unless the possessor could also "bear" them in some manner for their intended purpose. In almost all cases, an individual "keep[s]" "Arms" so that he can "bear" them. Moreover, an individual cannot "bear Arms" at all unless he "keep[s]" them during the time he is "bear[ing]" them; and he cannot conveniently "bear Arms" that he does not "keep" in his possession, ready to "bear". Indeed, if an individual has no "right * * * to keep * * * Arms" at all, because some other party can prevent him from coming into possession of them in the first place, he has no "right * * * to * * * bear Arms", only a revocable license to "bear" them if and how that other party so allows. Thus, because typically an individual "keep[s]" the very "Arms" he intends to "bear", and "bear[s]" the very "Arms" he "keep[s]", "the right * * * to keep * * * Arms" presupposes "the right * * * to * * * bear" them, and "the right * * * to * * * bear Arms" presupposes "the right * * * to keep" them.

Not surprisingly, the full text of the Second Amendment confirms this commonsensical construction. Because the absolute clause of the Amendment controls its interpretation, "keep" and "bear" must be construed in mutually close conjunction. The Amendment guarantees "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" so that "the people", individually and collectively, will always be capable of serving in "the Militia of the several States". This requires that they always be able "[both] to keep and bear Arms", not just in some happenstance fashion, but in a manner suitable for their participation in "well regulated Militia" according to pre-constitutional principles—which means with "Arms" in their permanent personal possession, ready at all times for "the people" to bring forth into the field for service. Importantly, because the Second Amendment guarantees to "the people" "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" without let or hindrance from public officials, and because the purpose of this guarantee is to maintain "well regulated Militia" in each of the States, therefore the Amendment guarantees to "the people" "the right" to participate in "well regulated Militia"—either (in the normal conditions the Constitution presumes) under the aegis of appropriate statutes enacted by Congress and their States' legislatures, or (upon their representatives' default in times of crisis) under the aegis of the sovereign authority reserved to "the people" through the Tenth Amendment and the Declaration of Independence.

Of course, even an unitary "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" must include a number of subordinate rights, encompassing every particular action that makes up "keep[ing]" and "bear[ing]" as distinct types of behavior.

Second, from another perspective, the phrase "to keep and bear Arms" can be interpreted in a bifurcated manner, to embrace "the right * * * to keep * * * Arms" as a concept separate in certain particulars from "the right * * * to * * * bear Arms". To some degree, both common sense and the principles of the pre-constitutional Militia allow for this reading of the Amendment, too. For, in the Militia, although most individuals would both "keep and bear Arms", some would always "keep * * * Arms" but not necessarily always "bear" them (such as Militiamen exempted on the grounds of public office or private occupation from turning out for regular musters, or superannuated individuals who might be called forth only during "alarms"); and some might "bear Arms" who did not necessarily "keep" them (such as poor Militiamen to whom firearms owned by the public were distributed when they were called forth for Militia service, or minors whose parents owned and maintained custody over the firearms their children used to fulfill their duties).

Moreover, because individuals with no direct personal duty in the Militia "to keep and bear Arms"—such as free adult women—were never precluded from possessing and using "Arms" during the pre-constitutional era, today such individuals could "keep * * * Arms", or "bear Arms", in various ways unrelated to Militia service. That "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" is enumerated in the Second Amendment for the vast majority of "the people" who are eligible for the Militia does not mean that the few "people" not so eligible cannot claim a cognate (although perhaps in some particulars different) right of that kind—for, as the Ninth Amendment commands, "[t]he enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people".

Overall, then, to examine all of the possibilities, the meanings of both "keep" and "bear" should be treated separately.

(1) "[T]o keep * * * Arms". "[T]o keep" has many obvious meanings relevant to a "right" to "Arms", including: "[t]o retain", "[t]o have in custody", "not to let go", "[t]o preserve in a state of security", "[t]o protect; to guard", and simply "[t]o have in the house".[2839] Thus, "to keep * * * Arms" is a rather broad, yet also a remarkably precise, concept. Coupled with "the right of the people", definitions such as "[t]o have in the house", "[t]o retain", and "not to let go" compel the conclusion that "to keep * * * Arms" embraces average Americans' actual personal physical possession of "Arms", not simply their abstract titles to them as their personal property. And, because the Amendment does not temporally limit "the right * * * to keep", this actual personal physical possession is to be permanent.

