The Sword and Sovereignty

EDWIN VIEIRA, JR.

Constitutional "Homeland Security"

Volume Two

The Constitutional Principles of "the Militia of the Several States"

The SWORD and SOVEREIGNTY

by

Edwin Vieira, Jr.

Moses Brown School
Harvard College, A.B.
Harvard Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, A.M., Ph.D.
Harvard Law School, J.D.

A Caveat to Readers

The Sword and Sovereignty: The Constitutional Principles of "the Militia of the several States" is designed to provide information, analysis, opinion, and advocation in regard to revitalizing "the Militia of the several States". It is published and distributed with the understanding—and must be perused with the reader's agreement—that the author and other persons involved in such publication and distribution are not thereby engaged in rendering legal or other professional services or advice.

If any reader of this book requires or desires legal or other expert counsel or assistance relating to any matter covered herein, he should retain a licensed and competent professional advisor. Because of the rapidly changing nature and content of what passes for "law" in the United States, information contained in this book may become outdated; and therefore anyone using the material compiled herein must research original sources to update authorities and ensure their continued applicability and materiality. Moreover, although the author has expended every effort to make this book a comprehensive resource for revitalizing "the Militia of the several States", neither has it been his purpose, nor would it have been possible, to include all the relevant information that might be available.

In addition, although the author has expended every effort to make this book accurate, it nonetheless may contain inadvertent errors or oversights, both in typography and in content and analysis. Therefore, it should be used only as a general guide. Neither the author nor any person involved in the publication and distribution of this book assumes or shall have any liability or responsibility to any individual, person, or entity with respect to any loss, damage, or other claim of any sort allegedly caused directly, indirectly, consequentially, or in any other way by any such individual's, person's, or entity's claimed use of or other reliance on any information, analysis, opinion, or advocation set out in this book.

International Standard Book Number (10): 0-9671759-4-1
International Standard Book Number (13): 978-0-9671759-4-2

Produced in the United States of America under the auspices of

Edwin Vieira, Jr.
Front Royal, Virginia

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Edwin Vieira, Jr., holds four degrees from Harvard: A.B. (Harvard College), A.M. and Ph.D. (Harvard Graduate School of Arts and Sciences), and J.D. (Harvard Law School).

For some thirty-nine years he has been a practicing attorney, specializing in constitutional law. In the Supreme Court of the United States he successfully argued or briefed the cases leading to the landmark decisions Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977), Chicago Teachers Union v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292 (1986), and Communications Workers of America v. Beck, 487 U.S. 735 (1988), which confirmed and enforced constitutional and statutory limitations on the uses to which labor unions, in both the private and the public sectors, may apply fees extracted from nonunion workers as a condition of their employment.

He has written numerous monographs and articles in scholarly journals, and lectured throughout the county. His latest scholarly works are Pieces of Eight: The Monetary Powers and Disabilities of the United States Constitution (GoldMoney Foundation Special Edition [2011] of the Second Revised Edition, 2002), a study of American monetary law and history viewed from a constitutional perspective; How To Dethrone the Imperial Judiciary (2004), an analysis of the problems caused by "judicial supremacy" and how to deal with them; and Constitutional "Homeland Security", Volume One, The Nation in Arms (2007), the first book in the series aimed at revitalizing "the Militia of the several States".

With Victor Sperandeo, he is the co-author (under a nom de plume) of the political novel CRA$HMAKER: A Federal Affaire (2000), a not-so-fictional story of an engineered "crash" of the Federal Reserve System, and the upheaval it causes.

He is a firearms instructor certified by the National Rifle Association in several disciplines.

He resides with his family in Front Royal, Virginia.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE

Some people will carp that, in writing this book, I have set myself upon a quixotic task. Yet anyone who actually reads my words will discover that, from the first capital letter to the last period, my motivation lies above and beyond what the Portuguese call saudade. The Sword and Sovereignty: The Constitutional Principles of "the Militia of the Several States" is not simply a dry intellectual exercise in the rehearsal of long-forgotten American history, and the penetration of a maze of obscure legal analysis, undertaken in order to satisfy a nostalgic craving for the restoration of a country that can never retrace its steps back to its idealistic origins from the brink of catastrophe at which it now finds itself. Even less is this work intended to memorialize in print a resignation to the dictates of what the Portuguese call fado. To the contrary: Fate called The Sword and Sovereignty into being, not to dust off for the sake of idle curiosity ideas from a bygone era which retain no practical relevance today, but instead to explore, explain, and advocate principles of political organization and action with timeless pertinence, and to apply them for the purpose of bringing about America's renaissance.

To be sure, this will be a massive job, for the completion of which most Americans are, no doubt, woefully unequipped at present. So The Sword and Sovereignty has been designed and executed to supply all Americans with the basic tools they now lack, but will all too soon desperately need in order to save from destruction the real America—the America of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

Some readers may complain, however, that, in a book replete with footnotes and endnotes complementing an extensive text, I have supplied altogether too many tools for the average man's easy use. This criticism is myopic. Although the matters described in The Sword and Sovereignty were common knowledge among most literate Americans once upon a time, they have not been such for quite a while. In fact, the historical and legal character—and especially the uniquely and critically important constitutional place—of "the Militia of the several States" have been passed over, garbled, misrepresented, and even suppressed for generations, not only by all of America's domestic enemies, but also by all too many American patriots who have naively prided themselves as champions of the Second Amendment—so that, today, vanishingly few and extremely far between are those Americans even minimally conversant with the subject. As did the Founding Fathers who subscribed the Declaration of Independence, I believe that "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind" demands more than the airy assumption that my readers should supinely "take my word for it", without perusing the evidence themselves. Instead, to become sufficiently educated in this area—and, perhaps of more consequence, to be convinced that his education rests on a foundation sufficiently solid to undergird political action—the contemporary student must be presented with, and must himself both ingest and thoroughly digest, the full record of historical facts, and the full panoply of legal analysis and arguments, in support of the reasoning, conclusions, and recommendations that The Sword and Sovereignty lays out.

Other readers may conjecture, though, that, whatever their merits in theory, these tools will prove to be simply too ponderous for politically and economically illiterate, self-indulgent, and slothful Americans to take up and wield in practice. At least as an admonition, this observation may be marginally valuable. Folk-wisdom identifies four types of human minds: The very best mind understands things on its own, and always acts in conformity with its understanding. The good mind understands things when they are explained to it, and usually acts in conformity with that explanation. The bad mind cannot understand things even when they are explained, and therefore never learns how to act properly. And the very worst mind refuses to acknowledge what it knows to be true, so that it can act according to its own contrary, malign purposes. When the Founding Fathers wrote the Second Amendment, they presumed that average American patriots were of sufficiently sound, self-actuating minds that they would understand the Amendment's meaning without being told—in particular, that most Americans could themselves explain what "a free State" is, why "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", and how "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" always forms the indispensable foundation for such a Militia. This presumption was valid in the Founders' era, because most free adult male Americans were then actually serving or had served in "well regulated Militia", in times both of peace and of war. Unfortunately, such a presumption would be ill-founded today, because: (i) Next to no Americans have any present or historical experience of serving in true constitutional Militia—indeed, no such Militia have even existed since the earliest days of the Twentieth Century. (ii) Hardly anyone proposes revitalization of the Militia along constitutional lines—proving that the very best minds are not applying themselves to the problem of how to obtain constitutional "homeland security". (iii) As a result of this dearth of intellectual leadership, the matter is not being correctly explained to common Americans, leaving them in something of a mental void on the subject. And (iv) that void is being filled with disinformation broadcast by proponents of "gun control" with apparently unlimited access to the mass media who routinely label as an "extremist" or even a "terrorist" whoever dares to advocate Americans' participation in anything to do with "militia". Against this background, it would hardly evidence paranoia to fear that, even were the matter of the Militia properly explained, the great mass of Americans would still not understand, but instead would follow the pied pipers of "gun control" into the political septic tank of a National para-military police state. Yet, if there is room for doubt on one side, there must be room for doubt on the other, too. The presumption that average Americans can learn when the matter has been correctly explained to them has yet to be disproven. And it can be disproved only by presenting them with the facts and obtaining no good result.

Of course, there can be no guarantee that even if Americans are fully informed they will take the advice to heart and set their hands to work. Human nature has not changed since the Founding Fathers' days. Only a little more than a generation after ratification of the Second Amendment, in his Commentaries on the Constitution Joseph Story observed that > among the American people, there is a growing indifference to any system of militia discipline, and a strong disposition, from a sense of its burdens, to be rid of all regulations. How it is practicable to keep the people duly armed without some organization it is difficult to see. There is certainly no small danger that indifference may lead to disgust, and disgust to contempt; and thus gradually undermine all the protection intended by th[e Second Amendment.]

Nonetheless, that was then; and this is now. In Story's era, Americans could perhaps afford for a while to indulge the vice of "indifference". Today, common Americans have arrived at the point where "indifference" is no longer an option for which the social cost in treasure—and, perhaps, blood as well—will likely be bearable. The crisis is upon them at this very moment, intensifying with each passing day. And unless they are willing to witness their country's destruction, and themselves to suffer the horrendous consequences of that débâcle, they must pick up and put to effective use the tools the Constitution has provided for them, no matter how heavy those tools may seem to be at first. When they do, rather than recoiling in "disgust" and "contempt", they will swell with admiration and give profound thanks for the foresight of the Founding Fathers in incorporating "the Militia of the several States" into the original Constitution, and guaranteeing through the Second Amendment "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" for their use in "well regulated Militia" that can provide "the security of a free State" everywhere within America.

The struggle that has been thrust upon Americans is not one to preserve the uniquely American way of life, but to restore it. For most that has been and remains worthwhile in this country has already been systematically denigrated, subverted, corrupted, and even prohibited by bevies of rogue public officials working on behalf of factions and special-interest groups, both domestic and foreign—so that, today, the true America exists only as fleeting, dissipating shadows of her former self. To restore America, though, Americans must first wrest control of their country from the grasping hands of the usurpers, tyrants, and exploiters who have conquered and despoiled her.

The reconquest of America cannot be successfully waged by a people whose primary motivation is the materialistic desire simply to live a comfortable life. The average American will endure only so much deprivation and danger for the benefit of self-indulgence, always finding it easier in the short run to surrender a little material ease in order to gain a respite from the travails of the struggle—until, step by step, he finally surrenders so much that he strips himself of the means, even if he retains the will, to continue the struggle at all. So the reconquest of America must be envisioned and especially carried on, not as a matter of isolated individuals' narrow economic self-interests, but as an heroic cause: the renewed assertion, by common Americans in unison, of America's unique character as a truly "free State" that can serve, not only as their own prosperous homeland, but also as a beacon of hope to oppressed and impoverished peoples throughout the world. Such an heroic cause will require no less than an heroic effort to see it through to fruition. For America must be rebuilt, not just economically, but politically, socially, culturally, legally, and morally as well—in the execution of which extensive reconstruction must be called forth labors that might tax the strength of even Hercules himself. And this effort will call for a most unusual sort of heroism, because typical Americans, not mythical Greek heroes, will have to perform the work.

Moreover, heroism by itself will not suffice. Even in the hands of one of the greatest warrior races known to History, kamikaze tactics failed, as common sense teaches that all such desperate measures inevitably must fail. To justify their exertions today and tomorrow, Americans will need to be able confidently to believe in the realistic likelihood of success, because they will be applying historically proven methods. Such confidence would be amply justified, though, were they to revitalize and deploy "the Militia of the several States", as the Constitution requires. The Second Amendment, after all, does not describe "[a] well regulated Militia" as "being necessary to the security of a free State" without abundant support in the historical record. To the contrary: It was largely through the efforts of the Militia—in the face of the gravest adversities, and against the determined resistance of powerful enemies who compassed their destruction, if they refused to bend to subjection—that WE THE PEOPLE secured their independence and established just governments throughout America in the late 1700s. That Americans thus won their own freedom through their own efforts was the original cause and the most important effect of what has come to be called "American exceptionalism".

Precisely through this aspect of "American exceptionalism" can contemporary Americans assert once again the principles of independence, freedom, and justice that should always define "the American way of life". "[T]he Militia of the several States" are not the subjects of some *semi-*legendary account from a long-dead past, interred within dusty tomes in the libraries of obscure historical societies—or resurrected in the persons of reinactors in Colonial garb who parade each year on Independence Day through the Town of Bristol, Rhode Island—but rather the exemplars of an ever-living lesson to be applied whenever great perils threaten this country and ordinary Americans are called to perform even greater deeds in America's defense. And never before have the Militia been more pertinent to the threats confronting this country—or more capable of overcoming them.

Americans can rely and build upon the Militia's historical tradition and legal authority, because now more than ever before they have the incentive, the imagination, the resources, and especially the spiritual strength to use the Militia to restore "the security of a free State" throughout this land:

• The present danger is more serious and more pressing than any the Founding Fathers ever faced. Each and every day, before Americans' very eyes, the malign forces of usurpation, tyranny, and exploitation strike one foul blow after another at National independence, individual freedom, and social justice—with consequences far worse than those the Founders refused submissively to endure from the far less onerous oppressions visited upon them. So "indifference" to the Militia now promises to prove fatal to America's survival.

• Yet most common Americans still instinctively appreciate what "an American" is supposed to be, used to be, and can be—must be—once again. With a little encouragement and assistance, they will quickly learn how, working together in the Militia, they can bring out the essential American in every one of their countrymen who is capable of being roused into patriotic action.

• An objective appraisal of what strategists call "the balance of material forces" should convince anyone that common Americans, properly motivated, educated, and organized, can defeat the usurpers, tyrants, and exploiters—in both public office and private station—who now plague this country. Most obviously, common Americans constitute the vast majority of the population, dispersed throughout the land—and, all other things being equal, "God favors the big battalions". Moreover, to the extent that other things of consequence are not equal, the disparities favor WE THE PEOPLE. First, common Americans are imbued not only with all of the general knowledge and skills sufficient to take control of their country, but also with the information and experience related to specifically local conditions that will be necessary to administer it in an economically prudent, politically honest, and legally just fashion. Second, common Americans already exercise actual physical possession of almost all of the real and personal property in this country. Third, common Americans cannot easily be dislodged from this commanding position, because tens and even hundred of millions of them are armed, and to some significant degree familiar with the use of arms.

• Finally, "the balance of spiritual forces" tips decisively in common Americans' favor. In their hearts as well as in their minds and hands, true Americans are simply better than their enemies. As the Declaration of Independent attests, perforce of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" "all men are created equal" with respect to their "unalienable Rights". The usurpers, tyrants, and exploiters, and all of their minions, myrmidons, and blackguards who now infest this country have intentionally set out to deny human freedom—the exercise and enjoyment of "unalienable Rights"—to the vast majority of their fellow men. Thus, they have enlisted in a cause so fouled with soot from the fires of Hell that no rationalization can ever whitewash it. With the exercise of a peppercorn's worth of introspection, they know themselves to be ignoble wretches, irretrievably unworthy—and therefore ultimately incapable—of victory. On the other side, the Constitution prohibits all titles of nobility, because the only nobility of consequence, the nobility of freedom, is the birthright of all Americans. With the exercise of a peppercorn's worth of introspection, they will realize that this is the wellspring of their strength, and draw upon it against every adversity.

In sum, in The Sword and Sovereignty: The Constitutional Principles of "the Militia of the several States" I have endeavored to point out the means by which Americans can once again become the masters of their own country. Now I must hope that my countrymen will put this advice to good use—immediately, if not sooner.

Edwin Vieira, Jr.

Front Royal, Virginia
27 September 2012

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The author wishes to thank, with appropriate respect for their privacy, the individuals who contributed financial support to the production of The Sword and Sovereignty. In alphabetic order, they are: JLA (Wisconsin), SJB (Texas), SB (Illinois), BB (Indiana), PNB (Kansas), TB (Michigan), LBC (Virginia), JEC (Iowa), LE (Michigan), JBE (Florida), SF (New York), SG (Nebraska), PG (Michigan), FH (California), KH (Massachusetts), HLH (Kentucky), AJ (California), GK (Illinois), GMM (Nevada), PDO (North Carolina), LJP (Michigan), DP (California), EP (Virginia), JP (Texas), WAR (California), DS (North Carolina), SS (Illinois), MDS (Indiana), RMS (Texas), DS (Colorado), DFS (Minnesota), JT (Indiana), CET (California), KLW (Arizona), PW (Florida), RW ["the Simple Artisan"] (Illinois), and KAZ (Massachusetts). The National Rifle Association's Civil Rights Defense Fund also provided a generous grant that deferred some of the costs of the original research on which in part this study is based.

Most importantly, thanks to AMOR, without whose tireless efforts this work could never have been completed.

The artwork for this CD version of The Sword and Sovereignty was produced by Blake Stenning of Pittny Creative, Falls Church, Virginia.

A NOTE ON STYLE

Three asterisks (* * *) in a quoted text mark an ellipsis interpolated by the author of this study.

A set of brackets ([...]) in a quoted text indicates that material from the original has been excised, modified, or supplemented, generally to clarify the sense or to provide grammatical consistency with the passage in which the quotation appears. Although this may distract some readers, it is necessary to maintain the scrupulous accuracy demanded in constitutional discourse.

Punctuation marks within the quotation marks (" " and ' ') that set off a quoted text are to be found in the original; all other punctuation marks are the present author's, and are placed outside the quotation marks in order to emphasize the difference. Although this bends the rules of contemporary typography, it precludes confusion as to what punctuation an original text contains.

Nowadays peculiar spelling and punctuation from old sources have been left as they appear in the originals, without constant interjection of the distracting disclaimer "[sic]".

"Local", "State", and "National" are capitalized throughout the book when they refer to legal jurisdictions within the United States.

Common abbreviations employed in footnotes are as follows:

- "Stat."—the Statutes at Large, the official compilation of statutes of the United States as they are enacted (e.g., "116 Stat. 1498" indicates volume 116, page 1498);
- "U.S."—the United States Reports, the official reports of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States (e.g., "143 U.S. 649" indicates volume 143, page 649);
- "U.S.C."—the United States Code, the present codification of statutes of the United States, by title and section (e.g., "10 U.S.C. § 311" indicates title 10, section 311);
- "art. [...], § [...], cl. [...]" or "amend. [...]"—a particular article, section, and clause, or an amendment, of the Constitution; and "§ [...]" and "¶ [...]" a section or paragraph of a statute or other legal code.

Throughout this work, material has been quoted from official and original sources whenever possible. For early opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, however, more than one privately published edition of the United States Reports is available in various libraries—and these editions sometimes differ in spelling, punctuation, and capitalization. For the sake of consistency, therefore, quotations from the Court's opinions have been conformed to a single set of the United States Reports available on reserve in the Court's own library.

Finally, the various Internet web sites which are referenced in the footnotes were active at the time this book was written.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

TABLE OF CONTENTS, CONTINUED

THE CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES OF "THE MILITIA OF THE SEVERAL STATES"

It is evident that every form of government * * * must contain a supreme power * * * , and this supreme power must necessarily be in the hands of one person, or a few, or many; and when either of these apply their power for the common good, such states are well governed; but when the interest of the one, the few, or the many who enjoy this power is alone consulted, then ill * * * . We usually call a state which is governed by one person for the common good, a kingdom; one that is governed by more than one, but by a few only, an aristocracy; either because the government is in the hands of the most worthy citizens, or because it is the best form for the city and its inhabitants. When the citizens at large govern for the public good, it is called a state; * * * and these distinctions are consonant to reason; for it will not be difficult to find one person, or a very few, of very distinguished abilities, but almost impossible to meet with the majority of a people eminent for every virtue; but if there is one common to a whole nation it is valour; for this is created and supported by numbers: for which reason in such a state the profession of arms will always have the greatest share in the government.

Aristotle

The quotation on the preceding page is taken from the Politics, Book III, Chapter VII, in A TREATISE ON GOVERNMENT OR, THE POLITICS OF ARISTOTLE, William Ellis, Translator (London, England: J.M. Dent & Sons Ltd., 1912), at 78-79.

INTRODUCTION

The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution are the true sources of America's "homeland security".

The theme of this series is Constitutional "Homeland Security", because America's foundational documents—the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution—are the only legal authorities for "homeland security" and thus the only sources of and standards for legal "homeland security". And it is Constitutional "Homeland Security", with that term set off in marks of distinction and implicit qualification, because "homeland security" means radically different things to different people. But, as this series explains, the only true, valuable, and lasting "homeland security" must aim first, foremost, and forever at preserving a particular "homeland"—which, as the Declaration attests, is "the separate and equal station" "among the powers of the earth" "to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle the[American people]".[1] And it must accomplish this task through the only legitimate "security" available to Americans: the principles, institutions, mechanisms, and procedures the Declaration and the Constitution provide.

When the Declaration of Independence announced, "in the Name, and by the Authority of the good People of the[Thirteen] Colonies", that "Governments are instituted among Men" "to secure these [unalienable] rights"—and "That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES; * * * and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do"—it asserted with the full and permanent force of law the right of "the good People" and those who followed them as inhabitants of America to provide by themselves for the "security" of their own "homeland". And when the Declaration secured for "the good People" the power of sovereigns to provide for their own "security" through their own governments, it envisioned only such "security" as is fully consistent with "the[ ] truths [the good People held] to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights", and "[t]hat to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed". For "the good People" also emphasized that whenever any system of ostensible "security"conflicts with these truths—that is, "whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends"—then "it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it". Therefore, under the Declaration of Independence, no purported need for "security" could ever rationalize contradicting the self-evident truths that justify instituting government in the first place. Furthermore, any scheme of "security" that rogue public officials might try to impose which embodied such a contradiction could not be the result of their exercise of "just powers", and if carried far enough—as, for instance, to the establishment of a para-military police state—would render illegitimate the "Form of Government" out of which it arose, and thereupon would compel "the good People" "to alter or to abolish" that "Form of Government" in part or in whole.

---

[1] The typeset version of the Declaration of Independence quoted throughout this book appears in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, House Document No. 398, 69th Congress, 1st Session (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1927), at 22-26.

WE THE PEOPLE then "ordain[ed] and establish[ed]" the Constitution not just to set up a General Government within a federal system.[2] Beyond that, they sought to achieve six specific goals: "to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity".[3] And not for the opposite purpose in any particular. For "[a]ffirmative words are often, in their operation, negative of others than those affirmed; and in this case, a negative or exclusive sense must be given to them, or they have no operation at all".[4] Surely, "[t]he doing of one thing which is authorized cannot be made the source of an authority to do another thing which there is no power to do".[5] Moreover, WE THE PEOPLE never agreed to sacrifice any one of the Preamble's goals in order supposedly to achieve the others, either. To the contrary: The conjunction

---

[2] As used herein, the term "General Government" refers solely to the new government the Constitution created, consisting of Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court, as distinct from "the federal government" or "the federal system", which consists of the General Government, the States, and WE THE PEOPLE. This is a clarifying usage common among the Founding Fathers. For instance: "[I]t is to be remembered that the general government is not to be charged with the whole power of making and administering laws." The Federalist No. 14 (James Madison). "I confess I am at a loss to discover what temptation the persons intrusted with the administration of the general government could ever feel to divest the States of the[ir] authorities[.]" Id. No. 17 (Alexander Hamilton). "Is the aggregate power of the general government greater than ought to have been vested in it?" Id. No. 41 (James Madison). "The second class of powers lodged in the general government consist of those which regulate the intercourse with foreign nations[.]" Id. No. 42 (James Madison). See also, e.g., THE GENUINE INFORMATION, DELIVERED TO THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF MARYLAND, RELATIVE TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE GENERAL CONVENTION, HELD AT PHILADELPHIA, IN 1787, BY LUTHER MARTIN, ESQUIRE, ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF MARYLAND, AND ONE OF THE DELEGATES IN THE SAID CONVENTION (29 November 1787), quoted in The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, Max Farrand, Editor (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1966), Volume 3, at 194, 195, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225. Since then, the term has often appeared in opinions of the Supreme Court. E.g., Presser v. Illinois, 116 U.S. 252, 265 (1886); In re Rahrer, 140 U.S. 545, 554 (1891); House v. Mayes, 219 U.S. 270, 282 (1911).

[3] U.S. Const. preamble. The typeset version of the Constitution quoted throughout this book is The Constitution of the United States of America, Bicentennial Edition, House Document No. 94-539, 94th Congress, 2d Session (Washington, D.C.: U. S. Government Printing Office, 1976).

[4] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803).

[5] Wilson v. New, 243 U.S. 332, 345 (1917).

"and" explicitly emphasizes that the Constitution intends all of these ends to be attained fully and simultaneously, not partially or selectively. Indeed, any other construction of the Constitution in this particular would be self-contradictory and self-defeating: If "the Blessings of Liberty" may be set aside in favor of (say) "the common defence", then to that extent WE THE PEOPLE have actually "ordain[ed] and establish[ed]" the Constitution in order, at least some of the time, to deny those "Blessings * * * to ourselves and our Posterity". A "supreme Law of the Land"[6] designed to "secure the Blessings of Liberty", while at the same time providing for their denial, is incoherent to the point of imbecility. To attribute such mutually antagonistic purposes to the Founding Fathers is defamatory. And to impose on WE THE PEOPLE the burden of entrusting their lives, liberty, and property to a "supreme Law" that proffers only a chaos of conflicting goals is to render "the security of a free State"[7] a political gamble as chancy, and perhaps as fatal, as Russian roulette.

Moreover, the very nature of the Preamble's goals proves that WE THE PEOPLE could never have intended in the late 1700s—and should not tolerate today—some of those goals ostensibly to be achieved only at the sacrifice of others. For example, can "Justice" be "establish[ed]" without "secur[ing] the Blessings of Liberty"? Is not any deprivation of "Liberty" without due process of law itself an injustice? Can "domestic Tranquility" be "insure[d]" without "establish[ing] Justice"? Will those suffering from injustice long remain "Tranquil[ ]"? And can "the Blessings of Liberty" be "secure[d]" without adequate "provi[sion] for the common defence"? When have defenseless people ever maintained their freedom?

Furthermore, the "more perfect Union" the Preamble identifies as the first goal of the Constitution is to consist of States each with "a Republican Form of Government", and only of such States—for the Constitution commands that "[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government".[8] Thus the Constitution impliedly defines the purposes of "a Republican Form of Government" as being to "establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"—for the United States could not be required to "guarantee to every State" (or to any State, for that matter) a "Form of Government" inconsistent with the Union's own purposes. From this must follow the conclusion that the Preamble's goals constitute the indivisible essence of "homeland security" for WE THE PEOPLE, for the Union, and for its constituent States—for only matters that are fully "guarantee[d]" by force of law are adequately "secured".

---

[6] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[7] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[8] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

Because, however, the Declaration of Independence presumes that the "security" any legitimate government provides must be consistent with certain self-evident truths; and because, in its turn, the Constitution intends that all of its Preamble's goals can and will be achieved at the same time and to the maximum possible degree in each case, and that "a Republican Form of Government" attuned to these goals can and will be maintained in every State throughout "this Union" all the while—then, at this country's founding, WE THE PEOPLE must have made available, in and through the "Form of Government" they embodied in the Constitution, what they believed, for good and sufficient reasons, were at that time and would remain thereafter the necessary and sufficient means to secure these ends. Why, then, simply upon the appearance of mere handfuls of criminals who engage in so-called "global terrorism"—and even if these criminals are sometimes harbored and assisted by the established régimes in various rogue nations—must Americans now conclude that the Declaration's principles have been negated, that the Preamble's goals have been rendered impossible of full and simultaneous attainment, that "[t]he United States [cannot] guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government" while waging a so-called "war on terrorism", and that, in consequence, the General Government in Washington (and, following its lead, the States, too) may, and even should, impose on Americans in the name of "homeland security" a centralized bureaucratic apparatus that threatens (or perhaps promises) to degenerate into a National para-military police state?![9]

Must Americans now denounce the Founding Fathers as bereft of both insight and foresight: that they so misconceived the reality of criminal politics, irregular warfare, and international gangsterism in their era, and so myopically failed to foresee how these evils would evolve, expand, and intensify in the future—and in their ignorance and blindness so misled themselves in the Declaration of Independence and malformed the Constitution—that the only way to achieve a modicum of "homeland security" in America's present circumstances is by adoption of a "Form of Government * * * destructive of" Americans' "certain unalienable Rights"—and with it, by acquiescence in wholesale denials of their "Liberty", the demolition of every State's "Republican Form of Government", and thus the eradication of the Constitution's very essence?

Must thoughtful Americans also conclude that most of their contemporary countrymen—or at least those in whom the Department of Homeland Security

---

[9] On several counts, "the war on terrorism" is a deceptive, even duplicitous misnomer. See Edwin Vieira, Jr., Constitutional "Homeland Security", Volume One, The Nation in Arms (Ashland, Ohio: BookMasters, Inc., 2007), at 8-16. But the term's unfortunate currency in public discourse compels its employment here in order to denote an existing situation—although not to accept the description, explanation, and approval of that situation its proponents usually put forth.

arouses neither trepidations nor even reservations—are no less incorrigible ignoramuses, too? After all, the Department of Homeland Security was created with the primary missions to "prevent terrorist attacks within the United States", "reduce the vulnerability of the United States to terrorism", and "minimize the damage, and assist in the recovery, from terrorist attacks that do occur within the United States".[10] Yet anyone with a sense for history and language knows that, for very good reason, the very first definition of "terrorism" in the English lexicon is "a mode of government by terror or intimidation".[11] So, on its face, the claim that this country must cower in the shadow of any variety of a National para-military police state in order to win a "war on terrorism" is patently self-contradictory, self-defeating, and even absurd, because it concedes that the "terrorists" have already prevailed. Proponents of "the war on terrorism" contend that any and every effort to wage it is necessary, because foreign "terrorists"—particularly, fanatical Muslim "jihadists" supposedly committed to an ideology encapsulated in the politically, economically, and religiously ridiculous term "Islamofascism"—"hate our freedoms" and intend to employ every means at their disposal to deprive Americans of them. But what more direct, more expeditious, more economical, and especially more ironic way could such "terrorists" imagine for achieving that goal than to goad gaumless Americans into suppressing their own freedoms themselves, by allowing (even encouraging) rogue officials in the General Government to erect a domestic fascistic National para-military police state undoubtedly inimical to "our freedoms" under color of fighting the very foreign forces being excoriated by that government's propaganda-mills precisely because they "hate our freedoms"?! What greater victory could these foreign "terrorists" win than to persuade this country to commit suicide by destroying forever what is unique to, and uniquely valuable in, America: "the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"?![12]

Yet even the absurd conclusion that common Americans should willingly cast away their freedoms in order to confront foreign "terrorists" who supposedly "hate our freedoms" may have a recondite and sinister logic behind it. For foreign "terrorists" who "hate our freedoms" are not unique on that score among the voracious Forces of Darkness that prowl about the world seeking to devour men's liberties. Who else, thoughtful Americans should ask, would win a victory if most of their countrymen stupidly surrendered their freedoms to a National para-military police state?

---

[10] An Act To establish the Department of Homeland Security, and for other purposes ("Homeland Security Act of 2002"), Act of 25 November 2002, Pub. L. 107-296, TITLE I—DEPARTMENT OF HOMELAND SECURITY, § 101(b)(A) through (C), 116 Stat. 2135, 2142.

[11] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary (Springfield, Massachusetts: G. & C. Merriam Company, 1913), at 1489. Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary (New York, New York: Oxford University Press, 1971), Volume 2, at 3268.

[12] U.S. Const. preamble.

Even if foreign "terrorists" do boundlessly and remorselessly "hate our freedoms", their religiously or ideologically based animosities do not easily translate into successful military, para-military, or even simply criminal operations. Short of an actual invasion and savage pacification of this country—which no sensible person believes possible—no means exist by which all of the foreign "terrorists" in the whole world, acting simultaneously and in concert, could ever deprive Americans of "our freedoms" through the "terrorists'" actions alone. Yet everyone with at least a milligram of cerebral cortex realizes that "our freedoms" are rapidly being eroded by Americans' own "representatives". Under color of providing for "homeland security", as a result of their incompetence or malevolence these miscreants are transmogrifying this country into a first-class police state in which Lavrenti Beria or Reinhard Heydrich would feel right at home (and would probably be offered employment as "security consultants"). So, judged by that result, some "terrorists" are in fact winning "the war on terrorism". Moreover, they will continue to prevail because, as its proponents predict, "the war on terrorism" is slated to drag on indefinitely, necessitating the perpetuation—and, predictably, the elaboration and augmentation—of a National para-military police-state apparatus, and the multiplication and intensification of its intrusions into common Americans' lives.

Which means that either America's present-day public officials and molders of public opinion constitute perhaps the greatest gaggle of nitwits in high offices and influential positions that mankind has ever witnessed, or "the war on terrorism" is really something radically different from what they are advertising it to be: Rather than exclusively a foreign "war" rogue officials of the General Government claim to be waging against "terrorists" in order to secure "our freedoms", "the war on terrorism" is also, arguably predominately, a domestic or civil "war" that certain centers of political and economic power in this country are waging through that governmental apparatus—or, more descriptively, through their subversion and perversion of it—in order to suppress common Americans' freedoms. The open, but largely theatrical, "war on terrorism" against a few radical Muslims overseas is really a clandestine, but deadly serious, "war of terrorism" against all common Americans here at home. This should hardly surprise anyone, inasmuch as the very first definition of "terrorism" is "a mode of government by terror or intimidation"[13]—and "terror" means "[e]xtreme fear" and "violent dread",[14] which is precisely the state of mind the touts of "the war on terrorism" try to instill in Americans' collective psyche in order to rationalize public officials' assumption and exercise of ever-expanding, ever-more-intrusive, ever-more-draconian, and ever-more-abusive powers over the citizenry. The whole operation is itself a campaign of "terror":

---

[13] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1489 (emphasis supplied). Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 2, at 3268.

[14] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1489, definition 1.

"[t]he threatenings of wicked men", "calculated to impress fear".[15] Whether these domestic power-brokers "hate our freedoms" even more than do supposed "Islamofascists" overseas might be debatable. Beyond dispute is that, unlike foreign "terrorists", America's most dangerous domestic enemies actually enjoy the capability to destroy "our freedoms", root and branch, because they occupy strategic positions in this country—within the governmental apparatus, high finance and big business, the mass media, the educational establishment, and the intelligentsia, to catalogue the most prominent—and from those vantage points can deploy political, economic, and especially police power so as to make their hatred effective.

Viewed in this light, though, the underlying reality of "the war on terrorism" emerges as nothing truly novel in American experience. The Founding Fathers faced perils no less daunting, and rose to the occasion—because they understood perfectly the nature of the evil then afoot and how to confront and defeat it. The Declaration of Independence affirms that > all men * * * are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.—That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed,—That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government * * * . Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security.

Whoever attunes his thinking to the Founders' minds must conclude that any program of "homeland security" that excuses, enables, and empowers the construction of a National para-military police state is no part of an acceptable "form[of government] to which [Americans have ever been or now] are accustomed"—is inherently "destructive of the[ ] ends" for which "Governments are instituted among Men"—and if it is not itself an additional part of a preëxisting "long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object [that] evinces a design to reduce the[People] under absolute Despotism", yet it undeniably constitutes the commencement of such a "train", traveling to no other terminus. Indeed, the institution of such a program is not just a "light and transient cause[ ]" for action, but a compelling reason and immediate occasion for patriotic Americans in every walk of life (in the words of Samuel Adams) "[t]o tell [the contemporary political descendants of] General Gage * * * no longer to insult the feelings of an exasperated people",[16] and if that does not suffice then "to throw off such Government" (or at least the individuals composing it, and the others pulling their political strings from behind the screen).Therefore, such a program cannot conceivably qualify as "homeland security", but instead must be rejected out of hand as the creation of centrally organized "homeland *in*security" and instability, and thereby the prelude to America's descent into domestic conflict and chaos, if not to her utter destruction.

---

[15] See Noah Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (New York, New York: S. Cosgrove, 1828), definitions 4 and 5.

The opposite conclusion—that, although (as thoughtful Americans of all political persuasions agree) the General Government's present Department of Homeland Security exhibits the potential to devolve into the linchpin of a National para-military police-state apparatus along the lines of the Nazis' infamous Reichssicherheitshauptamt, it is nonetheless a legally appropriate, even necessary, means to achieve "homeland security" in an era of "global terrorism"—is not simply implausible, but is surely impossible. The legitimacy of the Constitution and the authority of all public officials acting under its aegis depend upon steadfast compliance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence—particularly that, even to secure men's "unalienable Rights", governments may employ only "just powers". The Preamble to the Constitution identifies "establish[ing] Justice" as the very first goal of the "more perfect Union" WE THE PEOPLE created. In its purposes and operations, a police state is the epitome of injustice. Therefore, no National police state of any variety, erected on any premisses, promises, or pretexts—or for any purpose whatsoever—can even arguably be constitutional. And "[a]n unconstitutional act is not a law; * * * it imposes no duties; * * * it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed".[17] "An unconstitutional act is not a law; it binds no one".[18] "An unconstitutional law is void, and is as no law. An offense created by it is not a crime."[19]

All this being true, the critical question nonetheless remains: How in the present dangerous era—against enemies both foreign and especially domestic—does the Constitution actually provide for "form[ing] a more perfect Union, establish[ing] Justice, insur[ing] domestic Tranquility, provid[ing] for the common

---

[16] Quoted in John Fiske, "The Eve of Independence", The Atlantic Monthly (November 1888), at 366.

[17] Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886).

[18] Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U.S. 97, 101-102 (1887).

[19] Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 376 (1880), quoted in Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 408 (1963).

defence, promot[ing] the general Welfare, * * * secur[ing] the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity", and "guarantee[ing] to every State * * * a Republican Form of Government"? For presumably it must supply some adequate means to its ends at all times and against all threats. The answer—written perhaps more plainly than any other on the very face of the Constitution itself—is that "the Militia of the several States" are the primary institutions the Constitution recognizes and upon which it relies to solve each and every one of the problems of "homeland security" that confront America, now and in the future.[20]

True, the Constitution never employs the exact term "homeland security". This, however, is hardly consequential. For the Constitution does set out as one of its goals "to * * * provide for the common defence".[21] And although the "meaning [of all constitutional provisions] is changeless", "their application * * * is extensible" throughout the ages.[22] So "the common defence" can obviously subsume "homeland security". Even more to the point, though, the Second Amendment highlights WE THE PEOPLE'S concern for "security", by commanding that, "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed." "[A] free State" is the goal, "security" the condition sine qua non, "[a] well regulated Militia" the indispensable instrument, "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" the ultimate means. And the Amendment speaks most emphatically on this score: For, other than the Preamble, the Second Amendment is the only place in which the Constitution explains the reason for any right, power, privilege, duty, or disability that it recognizes.[23] So the interconnections among "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", "[a] well regulated Militia", and "the security of a free State" must be extremely important.

Moreover, the Second Amendment not only employs the term "security", but also ties it inextricably to "a free State", thus establishing that the one and only type of "security" the Constitution countenances is "security" compatible with and instrumental for freedom—and therefore that public officials may concern themselves with, and enjoy the authority, power, and discretion to work for, only such "security". This is hardly surprising, inasmuch as the only other places in which a word relating to "security" appears in the Constitution are: (i) its Preamble, which declares WE THE PEOPLE'S intention "to secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"; and (ii) the Fourth Amendment, which guarantees "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against [20] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II.

---

[21] U.S. Const. preamble. See also U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[22] Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 451 (1934) (Sutherland, J., dissenting).

[23] On the legal terminology of "rights", "powers", "privileges", and so on employed in this book, see Wesley N. Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions As Applied In Judicial Reasoning (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1964); Arthur L. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", 29 Yale Law Journal 163 (1919).

unreasonable searches and seizures"—thereby protecting both individual liberty ("their persons") and private property ("their * * * houses, papers, and effects").[24] And the Second Amendment's explicit conjunction between "security" and freedom makes perfect sense in a Constitution that conjoins as among its goals both "the common defence" "and * * * the Blessings of Liberty".[25] Thus, the Second Amendment provides a far more pertinent, precise, and especially protective definition of constitutional "security" (looking to substance) than does the vague term "homeland security" (looking primarily to place). For, self-evidently, "a free State" cannot possibly be a National (or a State or Local) police state in which individuals are systematically denied "the Blessings of Liberty", through "unreasonable searches and seizures" or otherwise. And therefore "a free State" can never seek, certainly can never attain, and can never, ever acquiesce in "homeland security" through the methods of a police state.

Furthermore, because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", "the Militia of the several States"—and the underlying "right of the people to keep and bear Arms"—can never be the instruments, but must always be the antagonists, of a police state. This, too, because the Constitution delegates to Congress the power and the duty "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions", and only for these three purposes.[26] Together, these purposes constitute the quintessence of "homeland security"—but none of them lends the least colorable support to the erection of a police state. And if by some wild misconstruction someone imagined that they did, the Second Amendment—which ultimately acts as the most forceful of all "checks and balances" on Congress's powers—declares that those powers can be employed only in service of "a free State".

Thus the Constitution renders pellucid the critical distinction between the simple apothegm from the early literature of freedom, that "the Sword and Soveraignty always march hand in hand"[27]—or, in its less elegant but more notorious, albeit equally accurate, modern formulation, that "'[p]olitical power

---

[24] Emphases supplied in both instances.

[25] U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

[26] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[27] Anonymous [John Trenchard with Walter Moyle], AN ARGUMENT, Shewing, that a Standing Army Is inconsistent with A Free Government, and absolutely destructive to the Constitution of the English Monarchy (London, England: [no publisher identified] 1697), at 7. On Trenchard's importance, see Introduction, The English Libertarian Heritage: From the Writings of John Trenchard and Thomas Gordon in The Independent Whig and Cato's Letters, David L. Jacobson, Editor (Indianapolis, Indiana: The Bobbs-Merrill Company, Inc., 1965); Caroline Robbins, The Eighteenth-Century Commonwealthman: Studies in the Transmission, Development and Circumstance of English Liberal Thought from the Restoration of Charles II until the War with the Thirteen Colonies (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1959), passim.

grows out of the barrel of a gun'"[28]—and the elaboration of that insight in America. As a generality, the "Soveraignty" that "always march[es] hand in hand" with "the Sword", or the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'", can be either good or bad, depending upon circumstances. In the hands of Mao Tse-tung—indeed, in the hands of each and every Führer, Duce, Vozhd', or other psychopathological "leader" of the Twentieth Century—it proved to be uniformly malevolent.[29] Conversely, qualified in the manner set out in the Second Amendment, "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'" is a formula for obtaining and preserving the rarest and best of all political goods: self-government "of the people, by the people, for the people".[30] For, under that interpretation, the aphorism becomes: "political power for the defense of freedom grows out of the barrels of * * * guns held in the hands of the people themselves". And nothing is "so essential to the liberties of the people" as "plac[ing] the sword in the[ir] hands"—this is "a real security" and "the greatest of all".[31]

Yet, although anyone can see, on the very face of the Constitution, conclusive evidence of the unique and indispensable relationship between "homeland security" and "the Militia of the several States", this book remains necessary. For today Americans are told—and all too many of them believe—that their Constitution does not really mean what it says in the words the Framers penned and WE THE PEOPLE ratified, but that this country has an oxymoronic "living Constitution" which means whatever rogue public officials and subversive

---

[28] Quotations From Chairman Mao Tse-tung (Peking, China: Foreign Languages Press, First Edition, 1966), at 61.

[29] Doubtlessly, no less than Hitler or Stalin, Mao was a veritable monster, whose tyranny brought about the unjustifiable deaths of countless millions, and the needless suffering of yet millions more. See, e.g., Frank Dikötter, Mao's Great Famine: The History of China's Most Devastating Catastrophe, 1958-1962 (New York, New York: Walker & Company, 2010). But Mao was not the only political potentate who has enjoyed success and acclaim—at the very same time that he has wrought untold havoc—in the modern political world. Even such an iconic figure among Western statesmen as Winston Churchill must bear posthumous personal responsibility for policies of criminal negligence that verged on actual crimes against humanity. See, e.g., Madhusree Mukerjee, Churchill's Secret War: The British Empire and the Ravaging of India During World War II (New York, New York: Basic Books, 2010). Neither did such genocidal policies arise only in the Twentieth Century. See, e.g., Ciarán Ó Murchadha, The Great Famine: Ireland's Agony 1845-1852 (London, England: Continuum International Publishing Group, 2011). As bad as "the Great Helmsmen" who steer their ships of state along such pernicious courses may be, though, they nonetheless sometimes stumble onto the truth, and popularize it (if only for their own purposes) in apt phrases with wide application. "Political power grows out of the barrel of a gun" is just such a phrase. It states a fundamental axiom of social organization so self-evident in principle and historically validated in practice that even such men as Mao, lost as they are in the depths of political and moral darkness, can recognize it.

[30] Abraham Lincoln, Address Delivered at the Dedication of the Cemetery at Gettysburg (19 November 1863), in The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, Roy P. Basler, Editor (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1953), Volume VII, at 23.

[31] Andrew Fletcher, A DISCOURSE OF GOVERNMENT With relation to MILITIAS (Edinburgh, Scotland: M. Cooper, 1755 [reprint of the 1698 edition]), at 7, 34. On Fletcher's contribution to the literature of liberty that inspired Americans in the 1700s, see C. Robbins, The Eighteenth-Century Commonwealthman, ante note 27, passim.

special-interest groups want it to mean from time to time, notwithstanding what it actually says at all times. The only antidotes to such an intellectually preposterous and politically poisonous doctrine are a detailed study of how to interpret the Constitution, and (with this in hand) a painstaking analysis of what WE THE PEOPLE intended—and should still intend—"the Militia of the several States" to be.

That is why this book is subtitled Constitutional Principles of "the Militia of the several States". Americans must understand the constitutional principles of the Militia if they are to know what the Militia are, and how the Militia are to fulfill their constitutional responsibilities. Therefore, whoever wants—and, in the case of all patriotic Americans concerned with "homeland security", needs—to understand "the Militia of the several States", to revitalize the Militia, and at length to serve in the Militia, must first become thoroughly conversant with these principles. If WE THE PEOPLE do not take charge of the Constitution intellectually by understanding in detail why and how it serves as the foremost instrument of their own freedom and security, unscrupulous and wily men in public offices and special-interest groups will pervert the Constitution's powers into engines for depriving common Americans of their freedoms in the name of "security". They are well along that dark path right now.

To understand the Constitution with respect to the Militia (and everything else it contains, for that matter), Americans must focus on what the Constitution's key terms actually meant in the late 1700s—and what they continue to mean today, there having been no Amendments on that score in the intervening years. The original Constitution and the Bill of Rights, however, did not define "the Militia of the several States",[32] "[a] well regulated Militia" and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms",[33] or what it means "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[34] They did not have to, because their original audience, WE THE PEOPLE in 1788 and 1791, knew precisely the import of those phrases. Unfortunately, most contemporary Americans do not. And sources from which they should derive useful information are all too often peculiarly devoid of it.[35] So WE THE PEOPLE today must study the legal history that this book provides—assiduously and with alacrity, for there is much to learn and little time remaining in which to assimilate and apply it.

---

[32] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[33] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[34] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[35] For example, in some 1,593 pages of text thickly set with footnotes, the otherwise scholarly and comprehensive The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation, Senate Document No. 92-82, 92d Congress, 2d Session (Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1973) devotes only 1-1/2 pages to the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution (Article I, Section 8, Clauses 15 and 16) and but 1-1/2 pages to the Second Amendment.

This is no merely academic exercise. At stake in the struggle for true "homeland security"—"the security of a free State"[36] with a "Government[ ] * * * deriving [its] just powers from the consent of the governed"[37] and committed "to secur[ing] the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"[38]—is no less than America's survival as a free and independent nation. True, in light of the somber history of the last century, the odds against common Americans are daunting. But they are not impossibly heavy. Besides, the odds against National survival without revitalization of "the Militia of the several States"—immediately, if not sooner—are even worse. The variability, complexity, and fragility of contemporary society throughout America render the Militia even more important now than ever before, for several reasons:

First, modern society suffers from far more systemic risks than did its Colonial antecedents. Economic cycles of "boom and bust"—especially those caused by the emission of currency based on debt (the so-called "Bills of Credit" that the Colonies, the independent States, and the Continental Congress emitted until the Constitution outlawed such practices[39])—were not unknown during the 1700s. But they never manifested the chronic instability of modern central banking, or the immediacy and intensity of modern monetary and banking crises, which threaten America as a whole with depression, hyperinflation, or even hyperinflation coupled with depression. Colonial society was never exposed to major industrial accidents of a nuclear, chemical, or biological nature. And although epidemics of fatal diseases were not unknown in the 1700s, they were less likely to become pandemics than they are today, because modern means of transporting people and things can spread infections far and wide in very short lengths of time.

Second, the constituents and components of modern society are far more interdependent than those of Colonial society ever were. Today, if something goes seriously wrong in one place, it will usually have deleterious effects in others, and in short order. So, even natural disasters which may be geographically localized are no longer limited in the extent of their economic, social, and political consequences.

Third, modern society does benefit from excellent systems of communication and transportation—when everything is working properly. But prudent planners must presume that a true "alarm" (as pre-constitutional Americans denoted a serious crisis) will occur when or even because everything is not working properly, or even at all; or that some man-made or natural disaster will cause those systems to fail. For

---

[36] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[37] Declaration of Independence.

[38] U.S. Const. preamble.

[39] See Edwin Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight: The Monetary Powers and Disabilities of the United States Constitution (Chicago, Illinois: R R Donnelley & Sons, Inc., GoldMoney Foundation Special Edition [2011] of the Second Revised Edition of 2002), at 67-205.

instance, if regional electrical grids shut down, or transportation networks break apart, widespread chaos will likely result (at least in the short term).

Fourth, to compound matters, modern society is far less self-reliant, self-sufficient, and self-confident than Colonial society was. Colonial economies were largely Local, and at least semi-agricultural, even in the vicinity of the few major cities—and most people knew how to provide themselves with food and shelter under adverse circumstances. In stark contrast, today the teeming urban and suburban masses in one metropolis after another could not hope to feed themselves for more than a week or two were transportation of food from the hinterlands interrupted. And most Americans do not possess the variety of practical knowledge and personal skills that their Colonial predecessors mastered as a matter of course—knowledge and skills that would be desperately needed everywhere in the event of (say) a catastrophic collapse of this country's economic infrastructure, leading to a prolonged depression. In the face of such major and widespread economic, social, or political crises, "emergency management" of the "top-down", centralized bureaucratic variety simply will not suffice. Inasmuch as the effects of these crises will likely differ in various places even within each State, let alone throughout the country as a whole, appropriate responses must be carefully tailored to the unique and probably constantly changing circumstances in each Locale, employing to the best possible degree the particular people and resources on hand at the time. Therefore, Local preparedness and Local responses through Local organization under Local command in "the Militia of the several States" will be necessary.

This book is intended to help bring that about.

Part One

METHODOLOGY

Instead of applying observation to the things we wished to know, we have chosen rather to imagine them. Advancing from one ill-founded supposition to another, we have at last bewildered ourselves amid a multitude of errors. These errors, becoming prejudices, are, of course, adopted as principles, and we thus bewilder ourselves more and more. The method, too, by which we conduct our reasonings is absurd; we abuse words which we do not understand, and call this the art of reasoning. When matters have been brought to this length, when errors have been thus accumulated, there is but one remedy by which order can be restored to the faculty of thinking; this is, to forget all that we have learned, to trace back our ideas to their source, to follow the train in which they rise, and * * * to frame the human understanding anew.

The Abbé de Condillac

The quotation on the preceding page is taken from Antoine Lavoisier, Elements of Chemistry, Robert Kerr, Translator (Edinburgh, Scotland: William Creech, Fourth Edition, 1799; Dover Facsimile Edition, 1965), at xxxv.

CHAPTER ONE

The constitutional principles of "the Militia of the several States" must be derived from the pre-constitutional Militia statutes of the American Colonies and independent States.

Where "the Militia of the several States" are concerned, several provisions of the Constitution must be considered:

> ARTICLE I, SECTION 8, CLAUSE 15—"The Congress shall have Power * * * To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions[.]"
>
> ARTICLE I, SECTION 8, CLAUSE 16—"The Congress shall have Power * * * To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress[.]"
>
> ARTICLE II, SECTION 2, CLAUSE 1—"The President shall be Commander in Chief * * * of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States[.]"
>
> AMENDMENT II—"A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed."
>
> AMENDMENT V—"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger[.]"

So the Constitution recites. But what do these provisions individually import? How do they interrelate, both among themselves and with other relevant provisions of the Constitution? And by what means of objective verification or falsification can Americans be certain? Just as answers to these questions are not self-evident, the proper method for arriving at them is not self-explanatory. So a careful study of that method is a necessary preliminary, because no one can determine what the Constitution actually means without first undertaking a detailed analysis of how to interpret the Constitution.

A. The centrality of the Declaration of Independence. The initial step must be to take close account of the legal and historical contexts in which the Constitution arose, in order to determine the source and substance of its authority. For neither the Constitution nor least of all the principles it embodies arose spontaneously out of nothing. That source and substance must be found in the Declaration of Independence.

It is perverse to pretend (as some will persist in doing) that the Declaration of Independence is not the original and still fully enforceable supreme organic law of each of the several States and of the United States as a whole. For, if the Declaration were not such, then neither WE THE PEOPLE, nor any of the States individually, nor the United States collectively could have claimed since 1776, or can claim today, an independent sovereignty on the basis of which to enact any other laws, such as the States' constitutions, the Articles of Confederation, the Constitution of the United States, and all of the statutes made in pursuance thereof. Yet, plainly, the Declaration established, not only when an individual living in the *pre-*constitutional era became an American citizen, independent of Britain as a matter of law as well as fact, but also when all American citizens, in their collective political capacities as "the good People of these Colonies", became independent sovereigns, no less as a matter of law.[40]

Nonetheless, some historians have contended that the Declaration of Independence was without the force of law in and of itself, and that it was instead the Resolution submitted by the Virginian Richard Henry Lee on 7 June 1776 and enacted by the Continental Congress on 2 July 1776 which brought about the Colonies' independence.[41] If true, this would mean that nothing contained in the Declaration would be a permanent part of America's supreme law, except for what was also contained in the Resolution of 2 July—and even that would derive its authority from the Resolution, not the Declaration. That contention, though, is self-evidently false. The Resolution of 7 June read as follows:

> Resolved, That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved.

---

[40] See Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor, 28 U.S. (3 Peters) 99, 120-121 (1830); McIlvaine v. Coxe's Lessee, 8 U.S. (4 Cranch) 209, 212 (1808); Harcourt v. Gaillard, 25 U.S. (12 Wheaton) 523, 526-528 (1827).

[41] See, e.g., William Hogeland, Declaration: The Nine Tumultuous Weeks When America Became Independent, May 1-July 4, 1776 (New York, New York: Simon and Schuster, 2010), at 174.

> That it is expedient forthwith to take the most effectual measures for forming foreign Alliances.
>
> That a plan of confederation be prepared and transmitted to the respective Colonies for their consideration and approbation.[42]

Obviously, the second and third paragraphs can be disregarded here because they were recommendations for future political action by Congress, not the assertion of a fundamental legal position, and could not have been made effective in any event if the first paragraph had proven inoperative. And, in fact, those paragraphs were excised from the Resolution as adopted on 2 July 1776:

> Resolved, That these United Colonies are, and, of right, ought to be, Free and Independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connexion between them, and the state of Great Britain, is, and ought to be, totally dissolved.[43]

But one may accept for purposes of argument that the Resolution adopted on 2 July could by itself have "made the colonies independent" in some sense, without in the least acceding to the further notion that therefore the Declaration of Independence had no force of its own as law:

First, the Declaration of Independence was adopted by the selfsame Continental Congress, for the selfsame purpose, as the Resolutions of 7 June and 2 July. Indeed, the mandate for the Declaration derived from a further Resolution brought forward on 10 June 1776, "that no time be lost, in case the Congress agree thereto, that a committee be appointed to prepare a declaration to the effect of the * * * resolution [of 7 June 1776]".[44] And very little time was lost in that endeavor, as the committee "brought in a draught, which was read" to Congress on 28 June 1776.[45]

Second, the Declaration of Independence was adopted contemporaneously with the Resolution of 2 July 1776 (only two days apart),[46] with the Declaration following the Resolutions of 7 June and 2 July, and therefore to the extent of any substantive differences in the three documents amending or superseding the latter two.

---

[42] Library of Congress, Journals of the Continental Congress, 1774-1789, Worthington C. Ford, Editor (Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1904-1937), Volume V (5 June 1776 to 8 October 1776), at 425 (footnote omitted).

[43] Id., Volume V, at 507 (footnote omitted).

[44] Id., Volume V, at 428-429.

[45] Id., Volume V, at 491-502.

[46] Id., Volume V, at 506-507 (Resolution), 510-515 (Declaration).

Third, on 4 July 1776 the Continental Congress also "Ordered, That the declaration be authenticated and printed" and "That copies of the declaration be sent to the several assemblies, conventions and committees, or councils of safety, and to the several commanding officers of the continental troops; that it be proclaimed in each of the United States, and at the head of the army"[47]—actions which it did not take with respect to the Resolution of 2 July, and which unquestionably demonstrate that Congress believed the important, because legally operative, document to be the Declaration, not the Resolution.

Fourth, in keeping with the Resolution of 10 June 1776, the Declaration incorporated and reasserted in full the operative part of the Resolution of 2 July:

> WE, * * * the REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the Name, and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES; that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do.[48]

If the Resolution of 2 July had issued with the force of law, its verbatim reassertion by the very same Congress for the identical purpose could have had no less of an effect.

Fifth, the Declaration was not merely a verbatim rehearsal of the Resolution of 2 July, but instead bracketed it with two very important statements, identifying: (i) the real parties in whose ultimate interest independence was being asserted—namely, "in the Name, and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies" (not just the Colonial governments); and (ii) the ambit of authority those parties intended to wield as a consequence of their independence—namely, the plenary powers "to do all * * * Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do". If the Resolution had sufficed to bring about such complete independence and legal self-sufficiency for "the good People of these Colonies", these further statements in the Declaration would not have been deemed necessary. Interestingly, too, this pattern set in the Declaration then carried over into the Constitution, which identifies the selfsame group as its real parties in interest—namely, "WE THE

---

[47] Id., Volume V, at 516 (footnote omitted).

[48] The text of the Resolution of 2 July 1776 appears in bold-italic typeface.

PEOPLE" who "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] this Constitution",[49] and then sets out those specifically enumerated powers, drawn from among all of the "Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do", that THE PEOPLE have delegated to the United States or withheld from the States.