This is not the result of an accidental choice of words. If the Amendment guaranteed (say) "the right * * * [to own] * * * Arms", rogue public officials could concede individuals' claims to formal ownership, yet also deny them any right to untrammeled actual personal physical possession, of those very "Arms", and thereby deprive them of all of the legitimate uses such possession would allow, except under whatever constraints suited those officials' fancies. In contemporary judicial jargon, private ownership would be recognized in principle, but would be "regulated" in practice, perhaps unto its effective extinction. Actual legal ownership of "Arms" is not necessary for their possession; but without actual possession (notwithstanding ownership) their use is impossible. And the Second Amendment's goal is their use by "the people" themselves whenever "the people" determine the need for it.

Definitions of "to keep" such as "[t]o have in custody", "[t]o protect; to guard", and "[t]o preserve in a state of security" go even further, indicating "the people['s]" permanent and complete legal authority to retain the personal physical possession of "Arms", because the Amendment excludes or exempts from its prohibition against "infringe[ments]" no individuals, offices, or institutions of any kind, at any time, or for any reason.

The best way to harmonize definitions of "keep" such as "[t]o have in the house" with definitions such as "[t]o have in custody"—which connect personal physical possession of "Arms", on the one hand, with specific legal authority as to "Arms", on the other—is to conclude that "the right * * * to keep * * * Arms" relates primarily to "the people['s]" ability to participate in "well regulated Militia". The Justices in the majority in the Heller case reversed this conclusion. They [2839] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 23 in the First Edition (1755), and 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 22 in the Fourth Edition (1773), respectively.

---

contended that "[t]he phrase 'keep arms' was not prevalent in the written documents of the founding period that we have found, but there are a few examples, all of which favor viewing the right to 'keep arms' as an individual right unconnected with militia service." The Justices did concede that "militia laws of the founding period * * * required militia members to 'keep' arms in connection with militia service". Notwithstanding that, they opined that "'[k]eep arms' was simply a common way of referring to possessing arms, for militiamen and everyone else".[2840] Obviously, though, the Justices forgot that "[a] well regulated Militia" includes just about "everyone". In any event, no matter whom they might have imagined "everyone else" to be, they explicitly admitted that "the right * * * to keep * * * Arms" can and does relate to "militia members"—that is, the part of WE THE PEOPLE eligible to participate in "well regulated Militia", who "keep * * * Arms" in anticipation of and readiness for Militia service. Moreover, because "the right * * * to keep * * * Arms" appears in an Amendment that links it instrumentally to "[a] well regulated Militia", the only plausible conclusion is that the Constitution's primary concern with the "keep[ing]" of "Arms" relates to "the people" eligible for the Militia and not to "everyone else". If "everyone else" were its focus, its nominative absolute clause would be not only unnecessary but even misleading.

In addition, plainly contrary to the notion floated by the majority in Heller, "the right * * * to keep * * * Arms" does not relate to "everyone else" without exception. For the most prominent example, the Second Amendment does not apply to the Armed Forces as such. Distinguishably from members of the Militia, members of the Armed Forces can claim no right even to temporary personal possession (let alone ownership) of the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements with which the General Government may supply them, except in conformity with the "Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces" that Congress "make[s]".[2841] Rather, upon the lawful command of their superior officers at any time, regular soldiers and sailors must lay down whatever arms they happen to possess. In contrast, members of the Militia who possess their own arms can never be compelled to surrender them to public officials, even when they may be properly exempted from part or all of their Militia duties because of physical or mental disability, superannuation, or other reason consistent with "the common defence" and "the general Welfare".[2842]

If Congress or a State's legislature supplies the Militia with public arms, it must invest every Militiaman who receives such arms with actual personal physical possession thereof—that is, recognize his "right * * * to keep * * * [those] Arms"—throughout his period of service. True enough, because public arms always [2840] 554 U.S. at 582-583 (Scalia, J., for the Court) (footnote omitted; emphasis in the original).

---

[2841] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

[2842] U.S. Const. preamble.

remain public property in terms of ownership, Militiamen who receive them should deliver those arms to their Militia officers as soon as their own service in the Militia ends or when other Militiamen may need those arms (for example, in the case of rotation in duty). But, save for those unavoidable (and presumably short) periods of time during which Militia officers transfer possession from one Militiaman to another, public arms should never leave the personal custody of some Militiaman required to employ them in the fulfillment of his own Militia duties. While they are being used for Militia service, public arms must be treated as each Militiaman's personal property in terms, not only of actual possession, but also of a right to possession.[2843]

These arrangements make perfect practical and political sense. The Founders recognized that "[a] well regulated Militia" requires the full participation of all eligible individuals within the community, which demands that each and every such individual be guaranteed a "right * * * to keep * * * Arms". For any individual's ability "to * * * bear Arms" could easily be frustrated if rogue public officials simply denied him possession of "Arms" by sequestering them in public armories or magazines, from which they would be handed out only to the officials' cronies and partisans, thereby destroying the Militia in order to make room for a species of Praetorian Guard or Shutzstaffel. *The only way to insure that everyone in the community is able "to * * * bear Arms" in the Militia whenever his own service is "necessary to the security of a free State"—which may be at* any *time—is to insure that everyone in the community is able "to keep * * * Arms" by him at* all times.

Furthermore, an individual's "right * * * to keep * * * Arms" implies more than just "hav[ing Arms] in [his] house". "[T]he people" have a constitutional right and duty "to keep * * * Arms" so that they are will be able "to * * * bear Arms" whenever necessary. "[T]he people" cannot "bear Arms" without access to "Arms". "[T]he right * * * to keep * * * Arms" presupposes, however, that an individual can always obtain suitable "Arms", because one cannot "keep" what one cannot procure in the first place. So, if "the right * * * to keep * * * Arms" is to have any practical effect, it must include the right to acquire "Arms". Which means that sufficient sources of suitable "Arms" must always be available to "the people" everywhere throughout America. Now, "Arms" can be acquired lawfully from two sources: the government and the free market. The Constitution delegates to Congress the power and duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia"[2844]—by causing the General Government to provide sufficient arms to the States or to individual Militiamen; by directing each State to provide "Arms" to her own Militia; by requiring "the people", as individuals, to provide themselves with "Arms" from the free market; or by some combination of two or more of these means. Interestingly enough, were Congress to require "the people" to arm themselves in the free market, its action would not exemplify what is called "deregulation", but would simply recognize that today, just as in *pre-*constitutional times, the success of any comprehensive "regulation" of the Militia necessitates reliance on the free market. If, however, Congress fails, neglects, or refuses to fulfill its duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia", then each of the States may arm her own Militia, or direct her own people as individuals to do so themselves in the free market, or both.[2845] And if both Congress and the States' governments fail, neglect, or refuse to arm "the Militia of the several States", in whole or in part, then "the people" themselves not only may, but also must, do so—because "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State", cannot be left in abeyance through the defaults or derelictions of incompetent or rogue public officials. This means that "the people" must never find themselves in the position of having to depend entirely upon public officials—and therefore "the right * * * to keep * * * Arms" must include a "right of the people" to a truly free market in "Arms" at all times.

---

[2843] Although Militiamen's personal possession of crew-served armaments presents its own practical complexities, it should nonetheless be guided by the same rule: namely, that in some effective manner the crew itself must retain possession of the arms it uses.

[2844] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

Self-evidently, though, no market can be truly "free" to supply suitable equipment for all of the purposes of the Militia if rogue officials in either the General Government or the States can prohibit private manufacturers, distributors, and retailers from providing common Americans with firearms equivalent to those the regular Armed Forces and *para-*militarized police carry. For, in that event, such officials will prevent "the people" from arming themselves directly if their governments fail, neglect, or refuse to so—and thus will deny "the people" "the right * * * to keep * * * [such] Arms"—and thus will disable "the people" from participating in "well regulated Militia"—and thus will subvert "the security of a free State". "[T]he right of the people to keep * * * Arms", then, must include not only "the right" of all of "the people" to possess, and therefore to acquire, "Arms", but also the right of some people in particular to design, manufacture, distribute, sell, and repair "Arms" for everyone else's use. For how could "the people" have a "right * * * to keep * * * Arms" if they could not acquire them in the first instance by their own actions? How could "the people" acquire "Arms" that were not readily available to them? How could "Arms" be available to "the people" that were not produced for and distributed to them? And what purpose would it serve for "the people to keep" unserviceable or outdated "Arms"?

The affirmative rôle of public officials in all of this is merely to assist "the people" in "keep[ing] * * * Arms", by supplementing, but never attempting to supplant, the free market—for example, by establishing public armories or other facilities for the manufacture and repair of "Arms" where private services are insufficient; by selling the regular Armed Forces' surplus firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements to Militiamen; and by supplying "Arms" to Militiamen too poor to purchase them on their own. Any more extensive involvement is both historically unsupportable and politically dangerous. Particularly the latter. *For "[t]he right of the people to keep * * * Arms" can never be secure unless and until—and will remain secure only while—WE THE PEOPLE have access to a sufficient source of all suitable "Arms" with which public officials cannot interfere.* The negative rôle of public officials, simply put, is to stay out of the way in every other way: neither to suppress, nor to stifle, nor to subvert access by all Americans eligible for the Militia to a free market in all firearms that are or can be made suitable for Militia service.