Sixth, beyond all of this, the Declaration: (i) invoked the principles of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" and carefully explained their application on behalf of "the good People['s]" decision "to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth" a "separate and equal station"; and (ii) marshaled damning facts in a lengthy indictment aimed at proving that "[t]he history of the present King of Great Britain" was one "of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States". So, whereas the Resolution of 2 July merely claimed independence, the Declaration asserted and justified it on the basis of controlling legal precepts and conclusive evidence.

Seventh, the Declaration was directed at Great Britain, the King, Parliament, and even "our Brittish brethren" as defendants, and addressed to the court of world public opinion ("a decent respect to the opinions of mankind") and to a court even higher than that ("appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions") as the tribunals in and by which the merits of the dispute between Great Britain and "the good People of these Colonies" would be decided. So the Declaration was a "declaration", not only in the general sense of "[a] proclamation or affirmation",[50] but also and more importantly in the specific legal sense of "properly the shewing forth, or laying out, of an action personal in any suit".[51] True enough, what followed was a "suit" between two peoples and two political systems, the "litigation" of which necessitated a long and sanguinary passage of arms that once again proved the raw truth in the epigram, "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[52] But it took the only form possible for a legal action enforcing "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" in the final court of appeal.

Eighth, although a suit in the court of last resort, the Declaration was not predicated upon the uncertain ground of what lawyers call "an issue of first impression". It did not depend for its validity upon utterly novel, even revolutionary principles that had never before been broached or tested "in the Course of human events". To the contrary: Everything of political philosophy upon which the Declaration relied was then part of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" to

---

[49] U.S. Const. preamble.

[50] Samuel Johnson, A Dictionary of the English Language, First Edition (London, England: W. Strahan, 1755), and Fourth Edition (London, England: W. Strahan, 1773), definition 1 in both editions. (Neither edition serially numbered its pages.)

[51] Id., definition 3 in both editions.

[52] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

which "the opinions of mankind" throughout Western civilization had long deferred. Otherwise, how could those "Laws" have "entitle[d]" Americans to a "separate and equal station" "among the powers of the earth" in the view of "a candid world" to which the Declaration submitted its evidence and arguments? Plainly, the Founders did not claim to have invented these "Laws" themselves, only to have applied them to the Colonies' situation. Rather, they found their foundational political and legal principles laid out then most recently in the work of John Locke[53] and Algernon Sidney,[54] whom Thomas Jefferson ranked as the two well-springs from which Americans drew their political inspirations with respect to liberty and men's unalienable rights.[55] And inasmuch as Locke and Sidney had taken explicit pains to debunk Robert Filmer's apology for "the divine right of kings",[56] in which Filmer had attempted unsuccessfully to refute the earlier writings of Robert Bellarmine in favor of popular sovereignty, the tenets upon which the Declaration relied can be traced to Bellarmine's work in the early 1600s.[57] Hardly coincidental, then, was it that Thomas Jefferson owned a copy of Filmer's book, wherein apparently Jefferson himself had marked a passage in which Filmer rehearsed Bellarmine's arguments in favor of popular sovereignty, admitting that they "comprised the strength of all that I [Filmer] have ever read, or heard produced for the Natural Liberty of the Subject".[58] And, of course, the principles Bellarmine espoused can be traced back through such of the Spanish Scholastics as Vitoria and Suárez to Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologiae. and thus ultimately to Aristotle's Politics. So the Declaration of Independence was anything but the outpouring of an alembic worked by a few radical political alchemists in America. Rather, it comprised the purest distillate of the political wisdom of the ages.

Ninth and last, the Declaration identified fixed legal principles, derived from "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", upon which the authority of the newly independent States would rest: namely, (i) What "Independent States may of right do" finds its genesis in the permanent "Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", not

---

[53] Two Treatises of Government (London, England: Awnsham & John Churchill, 1698), Book II, Chapters XVII, XVIII, and XIX.

[54] Discourses Concerning Government [written in 1681-1683, published posthumously in 1698], Thomas G. West, Editor (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Fund, Revised Edition, 1996).

[55] See Thomas G. West, Foreword, in id. at xv (footnote omitted). See C. Robbins, The Eighteenth-Century Commonwealthman, ante note 27, at 46.

[56] Patriarcha: A Defense of the Natural Power of Kings against the Unnatural Liberty of the People (written in 1637-1638, but not published until 1680).

[57] See generally John C. Rager, The Political Philosophy of St. Robert Bellarmine: An Examination of Saint Cardinal Bellarmine's Defense of Popular Government and the Influence of His Political Theory upon the Declaration of Independence (Spokane, Washington: Apostolate of Our Lady of Siluva, 1995), especially at 83-90.

[58] See James Brown Scott, The Catholic Conception of International Law—Francisco de Vitoria, Founder of the Modern Law of Nations—Francisco Suárez, Founder of the Modern Philosophy of Law in General and in Particular of the Law of Nations, A Critical Examination and a Justified Appreciation (Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University Press, 1934), at 425-426 & note 83.

in any merely transient human law. (ii) "[T]he governed" can "consent" to delegate to any "Form of Government" only "just powers" for the sole purpose of "secur[ing]" "certain unalienable Rights". And (iii) no "Form of Government [which] becomes destructive of these ends" can deny the ultimate "Right of the People to alter or to abolish it", and therefore to determine, in the first instance and with finality, when, why, and to what degree that "Form of Government" has "become[so] destructive", and what recourse should be had towards its correction or supersession—which "Right" necessarily entails "the People['s]" independent and complete control over both the interpretation as judges of the constitution or other organic law of that "Form of Government" and the determination as jurors of the underlying facts of the situation to which that juridical interpretation applies.[59]

Thus, the conclusion must be that, far from having no force of law itself, the Declaration of Independence is the source of WE THE PEOPLE'S sovereignty, and through delegation from them, not only of such sovereign powers as the several States individually and the United States collectively may exercise, but also of such disabilities—that is, absences of power—as constrain them legally and politically. Therefore, those powers and disabilities must be predicated, conditioned, and applied in all of their particulars upon and according to the principles of law that the Declaration explicitly invoked as the bases for attesting that the "Free and Independent [American] States * * * have full Power * * * to do all * * * Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do".

B. Fundamental insights for interpreting the Constitution. The next question is what the Constitution, interpreted in light of the Declaration of Independence, actually means. In general terms, the answer is far simpler than most people imagine.

1. The meanings of the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights known at the times of their ratifications. The specific problem of how to interpret the language of the Constitution first arose—and was definitively solved for all time thereafter—in the late 1700s. The original Constitution was ratified in State Conventions from 7 December 1787 through 21 June 1788; and the Bill of Rights was ratified by the States' legislatures from 20 November 1789 through 15 December 1791.[60] At that point in time, in order to be "ratified" in any rational sense of that verb, the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights individually and together had to have meanings, in every word and phrase, fully accessible to the individuals who ratified them—that is, WE THE PEOPLE who the Preamble itself asserts "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] this Constitution", and their representatives in the States' legislatures. THE PEOPLE and their representatives had to understand exactly what they were "ordain[ing] and establish[ing]" and "ratifying". Before they took those fateful steps, they had to be assured of far more than that the original Constitution and its Amendments would be explained to them, piece by piece in some random fashion, only at unpredictable later dates in an uncertain future, and then only according to the unilateral interpretations of public officials whose identities they did not yet know, or might never know, and of whose competence and good faith they could have no guarantee. So THE PEOPLE must have believed that no facts material to any question of constitutional interpretation were unascertainable in principle, let alone affirmatively withheld or knowingly and willfully misrepresented by their agents in the Federal Convention that drafted the original Constitution, the State Conventions that ratified it, the Congress that drafted the Bill of Rights, and the State legislatures that ratified the first ten Amendments.

---

[59] See by way of analogy Ohio Valley Water Company v. Ben Avon Borough, 253 U.S. 287, 289 (1920); Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 60 (1932); Saint Joseph Stock Yards Company v. United States, 298 U.S. 38, 51-52 (1936).

[60] See House Document No. 94-539, ante note 3, at 10, 12; Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1007-1061, 1063-1067. Hereinafter, unless otherwise qualified, reference to "the Constitution" simpliciter should be taken to include the original Constitution and all of its subsequent Amendments in existence at the relevant time.

To be a valid "social contract" as American political philosophy understood the term at that point in time, the original Constitution upon its adoption had to embody a definite "meeting of the minds" among WE THE PEOPLE as to its substance. So, too, for every subsequent Amendment when it was ratified. For no prudent individuals, as individuals or as a polity, would—or rationally could—enter into a "contract" of any nature the meaning of which they did not then and there understand, or the meaning of which could unpredictably be changed at any time in the future at the mere whim of less than all of the contracting parties in a manner to which all of them did not originally agree. And to be a valid "law" at that point in time, the original Constitution (and then its various Amendments as each of them was ratified) had to have ascertainable meanings in all of their particulars. For, ultimately, the Constitution and its Amendments are statutes—and any statute composed "in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law".[61] So, if perforce of unintelligibility the original Constitution had not been a true "social contract" and a "law" at that point in time, neither it nor its subsequent Amendments could ever have become such, either then or thereafter. And if the Constitution had not been a "social contract" and a "law" then, so that it and its Amendment do not qualify as a "social contract" and "law" now, then they are useless—except for deceiving common Americans into sheepishly acquiescing in endless usurpation and tyranny directed against themselves, and otherwise stirring up other potentially limitless mischief and grief.

---

[61] Connally v. General Construction Company, 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926).

In keeping with the necessity to interpret constitutional terms according to the meanings they had during the pre-constitutional era, "usurpation" and "tyranny"—which are paradigmatic categories of unconstitutional actions—should be defined here, as well. According to Locke, "Usurpation is the exercise of Power, which another hath a Right to".[62] According to Sidney, three forms of usurpation were the most common:

> The first is, when one or more men take upon them the power and name of a magistracy, to which they are not justly called.
>
> The second, when one or more being justly called, continue in their magistracy longer than the laws by which they are called do prescribe.
>
> And the third, when he or they who are rightly called, do assume a power, tho within the time prescribed, and that the law does not give; or turn that which the law does give, to an end different and contrary to that which is intended by it.[63]

To Locke,

> Tyranny is the exercise of Power beyond Right, which no Body can have a Right to. And this is making use of the Power that any one has in his hands; not for the good of those, who are under it, but for his own private separate Advantage. When the Governour, however intituled, makes not the Law, but his Will, the Rule; and his Commands and Actions are not directed to the preservation of the Properties of his People, but the satisfaction of his own Ambition, Revenge, Covetousness, or any other irregular Passion.
>
> * * * * *
>
> 'Tis a Mistake to think this Fault is proper only to Monarchies; other Forms of Government are liable to it, as well as that. For where-ever the Power that is put in any hands for the Government of the People, and the Preservation of their Properties, is applied to other ends, and made use of to impoverish, harass, or subdue them to the Arbitrary and Irregular Commands of those that have it: There it presently becomes Tyranny, whether those that thus use it are one or many.[64]

To which Sidney agreed,

---

[62] Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XVIII, § 199.

[63] Discourses Concerning Government, ante note 54, at 220.

[64] Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XVIII, §§ 199 and 201.

> *that regard is to be had to the principal end and cause, for which a * * * lord is set over [a people] which is their good and profit, and not that it should turn to their destruction and ruin; for if that should be, there is no doubt but from thence forward, that power would be tyrannical and unjust, as tending more to the interest and profit of that lord, than to the publick good and profit of the subjects; which, according to natural reason, and the laws of God and man, is abhorred, and deserves to be abhorred.*[65]

This definition of "tyranny", of course, was not original with either Locke or Sidney. Much earlier Thomas Aquinas had opined that "[a] tyrannical régime is not just, because it is not directed to the common good but to the private good of the one who rules".[66] For another example, the eminent theologian and jurist Francisco de Vitoria, following Aquinas, held to the same definition: "Herein, indeed, is the difference between a lawful king and a tyrant, that the latter directs his government towards his individual profit and advantage, but a king to the public welfare[.]"[67]

2. The necessity of fixed principles of construction. For the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights to have had ascertainable meanings in 1788 and 1791, a set of equally ascertainable principles of interpretation or construction of their language must then have existed. After all, constitutional questions "must be resolved not by past uncertainties, assumptions, or arguments, but by the application of the controlling principles of constitutional interpretation".[68] Moreover, those principles themselves must have been fixed in substance, and their proper applications well understood, otherwise their very verbal ambiguity and political plasticity would have afforded a surreptitious means for serially amending the Constitution. "Surreptitious", because the original Constitution contained an explicit and complex procedure for Amendments.[69] And if effective amendment simply by alleged "interpretation" or "construction" were allowable, then this provision would have been utterly superfluous, even duplicitous, from the very outset—in derogation of the opposite conclusion, obvious from the structure of the instrument itself, that no "clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect".[70] In derogation, too, of the very purpose of the provision for Amendments, which is to compel extremely careful deliberation by WE THE PEOPLE as a whole on

---

[65] Discourses Concerning Government, ante note 54, at 51-52 (footnote omitted) (quoting Bartolomé de Las Casas).

[66] Summa Theologiae, Secunda Secundae, Quaestio 42, De Seditione, Articulus 2, Ad Tertium, in Edita Auspiciis et Inspiratione Pontificiae Universitatis Salmanticensis (Biblioteca de Autores Christianes, Tertio Editio, 1963), Volume III, at 277 (the present author's translation).

[67] De Iure Belli (1557), quoted in J. Scott, The Catholic Conception of International Law, ante note 58, at 38.

[68] Wright v. United States, 302 U.S. 583, 597-598 (1938).

[69] U.S. Const. art. V.

[70] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 174 (1803).

any proposed change in their Constitution, so as to preserve self-conscious and fully informed popular self-government. Whereas, underhanded ersatz amendments jury-rigged by specious "interpretations" or "constructions" of the Constitution aim at the subversion, if not the entire overthrow, of popular self-government—because the concocted "interpretations" or "constructions" derive, not from WE THE PEOPLE themselves, but instead from unelected judges and their law clerks, or nameless and faceless bureaucrats in "alphabet agencies" (the quintessence of political élitism); or from legislators almost always beholden to avaricious special-interest groups (the quintessence of political corruption). All of these constitute "factions"—namely, "a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community".[71] Importantly, even a majority of the community may constitute a faction, inimical to the Constitution, if its members' aim is other than "the common defence" and "the general Welfare".[72] Therefore, the correct construction of the Constitution cannot be held hostage to what passes for modern "democracy": namely, the raw will of some majority of the moment, unrestrained by concerns for the community's well-being in the long run—which in its most grotesque manifestations the ancient Greeks disparaged as "ochlocracy", the rule of the mob. For example, Aristotle distinguished between, on the one hand, "a state", which was his name for a government in which "the citizens at large govern for the public good"; and, on the other hand, "democracy", which was his name for "the corruption[ ] attending" the type of government in which "those who have [the supreme power] are worth little or nothing" and rule without "hav[ing] a common good in view".[73] So, today as well, mere numbers can have nothing to do with the matter: The meaning of the Constitution's provisions "may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections".[74]

Thus, although only implicit, this set of fixed principles of interpretation or construction arguably comprises the most important part of the Constitution, because it controls the meaning and therefore the application of everything else in the document. Self-evidently, too, because these principles were well understood and fixed in 1788 (as they had to be if the original Constitution were to have qualified as a "law" at all), and no Amendment of the Constitution addressed to any of them having supervened (or even been suggested) since then, they remain certainly ascertainable (and presumably still well understood), and still fixed, today.

---

[71] The Federalist No. 10 (James Madison).

[72] See U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

[73] Politics, Book III, Chapters VII and VIII, in A TREATISE ON GOVERNMENT OR, THE POLITICS OF ARISTOTLE, William Ellis, Translator (London, England: J.M. Dent & Sons Ltd., 1912), at 79.

[74] West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 638 (1943).

a. The plain meaning of the words. The most important principle of constitutional interpretation is literalism: the self-evident truth that the first step in understanding the Constitution must be to read its actual words in the expectation that they will elucidate its meaning. After all, "[w]hy not assume that the framers of the Constitution, and the people who voted it into existence, meant exactly what it says?"[75] Indeed, is not the opposite assumption—that the document might mean something other than what it says—to attribute to its authors either lunacy or fraud?!

History attests that "the framers of the Constitution were * * * practical men" who "prescrib[ed], in language clear and intelligible, the powers that government was to take".[76] No one has ever denied, or even seriously questioned, that they employed words and phrases in "their natural sense";[77] in their "natural and obvious sense";[78] in their "natural signification";[79] with their "natural meaning";[80] with their "normal and ordinary * * * meaning";[81] according to "ordinary and common usage";[82] and according to their "plain meaning".[83]

b. As understood at that time. Yet "language clear and intelligible" to whom and when? The answer to this question is found in another key principle of constitutional interpretation: temporal contextualism. Namely, that the Constitution's words and phrases are to be construed as the people by and for whom the Constitution was written understood them at that time—that is, WE THE PEOPLE of the late 1700s.

(1) Proper construction of the Constitution must look to and determine "[w]hat * * * those who framed and adopted it understood [its] terms to designate and include"[84]—"that sense in which * * * [the words were] generally used by those for whom the instrument was intended",[85] "the common understanding" "when the Constitution was adopted",[86] "the common parlance of the times in which the

---

[75] Lake County Commissioners v. Rollins, 130 U.S. 662, 670 (1889).

[76] South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 449 (1905).

[77] Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheaton) 1, 188 (1824); McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U.S. 1, 27 (1892); South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 449 (1905).

[78] The Pocket Veto Case, 279 U.S. 655, 679 (1929).

[79] Lake County Commissioners v. Rollins, 130 U.S. 662, 670 (1889).

[80] Wright v. United States, 302 U.S. 583, 588 (1938).

[81] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 731 (1931); Green v. United States, 356 U.S. 165, 210 (1958) (Black, J., dissenting).

[82] The Pocket Veto Case, 279 U.S. 655, 679 (1929).

[83] Bronson v. Kinzie, 42 U.S. (1 Howard) 311, 318 (1843).

[84] Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, 157 U.S. 429, 558 (1895).

[85] Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U.S. (12 Wheaton) 213, 332 (1827) (Marshall, C.J., dissenting).

[86] Ohio ex rel. Popovici v. Agler, 280 U.S. 379, 383 (1930).

Constitution was written",[87] and "according to their accepted meaning in that day".[88] Importantly, the analytical emphasis here rests squarely upon "common" parlance and understanding—not some arcane and recondite gnosis, hermeneutic, or intuition of a narrow political, judicial, academic, intellectual, or other self-styled and self-empowered élite. For the Constitution was designed to "establish Justice" throughout the United States, "insure domestic Tranquility" everywhere within this country, "provide for the common defence", "promote the general Welfare", and "secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity" for Americans as a whole in all ages to come.[89] So the true sense of the Constitution is not to be found simply in the understanding of the Framers, or of the Founding Fathers, or of some other small group of American patriots, no matter how distinguished they may have been—but exclusively according to the meaning broadly accepted among WE THE PEOPLE: namely, "the common understanding" among common individuals. And, plainly enough, because the Constitution was "clear and intelligible" to THE PEOPLE "in that day", it remained and remains "clear and intelligible" to THE PEOPLE thereafter, generation upon generation, even unto the present day.

(2) Neither the Framers who composed the original Constitution, nor the Founding Fathers who ratified it in the State Conventions, nor WE THE PEOPLE who empowered them all as agents to draft and adopt it at that point in time could have predicted whether, when, how, or why the particular words and phrases they used and approved, because they understood them in particular senses, might change (or be claimed by someone to have changed) in meaning in the dim, distant, and perhaps disturbed future. Rather, they must have conclusively presumed that the Constitution's words and phrases, no matter how much their connotations and even denotations might be transformed by social convention in other contexts and for other purposes, would nevertheless always remain exactly the same for the purpose of interpreting and applying the Constitution—that is, those words and phrases would display a legal fixity of meaning in that document.

Because the Constitution's words and phrases must be understood "according to their accepted meaning in that day", that certain of them may subsequently have passed into obsolescence, obscurity, or disuse, or acquired different connotations, in ordinary daily discourse today is wholly inadmissible as an argument for construing the Constitution in some novel fashion according to such neologisms. For that procedure would amount, not to interpretation, but to *re*interpretation, and therefore to *mis*interpretation. To be sure, in the course of time various words and phrases in the English language may depart from their [87] United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association, 322 U.S. 533, 539 (1944). Accord, Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheaton) 1, 190 (1824).

---

[88] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 418 (1857).

[89] See U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

original meanings, develop altogether new meanings, or even disappear entirely in common usage. But, even so, the meanings of those words and phrases as employed in the Constitution do not change, in whole or in any part.

The "meaning [of constitutional provisions] is changeless; * * * only their application * * * is extensible".[90] "What [the Constitution] meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation",[91] notwithstanding swings in public opinion at home or abroad,[92] variations in "the ebb and flow of economic events",[93] or shifts in what is loosely called "public policy".[94] Indeed, facile and ultimately fatuous political slogans such as "'[p]olicy and humanity' are dangerous guides in the discussion of a legal proposition. He who follows them far is apt to bring back the means of error and delusion."[95] Therefore, > while [the Constitution] remains unaltered, it must be construed now as it was understood at the time of its adoption. It is not only the same in words, but the same in meaning, and delegates the same powers to the government, and reserves and secures the same rights and privileges to the citizen; and as long as it continues to exist in its present form, it speaks not only in the same words, but with the same meaning and intent with which it spoke when it came from the hands of its framers, and was voted on and adopted by the people of the United States. Any other rule of construction would abrogate the judicial character of th[e Supreme C]ourt, and make it the mere reflex of the popular opinion or passion of the day.[96]

For, "[i]f * * * we are at liberty to give old words new meanings * * * , there is no power which may not * * * be conferred on the [G]eneral [G]overnment"[97]—or, for that matter, no power that may not be reallocated away from WE THE PEOPLE to the General Government or the States.[98] No constitution can limit the powers it delegates if the definitions of its terms may deviate from their original meanings at the behest of the very persons whose powers are to be limited.

---

[90] Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 451 (1934) (Sutherland, J., dissenting).

[91] Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 365 (1932). Accord, South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 448-449 (1905).

[92] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 426 (1857).

[93] West Coast Hotel Company v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 402 (1937) (Sutherland, J., dissenting).

[94] Patton v. United States, 281 U.S. 276, 306 (1930).

[95] Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U.S. 595, 604 (1878).

[96] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 426 (1857).

[97] Passenger Cases, 48 U.S. (7 Howard) 283, 478 (1849).

[98] The Tenth Amendment to the Constitution renders apparent the limitless scope of the possible pernicious permutations and combinations that could arise.

(3) Moreover, no subsequent legislative or judicial "precedents"—or, more accurately described, later innovations—can rewrite the Constitution. "[W]hen the meaning and scope of a constitutional provision are clear, it cannot be overthrown by legislative action, although several times repeated and never before challenged."[99] "[N]either the antiquity of a practice nor * * * steadfast legislative and judicial adherence to it through the centuries insulates it from constitutional attack".[100] Surely, if "a bold and daring usurpation might be resisted, after * * * [long and complete] acquiescence",[101] then a mindless "[g]eneral acquiescence cannot justify departure from the law",[102] no matter how long it may have continued. "Illegality cannot attain legitimacy through practice."[103]

c. What linguistic authority controls. Application of the rule that the Constitution's words and phrases should be interpreted according to their "ordinary acceptation", "ordinary and common usage", "sense most obvious to * * * common understanding", and "plain meaning" as these were known during the *pre-*constitutional period requires reference to some linguistic authority to determine what the meanings of those words and phrases actually were at that time. How does one know now what was generally known then?

(1) Then-contemporary dictionaries not necessarily definitive. Plainly, though, recourse simply to some then-contemporary dictionary will not always suffice. For example, both the first and fourth editions of Samuel Johnson's famous A Dictionary of the English Language defined "militia" as "[t]he trainbands; the standing force of a nation"; defined "trainbands" as "[t]he militia; the part of the community trained to martial exercise"; and defined "regulate" as "[t]o adjust by rule or method".[104] From this alone, however, it would have been impossible for anyone in 1791, and remains impossible for anyone today, to describe with specificity or surety what the Second Amendment meant or still means by "[a] well regulated Militia". To qualify as such a "Militia", what "part of the community" must be "trained", to what "martial exercise", and by what "rule or method" that will enable it to constitute a "standing force"? No dictionary by itself can answer any of these questions.

(2) Subjective views of the Founding Fathers not controlling. A technique often employed in academic, as well as popular, studies that aim at

---

[99] Fairbank v. United States, 181 U.S. 283, 311 (1901).

[100] Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235, 239 (1970), quoted in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

[101] McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 316, 401 (1819).

[102] Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 369 (1932).

[103] Inland Waterways Corporation v. Young, 309 U.S. 517, 524 (1940).

[104] Respectively, the sole definition in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions; the sole definition in both editions; and definition 1 in both editions.

defending "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms"[105] attempts to ascertain the meaning of that phrase (as well as others in the Constitution) by compiling statements attributed to various of the Framers of the Constitution and others among the Founding Fathers and prominent American patriots of that era. Unfortunately, this approach is multiply flawed. For these statements evidence no more than the bare words that some Framer, Founder, or other patriot spoke or wrote on a particular occasion. They are neither always self-explanatory nor ever self-validating as to their substance. Indeed, they are not necessarily even accurate summaries of actual historical facts, or especially of correct legal principles, or perhaps even of the true personal opinions of those individuals—but instead may require other, and possibly extensive, evidence for their corroboration or correction.

In the best of cases, these statements, taken individually or collectively, and even if they themselves are substantially accurate as far as they go, do not provide all of the information necessary to define the constitutional characteristics of "the Militia of the several States";[106] what constitutes "[a] well regulated Militia" and what is the substance of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms";[107] and what the power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" requires and allows Congress and the States to do vel non.[108] Indeed, these statements do not offer a complete insight into even any particular Framer's or Founder's individual opinions on those matters, his reasons for those opinions, and the facts he may have believed supported them—let alone a reliable gauge as to what the Framers and Founders, let alone the vast majority of politically literate Americans of that era, might all have agreed upon had the matter been put to them collectively.

Moreover, some of this material is patently unreliable. For instance, in the debates in Virginia's Convention of 1788, delegates differed radically as to whether Congress's proposed constitutional power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" is exclusive, or allows for concurrent action in those particulars by the States.[109] On one side were:

> • PATRICK HENRY—"The clause which says that Congress shall 'provide for arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia * * * ,' seemed to put the states in the power of Congress. * * * The power of arming the militia, and the means of purchasing arms, are taken from the states by the

---

[105] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[106] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[107] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[108] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[109] An example is drawn from Virginia's Convention because this study focuses in part on Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia laws. Similar instances of dissension among the Founding Fathers could easily be found, though, in the reported debates in other State Conventions.

paramount powers of Congress. If Congress will not arm them, they will not be armed at all."[110]

• GEORGE MASON—"The militia may be here destroyed by that method which has been practised in other parts of the world before; that is, by rendering them useless—by disarming them. Under various pretences, Congress may neglect to provide for arming and disciplining the militia; and the state governments cannot do it, for Congress has an exclusive right to arm them * * * . Should the national government wish to render the militia useless, they may neglect them, and let them perish, in order to have a pretence of establishing a standing army."[111]

• WILLIAM GRAYSON—"As the exclusive power of arming * * * was given to Congress, they might entirely neglect them; or they might be armed in one part of the Union, and totally neglected in another."[112]

On the other side were:

• EDMUND RANDOLPH—"It is clear and self-evident that the pretended danger cannot result from the clause. Should Congress neglect to arm or discipline the militia, the states are fully possessed of the power of doing it; for they are restrained from it by no part of the Constitution."[113]

• JAMES MADISON—"I cannot conceive that this Constitution, by giving the general government the power of arming the militia, takes it away from the state governments. The power is concurrent, and not exclusive."[114]

• GEORGE NICHOLAS—"The power of arming the[Militia] is concurrent between the general and state governments; for the power of arming them rested in the state governments before; and although the power be given to the general government, yet it is not given exclusively; for, in every instance where the Constitution intends that the general government shall exercise any power exclusively of the state governments, words of exclusion are particularly inserted. Consequently, in every case where such words of exclusion are not inserted, the power is concurrent to the state governments and Congress, unless where it is impossible that the power should be exercised by both. It is, therefore, not an absurdity to say, that Virginia may arm the militia, should Congress neglect to arm

---

[110] Jonathan Elliot, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS ON THE ADOPTION OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION, AS RECOMMENDED BY THE GENERAL CONVENTION AT PHILADELPHIA, IN 1787 (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: J.B. Lippincott Company, Second Edition, 1836), Volume 3, at 169.

[111] Id., Volume 3, at 379.

[112] Id., Volume 3, at 418.

[113] Id., Volume 3, at 206.

[114] Id., Volume 3, at 382.

> them. But it would be absurd to say that we should arm them after Congress had armed them, when it would be unnecessary[.]"[115]
>
> • JOHN MARSHALL—"If Congress neglect our militia we can arm them ourselves. Cannot Virginia import arms? Cannot she put them into the hands of her militia-men?
>
> " * * * [T]he power of governing the militia was not vested in the states [only] by implication, because, being possessed of it antecedent to the adoption of the government, and not being divested of it by any grant or restriction in the Constitution, they must necessary be as fully possessed of it as ever they had been."[116]
>
> • EDMUND PENDLETON—"[T]here is nothing to preclude them [that is, the States] from arming and disciplining the[Militia], should Congress neglect to do it."[117]

Obviously, both of these mutually contradictory viewpoints could not then have been, and cannot now be, correct. Yet, to determine which of them was and remains cogent requires recourse to evidence and reasoning other than these statements alone present.

Of course, men such as Patrick Henry and George Mason, who opposed ratification of the original Constitution, may have voiced what they knew were extravagant constructions of that document merely as a means of putting their opponents on the rhetorical defensive. They were, after all, intent on convincing Virginia's Convention not to ratify the Constitution, for which result fear might have proven a stronger motivation than cold reason. Yet some of their utterances are not so easily written off as mere political hyperbole. For instance, Henry stated that, in relation to the Militia, "[t]he great object is, that every man be armed".[118] That, however, is not merely the "object", but the very historical and constitutional definition, of the "Militia" in America—the people armed, not as a matter of happenstance, individually and voluntarily, but as a matter of systematic organization, collectively and compulsorily. Had Henry focused on this, he might have been able to advance a far more powerful argument than he did in parsing the Constitution's delegation of power to Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia"—perhaps by challenging his opponents to admit that Congress's power constituted a duty to see to it, one way or another, whether by Congressional, State, or the people's own action, that (in Henry's own words) "[e]very one who is able may have a gun";[119] and that if Congress did not perform that duty, the

---

[115] Id., Volume 3, at 391.

[116] Id., Volume 3, at 421.

[117] Id., Volume 3, at 440.

[118] Id., Volume 3, at 386.

[119] Id.

responsibility and right to act fell to the States, and in default of the States to the people themselves.

Similarly, Mason rhetorically shot himself in the foot when he answered his own question—"Who are the militia?"—with the response, "[t]hey consist now of the whole people, except a few public officers. But I cannot say who will be the militia of the future day."[120] For his definition was too narrow, and his implicit misinterpretation of Congressional power too broad. As will appear further on, in pre-constitutional times some public officials were exempted from certain Militia duties, but were not thereby excluded from the Militia altogether.[121] The constitutional definition of the Militia derives from and embodies such pre-constitutional practices.[122] And Congress cannot change any constitutional definition,[123] except as a participant in the formal process of amendment.[124] So Mason would have stood on firmer ground had he demanded that his opponents either admitted as much (thereby conceding the limited power of Congress in that regard), or denied it (thereby supporting his claim that the Constitution delegated too much power to Congress).

Presumably, both Henry and Mason knew better than they spoke, and would have spoken to better purpose had they been in a position to measure their words more calmly and carefully than they did. But their behavior exemplifies how, in the tumultuous circumstances in which they found themselves, even the most prominent figures among the Framers and Founders did not necessarily think through and craft their statements about the Constitution as circumspectly (or perhaps as honestly) as they might have done had they been consciously writing "for the ages" in the quiescent solitude of their own libraries.

Even such an artfully composed compendium as The Federalist Papers contains veins of tendentious political propaganda and mutually conflicting passages that unfavorably distinguish it from an objective and even-handed academic analysis of the Constitution. For example, in The Federalist No. 29, Alexander Hamilton attacked those opponents of the original Constitution who > apprehend[ed] danger from the militia itself in the hands of the federal government. It is observed that select corps may be formed, composed of the young and the ardent, who may be rendered subservient to the views of arbitrary power.

---

[120] Id. at 425.

[121] See post, at 252-254 (Rhode Island) and 617-623 (Virginia).

[122] See post, at 63-76.

[123] Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189, 206 (1920).

[124] U.S. Const. art. V.

Yet Hamilton himself, in that very paper, argued that "[l]ittle more can reasonably be aimed at with respect to the people at large than to have them properly armed and equipped; and in order to see that this be not neglected, * * * to assemble them once or twice in the course of a year"—and then proposed that > [t]he attention of the government ought particularly to be directed to the formation of a select corps of moderate size, upon such principles as will really fit it for service in case of need. By thus circumscribing the plan, it will be possible to have an excellent body of well-trained militia ready to take the field whenever the defense of the State shall require it.

Hamilton did not explain, however, on what grounds "a select corps of moderate size", even if well disciplined, but without significant support from the remainder of the people, could be expected to oppose a domestic "standing army" (let alone a force of foreign invaders) presumably larger in size and composed of at least equally competent soldiers. Neither did he preëmptively refute the obvious objection that the members of "a select corps" might envision themselves as separate from, independent of, and even antagonistic to the people, and thus become, not just "subservient to the views of arbitrary power", but an actual source and instigator of such "views". In any event, Hamilton must have been familiar with the relevant literature of the period,[125] including the definition in Article 13 of Virginia's Declaration of Rights of 1776 that "a well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms"{EN-1}—with which patriots in every other State as well would doubtlessly have agreed. He surely would have known that, in common parlance, "the body of the people" meant "[a] collective mass; a joint power" and "[t]he main part; the bulk".[126] And more likely than not he would also have been familiar with the specifically political—and radical—implication that "the body of the people" was the embodiment of constitutional democracy in its truest and best sense: incorporating and empowering the entirety of the free adult individuals from all walks of life, occupations, and economic and social classes throughout the community in service of the community's aggregate and permanent interests.[127] Nonetheless, Hamilton frankly opposed preparing most of the citizenry for some sort of effective Militia service, other than requiring the mere personal [125] Because the pre-constitutional statutes and other material to be referenced in this study are so voluminous, they will be cited in endnotes rather than footnotes. In the text, the endnotes will appear as {EN-1}, {EN-2}, {EN-3}, and so on.

---

[126] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 5 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions, and definitions 9 in the First Edition and 8 in the Fourth Edition.

[127] On this then-contemporary understanding of "the body" made notorious in Boston in the 1770s, see, e.g., Benjamin L. Carp, Defiance of the Patriots: The Boston Tea Party & the Making of America (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 2010), at 99; Esther Forbes, Paul Revere & The World He Lived In (Boston, Massachusetts: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1948) at 195-196.

possession of arms. Surely he realized that, even if "the people at large" were "properly armed and equipped", they would remain otherwise unorganized, and largely if not completely undisciplined and untrained—and therefore would not constitute a "militia" at all, any more than contemporary Americans who happen to possess firearms constitute a "militia" merely as a consequence of such possession.

Contrast this with The Federalist No. 46, in which James Madison contended that > [t]he only refuge left for those who prophesy the downfall of the State governments is the visionary supposition that the federal government may previously accumulate a military force for the projects of ambition. * * * That the people and the States should, for a sufficient period of time, elect an uninterrupted succession of men ready to betray both; that the traitors should, throughout this period, uniformly and systematically pursue some fixed plan for the extension of the military establishment; that the governments and the people of the States should silently and patiently behold the gathering storm and continue to supply the materials until it should be prepared to burst on their own heads must appear to everyone more like the incoherent dreams of a delirious jealousy, or the misjudged exaggerations of a counterfeit zeal, than like the sober apprehensions of a genuine patriotism. Extravagant as the supposition is, let it, however, be made. Let a regular army, fully equal to the resources of the country, be formed; and let it be entirely at the devotion of the federal government: still it would not be going too far to say that the State governments with the people on their side would be able to repel the danger. The number to which, according to the best computation, a standing army can be carried in any country does not exceed one hundredth part of the whole number or souls; or one twenty-fifth part of the number able to bear arms. This proportion would not yield, in the United States, an army of more than twenty-five or thirty thousand men. To these would be opposed a militia amounting to near half a million of citizens with arms in their hands, officered by men chosen from among themselves, fighting for their common liberties and united and conducted by governments possessing their affections and confidence. It may well be doubted whether a militia thus circumstanced could ever be conquered by such a proportion of regular troops.

Of these two, then, who was correct: Hamilton—who proposed Militia the effective portions of which would be composed merely of "select corps"; or Madison, who presumed (as any Virginian of that era would have) that the Militia would always be "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms"? Could the Militia powers and duties of the General Government and the States allow such mutually contradictory results? Or perhaps should the statements of Hamilton and Madison be reconciled by reference to the *pre-*constitutional practice—with which they both were surely familiar—of creating special units within the Militia (such as "Minutemen" and "Rangers") to which were tolled off the men most capable of performing arduous duties, with other men assigned to less-rigorous ordinary service, yet with all of them at least minimally trained for any tasks they might be called upon to fulfill in an emergency?

Examples such as these prove that random statements drawn from the Framers, Founders, or other American patriots in the late 1700s cannot always—and, really, should never—be naively accepted at face value, but must instead be read critically in their peculiar historical contexts and then checked for accuracy by reference to some other, independent, objective, verifiable, and (if possible) unimpeachable sources capable of providing standards by means of which to winnow the wheat from the chaff. That being the case, though, such other sources can better serve in the first instance as authorities for the substance of the statements than can the statements themselves—thus rendering the statements at best cumulative and even supererogatory simply as a consequence of proving their accuracy.

Even if particular Framers, Founders, or other American patriots could in some sense be considered "experts" on the subject of constitutional principles, and even if their statements and writings could be assimilated to "testimony" (albeit not under oath), that "testimony" would not necessarily constitute conclusive evidence as to the meaning of any constitutional provision. In a court of law, after all, an expert may be allowed to testify as to his opinion on a matter within his area of expertise—but then he is subject to cross-examination on the basis for his opinion, and its sufficiency. So, even if those Framers and Founders were acknowledged experts, common Americans in the jury of public opinion both then and now would have been and are entitled to test the witnesses' expert opinions by investigating the evidence upon which they had relied, and the methods which they had employed for evaluating it. Moreover, such a jury would have been and would still be justified in discounting or disregarding entirely any such expert's testimony, if it determined that the basis of his opinion, or his reasoning from that basis, were faulty, or that he were biased or otherwise unreliable as a witness.

(3) The objectively probable consensus among WE THE PEOPLE. The personal opinions of simply the Framers, the Founding Fathers, and other prominent American patriots of the *pre-*constitutional era also cannot suffice for constitutional interpretation for the evident reason that, as illustrious in accomplishments as these men were, they numbered very few—whereas the Constitution, as its Preamble attests, was "ordain[ed] and establish[ed]" by WE THE PEOPLE as a whole. So, inasmuch as one of the first steps towards elucidating the true meaning of the Constitution is "to review the background and environment of the period in which that constitutional language was fashioned and adopted",[128] "to place ourselves as nearly as possible in the condition of" the Americans of that era,[129] and "to recall the contemporary or then recent history of the controversies on the subject" that still "were fresh in the memories of those who achieved our independence and established our form of government"[130]—one must not just enter the individual minds of the Framers of the Constitution who originally drafted it, or the Founding Fathers who worked for its ratification, or others among the most prominent patriots of their time, but instead must search out the most probable consensus among all of the reasonably intelligent and informed Americans of personal integrity who worked for independence and whom the Constitution identifies as WE THE PEOPLE. The question then becomes: "How would WE THE PEOPLE in 1788 and 1791 have determined what the original Constitution, and then the Constitution as amended by the Bill of Rights, meant to them?" This reduces to the question: "What were, and how would THE PEOPLE have used, the relevant intellectual resources available to every literate adult American at that time?"

(a) On the one hand, vanishingly few among WE THE PEOPLE anywhere in America had any personal experience of the Federal Convention of 1787 (and none of them who happened to live in Rhode Island, because that State dispatched no delegates to Philadelphia). Very few had any vicarious experience, either: For the proceedings were conducted in camera, with no contemporary reports in newspapers or other publications. And both the official Journal of the Convention, and private notes taken by various participants, were not published until many years later—James Madison's now famous notes of the debates, for example, not coming to the public's attention until 1840.[131] Similarly, very few among WE THE PEOPLE had any personal experience as delegates to the several States' Conventions in 1787 and 1788. And THE PEOPLE'S vicarious experiences in that particular were limited to reports of the proceedings in newspapers, which were not entirely reliable.[132]

---

[128] Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947). Accord, e.g., Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, 157 U.S. 429, 558 (1895); Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581, 602 (1900); Grosjean v. American Press Company, 297 U.S. 233, 245-249 (1936).

[129] Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, 12 (1887). Accord, e.g., South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 450 (1905).

[130] Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 624-625 (1886).

[131] See The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, ante note 2, Volume 1, at xi-xxii.

[132] See J. Elliot, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS, ante note 110, Volume 1, at iii (PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION): "In the compilation, care has been taken to search into contemporary publications, in order to make the work as perfect as possible. Still, however, the Editor is sensible, from the daily experience of the newspaper reports of the present time, that the sentiments they contain may, in some instances, have been inaccurately taken down, and, in others, probably, too faintly sketched, fully to gratify the inquisitive politician * * * ." Exactly how, then, anyone could be sure (as the editor vouchsafed to his readers) that "the compilation" accurately "disclose[d] the opinions of many of the most distinguished revolutionary patriots and statesmen, * * * and certainly may form an excellent guide in expounding many doubtful points

Moreover, if the average legally literate American of that era had enjoyed access to such notes as Madison had generated or to such coverage as the press had offered, he nonetheless would not have considered them admissible let alone dispositive evidence, because "legislative history" consisting even of verbatim debates, recorded by an official reporter and contemporaneously transcribed, had no legal standing for the purpose of statutory interpretation in that era. As the general rule came to be stated thereafter, "[i]nquiries into [legislators'] motives * * * are a hazardous matter",[133] as is "bas[ing] speculations about the purposes or construction of a statute upon the vicissitudes of its passage",[134] because "it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction" the legislature as a whole "put upon an act * * * by resorting to the speeches of individual members",[135] the arguments of individual legislators being "so often influenced by personal or political considerations, or by the assumed necessities of the situation".[136] Difficult to interpret in any event, and sometimes colored by ignorance or questionable motives, legislative debates and like materials are inadmissible as evidence of what statutes mean,[137] except in the most extraordinary situations plainly inapplicable to the Constitution, such as where statutory provisions, "literally applied, offend the moral sense, involve injustice, oppression or absurdity, * * * or lead to an unreasonable result plainly at variance with the policy of the statute as a whole".[138] And if WE THE PEOPLE could and would not have relied even on formal "legislative history", they certainly could and would not have treated as controlling the mere opinions that various prominent Americans may have stated informally.

(b) On the other hand, the average legally literate American in 1788 and 1791 had before him the original Constitution and then the Bill of Rights. He knew that these were statutes—enacted "in the Name, and by the Authority of the good People of these Colonies" under the aegis of the Declaration of Independence, and "ordain[ed] and establish[ed]" by WE THE PEOPLE themselves to be "the supreme Law of the Land".[139] And inasmuch as "[a]t the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution [Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England] had been published about twenty years, and * * * more copies of the work had been sold in th[e Constitution]", the editor did not explain.

---

[133] United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 383-384 (1968). Accord, Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217, 224 (1971).

[134] Pine Hill Coal Company v. United States, 259 U.S. 191, 196 (1922).

[135] United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U.S. 290, 318 (1897).

[136] Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244, 254 (1901).

[137] E.g., Aldridge v. Williams, 44 U.S. (3 Howard) 9, 24 (1845); United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Company, 91 U.S. 72, 79 (1875); United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U.S. 290, 318-319 (1897); United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U.S. 649, 699 (1898).

[138] See, e.g., George Van Camp & Sons Company v. American Can Company, 278 U.S. 245, 253-254 (1929).

[139] U.S. Const. preamble and art. VI, cl. 2.

in this country than in England; so that undoubtedly, the framers of the Constitution were familiar with it",[140] and considered it "the preeminent authority on English law",[141] every legally literate American was also aware of the general rule for statutory construction which Blackstone taught: namely, that

> [T]HE fairest and most rational method to interpret the will of the legislator, is by exploring his intentions at the time when the law was made, by signs the most natural and probable. And these signs are either the words, the context, the subject matter, the effects and consequence, or the spirit and reason of the law.[142]

So every such American knew that the proper constructions of the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights were to be found in WE THE PEOPLE'S "intentions at the time when the law was made", to be deduced from what those documents themselves contained, explicitly and implicitly.

(4) "Original intent" the fundamental rule of construction. In the parlance of modern constitutional exegetes, Blackstone's phrase "intentions at the time when the law was made" has come to be truncated into the term "original intent". Unfortunately, this neologism comes freighted with the potential for serious confusion, because it implicitly suggests that there may exist some arguably legitimate "modern intent" that differs substantially from the Constitution's "original intent"—and that therefore appeal to the so-called "living Constitution" may be something other than an intellectual delusion and political deception. It would be more accurate and safe, therefore, to speak solely of "the Constitution's intent", which of course can never change, unless and until the document's provisions are altered through some formal Amendment, and then only in keeping with an intellectually honest construction of any such provision. But inasmuch as "original intent" has developed a following along legal commentators, successful substitution of a term less susceptible to confusion and misuse is probably impossible. In any event, as Blackstone's teaching evidences, "original intent", whatever its most appropriate label should be, was the prevailing rule in the late 1700s—not some anachronism advanced only recently by ivory-tower intellectuals fixated upon irrelevant historical oddments, or obsessed with retarding "social progress" by appealing to outdated legal principles. Indeed, at the very founding of the Republic the doctrine of "original intent" was already hundreds of years old.[143]

---

[140] Schick v. United States, 195 U.S. 65, 69 (1904).

[141] Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 715 (1999).

[142] Commentaries on the Laws of England (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Robert Bell, American Edition, 4 Volumes & Appendix, 1771-1773), Volume 1, at 59.

[143] See generally, e.g., Raoul Berger, "Original Intention in Historical Perspective", 54 George Washington Law Review 296 (1986).

Out of stark necessity, as well as familiarity, "original intent" was the interpretive method employed by the Framers who drafted the Constitution, the Founding Fathers who ratified it in the State Conventions, the first public officials in the General Government and the governments of the several States who applied it, and WE THE PEOPLE as a whole whose agents all of the foregoing were. For what rule of construction could Americans at that time have employed to draft, interpret, and apply their utterly new Constitution other than to ask what those documents meant to WE THE PEOPLE at that time, and to answer that question by reading the documents' words in their linguistic, legal, political, and historical contexts current at that time? After all, no legal sophists had yet popularized the fantasy that the Constitution is a supposedly "living" linguistic entity capable of protean meanings that somehow spontaneously "evolve" over time, without any formal amendments, in response to different political, economic, social, and cultural circumstances, tastes, fashions, or fads—and, if they had, their imaginings would have been irrelevant to the issue of what the Constitution meant then and there, before any supposed "evolution" could conceivably have taken place.

Therefore, inasmuch as Americans of the pre-constitutional era were thoroughly familiar with the doctrine of "original intent"; inasmuch as "original intent" was then the prevailing rule for statutory construction; inasmuch as everyone at that time would have presumed (and correctly so) that "original intent" could have supplied a viable construction of every provision in the Constitution; inasmuch as some unique rule of statutory construction had to be adopted if "the supreme Law of the Land" was to be rationally enforced; and inasmuch as no alternative rule of construction enjoyed any currency among WE THE PEOPLE even as a legal theory—then "original intent" must have been adopted as the exclusive means of interpreting the Constitution at that time. And not simply after it had been ratified. For, had not the Framers employed "original intent" when they composed the Constitution, and had not the Founding Fathers utilized "original intent" when they ratified it, and had not WE THE PEOPLE themselves conclusively presumed with legal certitude that the Framers and the Founders were doing so, no one could have known with any semblance of surety what the Constitution meant at any point during the entire process of its enactment. So, too, for the Bill of Rights.

Today, as well, "original intent" continues as the only legitimate—indeed, the only rational—method of construing the Constitution. For, "original intent" being the rule in reliance upon which the Constitution was originally drafted and ratified, it is as much an actual, albeit only implied, provision of the Constitution as any other—indeed, perhaps more important (and certainly more often consulted) than any other, because the proper construction of every provision of the Constitution depends upon it.

3. The language and structure of the Constitution often sufficient. Because "original intent" looks to what the Constitution actually says, proper construction usually need not proceed beyond the actual words and form of the document in order to garner sufficient evidence of its meaning.

On its face, the Constitution demonstrates which side of the debate in the Virginia Convention of 1788 quoted above was correct. To be sure, unlike some other powers and disabilities of Congress and the States, their powers and disabilities with respect to the Militia do need to be carefully parsed. For example, the Constitution delegates several powers to the General Government while simultaneously imposing corresponding disabilities on the States—such as with respect to levying "Duties" and "Imposts";[144] "coin[ing] Money";[145] "rais[ing] and support[ing] Armies" and "provid[ing] and maintain[ing] a Navy", on the one hand, but not "keep[ing] Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress", on the other;[146] and "mak[ing] Treaties", one the one hand, but not "enter[ing] into any Treaty" under any conditions or "into any Agreement or Compact * * * with a foreign Power" "without the Consent of Congress", on the other.[147] The Constitution also delegates to the General Government certain powers without imposing any additional express disabilities on the States, because the powers are so defined as to be inherently exclusive in their nature or when exercised—such as the powers "[t]o lay and collect Taxes * * * to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States",[148] "[t]o borrow Money on the credit of the United States",[149] and "[t]o establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the Subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States".[150] With respect to the two powers of Congress over the Militia, however, neither of these situations obtains.

The Constitution empowers Congress

> [t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions; [and]
>
> [t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment

---

[144] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 with art. I, § 10, cl. 2.

[145] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 5 with art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[146] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13 with art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[147] Compare U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2 with art. I, § 10, cls. 1 and 3.

[148] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[149] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 2 (emphasis supplied).

[150] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4 (emphasis supplied).

> of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.[151]

Obviously, the Constitution delegates these powers to Congress for the purpose of providing the United States with the ability to rely upon uniform Militia drawn from the several States for any of the three constitutionally designated purposes. But the Constitution imposes no corresponding disabilities upon the States with respect to the subject-matters of these two powers, other than the implicit limitation always applicable to every concurrent power that the States' regulations in those particulars may not interfere with whatever pertinent and otherwise constitutional regulations Congress may have enacted.[152] This is because, as the Constitution itself recognizes, the "Militia" to be "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]" are none other than "the Militia of the several States", not "the Militia of the United States"—a distinction the Constitution makes exquisitely clear in defining the dual status of the President as "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States".[153] "[T]he Militia of the several States" (or of the American Colonies before the latter declared their independence from Great Britain) preëxisted the Constitution. And during the entire pre-constitutional era, each of the Colonies and then independent States exercised exclusive jurisdiction over her own Militia and such regular armed forces as she might raise. Even the precursor to the Constitution, the Articles of Confederation, expressly mandated that "every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred"[154]—according, moreover, to each State's own laws, because the Articles granted no powers to Congress for that purpose. The Constitution nowhere explicitly withdrew authority over their Militia from the States, as it did with respect to the States' "keep[ing] Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress".[155] And the Constitution nowhere granted any authority to Congress to form a "Militia of the United States", as it did with respect to "rais[ing] and support[ing] Armies" and "provid[ing] and maintain[ing] a Navy" which were to be known as "the Army and Navy of the United States".[156] Therefore, each of the States retains the authority to "organiz[e], arm[ ], and disciplin[e]" her own Militia in order: (i) to fill any voids in her Militia's preparedness caused by Congress's neglect, failure, or refusal to "organiz[e], arm[ ], and disciplin[e]" the Militia in complete readiness to

---

[151] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[152] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[153] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[154] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4. The typeset version of the Articles quoted throughout this book appears in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 27-37.

[155] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[156] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

be "call[ed] forth" "in the Service of the United States" for any of the three constitutionally designated purposes; (ii) to prepare her Militia to be called forth by State herself for any of those reasons if Congress neglects, fails, or refuses to do so when such mobilization is necessary; and (iii) to enable her Militia to provide defense and other aid to the State in situations not involving any of those three reasons, by supplementing what Congress has mandated should that State consider Congress's action insufficient for her own purposes.[157]

After all, even if the purpose of having Congress "provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" in an uniform manner is so that they may most effectively "be employed in the Service of the United States" when called forth collectively, why should individual Militia not also be "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]" in such complementary fashion as each State might deem necessary for her own particular "Service"? In principle, perhaps, if Congress's power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" were not directed solely to three explicit purposes of the General Government, Congress arguably could "provide" different forms of "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", tailored to the specific needs of each State. But in practice such a program would be extraordinarily cumbersome. So why should the Constitution be tortuously misconstrued to deny the States the authority to perform a necessary task that would overtax, if not lie entirely beyond, Congress's competence as well as its authority? No plausible construction of the Constitution could, for example, license Congress simultaneously to disallow the States from "keep[ing] Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace", and to preclude the States from "organizing, arming, and disciplining" their own Militia, and to license itself to neglect, fail, or refuse to "organiz[e], arm[ ], and disciplin[e]" the States' Militia effectively.

The unavoidability of this conclusion appears perhaps most patently in the portion of Congress's power that authorizes it "[t]o provide * * * for governing such Part of them [that is, the Militia] as may be employed in the Service of the United States". If Congress may provide for governing only that "Part" of the Militia "employed in the Service of the United States", who is to govern the remainder of the Militia at that time, and all of the Militia when no "Part of them" is so employed? The Constitution itself decrees that it cannot be Congress. Therefore it must be the States, or in the event of the States' default "the people" themselves[158]—unless the Constitution implicitly commands the absurd result that under those circumstances the Militia (in "Part" or in whole) are not to be "govern[ed]" at all. But such a result the Constitution obviously precludes, when it "reserv[es] to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers [of the

---

[157] See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2 and amend. X.

[158] See U.S. Const. amends. II and X.

Militia]",[159] thereby retaining almost all actual authority of command in the States, because the only officer of the General Government who is simultaneously an officer in any of "the Militia of the several States" is the President of the United States (and then only when the Militia are "called into the actual Service of the United States").[160]

Even more generally, as proven by reference to the pre-constitutional practices that this study later surveys in detail, the noun "Militia" in the American legal lexicon means the entirety of the able-bodied adult population, properly organized, armed, and disciplined in some effective manner at all times. By incorporating "the Militia of the several States" into its federal structure, the Constitution ensures that such "Militia"—and, absent an Amendment, only such "Militia"—will always exist under its aegis. For the very good reason that, as the Second Amendment attests, such "well regulated Militia" are "necessary to the security of a free State", and therefore the very foundation of the constitutional system. That being the case, Congress's power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" is also a duty to do so. In constitutional parlance, a "power" can often imply a "right", and a "duty" as well. A "power" is the ability to create a new legal relationship, either between the government and some other party, or between two or more private parties.[161] A power is part of a government's "jurisdiction", its "authority * * * to govern or legislate"; and with respect to its subject matter it defines the government's "[s]phere of authority; the legal limits within which * * * [that] particular * * * [authority] may be exercised".[162] So, by exercising its power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", Congress can, for example, change the legal relations between the General Government and members of the Militia, between the General Government and the States, and among the members of the Militia themselves. Congress could not exercise such a power, though, without enjoying the right to exercise it. A "right" is the legal relationship between the government and some other party that exists when the government may command that other party to take, or to refrain from taking, some action, and punish that party's disobedience.[163] So, when Congress exercises its power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", it also exercises the right to do so, because it may command the members of the Militia and the States, on pain of some penalty, to comply with its directives. Furthermore, in the case of the Militia, the power and right "[t]o provide for

---

[159] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[160] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[161] See A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 168.

[162] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 806, definitions 2 and 3. Accord, N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definitions 2 through 4.

[163] See A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 167.

organizing, arming, and disciplining" implies a duty as well.[164] A "duty" denotes the legal relation perforce of which the government is required to act (or to forebear from acting) for the benefit of some other party or parties, and perforce of which public officials may be subjected to sanctions for their failure in that regard.[165] So, Congress not only may but also must exercise its power and right "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" at all times to the fullest extent possible consistent with "the common defence" and "the general Welfare".[166] This, for four basic reasons:

First, as a general proposition, "[w]hatever functions Congress are by the Constitution authorized to perform they are, when the public good requires it, bound to perform".[167] For all practical purposes, "the public good" always requires that the Militia be properly "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]". The Second Amendment declares that "[a] well regulated Militia"—that is, a Militia properly "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]"—is "necessary to the security of a free State".[168] Thus the Amendment defines the primary power of Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"—and the secondary power allied with it "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution th[at] Power[ ]"[169]—not as discretionary, but as obligatory, because what is "necessary" is "[i]mpossible * * * to be dispensed with".[170] The Constitution delegates that primary power to Congress for the specific purpose of preparing the Militia to be "call[ed] forth to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions".[171] These functions the Constitution considers so critical, and the identities and attributes of the parties designated to perform them so important, that it incorporates "the Militia of the several States" as permanent components of its federal system. If Congress does not properly exercise its power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", then "the Laws of the Union" will not be "execute[d]", "Insurrections" will not be [164] This, of course, is not the only example of a duty flowing from some constitutional power or right. See, e.g., United States v. Marigold, 50 U.S. (9 Howard) 560, 567 (1850) (the power implies "the trust and the duty"); Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheaton) 304, 327-329 (1816) (the power is "mandatory" and "obligatory"); Pensacola Telegraph Company v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 96 U.S. 1, 9 (1878) (the power implies a right, and "not only the right, but the duty"); and Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U.S. 1, 58 (1912) ("[t]he existence of the jurisdiction creates an implication of duty to exercise it, and that its exercise may be onerous does not militate against that implication").

---

[165] See A. Corbin, "Legal Analysis and Terminology", ante note 23, at 167.

[166] See U.S. Const. preamble.

[167] United States v. Marigold, 50 U.S. (9 Howard) 560, 567 (1850).

[168] Emphasis supplied.

[169] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[170] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 967, definition 2. Accord, N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 2.