---

[2845] U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

To be sure, today "a militia, to be as effective as militias in the 18th century, would require sophisticated arms that are highly unusual in society at large".[2846] But that such "sophisticated arms"—such as heavy machine guns, mortars, anti-tank and anti-aircraft rockets, and even light artillery—might be "highly unusual" does not mean that "the people" could not or should not "keep" them, in the same sense they could and should "keep" ordinary rifles, pistols, shotguns, and the like. Even if such "unusual" "Arms" needed crews, rather than simply individuals, to serve them, they could nonetheless be "ke[pt]" in "the people['s]" possession, if not in their own homes then at least in Local armories under the crews' control.

(2) "[T]o * * * bear Arms". Even during the Founding Era, the transitive verb "bear" "[wa]s a word with such latitude, that it [wa]s not easily explained".[2847] It can mean simply "[t]o * * * carry", in the sense of physical possession and transportation.[2848] Or, in a more complex vein, "[t]o carry as a mark of authority" or "[t]o carry as in trust"[2849]—importing the dual signification of physical possession coupled with some particular legal position, power, and even duty. The latter definitions are especially fitting with respect to "the right of the people to * * * bear Arms", because in relationship to "well regulated Militia" "the people" "carry [Arms] as a mark of [their own sovereign] authority", and "carry [them] as in trust" for "the security of a free State".

"To bear arms" has several meanings, too. It can mean simply "[t]o possess or carry * * * to wear; as, to bear a sword "[2850]—under which definition "the right

---

[2846] Heller, 554 U.S. at 627 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

[2847] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2848] Id., definition 3 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[2849] Id., definitions 4 and 7, respectively, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions (emphases supplied). Accord, Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 128, definition 6.

[2850] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 128, definition 6. Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 1, at 183, definition 6.a.

to * * * bear Arms" takes on the color of an "individual right". Or, more specifically, "to bear arms" could mean to carry in a military organization or for a military purpose[2851]—under which definition "the right * * * to * * * bear Arms" appears as a "collective right". And, of course, both definitions largely overlap, because people who simply "carry about * * * or wear * * * weapons of * * * defence" perform through their acts of personal self-defense a quintessential function of the Militia: namely, the execution of the law against aggressors at the very moment of their aggression.

In historical context, however, the phrase "to * * * bear Arms" in the Second Amendment should primarily be taken in the "collective" sense. As a brief amicus curiae in Heller pointed out,

> [t]he term "bear arms" is an idiomatic expression that means "to serve as a soldier, do military service, fight." * * *
>
> * * * At the time of the Second Amendment's adoption, the word "arms" had an overwhelmingly military meaning. * * *
>
> Examples of the idiomatic usage of "bear arms" during the time of the founding abound. In each instance where "bear arms" (or "bearing arms" or "bear arms against") is used without additional language modifying the phrase, it is unquestionably used in its ordinary idiomatic sense. * * *
>
> For example, the Declaration of Independence denounces the British monarch for "constrain[ing] our fellow Citizens taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country." * * * No one doubts that "bear Arms against" in that passage means "to be engaged in hostilities with."
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [T]he term "bear arms" or "bearing arms" appears 30 times in the Library of Congress database containing all of the official records of debates in the Continental Congress and U.S. Congress between 1774 and 1821. * * * In each instance the usage was unquestionably the military usage. * * * Taking that research a step further, [one] historian * * * surveyed the use of the term "bear arms" (with and without qualifying language) in books, pamphlets, broadsides and newspapers from the period between the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of the Second Amendment. He found 115 texts employing the term, all but five of which were used in the military sense. * * * We have reviewed the "bear arms" language in the[se] texts * * * and concluded that in four of the five instances of non-military use, the use was expressly qualified by further language indicating a different meaning (e.g., "bear arms in time of peace" or bear arms . . . for the purpose of killing game"). Of the 110 > that were used in a clearly military context, 99 employed the idiom in its ordinary, unadorned state, "bear arms" or "bear arms against," without any additional specifying language. The remaining 11 all used additional specifying language (e.g., "for the purposes of"). We otherwise have been unable to find unidiomatic uses of the phrase "bear arms" or "bearing arms" or "bear arms against" from the founding era in the United States. But even if one were to produce a few instances of actual non-idiomatic uses, that would not affect the meaning of the idiom in the Second Amendment.

[2851] See, e.g., Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 238.