[171] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

"suppress[ed]", and "Invasions" will not be "repel[led]" in the manner the Constitution specifically sets forth—the unique institution "necessary to the security of a free State" will not exist in any State—and therefore the very existence of "a free State" anywhere and everywhere through the Union will be in jeopardy. As such a result would defeat the achievement of the fundamental purposes of the Constitution "to * * * insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity",[172] it cannot possibly be deemed even arguably constitutional. Self-evidently, then, "[t]he language" of the power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" "is manifestly designed to be mandatory * * * . Its obligatory force is so imperative, that Congress c[an] not * * * refuse[ ] to carry it into operation"—for, without the Militia being properly "organiz[ed], arm[ed], [and] disciplined", "it would be impossible to carry into effect some of the [most important] express provisions of the Constitution".[173]

Second, the power of Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" is a duty, because the Second Amendment emphasizes that it (along with all other Congressional powers) must be exercised consistently with "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" for the very purpose of being able to serve in "well regulated Militia".[174] If "the people" enjoy "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" for that purpose, which "right * * * shall not be infringed" by any public official (because no exception for any public official is stated), then Members of Congress as individuals, and Congress as an institution, must labor under the correlative "duty" to see to it that "well regulated Militia"—properly "organiz[ed], arm[ed], and disciplin[ed]"—shall actually exist at all times in every State. For if the practical effectuation of that "right" depends to some significant degree upon the exercise of Congress's power, then that power shall be exercised to the selfsame extent that "the right * * * shall not be infringed".

Third, that the Constitution explicitly "reserv[es] to the States respectively * * * the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress"[175] implies a right in the States to require that Congress does in fact "prescribe[ ]" such "discipline"—that is, does in fact "provide for * * * disciplining, the Militia" through some régime of "training"—so that the States can exercise their exclusive "Authority" in that regard. This establishes beyond doubt that Congress's power "[t]o provide for * * * disciplining, the Militia" is mandatory—not simply a power and a right, but a duty as well. For inasmuch as the Constitution

---

[172] U.S. Const. preamble.

[173] See Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheaton) 304, 328, 329 (1816).

[174] See post, Chapter 45.

[175] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

explicitly "reserv[es] to the States respectively * * * the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress", Congress cannot refuse to "prescribe[ ]" the necessary "disciplin[e]" without thereby denying the States the ability to exercise their "reserv[ed]" power, thus effectively stripping them of that power altogether—a result which is constitutionally impossible. Indeed, such a result is constitutionally ridiculous, because WE THE PEOPLE would never have explicitly reserved to the States a vitally important power over the Militia which they knew Congress could negate at will simply by inaction. All that being true, the rest of Congress's power—that is, "[t]o provide for organizing[and] arming * * * the Militia"[176]—must be no less mandatory. For, as a matter of law, all of them being found in conjunction within the very same clause, and each of them taking "the Militia" as its direct object, the present participles "organizing, arming, and disciplining" must be construed in pari materia, so that if one of them must be taken as mandatory, then so must all of them. Moreover, as a matter of fact, in general it is impossible to "disciplin[e]" any entity which is not already sufficiently "organiz[ed]"; and in particular it is impossible to "disciplin[e]" a "Militia" which is not sufficiently "arm[ed]", because, by definition, in "[a] well regulated Militia" "the people" exercise "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms",[177] and, again by definition, "a well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".[178]

Fourth, under the Constitution, "[a] well regulated Militia" is an indispensable component of the American conception of "a Republican Form of Government".[179] "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government".[180] "[T]he United States" must fulfill this "guarantee" through every appropriate exercise of their legislative, executive, and judicial authority.[181] As the arm of "[t]he United States" in which "[a]ll legislative Powers * * * granted * * * [by the Constitution] shall be vested",[182] Congress "shall guarantee to every State" "[a] well regulated Militia" through the enactment of appropriate laws—which it is explicitly empowered to do by "provid[ing] for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", as well as by "mak[ing] all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution th[at] * * *

---

[176] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[177] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[178] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776), art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

[179] See post, at 890-893, 921-922, 1038-1040, 1301-1307, 1451-1453, and 1497-1499.

[180] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[181] The Supreme Court, however, has largely absolved itself of responsibility for the enforcement of this requirement. Contrast Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 Howard) 1 (1849), with Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wallace) 162 (1875), and Forsyth v. Hammond, 166 U.S. 506 (1897).

[182] U.S. Const. art. I, § 1.

Power[ ]".[183] Thus, exercises of the latter powers constitute unavoidable aspects of the fulfillment of the former duty. And therefore, taken together, those two powers must constitute a duty, too.

One may, of course, question how such a duty could be enforced. Actually, at least five ways exist: (i) A rogue Congress could itself be punished as an institution for its dereliction if "the People" determined that the situation was sufficiently serious to warrant the exercise of their "Right * * * to alter or to abolish" Congress or the entire "Form of Government" of which it is a part.[184] (ii) Congress's duty could be enforced as a moral obligation by Members of Congress on themselves, through the workings of their own consciences. (iii) Congress's duty could be enforced as a political obligation by those Members' constituents at the next election. (iv) Congress's duty could be enforced as a legal obligation on those Members directly, because at some point persistent nonfeasance or misfeasance becomes actionable malfeasance, in violation of the requirement that "Senators and Representatives * * * be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support th[e] Constitution".[185] Finally, (v) Congress's duty could be enforced indirectly through affirmative action taken by other components of the federal system that exercise concurrent jurisdiction over "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"—namely, the several States and WE THE PEOPLE. Surely, maintenance of the federal structure and of the Constitution as the supreme law of "a free State" cannot for one moment be held hostage to some rogue Congressmen's neglect, failure, or refusal to exercise the powers that, if exercised, would prove sufficient to the purpose. So, if such Congressmen, derelict in their constitutional duties, for whatever reason do not organize, arm, and discipline "the Militia of the several States", the States must act individually—and because they must act, they must be constitutionally authorized to act. And if under such circumstances any State's government, derelict in its constitutional duties, for whatever reason does not organize, arm, and discipline that State's Militia, then WE THE PEOPLE themselves in that State must act collectively to redress that deficiency—and because they must act, they too must be constitutionally authorized to act. The existence of which reserved authority, to the States or to "the people" as the case may be, the Second and Tenth Amendments verify.[186]

4. WE THE PEOPLE the final authorities on the meaning of the Constitution. These chains of reasoning and the conclusions to which they lead should hardly be surprising even today, and would have been as obvious as the

---

[183] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[184] See Declaration of Independence.

[185] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3.

[186] See post, Chapters 45, 46, and 50.

sunrise to most Americans in 1788 and 1791. Yet, as is painfully obvious as well to all students of this country's history, the Constitution has always been subject to attempts to manipulate its meaning in service of the narrow agenda of influential factions and other special interests. In these situations, under whatever rule of interpretation may rightfully apply, though, the question nevertheless remains: "Who is authorized to construe the Constitution with finality?" The political fashion today is to acquiesce in the assumption of this responsibility by the Judiciary, on the Judiciary's own plea that "[i]t is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is".[187] This claim, however, is obviously not true in the expansive sense in which exponents and apologists of contemporary "judicial supremacy" tout it.[188]

Even as to statutes, the Constitution declares that, with respect to the General Government, "[a]ll legislative Powers herein granted"—the powers to make "laws"—"shall be vested in * * * Congress".[189] And the Constitution delegates to Congress, not only a set of discrete enumerated powers,[190] but also a cautionary supplemental authority "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution [those enumerated] Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof".[191] So, in this sphere, it is emphatically the province and duty of Congress, not the Judiciary, "to say what the law is", because Congress enacts all of [187] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 177 (1803).

---

[188] On the vexing problems inherent in "judicial supremacy", see generally Edwin Vieira, Jr., How To Dethrone the Imperial Judiciary (San Antonio, Texas: Vision Forum Ministries, 2004).

[189] U.S. Const. art. I, § 1.

[190] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 1 through 17.

[191] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18. On the grounds that any legislative power must be a power to enact "necessary and proper" laws, Alexander Hamilton contended that this clause is "only declaratory of a truth which would have resulted by necessary and unavoidable implication from the very fact of constituting * * * [the General G]overnment and vesting it with certain specified powers. * * * The declaration itself, though it may be chargeable with tautology or redundancy, is at least perfectly harmless." The Federalist No. 33. Dismissing the clause on that facile ground, however, runs afoul of the rule that, "'[i]n expounding the Constitution * * * , every word must have its due force, and appropriate meaning; for it is evident from the whole instrument that no word was unnecessarily used, or needlessly added'". Williams v. United States, 289 U.S. 553, 572-573 (1933). The adjectives "necessary" and "proper", then, must be given a particular effect peculiar to them—which, as they are plainly intended as words of limitation, must be to constrain Congress's exercise of implied powers, by requiring that the closest possible relationship be established between Congress's enumerated powers and any powers implied as the means "for carrying [the enumerated powers] into Execution". In The Federalist, Hamilton himself recognized this: "The propriety of a law, in a constitutional light, must always be determined by the nature of the powers upon which it is founded." So, if it is unnecessary to imply a particular power in order to "carry[ ] into Execution" an enumerated power, or if a power that might be implied is improper on some other ground, then that purported implied power is one "not delegated to the United States". See U.S. Const. amend. X. The final word as to what may be "necessary and proper" is not left with Congress, either. Again, Hamilton: "If the [General G]overnment should overpass the just bounds of its authority and make a tyrannical use of its powers, the people, whose creature it is, must appeal to the standard they have formed, and take such measures to redress the injustice done to the Constitution as the exigency may suggest and prudence justify."

the "Laws", other than the Constitution itself, in the first place. At most, the Judiciary is authorized and required simply to parrot Congress's determination—even as to interpretation, because, as a part of its "Laws", Congress may stipulate how judges are to interpret them (if that matter is not obvious from the very texts of the "Laws" themselves).

As to constitutional law, just as no principal in his right mind would empower his agents to act on his behalf according to written instructions that implicitly licensed any one of them to misinterpret that document—perhaps ignorantly, perhaps maliciously, but in any event erroneously and without any recourse on the part of the principal to correct the error other than by laboriously amending his instructions—so too would no rational people in any polity adopt a supposed "constitution" designed to limit the power of the government formed under its aegis but which nevertheless licensed any branch or official of that government to determine the nature and extent of the government's own powers independently of the will of the people. Thus, in principle, it could never be uniquely "the province and duty of the judicial department" of either the General Government or the States "to say what the [constitutional] law is" (or, for that matter, the province of any legislator, executive official, or other public functionary).

In particular, when "WE THE PEOPLE"—not "We the Judges"—"ordain[ed] and establish[ed] this Constitution",[192] by that act THE PEOPLE constituted themselves the highest court in the land for the purposes of constitutional interpretation, because "[t]he power to enact carries with it final authority to declare the meaning of the legislation".[193] And by accepting and acting under its authority throughout the years since 1788—when under the ultimate constitutional law, the Declaration of Independence, they could have "throw[n] off such Government, and * * * provide[d] new Guards for their future security"—WE THE PEOPLE in their many succeeding generations have continued to "ordain and establish th[e] Constitution", and thereby have retained and retain the ultimate and unquestionable power "to declare [its] meaning", even unto this very day. This, of necessity: For, as Blackstone pointed out, "whenever a question arises between the society at large and any magistrate vested with powers originally delegated by that society, it must be decided by the voice of the society itself: there is not upon earth any other tribunal to resort to".[194]

Certainly, Americans were not so childish in the *pre-*constitutional period—and should not be so silly today—as to need or to seek tutelage in their

---

[192] U.S. Const. preamble.

[193] Propper v. Clark, 337 U.S. 472, 484 (1949).

[194] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 212.

constitutional political science from the very public officials whom they themselves had or have selected, particularly judges. For, as Blackstone pointed out, "the law, and the opinion of the judge are not always convertible terms, or one and the same thing; since it sometimes may happen that the judge may mistake the law".[195] Neither should Americans today kowtow to judges or other public officials with regard to constitutional interpretation, especially in light of the Supreme Court's own admissions of its numerous errors in that field over the years, which other public officials have hardly ever tried to correct, notwithstanding that they have had the power and the duty to do so.[196]

WE THE PEOPLE always need to remember, moreover, that just as they must be ready to don the majestic robes of the ultimate interpreters of law in all situations of contention between themselves and public officials, so too must they willing to pull on the workaday overalls of the ultimate finders of fact: namely, this country's supreme and final investigators, prosecutors, witnesses, and jurors in every political inquest of consequence. For THE PEOPLE'S authority to interpret the law as applied to a particular set of facts will inevitably prove nugatory if someone else predetermines what those facts are. THE PEOPLE, after all, are in no way inferior to the courts which they themselves have created. And the courts correctly hold that, where constitutional issues are involved, they cannot be bound either by conclusions of law alone,[197] or by findings of facts coupled with conclusions of law,[198] put forward by legislators or administrators—but may make their own independent determinations of both law and fact in every case. Could WE THE PEOPLE possibly enjoy less authority than their creatures? Hardy. For the courts are invested solely with constitutional and statutory authority, and can operate within those bounds alone; whereas THE PEOPLE are invested by "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", through the Declaration of Independence, with the supra-constitutional right and duty to determine "when[ ] any Form of Government [has] become[ ] destructive of the[true] ends" of "Government"—and especially "when a long train of abuses and usurpations * * * evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism", whether through the misbehavior of administrators, or of legislators, or even of judges. When a "Form of Government [has] become[so] destructive", however, public officials cannot be allowed either to find the facts or to apply the law relating to their own misbehavior—for the obvious reason that no "Form of Government" which has "become[ ] destructive" of THE PEOPLE'S rights will ever

---

[195] Id., Volume 1, at 71 (emphasis in the original).

[196] Compare and contrast, e.g., Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 828-830 & note 1 (1991), with Edwin Vieira, Jr., How To Dethrone the Imperial Judiciary (San Antonio, Texas: Vision Forum Ministries, 2004).

[197] See, e.g., Tyson & Brother v. Banton, 273 U.S. 418, 431 (1927).

[198] See, e.g., Block v. Hirsh, 256 U.S. 135, 154 (1921); Ohio Valley Water Company v. Ben Avon Borough, 253 U.S. 287, 289 (1920); Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 60 (1932); Saint Joseph Stock Yards Company v. United States, 298 U.S. 38, 51-52 (1936).

enforce those rights against itself. So any demand by officials for exclusive authority to find the facts or to apply the law in such a situation would constitute additional misbehavior, because its purpose would invariably be to cover up officialdom's misdeeds. Furthermore, inasmuch as THE PEOPLE, unless they investigate for themselves, can never be assured that, no matter how tranquil the times appear, "a long train of abuses and usurpations" is not in its initial stages, or that "a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism" is not being put into operation, they can never entertain, let alone accede to, any such demand. Thus, at all times "in the Course of human events", only THE PEOPLE themselves—acting independently of the opinions, the influence, and especially the direction of public officials—can qualify as proper political investigators, prosecutors, witnesses, and jurors. This, of course, requires that THE PEOPLE be at pains to enforce the maximum transparency in the operation of their government. The least opacity in public affairs must furnish grounds for suspicion; and the slightest hesitancy on the part of public officials to expose to scrutiny the record of their stewardship must rouse THE PEOPLE to immediate action.

5. WE THE PEOPLE'S interpretive authority limited by the actual meanings of the Constitution's words. WE THE PEOPLE'S authority to interpret the Constitution is not unlimited, however. The rule has always been (and today remains) that statutes should be enforced as written.[199] The Constitution is a statute. In every case, then, the Constitution must be interpreted "in such a manner, as, consistently with the words, shall fully and completely effectuate the whole objects of it. * * * No court of justice"—including the ultimate human "court of justice", WE THE PEOPLE themselves—"can be authorized so to construe any clause of the Constitution as to defeat its obvious ends, when another construction, equally accordant with the words and sense thereof, will enforce and protect them."[200]

a. Not problematic that only a few terms are specifically defined. Yet even written words cannot be understood separate from their meanings. And the Constitution itself defines very few of the words it employs. For example, "Congress" and its components the "House of Representatives" and the "Senate" are painstakingly described with respect to their structures, compositions, and legal powers and disabilities[201]—because they were entirely new political creations in 1788, for which no prior definitions existed. (A "Congress" did exist under the Articles of Confederation; but its powers were quite different in many particulars

---

[199] See, e.g., W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 59-62; Lewis v. United States, 92 U.S. 618, 621 (1876); Wilbur v. United States ex rel. Vindicator Consolidated Gold Mining Company, 284 U.S. 231, 237 (1931); Ex parte Collett, 337 U.S. 55, 61 (1949); Rubin v. United States, 449 U.S. 424, 430 (1981); Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333, 336 (1981); Rosewell v. LaSalle National Bank, 450 U.S. 503, 512 (1981).

[200] Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Peters) 539, 612 (1842).

[201] U.S. Const. art. I, §§ 1 through 9.

from those of the Congress established under the Constitution. For example, the Congress under the Articles performed many "executive" as well as "legislative" functions; whereas, under the Constitution, "legislative" functions were assigned to Congress and "executive" functions to the President.) So, too, the Constitution lays out in detail the nature and powers of the President, because that office appeared there for the first time in human history.[202] And "[t]he judicial Power of the United States" is also carefully spelled out[203]—because nothing of its kind had ever been seen before, either. Distinguishably, the crimes of "counterfeiting" and "Treason" are narrowly defined—"the Punishment for counterfeiting" being limited to "the Securities and current Coin of the United States",[204] and "Treason" being stipulated to "consist only in levying War against the[United States], or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort"[205]—precisely because those crimes had long preëxisted the Constitution, but in forms far broader than WE THE PEOPLE desired to continue in their new supreme law.[206] With respect to "Treason" in particular, THE PEOPLE took to heart Blackstone's admonition that, "[a]s * * * [treason] is the highest civil crime, which (considered as a member of the community) any man can possibly commit, it ought therefore to be the most precisely ascertained. For if the crime of high treason be indeterminate, this alone * * * is sufficient to make any government degenerate into arbitrary power".[207]

Otherwise, the Constitution presumes that every linguistically, historically, politically, economically, and especially legally literate and experienced American, in 1788 and thereafter, knew and would know, or could easily determine, what its undefined words and phrases then meant and would continue to mean, unless and until some formal constitutional Amendment deleted them or altered their sense. Plainly too (as noted above), the Constitution presumes that its readers at all times did, do, and will construe its undefined terms "in their natural sense" in "the common parlance of the times" in which they were written,[208] because it nowhere indicates that those terms should be construed in some other, unusual way.

Some of the Constitution's words, of course, have meanings that are truly timeless, so that they apply without distinctions across the ages—such as the nouns

---

[202] U.S. Const. art. II.

[203] U.S. Const. art. III, §§ 1 and 2.

[204] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 6.

[205] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

[206] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 74-93; William W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (Chicago, Illinois: The University of Chicago Press, 1953), Volume 1, at 470-477; E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 612-622.

[207] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 75 (footnote omitted).

[208] Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheaton) 1, 188 (1824); United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association, 322 U.S. 533, 539 (1944).

"Year" or "Years";[209] "Majority";[210] "Secrecy";[211] "Armies" and "Navy";[212] "Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, [and] dock-Yards";[213] "gold and silver Coin";[214] "Imports or Exports";[215]and "Troops, or Ships of War".[216] Others must be taken in a particular historical context—such as the noun "dollars",[217] which refers uniquely to the Spanish milled dollar adopted as America's monetary unit by the Continental Congress before the Constitution was drafted.[218] Still others must be construed in a specific setting and with a generous measure of common sense—such as the terms "disorderly Behaviour" and "good Behaviour".[219] And others yet are capable of expansive interpretations when, where, and as socio-economic conditions might vary—such as the noun "Commerce", many modern manifestations of which the Framers and Founding Fathers could not have foreseen, but surely (had they been prescient) would have intended to come within the power of Congress to "regulate".[220]

b. "Technical" words and phrases. Linguistic analysis of the Constitution becomes complicated when a word or phrase has both factual and legal connotations, such as "disorderly Behaviour",[221] or is purely a legal term of art, such as "[t]he Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus".[222] Quite misleading, then, is the notion that, because "[t]he Constitution was written to be understood by the voters", "its words and phrases were used in their normal and ordinary, as distinguished from technical, meaning".[223] For the "technical" meaning of a word or phrase is the particular meaning the law attaches to it, which almost always will be narrower and more precise than the meaning attributed to it in common parlance or in some general definition from a popular dictionary. And when the

---

[209] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cls. 1 through 3, § 3, cls. 1 though 3, and § 4, cl. 2, § 9, cl. 1; art. II, § 1, cls. 1 and 4; and art. V.

[210] U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, cl. 1.

[211] U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, cl. 3.

[212] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13.

[213] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 17.

[214] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[215] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 2.

[216] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[217] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 1 ("a Tax or duty may be imposed * * * not exceeding ten dollars") and amend. VII ("where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars").

[218] See E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 134-141, 183-199.

[219] U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, cl. 2 ("[e]ach House [of Congress] may * * * punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour") and art. III, § 1 ("Judges * * * shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour").

[220] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

[221] U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, cl. 2.

[222] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 2.

[223] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 731 (1931).

issue is the interpretation of a specifically legal document—and no document could be more specifically legal than "the supreme Law of the Land" itself[224]—the "technical" meanings of its words and phrases often constitute their common meanings, because: (i) it is the commonality of their meanings within the legal system that qualifies those meanings as their "technical" meanings; and (ii) the law presumes that every man (lawyer or not) knows the law, particularly if he is among WE THE PEOPLE who originally did, and thereafter continually do, "ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America".[225]

The merest inspection of the Constitution proves that to enforce its obvious ends often absolutely requires application of the specifically "technical" meanings of certain words and phrases—such as "Felony" and "Felonies",[226] "Breach of the Peace",[227] "Bill of Attainder",[228] "ex post facto Law",[229] "Treason",[230] and "all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States".[231] Adding further subtlety to the task, not a few of the Constitution's "technical" words and phrases combine legal with other sometimes quite specialized connotations, such as: legal and economic—"Bills of Credit";[232] legal and political—"high Crimes and Misdemeanors" and "Republican Form of Government";[233] legal and historical—"Jury" and "trial by jury";[234] legal, political, and historical—"Title of Nobility";[235] and even legal, political, historical, and theological—"religious Test" and "establishment of religion".[236] So, in constitutional interpretation, quite often the "normal and ordinary" meaning of some word or phrase is and must be its "technical" meaning, even in numerous senses. And any legally literate American in the late 1700s would have known that focusing on the "technical" meanings of certain of its words and phrases was the only way in which to interpret the Constitution in those particulars with objectivity, accuracy, and anything approaching certainty.

Moreover, any legally literate individual in contemporary America should know just as much. For, no less than any other words and phrases they contain, the

---

[224] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[225] U.S. Const. preamble.

[226] U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 1; art. I, § 8, cl. 10; and art. IV, § 2, cl. 2.

[227] U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 1.

[228] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 3 and art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[229] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 3 and art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[230] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1. In this instance, the Constitution itself supplies the "technical" meaning.

[231] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 1.

[232] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[233] U.S. Const. art. II, § 4 and art. IV, § 4.

[234] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 3 and amends. VI and VII.

[235] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8 and art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[236] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3 and amend. I.

"technical" terms the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights employed in 1788 and 1791 mean today precisely what they meant then. That the Constitution "speaks not only in the same words, but with the same meaning and intent with which it spoke when it came from the hands of its framers"[237] applies to the specifically legal meaning its words and phrases had in that day: "The scope and effect of * * * many * * * provisions of the Constitution[ ] are best ascertained by bearing in mind what the law was before."[238] "We are bound to interpret the Constitution in the light of the law as it existed at the time it was adopted[.]"[239] "[O]ur inquiry concerns the [legal] standard prevailing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, not a score or more years later".[240] Moreover, "[t]he law as expounded for centuries cannot be set aside or disregarded because some of the judges"—or legislators, or factions and special-interest groups, or members of the intelligentsia—"are now of a different opinion from those who, [two] centur[ies] ago, followed it in framing our Constitution".[241] Indeed, it is even more ridiculous to suggest that the law upon which the Constitution was based may be "reinterpreted" today than that the Constitution's words may be.

For perhaps the most obvious example, the words "Jury" in Article III of the Constitution and in the Sixth Amendment[242] and "trial by jury" in the Seventh Amendment[243] "were placed in the Constitution * * * with reference to the meaning affixed to them in the law as it was in this country and in England at the adoption of that instrument".[244] So, "[i]n order to ascertain the scope and meaning of the Seventh Amendment, resort must be had to the appropriate rules of the common law established at the time of the adoption of that constitutional provision in 1791".[245] For "here we are dealing with a constitutional provision which has in effect adopted the rules of the common law in respect of trial by jury as those rules existed in 1791. To effectuate any change in these rules is not to deal with the common law, qua common law, but to alter the Constitution."[246] Thus, for instance,

---

[237] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 426 (1857).

[238] Ex parte Wilson, 114 U.S. 417, 422 (1885).

[239] Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 243 (1895).

[240] United States v. Barnett, 376 U.S. 681, 693 (1964).

[241] Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, 157 U.S. 429, 591 (1895) (separate opinion of Field, J.) (referring to English common law).

[242] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 3 ("[t]he Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury") and amend. VI ("[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury").

[243] U.S. Const. amend. VII ("the right of trial by jury shall be preserved").

[244] Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343, 350 (1898).

[245] Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U.S. 474, 476 (1935), citing Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343, 350 (1898), and Patton v. United States, 281 U.S. 276, 288 (1930). Accord, Baltimore & Carolina Line, Inc. v. Redman, 295 U.S. 654, 656-657 (1935).

[246] Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U.S. 474, 487 (1935).

a jury must be "constituted, as it was at common law, of twelve persons, neither more nor less".[247] And > unanimity was one of the peculiar and essential features of trial by jury at the common law. No authorities are needed to sustain this proposition. Whatever may be true as to legislation which changes any mere details of a jury trial, it is clear that a statute which destroys this substantial and essential feature thereof is one abridging the right.[248]

Similarly for construction of the constitutional term "a Republican Form of Government":[249]

> No particular government is designated [in the Constitution] as republican, neither is the exact form to be guaranteed, in any manner especially designated. Here, as in other parts of the instrument, we are compelled to resort elsewhere to ascertain what was intended.
>
> * * * * *
>
> The guaranty necessarily implies a duty on the part of the States themselves to provide such a government. All the States had governments when the Constitution was adopted. * * * These governments the Constitution did not change. They were accepted precisely as they were, and it is, therefore, to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the States to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form, within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution.[250]

C. The rules of constitutional construction applied specifically to "the Militia of the several States" in 1788 and 1791. This method of construing the original Constitution and the Bill of Rights by straightforward reference to principles embodied in the law in force at the time of their ratifications applies most emphatically to those provisions dealing with the Militia.

1. The necessity for definite meanings of the terms at that time. The "Power" of Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", "the Militia of the several States", "[a] well regulated Militia", and "the right

---

[247] Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343, 349 (1898). Accord, Patton v. United States, 281 U.S. 276, 288-289 (1930).

[248] American Publishing Company v. Fisher, 166 U.S. 464, 468 (1897). Accord, Andres v. United States, 333 U.S. 740, 748 (1948); Patton v. United States, 281 U.S. 276, 288-289 (1930); Maxwell v Dow, 176 U.S. 581, 586 (1900).

[249] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4 ("[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government").

[250] Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wallace) 162, 175-176 (1874).

of the people to keep and bear Arms" are plainly all "technical" phrases.[251] But they are nowhere defined in the Constitution. Yet the term "[a] well regulated Militia", which the Second Amendment declares to be "necessary to the security of a free State", must have had a most definite meaning known to all among WE THE PEOPLE at the time the Bill of Rights was ratified—and a meaning which THE PEOPLE expected could not change absent an Amendment of the Constitution (and, as will be shown hereafter, perhaps not even then).

Is it conceivable that WE THE PEOPLE in 1791 could have considered undefinable the very "well regulated Militia" which they explicitly identified as "necessary to the security of a free State"? Or that they would have left that phrase entirely undefined, and therefore subject to the vagaries of ever-changing definitions by Congress, the States, or the Supreme Court, as the mere ignorance, political intrigues, or even subversive designs of incompetent or malign public officials and special-interest groups might dictate? Not at all. For THE PEOPLE knew that

> [t]he very purpose of a Bill of Rights [is] to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles * * * . One's * * * fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections.[252]

And insofar as that is true of a single "fundamental right[ ]" of a single individual, it must especially be true of "the security of a free State", which involves every American's every "fundamental right[ ]". Indeed, only by being true for "the security of a free State" can it become an effective truth for any individual residing in that State—for if "a free State" is itself insecure, none of its constituent individuals can be any better off. So WE THE PEOPLE'S use of the crucially important terms "necessary", "security", and "free" in connection with "[a] well regulated Militia" and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", without an explicit definition of any of those terms in the Constitution, proves that the phrases "[a] well regulated Militia" and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" were sufficiently defined by legal and historical experience so common to most Americans that they could not plausibly be denied. Therefore, no declaration of Congress or of any State's legislature, and no opinion of any court, is necessary to define these terms today; nor can any such contemporary declaration or opinion change those definitions.[253]

---

[251] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 1 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II (emphases supplied).

[252] West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 638 (1943).

[253] See Ex parte Wilson, 114 U.S. 417, 426 (1885).

The original Constitution authorized Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States".[254] Although the principles, standards, and required outcomes that govern the exercise of this power are nowhere explicitly set out, they are obviously implicit in the Constitution's incorporation of "the Militia of the several States"—in the plural—into its federal system.[255] These are the only "Militia" the Constitution recognizes. These are uniquely "the Militia" to which the powers and disabilities of Congress pertain. Even more to the point, these were not merely theoretical "Militia", but instead were actual institutions—indeed, the only institutions of their kind—which existed in 1788 and had existed theretofore for generations throughout America, settled and regulated pursuant to Colonial and then State statutes. So, from the very beginning, Congress's power was limited to "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" in such wise as to produce "Militia" of the type long theretofore and even then extant as "the Militia of the several States"—and Congress therefore labored under a complete disability as to any other "militia".

To be sure, because of invincible ignorance or for maleficent political purposes, someone might attempt to deny or obscure the obvious, and float the notion that the Constitution licenses Members of Congress to define "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia"—and even the noun "Militia" itself—in any manner that suits their fancy.[256] Certainly this would be the tack taken by those intent on hamstringing or even destroying the Militia, and thereby undermining "the security of a free State", in aid of usurpation and tyranny. And, just as certainly, the citizens of "a free State" would never be worried about domestic threats to their security unless such incompetents and miscreants were likely to turn up as public officials from time to time. So, to ensure that officials would always adhere to the correct construction of the original Constitution with respect to the Militia, the Second Amendment (along with the rest of the Bill of Rights), consisting of "further declaratory and restrictive clauses", was added to the Constitution "in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers".[257] Thus, the Second Amendment renders pellucid that Congress is "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States" according to—and only according to—the principles of "[a] well regulated Militia" which is based upon

---

[254] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[255] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[256] See, e.g., District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 599-600 (2008) (Scalia, J., for the Court), where this sort of nonsense finds voice, albeit only in dicta.

[257] RESOLUTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS SUBMITTING TWELVE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION (4 March 1789), in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, ante note 1, at 1063.

"the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", and which, so structured, is "necessary to the security of a free State", precisely as those matters were understood throughout America in 1791.

2. The requisite definitions to be found in the Militia statutes of the pre-constitutional era. Where, then, outside of the Constitution, can the historically and legally correct understanding of the terms "the Militia of the several States", "[a] well regulated Militia", "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", and "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" be found? This inquiry must be conducted circumspectly, because uncertainty, confusion, and downright error in terms of definitions can all too easily insinuate themselves into shoddy constitutional analysis.

a. For example, in one of the Supreme Court's most important cases on the subject of unconstitutional paper currency, one Justice pointed out that

> [t]he terms, "bills of credit," are in themselves vague and general, and, at the present day, almost dismissed from our language. It is, then, only by resorting to the nomenclature of the day of the Constitution, that we can hope to get at the idea which the framers * * * attached to it.[258]

Perhaps amazingly, this observation was offered a scant forty-two years after ratification of the Constitution, when men who had been young adults in 1788 were still alive and capable of remembering not only "the nomenclature of th[at] day" but also the actual "bills of credit"—such as the Continental Currency—which had then circulated throughout America. And, these possible witnesses aside, the pre-constitutional historical record more than adequately addressed the issue.[259]

If an actual problem with defining the well-understood term "bills of credit" supposedly arose so early in the life of the Constitution, then properly defining "the Militia of the several States", "[a] well regulated Militia", "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", and the power of Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" will require exquisitely meticulous care today. For decade upon decade of disuse, misuse, and abuse have so thoroughly muddled the meaning of "Militia" in contemporary American political discourse that the word is hardly ever encountered except as invective, usually well-freighted with vituperative adjectives such as "extremist" and "violent", broadcast by the enemies of constitutional government (and their dupes and other "useful idiots") for the purpose of intimidating into silence the people they intend to oppress as soon as the vast majority of Americans has been thoroughly disarmed through one form of "gun control" or another.

---

[258] Craig v. Missouri, 29 U.S. (4 Peters) 410, 442 (1830) (Johnson, J., dissenting), referring to U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[259] See, e.g., E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 67-79, 94-96, 141-155, 391-454.

As used throughout this study, "gun control" and "gun controllers" are meant—without equivocation, sympathy, or apology, and with good reason—to be taken as strongly pejorative terms. "Gun control" is a neologism. *Pre-*constitutional American laws aimed at a near-universality of armament among able-bodied free adult male inhabitants, either through their own efforts or with the assistance of public institutions. In those days, had the term been current, "gun control" would have meant, not keeping firearms and ammunition away from as many private citizens as legislators might contrive to disarm, but instead seeing to it that as many citizens as possible possessed their own arms at all times, and were as well trained in the use of those arms as circumstances permitted. To employ the modern Judiciary's mumbo jumbo, that and only that was considered to be "reasonable regulation" with respect to firearms. That the Colonies and independent States never attempted to exercise a purported power to disarm the general populace—and that no one of consequence ever seriously advocated that they should have done so—provides compelling evidence that no such power was ever believed to exist.[260] The purpose of "gun control" today, conversely, is not to train people in the safe and effective use of firearms, or to regulate the use of firearms so as to minimize negligent, reckless, or criminal behavior while still maximizing the freedom of individuals to possess and use firearms for all legitimate purposes. Rather, "gun control" aims at denying as many people as possible possession of as many types of firearms as possible in as many places as possible with respect to as many uses as possible—as soon as possible. Its goal is the systematic disarmament of common Americans, typically coupled with the equally systematic elaboration of a *para-*military police-state apparatus to keep defenseless people in line through a cynically calculated policy of official Schrecklichkeit ("frightfulness") mediated, ironically, through various "law-enforcement agencies". "Gun control", police lawlessness and brutality, and a general contempt on the part of the professional political class for the people's basic human and civil rights inevitably and invariably march together in goose-step. The motivations of "gun controllers" may be debatable. A very few of them may be simple-minded, rather than aggressively malevolent. But no one is so dim-witted as to be unable to read and understand the historical record of modern times. For that chronicle is as pellucid as it is bloody: Once the common people in any country are disarmed, they are helpless against oppression. Aspiring usurpers and tyrants always disarm the people as a key step towards oppressing them. And, confronted by a psychopathic political class claiming unlimited "governmental" powers, disarmed people generally become victims of slavery and mass murder.[261] Unfortunately, all too many Americans with otherwise sound patriotic instincts who should vocally support revitalization of "the Militia of the several States"—on the undeniably constitutional, as well as practical, ground that "well regulated Militia" are "necessary to the security of a free State" in their own personal interests where they themselves reside—have been so thoroughly cowed and demoralized by "gun controllers'" black propaganda that they shrink from uttering the word "Militia" in public as part of a political proposal, lest they be vilified in the mass media as dangerous crackpots. The jack-booted tramping of political thugs who demonize the word "Militia" cannot drown out the truth, however, because "[a] well regulated Militia" is not some newly contrived conception with no firm foundation in American law and history. Quite the contrary.

---

[260] See, e.g., Federal Power Commission v. Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company, 337 U.S. 498, 513 & note 20 (1949); Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 905, 907-908 (1997).

b. Where did WE THE PEOPLE in the late 1700s find the definitions of "the Militia of the several States", "[a] well regulated Militia", "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", and "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" that they accepted as true and sufficient? Even before the idea of the Constitution entered anyone's head, "the Militia of the several States" (or, earlier, the Militia of the several American Colonies, with the partial, peculiar, and in any event not permanent exception of Pennsylvania[262]) were established and maintained pursuant to statutes enacted throughout the 1600s and 1700s. In those Colonies and then all of the independent States, operations aimed at organizing, arming, and disciplining these Militia were conducted pursuant to these statutes. In those Colonies and States, the vast majority of the able-bodied adult free male inhabitants (other than conscientious objectors) personally possessed firearms, because those statutes imposed upon them a duty to keep and bear arms. And as a consequence of all this, throughout America in the *pre-constitutional era existed "well regulated Militia"—the products of statutes which Americans had believed were so effective in achieving their ends that they had enacted them and reënacted them and reënacted them yet again, in form and substance, decade after decade and generation after generation.*

That these statutes existed, what they mandated, how they operated, and what they accomplished were known to all Americans. Moreover, during the *pre-*constitutional era, statutes such as these, the principles of which had been reënacted so often, were likely to have been considered of "constitutional" status.

---

[261] See Rudolph J. Rummel, Death by Government: Genocide and Mass Murder in the Twentieth Century (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction Publishers, 1994). For communist "governments" in particular, which have exceeded all others in the extent and ferocity of the wars of enslavement and extermination they have waged against the common people of their own countries, see, e.g., Stéphane Courtois, Nicholas Werth, Jean-Louis Panné, Andrzej Paczkowski, Karel Bartošek, and Jean-Louis Margolin, The Black Book of Communism: Crimes, Terror, Repression, Jonathan Murphy and Mark Kramer, Translators (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1999).

[262] See post, at 87-88 and 845-848.

For, as Blackstone observed, "[B]Y the sovereign power * * * is meant the making of laws; * * * and all the other powers of the state must obey the legislative power in the execution of the several functions, or else the constitution is at an end"—and therefore in the British Parliament was "lodged the sovereignty of the British constitution".[263] So Americans would hardly have questioned the "sovereign" power of their Colonial and State governments as residing in their legislatures, too. Not surprisingly then, at the end of the *pre-constitutional period, WE THE PEOPLE not only incorporated directly into the original Constitution's federal system the Militia that these statutes had regulated,[264] but also emphasized the constitutional authority and political indispensability of such statutorily "well regulated Militia" through the Second Amendment. So, because, in the late 1700s, WE THE PEOPLE drew the meanings of "technical" words and phrases from the relevant laws of England, the Colonies, and the independent States as befitted the particular case at hand, it is from these pre-*constitutional statutes that the constitutional meaning of "Militia", in all its particulars, must be gleaned.

Just as the noun "Legislature"[265] "was not a term of uncertain meaning when incorporated into the [original] Constitution" and "[w]hat it meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation",[266] so too the phrases "Militia of the several States", "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", "[a] well regulated Militia", and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" were well understood by every adult American in the late 1700s—and, no Amendment of the Constitution having supervened thereafter, have not changed in their constitutional definitions since then.

And just as "[t]he definition of 'a state' is found in the powers possessed by the original states which adopted the Constitution" by studying the laws that evidenced those powers,[267] so too must the definitions of all those words and phrases that relate to the Militia in the Constitution (and in the Articles of Confederation, too) be found in the *pre-*constitutional American Colonial and State Militia statutes, there being no other source of evidence as

- scientifically ascertainable—because every statute's every word, phrase, and mark of punctuation is reproducibly verifiable or falsifiable;
- objective—because the substance of none of these statutes depends upon anyone's personal and inevitably subjective interpretations, opinions, or recollections;

---

[263] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 49, 51.

[264] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[265] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 1; art. I, § 3, cls. 1 and 2; art. IV, § 4; art. V; and art. VI, cl. 3.

[266] Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 227 (1920).

[267] Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 566 (1911).

• historically complete and comprehensive—because these statutes document everything that the *pre-*constitutional American legislatures did throughout the 1600s and 1700s, not just the limited personal experiences of a few Framers, Founding Fathers, or others around the time of the Constitution's ratification;

• unequivocal—because these statutes are consistent in content, not only across the varying political jurisdictions of the Colonies and independent States, but also over the entirety of the *pre-*constitutional period; and

• legally dispositive—because, being the actual law, these statutes are, not only the best evidence, but even the only admissible evidence, of what the phrase "[a] well regulated Militia" means.

With their own States' and their neighbors' Militia statutes before them, WE THE PEOPLE in 1791 did not need to consult isolated statements of various Framers and Founding Fathers in order to ascertain with exactitude the defining constitutional principles of "[a] well regulated Militia". Neither do WE THE PEOPLE today. On the one hand, if particular Framers' or Founders' interpretations, opinions, or reminiscences of or about the "Militia" contradict what the statutes mandated, they are useless for defining "[a] well regulated Militia", because they are erroneous as a matter of law. On the other hand, if they confirm the statutes, they are merely derivative, cumulative, and ultimately superfluous evidence. In either event, the statutes, not any Framer's or Founder's personal conceptions of the "Militia", must control.

c. This is no mere hobbyhorse of modern ivory-tower intellectuals, but a conclusion in which WE THE PEOPLE in 1788 and 1791 undoubtedly concurred. When THE PEOPLE incorporated "the Militia of the several States" into their new Constitution's federal system, they knew full well that these were statutory institutions already in existence, separate in every State and each one the creature of its own State's laws. When THE PEOPLE referred to "[a] well regulated Militia" in the Second Amendment, they knew exactly what the salient principles of "regulat[ion]" were, because those principles could be found, repeated again and again, in statute after statute the Colonies and then the independent States had enacted throughout the 1600s and 1700s. And when THE PEOPLE authorized Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", they knew to the last detail what those activities entailed, because they were familiar with the "well regulated Militia" the Colonies' and States' statutes had produced in the past.

For example, in their titles, their bodies, or both, Rhode Island's *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes often explicitly described themselves as "regulating" her Militia:

• [1699, 1701, and 1705] An Act for the better regulating the militia, and for punishing offenders as shall not conform to the law thereunto relating.{EN-2}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] An Act for the Repealing several Laws relating to the Militia within this Colony, and for further Regulation of the same.{EN-3}

• [1726] An Act for regulating the Militia, and the Election of the Officers of each respective Company in this Colony.{EN-4}

• [1730] "[N]o Constraint shall be laid upon the Conscience of any Person whatsoever, by Force of any Act or Law for the keeping up or regulating the Militia within this Colony".{EN-5}

• [1755] Petitioners seeking a charter for an Independent Company "proposed the Laws of the Colony made for regulating the Militia, for the Rule of their Conduct".{EN-6}

• [1755] An ACT in Addition to the several Acts regulating the Militia in this Colony.{EN-7}

• [1756] An ACT in Addition to, and Amendment of the several Acts regulating the Militia.{EN-8}

• [1766] An ACT, regulating the Militia in this Colony.{EN-9}

• [1774] An ACT in addition to, and amendment of, an Act entitled "An Act regulating the Militia of this Colony["].{EN-10}

• [1779] "WHEREAS the Security and Defence of all free States essentially depend, under God, upon the Exertions of a well regulated Militia: * * * Wherefore, for the better forming, regulating and conducting the military Force of this State, Be it Enacted * * * [.]" An ACT for the better forming, regulating and conducting the military Force of this State.{EN-11}

Similarly, in Virginia the *pre-*constitutional statutes identified themselves as "regulating" or as "regulations" of her Militia:

• [1723] "WHEREAS a due regulation of the Militia is absolutely necessary for the defence of this country * * * ." An Act for the settling and better Regulation of the Militia.{EN-12}

• [1738] An Act, for the better Regulation of the Militia.{EN-13}

• [1754] An Act for amending the act, intituled, An Act for the better regulation of the militia.{EN-14}

• [1755] An Act for the better regulating and training the Militia.{EN-15}

• [1757] An Act for the better regulating and disciplining the Militia.{EN-16}

• [1759] An Act for continuing an Act, intitutled, An Act for the better regulating and disciplining the Militia.{EN-17}

• [1762] An Act for amending and further continuing the act for the better regulating and disciplining the Militia.{EN-18}

• [1766] An act to continue and amend the act for the better regulating and disciplining the militia.{EN-19}

• [1771] An act for further continuing the act, intituled An act for the better regulating and disciplining the militia.{EN-20}

• [1777] An act for regulating and disciplining the Militia.{EN-21}

• [1779] An act for the better regulation and discipline of the militia.{EN-22}

• [1781] An act to amend the act for regulating and disciplining the militia, and for other purposes.{EN-23}

• [1782] An act to amend the act, intituled, An act for establishing and regulating the militia.{EN-24}

• [1784] An act for amending the several laws for regulating and disciplining the militia, and guarding against invasions and insurrections.{EN-25}

• [1785] An act to amend and reduce into one act, the several laws for regulating and disciplining the militia, and guarding against invasions and insurrections.{EN-26}

These and other like and related statutes provide reliable evidence for WE THE PEOPLE today because they constituted reliable evidence for WE THE PEOPLE in the *pre-*constitutional era, being the very evidence that THE PEOPLE in that day themselves created. Indeed, they are the best of all possible evidence, because they document with legal certainty, exactitude, and even redundancy what, time and again over a period of more than a century, the General Assemblies of Rhode Island and Virginia wanted to happen, ordered to happen, expected to happen, and punished if it did not happen with respect to their Militia.

Doubtlessly, the legislators who authored these statutes, the voters who elected those lawmakers and approved of their efforts, and probably the vast majority of the individuals who served in Rhode Island's and Virginia's Militia under the aegis of these enactments believed that they provided, not simply Militia "regulated" in some at least minimally satisfactory manner, but "well regulated Militia"—even as "well regulated" as Rhode Island's and Virginia's circumstances allowed. After all, although the General Assemblies of those two Colonies and then independent States from time to time did amend their Militia laws whenever they considered them inadequate in various minor particulars, they obviously believed that the laws' fundamental principles of organization and operation were sound, because, although they enacted many Militia statutes and related laws from the early 1600s through the late 1700s, they never modified, or even questioned, those principles. So the conclusion is unavoidable that they considered their Militia to be "well regulated" precisely because the Militia were "regulated" by statutes according to those principles. If the General Assemblies had deemed their Militia seriously defective in some fundamental way, they would have "regulated" them in some other manner, or even experimented with entirely different means of providing their communities with adequate "homeland security". And this was the case, not only in Rhode Island and Virginia, but also throughout the other Colonies and then independent States.[268]

Thus, during the entire pre-constitutional period, the common meanings of what became the constitutional phrases "Militia of the several States", "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", "[a] well regulated Militia", and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" were their "technical" meanings, because the "Militia" that existed in that era were not some theoretical "militia", but instead the particular "Militia" that were formed and operated under the aegis of these statutes. The "technical" meanings of all these phrases were defined initially in the statutes; and from these "technical" meanings the common meanings derived through Americans' actual experiences as the statutes were applied.

In contrast, just as with statements from Framers, Founders, and other patriots, anecdotes about the Militia from the pre-constitutional period in and of themselves provide next to nothing definitive. What is reported to have been done here and there, at one time or another, under the rubric of "militia" activity is not always reliable evidence of what was in fact done, let alone what should have been done rather than left undone. For instance, the activity may have occurred in an extreme, possibly unique, situation in which the standing law simply could not have been applied—and therefore, albeit perhaps not actually *il*legal, it would have been at best extra-legal. Or the activity may have arisen from a misunderstanding of what the standing law required—and therefore, although not intentionally so, it was technically illegal. Or the activity may have been arguably or even patently illegal, but either tolerated by the authorities or beyond their ability to punish under the circumstances. In any event, one cannot possibly adjudge the legality, extra-legality, or illegality of any such action except against admitted standards—which only the Militia statutes provide.

3. No changes in these definitions now possible. All of the foregoing being beyond fair dispute, "the Militia of the several States", "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", "[a] well regulated Militia", and "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" can and must find their definitions in the fundamental principles set out in the Militia statutes of the Colonies and independent States throughout the *pre-*constitutional period. There is, after all, no practical or even plausible alternative.

---

[268] See generally The Selective Service System, Backgrounds of Selective Service, Military Obligation: The American Tradition, A Compilation of the Enactments of Compulsion From the Earliest Settlements of the Original Thirteen Colonies in 1607 Through the Articles of Confederation 1789, Special Monograph No. 1, Volume II (14 Parts) (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1947).

As Rhode Island's and Virginia's histories demonstrate, the fundamental principles of the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes never changed, and apparently no one of consequence in that era ever suggested that they should have been changed. Under these circumstances, how could WE THE PEOPLE who "ordain[ed] and establish[ed] th[e] Constitution" and then ratified the Bill of Rights have possibly believed that this unbroken line of both historical and even their own personal experiences, embodied in law and tested in peace and war, had no permanent political meaning—or disproved those principles in any substantial part—or supported the notion that those principles could or ought to be changed at the mere whims of future legislative or electoral majorities? Were WE THE PEOPLE ready to accept for themselves and their posterity just anything as "[a] well regulated Militia"—and, if so, were they willing to accept just anything as "a free State" for the "security" of which they believed such a "Militia" to be "necessary"? Moreover, if WE THE PEOPLE had imagined that some type of "Militia" quite unknown in *pre-*constitutional practice could be as "well regulated" as, or perhaps even better "regulated" than, the "Militia" with which they were familiar, would they not have explicitly and carefully redefined all the words and phrases relating to "Militia" in the Constitution so as to break the implicit historical continuity with their *pre-*constitutional meanings, as they were so very careful to do with the definition of "Treason"?[269]

Even with some such scrupulous new specification, though, would WE THE PEOPLE have trusted "the security of a free State"—the ultimate goal for which they had just fought the War of Independence—to a form of "militia" of which no American had ever had any practical experience whatsoever? Less plausible yet, would they have left the matter entirely to the unpredictability of political control—so that Members of Congress or of the various States' legislatures might not "organiz[e], arm[ ], and disciplin[e], the Militia" at all? Or perhaps might "organiz[e], arm[ ], and discipline, the Militia" only in such eccentric or slapdash fashion as to render them ineffectual? Or might "organiz[e], arm[ ], and disciplin[e], the Militia" in a purposefully malignant form consisting of members of just a single political party—such as a Sturmabteilung or Rote Front Kämpfer Bund; or of ideological fanatics—such as a Hitler Youth, Stalinist Komsomol, or Maoist Red Guard; or of men who could be drafted into, or otherwise brought under the orders of, a "standing army"—which American patriots rightfully feared like the plague; or of mercenaries recruited from both citizens and foreigners—who could act as a ruthless Praetorian Guard for a clique of usurpers and tyrants?

---

[269] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1. See ante, at 59.

Any such result is impossible to credit. WE THE PEOPLE knew exactly what "a free State" was, and exactly what "[a] well regulated Militia" was, and exactly how the two interrelated—or else they never could have declared with any sense in their statement that such a Militia is "necessary to the security of a free State". Furthermore, knowing all that, they could never have intended or expected that unknown public officials, to be elected or appointed under unpredictable circumstances in an uncertain future, would have any say whatsoever over the definition of "[a] well regulated Militia", any more than they would over the definition of "a free State".

Neither did WE THE PEOPLE leave "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" undefined, or subject to transmogrifications in meaning at public officials' hands. They knew that "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" was not simply "a right" that Congress would enjoy the power to specify, broadly or narrowly, when it chose to "organiz[e], arm[ ], and disciplin[e], the Militia", but instead the legal rubric for a pattern of behavior widespread among Americans that had long preëxisted the Constitution. For they declared that "the right * * * shall not be infringed". And if "the right" were merely "a right" the substance of which derived from Congress, then it could never be "infringed" by Congress, because its very definition would depend entirely upon the will of Congress in the first place. Similar reasoning also precluded any power in the States' governments to interfere with "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms". THE PEOPLE knew that the meaning of "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" was utterly independent of the will of anyone in public office in the General Government or the governments of the several States—just as were the meanings of "[a] well regulated Militia" and "a free State"—because it was "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" (not any discretionary power of public officials) that made "[a] well regulated Militia" possible, and therefore was the foundation for "the security of a free State". In addition, THE PEOPLE knew—most of them from personal experience—that the substance of "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms" was to be found in the Militia statutes in that pattern of behavior relative to firearms that had proven itself necessary for the formation and maintenance of "well regulated Militia" throughout American history—in particular, the personal possession in his own home by every adult able-bodied individual (not a conscientious objector) of a firearm and ammunition suitable for Militia service.[270]

To be sure, during the *pre-*constitutional period the principles of "[a] well regulated Militia" were apparently only statutory in nature. One may leave aside whether these principles—particularly the unbroken tradition of common Americans to be armed for their individual and collective self-defense—were among the permanent "rights of Englishmen" that patriots could with justice have claimed to be of "constitutional" stature in Anglo-American Colonial law perforce of immemorial usage. For that question became moot when the Declaration of Independence asserted Americans' entitlement to "certain unalienable Rights" derived from "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", among which was "the Right of the People to alter or to abolish" an abusive "Form of Government" by main force if necessary, and as to which "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" is a necessary concomitant. Then, when the Constitution incorporated "the Militia of the several States" into its federal structure, the principles of those Militia were elevated from the statutory to the constitutional level. Therefore, the definitions of "the Militia of the several States", of what constitutes "organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia", of "[a] well regulated Militia", and of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" which arose out the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes are now beyond the power of the General Government, the States, or even WE THE PEOPLE themselves to change without a formal constitutional Amendment[271]—and even with such an Amendment, if the Amendment purported to override THE PEOPLE'S sovereign power as recognized in the Declaration of Independence.

---

[270] See post, Chapter 6 (Rhode Island) and Chapters 17 and 18 (Virginia).

4. Although immutable, these definitions nonetheless extensible. There remains, however, the further consideration that some words or phrases in "the supreme Law of the Land"[272] WE THE PEOPLE originally did intend to be taken in their then-contemporary meanings as generalities, but with the expectation that the particular things or activities to which those meanings referred probably would vary from era to era thereafter. Thus the familiar rule of construction that the "meaning [of constitutional provisions] is changeless; * * * only their application * * * is extensible".[273] For example, self-evidently the "Commerce" that Congress may "regulate"[274] has expanded since the late 1700s in terms, not of the legal category "Commerce", but of the specific economic and technological means, ends, and subjects of "Commerce" that were unknown, and even unpredictable, in that day. The constitutional definition of the category "Commerce" remains the same now as it was then; but the sum total of specific activities that now fall within that definition has greatly increased since the Constitution was ratified. The power of Congress over "Commerce" has not expanded; but the set of possible subjects of that power has.

---

[271] See, e.g., Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189, 206 (1920).

[272] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[273] Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 451 (1934) (Sutherland, J., dissenting).

[274] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

a. Similarly for the power of Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia".[275] As will appear hereinafter, "organizing" the Militia is based upon several principles, two of the most prominent being: (i) near-universal enrollment of all eligible able-bodied adults;[276] and (ii) selective exemption for particular individuals based upon their ages, their holding of important public offices, or their engagement in critical private occupations inter alia.[277] The first of these principles is fixed—indeed, as Article 13 of Virginia's Declaration of Rights of 1776 set out most clearly, "a well regulated militia" by definition is "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms". Application of the second principle, though, affords legislators a certain lattitude, provided that they do not expand or contract the scope of exemptions beyond what "the general Welfare" may require and "the common defence" may allow.[278] "[D]isciplining" the Militia is also both a fixed principle—"a well regulated militia" being "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms"—and a discretionary authority for legislators to mandate forms and methods of "train[ing] to arms" that necessarily must differ for different groups within the populace, and from time to time and place to place, in order to deal most effectively with different threats to "homeland security" whenever, wherever, and howsoever they may arise.[279] "[A]rming" the Militia, too, combines fixed principles with a modicum of discretionary legislative power. The fixed principles include: (i) the arming of all eligible able-bodied adults except for conscientious objectors and those few others who might justifiably be exempted; (ii) the personal possession by most armed Militiamen of the firearms with which they are to perform their Militia service, those arms to be acquired where practicable in the free market and usually held as their very own private property; and (iii) the utilization wherever possible of equipment specifically serviceable for Militia duty, which in general requires arms no less up-to-date and effective than those the members of the regular Armed Forces carry.[280] The discretionary authority relates to what arms in particular will fulfill those requirements, the specifications of which will naturally change along with the threats, the tactics and training, and the technology of the times.

Thus, in the first Militia statute under the Constitution, Congress provided that "every citizen" enrolled in the Militia "shall * * * provide himself with a good

---

[275] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

[276] See post, Chapter 5 (Rhode Island) and Chapter 16 (Virginia).

[277] See post, Chapter 11 (Rhode Island) and Chapter 22 (Virginia).

[278] See U.S. Const. preamble.

[279] See post, Chapter 10 (Rhode Island) and Chapter 21 (Virginia). The constitutional connection between "disciplining" and "training" appears most clearly in the provision "reserving to the States respectively * * * the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress". U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16. See, e.g., Timothy Pickering, Jr., An Easy Plan of Discipline for a Militia (Salem, Massachusetts: Samuel and Ebenezer Hall, 1775), which contains a set of instructions for drilling Militiamen.

[280] See post, Chapters 6 through 9 (Rhode Island) and Chapters 17 through 20 (Virginia).

musket or firelock * * * or with a good rifle",[281] which faithfully followed the pattern set in the pre-constitutional Militia laws, even to the specification of particular types of equipment. Although this Congressional construction of the Constitution nearly contemporaneous with its and the Second Amendment's ratifications is not evidence of the meaning of "arming * * * the Militia" anywhere near as conclusive as are the pre-constitutional Militia statutes, it is strongly corroborative, to the point of precluding any later Congress from deviating from that construction in general.[282] Furthermore, for over one hundred years from 1792 to 1903, Congress retained substantially the same requirement, that "[e]very citizen shall * * * be constantly provided with a good musket or firelock * * * or with a good rifle",[283] until it finally modified its mandate by authorizing the Secretary of War in the latter year "to issue * * * such number of the United States standard service magazine arms, with bayonets, bayonet scabbards, gun slings, belts, and such other necessary accouterments and equipments as are required for the Army of the United States, for arming all of the organized militia".[284] Apparently, during this period Congress presumed (as did the Colonial and State legislatures throughout the entire pre-constitutional era) that, when directed to provide himself "with a good musket or firelock * * * or with a good rifle", every man would use his best efforts to procure the most technologically up-to-date firearm he could afford. From 1874 to 1887, though, just as the Colonies and independent States had sometimes provided public arms to their Militia, Congress appropriated money "for the purpose of providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, by and on account of the United States".[285] And from 1887 to 1903, Congress authorized appropriations "for the purpose of providing arms, ordnance stores, and camp equipage for issue to the militia", with the requirement that "the purchase or manufacture" of this equipment "shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of War, as such arms, ordnance and quartermaster's stores and camp equipage are now manufactured or otherwise provided for the use of the Regular

---

[281] An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, § 1, 1 Stat. 271, 271.

[282] See, e.g., Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 174-176 (1926).

[283] Revised Statutes of the United States (1873-1874), TITLE XVI, THE MILITIA, § 1628, 18 Stat. 285, 285.

[284] An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 13, 32 Stat. 775, 777. The Supreme Court claimed that the Militia Act of 1792 (apparently as later included in the Revised Statutes) was repealed in 1901. Perpich v. Department of Defense, 496 U.S. 334, 341 & note 9 (1990), citing An Act To increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States, Act of 2 February 1901, CHAP. 192, § 42, 31 Stat. 748, 758. The latter statute, however, did not contain the word "militia". It did, however, provide for "the establishment of * * * camp grounds for instruction of troops of the * * * National Guard"—an emerging neologism for the Militia—which it assumed was then, and would continue thereafter, in existence. § 35, 31 Stat. at 757. The term "National Guard", of course, does not appear in the Constitution at all, let alone as a synonym for "Militia". See post, at 786-793.

[285] Revised Statutes of the United States (1873-1874), TITLE XVI, THE MILITIA, § 1661, 18 Stat. 285, 290.

Army".[286] At that point, Congress simplified the situation by standardizing all of the Militia's arms along with those of the Regular Army.[287]

b. Not surprisingly, the selfsame mode of construction applies to the Second Amendment. As with any other statute, the Constitution must be read as an entirety, consistently interrelating all of its provisions.[288] For all parts of the same law "must be read in relation to each other",[289] and "reconciled so as to produce a symmetrical whole".[290] All other things being equal, "identical words used in different parts of the same act are intended to have the same meaning".[291] So "[w]hen the same term which has been used" in one clause of the Constitution is used in another, "it must be understood as retaining the sense originally given to it".[292] Therefore, when the Constitution first empowers Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States",[293] "the Militia" and "them" must refer to "the Militia" in the Constitution's next relevant clause:

---

[286] An act to amend section sixteen hundred and sixty-one of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia, Act of 12 February 1887, CHAP. 129, §§ 1 and 3, 24 Stat. 401, 401, 402. Continued with an increase in appropriations, An Act To amend section one of the Act of Congress approved February twelfth, eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, entitled "An Act to amend section sixteen hundred and sixty-one of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia", Act of 6 June 1900, CHAP. 805, 31 Stat. 662.

[287] Unfortunately, in plain violation of the Constitution, Congress also purported to divide the Militia into two components—"the organized militia, to be known as the National Guard * * * , and the remainder to be known as the Reserve Militia"—but to require that only "the organized militia" be armed. Compare Act of 21 January 1903, § 1, 32 Stat. at 775, with § 13, 32 Stat. at 777. This was the first time in American history at which a significant part of the men eligible for the Militia—indeed, decidedly the major part—was not required to be armed (although, of course, the statute did not preclude members of "the Reserve Militia" from being armed by their State governments, or from arming themselves voluntarily). Fortunately, even more than a century later, this error is still correctable, because "no one acquires a vested or protected right in violation of the Constitution by long use". Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 664, 678 (1970).

[288] See Hostetter v. Idlewild Bon Voyage Liquor Corporation, 377 U.S. 324, 332 (1964); United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U.S. 649, 653-654 (1898); Cherokee Intermarriage Cases, 203 U.S. 76, 89 (1906); Talbott v. Silver Bow County, 139 U.S. 438, 443-444 (1891); Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 44 (1957) (opinion of Frankfurter, J.).

[289] United States v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corporation, 344 U.S. 218, 222 (1952).

[290] Federal Power Commission v. Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company, 337 U.S. 498, 514 & n.21 (1949). Accord, e.g., Richards v. United States, 369 U.S. 1, 11 (1962).

[291] Atlantic Cleaners & Dyers, Inc. v. United States, 286 U.S. 427, 433 (1932). Accord, e.g., Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Lundy, 516 U.S. 235, 249-250 (1996); Gustafson v. Alloyd Company, Inc., 513 U.S. 561, 569-570 (1995); Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 143 (1994); Department of Revenue of Oregon v. ACF Industries, Inc., 510 U.S. 332, 342 (1994); Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation, 509 U.S. 209, 230 (1993); Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Keystone Consolidated Industries, Inc., 508 U.S. 152, 159 (1993); Estate of Cowart v. Nicklos Drilling Company, 505 U.S. 469, 479 (1992); Sullivan v. Stroop, 496 U.S. 478, 484 (1990); Sorenson v. Secretary of the Treasury, 475 U.S. 851, 860 (1986); Morrison-Knudson Construction Company v. Director, Office of Workers' Compensation Programs, 461 U.S. 624, 633 (1983). Of course, this rule is only presumptive, not absolute. Helvering v. Stockholms Enskilda Bank, 293 U.S. 84, 86-87 (1934); Atlantic Cleaners & Dyers, 286 U.S. at 433-434.

[292] Hepburn and Dundas v. Ellzey, 6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 445, 453 (1805).

[293] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

namely, "the Militia of the several States", of which Militia the President "shall be Commander in Chief * * * when [they are] called into the actual Service of the United States".[294] And these "Militia of the several States" must be the very same "well regulated Militia * * * necessary to the security of a free State" of which the Second Amendment then speaks, if only because each and every State in the Union—that is, "the several States", as the Constitution always describes them collectively[295]—must be taken to be "a free State" within the Amendment's understanding of that term. So, "the Militia of the several States" that Congress is empowered "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining" must also be understood as consisting of "the people" as a whole in each of those States. Furthermore, "the people" with respect to whom the Second Amendment commands that "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed" must be the largely selfsame "WE THE PEOPLE" who "do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America".[296] For nothing in the Constitution or any of its Amendments identifies any other "people" as entitled to any rights, powers, privileges, or immunities.[297] And the "Arms" to which "the right of the people" pertains must be the "Arms" necessary for them to serve in "well regulated Militia", which must be the very same "Arms" (at least in the general terms of purpose, type, and quality) with which Congress is "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia".

As a result, the noun "Arms" in the Second Amendment must be construed in the selfsame sense as the verb "arming" in the power of Congress "[t]o provide" therefor—which is the functional sense all references to firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements had in the *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes: namely, the "Arms" necessary and proper for "the people" to possess in order to provide themselves with "the security of a free State" through "[a] well regulated Militia" under the particular technological circumstances of the period in question. Thus, the proper inquiry where the Second Amendment (or any other constitutional provision relevant to the Militia) is concerned is whether the firearm in question "at this time has some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia".[298] Today, then, (as will be demonstrated hereinafter) such "Arms" should embrace at least every form of long gun and hand gun that might adequately serve an infantryman, irregular, partisan, guerrillero, or résistant of the present era, including the ubiquitous automatic rifle in a military caliber, equipped with a

---

[294] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[295] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cls. 1 and 3, and § 8, cl. 3; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; art. IV, § 2, cl. 1; art. V; art. VI, cl. 3.

[296] U.S. Const. preamble.

[297] See U.S. Const. amends. I, IV, IX, and X.

[298] United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174, 178 (1939) (emphasis supplied).

detachable magazine, pistol grip, folding stock, flash suppressor, bayonet lug, and optical sights.[299]

D. The correctness of any construction informed by its consequences. Finally, in construing the Constitution with the benefit of critical hindsight, an argument from consequences should not be overlooked. Truly scientific experiments cannot be conducted within society, because the necessary "laboratory conditions" are never available. To control all but one of the variables that could affect the outcome is impossible. Therefore, the historical, as opposed to the scientific, method must be employed.[300] Practical "thought experiments", though, can be worthwhile. With respect to the Militia in particular, it is instructive to ask whether the misconstruction of the Constitution which has been applied over the years has actually worked out well, all things considered, in comparison to what might likely have happened had the quite different construction advanced in the present study been adopted. That under the former construction things have gone very badly provides evidence in favor of the latter construction.

Since the turn of the Twentieth Century,[301] Congress has treated its power "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia" as a license to leave them, as they now are, almost totally *un*organized, *un*armed, and *un*disciplined, and to substitute for the Militia "the National Guard" and "the Naval Militia", which are actually adjuncts of the regular Armed Forces.[302] And the States have completely lost sight of the constitutional fact that, because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States" with only a limited liability to "be employed in the Service of the United States",[303] the States enjoy the primary authority and labor under the primary responsibility for organizing, arming, and disciplining them. After more than a century, the disastrous results prove this neglect to have been anything but benign. Today, at every level of the federal system, America is woefully unprepared to deal effectively with hurricanes, tornados, floods, earthquakes, and other natural disasters; with major industrial accidents, such as leakages from off-shore oil-drilling rigs or meltdowns of nuclear power plants; with epidemics and pandemics; with crop failures and possibly attendant famines; with invasions through the Volkerwanderung of illegal immigration; with economic breakdowns, and in particular a collapse of this country's monetary and banking systems; and

---

[299] See post, Chapter 39.

[300] See generally Ludwig von Mises, Theory and History: An Interpretation of Social and Economic Evolution (Auburn, Alabama: Ludwig von Mises Institute, 2007).

[301] See An Act To promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, Act of 21 January 1903, CHAP. 196, § 1, 32 Stat. 775, 775; An Act For making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, Act of 3 June 1916, CHAP. 134, § 57, 39 Stat. 166, 197.

[302] See 10 U.S.C. § 311. See post, at 786-793.

[303] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 and art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16 (emphases supplied).

with the myriad threats posed by real terrorism. "[W]ell regulated Militia", however, not only could deal with the consequences of such events, but also could forefend many of them.

For a prime example, hurricanes are not unnatural occurrences that mysteriously and unpredictably arise out of nowhere, and for and from which no prevision, provision, and protection are possible. Meteorologists can usually predict with good accuracy when and where hurricanes will be born (their sources), where they will travel (their paths), how long they will last (their durations), and how destructive they may be (their effects). The various types and extent of damage hurricanes may cause in different Localities are typically foreseeable, as are the means necessary to protect against and to repair such damage. Yet, when Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans in 2005—although everyone had known it was coming, had formed a good idea of how strong it was, and without a crystal ball could have foretold its likely effects—the preparations and especially the responses from the professional "homeland-security" agencies at every level, from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to Local police departments, turned out to be abysmal.[304] Most disturbingly, although State and Local authorities (even when backed up by the National Guard) were unable to provide adequate police protection, means for the evacuation of homeless individuals from devastated areas, and emergency shelter, food, and medical treatment for displaced persons, they were quick to employ legally unjustifiable storm-trooper tactics to confiscate firearms from innocent citizens. It is impossible to imagine how New Orleans would not have been orders of magnitude better off if, years earlier, Louisiana had begun organizing in "[a] well regulated Militia" even as few as ten percent of the city's eligible citizens, with the emphasis in their training being preparation for hurricanes—and, when Katrina arrived, the Militia had excluded all other "homeland-security" agencies from the area, and assumed complete authority over preparation for the storm and the response to its aftermath.

Revealingly, the predictable yet nonetheless appalling deficiencies of "homeland-security" policies, programs, and personnel exposed in episodes such as Hurricane Katrina have never resulted in the punishment or even the discharge of any significant number of incompetents. Rather, this sorry record of shortsightedness and failure—coupled with hysterical fear-mongering by the same agencies and their touts in the mass media, aimed at convincing gullible Americans that "terrorists" lurk in every dark corner—linked with airy promises that somehow "all will be well" if only central planners in the District of Columbia are endowed with unlimited authority over "homeland security" at every level of the federal system—is now being put forward to promote the erection a National para-military police state of the ilk made forever notorious in the East-European Stalinist "people's republics" of the 1950s.

---

[304] See, e.g., Christopher Cooper and Robert Block, Disaster: Hurricane Katrina and the Failure of Homeland Security (New York, New York: Henry Holt and Company, 2006); Jed Horne, Breach of Faith: Hurricane Katrina and the Near Death of a Great American City (New York, New York: Random House Trade Paperbacks, 2008).

One need not be overly suspicious of the motives of bureaucratic central planners to conclude that the demotion of the Militia into obscurity, along with the Hollywood-style promotion of a police state staffed largely with thugs who have demonstrated little more than a bestial instinct for harassing innocent Americans, is a matter neither of mere negligence, nor even of a reckless disregard for the constitutional admonition that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State". Rather, it stems from malign, not benign, neglect—that is, a studied intent to suppress every vestige of common Americans' instinct for self-defense for the purpose of rendering impossible "the security of a free State" through their own efforts in the Militia. Suppression of the Militia suffices to make terrorism successful—not just the largely imaginary "terrorism" from foreign sources which unprepared and unprotected Americans are being conditioned to fear, but especially the real terrorism of a domestic police state about which Americans are too often uninformed to know how to prepare and protect themselves.

Thus, this "thought experiment" supports the conclusion that rogue and incompetent officials of both the General Government and the States have misinterpreted and misused their powers with respect to the Militia—and that the construction of the Constitution that allows for the Militia to be *un*organized, *un*armed, and *un*disciplined must be, not only wrong, but also vicious.

Part Two

EVIDENCE

In construing any act of legislation, whether a statute enacted by the legislature, or a constitution established by the people as the supreme law of the land, regard is to be had, not only to all parts of the act itself, and of any former act of the same law-making power, of which the act in question is an amendment; but also to the condition, and to the history, of the law as previously existing, and in the light of which the new act must be read and interpreted.

Associate Justice Horace Gray

The quotation on the preceding page is taken from Justice Gray's opinion for the Court in United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U.S. 649, 653-654 (1898).

CHAPTER TWO

The pre-constitutional Militia laws of Rhode Island and Virginia establish the principles applicable to "the Militia of the several States" in theory and practice.

Prior to their ratifications of the Constitution in 1790 and 1788, respectively, Rhode Island and Virginia had established, developed, codified, and systematically applied the principles of the Militia in their charters and statutes from the mid-1600s to the late 1700s. Although compressed overviews of this history are available,[305] for purposes of construing the Constitution only detailed analyses of the actual legislation in both of these Colonies (and then independent States) will suffice. Some of this extensive material may appear to be cumulative or even redundant; and the tedium of perusing the detailed review presented here may tax the average reader's patience. But legal-historical continuity can be established in no way other than by demonstrating it with numerous examples from throughout the period under investigation. Sapiens nihil quod probare non possit affirmat.[306] And continuity is the best evidence of importance: That decade after decade the selfsame principles were embodied in statute after statute proves how much both Rhode Islanders and Virginians considered these principles necessary for their security. On the other hand, no need exists to bring owls to Athens by extending such an historical review to the other eleven Colonies and then independent States. For precisely the same results would be had in any or all of them[307]—with the peculiar exception of Pennsylvania which, because of the political influence of pacifistic Quakers, could not enact Militia laws on the pattern prevailing elsewhere in America until 1777.{EN-27} Yet during the middle 1700s, many Pennsylvanians who were not pacifists did voluntarily "associate"—albeit without specific legal [305] For RHODE ISLAND, see James B. Whisker, The American Colonial Militia, Volume II, The New England Militia, 1606-1785 (Lewiston, New York: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1977), at 137-156. For VIRGINIA, see James B. Whisker, The American Colonial Militia, Volume V, The Colonial Militia of the Southern States, 1606-1785 (Lewiston, New York: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1997), at 5-93. Also see generally James B. Whisker, The Rise and Decline of the American Militia System (Cranbury, New Jersey: Associated University Presses, 1999), and Clayton E. Cramer, Armed America: The Remarkable Story of How and Why Guns Became as American as Apple Pie (Nashville, Tennessee: Nelson Current, 2006).

---

[306] "A wise man affirms nothing that he cannot prove."

[307] See generally The Selective Service System, Backgrounds of Selective Service, Military Obligation: The American Tradition, A Compilation of the Enactments of Compulsion From the Earliest Settlements of the Original Thirteen Colonies in 1607 Through the Articles of Confederation 1789, Special Monograph No. 1, Volume II (14 Parts) (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1947).

authority—for mutual defense in groups meant to take the place of the regular Militia which Pennsylvania's legislature refused to settle and regulate.[308]

Chapters 3 through 13 scrutinize the *pre-*constitutional Militia laws of Rhode Island, Chapters 14 through 25 the Militia laws of Virginia. Rhode Island and Virginia were selected as the exemplars, not simply because the author of this study grew up in Rhode Island and now lives in Virginia, but in particular because Rhode Island was a Northern Colony, the smallest Colony, a Colony basically "republican" in political form because her governor and council were elected officials, and of all the Colonies surely the most independent and idiosyncratic; whereas Virginia was a Southern Colony, the largest Colony, a "royal" Colony because her governor and council were appointed by the British Crown, and of all the Colonies among if not the most politically and socially conservative. That these two Colonies enacted Militia laws precisely parallel in substance demonstrates something more than mere accident at work.

Rhode Island is an appropriate place to begin because, more than any other Colony, her Militia laws should be expected to display an uniquely American nature, inasmuch as they were the products of perhaps the most intensely unregimentary of all of the Colonial peoples. As the Chief Justice of the Colony of New York, Daniel Horsmanden, wrote to the Earl of Dartmouth in 1773, > as to the Government [of Rhode Island] (if it deserves that name), it is a downright democracy; the Governor is a mere nominal one, and therefore a cipher, without power or authority; entirely controlled by the populace, elected annually, as all other magistrates and officers whatsoever.

>
> * * * * *
>
> Though by their charter, [Rhode Islanders] are inhibited from passing laws contrary to those of England, but to be as near as may be, agreeable to them, yet they seem to have paid little regard to that injunction, as may sufficiently appear upon inspection of the printed book of them; they have never transmitted them for the royal approbation nor indeed, by their charter were they obliged to do so.
>
> Under these circumstances, Your Lordship will not wonder that they are in a state of anarchy * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [I]t must be confessed, as to the people, it would require a gentleman of very extraordinary qualifications and abilities, to adventure

---

[308] See generally David E. Young, The Founders' View of the Right to Bear Arms: A Definitive History of the Second Amendment (Ontonagon, Michigan: Golden Oak Books, 2007), at 14-25. See post, at 845-848. Presumably, the same approach might be taken in a crisis today, if neither Congress nor the States properly organized, armed, disciplined, and trained the Militia. See Edwin Vieira, Jr., Constitutional "Homeland Security", Volume One, The Nation in Arms (Ashland, Ohio: BookMasters, Inc., 2007).

> upon the first arduous task, for modelling them into due subordination and decorum.[309]

Yet, at the siege of Boston immediately following the Battle of Lexington and Concord in 1775, Rhode Islanders under Nathanael Greene were considered better disciplined than any of the other Colonial forces.[310] Perhaps this should not have been surprising, the men of that Colony having theretofore been in the forefront of armed resistance to British oppression. No doubt their Militia training (and the attitudes upon which it was predicated and which it fostered) served the residents of Providence well, when on the night of 9 June 1772, under the leadership of John Brown, one of Rhode Island's "first and most respectable merchants", they set out from Sabin's Tavern to attack the British schooner Gaspée as she lay aground on Namquit Point, boarded and captured "that troublesome vessel", and burned her to the waterline, in protest against her captain's heavy-handed enforcement of the Mother Country's revenue laws.[311]

By September of 1772, an outraged King George III had offered rewards "[f]or the discovering and apprehending the persons who plundered and burnt the Gaspee schooner", and pardons to any accomplices who informed on them; had determined that "the persons concerned in * * * that daring insult, should be brought to England, to be tried"; and had established a Commission of Inquiry "to the end that [suspects] may be accordingly arrested and delivered to the custody of the commander of [the British] ships and vessels in North America".[312] This was the very first Royal court of inquisition to pry into a criminal case in the Colonies, and the first tribunal of any kind to be impressed with the duty to transport suspects and witnesses to England for trial in such a case.

Although an indentured servant—whose testimony the British coerced and embroidered—implicated John Brown, nothing came of the Commission's investigation. Nonetheless, Rhode Islanders immediately denounced these Royal directives as the very zenith of tyranny. An article by the leading patriot Stephen Hopkins (writing under the nom de plume "AMERICANUS") in the Providence Gazette of 26 December 1772 warned his countrymen

---

[309] Records of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in New England, 1636 to 1792, John R. Bartlett, Secretary of State, Editor [10 volumes, 1856-1865; 1968 reprint], Volume VII, 1770 to 1776 (Providence, Rhode Island: A. Crawford Greene, 1862), at 182-183, 184, 185.

[310] Richard M. Ketchum, Decisive Day: The Battle for Bunker Hill (New York, New York: Anchor Books, 1991), at 60. See Gerald M. Carbone, Nathanael Greene: A Biography of the American Revolution (New York, New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008), at 23-25.

[311] See THE DESTRUCTION OF THE GASPEE, in J. Bartlett, Records of the Colony of Rhode Island, ante note 309, Volume VII, at 57-192. On the Brown family's key rôle in Rhode Island's politics during this era, as well as John Brown's leadership in the Gaspée affair, see Charles Rappleye, Sons of Providence: The Brown Brothers, the Slave Trade, and the American Revolution (New York, New York: Simon & Schuster, 2006).

[312] J. Bartlett, Records of the Colony of Rhode Island, ante note 309, Volume VII, at 107-108, 104, 111.

to attend to your alarming situation.

The stamp act you opposed with a spirit and resolution becoming those who were truly solicitous to transmit to posterity those blessings which our forefathers purchased for us * * * at an immense expense of blood and treasure.

But behold, an evil infinitely worse, in its consequences, than all the revenue laws which have been passed from the reign of Charles the First, to this time, now threatens this distressed, piratically plundered country.

A court of inquisition * * * is established within this colony, to inquire into the circumstances of destroying the Gaspee * * * and * * * the commissioners * * * are directed to * * * apprehend persons * * * and * * * deliver them to Admiral Montagu, * * * to carry them to England, where they are to be tried.

* * * * *

* * * Is there an American, in whose breast there glows the smallest spark of public virtue, but who must be fired with indignation and resentment, against a measure so replete with the ruin of our free constitution? To be tried by one's peers, is the greatest privilege a subject can wish for * * * .

This establishment is the grand barrier of our lives, liberties and estates; and whoever attempts to alter or invade this fundamental principle, by which the liberties of the people have been secured from time immemorial, is a declared enemy to the welfare and happiness of the King and state. The tools of despotism and arbitrary power, have long wished that this important bulwark might be destroyed, and now have the impudence to triumph in our faces, because such of their fellow subjects in America, as are suspected of being guilty of a crime, are ordered to be transported to Great Britain for trial, in open violation of Magna Charta.

Thus we are robbed of our birth-rights, and treated with every mark of indignity, insult and contempt; and can we possibly be so supine, as not to feel ourselves firmly disposed to treat the advocates for such horrid measures with a detestation and scorn, proportionate to their perfidy and baseness?

Luxury and avarice, a more fatal and cruel scourge than war, will ere long ravage Britain and ultimately bring on the dissolution of that once happy kingdom. Ambition, and a thirst for arbitrary sway, have already banished integrity, probity and every other virtue, from those who are entrusted with the government of our mother country. Her colonies loudly complain of the violences and vexations they suffer by having their moneys taken from them, without their consent, by measures more unjustifiable than highway robbery; and applied to the basest purposes,—those of supporting tyrants and debauchees. No private house is inaccessible to the avarice of custom-house officers; no place so remote > whither the injustice and extortion of these miscreant tools in power, have not penetrated.

>
> Upon the whole, * * * it is an almost absolute certainty, that, according to the present appearances, the state of an American subject, instead of enjoying the privileges of an Englishman, will soon be infinitely worse than that of a subject of * * * the most despotic power on earth; so that, my countrymen, * * * it is your indispensable duty to stand forth in the glorious cause of freedom * * * and, with a truly Roman spirit of liberty, either prevent the fastening of the infernal chains now forging for you, and your posterity, or nobly perish in the attempt.
>
> To live a life of rational beings, is to live free; to live a life of slaves, is to die by inches. Ten thousand deaths by the halter, or the axe, are infinitely preferable to a miserable life of slavery in chains, under a pack of worse than Egyptian tyrants, whose avarice nothing less than your whole substance and income, will satisfy; and who, if they can't extort that, will glory in making a sacrifice of you and your posterity * * * .[313]

On the other side of the political controversy, the thoroughly Loyalist Governor of Massachusetts, Thomas Hutchinson, recognized that > [p]eople in this Province [that is, Massachusetts], both friends and enemies to government, are in great expectation from the late affair at Rhode Island, of the burning the King's schooner; and they consider the manner in which the news of it will be received in England, and the measures to be taken, as decisive. If it is passed over without a full inquiry and due resentment, our liberty people will think they may with impunity commit any acts of violence, be they ever so atrocious, and the friends to government will despond and give up all hopes of being able to withstand the faction.

>
> * * * If ever the government of that colony is to be reformed, this seems to be the time * * * . The denial of the supremacy of Parliament, and the contempt with which its authority has been treated by the Lilliputian Assemblies of America, can never be justified or excused * * * .[314]

> Admiral Montague says that Lord Sandwich will never leave pursuing the colony, until it is disfranchised. If [the Gaspée incident] is passed over, the other colonies will follow the example.[315]

---

[313] Id., Volume VII, at 112-113 note *. Distressingly, every contemporary patriot may be disposed to wonder how much the circumstances of the United States today conform to this indictment. Le plus ça change, le plus c'est la même chose.

[314] Id., Volume VII, at 102-103 note †.

[315] Id., Volume VII, at 103 note †.

Although denounced by his contemporaries as "Too infamous to have a friend, Too bad for bad men to commend",[316] Lord Sandwich, First Lord of the Admiralty, was indubitably prescient on this score.

For although they had brought it upon themselves, Rhode Islanders did not stand alone in this crisis, but could count on support from what Thomas Hutchinson had derided as the other "Lilliputian Assemblies of America". On 12 March 1773, Virginia's House of Burgesses[317] appointed "a standing committee of inquiry"—the members of which included such outstanding patriots as Peyton Randolph, Richard Henry Lee, Patrick Henry, and Thomas Jefferson—> whose Business it shall be to obtain the most early and authentic Intelligence of all such Acts and Resolutions of the British Parliament, or Proceedings of Administration, as may relate to or affect the British Colonies in America; and to keep up and maintain a Correspondence, and Communication, with our Sister Colonies, respecting these important Considerations[.]

In particular, the committee was instructed, > without Delay, [to] inform themselves particularly of the Principles and Authority on which was constituted a Court of Enquiry * * * in Rhode Island, with Powers to transport Persons suspected of Offences committed in America, to Places beyond the Seas to be tried.

And the House of Burgesses requested "the different Assemblies of the British Colonies * * * to appoint some Person, or Persons * * * to communicate from Time to Time with the * * * Committee".[318]

---

[316] Quoted in The American Heritage Book of the Revolution (New York, New York: American Heritage Publishing Company, Inc., 1958), at 276.

[317] Virginia's Colonial Government was patterned on Britain's King in Parliament, and consisted of an executive branch, the Governor, and a legislative branch, the General Assembly, itself composed of the Governor's Council (an "upper house") and the House of Burgesses (a "lower house").

[318] JOURNALS of the HOUSE of BURGESSES of VIRGINIA, 1773-1776, Including the records of the Committee of Correspondence, John P. Kennedy, Editor (Richmond, Virginia: Library Board of the Virginia State Library, 1905), at 39. Also in J.R. Bartlett, Records of the Colony of Rhode Island, ante note 309, Volume VII, at 226-227. Virginia's concern was not of only then-recent coinage, as three years earlier she had recognized the grave danger posed by what the King later proposed to do to Rhode Islanders. Resolve of the House of Burgesses, Passed the 16th of May, 1769, reprinted in Revolutionary Virginia: The Road to Independence, Robert L. Scribner, Editor (The University Press of Virginia: Virginia Independence Bicentennial Commission, 10 Volumes, 1973-1983), Volume I, at 70: "Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That all Trials for Treason, Misprison of Treason, or for any Felony or Crime whatsoever, committed and done in this his Majesty's said Colony and Dominion, by any Person or Persons residing therein, ought of Right to be had and conducted in and before his Majesty's Courts, held within the said Colony, according to the fixed and known Course of Proceeding; and that the seizing any Person or Persons residing in this Colony, suspected of any Crime whatsoever, committed therein, and sending such Person or Persons to Places beyond the Sea to be tried, is highly derogatory of the Rights of

In response to this request, beginning with Rhode Island, all of the Colonies then established Committees of Correspondence, the work of which aroused and unified Americans in opposition to Britain's suppression of their liberties.[319] Indeed, the Committees of Correspondence were of critical importance in the formation of the Continental Congress.[320] For example, as Thomas Cushing, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Province of Massachusetts Bay, observed in response to Virginia's call,

> [t]hat there has been long a settled Plan to subvert the Political Constitutions of these Colonies and to introduce arbitrary Power, cannot in the opinion of this House admit of Doubt.
>
> Those who have aimed to enslave us, like a Band of brothers, have ever been united in their Councils and their Conduct. To this they owe their Success. Are they not in this Regard worthy Imitation? Here it is praise worthy to be instructed even by an Enemy.
>
> The Object which the Conspirators against our Rights seem of late to have had much in View, has been either to lull the Colonies into a State of Profound Sleep and Security, which is forever the Forerunner of Slavery; or to foment Divisions among them. How necessary then, how important is it to counteract and defeat them in this fatal Design? To awaken and fix the Attention of all to the Common Danger—to open & maintain an uninterrupted Intercourse among the Colonies, that all may be fully apprised of the true State and Circumstances of each, and that the Councils of the whole may be united in some effectual Measures for restoring the Publik Liberty.[321]

Little more than two years later, Massachusetts Militiamen routed British regulars at the Battle of Lexington and Concord. It was not accidental that, in defense of Americans' freedoms, Militiamen were the first to act. For they were on the scene—organized, armed, disciplined, trained, governed, and motivated by the highest sentiments of patriotism. Indeed, it was the Militia's immediate availability as the crisis arose—their ubiquity throughout New England—that strikingly proved the truth of the Second Amendment's declaration that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State". No other organization available to Americans at that time could have sufficed.

British Subjects".

[319] See J. Bartlett, Records of the Colony of Rhode Island, ante note 309, Volume VII, at 227-239. Among the first seven members of Rhode Island's Committee of Correspondence was Moses Brown, the brother of John Brown. See id. at 228. In 1784, Moses Brown founded a school (now known as Moses Brown School and located in Providence, Rhode Island), which the author of the present study attended.

[320] David Ammerman, In the Common Cause: American Response to the Coercive Acts of 1774 (Charlottesville, Virginia: University Press of Virginia, 1974), at 20-23.

[321] Letter of 3 June 1773, in JOURNALS of the HOUSE of BURGESSES of VIRGINIA, ante note 318, at 50. Also reprinted in R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume II, at 31.

This ubiquity, too, was not accidental, but the consequence of a system that took form in the 1600s and continued, fundamentally unchanged, throughout the entire *pre-*constitutional period. The architectonic principles of this system define the term "Militia" in both the original Constitution and the Second Amendment. Chapters 3 through 26 of this study lay out the copious evidence from which these principles can be drawn; and Chapters 27 through 44 summarize these principles as they should apply today. Chapters 45 and 46 then employ this evidence to construe the Second Amendment. And Chapters 47 through 50 apply these lessons to America's present and future plight.

CHAPTER THREE

Rhode Island founded her pre-constitutional Militia on society's right of self-preservation in "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God".

From Rhode Island's very beginning, provision of her "homeland security" was the legal duty of every able-bodied adult free male.[322] The immediate and especially the ultimate sources of this duty were never in doubt.

A. Rhode Island's Charter. In the Colony's first "constitution", the Charter of 1663, King Charles II

> G[a]ve and Grant[ed] unto the * * * Governour and Company [of the Colony] * * * THAT it shall and may be Lawful to and for the said Governour * * * to Nominate, Appoint & Constitute such and so many Commanders, Governours, and Millitary Officers as to them shall seem Requisite for the Leading, Conducting and Training up the Inhabitants of said Plantations in Martial Affairs; & for the Defence and Safeguard of the said Plantations: AND that it shall and may be Lawful, to and for all and every such Commander, Governour and Millitary Officers * * * and Major part of the Freemen of the said Company * * * To Assemble, Exercise in Arms, Martial Array, and put in Warlike Posture the Inhabitants of said Colony for their special Defence and Safety; AND to Lead and Conduct the said Inhabitants, and to Encounter, Expulse, Expel and Resist by force of Arms, as well by Sea as by Land; and also to Kill, Slay and Destroy by all fitting ways, Enterprizes and means whatsoever, all and every such Person and Persons, as shall at any time hereafter Attempt or Enterprize the Destruction, Invasion, Detriment or Annoyance of the said Inhabitants or Plantations * * * .{EN-28}

The Charter's delegation of authority to the "Govenour and Company" was in keeping with the King's exercise of his "sole supreme government and command of the militia", both in England in practice and in her American Colonies in principle.[323] And the King's mandate "To Assemble, Exercise in Arms, * * * and put in Warlike Posture" the "Major part of the Freeman" was necessitated by the Colony's remoteness from England and its sparse population of settlers.

---

[322] See post, Chapter 5.

[323] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 262.

B. "[T]he Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". The principle of an universal legal duty persisted, however, even after the Colonists began enacting their own legislation, and then set off on the path that would separate them entirely from the Crown. In that most perilous of times, just before and through the War of Independence, Rhode Islanders still, perhaps especially, knew that "the Preservation of this Colony, in Time of War, depends, under God, upon the military Skill and Discipline of the Inhabitants".{EN-29} And the continuity of this principle over so many decades proves that the basis for Rhode Island's power to require her inhabitants to serve in a Militia, and their corresponding duty to do so, was understood by all as transcending mere Royal prerogative or the positive laws of even popular, representative legislatures.

Rather, both the Colony's legal power and her inhabitants' corresponding duty found their geneses and justifications in the realization that "every Principle, divine and human, require us to obey that great and fundamental Law of Nature, Self-Preservation".{EN-30} This was the law of which Locke had taught that "the Society can never, by the fault of another, lose the Native and Original Right it has to preserve it self".[324] It was the law Blackstone described as "justly called the primary law of nature, so it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[325] It was foremost among "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" that the Declaration of Independence invoked for the right of Rhode Island and her sister Colonies "to assume among the powers of the earth" a "separate and equal station"—certainly (i) the necessary means to secure the right to "Life", which the Declaration identified as first among those "certain unalienable Rights" with which "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator", and (ii) among the "just powers [derived] from the consent of the governed" that "Governments" may and should exercise "to secure these rights". And, operating perforce of and through the Declaration, it was the right upon which the authority, power, and permanence of the Constitution would thereafter rest, encapsulated in the Second Amendment's precept that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", and echoed in the preamble of a then-contemporary Rhode Island Militia Act, that "the Security and Defence of all free States essentially depend, under God, upon the Exertions of a well regulated Militia".{EN-31}

C. The absolute necessity of the Militia. But because "that great and fundamental Law of Nature", "the Native and Original Right" of self-preservation, is the foundational norm of society, can never be lost by society, and cannot be "taken away by the law of society" from a single innocent individual, then also its enforcement on society's behalf cannot be denied, flouted, shirked, or evaded by any individuals living within society, whether private citizens or public officials. So, being establishments that derive their existence from the collective right of self-preservation in "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", the Militia were not simply expedient, but absolutely necessary. For, as Blackstone observed in reference to England's militia, "[t]his is the constitutional security, which our laws have provided for the public peace, and for protecting the realm against foreign or domestic violence; and which the statutes [of Parliament] declare is essentially necessary to the safety and prosperity of the kingdom".[326]

---

[324] Two Treatises of Government, ante note 53, Book II, Chapter XIX, § 220.

[325] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

D. The primacy of social duty over individual right. Rhode Islanders of the founding era knew that, as invoked by society, "th[e] great and fundamental Law of Nature" compels a near-universal duty of service and sacrifice (even if not a strict equality thereof) among all those who constitute society and who benefit from their membership in it. So they held that:

> WHEREAS the preservation of this State and the maintenance of its liberties, at all times depend, under God, in a great measure, upon an acquaintance with military discipline * * * it becomes the indispensable duty of every American citizen, to place himself in a situation where he can be useful in repelling the attacks of its enemies.{EN-32}

Rhode Islanders appreciated that none of their fellow citizens should be suffered to claim an individual right to "avoid[ ] contributing their equal and necessary proportion for the defence of our rights, privileges and estates * * * from which they do, and will, derive, in all respects, equal benefit and protection with other subjects of this state, not exempted from personal military service".{EN-33} Quite the contrary: Rhode Islanders asserted that, "all Countries have a Right to the personal service of [their] Inhabitants, the greatest Exertions of whom, in their different Capacities, are especially requisite for the Defence and Protection of their Lives, Liberties and Properties, during the actual Invasion of Enemies". Therefore, "a Refusal or withdrawing" of personal service in times of public danger stands squarely "against the Rights of human Society", no less than "being voluntarily adherent to public Enemies, by giving them Aid or Comfort, or the seeking of their Protection, [which] amount to a total Renunciation of all former Rights, Privileges and Inheritances whatever". So, to Rhode Islanders, those who shirked their duty to provide personal service for their society's protection were no better than those "who * * * hath withdrawn * * * into Parts and Places under the acknowledged Authority and Dominion of the[ir country's enemies]"—and who on that account "shall be held, taken, deemed and judged to have voluntarily renounced all civil and political relation to each and every of the * * * United States, and be considered as an Alien".{EN-34}

---

[326] Id., Volume 1, at 412 (footnote omitted) (emphasis supplied).

CHAPTER FOUR

Rhode Island's pre-constitutional Militia was an institution of popular self-government, not in any sense a private establishment.

In Rhode Island, as in all the other Colonies (and later, independent States), the Militia were always integral parts of the communities' governmental structures.

The Militia were the institutions in and through the operation of which most Rhode Islanders, as well as the citizens of other Colonies and then independent States, developed "an acquaintance with military discipline" through their own personal service. Such establishments—a refusal to serve in which in times of extreme public danger could be tantamount to treason,[327] and thereby made the basis for reducing an individual from a citizen to an alien—were certainly not in any sense private organizations, or organizations with which some individuals might simply refuse to affiliate, or the authority of which they might refuse to acknowledge, for reasons sufficient unto themselves alone. Rather, from the beginning (as Rhode Island's Charter evidences),[328] all of her Militia units were raised, organized, trained, and operated exclusively under governmental auspices, authorization, supervision, direction, and control. Moreover, they were not simply the products of governmental action—as might be the behavior of private parties subject to governmental regulations, yet for all that still remaining private—but were actually institutions of government, through and through. And, even more than that, institutions of self*-government*.

A. The legislature in ultimate control. As was typical in other Colonies too, Rhode Island's Colonial Governors were the local commanders in chief of her Militia—in keeping with their positions as the chief executive appointees of the King, whose "undoubted right" under British law was "the sole supreme government and command of the militia, within all his majesty's realms and dominions".[329] This, however, did not subject the Militia to some "Leader Principle" of a traditionally monarchical, let alone a modern dictatorial, cast. To the contrary: From the very beginning in the late 1600s, the rule was that "there be power by the Charter with

---

[327] Compare ante, at 97-98 with U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1: "Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort."

[328] See ante, at 95.

[329] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 262-263.

the Generall Assembly, or in the intervalls of the Generall Assemblys, then with the Governor and Counsell, * * * in extraordinary cases to take care of and order the malitia * * * for defence and safetye of the whole Collony"{EN-35}—so that the Governors were empowered to act on their own recognizance only "when the Generall Assembly shall not be sitting, to constitute Commanders and military officers, for settling, conducting, and training up the inhabitants in martial affairs, * * * and to exercise and put in warlike posture, lead and conduct the inhabitants for the defence and safety of the Plantations".{EN-36} And throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, the General Assembly did not simply delegate sweeping authority to the Governor, or to some other high-ranking Militia officer (such as an Adjutant General), to determine whether, when, and how the Militia should be organized, armed, and disciplined.

B. "Settling" and "regulating" the Militia. As will be detailed further on in this book, through numerous, comprehensive statutes Rhode Island's legislators themselves first "settled the Militia"—for example, by designating which Towns should raise what were called "train'd Band[s] of Foot Soldiers" and "Troop[s] of Horse". Then they "regulated the Militia"—for example, by specifying what equipment Militiamen should procure; how individuals not called to train or otherwise serve on a regular basis in the "Band[s]" and "Troops" should participate in the Militia; who among otherwise eligible residents might be exempted from some types of Militia service; how infractions of Militia regulations were to be punished; and so on.

The distinction between "settling" and "regulating" the Militia is no mere linguistic quibble, but has significant legal consequences. In the common usage of *pre-*constitutional times, as well as today, "settling" or to become "settled" meant establishing or being established in the first instance: namely, "[t]o place in a fixed or permanent condition"—"to establish; to fix"—or "[t]o become fixed or permanent", "to assume a lasting form, condition, [or] direction * * * in place of a temporary or changing state".[330] Indeed, Samuel Johnson defined "settle" as "[t]o establish" and "[t]o fix unalienably by legal sanctions"[331]—and in his entries for "militia" even provided a specific example of such usage: "The militia was so settled by law, that a sudden army could be drawn together."[332] Thus, when the original [330] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1318, definition 1 (transitive verb) and definition 1 (intransitive verb). Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 2, at 2751, definitions 4.c., 4.f., and 6, and at 2752, definition 31; Webster's New International Dictionary of the English Language, Second Edition, Unabridged (Springfield, Massachusetts: G. & C. Merriam Company, 1954), at 2293, definition 12; Webster's Third New International Dictionary of the English Language (Springfield, Massachusetts: G. & C. Merriam Company, 1971), at 2079, definition 6a.

---

[331] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 4 and 9 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[332] Id., in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

Constitution incorporated "the Militia of the several States" into its federal system, and the Second Amendment declared that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State", they "settled" the Militia once and for all by "fix[ing them] unalienably by legal sanctions" within America's governmental structure. Distinguishably, during pre-constitutional times, "to regulate" meant (and still means) to arrange an already established (or "settled") institution in proper order according to some standard: namely,"[t]o adjust by rule or method" and "[t]o direct";[333] "to direct by rule or restriction" and "to subject to governing principles or laws"; "[t]o put in good order"; and "[t]o adjust, or maintain, with respect to a desired * * * condition".[334]

Thus, a statute of 1746, entitled "An ACT for settling the Militia of the Towns of Bristol, Tiverton, Little-Compton, Warren, and Cumberland", provided that > there shall be one train'd Band of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Bristol, and two train'd Bands of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Tiverton, and one train'd Band of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Little-Compton, and one train'd Band of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Warren, and one train'd Band of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Cumberland. And that one Troop of Horse be raised in the County of Newport: And that so many of those in the Towns of Tiverton and Little-Compton, who are properly equipt for Troopers, and desire to continue so, be Part of said Troop of Horse{EN-37} —thereby establishing those particular Militia units for the first time. To the same effect, a statute of 1719, entitled "An Act for the Establishing of Watches throughout this Colony, both in Time of War and Peace", provided "[t]hat the Town Council of each * * * Town in this Colony, Be Authorized and Impowered, to appoint, Settle and Order a Military Watch in Time of War * * * of such Number of Persons as they think proper", and "[t]hat each * * * Town Council * * * be * * * fully Impowered to appoint and Settle all Watches in Time of Peace".{EN-38} And a statute of 1742, entitled "An ACT for the more effectual Establishing a Military Watch in Time of War, throughout this Colony", stipulated "[t]hat any Five of the Members of the Council of War * * * shall * * * settle all Watches and Wards in Time of War".{EN-39} Whereas, in contrast, other statutes described themselves as "regulating" Rhode Island's Militia—which was already "settled"—by specifying the details of its composition, structure, discipline, equipment, training, and deployment.[335]

---

[333] Id., definitions 1 and 2, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[334] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1211, definitions 1, 2, and 3. Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 2, at 2473, definitions 1., 1.b., and 2.

[335] See ante, at 70-71.

So, when the Second Amendment to the Constitution declares that "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State",[336] it presumes that such a Militia is already, and always will be, "settled". When the Constitution refers to "the Militia of the several States",[337] it presumes that Militia are already, and always will be, "settled" within, by, and under the jurisdiction of each of "the several States"—and under the ultimate control of WE THE PEOPLE in those States who enjoy "the right * * * to keep and bear Arms"—not as a single "Militia of the United States" (for which the Constitution nowhere provides). And when the original Constitution empowers Congress "[t]o provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia",[338] it delegates the authority simply for "regulating", not for "settling", the Militia already in existence—that is, "the Militia of the several States". This, in contrast to Congress's powers "[t]o raise and support Armies" and [t]o provide and maintain a Navy",[339] powers cognate to which the Constitution prohibits the States from exercising "without the Consent of Congress * * * in time of Peace".[340] In 1788, WE THE PEOPLE saw no need to empower Congress to "settle" the Militia, because the Militia were already "settled" by and within each of "the several States", and had been "settled" under Colonial and State laws for generations—and, under the Articles of Confederation, "every state" was then required "always [to] keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred".[341] Moreover, WE THE PEOPLE intended the Militia to remain separate establishments "of the several States", just as they always had been and at that time still were. It sufficed, then, solely to empower Congress to "regulate" the Militia for the purpose of inducing reasonable uniformity in their "organiz[ation], arm[s], and disciplin[e]" for certain purposes. Whereas, inasmuch as the States were to be prohibited from establishing their own armies ("Troops") and navies ("Ships of War") "in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress", Congress had to be delegated the unique authority to "settle" ("raise" and "provide") those institutions in the first instance—either by its own actions or through its approval of actions by the States—or else "Armies" and "a Navy" of the United States could not have come into existence at all.

C Delegation of authority to Local governments. Reflecting the fundamentally Local foundations of the Militia, throughout the *pre-*constitutional period Rhode Island's General Assembly delegated extensive authority to the Colony's Towns. At various times, the Towns were empowered to: supervise the

---

[336] Emphasis supplied.

[337] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (emphasis supplied).

[338] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16 (emphasis supplied).

[339] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13 (emphasis supplied).

[340] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[341] Arts. of Confed'n art. VI, ¶ 4.

selection of Militia officers;{EN-40} regulate the authority of Militia officers;{EN-41} designate the days for and regimens of training;{EN-42} judge individuals' compliance with Militia regulations;{EN-43} pass on the sufficiency of firearms for Militia purposes;{EN-44} arrange for inspections and inventories of firearms and ammunition in private hands;{EN-45} see to it that firearms in individuals' personal possession were kept in good repair;{EN-46} ascertain whether individuals had the financial wherewithal to purchase their own firearms and ammunition;{EN-47} provide firearms and ammunition to the poor;{EN-48} determine who was physically able to serve in the Militia's "Alarm List";{EN-49} draft individuals into military service;{EN-50} procure substitutes for men who defaulted on their military duty;{EN-51} establish "watches" in times of peace and war;{EN-52} and maintain magazines for firearms, gunpowder, and shot.{EN-53}

D. Participation by the people themselves. Evidencing the fundamentally democratic character of an institution in which every able-bodied adult free male participated, common Rhode Islanders, too, often enjoyed a direct and significant say in what went on in their Militia.

First, they could always petition the General Assembly to authorize the formation of regular Militia "Companies" in their Towns;{EN-54} to divide an existing overly large Company into two or more smaller Companies;{EN-55} or even to approve the formation of so-called "Independent Companies" that to a great degree organized, armed, disciplined, and trained themselves separate from the Militia's regular establishment.[342]

Second, in the earliest days, Rhode Islanders were empowered to select their own Militia officers by and from amongst themselves, subject to the approval of public officials in the various Towns or in the General Assembly. For example—

> • [1639] "It is ordered and agreed upon, that the Body of the people, viz.: the Traine Band shall have free libertie to select and chuse such persons, one or more from among themselves, as they would have to be officers among them; to exercise and traine them; and then to present them to the Magistrates for their approbation".{EN-56}

> • [1642] "[T]he officers for militarie affairs, [namely] Captains, Leiftenants, Ensigns, Sarjeants and Clarks shall be dewlie chosen every yeare at y^{e} Generall Courte of Election; and that also the officers of each Band shall be chosen within themselves or limitts (and not officers) to be chosen one band out of another Towne or Band; and further that their Powre shall be ordered from time to time by the Towne" .{EN-57}

Sometimes this process was open to all the inhabitants of suitable age in each Town:

---

[342] On the last-mentioned point, see post, at 224-234.

• [1647] "It is ordered, that all y^e^ Inhabitants in each Towne shall choose their Military Officers from among themselves".{EN-58}

• [1665] "And as for choosing the Captaine and other millitary officers, every one that is eighteene yeares old or more, and hath taken the oath or engagement of alegiance, shall vote if they please therein, though not freemen, intending only the officers soe chosen are only for the military exercise of training".{EN-59}

• [1677] "This Court * * * findinge that his Majesty * * * hath required that the inhabitants of his Collony are to be led, conducted and trained up in martiall affaires, doe * * * order * * * that the inhabitants of every respective towne within this Collony, shall * * * have their free choyce or election of their millitary commanders and officers; and that yearly * * * . And that [a public official] * * * shall give forth warrant * * * to warne the inhabitants to assemble in armes * * * to make choyce and elect their commanders and millitary officers. And that for the future * * * the Captaine * * * of the respective Traine Bands, shall give forth warrant * * * to warne and require the inhabitants yearely * * * to assemble in armes and elect their respective commanders and millitary officers for the exercisinge of the people in martiall affaires in each * * * towne."{EN-60}

• [1699, 1701, and 1705] "[T]hose who shall list themselves under the command of the respective Train Bands, * * * are ordered to give in their names to [certain officers] * * * ; so that when they find there is a suitable number, not exceeding fifty persons for each troop, the said persons so listing themselves, may have liberty to make choice of their own commander".{EN-61}

Otherwise, the procedure might be limited, such that solely "Freemen"were eligible to stand for election, or to vote:

• [1641]"[T]he Traine Bands shall choose among the Freemen, one or more such as shall be for their commanders, and present them to the Towne. The Major vote of the Towne, by the Authority of this Court, shall have the negative voice for the Establishment of them, and shall order their Powre till the next Generall Courte".{EN-62}

• [1705] "This Assembly having taken into their consideration the great inconveniences and dishonor it brings to the Collony in admitting the listed soldiery of each Train Band in this Collony to make choice of their commissioned officers, by which sundry listed soldiers being transient persons, and many youth of small consideration, persons are chosen to office that is not honorable to her Majesty nor capable of serving * * * in the office they are chosen unto:

"Therefore be it enacted * * * That * * * no person shall have any vote in any Train Band of soldiers in this Collony for commissioned > officers * * * but such as are freemen of the respective towns they live in, or freemen of the Collony".{EN-63}

In that era, to qualify as a "Freeman" a man was required to satisfy religious, economic, and political tests. For example, a statute in 1663 decreed that > all Men Professing Christianity, and of competent Estates, and of Civil Conversation, who acknowledge, and are Obedient to the Civil Magistrate, though of different Judgments in Religious Affairs (Roman Catholicks only excepted) shall be admitted Free-men, And shall have Liberty to Chuse and be Chosen Officers in the Colony both Millitary and Civil.{EN-64}

And a statute in 1729 mandated that "no Person whatsoever shall be admitted a Freeman of any town in this Colony, unless the Person * * * be a Freeholder of Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments * * * to the Value of Two Hundred Pounds, or Ten Pounds per Annum, or the eldest Son of such a Free holder".{EN-65} Today, of course, any such religious test would be plainly unconstitutional.[343] And insofar as conditioning the right to vote "on the basis of wealth or property" violates the principle of "equal protection of the laws",[344] even when voting is constitutionally protected and morally obligatory but not legally mandatory, conditioning performance of the constitutional duty (as well as right) to serve in the Militia "on the basis of wealth or property" would be no less violative of that principle.[345]

Even for "Freemen", however, Rhode Island's Militia was not a purely democratic institution. For the General Assembly early took upon itself the selection of Militia officers. In 1713, it decreed that an Act passed in 1677, > empowering the inhabitants of each respective town in the colony to choose or elect their commissioned officers for the militia * * * shall be * * * repealed, made null and void, and of none effect; and all other * * *

---

[343] See U.S. Const. amend. I and amend. XIV, § 1. See Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 494-495 (1961).

[344] See U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1, as applied in Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663, 668 (1966).

[345] The two previous footnotes cite the Fourteenth Amendment and judicial decisions applying it. Admittedly, the validity of the ratifications of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments has been, and in some circles remains, a matter of historical, political, and legal controversy. For the sake of simplicity, the constitutionality of these Amendments will be accepted arguendo here, because: (i) The arguments against their ratifications are certainly not open and shut. (ii) Its seems highly unlikely than any argument will prevail against the historical record that for over a century and a half those Amendments have been accepted as having been properly ratified. (iii) The vast majority of legal scholars, jurists, and other public officials, and for that matter most common Americans who think about the subject at all, treat those Amendments as legitimate—so that any discussion of the Constitution that does not do so will tend to confuse them even more than they are already confused. And to no evident purpose will such confusion be exacerbated, inasmuch as (iv) the meaning and application of the Militia Clauses of the original Constitution and the Second Amendment do not depend in any way upon the validity vel non of those Amendments.

> acts, ordinances or customs in this colony, that may in any wise further tend to the same.
>
> And further, * * * for the future, all and every the commissioned officers, for the militia of this colony, shall be nominated, appointed, chosen and elected by the Governor, general council and Assembly * * * annually, pursuant and according to our charter[.]{EN-66}

In 1714, however, this statute was repealed, eliciting a remonstrance from the Governor and others:

> There being a vote of [the General] Assembly, passed for the repealing a late act, wherein the choice of the militia officers was vested in the General Assembly, according to the express words of the charter, and that for the future the military officers shall be elected or chosen by the freemen of each respective company within said colony;—
>
> We * * * are of opinion * * * that the investing of the freemen of each company with the choice of the militia officers, is repugnant to the express words of the charter, and highly dishonorable to the crown and dignity of Her Majesty * * * —the prerogative of the militia being wholly and solely vested in the crown, and by the crown, in the General Assembly of this colony[.]{EN-67}

On the prerogative of the King, of course, the Governor was quite correct.[346] So, too, on the delegation of authority over the Militia "in time of peace" from the King to the Governor of the Colony.{EN-68} Perhaps not surprisingly, then, in 1718, 1730, and 1744 the law stipulated that:

> the Militia of this Government be * * * Divided into two Regiments * * * each of which Regiments shall be Govern'd, Guided and Led by one Colonel, one Lieutenant Colonel, and one Major, which shall be Annually Chosen * * * by the General Assembly * * * ; and that each Company or Trained Band in each of the aforesaid Regiments, shall be Guided, Conducted and Led by one Captain, one Lieutenant, and one Ensign; the which shall annually be Elected and Chosen by the General Assembly * * * : And if any * * * Commission Officer Chosen as aforesaid, shall refuse to Serve in such Office, * * * or shall happen to Die; that then * * * it shall and may be lawful for the Governour, or in his absence, for the Deputy Governour, by and with the consent of the General Council, at any time when the General Assembly shall not be Sitting, to chuse and appoint * * * Officers to Serve in the room and stead of those that shall refuse or Die[.]{EN-69}

---

[346] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 262-263.

In 1726, however, the General Assembly, > being advised that through the dissatisfaction and discontent of His Majesty's good subjects in the choice and election of commissioned officers, to lead and conduct them, * * * the militia is of late visibly declining, not only to the scandal and reproach of the government, but also to the imminent danger thereof * * * should it be invaded or assaulted by a common enemy;—

>
> Be it * * * enacted, that the several or respective companies or trained bands of, and within this colony, shall * * * meet together under military arms, at their usual place of meeting, * * * with the freemen within the limits of each band, and * * * shall nominate and elect a captain, lieutenant and ensign of their respective bands, with the inferior or under officers (as shall be well qualified) to be their commanders; and that such as shall be then nominated and elected by a majority of voices or votes * * * by the Governor and council to be approbated and confirmed; without the Governor and council shall see just cause to reject or disapprove of any one or more of them; in which case, the council shall elect another or others * * * .
>
> And it is further enacted * * * that for the better encouragement of the commissioned and other officers of each band, to accouter and inform themselves of the military art and discipline, that such as shall be elected and approved * * * shall continue in their respective offices for the term of three years[.]{EN-70}

But in 1740, the General Assembly once again mandated that the earlier allowance "empowering the Freemen and Soldiers choosing their Military Officers * * * is hereby repealed", and "for the Future, the General Assembly * * * [will] choose and elect the Military Officers in this Government".{EN-71}

Yet, although this was the procedure then followed through the late 1700s,{EN-72} the Militia was not entirely hierarchic and subject to exclusively "top-down" control. For the practice by which Local Militia Companies at least nominated their own commanders still persisted. In 1780, for instance, > it [wa]s represented to th[e General] Assembly, that the Inhabitants of the Towns of Newport and Portsmouth are desirous of associating for the Defence thereof against the Enemies of this and the United States: It is therefore Voted and Resolved, That the said Inhabitants be, and they are hereby empowered, to associate for the Defence of the said Towns; to form themselves into Companies, and to nominate the necessary Officers, who being returned to and approved by * * * the Governor, shall be commissioned accordingly.{EN-73}

And usages of that type continued after the Constitution was ratified.{EN-74} In addition, Rhode Island's Independent Companies of Militia always selected their own officers—as well as their own members.[347]

If the procedure of exclusive and complete Local selection or at least nomination of officers might not today be constitutionally required perforce of these traditions, it assuredly would be constitutionally recommended, inasmuch as "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State"[348]—and in "a free State" as much decision-making power as possible is lodged in common people's hands.

E. The Militia an unique governmental institution. As the foregoing should make clear, in Rhode Island as well as in the other Colonies and then independent States, the Militia were "settled"—that is, established in the first instance—and then "regulated"—that is, provided with and administered according to standards and procedures for their day-to-day conduct—by statutes and as institutions part of yet quite distinct from other components of those Colonies' and States' governments.

1. Not the product of "common law". Contrary to a belief enjoying some unwarranted currency among naive patriots today, *no pre-*constitutional Militia ever derived its authority from "common law", in the strict sense in which American legal history and the Constitution itself employ that term.[349] (Except, of course, insofar as a statute which applied in common to all members of the community on an equal basis was thereby an example of "common law".) As Blackstone explained, "the common law, or lex non scripta,[350] of this kingdom [that is, England]", > properly so called * * * is that law, by which proceedings and determinations in the king's ordinary courts of justice are guided and directed. This, for the most part, settles the course in which lands descend by inheritance: the manner and form of acquiring and transferring property; the solemnities and obligations of contracts; the rules of expounding wills, deeds, and acts of parliament; the respective remedies of civil injuries; the several species of temporal offences, with the manner and degree of punishment; and an infinite number of minuter particulars, which diffuse themselves as extensively as the ordinary distribution of common justice requires * * * —all these are doctrines that are not set

---

[347] See post, at 226-228.