>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * By simply (i) giving the idiom "bear Arms" the meaning it had at the time (to serve as a soldier, do military service, fight), (ii) reading the term "well regulated Militia" as it was used at the time (to refer to a militia that not only is subject to regulation under the militia laws, but also well functioning and disciplined), and (iii) looking to the absolute clause's statement of causation (the right to "bear Arms" is protected to perpetuate "a well regulated Militia) to determine the scope of military service covered by the right (that which is in a well regulated Militia), one finds a balanced text that protects the right of the people to serve in a well regulated militia and keep arms for such service.[2852]

In response to this evidence, the Justices in the majority in Heller conceded that "at the time of the founding" "an idiomatic meaning" of the phrase "to * * * bear Arms" was "'to serve as a soldier, do military service'". But they then claimed that this "idiomatic meaning * * * was significantly different from [that phrase's] natural meaning", and that the phrase "bear Arms" "unequivocally bore that idiomatic meaning only when followed by the preposition 'against,' which was in turn followed by the target of the hostilities".[2853] This, however, is poor historical fiction. For example, throughout the 1600s and 1700s, every American who appeared at a Militia muster for purposes of training with firearms during times of peace was surely "bear[ing] Arms", but just as certainly was not "bear[ing]" them "against" anyone in particular.

It may, of course, be true, as the majority in Heller pointed out, that during the 1700s the phrase "bear arms" was "frequently used * * * in nonmilitary contexts" in both legal and non-legal sources.[2854] But the context in which that phrase appears in the Second Amendment—which in the final analysis is the only

---

[2852] BRIEF FOR PROFESSORS OF LINGUISTICS AND ENGLISH, ante note 2622, at 18-21, 23-24, 29 (footnote omitted). Admittedly, this was somewhat porous research, because it investigated only the periods from 1774 to 1821 in one instance and from 1776 to 1791 in the other—with the material from 1792 to 1821 being historically and legally irrelevant in any event because the usages of words from 1792 onwards could not have influenced events before that date.

[2853] 554 U.S. at 586 (Scalia, J., for the Court) (emphasis in the original).

[2854] Id. at 587-588.

context that counts—is plainly a "military" one: namely, with explicit connection to "[a] well regulated Militia". So the use of the phrase in other contexts is hardly probative, let alone dispositive, of its meaning in the Amendment. In the light of the Amendment's nominative absolute clause, "to * * * bear Arms" must primarily (perhaps even to the point of exclusivity) relate to participation in "well regulated Militia" by "the people". That is, the "right of the people to * * * bear Arms" (and, as well, "to keep * * * Arms" for the purpose of "bear[ing]" them) entails "the right of the people" to have and to serve in "well regulated Militia" composed of "the body of the people" themselves[2855]—and not to be told by rogue Members of Congress, State legislators, or judges that no such Militia are to be had.

This is of the very highest significance. The majority of the Justices in Heller opined that, to "[g]iv[e] 'bear Arms' its idiomatic meaning would cause the protected right to consist of the right to be a soldier * * * —an absurdity that no commentator has ever endorsed".[2856] The question, however, is what the Constitution, not some commentator or gaggle of jurists, "endorse[s]". If "the ablest * * American statesmen" in history incorporated such a right into the Constitution, then as a matter of law it cannot be deemed "absurd", notwithstanding that it has been neglected, suppressed, and even ridiculed by feckless or faithless public officials over many years.[2857] The Second Amendment guarantees "the right of the people" not simply to be armed as atomistic individuals ("keep * * * Arms") but also to employ their equipment ("bear Arms") in a particular manner: not "the right to be a soldier" in some general sense, but "the right to be a soldier [specifically in '[a] well regulated Militia']". The Amendment protects that "right" because it aims ultimately at "the security of a free State", and because "the people" must provide this "security" themselves through Militia in which they all participate in one manner or another.

By dismissing as "an absurdity" the very collective activity—the participation of "the people" in "well regulated Militia"—which the Second Amendment explicitly declares to be "necessary to the security of a free State", the majority of the Justices in Heller exposed themselves as "obviously and flatly opposed to the manifest truth" of the matter (which is one definition of "absurdity").[2858] Although manifest madness thus pervaded their method, nonetheless a malignant method lurked within that madness. For, by tossing them the insubstantial crust of an "individual right" for which they had so long hungered, the Justices won the plaudits of the Amendment's self-styled defenders, even as they withheld from "the people" the invaluable collective loaf of the "'[p]olitical power

---

[2855] See Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[2856] 554 U.S. at 586 (Scalia, J., for the Court).

[2857] See Lake County Commissioners v. Rollins, 130 U.S. 662, 672 (1889).

[2858] See Black's Law Dictionary, ante note 368, at 24.