[348] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied).

[349] See U.S. Const. amend. VII.

[350] "The unwritten law." This is something of a self-contradictory appellation, though, because "the common law" was often "written" in reports of judicial decisions, without which records it could hardly have been generally or reliably known at all.

> down in any written statute or ordinance, but depend upon immemorial usage, that is upon common law, for their support.[351]

Revealingly, Blackstone did not include within this litany any matter relating to "militia", because English "common law"—the lex non scripta—did not extend to that subject.

Even had English "common law" in the very broadest sense—that is, the law "common" throughout the Realm because it embodied "[g]eneral customs; which are the universal rule of the whole kingdom",[352] as well as Parliamentary statutes—controlled the Mother Country's militia on her own soil, the entirety of that law was never transplanted to and imposed upon the Colonies. As Blackstone observed, even in principle, in > our most distant plantations in America, * * * colonists carry with them only so much of the English law, as is applicable to their own situation * * * . The artificial refinements and distinctions incident to the property of a great and commercial people, laws of police and revenue, (such especially as are enforced by penalties), the mode of maintenance for the established clergy, the jurisdiction of spiritual courts, and a multitude of other provisions, are neither necessary nor convenient for them, and therefore are not in force. What shall be admitted and what rejected, at what times, and under what restrictions must * * * be decided in the first instance by their own provincial judicature, subject to the revision and control of the king in council * * * . And therefore the common law of England, as such, has no allowance or authority there; they being no part of the mother country, but distinct (though dependent) dominions.[353]

This position was early adopted in Rhode Island, when in 1700 her General Assembly decreed "[t]hat in all Actions, Matters, Causes and Things whatsoever, where no particular Law of this Colony is made to Decide and Determine the same; that then and in all such Cases the Laws of England shall be put in Force, to Issue, Determine and Decide the same".{EN-75} Then, in 1749, the General Assembly finally appointed "a Committee to prepare a Bill for introducing into this Colony, such of the statutes of England, as are agreeable to the Constitution"; the Committee prepared a short list of the statutes "which * * * have heretofore been, and still ought to be in Force in this Colony"; and the General Assembly "Resolved, That all and every of th[os]e Statutes * * * shall be in full Force * * * until the General Assembly shall order otherwise".{EN-76}

---

[351] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 67-68.

[352] Id., Volume 1, at 67.

[353] Id., Volume 1, at 106-107.

The same position was adopted even earlier in Virginia, when her General Assembly in 1662 declared with careful distinction that it had "endeavoured in all things (as neere as the capacity and constitution of this country would admitt) to addhere to those excellent and often refined laws of England, to which we profess and acknowledge all due obedience and reverence".{EN-77} And it was reasserted by Virginia's revolutionary Convention in 1776, which declared

> [t]hat the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of king James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by the legislative power this colony.{EN-78}

Moreover, in practice, throughout the pre-constitutional era, both Virginia and the New England Colonies not infrequently rejected, in whole or in part, various rules of the English "common law".[354]

In any event, although "common", English "common law" was never supreme and unchangeable, but could always be overridden by what Blackstone called > the leges scriptae, the written laws of the kingdom; which are statutes, acts, or edicts, made by the king's majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in parliament assembled.[355]

>
> STATUTES * * * are either *declarator*y of the common law or remedial of some defects therein. Declaratory, where the old custom of the kingdom is almost fallen into disuse, or become disputable * * * . Remedial statutes are those which are made to supply such defects, and abridge such superfluities, in the common law, as arise either from the general imperfection of all human laws, from change of time and circumstances, from the mistakes and unadvised determinations of unlearned judges, or from any other cause whatsoever.[356] [And,] [354] See, e.g., Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 60-65 (1932) (rejecting for purposes of American constitutional law the old English rule that denied a defendant a right to counsel in a criminal case). See generally William E. Nelson, The Common Law in Colonial America, Volume I, The Chesapeake and New England, 1607-1660 (New York, New York: Oxford University Press, 2008).

---

[355] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 85 (footnote omitted).

[356] Id., Volume 1, at 86.

> * * * WHERE the common law and a statute differ, the common law gives place to the statute * * * .[357]

Decisively, at the time of the first settlement of the American Colonies, no one could have doubted that in England the militia laws derived from exercises of the Royal prerogative and Parliamentary statutes, not from the lex non scripta of "common law". As Blackstone recounted the relevant history, > the statute of Winchester obliged every man, according to his estate and degree, to provide a determinate quantity of such arms as were then in use, in order to keep the peace: and constables were appointed * * * to see that such arms were provided.[358] These weapons were changed, by * * * [another] statute * * * into others of more modern service; but both this and the former provision were repealed in the reign of James I. While these continued in force, it was usual from time to time for our princes * * * to muster and array (or set in military order) the inhabitants of every district * * * . But at the same time it was provided, that no man should be compelled to go out of the kingdom at any rate, nor out of his shire but in cases of urgent necessity; nor should provide soldiers unless by consent of parliament. About the reign of Henry the eighth * * * , lord lieutenants began to be introduced, as standing representatives of the crown, to keep the counties in military order * * * , as extraordinary magistrates constituted only in times of difficulty and danger.

>
> IN this state things continued, till * * * when king Charles the first had * * * issued commissions of lieutenancy and exerted some military powers, which having been long exercised, were thought to belong to the crown, it became a question in the long parliament, how far the power of the militia did inherently reside in the king * * * . This question * * * became at length the immediate cause of the fatal rupture between the king and his parliament: the two houses not only denying this prerogative of the crown, the legality of which right perhaps might be somewhat doubtful; but also seising into their own hands the intire power of the militia, the illegality of which step could never be any doubt at all.
>
> SOON after the restoration of king Charles the second, * * * it was thought proper to ascertain the power of the militia, to recognize the sole right of the crown to govern and command them, and to put the whole into a more regular method of military subordination: and the order, in which the militia now stands by law, is principally built upon the statutes which were then enacted * * * the general scheme of which is to discipline a certain number of the inhabitants of every county, chosen by lot * * * . They are not compellable to march out of their counties, unless > in case of invasion or actual rebellion, nor in any case compellable to march out of the kingdom. They are to be exercised at stated times: and their discipline in general is liberal and easy; but, when drawn out into actual service, they are subject to the rigours of martial law, as necessary to keep them in order. This is the constitutional security, which our laws have provided for the public peace, and for protecting the realm against foreign or domestic violence; and which the statutes declare is essentially necessary to the safety and prosperity of the kingdom.[359]

---

[357] Id., Volume 1, at 89.

[358] 13 Edward I, Chapter 6 (1285), quoted post, at 235-236.

As the rest of the present study will exhaustively demonstrate, these English militia laws have parallels in both pre-constitutional and constitutional American Militia law. Nonetheless, just as with English "common law", English statutory law was never imported into and imposed wholesale upon the Colonies. As Blackstone noted in general, although the Colonies were "subject to the control of parliament" they were "not bound by any acts of parliament, unless particularly named".[360] And the militia laws of England were never applied directly to any Colony. Furthermore, from their beginnings, Colonial Assemblies took upon themselves the task of enacting all of the legislation necessary in light of the peculiar political, economic, and social conditions of their jurisdictions.[361]

So, to determine the character of the laws historically applicable to the Militia in America requires the study of American legislation alone. Although in America the pre-constitutional Militia laws did rely on "common-law" remedies and the courts in order to enforce fines,[362] the laws themselves never arose out of Colonial and State "common law" (lex non scripta), but solely from Colonial and State Militia Acts (leges scriptae). Regular Colonial and State Militia units often did have a say in choosing their own officers,[363] and "Independent Companies" often did organize and largely regulate themselves[364]—but always subject to specific governmental approval, supervision, and command as mandated by some statute.

Therefore, no matter how patriotically motivated, well organized and equipped, and carefully trained they may be, private groups of individuals appealing to "common law" for their authority do not and can not constitute constitutional "Militia"—unless perhaps when: (i) Their actions, if arguably extra-legal when performed, are retrospectively validated by governmental authorities. Or, (ii) they assume direct governmental authority on their own recognizance, under aegis of the

---

[359] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 410-412 (footnotes omitted).

[360] Id., Volume 1, at 107-108.

[361] See W. Nelson, The Common Law in Colonial America, ante note 354, at 130-131.

[362] See post, at 275-284 (Rhode Island) and 666-697 (Virginia).

[363] See ante, at 103-108 (Rhode Island), and post, at 528-530 (Virginia).

[364] See post, at 224-234 (Rhode Island) and 567-597 (Virginia).

maxim salus populi suprema lex,[365] because of the dire, unavoidable exigencies of the circumstances confronting them—as, for example, the situation the Declaration of Independence posits: "[t]hat whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of [men's unalienable Rights], it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government".

2. Not subordinate to Sheriffs. Contrary to another mistaken belief current among not a few contemporary patriots, Local Sheriffs enjoy no unique, supreme authority within their jurisdictions which would somehow entitle them either to assert direct control over whatever Militia units were already settled there, or indirectly to supersede and absorb the Militia entirely under their command by calling forth in the posse commitatus every adult eligible for the Militia.[366] Certainly no historical basis exists for any such claim. For no* pre-*constitutional American Militia were ever made generally subordinate to, or in any particulars controlled by or answerable to, Local Sheriffs as commanding officers.

As Blackstone described Sheriffs' traditional powers under the law as applied in England,

> [A]S the keeper of the king's peace, both by common law and special commission, he is the first man in the county, and superior in rank to any nobleman therein, during his office. He may apprehend, and commit to prison, all persons who break the peace or attempt to break it * * * . He may, and is bound ex officio to, pursue and take all traitors, murderers, felons, and other misdoers, and commit them to gaol for safe custody. He is also to defend his county against any of the king's enemies when they come into the land: and for this purpose, as well as for keeping the peace and pursuing felons, he may command all the people of his county to attend him; which is called the posse commitatus, or power of the county: which summons every person above fifteen years old, and under the degree of a peer, is bound to attend upon warning, under pain of fine and imprisonment.[367]

---

[365] "The health [or welfare] of the people is the highest law."

[366] This belief apparently derives, or at least takes comfort, from the Supreme Court's opinion that Congress may not compel a State's executive officials "to execute federal laws" by participating "in the administration of a federally enacted regulatory scheme" aimed at "gun control". Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 904-905 (1997) (Scalia, J., for the Court). This decision did not turn, however, on the particular rights, powers, privileges, or immunities of Sheriffs under the Constitution or laws of the United States or any State's laws. Local law-enforcement officers in general were the executive officials whom Congress attempted to dragoon into the General Government's service, because typically they happened to have direct access to the data from which an individual's eligibility to purchase a firearm could be ascertained. But the Court's reasoning would have applied just as well to any State officer, bureaucrat, or employee whom Congress might have singled out to perform the requisite statutory duties—for example, Local prosecutors or custodians of criminal records other than actual law-enforcement officers.

[367] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 343-344 (footnotes omitted).

Blackstone's reference to "common law" in this passage is perhaps the source of the composite proposal circulating among some contemporary patriots for the formation of "common-law militias" specifically commanded by Sheriffs.

The powers Blackstone catalogued, however, were never considered either mandatory, or necessary, or sufficient for organizing the defense of any of the Colonies around their Sheriffs. Although Sheriffs in *pre-*constitutional America traditionally could deputize individual citizens, or even summon them en masse in a posse commitatus, in aid of keeping the peace and enforcing the criminal law,[368] they played no special—let alone a commanding—rôle in the Militia. Otherwise, neither legal justification nor practical need would have existed for enactment of elaborate Militia statutes, as the matter of defending each Colony, County by County, could simply have been entrusted to the Sheriffs by implication; or the Militia statutes could simply have declared the Sheriffs the commanding officers of the Militia in each County within each Colony—neither of which courses of action ever occurred anywhere in *pre-*constitutional America.

Revealingly, references to Sheriffs are few and far between in the Militia laws of *pre-*constitutional Rhode Island. The only one of consequence this study has uncovered involved a requirement, imposed during the War of Independence, that > all the male inhabitants of this colony, of sixteen years of age and upwards, who shall be suspected of being inimical to the United American Colonies, and the arduous struggle in which they are engaged, against the force of Great Britain, shall make and subscribe * * * [a] declaration, or test [of loyalty] * * * .

>
> * * * * *
>
> And * * * , that in case any such suspected person shall refuse to subscribe the same, * * * and if [upon being summoned and interrogated] he shall continue such refusal, without giving satisfactory reasons for the same * * * , or shall refuse to appear upon being summoned, * * * [a] warrant [shall be issued], directed to the sheriff of the county * * * , commanding him * * * to make strict and diligent search for all arms, ammunition, and warlike stores, belonging to such persons so refusing, and to take and deliver the same to the captain of the company of militia in whose district the delinquent shall live, to be made use of in time of an alarm, taking a receipt of the captain, therefor; which arms, ammunition and warlike stores, shall be appraised * * * and be paid for out of the general treasury.{EN-79}

Obviously, in this instance the Sheriff was no more than a pursuivant.

---

[368] See Black's Law Dictionary (St. Paul, Minnesota: West Publishing Company, Revised Fourth Edition, 1968), at 1324.

Moreover, in the plainest contradistinction to "the Militia of the several States",[369] Sheriffs derive no explicit authority whatsoever from the Constitution. Indeed, the noun "Sheriff" does not even appear in that document. And whatever authority Sheriffs may still retain in States such as Rhode Island or Virginia is purely a matter of what those States' own constitutions and laws may grant them.[370]

The peculiar desire of some contemporary patriots to assign a power over the Militia to officials outside of the Militia would perhaps be more fitting on legal-historical grounds if Constables, rather than Sheriffs, were selected. Of course, the Constitution neither recognizes any authority inherent in the office of Constable, nor grants any authority to that office, any more than it does for the office of Sheriff. But, as Blackstone explained, "[T]HE general duty of all constables [under English law] * * * [wa]s to keep the king's peace in their several districts; and to that purpose they [we]re armed with very large powers, of arresting and imprisoning, of breaking open houses, and the like"—although, as he added, "of the extent of which powers, considering what manner of men [we]re for the most part put upon these offices, it [wa]s perhaps very well that they [we]re generally kept in ignorance".[371] Moreover, "[o]ne of the[English constables'] principal duties * * * [wa]s to keep watch and ward in their respective jurisdictions".[372] In the early days in Rhode Island, too, Constables could be assigned that duty:

> [1700] "It shall * * * be lawfull for the Governor, Deputy Governor, or any two Assistants, or Justices for their respective town to issue forth their warrant to the respective Constables of their towns, to summons in the house-keepers and any other person, that shall reside in any town in this Collony, for the space of a month, not being servants, &c., to watch, or send some sufficient person to watch for them[.]"{EN-80}

Later on, though, the Militia took over that responsibility.[373] Constables also occasionally performed some services for the Militia:

> [1701] "[I]n case any person or persons that shall through his neglect [of Militia duty] be fineable * * * shall refuse or neglect to pay his or their fines upon demand * * * , and there be no visible estate to be found of said person or persons * * * whereby to make distraint on, then it shall be lawfull * * * to issue forth * * * [a] warrant to any Constables

---

[369] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[370] See, e.g., Const. of Rhode Island art. IX, § 5 and General Laws of Rhode Island § 42-29-1; Const. of Virginia art. VII, § 4 and Code of Virginia § 15.2-530.

[371] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 356.

[372] Id.

[373] See post, at 235-238.

> or other person to apprehend * * * such [delinquent] person or persons[.]"{EN-81}

Yet, even in cases such as these, a Constable's power of arrest was not exclusive—perhaps because there was a history of individuals' often "refusing to searve * * * in the place of Constable, Towne Sargant, or others constituted to exicute warrants or writts in speciall occasions", or even "to ayd a Constable being thereto required".{EN-82} And no Constable, perforce of that office, ever enjoyed any general authority within, let alone over, the Militia. So, that misguided patriots in the present day favor Sheriffs over Constables to assume powers with respect to the Militia that neither of those officers exercised in America during *pre-*constitutional times may reflect no more than simple-minded political pragmatism: The office of Sheriff is still to be found in many States, ready to be twisted to the purpose; whereas the office of Constable is not (at least under that name[374]), and would have to be resurrected before it could be so misemployed.

Nonetheless, the authority that many contemporary patriots want Sheriffs to exercise for the purpose of exposing and suppressing usurpation and tyranny, especially on the part of rogue officials of the General Government, ought to be exercised by someone. In fact, it can be exercised, with full constitutional sanction, by the Militia, with their commanders—at the National level, the President; at the State level, the Governor; and at the Local level, "the County Lieutenant" or other chief commanding officer in the jurisdiction—performing the functions that Sheriffs as such cannot perform.[375]

---

[374] See Code of Virginia §§ 15.2-1701 and 15.2-1704.

[375] See post, at 327-328, 1135-1138, 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488.

CHAPTER FIVE

Rhode Island organized her pre-constitutional Militia on the principle of near-universal, compulsory service by every adult able-bodied free male.

Notwithstanding that Rhode Island's Charter referred all-inclusively to "the Inhabitants" of the Colony, the legal and social context of the time—and the manner in which such authority was invariably exercised thereafter throughout Colonial America—made plain that its purpose was "[t]o Assemble, Exercise in Arms, Martial Array, and put in Warlike Posture" only, but in principle all of, the able-bodied adult free males.[376] The qualification "in principle" is necessary, because in practice some men for good and sufficient reasons were exempted from certain kinds of service in the Militia, or were allowed to avoid duty upon their provision of satisfactory substitutes.[377]

A. Able-bodied adult free males only. Limitation of membership in the Militia to able-bodied adult free males took into account that—

1. The physical and mental immaturity, weaknesses, or disabilities of the very young and the superannuated precluded their useful service as a practical matter.

2. Although a not inconsiderable number of Colonial women pursued remarkable independent careers,[378] most adult females (other than widows, spinsters, and orphans) found themselves under the legal protection and control of either their fathers or their husbands, and in any event on physiological, psychological, social, cultural, and religious grounds were considered unsuitable for regular service under arms.[379] Today, of course, the changed legal and social status of adult women could recommend, if it would not absolutely require, a somewhat more flexible policy[380]—although even this would not preclude generous exemptions for women from the most arduous of Militia service, and should

---

[376] See the Charter of 1663, quoted ante, at 95.

[377] See post, Chapter 11.

[378] See, e.g., Elisabeth W. Dexter, Colonial Women of Affairs: A Study of Women in Business and the Professions in America Before 1776 (Boston, Massachusetts: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1924).

[379] See, e.g., Robert A. Gross, The Minutemen and Their World (New York, New York: Hill and Wang, 1976), at 102.

[380] See post, at 950-953.

continue to prescribe their exclusion from actual combat duties in all but the most dire circumstances.[381]

3. Slaves throughout the Colonies were almost always disbarred from the possession of firearms, except under close supervision, no doubt on the basis of Blackstone's admonition that "[t]wo precautions are * * * to be observed in all prudent and free governments: 1. To prevent the introduction of slavery at all: or, 2. If it be already introduced, not to intrust those slaves with arms; who will then find themselves an overmatch for the freemen".[382] This was a principle (or a prejudice) that died hard: For example, notwithstanding that one member of the Militia Company who had stood to arms on Lexington Green and been wounded was the slave Prince Estabrook,[383] even under the critical circumstances of the siege of Boston in 1775 the Massachusetts Committee of Safety refused to enlist slaves generally in that Colony's forces.[384]

Slavery was by no means uncommon in pre-constitutional New England.[385] The institution was first "legitimized" by statute in Massachusetts in 1641:

> There shall never be any bond slaverie, villinage or Captivitie amongst us unles it be lawfull Captives taken in just warres, and such strangers as willingly selle themselves or are sold to us. And these shall have all the liberties and Christian usages which the law of god established in Israell concerning such persons doeth morally require. This exempts none from servitude who shall be Judged thereto by Authoritie.[386]

Later, though, as a matter of English law, Blackstone utterly repudiated all but the last sentence of the theory on which this enactment rested:

> [P]ure and proper slavery does not, nay cannot, subsist in England * * * whereby an absolute and unlimited power is given to the master over the

---

[381] See Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 72-83 (1981).

[382] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 416.

[383] See Thomas Fleming, The First Stroke: Lexington, Concord, and the beginning of the American Revolution, (Washington, D.C.: National Park Service, United States Department of the Interior, 1978), at 5. The insert entitled "NAMES OF THE SEVENTY-SEVEN MEN OF CAPTAIN JOHN PARKER'S COMPANY Who were in the early morning engagement on Lexington Common, April 19, 1775" lists Estabrook simply as "COLORED". Frank W. Coburn, The Battle of April 19, 1775 in Lexington, Concord, Lincoln Arlington, Cambridge Somerville and Charlestown Massachusetts (Lexington, Massachusetts: Lexington Historical Society, Second Edition Revised, 1922), between pages 60 and 61.

[384] See R. Ketchum, Decisive Day, ante note 310, at 58-59.

[385] See generally Lorenzo J. Greene, The Negro in Colonial New England (New York, New York: Atheneum, 1968).

[386] THE BODY OF LIBERTIES, No. 92, in THE COLONIAL LAWS OF MASSACHUSETTS, REPRINTED FROM THE EDITION OF 1660, WITH THE SUPPLEMENTS TO 1672. CONTAINING ALSO, THE BODY OF LIBERTIES OF 1641 (Boston, Massachusetts: Rockwell & Churchill, 1889), at 53.

> life and fortune of the slave. And indeed it is repugnant to reason, and the principles of natural law, that such a state should subsist any where. The * * * origins of the right of slavery * * * are all of them built upon false foundations. As, first, slavery is held to arise * * * from a state of captivity in war * * * . The conqueror * * * had a right to the life of his captive; and having spared that, has a right to deal with him as he pleases. But it is an untrue position, when taken generally, that, by the law of nature or nations, a man may kill his enemy: he has only a right to kill him, in particular cases; in cases of absolute necessity, for self-defence; and it is plain this absolute necessity did not subsist, since the victor did not actually kill him, but made him prisoner. War is itself justifiable only on principles of self-preservation; and therefore it gives no other right over prisoners, but merely to disable them from doing harm to us, by confining their persons: much less can it give a right to kill, torture, abuse, plunder, or even to enslave, an enemy, when the war is over. Since therefore the right of making slaves by captivity, depends on a supposed right of slaughter, that foundation failing, the consequence drawn from it must fail likewise. But, secondly, it is said that slavery may begin * * * when one man sells himself to another. This, if only meant of contracts to serve or work for another, is very just; but when applied to strict slavery * * * is also impossible. Every sale implies a price, * * * an equivalent * * * : but what equivalent can be given for life, and liberty, both of which (in absolute slavery) are held to be in the master's disposal? His property also, the very price he seems to receive, devolves ipso facto to his master, the instant he becomes his slave. In this case therefore the buyer gives nothing, and the seller receives nothing: of what validity then can a sale be, which destroys the very principles upon which all sales are founded? Lastly, we are told, that besides these two ways * * * slaves * * * may also be hereditary: * * * the children of acquired slaves are * * * slaves also. But this being built on the two former rights, must fall together with them. If neither captivity, nor the sale of one's self, can by the law of nature and reason reduce the parent to slavery, much less can they reduce the offspring.[387]

So, slavery in America stood upon a rather shaky legal foundation from the beginning.

In 1652, though, Rhode Island effectively outlawed perpetual slavery:

> Whereas, there is a common course practised amongst English men to buy negers, to that end they may have them for service or slaves forever; for the preventinge of such practices among us, let it be ordered, > that no blacke mankind or white being forced by covenant bond, or otherwise, to serve any man * * * longer than ten yeares, or untill they come to bee twentie four yeares of age, if they bee taken in under fourteen, from the time of their cominge within the liberties of this Collonie. And at the end or terme of ten yeares to sett them free, as the manner is with the English servants.{EN-83}

---

[387] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 423-424 (footnotes omitted).

However, although apparently never repealed, this law was simply flouted.

As early as 1712, Rhode Island tried to discourage the smuggling of Negroes into the Colony by imposing duties on importation of those people.{EN-84} But in 1732 the Colony complied with "his Majesty's instructions" that her (and every other Colony's) duties on the importation of Negroes be repealed.{EN-85} Perhaps not entirely with reluctance, either. For in New England the slave trade proved extraordinarily lucrative. Newport, Rhode Island, ranked second only to Boston, Massachusetts, as a port for slavers during the Colonial period.[388] And the Browns of Providence, Rhode Island—the illustrious family which included the patriots John Brown, who organized the attack on the Gaspée, and his brother Moses, who personally opposed slavery and was one of the first members of Rhode Island's Committee of Correspondence[389]—amassed a fortune from the nefarious trade.[390]

Yet, as economically important as slavery was, and although Rhode Island enacted laws that enforced slavery,{EN-86} restricted the manumission of slaves,{EN-87} prohibited masters of sailing vessels from carrying off slaves without their owners' permission,{EN-88} caused slaves to be sold to pay judgments against them,{EN-89} restricted Negro servants and slaves from venturing abroad at night,{EN-90} prohibited ferrymen from transporting slaves without permission from the slaves' masters,{EN-91} and limited the liberty of free Negroes{EN-92}—nonetheless, her Militia statutes never explicitly excluded or exempted slaves, let alone free Negroes, as a class from service, but instead enrolled "all Male persons" or "all effective [that is, able-bodied] Males", with no apparent disqualification on the basis of race or condition of servitude.[391] And in one instance in which race was an explicit criterion for action, the statute provided that, rather than being disarmed, "all Indian men servants" on Block Island should "be by the inhabitants * * * carefully provided for with arms and ammunition * * * for the[inhabitants'] defence".{EN-93}

The silence of Rhode Island's Militia laws on the subject of slavery may have derived from the peculiar legal status of bondsmen, who were considered not fully

---

[388] L. Greene, The Negro in Colonial America, ante note 385, at 27.

[389] J. Bartlett, Records of the Colony of Rhode Island, ante note 309, Volume VII, at 68-73, 227-228.

[390] C. Rappleye, Sons of Providence, ante note 311, Chapter 3; L. Greene, The Negro in Colonial America, ante note 385, at 30 & note 87.

[391] See post, at 123-128 and Chapter 10.

legal "persons" at all, but instead only "personal estate"{EN-94} (a form of private property).[392]

Or it may simply have reflected how relatively few slaves and free persons of color suitable for Militia service lived in Rhode Island, so that special provision for them was deemed supererogatory. The specific numbers of Negro "servants" (an euphemism which included both indentured servants and slaves), "servants" of mixed race, and free persons of color in Rhode Island varied throughout the pre-constitutional period. In 1708, "Black servants" totaled four hundred twenty-six (5.9% of the total population);{EN-95} in 1749, there were three thousand seventy-seven "Negroes"(9.4% percent of the total population);{EN-96} and in 1774, three thousand seven hundred sixty-one "blacks" (6.3% of the total population) were counted.{EN-97} At that time, Rhode Island had the highest proportion of Negro slaves of all the Colonies in New England.[393] Finally, in 1782, the census recorded two thousand eight hundred six "blacks" and "mulattos" (5.4% of the total population).{EN-98} So perhaps people of color were considered not sufficiently important, numerically at least, to warrant expressly including or excluding Negro men in or from the Militia. Yet, when Rhode Island began her gradual abolition of slavery, she did take care to prevent manumitted slaves from becoming financial burdens on the communities in which they resided, thereby indicating that the population of slaves could not have been considered negligible for all purposes.{EN-99}

Or the silence of Rhode Island's Militia laws on the subject of people of color may have resulted from the implicit understanding throughout the Colonial period of what became implicit during the struggle for independence, that the "rights and liberties * * * of personal freedom must be considered as the greatest" of all rights, and that "those who are desirous of enjoying all the advantages of liberty themselves, should be willing to extend personal liberty to others".{EN-100} After all, this conception did not spring forth from the forehead of Jove only in the 1770s.

Whatever Rhode Island's Militia statutes did or did not recite in so many words, though, during the period from 1742 through 1748 (King George's War) her Militia's rolls recorded that from one to three Negroes actually served in each [392] See generally, e.g., L. Greene, The Negro in Colonial New England, ante note 385, at 167-186. See also Kenneth M. Stamp, The Peculiar Institution: Slavery in the Ante-Bellum South (New York, New York: Vintage Books, 1989), at 192-236. The legalistic intricacies of this anomalous situation must have perplexed even the shrewdest thinkers of that day. For example, if slaves had been required to serve in the Militia as "men", their free male owners, when themselves also required to serve, would have been doubly (and arguably unfairly) burdened, both in their own service and in having to provide more of their "property" for the Militia than did non-slaveholding residents—although perhaps this could have been rationalized as the quid pro quo for the government's protection of slavery in the first place. On the other hand, requiring widows or spinsters without minor sons or free servants to detach their male slaves for Militia duty could have been considered no less appropriate than requiring independent women with minor sons or servants to provide property in the form of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements. See post, at 155-157 and 244-245.

---

[393] L. Greene, The Negro in Colonial America, ante note 385, at 74-75.

Company. And during the period from 1756 through 1763 (the French and Indian War) as well, Negroes served in the Colony's Militia in not insignificant numbers.[394]

Moreover, in 1778, on the personal recommendation of General George Washington himself, Rhode Island raised two battalions composed exclusively of slaves:

> Whereas, for the preservation of the rights and liberties of the United States, it is necessary that the whole powers of government should be exerted in recruiting the Continental battalions; * * * and whereas, history affords us frequent precedents of the wisest, the freest, and bravest nations having liberated their slaves, and enlisted them as soldiers to fight in defence of their country; and also whereas, the enemy, with a great force, have taken possession of the capital, and of a greater part of this state; and this state is obliged to raise a very considerable number of troops for its own immediate defence, whereby it is in a manner rendered impossible for this state to furnish recruits for the said two battalions, without adopting the said measure so recommended.
>
> It is * * * resolved, that every able-boded negro, mulatto, or Indian man slave, in this state, may enlist into either of the said two battalions, to serve during the continuation of the present war with Great Britain.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [T]hat every slave, so enlisting, shall, upon his passing muster * * * , be immediately discharged from the service of his master or mistress, and be absolutely FREE, as though he had never been encumbered with any kind of servitude or slavery.
>
> * * * * *
>
> And whereas, slaves have been, by the laws, deemed the property of their owners, and therefore compensation ought to be made to the owners for the loss of their service,—
>
> It is further * * * resolved, that there be allowed, and paid by this state, to the owner, for every such slave so enlisting, a sum according to his worth; at a price not exceeding £120 for the most valuable slave; and in proportion for a slave of less value.{EN-101}

Rhode Island was the only one of the thirteen States to follow this course;[395] and her own statute was only temporarily in force.{EN-102} "At various times other states turned to their Negro inhabitants, slave and free, when recruiting lagged among whites. Most of these blacks served in integrated units, performing the same duties as other continentals, but Rhode Island followed a different pattern."[396] The First Rhode Island Regiment, its ranks composed entirely of Americans of Black African descent, fought with distinction until victory came at Yorktown.[397] Interestingly, too, the General Assembly's exercise of what it attested were "the whole powers of government" in this instance indicates that slaves could always have been enlisted in the Militia had the exigencies of the situation and political policy so demanded. All of this notwithstanding, even in 1780 and 1782 Rhode Island still excepted "Deserters, Indians, Mulattos and Negroes" from "all male Persons whatsoever, of the Age of Sixteen Years and upwards" who might be drafted into military service.{EN-103}

---

[394] Id. at 187-190 & notes 103, 110, 122, 125, and 126.

[395] G. Carbone, Nathanael Greene, ante note 310, at 97.

Distinguishably, in Southern Colonies (and later States) such as Virginia, where the population of slaves was extensive, the possibility of slave revolts the source of constant anxiety, and the belief prevalent that enlistment in the Militia would be an irreversible first step towards emancipation, the systematic arming of slaves never occurred.[398] Rather, careful distinctions were made among "free males" (who were enrolled in the Militia), "free mulattos, negros, or Indians" (who were allowed to serve in various noncombatant capacities), and slaves (who were generally disbarred from participation except under special conditions).[399] Today, of course, such a restriction on service in the Militia, or on the possession of arms in general, based upon an individual's condition of servitude could operate in only the most narrowly limited circumstances.[400] And any such restriction based exclusively on an individual's race would be constitutionally out of the question no matter what the circumstances.[401]

B. All eligible men subject to some service. These peculiar matters aside, as Rhode Island's Charter envisioned, all of the eligible male "Inhabitants of said Plantations" were subject to some Militia service: (i) in the Colony's earliest days when the population was sparse; (ii) in periods of emergency throughout the Colony's history when the services of every able-boded adult free man might be needed; and (iii) with respect to such foundational duties as personal possession of

---

[396] Robert K. Wright, Jr., for the Army Lineage Series, Center of Military History, United States Army, The Continental Army (Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1983), at 149.

[397] Bruce Chadwick, The First American Army: The Untold Story of George Washington and the Men Behind America's First Fight for Freedom (Naperville, Illinois: Sourcebooks, Inc., 2005), Chapter 25.

[398] See id., Chapter 24. Southern resistance to arming slaves could claim a perverse rationale in political philosophy, too. As one Confederate General later argued in opposition to enlisting slaves in support of the Southern rebellion in the 1860s, "If slaves will make good soldiers our whole theory of slavery is wrong." Quoted in James O. Horton & Lois E. Horton, Slavery and the Making of America (New York, New York: Oxford University Press, 2005), at 203.

[399] See post, at 363-369, 468, and 733-741 (Virginia).

[400] See U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1. See post, at 748-749, 993-998, and 1011-1013.

[401] See U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

firearms and ammunition suitable for Militia service,[402] and participation in "the Watch" and "the Ward".[403]

From the very beginning, Rhode Island's officials ordered that:

> • [1639] "noe man shall go two miles from the Towne unarmed, eyther with Gunn or Sword; and * * * none shall come to any public Meeting without his weapon";{EN-104}
>
> • [1643] "every man" should have sufficient "powder", "bulletts", and "shot lying by him";{EN-105}
>
> • [1643] inspectors should check "every inhabitant" to "see whether every one of them has powder, and what bullets run", and "go to every house" to determine "what armes are defective";{EN-106}
>
> • [1655] "an accompt * * * shall be given of what powder, lead and shot there is in the possession of everie inhabitant of y^e^ townes";{EN-107} and
>
> • [1669] "each * * * Towne Councill in the Colony * * * [should] see that the inhabitants of each respective towne bee furnished with ammunition according to law; and that the armes bee fixed and in readiness for service".{EN-108}

Also, in particular situations of "eminent dangers approaching", such as invasions, insurrections, or other "great extremities", Rhode Island's "magistrates" were "empowered to press or cause to be impressed [that is, to draft for compulsory service], any person or persons", and "to raise, appoint and authorize any or all persons requisitt for the preservation of * * * [the] Collony * * * to attend their allegiance and duty".{EN-109} Thus, during the War of Independence, the General Assembly:

> • [1775] "directed and empowered [inspectors] to go to the house of each person in their respective towns, to take an account of the powder, arms and ammunition";{EN-110}
>
> • [1775] "command[ed] every man in the colony, able to bear arms, to equip himself completely with arms and ammunition, according to law";{EN-111} and
>
> • [1780] authorized drafts from among "all male Persons whatsoever, of the Age of Sixteen Years and upwards, who have resided for the Space of Thirty Days within their respective Towns (Deserters, Indians, Mulattoes and Negroes excepted)".{EN-112}

---

[402] See post, Chapters 6 and 7.

[403] See post, at 235-240.

Moreover, that it was Rhode Island's practice, from the early to the late 1700s, to require Militia service, not just from her permanent residents, but also from mere "transient persons", evidences the near-universality and seriousness of the duty.{EN-113}

C. Different sets of men assigned to different duties. Although the duty of able-bodied adult free men to serve in some capacity in Rhode Island's Militia was near-universal in principle, in practice the extent of its required performance differed for individuals dissimilarly situated. Just as in other Colonies and independent States, Rhode Island singled out by ages particular subsets of her able-bodied male population for disparate types of duty.

1. As described below, those within the group of individuals considered physically and psychologically best able to perform the most strenuous and responsible tasks (from sixteen to fifty years of age) were required to arm themselves, to train on a fixed schedule, and to stand ready for service in the field at any time.[404] Those within the group of individuals considered less capable (from fifty to sixty years of age) were also required to arm themselves, but were exempted from regular training, as well as from most service except in times of the extraordinary public emergencies known as "alarms".[405] Presumably, the individuals in this group had received sufficient training in their earlier years, but because of their ages could have performed useful services only in the most dire circumstances. A few individuals in both age-groups were largely exempted from regular Militia duties—except the foundational duty to arm—because of their important public offices, private professions or trades, or peculiar personal circumstances.[406] But no able-bodied free male above sixty years of age was ever prohibited from volunteering to train or to serve in some capacity with the Militia, commensurate with his abilities, or from arming and training himself simply as an individual at any time.

Some of Rhode Island's early records recite that, unless specially exempted, "all men from sixteene * * * to sixtye yeares old" were required to "find themselves armes and traine in their owne persones", and "that noe person or persons within this Collony from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares, shall be released from traininge or other duties in millitary affaires".{EN-114} And the laws thereafter consistently required that "every Inhabitant of the Island [of Rhode Island] above sixteen and under sixty years of age, shall alwayes be provided of" a firearm, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements, whether he otherwise participated in the Militia or not.{EN-115} Nevertheless, the general rule for about one hundred fifty years was that only those "effective [that is, able-bodied] Males

---

[404] See post, at 208-220.

[405] See post, at 220-224, 257-258, and 259-261.

[406] See post, at 224, 252-256, and 258-259.

between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty" "who are able to beare arms" would be subject to "Trayning * * * in the arte of military discipline", would be required to "bear Arms in their Respective Train bands or Companies", and would "constitute and make the military Force of this State" in its first rank.{EN-116} Other men would serve in other capacities, with different duties—although all of them might be called upon for full participation in the Militia during "alarms".{EN-117}

In 1777, a statute finally systematized the process of assigning men to different types of service, by mandating that committees > make regular lists or registers of * * * all male persons inhabiting or residing within their respective towns:

>
> From sixteen to fifty years of age, whom they shall judge able to bear arms.
>
> From sixteen to fifty years of age, whom they shall judge unable to bear arms.
>
> From fifty to sixty, able to bear arms.
>
> From fifty to sixty, not able; and from sixty, upwards.
>
> That lists be made of those who are transient, or resident persons, in the same manner; as also * * * of negroes and Indians, in the same manner; and also of those who have taken the affirmation [of conscientious objection], or produced certificates from the Friends' Meeting, to excuse them from military duty[.]{EN-118}

Self-evidently, the purpose of this census—again, of "all male persons" without exception—was to determine how many adult men resided in each of the Towns, and which men within each age-group were sufficiently able-bodied to serve in various capacities.

In 1779, another statute made it clear that age alone was neither an absolute disqualification for the Militia nor an unquestionable excuse to avoid performing every possible form of service therein:

> That all Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the respective Town-Councils, shall be at all Times armed, accoutred and equipped, * * * upon the same Penalty as though they were held to military Duty * * * : And that they be considered as the Alarm-List of the State, and be subject to all other Duties as those exempted from bearing Arms.{EN-119}

And "those [others] exempted from bearing Arms" were nonetheless no more excused from all other Militia duties than were "all [able-bodied] Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty". For the same statute provided that, > whereas, by the Experience of all Ages, it has been found expedient, for the better Support of Subordination and military Discipline, to form separate and distinct Corps, which shall take in the different Degrees and Orders of effective Men, so far as respect their Offices and Stations in Life; and whereas this Assembly, influenced by this Principle of general Utility, have ever exempted certain Persons from serving promiscuously in the Militia Battalions; nevertheless, as the Public, in Cases of Necessity, had and have a Right to claim their personal Services, that the same beneficial Purposes may still be effected, It is Enacted, That all Persons under the following Description be exempted from serving in the Infantry Battalions, and Companies of Artillery, viz. all Persons who have served in the Place of General Officers, Justices of the Peace, or other commissioned Officers, the Ministers or Teachers of each Church or Congregation in this State, all sworn Practitioners in the Law, Physicians, Surgeons, Apothecaries, all Persons appointed to work the Fire-Engines, one Miller to each Grist-Mill, one Ferryman to each stated Ferry, all those who have lost a right Eye, or are disabled by Lameness, all Town-Councilmen, Treasurers, Clerks and Serjeants, while serving in their respective Stations.

>
> And be it further Enacted, That all Persons between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty Years, exempted as aforesaid from serving in the Infantry Battalions, be formed into separate Corps, to be known and called by the Name of the Senior Class, * * * who shall at all Times be armed, accoutred and provided, * * * and subjected to the same Regulations as the Battalions aforesaid.{EN-120}

2. So the differential, as well as deferential, treatment that Rhode Island afforded to men of advanced years, to those with partial disabilities, and to those in certain important public offices and critical private occupations did not imply her recognition of some supposed "right" for any of them to avoid service in the Militia altogether. It was not in any sense a denial of the general duty to serve in the Militia that falls on all individuals who, sharing in the sovereignty, must also share in the defense, of "a free State", but only a relaxation of and partial exemption from that duty, and the substitution for its performance of alternative service in some public office or private occupation, all based upon the legislative presumptions drawn from practical experience that: First, men of advanced years, or suffering from minor disabilities, were often capable of performing Militia functions only to an attenuated degree, and therefore could and should be called upon only in the most desperate situations. Second, men holding important public offices or engaged in critical private occupations could usually serve their community better in those positions and tasks than in the front ranks of the Militia, at least during tranquil times.[407] Yet, being based upon practicalities rather than inflexible principles, even these men's exemptions always had to yield to the right of "the Public, in Cases of Necessity, * * * to claim their personal Services", particularly in times of "alarm".

Moreover, Rhode Island's records nowhere indicate that her public officials ever treated the first of these presumptions as irrebuttable, such that elderly, but still physically active and mentally acute individuals were prohibited from volunteering for Militia service normally assigned to younger men. Quite the contrary: As noted above, even those from fifty to sixty years of age who did not volunteer were required to "be at all Times armed, accoutred and equipped" just as were all younger Militiamen, and were "considered as the Alarm-List of the State", subject to possible service in the field during serious emergencies. This, of course, was the policy throughout the Colonies, gloriously exemplified at Lexington and Concord, in April of 1775, when men and boys of all ages and occupations answered the call to defend their communities.[408] Today, if such a presumption might be valid to excuse from the most strenuous Militia duties individuals who elected not to contest but to avail themselves of it, it could never operate to exclude anyone who was both fit and willing to perform that particular, or certainly some less arduous but nonetheless useful, service in the Militia. For exclusion of an individual from the willing performance of his constitutional duty cannot be predicated on "an irrebuttable presumption often contrary to fact",[409] or on "a permanent and irrebuttable presumption" that "is not necessarily or universally true in fact, * * * when the [governmental official with jurisdiction over the matter] has reasonable alternative means of making the crucial determination".[410]

D. Membership in the Militia not contingent or conditioned upon formal enrollment. As the foregoing should make clear, the appearance of an individual, whatever his age, public office, or private occupation, on a particular formal "list" was not the criterion of his membership in the Militia. To be sure, many of Rhode Island's statutes employed "list", "enlist", "inlist", and variants of those terms in reference to free men from sixteen to fifty years of age who composed the "Trained Bands" or "Companies" (described hereinafter).{EN-121} But, in the nature of things,

---

[407] That exemption from Militia duty for men of advanced years, except during "alarms", was no more than a recognition of common physiological realities in that era is apparent from the similar practice of the Lakota people. See Joseph M. Marshall III, The Day the World Ended at Little Bighorn: A Lakota History (New York, New York: Penguin Group (USA) Inc., 2007), at 80-81. So, too, the exemption of men in important positions of leadership. For example, before and during the Battle of the Little Bighorn, Sitting Bull—the "old man chief of all the camps combined"—performed religious ceremonies and encouraged the Lakota and Cheyenne warriors to "[m]ake a brave fight", rather than engaging in combat himself. Quoted in The American Indians: War for the Plains (Alexandria, Virginia: Time-Life Books, 1994), at 146, 158, 164.

[408] See E. Forbes, Paul Revere, ante note 127, at 272.

[409] United States Department of Agriculture v. Murry, 413 U.S. 508, 514 (1973).

[410] Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441, 452 (1973).

"lists" neither defined nor even fully evidenced the composition of the Trained Bands, let alone the Militia as a whole.

In *pre-*constitutional Rhode Island, a "list" was simply an attempt to identify and record which individuals might be classified as members of a particular group. With respect to the Militia in particular, a "list" might, as in 1676, constitute a census of the entire population: "[T]hat persons be empowered in the towne of Newport and Portsmouth, to take an exact account of all the inhabitants in this Island, English, negros and Indians, and make a true list thereof, the proper inhabitants in one list; the English now come amongst us in another list, the negros in another list, and the Indians in another list; and alsoe to take account how all persons are provided with corne, guns, powder, shot and lead".{EN-122} It might assume, as in 1677, that the "inhabitants" of the Towns and villages and "listed souldiers" were one and the same individuals.{EN-123} It might record, as in 1776, simply "all persons in [certain] towns, being inhabitants thereof, and obliged by law to equip themselves with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box, and who are not able to purchase the same".{EN-124} It might be consulted, as in 1776, to determine which individuals "upon the Alarm List" "shall have the Benefit and Use of * * * Arms provided [by the Towns] * * * and be exempted from providing themselves".{EN-125} It might be used, as in 1776, to "embod[y]" individuals on "the alarm-list, in each town * * * into a separate company".{EN-126} It might attempt, as in 1777, to take into account in a systematic fashion which men were eligible and which were ineligible for the Militia, into what categories of service the eligible might fall, and who might qualify for exemptions.[411] And it might memorialize, as in 1779, "the Alarm-List of the State", composed of "all Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the respective Town-Councils".{EN-127}

Thus, the "listing" of individuals did not constitute creation of Rhode Island's Militia, or any part of it, but merely identification in fact of those particular individuals who already composed some portion of the Militia as a matter of law when the "lists" were drawn up. For an individual was part of the Militia—and subject to Militia duties of some sort—because he was a free, adult, able-bodied male member of the community from sixteen to sixty years of age, not because he happened to be included in some "list". The failure of some official to "list" an individual who should have been listed never excluded, exempted, or otherwise released that individual from his legal duty of Militia service (although, of course, an individual's avoidance of "listing" could have assisted him in evading that duty). Just as the population of a State exists, and the members of that population are citizens of that State, even if no census of it is ever taken, so too does a constitutional Militia exist even if no official "list" of its members is ever compiled. All of the duties of Militia service—including the duty to be armed; the duty to use arms in defense of the community; and the duty to provide organization, discipline, and training, even if public officials neglect, fail, or refuse to do so—exist in the individual as a consequence of who he is and where he finds himself, irrespective of whether he has formally been "listed" by someone.

---

[411] See ante, at 126.

E. Compulsory service often compensated. Although membership in her Militia was always compulsory (and essentially automatic when a free adult male took up residence in Rhode Island, or when a minor then resident reached the minimum age for participation), actual service was not always uncompensated. To be sure, most Militiamen were required to absorb many of the monetary burdens of service themselves—such as the cost of providing their personal firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements;[412] and the loss of time (and presumably income) associated with participation in musters and training.[413] They were also subject to fines, penalties, and punishments for failures to perform those and other duties.[414] In some instances, however, Militiamen were paid or otherwise compensated for actual service in the field.

Militiamen who served as "Minutemen", for example, were paid both for active duty and for training:

> [1775] "[O]ne-quarter part of the militia of this colony [shall] be enlisted as minute men, to meet together, and exercise themselves in military discipline, half-a-day, once in every fortnight.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]hat the following be the form of the enlistment of the said minute men, to wit:
>
> "Colony of Rhode Island, &c.
>
> *"We * * * voluntarily enlist ourselves to serve as minute men, in the service of this colony, to be * * * subject to the law of this colony, for regulating the minute men.*
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]hat the said minute men march for the defence of the colony, when and as often as they shall be called upon * * * .
>
> "And that the lieutenant general and major general of the colony be * * * empowered to march them out of the colony, whenever they, or either of them, shall think it necessary.
>
> "And * * * that the following wages be allowed and paid out of the general treasury, to the said officers and men, to wit:

---

[412] See post, Chapter 6.

[413] See post, at 208-214.

[414] See post, Chapter 12.

> "For every time they shall meet and exercise, each captain shall receive two shillings and sixpence * * * .
>
> "Each lieutenant and ensign, two shillings * * * ; and each other person one shilling * * * .
>
> "And when they march for the defence of the colony, or out of the colony, each captain shall receive six shillings * * * per day.
>
> "Each lieutenant, five shillings * * * per day; each ensign, four shillings * * * per day; and each other person, three shillings * * * per day; and shall also be billeted at the charge of the colony.
>
> * * * * *
>
> "And * * * the several independent companies in this colony, or such of them as shall think proper, [may] form themselves into companies of minute men, * * * and exercise and do duty in the same manner; and * * * receive the same pay and allowance."{EN-128}

Of course, all Minutemen were volunteers, as were the members of Independent Companies.[415]

Other Militiamen, though, could be compensated for their performance of actual duties for which they were drafted:

> • [1734] "[F]or the future there be allowed but one company or training band, to attend on the general election; and that not exceeding the sum of £10 be allowed and paid out of the general treasury for their expenses in attending thereon."{EN-129}
>
> • [1776] "[E]ach and every soldier of the independent companies, and companies of militia; and the soldiers upon the alarm list, who have been upon actual duty upon the late alarm within this state, properly equipped as by law required, shall be entitled to, and receive, three shillings per day, for each and every day * * * in actual service[.]"{EN-130}
>
> • [1776] "Whereas, the committee of the four New England states * * * presented * * * the following resolution, to wit:
>
> * * * * *
>
> "Whereas, the militia of the several states of New England may be frequently called into the same service; and many inconveniences may be prevented, by their being placed upon the same footing, in point of encouragement, wages and rations,—
>
> " * * * [T]hat whenever the militia of the said states * * * shall be called into service, for any term less than two months, that the officers and soldiers be * * * > paid the same wages and rations, that those of equal rank in the Continental army are allowed and paid * * * .

---

[415] See post, at 212 (Minutemen) and 224-234 (Independent Companies).

>
> "And that * * * , where the militia shall be called out for a term more than two, and not exceeding four months, that the non-commissioned officers and soldiers be paid a bounty of twenty shillings; and where the term of their service shall amount to five, and shall not exceed six months, * * * [they] be paid a bounty of forty shillings, over and above the Continental pay and rations; provided they shall voluntarily enlist into such service; otherwise that they have, and receive, the Continental wages and rations only, without any bounty * * * .
>
> "Upon consideration, whereof, —
>
> "It is voted and resolved, that the above recommendation be * * * approved[.]"{EN-131}

• [1776] "That all male Persons subject by Law to bear Arms, whether of the Militia, Alarm List or Independent Companies, within this State, be draughted in three Divisions * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * That the Division on actual Duty shall be relieved monthly, in the Order they shall be drawn out, by other Divisions * * * to be made and done punctually, at the Time each Division shall have completed its monthly Round of Duty.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he Pay of each private Soldier * * * shall be two Shillings per Day; and that the Pay of the several Officers be in the same Proportion * * * as regulated by the Laws for paying the Militia when in actual Service; * * * and * * * Officers and Soldiers shall, when in actual Service, be allowed and draw the same Rations as those of the standing Regiments, in the Service of this State."{EN-132}

• [1777] "[T]hat the field-officers * * * and other officers and privates of the militia and alarm-list, within this state, who have been draughted, and have done, or shall do, duty * * * shall receive * * *[certain stipulated] wages and rations[.]

* * * * *

"And * * * the * * * [officers] of the several independent companies within this state, who have been draughted, and have done, or shall do, duty * * * shall * * * receive the same wages that are allowed to the officers of the militia and alarm-list, and the same number of rations * * * ; and * * * the non-commissioned officers and privates of said companies, also receive the same bounties, wages and rations, as are allowed to the non-commissioned officers and privates of the militia, or alarm-list[.]"{EN-133}

• [1777] "[T]hat the first division of the second draft of the militia, and alarm and independent companies * * * march to such part of the shores within their respective counties, as shall be directed by the commanding officer, * * * properly equipped, to relieve those that are now upon duty, and there to remain and do duty for fifteen days from the time they shall actually take the field.

"And * * * for their encouragement to exert themselves in the defence of their country, that a bounty of ten shillings * * * be allowed to each non-commissioned officer and soldier * * * who shall do his duty * * * .

* * * * *

"And * * * the other divisions of the independent companies, alarm companies and militia * * * relieve said division * * * ; and that they be entitled to the same wages and encouragement[.]"{EN-134}

• [1777] "That One of the Divisions, consisting of the One Sixth Part of the Independent and Alarm Companies and Militia heretofore draughted, and One Half of a Division, be immediately called upon actual Duty * * * : That they continue in Service for the Space of Fifteen Days, and be relieved at the Expiration of said Time by the other Half of said Division, and one other Division, in the Order in which said Divisions were drawn, to continue in Service during said Time; and that the Divisions on actual Duty from Time to Time be relieved and do Duty in Manner as is before directed.

" * * * That a Bounty of Ten Shillings * * * be allowed to each non-commissioned Officer and Soldier who hath been draughted, and shall do Duty * * * . And further, That all Fines which shall be incurred for Delinquency * * * shall be equally divided among the non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers doing Duty, who belong to the same Town with the Delinquents who shall neglect to do Duty."{EN-135}

• [1777] "That one Half of the Militia, Alarm, Independent, and Artillery Companies, be drafted * * * within this State * * * . That they march to and rendezvous at such Place or Places as shall be directed * * * ; and that they remain and continue to do Duty for the Space of one Month * * * , unless sooner discharged * * * .

* * * * *

"AND for the Encouragement of the Persons who shall be drafted * * * to exert themselves in Defence of their Country, * * * each non-commissioned Officer and Private who shall be drafted * * * and shall do their Tour of Duty, shall be allowed, as a Bounty, forty Shillings * * * for one Month's Service, and in the same Proportion for a shorter Time, and the same Wages and Rations as are allowed * * * in the Continental Service."{EN-136}

• [1777] "Whereas * * * one-half of the militia, independent, artillery and alarm companies within this state, were draughted, and have done duty for one month,—

"It is voted * * * that the remaining half-part of said militia, independent, artillery and alarm companies, be draughted into two divisions * * * .

" * * * [O]ne of the said divisions * * * shall march to such place or places as shall be ordered * * * and do duty for the space of thirty days * * * .

" * * * [E]ach non-commissioned officer and private, who shall be draughted and do duty * * * shall be allowed as a bounty, forty shillings, and the same wages as are allowed the non-commissioned officers and privates in the Continental service."{EN-137}

• [1777] "[T]he council of war of this state [may] call forth into actual duty, such part of the militia, independent and alarm companies, within this state, for the defence thereof, as they shall from time to time think necessary, in the order in which they have been draughted, to supply the delinquencies of the quotas to be furnished * * * by the states of the Massachusetts Bay, New Hampshire and Connecticut, and in the proportion they shall be deficient therein.

" * * * [A] bounty of £4 * * * for every month, and in that proportion for any shorter time, [shall] be allowed to each non-commissioned officer and private, who shall be called and do duty * * * ; and that the same bounty be allowed to all the non-commissioned officers and privates of the said militia, independent and alarm companies, who shall do duty from and after the rising of this Assembly.

"And * * * the officers and soldiers of the militia, independent and alarm companies, who may be called into actual service * * * , [shall] be allowed the same wages and rations as the officers and soldiers in the Continental service."{EN-138}

• [1778] "[T]he non-commissioned officers and privates of the militia and alarm companies of the town of Little Compton, who have done duty within said town since the 6th day of November last, [shall] be allowed as a bounty, after the rate of forty shillings per month; and that they be paid, accordingly."{EN-139}

• [1778] "This Assembly, * * * having ordered eight hundred and thirty-nine men to be raised * * * for filling up the state's brigade, * * * and apportioned the same to the several towns; some of which have not raised the quota assigned them, * * *

" * * * such delinquent towns shall keep up in the field so many men from the militia, alarm and independent companies, in such town, as they are deficient in their quota, * * * until the same shall be completed.

"That the militia so doing duty, shall be entitled to the Continental wages and rations only."{EN-140}

> • [1781, 1781, and 1781] "That Twelve Hundred able-bodied effective Men of the Independent, Artillery, Senior and Junior Class Companies of Militia * * * be forthwith embodied; and that they rendezvous at such Places within this State * * * to do Duty therein for One Month from the Time of their arriving * * * , unless sooner discharged by * * * the Governor, or this Assembly.[416]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * That the Men who shall be detached, and do Service * * * as Soldiers, be allowed at and after the Rate of Fifty Shillings * * * per Month, and One Ration per Day * * * .[417]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [E]ach Person who shall be detached * * * or shall voluntarily enter into the said Brigade, [shall] furnish himself with Three Days Provision; and that he be allowed for the same One Shilling and Sixpence per Day * * * .[418]{EN-141}

Doubtlessly, the rationale for compensation in such cases was that not all members of the Militia were being called upon to perform these particular duties, and therefore the ones who were singled out by some form of draft, or who volunteered, were entitled to some measure of financial support by the remainder of the community. In contrast, everyone eligible for the Militia (other than conscientious objectors) was required to provide himself with a firearm, ammunition, and related accoutrements at his own expense—yet even as to this requirement, an exception was made for those Militiamen too poor to pay for that equipment, for whom arms were furnished at public expense.[419] So, in all of these instances, compensation in money or in kind was another way of spreading the burden of Militia service equitably and with social solidarity throughout the entire community. "They also serve who only stand and wait"[420] —especially if, as the price of being allowed simply to "stand and wait", they must contribute financially to the efforts of those slogging it out in actual service.

---

[416] The second and third Acts provided for "incorporating and bringing into the Field Five Hundred able-bodied effective Men" from those units of the Militia.

[417] The second and third Acts provided that "Soldiers" would be "allowed at and after the Rate of Sixty Shillings * * * per Month".

[418] The second and third Acts provided for an allowance of "Two Shillings per Day".

[419] See post, Chapter 6.

[420] John Milton, Sonnet XIX, "When I consider how my light is spent", Poems (London, England: Thomas Dring, 1673).

CHAPTER SIX

Rhode Island required essentially all of the able-bodied adult free males within her territory to be personally equipped with their very own firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements, suitable for the defense of their community as a whole and of themselves as individuals.

In the pre-constitutional era, "gun control" (had such a term then been current at all) would have meant that the people, through their government, required and enabled themselves to control—by means of their very own personal possession—the firearms and ammunition sufficient not only to repel the depredations of hostile Indians and criminals, and attacks by the armies and navies of enemy nations, but also to array the citizenry as a serious deterrent against, if not a match for, any forces their own rogue public officials might deploy against them in furtherance of usurpation, tyranny, or other forms of oppression.

A. Militiamen to furnish themselves with firearms. In most cases throughout that period, individuals (other than bona fide conscientious objectors[421]) were required by statute to procure and at all times to maintain personal possession, usually as their own property, of specified types and amounts of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements, ready for their immediate use. This served both the eminently practical purpose of assuring that the men could defend their communities, and the more far-reaching symbolic purpose of affirming that they would do so.[422]

1. Rhode Island's earliest ordinances in the late 1630s and 1640s simply presumed that men possessed their own arms and ammunition at home, and would bring them forth for Militia purposes, whether or not they happened to be members of the Trained Bands. Thus, not only were members of the Bands subject to "a view of the[ir] Armes" and to fines if any of the "Armes" they brought to musters proved "defective",{EN-142} but also "noe man" was permitted to "go two miles from the Towne unarmed, eyther with Gunn or Sword" or to "come to any public Meeting without his weapon".{EN-143} And "every man" was required "to have so much powder, and so many bulletts" "lying by him".{EN-144}

---

[421] See post, at 266-272.

[422] Again, the similar practice of the Lakota people is instructive. See J. Marshall, The Day the World Ended, ante note 407, at 84-85.

Even in those early days, Rhode Island did provide for public magazines in each of her Towns, in order to store some firearms and ammunition in central locations.{EN-145} But, as a statute of 1665 evidenced, no sharp distinction in terms of purpose existed between "public" and "private" magazines:

> And for the farther providing for the defence of the Collony, in having a Magazine or store of armes and amunition, both in pertickelar men's houses, and alsoe on publicke store in each towne.
>
> It is therefore ordered * * * that every man in each towne be allwayes furnished with two pound of gunpowder, and fowre pound of lead or bulletts, vpon penalty of being fined ten shillings[.]{EN-146}

Moreover, with almost every adult free male presumably armed on his own account, public magazines generally served only to supplement private supplies. Indeed, in 1650 the major Towns of Providence, Portsmouth, Newport, and Warwick together maintained within all of their magazines only fifty-four muskets, hardly enough to equip their own inhabitants, let alone out-lying areas, adequately.{EN-147}

Doubtlessly, too, Rhode Islanders recognized why public magazines were inherently incapable of providing the community with—and might even compromise or subvert its—security: First, to repel sudden assaults from hostile Indians or criminals, people (especially in outlying areas) needed to have firearms and ammunition ready at hand. Second, entrusting their arms to the exclusive control of possibly incompetent, corrupt, or even criminal public officials ensured that the necessary equipment would be unavailable just when it might, and probably would, be essential to resist domestic usurpation, tyranny, or other oppression.

In any event, that from the very beginning of the Colony almost all able-bodied adult free male Rhode Islanders were supposed to maintain firearms and ammunition in their personal possession at home, as their own private property, repudiated in the most practical and palpable manner possible the old English élitist notion that citizens should have only such arms as were "suitable to their condition and degree" in the social, political, and even religious hierarchy of the Mother Country.[423] In 1663, however, Rhode Island did explicitly exclude Catholics from the right—otherwise extended to "all Men Professing Christianity, and of Competent Estates, and of Civil Conversation, who acknowledge, and are Obedient to the Civil Magistrate, though of different Judgments in Religious Affairs"—to "be admitted Free-men", and to have "Liberty to Chuse and be Chosen Officers * * * both Millitary and Civil".{EN-148} Although this disability appeared to contradict the guarantee in the Colony's Charter "[t]hat no Person * * * shall be any ways

---

[423] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 143.

Molested, Punished, Disquieted, or called in Question for any Differences in Opinion, in matters of Religion", if he "do[es] not Actually disturb the Civil Peace",{EN-149} certainly contracted the principle of religious toleration upon which Rogers Williams had founded the Colony,[424] and probably was enforced only sporadically if at all,[425] nonetheless it was not repealed until 1783.{EN-150} Notwithstanding such religious prejudice, even Catholics were never statutorily disqualified from service in Rhode Island's Militia, except as officers, or from possessing firearms in fulfillment of their Militia duties or for any other lawful purpose. And any such disqualification would obviously be unconstitutional today.[426]

Furthermore, inasmuch as the early statutes neither prohibited in any manner private acquisition of firearms through private channels, nor mandated that public officials alone should distribute firearms (and then only to selected, presumably politically reliable individuals), Rhode Island's laws implicitly recognized every private individual's right to obtain firearms from private sources and to keep them in his personal possession. Moreover, if the Colony's general laws had outlawed possession of firearms by private individuals who lacked some governmental license, her Militia statutes themselves would have established, or would have implicitly constituted, exceptions to such a prohibition, in order to allow individuals to obtain, keep, and bear the firearms they were expected to provide for their service in the Militia. Inasmuch as those statutes encompassed every able-bodied adult free male in the jurisdiction, the permission they extended—or, more descriptively, the specific requirement they imposed—for private possession of firearms would have nullified any such general prohibition.

To be sure, if the government of *pre-*constitutional Rhode Island had only recognized for the time being and for its own purposes, but could have rigorously regulated or even revoked on the basis of political policy, a private individual's right to obtain and keep firearms, then that "right" would have been at best a matter of legislative grace. Yet, as did almost all of the other Colonies (and later all of the independent States), Rhode Island relied upon this right, whatever its source and security, in her Militia statutes throughout that period, by imposing on all but the poorest able-bodied men, as individuals, the duty to acquire firearms and ammunition as their own personal property through the free market, and then to maintain that equipment in their own personal possession at all times. This duty necessarily carried with it a corresponding individual right—enforceable against anyone other than, perhaps, the legislature—for each man capable of serving in the

---

[424] See, e.g., T.M. Merriman, THE PILGRIMS, PURITANS, AND ROGER WILLIAMS, VINDICATED: AND HIS SENTENCE OF BANISHMENT, OUGHT TO BE REVOKED (Boston, Massachusetts: Bradley & Woodruff, 1892).

[425] See J. Bartlett, Records of the Colony of Rhode Island, ante note 309, Volume II, at 36-37.

[426] See U.S. Const. amends. I, II, and XIV, § 1. See Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 494 (1961).

Militia to take the actions requisite to fulfill his duty. Such duty and right together composing the most critical element in "regulating" her Militia—without which, indeed, no effective Militia could have existed—they constituted important parts of the very definition of "Militia" in Rhode Island and throughout other Colonies (and then all of the independent States). The qualification "capable of serving", rather than "actually serving", in the Militia must be kept in mind, though, because individuals beyond fifty or sixty years of age were never prohibited from volunteering for Militia service, or from actually performing such service if caught up by circumstances. And although they were subject to no plain statutory duty to defend their communities to the limits of their abilities, they were surely required to do so under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God"—which, as the Declaration of Independence teaches, is the foundational authority for any people "to assume among the powers of the earth" a "separate and equal status" as a political community. Therefore, they each must have enjoyed an individual *pre-*constitutional "right to acquire and keep arms" necessary for that purpose—even if that purpose could have been served no further than by defending their own lives against aggressors. Thus, for all Americans other than those physically incapable of defending their communities even if only by simply defending themselves, no real difference existed between an "individual" and a "collective" right to keep and bear arms.[427]

2. From Rhode Island's founding forward, for nearly one hundred fifty years her statutes explicitly codified these principles, setting out the specific requirements that applied, not only to all the members of the actual Trained Bands, but as well to most (if not all) of those free adult males who were exempted for one reason or another from regular Militia training and first-line duty. Over the decades, these requirements were variously phrased, but always imported the same substance: namely, that every able-bodied free male, who was not specifically exempted (usually by virtue of conscientious objection), was at all times to be possessed of a suitable firearm, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements.[428] Thus—

---

[427] As it does not exist today. See post, at 1339-1351.

[428] As to these, in the subsequent text throughout this volume the following definitions apply:

•"Bandolier" or "bandaleer" is a belt or strap to which are attached containers carrying separate charges of black powder. It became obsolete upon introduction of the paper "cartridge" (q.v.). See, e.g., Encyclopedia of Firearms, Harold L. Peterson, Editor (New York, New York: E.P. Dutton and Company, Inc., 1964), at 53-54.

•"Carbine" or "carabine" is a short, light musket, usually of relatively small caliber, employed primarily by cavalrymen, but also by artillerymen, sappers or engineers, light infantry, and officers. Peterson, ante, at 75-76.

•"Cartridge" or "cartouch" denotes any disposable container that holds a single load of gunpowder for a firearm, usually including both the main and the priming charges. By the 1700s, cartridges consisted of black powder and a lead ball wrapped in a cylinder formed of paper and tied off at each end . Loose gunpowder and ball were used only for rifles and other special firearms. Peterson, ante, at 76. A "cartridge box" or "cartouche box" is a container that holds a number of cartridges in a position convenient for reloading a firearm.

• [1647] "[E]very Inhabitant of * * * [Rhode] Island above sixteen or under sixty yeares of age, shall alwayes be provided of a Musket, one pound of powder, twenty bullets, and two fadom of Match, with sword, rest, bandaleers all completely furnished."{EN-151}

• [1658] "And whereas, it was formerly ordered, [that] armes [should] bee muskett and match. Now it is declared, that both it and fyrelockes and snaphaunces with powder hornes bee alowed; and if any bee complayned of for defective armes, the Town Counsill in each towne have power to judge off, and order the armes to bee such as they may finde will fully answer the meaninge of the lawe concerning suffitiant armes".{EN-152}

• [1665] "[N]ine shillings yearly to be paid * * * to such parents and masters as find armes and amunition (as they must doe) for their sones and sarvants that are listable * * * ; as alsoe to such householders or other men that find themselves armes and traine in their owne persones; which all men from sixteene years of age to sixtye years old are hereby required to doe[.]"{EN-153}

• [1677] "[E]very listed souldier"—which included all "persons within this Collony from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares"—"shall * * * have one good gun or muskitt fit for service, one pound of good powder, and thirty bullets at least".{EN-154}

• [1699, 1701, and 1705] Every "person * * * listed" in the Militia must "appear complete in arms * * * with a good or sufficient muskett or fuse, and sword or bagganett, cotouch box or bandelears, with twelve

---

• "Firelock" denotes any firearm or firearm action that employs sparks to ignite the priming charge—including the "wheel lock", "snaphance", and "flintlock" (q.v.). Peterson, ante, at 128-129.

• "Flintlock" is a firearm action which discharges when a "cock", actuated by a spring, strikes a piece of flint against a striking-plate (known as the "steel" or "frizzen"), producing sparks that set off a priming charge in a "pan". Peterson, ante, at 130. Good diagrams of a typical flintlock action appear in De Witt Bailey, Small Arms of the British Forces in America 1664-1815 (Woonsocket, Rhode Island: Andrew Mowbray Incorporated, Publishers, 2009), at 11, and in Peterson, ante, at 131-137. The flintlock differs from the "snaphance" (q.v.) in that the frizzen and pan-cover are separate in the snaphance, whereas they are combined in the flintlock. Peterson, ante, at 130; Bailey, ante, at 10.

• "Fusil", "fuse", "fusee", "fuze", and "fuzee" denote a light, compact flintlock musket, usually of relatively small caliber, which may be either smoothbored or rifled. Sometimes the term "fusil" is used interchangeably for "carbine" (q.v.). Peterson, ante, at 140; Bailey, ante, at 10.

• "Matchlock" is a firearm action which uses a slow-burning rope impregnated with potassium nitrate to ignite the priming charge. It was the first action to employ a trigger and lock work to set off the charge. Peterson, ante, at 199-200.

• "Musket", "muskett", "muskitt", and "musquet" denote a long gun, typically with a smooth bore (if otherwise, specified as a "rifled musket"). Peterson, ante, at 222.

• "Musket and match" denotes a musket with a match lock (q.v.).

• "Pistol" denotes a handgun.

• "Snaphance" or "snaphaunce" is a firearm action in which the steel (frizzen) and the pan are separate, rather than one piece, as in the flintlock. Peterson, ante, at 304-305. The term "snaphaunce" was later superseded by "firelock" (q.v.).

• "Wheel lock" is a firearm action in which a piece of iron pyrite, pressed against a revolving serrated steel wheel, generates a shower of sparks that ignites the priming charge. Peterson, ante, at 334-353.

bullets, fit for his piece, half a pound of powder, six good flints"; and those in troops of horse must have "carbine & pistol".{EN-155}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll Male Persons Residing for the space of three Months within this Colony from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years" "shall be always provided with one good Musket, or Fuzee, the Barrel whereof not to be less than three foot and an half in length, to the satisfaction of the Commission Officers of the Company; also one pound of good Gunpowder, thirty Bullets, fit for his Gun, six good Flints, fit for Service; one good Sword, or Baionet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartriges of Gunpowder and Bullets"; and "every Trooper [in the Horse] shall be always provided with one good serviceable Horse, * * * one Carbine, one pair of good Pistols, one Sword, one pound of Gunpowder, thirty sizeable Bullets, twelve good Flints".{EN-156}

• [1755] "[E]very Person * * * by Law to be accoutred * * * is * * * directed to provide himself with Arms[.]"{EN-157}

• [1766] "[A]ll Male Persons, who have resided for the Space of Three Months in this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen to Fifty, shall bear Arms in the * * * trained Bands" and "shall always be provided with One good Musket or Fuzee, the Barrel whereof not to be less than Three Feet and an Half in Length, to the Satisfaction of the Commission Officers, also one Pound of good Gun-Powder, Thirty Bullets fit for his Gun, Six good Flints, One good Sword or Bayonet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartridges of Powder and Ball"; and "every Trooper shall always be provided with One good serviceable Horse * * * a Pair of good Pistols, One Carbine, One Sword, One Pound of Gunpowder, Thirty sizeable Bullets, Twelve good Flints".{EN-158}

• [1774] Every Militiaman "shall * * * be provided with a sufficient Gun or Fuzee" * * * "with a good Bayonet fixed on his Gun".{EN-159}

• [1775] "[E]very man in the colony, able to bear arms," shall "equip himself completely with arms and ammunition, according to law".{EN-160}

• [1776] "[A]ll * * * pe[r]sons who are by law obliged to equip themselves with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box; and who shall not * * * be reported incapable of providing themselves * * * do provide themselves * * * agreeably to law".{EN-161}

• [1778] "[A]ll Persons * * * by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box * * * do provide themselves therewith * * * , or with a Rifle-Gun and Sword[.]"{EN-162}

• [1779] "[E]ach and every effective Man * * * shall provide, and at all times be furnished, at his own Expence (excepting such Persons as the Town Councils * * * shall adjudge unable to purchase the same) with one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto, * * * one Ram-rod, Worm, Priming-wire and Brush, and one Cartouch-Box[.]"{EN-163}

• [1781] "[E]ach of the * * * non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers [of the Militia shall] furnish himself with a good Musket, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box[.]"{EN-164}

• [1781] "[E]ach Person, liable to do military Duty * * * (unless excused by the Town-Council * * * for Inability to procure the same)" must have "a good Gun, being his own Property, * * * a Bayonet * * * , a Ram-Rod * * * , a Wormer * * * , a Priming-Wire * * * , [and] Three good Flints[.]"{EN-165}

Significantly, in specifying that each Militiaman should furnish himself with (say) "one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto * * * one Ram-rod, Worm, Priming-wire and Brush, and one Cartouch-Box", these statutes mandated merely the minimum sets and qualities of equipment the General Assembly deemed necessary for the service. Nothing precluded any Militiaman from providing himself with as good a musket—or, even better, as good a rifle—and accoutrements as money could buy in the free market, together with useful accessories beyond what the statutes required.

Inasmuch as Rhode Island's Trained Bands enrolled only able-bodied free men from sixteen to fifty years of age, the requirement in some of the statutes quoted immediately above, that men from sixteen to sixty years old had to maintain personal possession of firearms, applied sotto voce to those individuals from fifty to sixty years of age who were otherwise exempted from regular, first-line Militia service. In addition, many statutes explicitly specified that those exempted from training were nonetheless to be armed:

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll * * * Persons * * * excus'd from Training * * * shall notwithstanding be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition * * * , &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train[.]"{EN-166}

• [1755] "[E]very Person excused from Training" is "by Law to be accoutred" and is "directed to provide himself with Arms".{EN-167}

• [1766] "[A]ll such Persons as are * * * excused from training, shall, notwithstanding, be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train[.]"{EN-168}

• [1774] Every member of the Militia "shall * * * be provided with a sufficient Gun or Fuzee" and "with a good bayonet fixed on his Gun", including "all those who, being exempted from appearing on the Days of Training, are notwithstanding, obliged to be provided with Arms and other Accoutrements".{EN-169}

> • [1775] "That a proclamation be * * * issued * * * , commanding every man in the colony, able to bear arms, to equip himself completely with arms and ammunition, according to law."{EN-170}
>
> • [1776] "It is voted and resolved, that the alarm-list, in each town within this state, be embodied in a separate company"—consisting of men who were excused from most Militia duties except during emergencies[429]— and "[t]hat said company do equip themselves".{EN-171}
>
> • [1778] "[A]ll Persons * * * by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box, and who shall not * * * be reported * * * incapable of providing themselves * * * , do provide themselves therewith * * * , or with a Rifle-Gun and Sword[.]"{EN-172}
>
> • [1779] "That all Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the respective Town-Councils, shall be at all Times armed, accoutred and equipped, * * * upon the same Penalty as though they were held to military Duty", "with one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto, * * * one Ram-rod, Worm, Priming-wire and Brush, and one Cartouch-Box".{EN-173}

This statutory history proves that:

First, the duty to obtain and maintain personal possession of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia purposes—and the corresponding right to do so against any interference contrary to the statutory mandates—were never limited to only those men who happened to compose the Trained Bands. (Which in and of itself supplies a decisive rejoinder to the contention that the contemporary National Guard constitutes "the Militia of the several States" in whole or in part, rather than a component of the regular Armed Forces.)

Second, the men exempted from participation in the Trained Bands were nonetheless members of the Militia, because (unless they were conscientious objectors[430]) they were required to possess the same types of firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements as were the Bands' members.[431] In addition, no statute exists that even suggests that men above the ages of fifty or sixty, or whatever their mere physical disabilities at any age, were ever deprived of the firearms they already possessed (perhaps as a consequence of their former Militia service) or prohibited from acquiring firearms on their own, unconnected to Militia service.

Third, Rhode Island's *pre-*constitutional laws never disqualified from Militia service or excluded from the personal possession of firearms either: (i) those

---

[429] See post, at 220-224 and 259-261.

[430] See post, at 266-272.

[431] See ante, at 143-144, and post, at 223-224.

individuals who had committed crimes or other offenses for which they had served their sentences, paid their fines, or undergone other punishments, and thereafter had returned to society; or (ii) those individuals who had merely been charged with but not convicted of crimes, and during the pendency of any inquiry or trial had been allowed to remain at large in society. Of course, in those days convictions of many serious offenses often permanently removed perpetrators from the community. For, as Blackstone explained, "[F]ELONY, in the general acceptation of our English law, comprizes every species of crime, which occasioned at common law the forfeiture of lands or goods. This most frequently happens in those crimes, for which a capital punishment either is or was liable to be inflicted[.]"[432] "THE idea of felony is indeed so generally connected with that of capital punishment, that we find it hard to separate them; and to this usage the interpretations of the law do now conform."[433] As the legal commentator William Hawkins explained, among "capital offenses" in pre-constitutional English law, "[t]hose by the Common Law come generally under the Title of Felony"; and "[t]he Judgment against a Man or Woman for Felony of Death, hath always been the same * * * That he or she be hanged by the Neck 'till dead".[434] Rhode Island's laws, too, reflected just such an understanding.{EN-174} This aside, however, the duty to defend the community—and to keep and bear arms for that purpose—in pre-constitutional times extended even to many of those individuals whom today various "gun-control laws" would disarm entirely on the basis of prior convictions of criminal behavior.[435]

B. Militiamen's firearms to be their own personal property. Rhode Island's pre-constitutional Militia statutes made clear that the firearm each able-bodied adult free male was required to obtain and possess was usually to be his own personal property, which he purchased for himself, not a firearm owned, supplied, or controlled by any level of government or any public official. Only in a few cases, when individuals were too poor to acquire firearms through their own efforts, might the Militia itself or Local governments supply, and possibly control, the necessary equipment.[436]

1. As early as 1650, the Colony recognized the necessity of relying upon its citizens' private ownership of firearms useful for protection of the community, when it commanded "that [certain named individuals], all excuses sett aparte, shall mende and make all lockes, stockes and pieces that by order from the warden of each Towne shall be from any of the inhabitants thearof presented to them, for just and

---

[432] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 94.

[433] Id., Volume 4, at 98.

[434] A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown (London, England: E. and R. Nutt, and R. Gosling, Third Edition, 1739), Book I, Chapter XXV, § 1, at 65, and Book II, Chapter XLVIII, § 7, at 444 (footnotes omitted).

[435] Compare and contrast post, at 307-307, with post, at 981-1014.

[436] See post, at 157-162.

suitable satisfaction in hand payed, without delay," and "that all men that have gunns and pieces to mend, and have need to have them mended for their present defence, shall forthwith * * * carrie those pieces to mende".{EN-175} Had these firearms been public property, the laws would not have directed private individuals to see to the matter of maintenance, but would have assigned that duty to public officials, and probably to public armorers rather than private gunsmiths. (The widespread private ownership of firearms in pre-constitutional America, of course, was hardly unique to Rhode Island, then or later.[437])

Subsequently, the statutes were quite explicit on the subject of the citizens' personal ownership of the firearms they themselves brought to their service in the Militia or to the fulfillment of other military duty:

> • [1665] "[A]ll men from sixteene years of age to sixtye years old are hereby required to" "find themselves armes".{EN-176}
>
> • [1701] "[A]ll persons that are willing to list themselves in * * * troops [of horse]; and to accoutre themselves with * * * carbine and pistol * * * shall be excused from any other duty in militia exercise[.]"{EN-177}
>
> • [1755] "[E]very Person * * * by Law to be accoutred * * * is * * * to provide himself with Arms, and other Accoutrements[.]"{EN-178}
>
> • [1775] "[E]very man * * * able to bear arms, [is] to equip himself completely with arms and ammunition, according to law[.]"{EN-179}
>
> • [1776] "[A]ll persons in their towns, being inhabitants" "who are by law obliged to equip themselves with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box; and who shall not * * * be reported incapable of providing themselves * * * , do provide themselves[.]"{EN-180}
>
> • [1776] "[T]he artillery companies * * * [shall] be equipped with small arms and bayonets, at their own expense[.]"{EN-181}
>
> • [1776] "It is voted and resolved, that the alarm-list, in each town within this state, be embodied in a separate company" and "[t]hat said company do equip themselves".{EN-182}
>
> • [1779] "That each and every effective [that is, able-bodied] Man * * * shall provide, and at all times be furnished, at his own Expence (excepting such Persons as the Town Councils of the Towns in which they respectively dwell or reside shall adjudge unable to purchase the same) with one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto, * * * one Ram-rod, Worm, Priming-wire and Brush, and one Cartouch-Box."{EN-183}
>
> • [1780] "That in order to encourage each Soldier who shall inlist into the Service * * * *to provide the * * * Articles of Accoutrements for*

---

[437] See Clayton E. Cramer, Armed America: The Remarkable Story of How and Why Guns Became as American as Apple Pie (Nashville, Tennessee: Nelson Current, 2006).

themselves, there shall be allowed unto each of the said Soldiers who shall furnish himself with a good Musket, Ram-Rod, Bayonet * * * Eighty Continental Dollars * * * out of the General-Treasury". And, in this instance, if sufficient firearms were not forthcoming from "each Soldier" himself, "the Commanding-Officer of the Militia in [the] Town * * * [was] to impress from the [other] Inhabitants * * * the Articles * * * deficient"—that is, to require those "Inhabitants" to furnish their own private firearms for use by "the Soldiers".{EN-184}

• [1781] "That each of the * * * non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers [of the Militia] furnish himself with a good Musket, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box[.]"{EN-185}

• [1781] "That each Person, liable to do military Duty * * * (unless excused by the Town-Council * * * for Inability to procure the same)" shall not "be found destitute of a good Gun, being his own Property".{EN-186}

2. During the *pre-*constitutional era, statutory commands on this subject were sometimes phrased in the indirect passive tense, but with and to the selfsame intent and effect:

• [1647] "[E]very Inhabitant of * * * [Rhode] Island above sixteen or under sixty yeares of age, shall alwayes be provided of a Musket, one pound of powder, twenty bullets, and two fadom of Match, with sword, rest, bandaleers all completely furnished."{EN-187}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Listed Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall be always provided with one good Musket, or Fuzee"; and "all * * * Persons * * * excus'd from Training, yet shall notwithstanding be provided with the same Arms".{EN-188}

• [1766] "[E]very enlisted Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall always be provided with One good Musket or Fuzee"; "all * * * Persons as are * * * excused from training, shall, notwithstanding, be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train"; and "every Trooper shall always be provided with * * * a Pair of good Pistols, One Carbine".{EN-189}

• [1774] "[E]ach inlisted Soldier, who shall not be provided with a sufficient Gun or Fuzee, as directed in [earlier legislation], shall be fined"; and "the Fines of all those who, being exempted from appearing on the Days of Training, are notwithstanding, obliged to be provided with Arms and other Accoutrements, shall be the same for every deficiency, as the Fines of the inlisted Soldiers".{EN-190}

The then-current (albeit somewhat now-archaic) meaning of the verb "provide", used in the indirect passive tense with the prepositions "with" or "of",

was "[t]o furnish; [t]o supply"[438]—"to procure beforehand; to get, collect, or make ready for future use; to prepare"[439]—and "[t]o procure supplies or means in advance; to take measures beforehand in view of an expected or a possible future need, especially a danger".[440] So, in *pre-*constitutional America, for someone "to be provided with" a firearm (in the context in which Rhode Island's Militia statutes employed that phrase) idiomatically meant for him "to furnish it", "to supply it", or "to make it available" to himself. Coupled with other common definitions of "provide"—namely, "[t]o procure beforehand; to get ready; to prepare"[441]—for someone to be statutorily directed "to be provided with" a firearm could mean nothing less than for him "to procure" that firearm through his own efforts. This, of course, is the only reading of the statutes quoted immediately above consistent in purpose with the other statutes on the same subject quoted theretofore.

3. Logic as well as linguistics supports this conclusion. Had all or most of the firearms men used for their service in the Militia been public property, the statutes would have required Rhode Island's Towns, or some other governmental bodies, to acquire, distribute, and generally maintain close supervision over them. That, however, never occurred, except when some individuals were simply too poor to purchase their own firearms.[442] Obviously, special provision would not have been made for the poor alone, if the practice had been for everyone in the Militia to use firearms the government owned, supplied, and controlled.

Moreover, if Rhode Island's government had owned, supplied, and controlled the firearms that Militiamen used, how could any of them have been justly fined—as the statutes required them to be—for not originally securing possession of a firearm themselves?[443] A Militiaman could and should have been made financially accountable for spoiling, losing, stealing, or otherwise improperly disabling or disposing of a firearm the government made available to him. But surely some public official would have been responsible for seeing to it that the Militiaman acquired possession of that firearm in the first place.

4. The private ownership of most Militia firearms mandated by Colonial (and later State) law did impose a financial burden directly on individuals. Yet, otherwise, that cost would have had to have been met with taxes no less onerous,

---

[438] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 2 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[439] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1154, definition 1 (transitive verb). Accord, N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15. See also The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 2, at 2340, definitions 5, 7, 7b, and 8.

[440] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1154, definition 1 (intransitive verb). Accord, N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15.

[441] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[442] See post, at 157-162.

[443] See post, at 275-284.

which the selfsame individuals would have been required to pay, because only the very poor (who presumably paid little or no taxes at all) received firearms purchased with taxpayers' funds. This direct financial burden, though, brought with it the practical benefits that always arise from an individual's actual ownership of any valuable property. Presumably, when a Rhode Islander had to buy and maintain his own firearm, as his own personal property, he would have had an incentive initially to purchase one that was up to date in design and well manufactured, and thereafter to keep it in good repair and readiness at all times—as well as to expend the time and effort, in addition to whatever regular Militia training he received, necessary and sufficient to learn how to use it effectively.

5. Most importantly, though, the widespread private ownership of firearms suitable for service in the Militia created a peculiar kind of private property that served a public, governmental, and even sovereign function as the means by which the community itself directly exercised the most fundamental and important of all political and legal powers: the Power of the Sword. Firearms privately owned guaranteed that sovereign power truly resided with WE THE PEOPLE, who held in their own hands as their own property the implements necessary to exercise that power in the gravest extreme. Thus, firearms privately owned became the most important of all property, private or public, because in the final analysis the security of all other property depended upon them.

C. Militiamen to maintain possession of firearms in their own homes. Whether a firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements for use in the Militia were his own personal property (in the case of most able-bodied free men), or public property (in the case of some poor individuals), almost all such equipment was to be maintained at all times in each individual's personal possession at home, within his own immediate control, not in a governmental magazine, arsenal, armory, or other remote location under someone else's control.[444]

1. To be sure, some Local governments did maintain their own magazines for storage of firearms and ammunition the public owned.[445] And, to minimize the danger from conflagrations in Towns largely constructed of wood, and in which open fires were constantly burning as the sources of heat and light, private citizens were required to store excessively large quantities of explosive black powder in public magazines.[446] But it was always presumed that private powder stored for common safety's sake in public magazines would be returned to its owners on demand. Indeed, in 1774 patriots were given "reason to apprehend some hostile intention against" Boston, when her military governor, General Thomas Gage, "in

---

[444] For the few exceptions, see post, at 160-161.

[445] See post, at 203.

[446] See post, at 310-311.

a very extraordinary manner", "forb[ade] the keeper of the magazine at Boston, to deliver out to the owners, the powder, which they had lodged" there.[447] So, until Gage embarked on a scheme for disarming American patriots, aimed at rendering them helpless against British oppression, the existence and use of public magazines in no way limited the ability of common citizens to retain firearms and sufficient powder in their own homes at all times, in order for them to remain suitably provisioned against every hazard.

2. Quite the contrary of any notion that firearms and ammunition were to be consigned to public arsenals unless and until public officials deigned to distribute them, Rhode Island's statutes required her citizens themselves actually to possess personally (not simply to own titularly) their firearms and ammunition:

> • [1643] "[E]very man shall have foure pounds of shot lying by him, and two pounds of powder, and to have it in readiness[.]"{EN-191}
>
> • [1665] "[F]or the farther providing for the defence of the Collony, in having a Magazine or store of armes and amunition, both in pertickelar men's houses, and alsoe on publicke store in each towne", "every man in each towne be allwayes furnished with two pound of gunpowder, and fowre pound of lead or bulletts". {EN-192}
>
> • [1677] Individuals within the Militia "from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares", not exempted, "shall * * * have one good gun or muskitt fit for service", one pound of good powder, and thirty bullets at least".{EN-193}
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Listed Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall always be provided with one good Musket, or Fuzee * * * ; also one pound of good Gunpowder, thirty Bullets, fit for his Gun, six good Flints, fit for Service; one good Sword, or Baionet, a Cartouch Box, ready fitted with Cartriges of Gunpowder and Bullets, on the penalty of Three Shillings, for each time he shall be found not provided[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [A]ll such Persons * * * excus'd from Training, yet shall notwithstanding be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train, & that once every year, or oftner * * * , there shall be * * * a Survey and Examination made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is Required; and all such Persons as shall be found unprovided with such Arms * * * shall pay the Fine of Five-Shillings for each default[.]"{EN-194}

---

[447] Joseph Warren, Suffolk Resolves (6 September 1774), ¶ 9, adopted by the Continental Congress on 17 September 1774, in Journals of the Continental Congress, ante note 42, Volume I (5 September to 26 October 1774), at 31-40. On the significance of the Suffolk Resolves, see, e.g., T.H. Breen, American Insurgents, American Patriots: The Revolution of the People (New York, New York: Hill and Wang, 2010), at 130-156.

> • [1766] "[E]very enlisted Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall always be provided with one good Musket or Fuzee * * * , also One Pound of good Gun-Powder, Thirty Bullets fit for his Gun, six good Flints, One good Sword or Bayonet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartridges of Powder and Ball, under the Penalty of Four Pence for each Article of Accoutrement * * * which he shall be deficient in, for every Time he shall be unprovided therewith[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [A]ll such Persons * * * excused from training, shall, notwithstanding, be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train. And * * * Twice in every Year, * * * there shall be an Examination and Survey made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is Required; and all such Persons as shall be found unprovided, shall pay the Fine of Four Pence for each Article of Accoutrement they shall be deficient in[.]"{EN-195}
>
> • [1779] "[E]ach and every effective [that is, able-bodied] Man * * * shall provide, and at all times be furnished, at his own Expence (excepting such Persons as the Town Councils * * * shall adjudge unable to purchase the same) with one good Musquet[.]"{EN-196}

Statutes commanding each Rhode Islander eligible for the Militia to "find themselves", "provide himself with", "equip himself completely with", "furnish himself with", or "be provided with" a firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements "at his own Expence"—the articles so obtained "being his own Property" and subject to regular "Survey and Examination"—could have intended only that, as with all other personal property, these things would normally have been kept in their owners' own homes, under their owners' own control. And not one of Rhode Island's pre-constitutional statutes mandated or even suggested that, after being "furnished" by an individual, at his own expense and for his own use in the Militia, any firearm or ammunition had to be or even ought voluntarily to have been committed to the government's (or anyone else's) storage and control. To the contrary, because Militiamen were required by statute to "be allwayes furnished" and "at all times be furnished" with firearms and ammunition "in readiness", they had to have them constantly at hand, close by, or available through their own efforts, not just when public officials might distribute the equipment from governmental arsenals as the men appeared for training or musters.[448] Not surprisingly, either, no statute imposed any such requirement of public storage or control on private arms acquired for use other than in the Militia.

---

[448] See also the post-constitutional case from Massachusetts, Commonwealth v. Annis, 9 Mass. 31 (1812), dealing with this question under An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, § 1, 1 Stat. 271, 271; and An Act in addition to an act, intituled "An act more effectually to provide for the National defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States", Act of 2 March 1803, CHAP. XV, § 2, 2 Stat. 207, 207.

3. To have their firearms and ammunition close at hand, under their own control, was a practical necessity, because Militiamen were required to appear for training and service in the field completely equipped in every particular:

> • [1640] "[A]ll Men allowed and assigned to beare armes, shall make their personall appearance completely armed with Muskett and all its furniture * * * on such dayes as they are appointed to Traine."{EN-197}
>
> • [1643] "[E]very man do come armed unto the [Town] meeting upon every sixth day."{EN-198}
>
> • [1664] "[T]he people listed to trayne" are "all * * * required * * * to appeare in armes, compleat[.]"{EN-199}
>
> • [1677] "[T]he * * * inhabitants * * * are * * * strictly required and commanded to make their personall appearance compleat in their armes[.]"{EN-200}
>
> • [1699, 1701, and 1705] Every "person * * * listed" in the Militia must "appear complete in arms * * * with a good or sufficient muskett or fuse, and sword or bagganett, cotouch box or bandaleers, with twelve bullets, fit for his piece, half a pound of powder, six good flints".{EN-201}
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Enlisted Person [in the Militia]" must "make his Personal appearance Accoutred" with "one good Musket, or Fuzee * * * also one pound of good Gunpowder, thirty Bullets, fit for his Gun, six good Flints, fit for Service; one good Sword, or Baionet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartriges of Gunpowder and Bullets".{EN-202}
>
> • [1766] "[E]very enlisted Person [in the Militia]" shall "make his personal appearance, accoutred" with "One good Musket or Fuzee * * * also one Pound of good Gun-Powder, Thirty Bullets fit for his Gun, Six good Flints, One good Sword or Bayonet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartridges of Powder and Ball".{EN-203}
>
> • [1777] "[E]ach and every person by law obliged to bear arms * * * , when duly notified, and called out to duty, shall * * * appear in person, completely equipped with arms and accoutrements[.]"{EN-204}
>
> • [1779] "[I]n Cases of general Alarm" every "Officer, non-commissioned Officer or Private [of the Militia], shall * * * appear[ ] at the Alarm-Post * * * armed and accoutred", or "shall * * * appear[ ], armed, accoutred, and provided * * * at the Time and Place of Rendezvous".{EN-205}
>
> • [1781] "[E]very Person, liable by Law to do military Duty * * * shall * * * make his personal Appearance when duly warned, accoutred" with "a good Gun, being his own Property, * * * a Bayonet * * * , a Ram-Rod * * * , a Wormer * * * , a Priming-Wire * * * , Three good Flints".{EN-206}

These requirements that members of the Militia should appear for duty completely equipped with their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements presumed that they already possessed all those things in their own homes, from whence they would depart to make their appearances. For no Rhode Island Militia statute in the pre-constitutional era ever: (i) directed all members of the Militia to store or secure their firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements in public arsenals or magazines; (ii) ordered them to repair to public arsenals or magazines to obtain such equipment when necessary for Militia service; (iii) fined or otherwise punished them for not doing so; or (iv) appointed and defined the powers of such public officials as would have been required to administer such a system throughout the Colony.

4. If members of the Militia had not kept their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements in their own homes, Rhode Island would have been patently unjust to fine them, as she did, for reporting to Militia service without that equipment.[449] For had their firearms and ammunition instead been secured in public armories or magazines, to have been made available to them by public officials only if and when needed, and thereafter to have been surrendered again to governmental storage and control, those officials should have been responsible for insuring that the equipment was fully distributed in good time, and thereafter recovered and secured—and themselves should have been fined or otherwise punished for any defaults or delays in the process, except where refractory Militiamen simply refused to coöperate.

5. Moreover, had Militiamen not kept their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements in their own personal possession, there would have been no point whatsoever to Rhode Island's requiring inspections of the men's homes in order to determine whether the statutorily mandated equipment was being maintained there in proper amounts and in good order; and no justice—or even any sense at all—in Rhode Island's fining individuals discovered to be in violation of the regulations.[450] Instead, inspections should have been made of the public arsenals and magazines, and fines for defaults levied against the individuals the government put in charge of those establishments.

6. Finally, Rhode Islanders' practice during the pre-constitutional period of keeping their firearms and ammunition in their own homes, ready at all times for service in the Militia, was not simply an arbitrary policy that might have been different. Rather, the "homeland-security" situation in which the community found itself, and the ultimate political purpose of the Militia, required no less. In Rhode Island and elsewhere, Colonial Americans had to be able to muster the full strength of their communities quickly, in order to repel sudden attacks by hostile Indians, pirates and other criminals, or foreign enemies. And they had to be capable of deterring, or (where deterrence failed) immediately resisting, rogue public officials' usurpation and tyranny—a competence most famously tested, and proven sufficient for the occasion, by the Massachusetts Militia at Lexington and Concord on 19 April 1775.

---

[449] See post, at 275-284.

[450] See post, Chapter 8.

Given the diffusion of many small settlements throughout the Colonies, Americans could not have achieved the first requisite if their firearms had been locked away in a few central locations. And the second would have been impossible of attainment had those locations, howsoever otherwise convenient, been under the thumbs of the very rogue officials the common people needed to confront in arms. Indeed, the Colonists' wisdom in avoiding a concentration of firearms and ammunition in a few officials' hands strikingly manifested itself in 1774 and 1775, when, seeking to thwart the possibility of armed popular resistance to British plans, General Gage repeatedly attempted to seize or destroy the people's martial supplies in eastern Massachusetts—a typical "gun-control" strategy that at length precipitated the battle of Lexington and Concord.[451]

Revealingly in this regard, the only example of a general governmental restriction over Rhode Islanders' use of their firearms and ammunition, not intended simply to promote public safety,[452] that the author of this study has uncovered aimed at securing individuals' personal possession of sufficient supplies of gunpowder available for immediate use during the unsettled times leading up to the War of Independence. In 1774, the General Assembly required that "there be no firing of cannon upon any public occasion, or of small arms; especially by the militia, or incorporated companies, on days of exercising, excepting only for perfecting themselves as marksmen * * * ; and that it be * * * recommended to all the inhabitants of this colony, that they expend no gun powder for mere sport and diversion, or in pursuit of game".{EN-207} Not that they should surrender what they had to public officials, but that they should conserve it in their own hands for their own Militia use.

A similar purpose animated a restriction on the distribution of ammunition specifically to the Militia in 1778, when the General Assembly > resolved, that the colonels of the several regiments of militia within this state, be * * * empowered to receive a sufficient number of cartridges and flints, belonging to this state, * * * to furnish the captains of the several alarm and militia companies * * * which are deficient, so that each soldier > in their respective companies be supplied with seventeen rounds, and with two flints; the colonels and captains giving and taking receipts for the same.

---

[451] See, e.g., E. Forbes, Paul Revere, ante note 127, at 229-277; R. Gross, The Minutemen, ante note 379, at 55, 109-132; and especially Stephen P. Halbrook, The Founders' Second Amendment: Origin of the Right to Bear Arms (Chicago, Illinois: Ivan R. Dee, Publishers, 2008), Chapters 1 through 3.

[452] On regulations for this purpose, see post, at 302-313.

>
> That the captains of the several companies choose out a sufficient number of cartridges to fit the bore of the gun of each soldier in his company, wrap them up in paper, and mark thereon the names of the persons for whom they are chosen out.
>
> That they keep them in their possession until an alarm, when they are to be delivered to the soldiers; and that the commanding officer of each independent company in this state be empowered in like manner to receive a sufficient number of cartridges and flints for his company, and directed to observe the same order respecting them * * * .
>
> * * * [W]henever the several companies shall be dismissed from the service upon which they shall at any time be called out, the captain * * * of each company shall collect the cartridges which shall not have been expended, and wrap them up, and keep them in manner as above directed; and that return be made to the * * * commanding officer of each regiment, or independent company, of the cartridges * * * expended, and of the occasion, that they may be re-placed.{EN-208}

The evident goal of this statute was not to deny the Militia ammunition, but to ensure a constant supply of it from the public stocks when circumstances had created a great stringency, and "several alarm and militia companies * * * [we]re deficient". Authorizing the Captains to control, monitor the use of, and replenish their Companies' reserves of ammunition—even assigning particular individualized cartridges to particular men—guaranteed that minimally sufficient amounts would be available for all upon an "alarm". In any event, nothing in this statute (or anywhere else in Rhode Island's laws) precluded individual Militiamen from acquiring and maintaining in their personal possession their own supplies of gunpowder and ball, if they could do so.

D. Some Militiamen assisted in obtaining firearms. Rhode Island's pre-constitutional Militia statutes not only decreed that every able-bodied free man, rich and poor alike, would be suitably armed, but also assisted impecunious individuals in meeting their obligations. This was only just: For a right in society to invoke the duty of all its members to defend the community implies a corresponding responsibility to provide, where and when just and necessary, the means by which all men can fulfill that duty. So, from the earliest days, the principle was established that "the Towne Councils shall have power to cause those which are defective in armes, to be supplied in an equal way according to Estate and strength".{EN-209} How this was accomplished depended on the situation.

1. Minors, servants, and apprentices. One set of those potentially "defective in armes" consisted of Rhode Islanders' minor sons, servants, and apprentices, the majority of whom were insufficiently wealthy to purchase firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements with their own funds. Not surprisingly, because Rhode Island required that "parents and masters" must "find armes and amunition * * * for their sones and sarvants * * * which are to be listed, and to traine" in the Militia,{EN-210} she also declared parents and masters liable for any fines their sons, servants, or apprentices incurred if they were found "defective" in the performance of their Militia duties:[453]

> • [1665] "[F]or each defecte in not duely attending the trainings, each one * * * deficient, shall for every dayes defect, pay three shillings fine, to be levied by distraint on the partyes goods, or on the goods of the master, or mistress, or parents of such sones or sarvents as are defective[.]"{EN-211}
>
> • [1677] "[I]f any person or persons to be" fined "be a son or servant, that have noe visible estate of their owne, * * * then the * * * fines and forfeitures shall be levied and distrained upon the estate of their respective masters, parents or other persons under whose service, command or tuition they are."{EN-212}
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Enlisted Person, that shall Refuse or Neglect to make his Personal appearance Accoutred as [required] * * * on * * * Training Days * * * shall for every such Default pay * * * Three Shillings in Mony * * * & if such defaulter shall Refuse so to do, * * * the Captain * * * shall Grant forth his Warrant * * * to take and distrain so much of the Personal Estate of such delinquent Person, or such as have them in Tuition,[454] as near as conveniently may be will pay his Fine or Fines * * * ; and such Estate that shall be taken by distress, shall be duly Apprized by Two Free-Holders * * * , and the Captain is * * * Impowered to Administer the same, and the overplus if any there be, to be returned to the owner thereof, and if he shall refuse to receive the same, then the Clerk shall give him Credit * * * which shall be accounted for out of his next Fine that shall become due[.]"{EN-213}
>
> • [1756] "[W]hen any Person under the Age of twenty-one Years, shall neglect or refuse to pay his Fine for Neglect of military Duty, the Clerk shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parents or Masters of such Persons[.]"{EN-214}

---

[453] In what follows, the term "distress" refers to the legal procedure whereby personal property is seized to enforce the payment of a debt—in this context, fines or taxes. The verb "distrain" and the noun "distraint" refer to the act of making a distress. See, e.g., W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 6-15.

[454] "Tuition" means "[g]uardianship; superintendent care", particularly "over a young person". S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions; N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 1; Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, definition 1. Compare the use of this term in 1718 and thereafter to its use in 1677.

> • [1766] "[I]n Case such Delinquent be under the Age of Twenty-one Years, the Clerk shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parents or Masters of such Delinquent Persons[.]"{EN-215}
>
> • [1781] "[T]he Sergeant * * * shall take and distrain sufficient of the personal Estate of the Delinquent, if to be found, to satisfy and pay his Fine or Fines, having first required him to pay the same * * * : [and t]hat in case such Delinquent be under the Age of Twenty-one Years, the Sergeant shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parent or Master of such delinquent Person * * * : And that all Goods taken by Distraint shall be immediately advertised for Sale, and if not redeemed in Ten Days, shall be sold by such Sergeant at public Vendue, to pay such Fine or Fines * * * ; and the Overplus, if any shall remain, shall be returned to the Owner[.]"{EN-216}

This allocation of the ultimate costs of their dependents' defaults created a strong incentive for parents, masters, and mistresses to supply their sons, servants, and apprentices with the requisite firearms and ammunition in the first place (which presumably most of them tried to do). This requirement to provide firearms was one of the few Militia duties to which women—as widows with minor sons, or widows or spinsters with male servants, or perhaps widows or unmarried women managing an enterprise left to them by their husbands or fathers—were directly subject. But it evidenced that even women, to the degree consistent with the mores of the times, were expected to participate in their community's defense through the Militia.

2. The poor. Most of those likely to have proven "defective in armes" were numbered among the independent adult poor. Rhode Island employed several approaches to deal with this group.

a. Sometimes, the government granted pay, bounties, or insurance against loss to individuals who acquired or supplied their own firearms for Militia or other military service:

> • [1665] "The Assembly taking into consideration the great defect in training, and * * * complaining of the great inequality, in that the poorest being vnable to spare wherewith to maintaine armes and amunition, * * * yett are forced by the law to beare armes as well as the most able", "for the incorradgement of the meaner [that is, poorer] sort, there shall be alowed yearly nine shillings in currant pay to or for each soldiare listed in the traine band * * * for the repaireing of armes * * * and * * * nine shillings * * * to such parents and masters as find armes and amunition (as they must doe) for their sones and sarvants that are listable, which are to be listed, and to traine; as alsoe to such householders or other men that find themselves armes and traine in their owne persones"; "and for the raysing the aforesaid allowance * * * each towne shall * * * make a rate [that is, a tax] vpon each one rateable * * * with as much equality as may be, according to each ones estate[.]"{EN-217}

> • [1755] "[I]f the Arms brought by [the] Officers into Service in the Army, shall be damnified afterwards, or lost, the same shall be made good by the Colony, according to the Value thereof. * * * Every common Soldier [shall receive] Sixteen Pounds per Month, and Twenty Pounds Bounty, if furnished with a good Fire-lock; but no more than Fifteen Pounds without: That if the Arms brought by any Soldier into the Army, shall be damnified afterwards, or lost, the same shall be made good by the Colony, according to the Value thereof."{EN-218}
>
> • [1776] "[O]n any future alarm, notice or warning being given to the militia, they forthwith repair * * * to the place threatened to be invaded, in order to repel the enemy"; and "every one of the militia appearing properly accoutred, with a good fire-lock, bayonet, cartridge-box, &c. * * * shall be entitled to receive pay".{EN-219}
>
> • [1776] For "one regiment * * * raised from the militia of this state * * * the committee of safety * * * are hereby appointed to equip * * * each and every soldier * * * with * * * one good fire-arm, with a bayonet and cartridge-box; to be returned * * * at the expiration of the time of enlistment"; and "for as many * * * fire-arms, with a bayonet and cartridge-box, as cannot readily be furnished by the aforesaid committee, * * * sums [of money] shall be paid to each and every soldier who shall furnish himself with them".{EN-220}
>
> • [1780] "[I]n order to encourage each Soldier who shall inlist into the Service * * * to provide * * * Articles of Accoutrements for themselves, there shall be allowed unto each of the said Soldiers who shall furnish himself with a good Musket, Ram-Rod, Bayonet * * * Eighty Continental Dollars, * * * and for each Cartouch-Box so furnished, Twenty Dollars, in the like Money; which shall be paid * * * out of the General-Treasury[.]"{EN-221}

Some of these benefits were available, of course, not simply to individuals of limited financial means. But without them, in many cases the poor could not have served.

b. Usually, though, in *pre-*constitutional times Rhode Island herself provided her poor citizens with the firearms and ammunition requisite for their service in her Militia.

(1) One method was to supply impecunious members of the Militia with equipment the purchase of which was subsidized by funds the Militia itself amassed from fines statutorily imposed on defaulters:

> • [1647] "[I]f any shall come defective in his Armes or furniture [to Militia service], he shall forfeit and pay y^{e} sum of twelve pence"; and "all the fines and forfeitures shall be employed to the use and service of the [Train] Band".{EN-222}

• [1650] "[Certain named individuals], all excuses sett aparte, shall mende and make all lockes, stockes and pieces that by order from the warden of each Towne shall be from any of the inhabitants thearof presented to them, for just and suitable satisfaction in hand payed, without delay, under the penaltie of ten pounds, to be levied * * * to the use of the sayd Towne's militia"; and "all men that have gunns and pieces to mend, and have need to have them mended for their present defence, shall * * * carrie those pieces to mende, upon paine of forfeiting ten shillings a piece, which shall be levied * * * to the use of the * * * Towne's militia."{EN-223}

• [1658]"[T]he Town councill have power * * * to lay out * * * what fines are taken for men's defect in traininge for such as they judge not able to buy armes[.]"{EN-224}

• [1676] "[A]ll fines or forfeitures of the Traine Bands in each towne are * * * to be returned to the Treasurer of said towne by him to ke kept apart, that it may be for disbursements to furnish the said Traine Band with colors, drums, and other publicke instruments; and what may be more, is to be kept for a magazine."{EN-225}

• [1680] "[F]ines * * * relating to the millitary exercise, shall be returned to the Clerke of every * * * Traine Band, and to be disposed of * * * for the use of the * * * Company[.]"{EN-226}

• [1699, 1701, and 1705] "[A]ll fines and forfeitures that shall arise upon persons neglecting in training and watching, shall be disposed of by the commissioned officers of each respective company, to provide drums, colors, ammunition, &c."{EN-227}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll such Fines taken * * * shall be laid out to and for the Use of such Company * * * for the defraying their Incident Charge[.]"{EN-228}

• [1755] "[A]ll the * * * Fines [shall] be lodged in the Town Treasury * * * to purchase Arms and Ammunition * * * to be used by such Soldiers as are not able to provide for themselves, after all Military Accoutrements * * * for the Company are purchased[.]"{EN-229}

• [1766] "[T]he * * * Fines * * * shall be paid * * * into the Town-Treasury * * * to purchase Arms and Ammunition * * * for the use of such Town to be used by such Soldiers as are not able to provide for themselves, after all military Accoutrements * * * for the Company are purchased[.]"{EN-230}

• [1779] "[A]ll Fines * * * [shall] be deposited in the Town-Treasurer's Office * * * to be appropriated for purchasing Arms and Ammunition for those who shall be unable to provide for themselves, [after deducting certain other costs.]"{EN-231}

Because the requirements of Rhode Island's Militia laws were largely enforced by fines,[455] the draftsmen of these statutes presumably expected not insubstantial revenue from that source. Indeed, in principle under this system, Rhode Island's Militia might have been self-financing with respect to the acquisition of firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements—being supplied by: (i) the private purchases its richer members made with their own money; and (ii) the public provision of equipment to the poorer ones that a properly adjusted schedule of fines made possible.

In any event, such a system would probably be far more workable today than it ever was then. With a population of able-bodied adult citizens (both male and female) orders of magnitude greater than in *pre-*constitutional times, contemporary Rhode Island (or any other State) could easily maintain an active Militia sufficient for most purposes of "homeland security", even while exempting large numbers of her citizens from regular duties beyond some fundamental requirements of basic training and readiness. If all of the latter individuals were assessed modest fees in exchange for their exemptions (as most of them would doubtlessly be content to pay), the Militia could become financially self-supporting. Thus free of financial control by or pressure from any other department of government, or from private special-interest groups, the Militia could provide a truly independent "check and balance" against rogue public officials and the people who manipulate them from behind the political scenery.

(2) Another method whereby Rhode Island in *pre-*constitutional times supplied the poor members of her Militia with the necessary firearms and ammunition was for her Colonial (and later State) and Local governments to procure and when necessary distribute that equipment directly:

> • [1658] "[C]oncerninge * * * supplyeinge such as are not able to gett armes, * * * the Town councill have power to make a rate [that is, to tax] * * * for such as they judge not able to buy armes."{EN-232}
>
> • [1705] "[A]ll Indian men servants and others of [Block] Island, shall * * * be by the inhabitants and authority of said Island carefully provided for with arms and ammunition for [Militia] service out of the rates [that is, taxes] by the Collony's allowance to said inhabitants * * * for all such uses for their defence."{EN-233}
>
> • [1776] The "town councils [shall] give in a list of all persons in their towns * * * obliged by law to equip themselves with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box, and who are not able to purchase the same"; and each "town shall immediately make order for the supplying such persons with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box, at such town's

---

[455] See post, Chapter 12.

expense, to be lodged with the [Militia] captains of such district wherein such poor persons belong, for their use upon any proper occasion".{EN-234}

• [1776] "Two Thousand Stand of good Fire-Arms, with Bayonets, Iron Ramrods, and Cartouch-Boxes, [shall] be purchased for the Use of the Colony * * * , and distributed to each Town, in Proportion to the Number of Polls, upon the Alarm List"; "each Town shall * * * appoint some proper Person or Persons to receive and take the proper Care of them, and see that they are constantly in Order, and fit for Service"; and "the Town-Council * * * shall * * * determine what Persons * * * shall have the Benefit and Use of the Arms provided, * * * and be exempted from providing themselves as the Law requires".{EN-235}

• [1776] "[T]he Town-Councils * * * [shall] furnish such Persons as they shall certify to be unable to furnish themselves, with Arms * * * and Accoutrements, as by Law required; and that the same be paid out of the General Treasury."{EN-236}

• [1777] "That * * * thirty-two Small-Arms, for the Town of Exeter, thirty Small-Arms * * * for the Town of South-Kingstown, and twenty Small-Arms for the Town of East-Greenwich * * * [be delivered] for the Use of * * * the Poor", "[a]nd * * * twenty-five Small-Arms be delivered to the Poor of the Town of North-Kingstown".{EN-237}

• [1777] "Daniel Mowry * * * presented * * * an Account * * * for twenty-six Guns and Bayonets, purchased by Order of the Town-Council of Smithfield, for the poor Inhabitants * * * the Amount thereof * * * be paid * * * out of the General Treasury."{EN-238}

• [1777] "[T]he Small-Arms * * * purchased by this State, for such Persons as should be adjudged unable to furnish themselves therewith, [shall] be delivered to the Committees of Safety[.]"{EN-239}

• [1777] "[I]f any * * * who have been adjudged by the town council * * * unable to furnish themselves [with arms] * * * shall appear not duly equipped, * * * [the] town councils * * * are hereby empowered and directed to furnish them with arms and accoutrements[.]"{EN-240}

As these statutes evidence, sometimes the arms were furnished to individuals directly, and at other times they were "lodged with the [Militia] captains" or some other "proper Person or Persons to receive and take the proper Care of them" until their ultimate users actually needed them.

(3) Yet another method was for Local governments to provide firearms in payment for the use of which the working poor would have their wages docked. For example, a statute of 1781 provided that > if [an individual] shall not be of sufficient Ability, or shall otherwise neglect to do it, the Town-Council * * * are directed to furnish him with > a Gun, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box * * * at the Expence of the said Town and receive therefor, out of the Wages of such delinquent Person, if of sufficient Ability to furnish himself * * * , Twelve Shillings, in Gold or Silver * * * ; the Persons receiving the said Accoutrements to return them, or account therefor with the Town-Council who shall furnish the same.{EN-241}

c. Importantly, that Local governments supplied poor individuals with firearms was no denial of the latter's personal duty to provide themselves with arms, but rather a merely temporary exemption from that duty while their straitened financial circumstances rendered them incapable of fulfilling it. Moreover, only in some of these situations were the arms Local governments supplied not maintained in the poor persons' private possession. And these exceptions to the general rule doubtlessly derived from a particularized practical concern that desperately poor men would not have places in which to store their firearms securely, or might be tempted to sell those firearms to make ends meet, rather than from some notion that firearms should be under governmental control as a matter of principle. Indeed, in 1777 Rhode Island's General Assembly found that "it frequently happens that the Inhabitants and others, in this State, being instigated with a sordid selfish View of making Gain and Advantage to themselves, do purchase and receive of the Soldiery * * * their Guns * * * which is of the most pernicious Consequence, and ought to be speedily prevented", and mandated "[t]hat if any Person or Persons whoever shall purchase, or take in Pledge, of any Soldier or Soldiers * * * in this State, any * * * Guns, [or] Bayonets," the offender "shall * * * forfeit and pay as a Fine * * * six-fold the Value * * * of such Article * * * or shall suffer * * * corporal Punishment".{EN-242}

E. Firearms supplied to Militiamen serving as regular "Troops". Finally, when raising detachments of soldiers from amongst the men in her Militia for other duty in various military campaigns, Rhode Island supplied firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements to everyone involved. These were the types of "Troops" that the Constitution now prohibits the States from "keep[ing] * * * in time of Peace" "without the Consent of Congress".[456] For, distinguishably, a State must maintain her Militia at all times, with or without "the Consent of Congress".

1. Thus, when men were drafted from the Militia during the French and Indian War in 1757, Rhode Island's Towns were "empowered to procure, at the expense of the colony, half a pound of gun powder, twenty bullets, six flints * * * for each soldier * * * ; and * * * to hire horses * * * and to procure arms, and all other necessaries, in the like manner"—and "each and every commissioned officer, and soldier, who has a gun fit for service, shall make use of the same; and those who have none, shall be provided for".{EN-243}

---

[456] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

Similarly, when regiments were raised from the Militia for service in the War of Independence:

> • [1776] "[T]he committee of safety * * * equip[ped] and furnish[ed] each and every soldier * * * with * * * one good fire-arm, with a bayonet and cartridge-box; to be returned * * * at the expiration of the time of enlistment[.]"{EN-244}
>
> • [1780] "WHEREAS there are not within the public Stores of this State, a sufficient Number of Guns * * * to accoutre the Soldiers ordered * * * to be raised for Three Months * * * , for their immediate Service:
>
> "BE it therefore Enacted * * * , That each and every Town within this State shall provide and furnish for each and every Soldier which they are ordered to raise * * * One good Musket, with a good Ram-Rod, One suitable Bayonet, * * * One Cartouch-Box * * * ."{EN-245}
>
> • [1780] "WHEREAS the Inhabitants of Rhode-Island and Jamestown have been deprived of their Arms by the Enemy, and are now totally destitute of the same: It is therefore Voted * * * That Major General Heath be * * * requested, to furnish the Men apportioned and to be raised by the several Towns on the Islands of Rhode-Island and Jamestown, to do Duty for the Term of Three Months, with Fire-Arms from the Continental Store; and that this State will cause the same to be replaced.
>
> "It is further Voted * * * That the said Arms be repaired at the Expence of this State[.]"{EN-246}

Presumably, what Rhode Island did for these "Troops" she always could also have, and sometimes did do, for her Militia.

2. Especially instructive here is the contrast between Rhode Island's pre-constitutional Militia and her regular "Troops" with respect to the permanent personal possession of arms that came into the men's hands for service. Militiamen had a statutory duty themselves to obtain and thereafter to retain personal possession (and usually ownership, too) of firearms and related accoutrements, whereas regular "Troops" did not.

a. For a stark example of the difference, in 1757 the General Assembly observed that "this colony hath been greatly injured by the troops in former campaigns, embezzling and destroying the[ ] arms" that had been supplied to them by the government; and "for preventing" this misbehavior in the future it decreed that > the committee of war be * * * strictly enjoined to require an account of every soldier returning from the camp, without his arms, what became of them; and if the soldier or soldiers so returning, either by furlough or > discharged, do not bring a certificate from the captain of the company unto which he or they belonged, that he or they have delivered up his or their arms in good order unto * * * the person or persons that may be appointed for that purpose, before his or their leaving the camp, that the said committee of war deduct out of the wages of such soldier or soldiers, the full value of such arms as he or they were furnished with; * * * and that the * * * commanding officer inform the troops of the contents of this act.{EN-247}

Self-evidently, most Militiamen could not possibly have "embezzl[ed] * * * their arms" at any time, because they owned them in the first place; and next to no Militiamen, serving as such, were ever required to "deliver[ ] up * * * their arms in good order" (or at all) to public officials when returning from some service in the field, because public officials had no possible claim to possession of those arms.

The dichotomy between Militia and regular "Troops" with respect to permanent personal possession of firearms appears perhaps most clearly in a statute enacted in 1776, in which the General Assembly "enacted, that one regiment be * * * raised from the militia of this state", to "be composed of six men as soldiers, of every hundred of the male inhabitants of sixteen years of age, and upwards, as last estimated within this state", who would voluntarily enlist and "continue in the service of this state three months from the time of their enlistment, unless dismissed before that time by th[e] Assembly". The statute specifically provided that > the committee of safety * * * are * * * appointed to equip and furnish each and every soldier, who shall enlist, * * * with * * * one good fire-arm, with a bayonet and cartridge-box; to be returned to such of the said committee of safety who furnished the same, at the expiration of the time of enlistment of said soldiers.

>
> And * * * for as many * * * fire-arms, with a bayonet and cartridge-box, as cannot readily be furnished by the aforesaid committee, the following sums shall be paid to each and every soldier who shall furnish himself with them * * * for the use, thereof, to wit:
>
> * * * twelve shillings for a fire-arm and bayonet; and two shillings and sixpence, for a cartridge-box.
>
> * * * [T]he committee of safety * * * are hereby directed to receive the fire-arms in the town of Newport, belonging to this state, in order to equip the soldiers[.]{EN-248}

Thus, although Militiamen were recruited for this service, upon enlistment they became regular "Troops" for up to three months. As such, they all were entitled to the loan of necessary equipment, including firearms and accoutrements, drawn from public stocks (in this case, the Town of Newport)—but upon the expiry of their enlistments they were, quite reasonably, required to turn in that equipment.

As for the Militiamen who supplied their own firearms and accoutrements upon enlistment, the payment the statute mandated was for the temporary hire, not for the sale, of that equipment; for the statute did not require that such men should surrender that equipment to the Committee of Safety when their service ended. This, of course, was neither a novel procedure at the time, nor one which was not employed thereafter. Rhode Island often offered financial incentives from the public treasury in order to encourage her citizens to supply their own firearms:

> • [1755] "[I]f the Arms brought by [the] Officers into Service in the Army, shall be damnified afterwards, or lost, the same shall be made good by the Colony, according to the Value thereof. * * * Every common Soldier [shall receive] Sixteen Pounds per Month, and Twenty Pounds Bounty, if furnished with a good Fire-lock; but no more than Fifteen Pounds without: That if the Arms brought by any Soldier into the Army, shall be damnified afterwards, or lost, the same shall be made good by the Colony, according to the Value thereof."{EN-249}
>
> • [1775] "[E]ach able bodied, effective man, who shall enlist into the service, and find himself a small arm, bayonet and other accoutrements, shall be * * * paid forty shillings, as a bounty; and each able bodied, effective man, not finding himself a small arm, bayonet, and other accoutrements, shall receive twenty-four shillings[.]"{EN-250}
>
> • [1775] "[E]ach able bodied man, who shall enlist into the service, and find himself a small arm, bayonet and other accoutrements, shall be allowed and paid sixteen shillings, therefor."{EN-251}
>
> • [1776] "[E]ach able-bodied, effective man, who shall enlist into the * * * regiment, and find himself a small-arm, bayonet and other accoutrements, shall be allowed sixteen shillings, therefor[.]"{EN-252}
>
> • [1776] "[T]hat for as many * * * fire-arms, with a bayonet and cartridge-box, as cannot readily be furnished by the * * * committee [of safety], the following sums shall be paid to each and every soldier who shall furnish himself with them * * * , to wit: * * * twelve shillings for a fire-arm and bayonet, and two shillings and sixpence, for a cartridge-box[.]"{EN-253}
>
> • [1776] "[I]f any man, who shall enlist himself, * * * shall furnish himself with a gun, bayonet, cartouch-box * * * , he shall be allowed * * * [e]ighteen shillings[.]"{EN-254}
>
> • [1780] "[T]o encourage each Soldier who shall inlist into the Service * * * to provide * * * for themselves, there shall be allowed unto each * * * who shall furnish himself with a good Musket, Ram-Rod, Bayonet * * * Eighty Continental Dollars * * * , and for each Cartouch-Box * * * Twenty Dollars * * * out of the General-Treasury[.]"{EN-255}

> • [1781] "[I]n case any * * * men shall furnish themselves with a gun, bayonet and cartouch-box, they shall be allowed a further sum of twelve shillings, silver money, each."{EN-256}

b. Other statutes for raising "Troops" (as opposed to deploying Militiamen) also made it clear that the men could not retain possession of, or otherwise treat as their own personal property, the public firearms supplied to them, after their period of service ended. For one example, in 1777 the General Assembly mandated that > two battalions, each consisting of six hundred men, * * * also a regiment of artillery, consisting of three hundred men, * * * be immediately raised for the defence of the United States in general, and of this state in particular * * * .

>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [E]ach able-bodied man, who shall enlist himself * * * shall * * * be furnished with a * * * gun, bayonet, cartouch-box * * * , to be returned or accounted for, at the expiration of his service * * * .{EN-257}

As this statute—unlike other enactments of its type{EN-258}—made no provision for the recruits to supply their own firearms and accountrements, the arms with which the men were "furnished" had to be public arms merely loaned to them for the duration of their service.

Similarly, in 1779 a statue provided that,

> WHEREAS our Enemies have invaded this State with a powerful Armament, and are now in Possession of the Island of Rhode-Island, whereby we are exposed to still more hostile Attacks:
>
> BE it therefore Enacted * * * , That Two Battalions of Infantry, each consisting of Five Hundred and Eighty-five Men * * * , and a Regiment of Artillery, consisting of Three Hundred and Thirty Men * * * , be immediately raised for the Defence of the United States in general, and of this State in particular * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * That each able-bodied Man who shall enlist * * * shall be furnished with a Gun, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box, and Canteen; the Three former to be returned or accounted for at the Expiration of the Service[.]{EN-259}

c. In 1777, the General Assembly dealt with a more complex situation:

> Whereas, it frequently happens that the inhabitants and others, in this state, being instigated with a sordid, selfish view of making gain and advantage to themselves, do purchase and receive of the soldiery within this state, their guns * * * ; which is of the most pernicious consequence, > and ought to be speedily prevented; in order, therefore, to remedy such mal-practices for the future,—

>
> * * * [I]f any person or persons whoever, shall purchase, or take in pledge, of any soldier or soldiers belonging or serving in this state, any * * * guns, bayonets * * * he, she or they, so offending, shall, upon conviction thereof, forfeit and pay as a fine therefor, to and for the use of this state, six fold the value or price of such article by him or them so received; or shall suffer such corporal punishment as the court * * * shall adjudge adequate to such offence * * * .{EN-260}

The peculiar aspect of this statute is that it penalized only the individuals who "purchase[d], or t[ook] in pledge, of any soldier * * * any guns" or "bayonets", and not the "soldiers" themselves who sold or pledged those items. Plainly enough, if a "soldier" sold or pledged the public arms with which he had been entrusted, he was just as blameworthy as the individual to whom he transferred those items. In the common usage of the time, however, the noun "soldiers" could have described both the members of Rhode Island's Militia and the "Troops" in her regular armed forces. In the case of most Militiamen, the firearms and accoutrements they brought to their service were the men's private property, which their owners were perfectly entitled in principle to sell or to give in pledge as they saw fit. (This was also true under various statutes that allowed men who enlisted in the regular troops to supply their own arms.) To be sure, if "soldiers" who had initially supplied their own arms later disposed of that equipment while on duty, they might then have been fined or otherwise penalized under Militia or other military law for being disarmed—but, arguably, not for selling or pledging their very own property. And certainly no Militiaman not actually on duty could have been punished simply for selling or pledging his own firearm or bayonet, as long as he could have arranged to have substitutes at hand when called into the field or subjected to an inspection. So, perhaps because the subset of "soldiers" who supplied their own arms could not fairly be prosecuted simply for disposing of their personal property, but the General Assembly desired to suppress root and branch any and all trade in arms from all "soldiers belonging or serving in this state" to "any [other] person or persons whoever", the most politic way to shut down the traffic was to penalize the recipients of the arms. That it would have been far easier for the authorities to have apprehended in camp or on the muster-field the "soldiers" who had disposed of their "guns" or "bayonets"—as opposed to the "persons" who had "purchase[d]" those items, or had "take[n them] in pledge", and thereafter might have absconded from the State—renders this explanation conclusive. Thus, in this statute, the draftsmen implicitly recognized, by effectively working around, the difference between Militiamen—who usually came to their service possessed of their very own firearms and accoutrements; and regular "Troops"—who, even if they were Militiamen before their enlistments, usually served in the regular forces with arms provided for them from public stocks.

In sum, Rhode Island's pre-constitutional laws aimed at an universality of armament among her able-bodied free adult male inhabitants, either through their own efforts or with the assistance of public institutions. In those days, "gun control" meant, not keeping firearms and ammunition away from as many private citizens as legislators might contrive to disarm, but instead seeing to it that as many citizens as possible possessed their own arms at all times.

The lesson from this history for revitalized "Militia of the several States" today is obvious. In most contexts, the General Government has no obligation to fund activities even if they involve individuals' exercise of so-called "fundamental rights".[457] But, with respect to "the Militia of the several States", Congress has the affirmative duty "[t]o provide for * * * arming" them,[458] "arming" always being "necessary and proper"[459] because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State".[460] This could require expenditures of public moneys where private moneys did not suffice (as with the poor), or perhaps in all cases, in order to ensure that every Militiaman would be properly armed at all times. Congress could achieve this end: (i) by requiring those individuals with sufficient personal financial resources to buy their own firearms in the free market; and (ii) by subsidizing others with tax credits, public grants, or even outright provision of the equipment at public expense. The second course would be a legitimate exercise of Congress's power "[t]o lay and collect Taxes * * * to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence * * * of the United States"[461]—for the Militia are plainly central to "the common Defence", being "necessary to the security of a free State". And the discrimination between the rich and the poor (to the favor of the poor) would be justified on the ground that such discrimination was always acceptable within "well regulated Militia" during the pre-constitutional era, and therefore constitutes part of the very definition of "well regulated" today.[462]

---

[457] See, e.g., Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 549-550 (1983); Lyng v. Automobile Workers, 485 U.S. 360, 368 (1988).

[458] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16. See ante, at 50-54.

[459] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 (emphasis supplied).

[460] U.S. Const. amend. II (emphasis supplied). See ante, at 50-54.

[461] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

[462] To be sure, "[u]nlike the Fourteenth Amendment, the Fifth Amendment contains no equal protection clause" and to that degree "provides no guaranty against discriminatory legislation by Congress." Detroit Bank v. United States, 317 U.S. 329, 337 (1943). That is, "no [explicit] guaranty"—for "discrimination, if gross enough, is equivalent to confiscation and [therefore] subject under the Fifth Amendment to * * * annulment". Steward Machine Company v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548, 585 (1937). A subsidy to insure that everyone within the Militia too poor to buy his own arms is nonetheless properly equipped cannot constitute a "gross" discrimination that "is equivalent to confiscation" of rich individuals' property, however. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 1 and 16.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Rhode Island aimed at having her *pre-*constitutional Militia provided with the types of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements that were equivalent to the standard equipment employed in the regular Armed Forces of that day.

Because her *pre-*constitutional Militia was no merely theoretical establishment—but instead a permanently standing and fully equipped force ready to deploy immediately a danger threatened the community—Rhode Island required every eligible male to possess, not just any firearms, but firearms and ammunition suitable specifically for Militia service at that time.

A. During the Colonial era, firearms steadily progressed in type from "musket and match" through a variety of "firelocks", which included the "matchlock", "wheel lock", "snaphaunce", and "flintlock".[463] Once perfected, the flintlock remained the standard action for almost all firearms in regular use from the late 1600s until the introduction of the percussion cap in the early 1800s.[464] Whatever the fluidity of the technological development of firearms during that period, though, Rhode Island's inflexible goal was for her Militia to be, man for man, not only absolutely better armed than such irregular marauders as hostile Indians, but also reasonably as well equipped as any European regular armed forces Rhode Islanders might be required to support or to engage in conventional warfare. In practice, this meant firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements equivalent to the types then commonly in day-to-day use in the British Army, not simply arms that sufficed only for individual self-defense, let alone solely for hunting, target shooting, or other sport. Thus—

> • [1647] "[E]very Inhabitant of the Island [of Rhode Island] above sixteen or under sixty yeares of age, shall alwayes be provided of a Musket, one pound of powder, twenty bullets, and two fadom of Match, with sword, rest, bandaleers all completely furnished."{EN-261}

---

[463] For definitions of these and other material terms, see ante, at 140-141 note 428.

[464] For an overview of the types, operations, and capabilities of the firearms generally employed during the latter part of the Eighteenth Century, see, e.g., Bill Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution and Other Colonial Wars (Lincoln, Rhode Island: Andrew Mowbray Incorporated, Publishers, 2005); Michael Stephenson, Patriot Battles: How the War of Independence Was Fought (New York, New York: HarperCollins Publishers, 2007), at 119-145.

• [1658] "And whereas, it was formerly ordered, [that] armes [should] bee muskett and match. Now it is declared, that both it and fyrelockes and snaphaunces with powder hornes bee alowed; and if any bee complayned of for defective armes, the Town Counsill in each towne have power to judge off, and order the armes to bee such as they may finde will fully answer the meaninge of the lawe concerninge suffitiant armes[.]"{EN-262}

• [1677] Every inhabitant eligible for the Militia "from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares" "shall * * * have one good gun or muskitt fit for service, one pound of good powder, and thirty bullets at least".{EN-263}

• [1699, 1701, and 1705] Every member of the Militia shall "appear complete in arms * * * with a good or sufficient muskett or fuse, and sword or bagganett, cotouch box or bandelears, with twelve bullets, fit for his piece, half a pound of powder, six good flints".{EN-264}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll Male Persons Residing for the space of Three Months within this Colony from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years" "shall be always provided with one good Musket, or Fuzee, the Barrel whereof not to be less than three foot and an half in length, to the satisfaction of the Commission Officers of the Company; also one pound of good Gunpowder, thirty Bullets, fit for his Gun, six good Flints, fit for Service; one good Sword, or Baionet, a Cartouch Box, ready fitted with Cartriges of Gunpowder and Bullets"; and "every Trooper [in the Horse] shall be always provided with one good serviceable Horse, * * * one Carbine, one pair of good Pistols, one Sword, one pound of Gunpowder, thirty sizeable Bullets, twelve good Flints".{EN-265}

• [1766] "[A]ll male Persons, who have resided for the Space of Three Months in this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen to Fifty" "shall always be provided with One good Musket or Fuzee, the Barrel whereof not to be less than Three Feet and an Half in Length, to the Satisfaction of the Commission Officers, also one Pound of good Gun-Powder, Thirty Bullets fit for his Gun, Six good Flints, One good Sword or Bayonet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartridges of Powder and Ball".{EN-266}

• [1774] Each member of the Militia "shall * * * be provided with a sufficient Gun or Fuzee * * * [a]nd also * * * a good Bayonet fixed on his Gun".{EN-267}

• [1776] All members of the Militia "are by law obliged to equip themselves with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box".{EN-268}

• [1776] "[E]very one of the militia appearing properly accoutred, with a good fire-lock, bayonet, cartridge-box, &c. * * * shall be entitled to receive pay."{EN-269}

• [1776] "Persons * * * by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box * * * do [that is, shall] provide themselves[.]"{EN-270}

• [1778] "[A]ll Persons * * * by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box * * * do provide themselves therewith * * * , or with a Rifle-Gun and Sword[.]"{EN-271}

• [1779] "[E]ach and every effective Man * * * shall provide, and at all times be furnished, at his own Expence (excepting such Persons * * * unable to purchase the same) with one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto, * * * one Ram-rod, Worm, Priming-wire and Brush, and one Cartouch-Box."{EN-272}

• [1781] "[E]ach of the * * * non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers [shall] furnish himself with a good Musket, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box[.]"{EN-273}

• [1781] "[E]ach Person, liable to do military Duty * * * (unless excused by the Town-Council * * * for Inability to procure the same)" must have "a good Gun, being his own Property, * * * a Bayonet * * * , a Cartouch-Box * * * , a Ram-Rod * * * , a Wormer * * * , a Priming-Wire * * * , [and] Three good Flints[.]"{EN-274}

B. The only plausible reading of these statutes is that the requirements of a "good" or "sufficient" firearm "fit for service"—especially "to the Satisfaction of the Commission Officers"—excluded both antiquated types and models unserviceable by either their designs or their states of disrepair.

1. The initial considerations were sound design and good mechanical operation. First, Militiamen's firearms had to be up to date: Which is why, as technology and supply improved over the years, the statutes initially ordered the use of "muskett and match", then mandated "fyrelocks and snaphaunces", then required "muskett[s] or Fuze[s]", and finally allowed the "Rifle-Gun". Second, Militiamen's firearms had to be up to snuff: Which is why, over and over again, the statutes reiterated each Militiaman's obligation to provide "one good gun", "a good or sufficient musket", "one good Musket * * * to the satisfaction of the Commission Officers of the Company", "a sufficient Gun", or "a good Fire-Arm". Inasmuch as the design of firearms changed very little once the flintlock had come into general usage, "good" firearms throughout most of the pre-constitutional period must usually have meant a flintlock smoothbored musket or fusil for infantry, a carbine and pair of pistols for cavalry.

2. The next consideration was suitability for the intended service. The obviously preferable situation was for Militiamen's firearms to be designed specifically for military usage. Which is why the later statutes required "a good Bayonet fixed on his Gun" or "one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto"; or simply conjoined "a good fire-lock, bayonet", "a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet", or "a good Musket, Bayonet" as an inseparable pair. For, in those days, infantrymen's ability to launch a bayonet charge or to repel an enemy's, or to turn aside a cavalry charge with the points of their own bayonets, often meant the difference between victory or defeat. But Rhode Island's statutes also recognized that many of her men simply could not furnish themselves with a "good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto"—and therefore allowed them to substitute a sword, as in the phrases "sword or bagganett", "Sword or Bayenet", and "good Sword, or Baionet". The firearms in these Militiamen's hands might not have been designed specifically with Militia service in mind, as the products of many Colonial gunsmiths were not.[465] Nonetheless, in combination with a good edged weapon, they were usable for such service to a reasonably satisfactory degree. Others may have been all-purpose "fowlers" suitable not only for hunting birds and common game, but also for Militia service—even to the extent of sometimes being specially fitted for bayonets.[466] New England gunsmiths produced a distinctive type of fowler, some of which Colonial marksmen employed in the Battle of Lexington and Concord.[467]

Rhode Island did not require, but merely allowed, her Militiamen to be armed with "Rifle-Gun[s]", for two reasons: First, although New England did not lack for gunsmiths,[468] rifles were not then particularly common in that area.[469] Second, although rifles were technologically superior to smoothbored muskets, having longer ranges and far greater accuracy, smoothbored muskets were often tactically superior in the set-piece, stand-up battles of the day. In forays based on linear formations firing face-to-face at short ranges on open ground, smoothbored muskets could maintain higher rates of fire than rifles, and when fitted with bayonets as original equipment (as rifles only infrequently were) could be effectively employed as "cold steel" in fighting at close quarters. Under other tactical situations, however, such as fighting in loose order in wooded country or at long range, rifles almost invariably outperformed smoothbored muskets.

In any event, the salient consideration overall was that Militiamen's firearms, of whatever types, should be usable for military service, either as designed or as complemented by or supplemented with other readily available personal weapons. When the statutes referred to a "good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted

---

[465] See, e.g., Harold L. Peterson, Arms and Armor in Colonial America, 1526-1783 (Harrisburg, Pennsylvania: Stackpole Company, 1956), at 178-179.

[466] See B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, Part 2, Colonial Fowlers.

[467] Id. at 113-119, 105.

[468] See, e.g., F. Allen Thompson, "Worcester County Gunsmiths 1760-1830", in The American Society of Arms Collectors, Longarms in America, George E. Weatherly, Compiler (Easton, Pennsylvania: The Mack Printing Group, 1997), Volume 1, at 141 (Massachusetts).

[469] See, e.g., Allen French, The Day of Concord and Lexington: The Nineteenth of April, 1775 (Boston, Massachusetts: Little, Brown, and Company, 1925), at 28 & note 1.

thereto" they intended a specifically military-grade firearm all around. When they referred to a firearm to be used in conjunction with a "good Sword or Bayonet", they intended what might have been a marginally military-grade firearm, or what today might be labeled a "sporting"-grade firearm—but, in the latter case, obviously one that possessed a basic military capability simply as a firearm, and close to full military capability when supplemented with a "good Sword". Thus, Rhode Island's statutes recognized, not a fundamental difference in kind, but only a difference in degree, among the many firearms her Militiamen might have brought to their service. Doubtlessly, some "sporting" arms, such as small-bored fusils and fowling pieces, could not have been used satisfactorily as Militia arms in some situations. But many others could have served that purpose. And most military-grade firearms (with their bayonets set aside) could have been used for such "sporting" purposes as hunting or target shooting, or (perhaps even with the bayonets attached) for personal self-defense.

C. Another indication that Rhode Island concerned herself with the specifically military service to which her Militiamen's firearms were dedicated, not necessarily the purposes for which those firearms might originally have been designed, is what the statutes demanded by way of accoutrements and ammunition. For, whether his firearm was originally of military grade or not, each Militiaman was required to provide himself with bandoliers or a cartridge box, and up to "one Pound of good Gunpowder, [and] Thirty Bullets fit for his Gun". Bandoliers and "a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartriges of Gunpowder and Bullets", were typically military, not "sporting", accoutrements. "Thirty bullets" was a large number for a hunter to carry, but certainly not for a soldier. And "one Pound of good Gunpowder"—which contained seven thousand grains—could produce more than twice that many cartridges. For instance, in 1759 the British standard charge for a musket cartridge for field service was one hundred sixty-five grains of black powder (including the priming charge), or about one hundred nine grains for a less robust "exercise" cartridge.[470] Later on, the British Pattern 1776 Rifle used a regulation charge of one hundred ten grains, which was likely reduced in the interest of accuracy to about eighty-three grains.[471] If Rhode Island's Militiamen had settled on an average charge of one hundred ten grains in their various firelocks, "one Pound of good Gunpowder" would have provided each of them with about sixty-three rounds—a not inconsiderable supply of ammunition that probably vanishingly few merely "sporting" shooters of that era would ever have taken with them afield.

D. On the other hand, these statutes also indirectly emphasized that her Militiamen brought their own firearms to the service. For instance, the explicit requirements from 1699 through 1766 that each Militiaman should supply "bullets, fit for his piece" or "Bullets, fit for his Gun" reflected the disparities Rhode Island expected to find in the calibers of the various firearms her men possessed—which resulted from their purchases, at widely separated times and from many different manufacturers or suppliers in the free market, of firearms of differing designs and levels of quality, perhaps acquired for reasons in addition to use in the Militia—which purchases were the consequences of the statutory requirements that, if possible, Militiamen should furnish themselves with arms howsover they could. Local economics played a rôle as well. For, to evade the British mercantilist policy that Americans should purchase their manufactured goods from England, New England gunsmiths often made up "combination guns" out of parts acquired from here and there.[472] These were eminently workable firearms—but hardly identical in specifications. Had Rhode Island's government supplied firearms of uniform design and manufacture to her Militia, or mandated that her Militiamen should have purchased only firearms of certain designated calibers, no matter what the source, the requirement the government imposed that each man's bullets should actually fit his firearm would have been unnecessary. (Of course, the disparities with which the statutes from 1699 to 1766 were concerned did not entirely disappear thereafter. Apparently, though, Rhode Island's legislators throughout the remainder of the pre-constitutional period took it for granted that her citizens were sufficiently sophisticated to know, without being reminded in her Militia Acts, that their bullets needed to fit the bores of their guns.)

---

[470] De Witt Bailey, Small Arms of the British Forces in America, ante note 428, at 247.

[471] De Witt Bailey, British Military Flintlock Rifles, 1740-1840 (Lincoln, Rhode Island: Andrew Mowbray Publishers, 2002), at 34.

[472] See Benjamin F. Hubbell, "The New England Combination Gun, 1730 to 1775", in The American Society of Arms Collectors, Longarms in America, ante note 468, Volume 1, at 27. These likely included parts cannibalized from obsolete firearms and sold into the commercial market by Britain's Board of Ordinance. See B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 17.

CHAPTER EIGHT

Rhode Island provided for regular inspections in order to insure that her inhabitants possessed all of their requisite firearms and ammunition in serviceable condition.

During the pre-constitutional era, Rhode Island did not merely mandate that her able-bodied free adult male inhabitants should acquire firearms and ammunition adequate for Militia service, and thereafter possess them in their own homes at all times, but also searchingly inquired into their actual compliance with her regulations.

A. From the very earliest days onwards, Rhode Island required inspections of the firearms and ammunition actually in her inhabitants' hands, in order to determine who possessed—or did not possess—what, and the condition of serviceability in which those arms were maintained:

1. Some of these inspections occurred more or less automatically in the normal course of events during Militiamen's regular musters for training and exercise, without any specific statutory directives to that effect. For example—

> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Listed Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall be always provided with one good Musket, or Fuzee * * * to the Satisfaction of the Commission Officers of the Company ; also one pound of good Gunpowder, thirty Bullets, fit for his Gun, six good Flints, fit for Service; one good Sword, or Baionet, a Cartouch Box, ready fitted with Cartriges of Gunpowder and Bullets, on the penalty of Three Shillings, for each time he shall be found not provided * * * .
>
> " * * * [T]he Captain of each respective Company or Train-band * * * shall * * * Call together the Company under his Command, and Exercise them in Martial Discipline, two Days in each Year in time of Peace and Four in War * * * .
>
> " * * * [E]very Enlisted Person, that shall Refuse or Neglect to make his Personal appearance Accoutred as aforesaid, on such Training Days * * * shall for every such Default pay * * * Three Shillings in Mony[.]"{EN-275}
>
> • [1766] ""[E]very enlisted Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall be always provided with One good Musket, or Fuzee * * * to the Satisfaction of the Commission Officers, also One Pound of good Gun-Powder, thirty Bullets, fit for his Gun, six good Flints, One good Sword or Bayonet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartridges of Powder and Ball, under the > Penalty of Four Pence, for each Article of Accoutrement * * * which he shall be deficient in, for every Time he shall be unprovided therewith * * * .

>
> " * * * [T]he Captain of each respective Company or Trained Band * * * shall * * * call together the Company under his Command, and exercise them in martial Discipline, Two Days in each Year * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [E]very Enlisted Person who shall refuse or neglect to make his personal Appearance, accoutred as aforesaid, on such training Days * * * shall for every such Default pay a Fine[.]"{EN-276}

Self-evidently, no Militiaman could have been "provided with one good Musket, or Fuzee * * * to the Satisfaction of the Commission Officers of [his] Company" on those occasions, unless one or more of those "Officers" actually inspected his firearm. And no Militiaman who actually "ma[d]e his Personal appearance * * * on such Training Days" could have been found improperly "Accoutred" and therefore subject to a fine, unless his equipment had been inspected. Presumably as well, on every occasion on which Militiamen mustered for any form of armed service, some "Commission Officer[ ]" would have conducted at least a rudimentary inspection of some kind in order to determine whether the men under his command were prepared to perform the duty at hand.

2. Other inspections were the products of explicit and specific mandates:

- [1639] The "Clerke of the Traine Band" was "to take a view of the Armes, and to Returne [that is, report on] the defects".{EN-277}
- [1643] Inspectors were to go "to every inhabitant" in the Town of Portsmouth to "see whether every one of them has powder, and what bullets run".{EN-278}
- [1643] Inspectors were to look "up all the armes in the Towne [of Portsmouth] w[ithin] the month * * * and * * * go to every house and [see] what armes are defective".{EN-279}
- [1655] "[A]n accompt shall begiven within ten dayes * * * to y^{e} head officer of everie Towne * * * of what powder, lead and shot there is in the possession of everie inhabitant of y^{e} townes".{EN-280}
- [1665] "[T]he Clarke of the traine band in each towne" was "required to informe himselfe" as to the "gunpowder, * * * lead or bulletts" in the home of "every man in each towne", "and finding any man vnsuplyed * * * to make report to the * * * magistrates".{EN-281}
- [1667] Inspectors were "to goe from house to house throughout the towne of Newport, the villages and precincts thereof, and to take a precise and exact account of all the armes, amunition and weapons of warr each person is furnished with, or hath in his house to spare to others, and in what condition with regard to service the same is in".{EN-282}

• [1669] Each "Towne Councill" was "to see that the inhabitants * * * bee furnished with ammunition according to law; and that the armes bee fixed and in readiness for service".{EN-283}

• [1676] Inspectors in Newport and Portsmouth were "to take account how all persons are provided with * * * guns, powder, shot and lead, and make returne [that is, a report] thereof".{EN-284}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll * * * Persons * * * excus'd from Training, yet shall notwithstanding be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train, & * * * once every year, or oftner, * * * there shall be * * * a Survey and Examination made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is Required[.]"{EN-285}

• [1755] "[E]very Person * * * by Law to be accoutred" was "directed to provide himself with Arms, and other Accoutrements * * * by the last Monday of April next, * * * at which Time, Examination shall be made, and also, on the third Monday of October, and last Monday of April annually, for the future[.]"{EN-286}

• [1766] "[A]ll * * * Persons * * * excused from training, shall, notwithstanding, be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train. And * * * Twice in every Year * * * there shall be an Examination and Survey made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is required[.]"{EN-287}

• [1774] For all Militiamen, including "all those who, being exempted from appearing on the Days of Training, are notwithstanding, obliged to be provided with Arms and other Accoutrements, * * * the examination and survey [of arms] * * * shall be made * * * on the First Monday in February, and on the last Monday in April".{EN-288}

• [1775] Inspectors were "directed to take an account * * * of the powder, arms and ammunition, in the several towns in this colony, * * * including private as well as public stock", and "to go to the house of each person * * * to take an account of [those items]".{EN-289}

• [1776] "[E]ach captain * * * of the several independent companies, and companies of militia in this state, [shall] notify his company to appear at some proper place * * * under arms, with all accoutrements, agreeably to law.

"That such captain * * * make out a list of the deficiency of each person in each article.

"That he send a proper officer to the dwelling-house of each person not attending, to examine how far such person be deficient.

"That each captain * * * of the companies of militia, make a proper return thereof, to the colonel of the regiment * * * .

> "That each captain * * * of the independent companies, make a like return to th[e General] Assembly[.]"{EN-290}

> • [1779] An inspector was "directed to cause strict examination to be made of the state of the arms * * * of the militia, alarm and independent companies, within this state"{EN-291}—which would have included all able-bodied free adult men from sixteen to sixty years of age.[473]

B. Not surprisingly, one purpose of these inspections was to direct defaulters to have their defective firearms repaired or replaced. In early statutes, this purpose was explicit:

> • [1643] An inspector was to "go to every house [in Portsmouth] and [see] what armes are defective; and that the men whose armes are [to be handed] in to be mended".{EN-292}

> • [1650] Certain private gunsmiths, "all excuses sett aparte, shall mende and make all lockes, stockes and pieces that by order from the warden of each Towne shall be from any of the inhabitants thearof presented to them, for just and suitable satisfaction in hand payed, without delay"; and "all men that have gunns and pieces to mend, and have need to have them mended for their present defence, shall forthwith, according to order, carrie those pieces to mende".{EN-293}

> • [1667] Inspectors were "to goe from house to house throughout the towne of Newport, the villages and precincts thereof," and "call vpon such [persons] as have deffects [in their arms and ammunition], that they may be supplyed in the place forthwith * * * to repaire to such persons as may supply them".{EN-294}

Later, the requirement to keep firearms in good repair was implicit in the process of regular inspection of arms, coupled with the imposition of fines against those men whose equipment proved unavailable, unusable at all events, unsuitable for service in the Militia, or unsatisfactory because defective in condition or operation.[474]

C. If these enactments could be described as exemplifying a species of "gun control", their purpose was to certify that Rhode Islanders controlled their own firearms and ammunition themselves, by possessing the full table of necessary equipment in their own homes, in good working order. These statutes presumed that any and all of the inhabitants might, and probably should, have been fully armed at all times—indeed, that some individuals might possess a superfluity of firearms and ammunition, and that extensive private arsenals were not only not unlikely but even desirable.

---

[473] See ante, at 126.

[474] On the imposition of fines to effectuate these controls, see post, at 275-284.

Self-evidently, none of this would have been necessary (or sensible, for that matter) had the government itself been monopolistically acquiring firearms and ammunition, maintaining them in public arsenals and magazines, distributing them among the citizens only if and when public officials deemed it necessary, and afterwards collecting the equipment for storage away from common citizens' hands. To the contrary, Rhode Island's pre-constitutional inspection-laws presupposed that individuals would and did obtain firearms and ammunition on their own, without any prior governmental approval or surveillance, and that they would and did possess those arms personally in their own homes, with no subsequent governmental interference aimed at dispossessing them. Indeed, it was precisely because individuals could and did acquire and maintain possession of firearms and ammunition by and for themselves that legislators presumed it possible that some might neglect to do so at all, or to keep their equipment in a proper state of readiness, and that therefore regular inspections and penalties for discovered failures to be sufficiently armed and accoutred were necessary and proper.

Moreover, in those days inspections were never distrusted as possible preliminaries to *dis*armament, but instead were accepted as proper means to ensure that every eligible member of the community was always as thoroughly armed as possible. No one feared that public officials, in the otherwise proper exercise of their duties, might misuse inspections to ferret out the locations of firearms and ammunition in private possession, for two reasons: First, no one doubted that, in a community in which every able-bodied adult free man was statutorily required to be armed, inspections to determine who possessed arms for the ultimate purpose of targeting individuals to be dispossessed of their arms would be supererogatory. Even a marginally sensible tyrannical régime would have realized that its myrmidons would have needed to invade essentially every home if they were to round up most of the firearms in private hands. Second, no one in the pre-constitutional era, or for generations thereafter, believed that public officials acting honestly as the agents of a self-governing people could, or ever would, claim a license to strip individuals of the ultimate power of popular sovereignty—the Power of the Sword—by confiscating their arms. To be sure, rogue officials might have presented such a danger—as they finally did, to their own deposition, starting in Boston and its environs in 1775. But it was in preparation for just such a dire contingency that the people always maintained possession of arms in their own hands—and submitted to inspections in order to insure that state of affairs. It was only when "the Militia of the several States" were effectively disestablished and most Americans consigned to the constitutionally self-contradictory and politically ridiculous "unorganized militia",[475] and efforts at systematic "gun control" initiated at every level of the federal system in and after the early 1900s, that official inquiries of various sorts aimed at determining which Americans possessed firearms and ammunition began to make practical sense from the perspective of aspiring usurpers and tyrants. For after most Americans who were eligible for "the Militia of the several States" instead became members of "the unorganized militia" willy-nilly, exactly who possessed what firearms and ammunition, and where that equipment might be stored, became open to question. At that point, rogue public officials' primary desiderata became supervision over the private manufacture, distribution, and purchase of firearms; registration of firearms in Americans' private possession; and other intelligence collected for the eventual purpose of facilitating confiscation of all such firearms.

[475] See post, at 786-793.

CHAPTER NINE

Throughout the pre-constitutional era, Rhode Island's Militia statutes presupposed, promoted, protected, and relied upon a free market in firearms and ammunition.

All contemporary "gun-control" theories and actual enactments assume the existence of powers in governments at the National, State, and even Local levels to destroy, piece by piece and at length entirely, a free market in the very firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements necessary for "[a] well regulated Militia". Such purported powers, of course, can find no basis whatsoever in pre-constitutional law.[476] Indeed, quite the opposite.

A. The presumption of a free market in arms. Throughout the pre-constitutional period, Rhode Island's Militia laws presumed that a free market in firearms and ammunition, adequate for the requirements the statutes imposed on her residents to arm themselves, either: (i) already existed; or (ii) would rapidly develop in response to the demand for such equipment for Militia purposes—and (iii) would always remain in operation. This, for three reasons:

First, legislators were surely aware of the powerful tendency for demand to create supply, and doubtlessly expected that their Militia laws would promote the fullest development and expansion of the market possible at that time, certainly far in excess of what would have occurred without the stimulative effects those statutes provided.

Second, legislators understood that political interference with the market would have been self-defeating, and subversive of the community's safety. For, in the absence of governmental arsenals that could have produced sufficient arms, the market was the only practical source for the quantities of firearms and ammunition required to equip the Militia.

Third, everyone in that era knew that, as far as each individual human being is concerned, "[s]elf-defence * * * , as it is justly called the primary law of nature, * * * is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[477] Legally, morally, and politically, self-defense is an absolute right. And surely everyone in those days also recognized that no viable society would ever be composed of members so suicidally demented as to attempt to deprive themselves collectively of the right and ability to preserve their community against all dangers. But, if self-defense is, both individually and collectively, an absolute right, then every individual—both by himself alone and as a member of society's ultimate force for self-preservation, the Militia—must enjoy a right no less absolute to possess the means necessary and sufficient for that purpose. And that right can be fully effectuated only through the free market—because, if rogue public officials could monopolize the provision of, let alone prohibit, personal acquisition and possession of the means of self-defense, then self-defense would reduce to a "right" the ostensible "law of society" embodied in those officials' decrees could "take[ ] away" in practice.

---

[476] On the types of statutes in that era by which Rhode Island mandated anything even remotely akin to any aspect of modern "gun control", see post, Chapter 13.

[477] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

These beliefs not only persisted, but also must have largely proven true when put into execution, because Rhode Islanders prolonged their reliance on the free market, unchanged, throughout the *pre-*constitutional era.

Although the Militia laws Rhode Island's General Assembly enacted were silent on the subject, they protected the free market in firearms and ammunition by preëmpting in principle all Local regulations aimed at restricting the free market—whether in terms of the types, qualities, or quantities of firearms or ammunition that might be sold, or the number of merchants who might enter the trade. In practice, of course, the laws were silent on this score, because no such regulations ever arose to be disallowed, no one of consequence in the *pre-*constitutional period ever having entertained the notion that "gun control" of today's variety was within public officials' authority, let alone desirable.

Overall, Rhode Island's Militia laws must also have strengthened a free market in, and private ownership and possession of, both amounts and types of firearms and ammunition other those that were or could have been used for actual service in the Militia. For once the network linking suppliers of raw materials to manufacturers to merchants to customers was established, it could have provided—and apparently did provide—whatever arms free men as consumers desired, for both public and private uses.

B. Reliance on the free market by common Militiamen. The actual existence of, and encouragement for, what Rhode Island's lawmakers presumed was an adequate free market for firearms is reflected most directly in her Militia statutes' requirements that men should obtain their firearms and ammunition through private purchases. For example:

> • [1665] "[A]ll men from sixteene years of age to sixtye years old are hereby required to" "find themselves armes[.]"{EN-295}
>
> • [1699, 1701, and 1705] "[A]ll persons that are willing to list themselves in * * * troops [of horse]; and to accoutre themselves with * * * carbine and pistol * * * shall be excused from any other duty in militia exercise[.]"{EN-296}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Listed Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall always be provided with one good Musket, or Fuzee * * * ; also one pound of good Gunpowder, thirty Bullets, fit for his Gun, six good Flints, fit for Service; one good Sword, or Baionet, a Cartouch Box, ready fitted with Cartriges of Gunpowder and Bullets, on the penalty of Three Shillings, for each time he shall be found not provided[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [A]ll such Persons * * * excus'd from Training, yet shall notwithstanding be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train, & that once every year, or oftner * * * , there shall be * * * a Survey and Examination made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is Required; and all such Persons as shall be found unprovided with such Arms * * * shall pay the Fine of Five-Shillings for each default[.]"{EN-297}

This statute did not specify from what source the "Listed Soldier[s]" and "all such Persons * * * excus'd from Training" were to acquire the equipment with which they "shall always be provided". But as no statute mandated that the government should provide that equipment (except to the poor), and as the "Soldier[s]" and other "Persons" were personally fined for being "not provided", the only possible source was the free market.

• [1755] "[E]very Person * * * by Law to be accoutred * * * is hereby directed to provide himself with Arms, and other Accoutrements[.]"{EN-298}

• [1766]"[E]very enlisted Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall always be provided with one good Musket or Fuzee * * * , also One Pound of good Gun-Powder, Thirty Bullets fit for his Gun, six good Flints, One good Sword or Bayonet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartridges of Powder and Ball, under the Penalty of Four Pence for each Article of Accoutrement * * * which he shall be deficient in, for every Time he shall be unprovided therewith[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [A]ll such Persons * * * excused from training, shall, notwithstanding, be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train. And * * * Twice in every Year, * * * there shall be an Examination and Survey made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is Required; and all such Persons as shall be found unprovided, shall pay the Fine of Four Pence for each Article of Accoutrement they shall be deficient in[.]"{EN-299}

The observation made immediately above in reference to the statute of 1718 (continued through 1730 and 1744) applies here as well.

• [1775] "[E]very man in the colony, able to bear arms, [is directed] to equip himself completely with arms and ammunition, according to law."{EN-300}

> • [1776] "[A]ll persons in their towns, being inhabitants" "who are by law obliged to equip themselves with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box; and who shall not * * * be reported incapable of providing themselves * * * , do provide themselves[.]"{EN-301}
>
> • [1779] "[E]ach and every effective [that is, able-bodied] Man * * * shall provide, and at all times be furnished, at his own Expence (excepting such Persons as the Town Councils of the Towns in which they respectively dwell or reside shall adjudge unable to purchase the same) with one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto, * * * one Ram-rod, Worm, Priming-wire and Brush, and one Cartouch-Box."{EN-302}
>
> • [1781] "[E]ach of the * * * non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers [of the Militia shall] furnish himself with a good Musket, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box[.]"{EN-303}
>
> • [1781] "[E]ach Person, liable to do military Duty * * * (unless excused by the Town-Council of the Town to which he belongs for Inability to procure the same) who shall at any Time be found destitute of a good Gun, being his own Property, shall pay * * * a Fine[.]"{EN-304}

Obviously, without an adequate free market within Rhode Island, supplied locally or from somewhere outside the Colony—or absent governmental arsenals capable of manufacturing sufficient quantities of the necessary equipment (for which the Militia statutes made no provision)—her residents would have been unable to satisfy these requirements. In that event, not only would such regulations have been pointless, because the purposes they sought to serve would have been incapable of attainment, but also the inspections the statutes mandated and the fines they imposed for individuals' failures to comply would have been not simply pointless but also grossly unjust, because no man can rightfully be penalized for not doing what he simply cannot do.[478]

C. Reliance on the free market by the government. When Rhode Island's Colonial (later, State) and Local governments needed to acquire firearms and ammunition for her Militia or regular armed forces, they generally purchased or otherwise obtained them in the free market, too.

> • [1755] "That the Committee of War * * * purchase on the best Terms they can, all the Arms that shall be necessary; and that any Person who shall * * * sell to the Colony, a good small Arm, shall be exempted from all Military Duty, for and during the Term of one Year".{EN-305}
>
> The incentive this statute offered demonstrates the extent of Rhode Island's dependence on the free market. It also illustrates the fairness with which these matters were conducted, in that an individual who sold his only firearm to the government could not have fulfilled the requirement that he appear at Militia musters fully armed.

---

[478] See ante, Chapter 8, and post, at 275-284.

• [1757] "[T]hat the deputies of the several towns be * * * empowered to procure, at the expense of the colony, half a pound of gun powder, twenty bullets, six flints * * * for each soldier[.]"{EN-306}

• [1774] Certain individuals were to "purchase * * * at the expense and for the use of the colony, three hundred half-barrels of pistol powder * * * ; three tons of lead and forty thousand flints * * * to be delivered to the several colonels of the militia, and the colonels of the independent companies * * * ; so that each soldier, equipped with arms, according to law, may be supplied with such quantities thereof, as by law is directed; he or they paying for the same, at the prime cost given by the colony".{EN-307}

• [1775] The General Assembly appointed "a Committee, to enquire at what Price good Muskets, for the Use of the Continental Army, can be made in this Colony".{EN-308}

• [1776] Each "town shall immediately make order for the supplying such persons [as are too poor to purchase their own firearms] with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box, at such town's expense, to be lodged with the captains of such district wherein such poor persons belong, for their use upon any proper occasion".{EN-309}

• [1776] "That Two Thousand Stand of good Fire-Arms, with Bayonets, Iron Ramrods, and Cartouch-Boxes, be purchased for the Use of the Colony * * * , and distributed to each Town, in Proportion to the Number of Polls upon the Alarm List therein[.]"{EN-310}

• [1777] The General Assembly ordered "*Bills * * * to be Paid*" to "Azariah Crandall, for a gun, bayonet and cartouch box, delivered into the Continental store"; and to "Oliver Eddy, for a small arm, delivered by him into the store at Prospect Hill, for the use of the Continent".{EN-311}

• [1777] "Daniel Mowry * * * presented * * * an Account, by him charged against the State, for twenty-six Guns and Bayonets, purchased by Order of the Town-Council of Smithfield, for the poor Inhabitants of the said Town * * * the Amount thereof * * * [to] be paid * * * out of the General Treasury."{EN-312}

• [1777] "That the Small-Arms heretofore purchased by this State, for such Persons as should be adjudged unable to furnish themselves therewith, be delivered to the Committees of Safety, for the Use of the fifteen Months Battalions, and Train of Artillery, raising within this State."{EN-313}

• [1777 and 1778] "That General Cornell immediately apply to the several Committees of Safety for Two Hundred Small Arms and Bayonets, and cause the same to be repaired, and fitted for immediate Service: That > if the said Number cannot be procured from the said Committees, he * * * purchase the Number deficient upon the best Terms he can, and as many other Bayonets as the State may require[.]"{EN-314}

>
> • [1781] "That each of the * * * non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers furnish himself with a good Musket, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box * * * : That if he shall not be of sufficient Ability, or shall otherwise neglect to do it, the Town-Council of the Town to which he belongs be * * * directed, to furnish him with a Gun, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box * * * at the Expence of such Town; and receive therefor, out of the Wages of such delinquent Person, Ten Shillings, in Gold or Silver, or paper Money equivalent * * * ; and that the Persons receiving the said Accoutrements return them, or account therefor with the Town-Council who shall furnish the same."{EN-315}

These enactments prove that significant numbers of firearms must have been held in private hands, available for sale; that if owners were willing to sell their firearms at reasonable prices they must have expected to be able to replenish their stocks in due course; and that public officials routinely served as middlemen between the Militia and the free market in arms.

Besides firearms, Rhode Island's government supplied ammunition to her Militia, sometimes acting simply as an intermediary for the free market. For example, in 1774 the General Assembly ordered its agents to "purchase * * * at the expense and for the use of the colony, three hundred half-barrels of pistol powder * * * ; three tons of lead and forty thousand flints * * * to be delivered to the several colonels of the militia * * * so that each soldier, equipped with arms, according to law, may be supplied with such quantities thereof, as by law is directed; he or they paying for the same, at the prime cost given by the colony".{EN-316} Of course, the government also endeavored to maintain public stocks of ammunition by the age-old method of taxing the market, sometimes by ingenious methods. For example, in 1704 (continued through 1744) the General Assembly directed "[t]hat there shall be paid by the Master of every Ship or other Vessel, of above Ten Tons, coming into any Port * * * of this Colony to Trade or Traffic, which are not wholly Owned by the Inhabitants of this Colony * * * , Twelve-pence per Ton, or one Pound of good New Gun Powder".{EN-317} This, however, would prove a problematic procedure today, because "[n]o State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty on Tonnage".[479]

Rhode Island's reliance on the free market was not limited simply to muskets, rifles, pistols, and gunpowder, either, but encompassed heavy crew-served weaponry, too. For example, in 1774 her General Assembly "empowered and directed [the Captain of the Independent Company known as 'The Train of Artillery, for the County of Providence'], to purchase at the Expence, and for the Use, of the Colony, Four Brass Cannon, Four Pounders, with Carriages, Implements, and Utensils, necessary for exercising them; And that they be lent to the said Company, to improve them in the Exercise of Cannon".{EN-318} Thus, the notion proponents of "gun control" sometimes advance today, that *pre-*constitutional Militiamen retained only small arms in their personal possession, lacks evidentiary support. Indeed, in those days even some Rhode Islanders who were not members of Militia Artillery Companies might nevertheless have possessed cannon. Self-evidently, the Train of Artillery did not "purchase [cannon] at the Expence, and for the Use, of the Colony" from the Colony, but looked to private owners—which meant, of course, that such private owners existed. This was no isolated incident, either. On different occasions in 1776, the General Assembly "voted and resolved, that this colony purchase of Metcalfe Bowler, Esq., nine cannon, with the shot and other stores belonging to him";{EN-319} "that the standing committee of audit * * * inquire into the number of cannon now in service, * * * and of whom they were purchased, and what price they cost";{EN-320} and that an appointee determine "who are the present owners of any of the cannon in this state's possession"{EN-321}—indicating that the "number of cannon" the State had acquired from the free market must have been significant. Then, again in 1776, the General Assembly "recommended to the Inhabitants of th[e] State, who are possessed of Cannon, Warlike Stores and Sails, that they forthwith remove them to Places of Safety: And that if they shall neglect to do it, the Commanding Officers * * * [shall] cause the same to be removed".{EN-322} If these "Cannon" had been in public officials' charge, or in the possession of the Militia, such a directive would have been unnecessary. So, even a year into the War of Independence, some cannon still remained in private hands, where officials apparently were satisfied to leave them if their owners took care to "remove them to Places of Safety". And in 1777, the General Assembly ordered a "Bill[ ] * * * to be Paid" to "Paul Allen, as agent for the privateer sloop Independence, for sundry cannon and warlike stores, taken out of the prize- ship Friendship, for the use of the state".{EN-323}

---

[479]See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

D. Loans and impressments of arms in and from the free market. In addition to employing outright purchases in the free market, Rhode Island acquired firearms and ammunition for her Militia from private owners by means of loans and impressments.

1. Individuals possessed of firearms or ammunition in excess of their own requirements were expected or encouraged to lend them to others:

> • [1667] Certain individuals were "to goe from house to house throughout the towne of Newport, the villages and precincts thereof, and to take a precise and exact account of all the armes, amunition and weapons of warr each person is furnished with, or hath in his house to spare to others".{EN-324}

• [1755] "That the Committee of War * * * borrow * * * on the best Terms they can, all the Arms that shall be necessary; and that any Person who shall lend * * * to the Colony, a good small Arm, shall be exempted from all Military Duty, for and during the Term of one Year[.]"{EN-325}

2. In times of particularly urgent need, privately owned firearms were impressed—that is, taken by force of law—into public service:

• [1755] "That in Case the Committee of War shall not be able to procure or purchase a sufficient Number of good Arms, * * * the Governor issue a Warrant for impressing as many as shall be found wanting and necessary."{EN-326}

• [1757] "[I]f * * * arms * * * or any other necessaries cannot be procured but by an impress, the deputies are * * * empowered to press each and every article which they shal have occasion for[.]"{EN-327}

• [1777] "[I]f any Person * * * shall appear not duly equipped, that the Commanding Officer * * * be empowered to impress a Gun, or whatever Accoutrements he may stand in Need of."{EN-328}

• [1780] "[I]n case any Town shall neglect or refuse to furnish and supply the Troops * * * , the Commanding-Officer of the Militia in such Town * * * [shall] impress from the Inhabitants thereof, so many of the Articles [that is, 'One good Musket, with a good Ram-Rod, One suitable Bayonet, * * * One Cartouch-Box'] * * * deficient[.]"{EN-329}

• [1781] "[T]he respective Town-Councils be empowered, if necessary, to impress Guns, Bayonets, Cartouch-Boxes * * * sufficient for equipping the Delinquents who shall be detached in Pursuance of this Act, giving Certificates therefor to the Persons from whom the same shall be taken."{EN-330}

3. The government dealt honestly, however, with private parties from whom it obtained firearms other than by outright purchase in the free market—

a. Firearms the government borrowed it later returned to their original owners:

• [1777] "That so many of the Guns, now in the Service of this State, be delivered to Mr. Oliver Ring Warner, as he shall prove * * * to be his Property."{EN-331}

• [1778] "WHEREAS Rowse J. Helme * * * furnished a Gun for one of the Soldiers who marched * * * upon the intended Expedition against Rhode-Island, which was turned into the State's Store * * * That Major James Sumner deliver the said Gun, unto the said Rowse J. Helme[.]"{EN-332}

b. The government eventually paid just compensation for any firearms it pressed into public service:

• [1757] "[I]f * * * arms, horses, or any other necessaries cannot be procured but by an impress, the deputies are * * * empowered to press each and every article which they shal have occasion for, * * * taking and keeping an exact account of what they shall procure of any man, that the same may be paid for by the colony[.]"{EN-333}

• [1777] "Timothy Hopkins, late a Soldier * * * in the Service of this State, had his Gun detained in Service by Orders from his Excellency General Washington * * * , and as yet has had no Allowance for the same: It is therefore Voted and Resolved, That two Pounds, eight Shillings, lawful Money, be paid to the said Timothy Hopkins, out of the General Treasury, for his said Gun."{EN-334}

• [1780] "That the * * * Commanding-Officer of the Militia* * * make Return of all the Guns and Accoutrements which he shall impress * * * unto [a designated] Committee, who thereupon shall appraise all such Guns and Accoutrements, and make a fair Entry thereof, with the Names of the Persons from whom the same shall be taken, with the Prices affixed thereto * * * ; and that * * * Allowances shall be made unto the Owner thereof, to wit: For a good Musket, Ram-Rod and Bayonet, * * * Forty Continental Dollars, and for a good Cartouch-Box, * * * Ten Continental Dollars, for the Use thereof; which * * * Sums shall * * * be paid out of the General-Treasury, or be deducted out of [the owner's] Proportion of the State-Tax". And "if any of the Muskets, or other Accoutrements shall be lost or spoiled, or shall not within One Month after the * * * Regiment shall be disbanded be sent into the respective Towns, in Order to be returned to the Owners, the same shall be paid for out of the General-Treasury".{EN-335}

• [1781] "THE Account of Mr. Thomas Allen * * * , amounting to Twelve Pounds Nineteen Shillings * * * , for Three Muskets and Accoutrements taken from him * * * for the Use of the Militia * * * , being duly considered, * * * the Secretary [shall] issue an Order in his Favour to draw the said Sum out of the General-Treasury."{EN-336}

• [1782] "That the Sum of Two Pounds Eight Shillings, Silver Money, be * * * paid by the General-Treasurer to Mr. Hezekiah Medbury, * * * for a Gun which was taken from him for public Use, in the Year 1775."{EN-337}

• [1784] "A CERTIFICATE given to Mr. Richard Smith * * * for a Gun taken from him and turned into the public Store * * * being duly considered, * * * Eighteen Shillings, Lawful Money, be allowed and paid * > * * out of the General-Treasury, in full for said Gun." And "[T]HE Representation of Freeman Perry * * * that he had taken from him a Gun, Cartridge-Box, and Twenty-four Rounds of Ammunition, for the Expedition in August, A.D. 1778, * * * for which he hath never received any Compensation, being duly considered, * * * One Pound Four Shillings, Lawful Money, be allowed and paid * * * out of the General-Treasury, in full Compensation therefor".{EN-338}

c. In other instances the government replaced firearms it had taken from private owners:

> • [1782] "That Mr. Paul Allen * * * purchase, at the Expence of the State, and deliver to Mr. Joseph Rogers, a Gun, Bayonet, Gun-Case, Cartridge-Box, Priming-Brush and Wire * * * ; it being in Lieu of a Gun and similar Accoutrements which the said Paul Allen received of the said Joseph Rogers, for the Use of the State, in the Year 1775."{EN-339}

> • [1786] "[T]hat a gun, bayonet and cartouch-box, out of the guns, &c., in the town of Richmond, belonging to this state, be delivered to Mr. Simeon Clarke, Jr., in lieu of the gun and like accoutrements impressed from him * * * in the year 1778, and turned into the public store."{EN-340}

4. Such loans and impressments of privately possessed firearms prove three very important things:

a. The number of firearms in private possession in pre-constitutional Rhode Island must have exceeded the number that individuals needed to satisfy their own immediate Militia duties to possess firearms, otherwise next to none would have been available for the government to borrow or impress on the spur of the moment. To be sure, some of the firearms borrowed or impressed for a particular Militia service could theretofore have been used for a Militia purpose of lesser importance. For instance, a superannuated man on "the Alarm List" who was staying at home might have been requested or required to supply a firearm to a younger man in the Trained Band who was deploying for service in the field. (In that case, the individual supplying the firearm would not thereafter have been fined for not personally possessing a firearm, because he could have pleaded a reasonable excuse.[480]) But surely at least some of the firearms borrowed or impressed during that era were not at that moment being used for any purpose related directly to the Militia. Apparently, then, Rhode Islanders in not insignificant numbers possessed, not just more than one firearm, but more than one firearm suitable for Militia service.

b. No one in those days believed that the government enjoyed an unlimited power of "gun control" to outlaw private individuals' personal possession of firearms for other than Militia use, and to confiscate any superfluous firearms they held. If such a power had ever even been imagined, let alone had actually existed, the government could simply have seized such extra firearms as contraband, and never paid for, returned, or replaced them. But such outright seizures were never even attempted, loans or takings with full compensation being employed instead. The absence of any instances of seizures—although that method of obtaining firearms would have been of great economic advantage to the public treasury—establishes the disability to do so.[481]

---

[480] See post, at 289.

c. The borrowing and impressment of firearms in those days show how a purely personal "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" (what today's legal controversialists label an "individual right") was inextricably linked with a "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" related to service in the Militia (what those people label a "collective right"), such that the two effectively merged into one—just as any commonsensical reading of the Second Amendment would lead any literate American to conclude. During the *pre-*constitutional era, a completely personal "individual right" could have encompassed only hunting and target shooting, and not self-defense. True, in any particular instance self-defense is a highly personal matter in a practical sense. But, legally, it is as well a matter of concern to the community. For individual self-defense, both then and today, always amounts to enforcement of the law in a situation in which regularly constituted authorities with specific "police" functions are incapable of intervening. Thus, even in an isolated instance involving only two ostensibly private parties, self-defense is a fundamental Militia function, enforcement of the law being the first responsibility of every member of the Militia.[482] Moreover, the ability of Rhode Islanders in those days to defend themselves in the absence of other regularly constituted authorities deterred crimes of all sorts—from adventitious crimes of passion, to crimes of economic predation, to crimes with political purposes such as usurpation and tyranny.[483] Thus, the potential for individual self-defense provided the community with the maximum conceivable level of protection, because every able-bodied, armed individual could act as a law-enforcement officer whenever confronted with criminal activity. An individual's personal possession of a firearm for hunting or other sport also served the purposes of the Militia, by being the source, in an emergency, of a firearm through a loan or impressment, as well as enabling the individual to perfect his skill with that firearm. (Shooting at targets or game, for example, prepared an individual for service in the Militia in a very direct way.) So possession of numerous firearms

---

[481] See, e.g., Federal Power Commission v. Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company, 337 U.S. 498, 513 & note 20 (1949); Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 905, 907-908 (1997).

[482] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[483] The same deterrence operates today. See, e.g., John R. Lott, Jr., More Guns, Less Crime: Understanding Crime and Gun Control Laws (Chicago, Illinois: University of Chicago Press, 3d Edition, 2010).

by individuals for apparently "personal" use not only was lawful, but also was desirable, public-spirited, praiseworthy, and even necessary. Thus, in *pre-*constitutional practice, both the "individual" and the "collective" "right * * * to keep and bear Arms" coalesced into a single right: The "individual right" served the "collective right", while the "collective right" reciprocally guaranteed, and in practical ways facilitated the exercise of, the "individual right". Therefore, the Second Amendment is accurate and precise to speak of "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", and to link that entire "right", without exception or qualification, to "[a] well regulated Militia".

E. Reliance on private gunsmiths. A robust free market in up-to-date, serviceable firearms required sufficient artisans to manufacture and repair them. Not surprisingly, then, Rhode Island relied upon private gunsmiths in numerous ways:[484]

•By command. As early as 1650, the Colony mandated "that [certain named individuals], all excuses sett aparte, shall mende and make all lockes, stockes and pieces that by order from the warden of each Towne shall be from any of the inhabitants thearof presented to them, for just and suitable satisfaction in hand payed, without delay", and "that all men that have gunns and pieces to mend, and have need to have them mended for their present defence, shall forthwith * * * carrie those pieces to mende".{EN-341} These, of course, were private workers, not employees at some public arsenal.

•By employment. For example, in 1777 the General Assembly empowered "Edward Wells * * * to procure Persons to repair the Guns in the Town of Hopkinton, belonging to this State, as soon as may be".{EN-342} Here, the firearms were public property, but the artisans were private citizens. So, sufficient public arsenals, adequately staffed, either did not exist at all or were incapable of performing the necessary work.[485]

•By special exemption from Militia duties. In 1777 the General Assembly "recommended to the Independent Company of Kingston Reds, that they excuse George Tesst and Jeremiah Sheffield (who are employed in making and stocking Guns) from doing any Service in said Company".{EN-343} And,

•By economic encouragement. In 1774 the General Assembly considered the petition of "Jeremiah Hopkins * * * that he sufficiently understands the business of a gunsmith, so as to make guns, or small arms, with advantage to himself, and to others, by whom guns are much wanted at this time, when they cannot be imported from Great Britain", and "grant[ed] him * * * a lottery, for raising the sum of $200, to be appropriated and applied towards procuring * * * works, tools and instruments" for that purpose.{EN-344}

---

[484] As employed here, "gunsmith" is an all-embracing term that actually includes quite a few different, but complementary trades and skills. See Encyclopedia of Firearms, ante note 428, at 150-156.

[485] Especially during the War of Independence, Rhode Island was not the only Colony that needed to rely on private gunsmiths. See post, at 519-522 (Virginia). See generally, e.g., R. Ketchum, Decisive Day, ante note 310, at 63.

Obviously, the government's rather routine reliance—indeed, apparent dependence—on the free market for gunsmiths evidenced the existence of numerous gunsmiths, which in turn evidenced a private demand for firearms that was capable of calling forth and supporting such artisans' services when the government did not need them.[486]

F. Regulation aimed at perfecting the free market. Even in those few instances in which Rhode Island regulated the market for arms, her purpose was, not to inhibit or suppress the trade (as with "gun controls" common today), but instead to guarantee the quality of the merchandise offered for sale. For example, in 1776 the General Assembly decreed "[t]hat if any Person * * * within this State, shall vend or expose to Sale any Gunpowder, manufactured within the same, unless said Gunpowder be packed in a good dry Cask, marked with the two first Letters of the Manufacturer's Name, and hath been examined and approved by the Inspector of Gunpowder, for said State, and by him marked with * * * Marks * * * necessary to distinguish the several sorts of Gunpowder; the Person * * * so offending, shall forfeit and pay six Pounds, lawful Money, for every Cask so exposed to Sale".{EN-345} That so many local manufacturers and distributors of gunpowder existed as to warrant an official "Inspector of Gunpowder" to certify the stuff put up for private sale indicated a significant private demand for gunpowder, which in turn indicated a large number of firearms in private use. (In this case, of course, "private" sales would have included purchases members of the Militia made to fulfill their duties.) This exemplifies how *pre-*constitutional "gun control" concerned itself with correcting possible imperfections in the free market so as to ensure that the people were well armed, not with hindering, let alone suppressing, private trade in firearms and ammunition.

G. Subsidization of the free market. In order to supply her Militia and other forces with firearms and ammunition, Rhode Island did not merely encourage and make use of the free market, but also supplemented it by subsidizing production of critical items where necessary. For example, in 1775 her General Assembly "Voted and Resolved, That a Bounty of Three Shillings a Pound be allowed, and paid out of the General-Treasury, on every Pound of Salt-Petre that may be made in this Colony by the Twenty-sixth Day of August, A.D. 1776, suitable to be manufactured into Gunpowder, and Three Shillings a Pound for every Pound of such Salt-Petre, exclusive of said Bounty";[487] but it also decreed that "no Person [shall] be entitled to said Bounty and Value, until he shall have first made Oath * * * that the Salt-Petre * * * was actually made in this Colony".{EN-346} Then, in 1776, the General Assembly repealed the latter statute and > enacted, that there shall be given and paid out of the colony treasury, a premium or bounty, of £10, for every hundred pounds weight of good and merchantable salt peter or nitre, that hath been made or manufactured in this colony, since the 1st day of September last past, or that shall be made or manufactured therein, before the 1st day of January, 1777; and so in proportion, for a greater or less quantity.

---

[486] See, e.g., Benjamin F. Hubbell, "The New England Combination Gun, 1730 to 1775", in The American Society of Arms Collectors, Longarms in America, ante note 468, Volume 1, at 27; F. Allen Thompson, "Worcester County Gunsmiths 1760-1830", in id., Volume 1, at 141 (Massachusetts).

>
> Provided always, that in case any proprietor of saltpeter works, or manufacturer of saltpeter, shall, upon application and request made to him by any person or persons, neglect or refuse to communicate a full account of the materials out of which, and the process by which, such saltpeter or nitre is made, such proprietor or manufacturer shall not be entitled to have or receive the aforesaid bounty or premium, for any saltpeter or nitre he shall make * * * .
>
> And * * * the claimants of the premium or bounty * * * shall * * * make oath * * * that such saltpeter or nitre, was made and manufactured in this colony, out of materials collected therein * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> And * * * every town in this colony, in which saltpeter or nitre works are not, or shall not be erected, and the manufacture of saltpeter is not, or shall not be, carried on by some private person or persons, shall be, and hereby are, enjoined as soon as may be, to erect one set of such works, and carry on the manufacture of nitre or saltpeter, in the same.
>
> * * * [I]t shall be the duty of the town council of each town in this colony, * * * at the expense and for the benefit of said town, to cause such works to be erected; and the manufacture to be carried on in the same, accordingly.
>
> * * * * *
>
> And whereas, it is necessary that one powder mill be immediately erected in this colony, for manufacturing gunpowder,— > * * * that a bounty or premium of £30, shall be paid out of the colony treasury to the person or persons who shall erect a powder mill in this colony, and shall make and manufacture therein five hundred pounds of good and merchantable gunpowder.
>
>
> And whereas, it is expedient that such powder mill should be so situated as to accommodate the public in the best manner,— [487] The powerful oxidant potassium nitrate (KNO_3, colloquially called "saltpeter" or "nitre") is the key ingredient (along with sulphur and charcoal) in black powder.

---

> * * * no powder mill shall be erected in this colony, for the manufacture of gunpowder, without the license of the General Assembly * * * .{EN-347}

These statutes illustrate that, where ammunition was concerned, the line between "private" and "public" action in pre-constitutional times was very fine indeed—and public officials stimulated and designed actions on both sides of the line to work in perfect unison. On the one hand, the General Assembly subsidized the manufacture of saltpeter by private parties, but demanded that the processes for its production be made public, in order to enable others to manufacture the material. On the other hand, the General Assembly compelled Rhode Island's Towns to take up that work at their own expense, but only where it was not being or likely to be carried on by private parties. In addition, the General Assembly stimulated the erection and operation of a private powder mill, but reserved to itself the facility's location so as "to accommodate the public in the best manner". Throughout, the desideratum was the Local production of gunpowder—to some degree, for Rhode Island's economic benefit, in that Local workers turned Local resources into a product to be used Locally; but, to a larger degree, for Rhode Island's political benefit, by securing Local supplies of the ammunition without which the firearms her Militia and other forces carried in their efforts to win the State's independence from Britain would have been of little use.

H. A free market in arms necessary for "well regulated" Militia. As a matter of fact, no Militia in pre*-constitutional Rhode Island ever existed in the absence of a free market for arms—the Militia which did exist was always deemed to be "well regulated"—therefore, the working definition of a "well regulated" Militia in Rhode Island was a Militia which relied and could depend upon a free market in arms to the fullest extent of its needs, whether those needs were expressed by its members as individuals or by the government of which it was an integral part.* Viewed from the other side, no market in arms ever existed in pre*-constitutional Rhode Island in the absence of a "well regulated" Militia—the market that did exist was undoubtedly "free" in terms of the way it actually functioned—therefore, the working definition of a free market in arms was a market which operated as a necessary adjunct to and complement of a "well regulated" Militia.*

That during the entire pre-constitutional period Rhode Island never negatively interfered with the free market's production and distribution of firearms and ammunition—refraining even from licensing the trade in arms, let alone prohibiting it, but instead requiring most of her citizens to employ the free market in order to acquire the arms they needed to fulfill their Militia duties, as well as relying on the market herself—provides compelling evidence for the legal conclusion that no power so to interfere was thought to exist.[488] Or, if such a power did subsist in some arcane theory, no one in a position of public authority ever attempted to exercise it. So, when the original Constitution explicitly incorporated "the Militia of the several States" as permanent components of its federal system, just as they then existed and had existed for generations in Rhode Island and the other Colonies (other than Pennsylvania) and then all of the independent States, it also implicitly incorporated the free market in arms as the necessary and permanent constitutional means through which WE THE PEOPLE could always assure themselves of access to sufficient supplies of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for their Militia service.

[488] See, e.g., Federal Power Commission v. Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company, 337 U.S. 498, 513 & note 20 (1949); Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 905, 907-910 (1997).

CHAPTER TEN

Rhode Island required all of her resident able-bodied free males between sixteen and sixty years of age to participate in some specifically mandated manner in her pre-constitutional Militia.

Rhode Island's pre-constitutional Militia was completely organized. By the late 1700s it was composed of several well-tried subdivisions. Yet it was anything but highly centralized and monolithic. Rather, from the 1600s Rhode Island established her Militia on a Local basis. As ultimately arranged, the structure had several components:

- "The Trained Bands" typically consisted of those able-bodied free men from sixteen to fifty years of age who were required to be fully armed and accoutered, to undergo regular Militia training on some set schedule, and to assume the primary responsibility for service in the field.[489]

- "The Alarm List" consisted of able-bodied (and even some partially disabled) men from fifty to sixty years of age, who were required to be fully armed and accoutred, but were not subject to regular training, and were called forth for service in the field only in emergencies.[490]

- "The Senior Class" consisted of able-bodied men from sixteen to fifty years of age who armed themselves and could be called forth in emergencies, but otherwise were exempted by statute from training and regular service in the field, because of their important public offices or specialized private professions or trades which the community considered crucial to its functioning.[491]

- "Independent Companies" were Trained Bands whose members voluntarily recruited, organized, armed, trained, and disciplined themselves as Militia, albeit separately from Rhode Island's compulsory Militia units, and served under regular Militia command only when called forth for actual duty in the field.[492]

---

[489] See post, at 208-220.

[490] See post, at 220-224.

[491] See post, at 224.

[492] See post, at 224-234.

• Both "the Watch" and "the Ward"—the foundational forms of "homeland-security" service from long before the *pre-*constitutional era in America—consisted of individuals from sixteen to sixty years of age who performed *proto-*police functions.[493]

• Conscientious objectors were not required to possess, train with, or bear firearms, but were assigned special Militia duties—some of which were even more hazardous than serving as front-line fighters in the field.[494]

• Compulsory service in the Militia terminated after sixty years of age. But none of Rhode Island's *pre-*constitutional statutes precluded any free male beyond that age from volunteering for whatever Militia duties he was capable of performing, or from maintaining possession of whatever firearm and ammunition he had acquired during his Militia service in his earlier years (or any other firearm or ammunition, for that matter).

Cumulatively, these categories embraced every free male from sixteen to sixty years of age (and possibly beyond)—in or of whatever public office, private occupation, or religious conviction—other than those with incapacitating disabilities. Moreover, with respect to the Trained Bands and the "Watch" and "Ward", many free women were indirectly affected, too.[495] The obvious constitutional principle to be drawn from this aspect of Rhode Island's *pre-*constitutional practice is that Militia duty attaches when an individual first becomes an adult and can serve in some useful capacity, and continues for as long as he remains capable of contributing (unless the legislature decides that special circumstances warrant an exemption in the public interest).

More specifically—

A. Total inclusion and employment. In *pre-*constitutional Rhode Island, no able-bodied free male was not regulated in some manner by her Militia laws. Whether he was a member of a Trained Band, a member of the Alarm List or the Senior Class, a member of an Independent Company, or even a conscientious objector, each individual was subject to statutes that explicitly defined and provided for enforcement of his participation. Rhode Island's Militia was completely and comprehensively organized—everyone found himself in some subdivision, with certain specific duties. All of the members of the Militia, other than conscientious objectors, were armed at all times—usually with their own firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements. Members of the Trained Bands and Independent Companies were trained and disciplined—and almost all of those in the Alarm List

---

[493] See post, at 235-240.

[494] The exemption for conscientious objectors is treated separately post, at 266-272.

[495] See ante, at 155-157, and post, at 242-245.

and the Senior Class had also seen some, or even extensive, service in the Trained Bands or Independent Companies at one time or another in their younger years or before they obtained the public offices or prepared themselves for the various professions or trades that qualified them for exemptions. Finally, even conscientious objectors were assigned particular, and often very dangerous, noncombatant duties for the fulfillment of which consummate skill might be required. Thus, in Rhode Island, no "private militia", "*un*organized militia", or "select militia" ever existed—so none of these could ever have qualified as a "well regulated" Militia under Rhode Island's laws, or could qualify as one today under the Constitution or the laws of any State.[496]

B. Comprehensive Local framework. Rhode Island structured her pre-constitutional Militia on the basis of her Towns, for several practical reasons. First, from the beginning the Towns were the Colony's basic political jurisdictions and therefore closest to the people—and Rhode Island's Militia was always: (i) a governmental, never a private, establishment; and (ii) a thoroughly popular institution. Second, as the centers of settlement in which population, developed property, accumulated wealth, and economic activity were concentrated, the Towns needed the most protection. Third, because many people congregated in or around the Towns, the Militia could be most easily organized, trained, and mobilized there in times of emergency.

1. Depending on its population or geographical extent, each of Rhode Island's Towns had one or more Trained Bands, Troops of Horse, or other Companies designated by statutes the General Assembly enacted for "settling the Militia" in those Localities. For example, in 1718 (continued through 1730 and 1744), the General Assembly provided

> [t]hat for the better Ordering and Training up the Inhabitants of this Colony, that the several Companies or Train'd-bands, shall remain in the Stations and Bounds and Division by which they have been heretofore Divided Known & Distinguished, until some further or New Division or Bounds be Stated Appointed or Limited by lawful Authority.
>
> That is to say, Three Companies in the Town of Newport, Three Companies in the Town of Providence, one Company in the Town of Portsmouth, one Company in the Town of Warwick, Two Companies in the Town of Westerly, one Company in the Town of Newshoreham, Two Companies in the Town of Kingstown, one Company in the Town of East-Greenwich, and one Company in the Town of James-Town.{EN-348}

In 1746, the General Assembly determined

---

[496] See ante, at 63-76.

> [t]hat there shall be one train'd Band of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Bristol, and two train'd Bands of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Tiverton, and one train'd Band of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Little-Compton, and one train'd Band of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Warren, and one train'd Band of Foot Soldiers in the Town of Cumberland. And that one Troop of Horse be raised in the County of Newport: And that so many of those in the Towns of Tiverton and Little-Compton, who are properly equipt for Troopers, and desire to continue so, be Part of said Troop of Horse: And that such others be added to them, as see Cause to inlist, and properly equip themselves for Troopers.{EN-349}

And in 1779, for another instance, legislators followed the same procedure:

> That there be Four Infantry Companies in the Town of Providence, Two in the Town of Cranston, Two in the Town of Johnston, and one in the Town of North-Providence: That there be Three Infantry Companies in the Town of Smithfield, and Three in the Town of Cumberland: That there be Six Infantry Companies in the Town of Scituate, and Four in the Town of Gloucester: Also that there be Three Infantry Companies in the Town of Westerly, Two in the Town of Charlestown, and Three in the Town of Hopkinton: That there be Four Infantry Companies in the Town of North-Kingstown, and Two in the Town of Exeter [...and on through an extensive list of Towns].{EN-350}

The General Assembly paid extraordinary attention to Local details in allocating the territorial extent of Militia Companies, as major rearrangements in 1775 illustrate:

> That the Second Trained Band, or Company of Militia, in the Town of Hopkinton, be * * * divided into Two Companies: That the Division Line shall begin at the Middle of the long Bridge, and run from thence on a West Course to the Colony Line, and from the Middle of said Bridge Easterly to Ell-Pond, Long-Pond, and to the South End of Blue-Pond, and from thence Easterly Twenty Rods South of Hezekiah Carpenter's House, to Wood-River: That the North Part of the said Town, from the said Line, be the Third Company * * * .{EN-351}

> That the First Trained Band, or Company of Militia, in the Town of Westerly, be divided into two Companies: That the District of the Company taken off, which shall be the Third Company in said Town, be included within the two Roads * * * beginning at the Bridge, near the Baptist Meeting-House, commonly called Crandall's Bridge; thence Southerly, bounded by the Road, until it comes to the Post-Road, near the

> House of Joshua Babcock, Esq; and thence Westerly, by the Post-Road, to the Colony Line at Pawcatuck Bridge * * * .{EN-352}
>
> WHEREAS the First Company of Trained Bands in Scituate * * * is become so large, that it is very inconvenient that the same should remain entire:
>
> * * * That the * * * First Company in Scituate be * * * divided and made into Two, by a Line dividing the late District of that Company, beginning at the Middle of the South Line of the said District, and to run from thence North through the same: And that all those Men who live on the West Side of said dividing Line, shall compose a Fifth Company in said Town * * * .{EN-353}
>
> WHEREAS the Company of Militia in the Town of Johnston labours under great Inconveniences, from the Largeness of its Extent, and the Number of its enrolled Soldiers * * *
>
> * * * Enacted, That the said Company be * * * divided into Two Companies, by a Line, beginning at Tripp's Bridge, upon Wanasquatucket River; thence following the Highway, until it comes to the Dividing of the Roads by Richard Eddy's Pot-Ash House; thence following the Course of the Highway, which leads over Neuticonkinut-Hill, until it comes to the House of John Waterman, Miller; and passing which, leaving the Highway, continues its Course still Westerly, so as to run about Sixty Rods to the Northward of Daniel Sprague's House; and after passing which, and bearing a little Southerly, extending Westerly, until it joins the Scituate Road Eighty Rods Easterly, from the House where William Harris now dwells; then following the Course of said Road or Highway, extends Westerly to the Eastern Line of the Town of Scituate: That all the Inhabitants upon the North of the said Line shall be One Company, and those upon the South of said Line shall be the other Company: And those who live within the South-East Part shall be the First Company.{EN-354}

Not surprisingly, such painstaking Local organization was not of an arbitrary, "top-down" variety, but instead often arose out of the initiatives and embodied the desires of Local residents themselves. In 1753, for instance, the General Assembly responded favorably when > sundry of the Inhabitants of Cumberland, represented * * * That said Town is almost twelve Miles in length, and but one Company or train'd Band therein; by Reason whereof, they are greatly incommoded in their Attending on Military Discipline; that there are in * * * said Company * * * almost Two Hundred Soldiers; and thereupon prayed, another Company or train'd Band may be set off and made in said Town[.]{EN-355}

In 1775, because "the Second Trained Band, or Company of Militia, in the Town of Coventry, contain[ed] about One Hundred and Sixty Soldiers, which [wa]s sufficiently large for Two Companies", that Company > met * * * and unanimously agreed to pray th[e General] Assembly to divide the same in the following Manner * * * : By a Line beginning at Scituate Line, where * * * Warwick-Brook, runs into the said Town; from thence down said Warwick-Brook to the Buck's-Horn Brook (so called;) from thence up said Buck's-Horn Brook to the Line between the Lands of Edmund Jordan and the Heirs of John Fox, deceased; from thence on the dividing Line between said Lands, as far Southward as their Land lieth; from thence on a strait Line Southerly to the old Saw Mill Place, where Philip Aylsworth's Saw-Mill formerly stood; and from thence South to West-Greenwich North Line, to a Place called Narrow-Lane:

>
> AND * * * it is Enacted, That the said Company be * * * divided into two Companies, in Manner * * * above described: And that * * * the Part of the said Company which lieth East of the said Line be the Second Company, and the Part which lieth West of the said Line the Fourth Company in the said Town.[EN-356]

In 1780, when it was "represented to th[e General] Assembly * * * that the inhabitants of the towns of Newport and Portsmouth [we]re desirous of associating for the defence thereof against the enemies of [Rhode Island] and the United States", the Assembly "empowered" those "inhabitants * * * to form themselves into companies, and to nominate the necessary officers, who being * * * approved by * * * the Governor, shall be commissioned[.]"[EN-357] And as late as 1781, "[u]pon the petition of a considerable part of the second trained band or company of militia, in the town of Westerly", the General Assembly resolved in its typically careful fashion to divide that Company into two,

> [b]y a line beginning at the Charlestown line to the eastward of William Crandall's house; and thence running west to the said house, leaving the same in the upper or fourth company; from thence, running northerly to Jonathan Sisson's house, leaving the same in the * * * fourth company; and from thence to the meadow brook; and that all to the northward of the said line to be embodied in a company, by the name of the Fourth Trained Band, or Company of Militia, of the town of Westerly.[EN-358]

These were not isolated events, either.[EN-359]

In addition to overseeing the formation of regular Militia Companies, Rhode Island's Towns were also empowered to enlist their residents into Companies of Minutemen.[EN-360]

2. Throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, Rhode Island's Towns, their Militia Companies, or both often participated in the selection of Militia officers:

> • [1641]"[T]he Traine Bands shall choose among the Freemen * * * their commanders, and present them to the Towne. The Major vote of the Towne * * * shall have the negative voice for the Establishment of them, and shall order their Powre till the next Generall Courte."{EN-361}
>
> • [1642] "[E]ach Town or Band should chuse their officers within themselves, and not to choose their officers out of another Town or Band * * * ; and further that their Powre shall be ordered from time to time by the Towne[.]"{EN-362}
>
> • [1647] "[A]ll y^e^ Inhabitants in each Towne shall choose their Military Officers from among themselves[.]"{EN-363}
>
> • [1705] "[N]o person shall have any vote in any Train Band of soldiers in this Collony for commissioned officers of the Train Bands, but such as are freemen of the respective towns they live in, or freemen of the Collony[.]"{EN-364}
>
> • [1780] "[T]he inhabitants of the towns of Newport and Portsmouth" are "empowered * * * to form themselves into companies, and to nominate the necessary officers; who being * * * approved by * * * the Governor, shall be commissioned accordingly."{EN-365}

Rhode Islanders doubtlessly adopted these procedures, not solely in deference to subsidiarity and democracy, but also because they were necessary to create and maintain Militiamen's confidence in their officers, and the officers' confidence in one another and in their men—particularly important in the kind of largely irregular warfare in which Americans of the *pre-*constitutional era regularly engaged against the Indians, the French, and later the British, too.

3. From an early date, with their Militia "settled", Rhode Island's Towns were "Authorized and Impowered, to appoint, Settle and Order a Military Watch in Time of War * * * of such Number of Persons as they think proper" and "to appoint and Settle all Watches in Time of Peace".{EN-366} Thus, the fundamental duty of "homeland security" was correctly assigned to the Localities most concerned with and capable of seeing to its fulfillment.

4. With her Militia organized on a Local basis, Rhode Island naturally secured martial supplies in and for her Towns, too. As early as 1640, the legislature "ordered, that Two Barrels of Gunn Powder be alway readie in the Treasury of each Towne, with Bullets and match".{EN-367} And in 1650 Rhode Island established in each major Town "a magazine for its present and constant defence", to store "good powder", lead, and muskets, "all in good case and fitt for service".{EN-368}

5. Because these arms in public storehouses merely supplemented the firearms and ammunition that Rhode Island required all of her free able-bodied adult male residents from sixteen to sixty years of age themselves to possess in their own homes at all times,[497] the amounts, quality, suitability for Militia service, and good repair of the armaments in private hands were of paramount concern. From the first, the Towns were charged with supervision of these matters:

> • [1650] The legislature "ordered, that [certain individuals], all excuses sett aparte, shall mende and make all lockes, stockes and pieces that by order from the warden of each Towne shall be from any of the inhabitants thearof presented to them, for just and suitable satisfaction in hand payed, without delay"; and "all men that have gunns and pieces to mend, and have need to have them mended for their present defence, shall * * * carrie those pieces to mende".{EN-369}
>
> • [1655] "[T]hat an accompt shall begiven within ten dayes * * * to y^e^ head officer of everie Towne * * * of what powder, lead and shot there is in the possession of everie inhabitant of y^e^ townes[.]"{EN-370}
>
> • [1658] The legislature provided that "if any bee complayned of for defective armes, the Town Counsill in each towne have power to judge off, and order the armes to bee such as they may finde will fully answer the meaninge of the lawe concerninge suffitiant armes".{EN-371}
>
> • [1665] "[F]or the defence of the Collony, in having a Magazine or store of armes and amunition * * * in pertickelar men's houses * * * in each towne", the General Assembly "ordered * * * that every man in each towne be allwayes furnished with two pound of gunpowder, and fowre pound of lead or bulletts * * * ; and the Clarke of the traine band in each towne is * * * authorized and required to informe himselfe in that matter, by inquiry; and finding any man vnsuplyed, is to make report to the * * * magistrates in each towne".{EN-372}
>
> • [1667] Certain individuals were deputed to "goe from house to house throughout the towne of Newport, the villages and precincts thereof, and to take a precise and exact account of all the armes, amunition and weapons of warr each person is furnished with, or hath in his house to spare to others, and in what condition with regard to service the same is in * * * . And also to call vpon such as have deffects, that they may be supplyed in the place forthwith, * * * to repaire to such persons as may supply them."{EN-373}
>
> • [1669] "The Councill * * * heerby recommend itto the care of each respective Towne Councill in the Colony * * * to see that the inhabitants of each respective towne bee furnished with ammunition according to law; and that the armes bee fixed and in readiness for service[.]"{EN-374}

---

[497] See ante, Chapter 6.

Subsequently, the Militia Companies in each Town performed the lion's share of these Local duties of inspection and enforcement of compliance with regulations.[498] Yet, as late as 1775 the General Assembly appointed various Townsmen "to take an account * * * of the powder, arms and ammunition, in the several towns in this colony, * * * including private as well as public stock", and "empowered [them] to go to the house of each person in their respective towns" for that purpose.{EN-375}

6. Throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, too, Rhode Island's Towns provided firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements to those among their residents who were too poor to purchase that equipment on their own:

> • [1647] "[T]he Towne Councils shall have power to cause those which are defective in armes, to be supplied in an equal way according to Estate and strength."{EN-376}
>
> • [1657] "[T]he Town councill have power to make a rate [that is, a tax] or to lay out * * * what fines are taken for men's defect in traininge for such as they judge not able to buy armes."{EN-377}
>
> • [1755] "[A]ll the * * * Fines be lodged in the Town Treasury of each respective Town, to purchase Arms and Ammunition with, * * * for the use of such Towns, to be used by such Soldiers as are not able to provide for themselves, after all Military Accoutrements * * * for the Company are purchased[.]"{EN-378}
>
> • [1766] "Fines * * * shall be paid by the Clerk into the Town-Treasury * * * to purchase Arms and Ammunition * * * for the Use of such Town to be used by such Soldiers as are not able to provide for themselves, after all military Accoutrements to be provided for the Company are purchased[.]"{EN-379}
>
> • [1776] "[E]ach town in this colony * * * [shall] call a town meeting * * * and make order that their respective town councils give in a list of all persons in their towns, being inhabitants thereof, and obliged by law to equip themselves with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box, and who are not able to purchase the same;" "thereupon, said town shall immediately make order for the supplying such persons with a good fire-arm, bayonet and cartouch box, at such town's expense, to be lodged with the captains of such district wherein such poor persons belong, for their use upon any proper occasion"; "[a]nd * * * upon failure of any town * * * such town be liable to the fine of £100".{EN-380}
>
> • [1776] "That Two Thousand Stand of good Fire-Arms, with Bayonets, Iron Ramrods, and Cartouch-Boxes, be purchased for the Use of the Colony, * * * and distributed to each Town, in Proportion to the

---

[498] See ante, at 175-178.

Number of Polls upon the Alarm List therein"; and "the Town-Council of each Town shall * * * determine what Persons in their respective Towns shall have the Benefit and Use of the Arms provided, * * * and be exempted from providing themselves as the Law requires."{EN-381}

• [1776] "That the Town-Councils of each Town furnish such Persons as they shall certify to be unable to furnish themselves, with Arms * * * and Accoutrements, as by Law required; and that the same be paid out of the General Treasury."{EN-382}

• [1777] "[C]ommanders" shall "cause their * * * companies to be completely equipped with arms * * * ; and if any in said company, who have been adjudged by the town council * * * to be unable to furnish themselves therewith, shall appear not duly equipped, * * * [the] town councils * * * are * * * empowered and directed to furnish them with arms and accoutrements".{EN-383}

• [1781] "[E]ach of the * * * non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers [shall] furnish himself with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box * * * . And if he shall not be of sufficient Ability, or shall otherwise neglect to do it, the Town-Council of the Town to which he belongs are directed to furnish him with a Gun, Bayonet, Cartouch-Box * * * at the Expence of the said Town and receive therefor, out of the Wages of such delinquent Person, if of sufficient Ability to furnish himself * * * , Twelve Shillings, in Gold or Silver[.]"{EN-384}

This, of course, required that the Towns exercised the authority to determine who was, in fact, too impoverished to procure a firearm and ammunition without public assistance:

• [1666] "[I]t * * * shall be in the power of any two magistrates in each towne, together with the Captain and Lieutenant of the band, or the major part of them, to judge of the excuses of such persons who are defective" with respect to their "due exicution of the enacted lawes of this Collony concerninge the militia[.]"{EN-385}

• [1778] "[A]ll Persons * * * by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box, and who shall not, by Report of the Town-Council of the Town to which they belong, be reported * * * incapable of providing themselves * * * do provide themselves therewith * * * or with a Rifle-Gun and Sword[.]"{EN-386}

• [1779] "[E]ach and every effective Man * * * shall provide, and at all times be furnished, at his own Expence (excepting such Persons as the Town Councils of the Towns in which they respectively dwell or reside shall adjudge unable to purchase the same) with one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto, * * * one Ram-rod, Worm, Priming-wire and Brush, and one Cartouch-Box."{EN-387}

> • [1781] "[E]ach Person, liable to do military Duty * * * (unless excused by the Town-Council of the Town to which he belongs for Inability to procure the same) who shall at any Time be found destitute of a good Gun, being his own Property, shall pay * * * a Fine[.]"{EN-388}

7. Besides providing the honest poor with firearms, Rhode Island's Towns were sometimes empowered to find substitutes to serve in the places of men drafted for special Militia duties.[499] For example, in 1777 the General Assembly provided that, when "the militia, independent, artillery and alarm companies within th[e] state were draughted" to "do duty for the space of thirty days", "if any person who shall be draughted * * * shall neglect to do duty, or hire a man to do his tour of duty, the town council * * * are empowered to hire a man in the room of such delinquent person * * * [at his cost] if the delinquent person be adjudged * * * of sufficient ability to bear the expense".{EN-389}

On the other hand, the Towns themselves were also made financially responsible for ensuring that sufficient men were drafted into military service. For example, in 1780 the General Assembly decreed that "each and every Town which shall neglect to raise their whole Quota of Men * * * shall forfeit and pay to the Treasurer of this State * * * double the Sum it shall cost upon an Average to procure a Recruit, for each and every Deficiency; to be collected by adding the same to the next State Tax which shall be assessed on said Town".{EN-390}

8. Thus, throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, Rhode Island's Towns retained significant jurisdiction over the Militia even as her General Assembly enacted increasingly specific statutes covering that subject. This system worked well then, and could work even more efficiently today, because three pillars of timeless strength supported it—

a. The principle of subsidiarity: namely, that the people who should make the decisions as to proposed actions impacting upon the adequacy of the defense of their own lives, liberties, and property are the ones possessed of the information necessary and sufficient to make such decisions in a timely fashion, and most directly affected by how that information is evaluated and used. That is, management of "homeland security" should be arranged "from the bottom up" rather than "from the top down". In Rhode Island (as elsewhere in America, both then and now) people on the scene knew best where Militia Companies were needed, and when established Companies were too large. They could arrive at the most accurate judgments as to who amongst themselves might be financially unable to purchase firearms and ammunition, or to hire substitutes. And they could most easily and least intrusively inventory the firearms and ammunition in Local residents' possession, to ensure that all such equipment was always maintained in good order and readiness. Perhaps most importantly, in emergencies Local Militia Companies could take immediate, independent action as soon as dangers became imminent, without having to await the approval, let alone abide the intervention, of less concerned because more removed higher authorities.

---

[499] On the use of substitutes in Rhode Island, see post, at 238-239 and 261-266.

b. The system worked because it promoted, as well as relied upon, social solidarity and sympathy. Rhode Island's Militia Companies were small Local units composed of men who knew not only the lay of the land in terms of geography, patterns of residence, and economic activities, but also each other as individuals, as well as Local customs and particular social and even *inter-*familial arrangements and understandings. Inasmuch as men from one Town might have been born and raised, or might have relatives or close friends, in a neighboring Town, each Town could always count on others for support in emergencies.[500] And it profited each Town to maintain, and if possible strengthen, those relations of mutual support.

c. The system worked because it reflected the true source and locus of sovereignty in a republican government: the people themselves, not public officials: The Sword is Sovereignty—Sovereignty is the Sword—and Popular Sovereignty demands that WE THE PEOPLE always hold the Sword in their own hands. Having Militia Companies organized within the Towns imparted to Rhode Islanders, not simply the sense, but especially the reality, of:

- Local authority coupled with responsibility—originally delegated by the General Assembly to be sure, but a recognized legal competence nonetheless;
- Local power—with essentially every able-bodied free man possessed of his own firearm and ammunition at home;
- Local control—the product of at least titular legal authority combined with actual physical power;
- Local independence—because organization of a fully armed citizenry "from the bottom up" provided an effective "check and balance" against usurpation and tyranny "from the top down"; and, the ultimate consequence,
- Local importance—not just in feeling, but in fact.

C. The Trained Bands. Throughout the *pre-*constitutional period from the *mid-*1600s to the late 1700s, Rhode Island designated the largest and most active components of her Militia the "Trained Bands" (or "Train Bands"), which comprised the infantry,{EN-391} and (in much smaller numbers) the "Troops", which comprised the cavalry.{EN-392} The Trained Bands were also known as "Companies" or "Companies of Militia".{EN-393}

---

[500] The most famous example in neighboring Massachusetts being the Town of Concord, on 19 April 1775. See R. Gross, The Minutemen, ante note 379, at 118-119; and F. Coburn, The Battle of April 19, 1775, ante note 383, Appendices Nos. 3 through 5, at 173-178, which list Militiamen of Companies from the near-by Towns of Acton, Bedford, and Lincoln who "ENTERED THE CONTEST AT CONCORD NORTH BRIDGE".

1. The term "trained band" was not original to Rhode Island (or any other American Colony), but derived from the usage of those words in England during the 1500s and 1600s to refer to local militia.[501] Often, in *pre-*constitutional usage, the nouns "militia" and "trained band" were treated as synonyms—as in Johnson's Dictionary, which defined "militia" as "[t]he trainbands; the standing force of a nation", and "trainbands" as "[t]he militia; the part of a community trained to martial exercise".[502] And not infrequently today as well, the designation "trained band" is equated with "the militia" as a whole.[503] But as Rhode Island's *pre-*constitutional legislation proves, that attribution of equivalence is erroneous, because her "Trained Bands", strictly so-called, actually encompassed only one portion of the part of her Militia that was subject to regular training and service in the field, the other portions of that part being the Troops of Horse, and to a far lesser degree the Companies of Artillery, along with the Independent Companies of infantry, cavalry, and even artillery.[504]

2. Although some early statutes mandated training for men from sixteen to sixty years of age—

> • [1665] "all men from sixteene years of age to sixtye yeares old * * * , both masters, parents, sones, sarvants and others, excepting such as are in publicke office, or are by former lawes exempted", are required to "find themselves armes and traine in their owne persones";{EN-394}
>
> • [1677] "noe person or persons within this Collony from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares, shall be released from taininge or other duties in millitary affaires, exceptinge only the civill officers in this Collony, or such whose employments render them excusable by law, unless he or they doe render or give under their Captaine * * * a good and full satisfactory reason for their neglect"{EN-395}

—throughout most of the *pre-*constitutional period Rhode Island generally required all able-bodied men only from sixteen to fifty years of age (and not specially exempted[505]) to train:

---

[501] See The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 2, at 3375.

[502] Ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[503] E.g., Black's Law Dictionary, ante note 368, at 1668.

[504] Hereinafter, the text will refer solely to the Trained Bands, because the distinction between "Trained Bands" and "Troops" in the Militia is the largely adventitious one that the former consisted of infantry, the latter of cavalry. Their tables of organization and equipment differed; but the principles upon which they were raised were identical.

[505] See post, Chapter 11.

> • [1638] "[T]her shall be a generall day of Trayning for the Exercise of those who are able to beare armes in the arte of military discipline, and all that are of sixteen yeares of age, and upwards to fifty, shall be warned thereunto."{EN-396}
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll Male Persons Residing for the space of three Months within this Colony from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years, shall bear Arms in their * * * Train-bands or Companies[.]"{EN-397}
>
> • [1766] "[A]ll Male Persons, who have resided for the Space of Three Months in this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen to Fifty, shall bear Arms in the respective trained Bands whereto by Law they shall belong[.]"{EN-398}
>
> • [1779] "[A]ll effective Males between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty, except such as are * * * excepted, shall constitute and make the military Force of this State[.]"{EN-399}

Of course, in any era differentiations in types of Militia service by dint of age must be eminently practical, must rely upon averages, and ultimately must be determined by contemporary political, economic, and social conditions and mores. During the *pre-*constitutional period, the criterion for Rhode Island's Trained Bands was usually from sixteen to fifty years of age, because the urgent goal was to mobilize for regular service the largest number of men in the best average physical condition, which in those times happened not to include many men much above fifty. Yet, in emergencies, whoever could serve was required to, his advanced age or any partial disability notwithstanding.[506]

3. As explained heretofore, all the members of Rhode Island's Militia other than conscientious objectors and some poor Militiamen were required to possess serviceable firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements in their own homes at all times.[507] In addition, as their designation denoted, the Trained Bands were under an obligation to muster on a regular schedule for actual training and exercises with their arms in the field.

a. The number of days statutorily designated for training depended upon circumstances, being greater in times of war and other public danger than in times of peace and tranquillity—but in any event encompassing the amount of effort considered necessary to impart the requisite knowledge, skills, and discipline to men who were primarily civilians and only secondarily soldiers:[508]

---

[506] See post, at 220-224 and 259-261.

[507] See ante, Chapter 6.

[508] In what follows, the term "discipline" often connotes "drill". See, e.g., Timothy Pickering, Jr., An Easy Plan of Discipline for a Militia (Salem, Massachusetts: Samuel and Ebenezer Hall, 1775), which contains a set of instructions for drilling Militiamen; A. French, The Day of Concord and Lexington, ante note 469, at 23.

• [1638] "[T]her shall be a generall day of Trayning for the Exercise of those who are able to beare armes in the arte of military discipline, and all that are of sixteen yeares of age, and upwards to fifty, shall be warned thereunto[.]"{EN-400}

• [1640] "[E]ight severall times in the yeare the Bands of each Plantation shall openlie in the field be exercised and disciplined * * * . And * * * there shall be two Generall Musters in the yeare[.]"{EN-401}

• [1642] "[T]he first Monday of every month, the Traine Bands shall be exercised by the Commanders, excepting in the months of May and August, January and Febru[ary] * * * ."{EN-402}

• [1647 and 1658] "[E]ight severall times in the yeare, the Bands of each plantation or Towne, shall, openlie in the field, be exercised and disciplined by their Commanders and Officers, in the months of May, August, January and February excepted; and on the first Monday of y^{e} other months, all the Train Bands to make their personal appearances completely armed, to attend their colors[.]"{EN-403}

• [1664] "[F]or the present reviueing the exercise and discipline in the Collony * * * the * * * captain in each town doe * * * give out warrants from time to time to warne the people listed to trayne vpon all such dayes as are by the Collony formerly appoynted, for the exercise of trayning, and that all be required on such dayes to appear in armes, compleat; and to exercise vnder their respective officers[.]"{EN-404}

• [1665] "[S]ixe days only in the yeare be ordered * * * for the milletary exercise in training, which shall be dilligently attended to in each respective towne, * * * ; and the dayes prefixed for the exercise of training, are yearly to be the last Monday in May; the first Monday in September; the first Monday in November; the last Monday in March, and the last Monday in Aprill."{EN-405}

• [1676] "[F]or the future not any of the Traine Bands shall be compelled to traine above two dayes in one yeare: which shall be the first Second day (or Monday) in the first month, March; and the first * * * Monday, in the 7th month, September[.]"{EN-406}

• [1677] "[T]here shall be six traininge days in the yeare * * * which days of traininge shall be for the towne of Newport upon the last Monday save one, in September; the last Monday save one, in October; the last Monday save one, in November; the last Monday save one, in March; and the last Monday save one, in Aprill. And for the townes of Providence, Portsmouth and Warwick, their days of trayninge shall be upon the last Monday in September, the last Monday in October, the last Monday in November, the last Monday in March, and the last Monday in Aprill; and soe for all or any other towne or village within this Collony; and the said inhabitants or listed souldiers are hereby strictly required and commanded to make their personall appearances compleat in their armes, at the second beate of the drum, in such places in their respective townes, and at such houres as the * * * Captaines * * * shall appoint; and that then and there, the souldiers * * * shall give and yeild all due obedience unto their * * * Captaines[.]"{EN-407}

• [1699, 1701, and 1705] All "persons listed under the command of any Captain * * * of the militia" were to "appear complete in arms * * * upon the ——— training days all ready prefixed".{EN-408}

• [1702] "[T]here shall be but four training days in one year; and three of them to be at the discretion of the commissioned officers of each of the respective Train Bands[.]"{EN-409}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[T]he Captain of each respective Company or Train'd band * * * shall * * * Exercise them in Martial Discipline, two Days in each Year in time of Peace, and four in War"; and "the Captain * * * shall Warn the Troop under his Command to Muster two several Days in every year in time of Peace, and four in time of War".{EN-410}

• [1740 and 1744] "[T]he Council of War * * * are * * * empowered to appoint such other Days as may be necessary to discipline the Militia, and make them expert in the Use of their Arms, over and above the Four Training Days by Law appointed in War Time[.]"{EN-411}

• [1745] "*WHEREAS the several Companies of the Militia, or train'd Bands, * * * being obliged to muster four Times a Year in Time of War, is found to be of ill Consequence in sundry Respects*, * * * for the future, the said Companies, or train'd Bands, shall be obliged to muster but twice a Year in Time of War, as well as in Time of Peace[.]"{EN-412}

• [1766] "[T]he Captain of each * * * Company or Trained Band * * * shall warn and call together the Company under his Command, and exercise them in martial Discipline, Two Days in each Year, at such Times and Places within his Town, as he shall see fit"; "the Captain * * * shall warn the Troop * * * to muster Two several Days in every Year * * * in like Manner as the Foot-Companies are to be warned"; and "a Council of War * * * may appoint such other Days as may be necessary to discipline the Militia, and make them expert in the Use of their Arms, over and above the Two training Days aforesaid".{EN-413}

• [1774] "[T]he Captain * * * shall warn and call together the Company under his Command One Day in every Month, and exercise the same in martial Discipline[.]"{EN-414}

• [1779] "That there be annually one grand Muster, for the Review of each Brigade"; and "[t]hat the several Companies of Infantry, Artillery and Horse, besides the Muster aforesaid, meet Two Days at the least in every Year, for Exercise and Reviews".{EN-415}

Admittedly, this level of training could not have produced first-rate soldiers equivalent to most regular British or French troops in parade-ground polish or battlefield prowess of European standards. Yet performance in the field under the special circumstances regularly to be encountered in North America was perhaps another matter. For, during the French and Indian War in the mid-1700s, relatively inexperienced Militiamen from New England demonstrated remarkable tenacity in battle.[509] In particular, whether Rhode Island's Militiamen became particularly good shots with the standard smoothbored flintlock muskets and fusils of the day may be debatable. At the time of the War of Independence, though, a typical American Militiaman from New England was likely to be more dangerous with his musket than the average British regular who opposed him.[510] For although, throughout the Colonial period, soldiers in the British Army did regularly practice marksmanship, both as individuals and in formations,[511] by the War of Independence the British military establishment had largely forgotten the lessons of small-unit tactics and fire-discipline which the French and Indian War had taught, but which Americans still remembered.[512]

In any event, changes from time to time in the statutorily required amount of Militia training reflected two key differences between the Militia and any regular army. First, the Militia was composed of "citizen-soldiers" for whom their day-to-day work as "citizens" was usually far more important and pressing than their adventitious service as "soldiers". Second, being composed of the people themselves, the Militia was strongly subject to "democratic" pressures. Thus, when in 1665 Rhode Island reduced the requisite days of Militia training from eight to six, the General Assembly explained its action as a response to > the great defect in training, occasioned by the remissnes of some vnder the pretence of the burden in training soe often as eight dayes in the yeare, and other complaining of the great inequality, in that the poorest being vnable to spare wherewith to maintaine armes and amunition, as powder, &c., yett are forced by the law to beare armes as well as the most able; to redresse which grevances, it is enacted and declared, that the sixe dayes only in the yeare be ordered * * * for the milletary exercise in training, which shall be dilligently attended to in each respective towne * * * . And for the incorradgement of the meaner sort [that is, the poor], there shall be alowed yearly nine shillings in currant pay to or for each soldiare listed in the traine band, to be duely payed * * * at the Captain's discretion for the repaireing of armes, &c.{EN-416}

---

[509] See, e.g., A. French, The Day of Concord and Lexington, ante note 469, at 18 (footnote omitted).

[510] See, e.g., id., Chapter V.

[511] See De Witt Bailey, Small Arms of the British Forces in America, ante note 428, Chapter 19.

[512] See B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 22-23.

And when in 1702 the General Assembly reduced the number of days of required training from six to four, it offered a similar rationale:

> Whereas there was an Act made * * * [in] 1677, that there should be six training days in the year, and this Assembly * * * finding it to be a great burden to the poor in losing much time:
>
> Be it therefore enacted * * * That * * * there shall be but four training days in one year; and three of them to be at the discretion of the commissioned officers of each respective Train Bands within this Collony[.]{EN-417}

The essential point in these events was two-fold: First, average Rhode Islanders, surely of quite modest means, could not (without some subsidy from wealthier citizens through the public fisc) easily afford the financial burdens that too many days of Militia training imposed upon them—either the direct burden, in terms of the wear and tear on their firearms from, as well as the cost of gunpowder and lead expended in, live-fire exercises; or the indirect burden in terms of the time Militia training took away from their gainful employments in various civilian trades or occupations. Second, average Rhode Islanders were both the mainstay of the Militia, whose dissatisfaction impaired its efficiency, and in a political position to prosecute their "grevances" successfully among legislators. So, the result was effective control of—or at least significant influence on—Militia policies from "the bottom up", based upon striking a practical balance between the needs of "the common defense" and maintenance of "the general welfare", as the people understood and applied those concepts in the practical context of their own lives. Rhode Islanders could not have afforded to shortchange "the common defense", because that would have endangered "the general welfare"; but neither would they have exaggerated "the common defense", because that would have undermined "the general welfare". Inasmuch as the people were then (as they remain today) the ultimate guardians of "the common defense" (in their capacity as "soldiers" in the Militia), as well as the most numerous beneficiaries of "the general welfare" (in their capacity as "civilians", producing and consuming in the free market), the final choice as to where the balance should have been struck was (and ought still to be) theirs.

b. During the War of Independence, up to one fourth of the men from among the Trained Bands might have voluntarily served as "Minutemen" in separate "Minute Companies".{EN-418} Minutemen were subject to a schedule of training and responsibility for service in the field more rigorous than that required of ordinary Militiamen. In 1775, for example, Rhode Island's General Assembly mandated "[t]hat One Quarter Part of the Militia of this Colony be inlisted as Minute-Men, to meet together, and exercise themselves in military Discipline, Half a Day, Once in every Fortnight", and "[t]hat the * * * Minute-Men march for the Defence of the Colony, when and as often as they shall be called upon by the Colonel of the Regiment to which they * * * belong".{EN-419}

4. All of this training aimed at preparing the Militia for duty in the field in times of war and other emergencies. So Rhode Island's statutes defined in detail how Militiamen might be called to particular duties.

a. Inasmuch as participation in Rhode Island's Militia was always in some manner or other compulsory for all able-bodied adult free men from sixteen to fifty or sixty years of age, assignment to a specific tour of duty often arose pursuant to an "impressment" or "draft". No one doubted the government's power to follow such a course:

> • [1757] "[E]ach respective captain * * * shall make his return of every man enlisted, (it being witnessed by the muster master that he hath passed muster) * * * ; whereupon, each respective colonel * * * shall immediately grant forth his warrant * * * in every town that shall be found deficient in enlisting its proper quota, immediately to impress * * * so many able bodied men, fit for soldiers, as shall make up each town's proportion * * * .
>
> "And every man so impressed, shall be obliged to serve as a soldier, or find a good, able bodied, effective man to serve in his stead; unless he hath some reasonable or lawful excuse * * * .
>
> "And when any man that hath been impressed, is excused or doth not pass muster, the captain * * * shall * * * impress another, forthwith, in his stead."{EN-420}

> • [1757] "Whereas, a number of men is demanded of this colony, * * * for the relief of Fort William Henry, which is invested by a large body of French and Indians; in compliance with the said demands, and to the end that every thing in the power of this colony may be done for the preservation of the country,—
>
> " * * * [O]ne sixth part of the whole militia of this colony, be forthwith raised and sent to Albany, with all possible despatch, * * * and to continue in the service as long as the immediate preservation of the country requires their stay there, and no longer * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]hat His Honor the Governor, forthwith issue his warrants to the proper officers, to call together all the companies * * * in this colony * * * in each respective town * * * .
>
> " * * * [T]hat the names of all persons in the list of each company, shall be written on a scroll of paper * * * then put into a hat or box; and one sixth part thereof, shall be drawn, (unless the company agree that the commissioned officers shall press said sixth part,) and the persons whose names shall be so drawn or pressed, shall go on this service.
>
> * * * * *

"Provided * * * that no person's name be put into the hat or box, who, through sickness or lameness, cannot go[.]"{EN-421}

• [1776] "That all Male Persons subject by Law to bear Arms, whether of the Militia, Alarm List or Independent Companies, within this State, be draughted in three Divisions[.]"{EN-422}

• [1777] "[T]hat the first division of the second draft of the militia, and alarm and independent companies * * * march to such part of the shores within their respective counties, as shall be directed by the commanding officer * * * , properly equipped, to relieve those that are now upon duty, and there to remain and do duty for fifteen days[.]"{EN-423}

• [1777] "That one of the Divisions, consisting of the One Sixth Part of the Independent and Alarm Companies and Militia heretofore draughted, and One Half of a Division, be immediately called upon actual Duty[.]"{EN-424}

• [1777] "That one Half of the Militia, Alarm, Independent, and Artillery Companies, be drafted * * * ; and that the Persons who shall be drafted * * * be duly equipped with Arms and Accoutrements according to Law."{EN-425}

• [1777] "Whereas * * * one-half of the militia, independent, artillery and alarm companies within this State, were draughted, and have done duty for one month," "the remaining half-part of said militia, independent, artillery and alarm companies, be draughted * * * and do duty for the space of thirty days".{EN-426}

• [1781] "Twelve Hundred able-bodied effective Men of the Independent, Artillery, Senior and Junior Class Companies of Militia * * * be forthwith embodied; and that they rendezvous at such Places within this State * * * to do Duty therein for One Month * * * .

* * * * *

"AND * * * the * * * Commanders of each Regiment * * * shall forthwith issue their Warrants to the Captains of each Company * * * , setting forth the Number of the * * * able-bodied effective Men, which such Company is required to furnish, and commanding such Captain * * * , if the said Number of Men shall not voluntarily turn out to do Duty * * * , to detach the Men for the Service * * * and cause them to be marched to the Place of Rendezvous * * * .

* * * * *

"AND * * * the * * * Commanders * * * shall proportion the Men which each Company shall raise according to the Numbers of Men which the Company shall consist of, in Proportion to the whole Number to be raised by the Town to which such Companies shall respectively belong.

"AND * * * the Commanders of each respective Company * * * shall forthwith call their * * * Companies together, and in case the > Number of able-bodied effective Men which such Company is required to raise shall not voluntarily turn out to do Duty * * * , that then such Commander shall detach such a Number of Men as will make up their Quota * * * .

>
> "AND * * * the Committees appointed to class the Inhabitants of the Islands of Rhode-Island and Jamestown * * * are * * * empowered and directed, to detach from the Inhabitants of their respective Towns the Number of Men before assigned to the said Towns, unless they shall voluntarily engage in the said Service[.]"{EN-427}

As their name implied, Minutemen in particular were always subject to call: "That the * * * Minute-Men march for the Defence of the Colony, when and as often as they shall be called upon by the Colonel of the Regiment to which they respectively belong[.]"{EN-428} This, however, was pursuant to their initial voluntary enlistments in the Minute Companies.

b. In times of greatest peril, Rhode Island extended her drafts of men beyond her Militia proper:

> • [1667] "Whereas, information is given to the Councill of eminent dangers approaching, whereby his Majesties Collony is like to be hazarded by the invasion of the common enemy, or by treachery from amongst the natives, whereby his Majesties subjects may be exposed to great extremities; the Councill * * * doe order, that * * * the magistrates of the townes and places within this Collony * * * are * * * empowered to press or cause to be impressed, any person or persons * * * .
>
> "And it is further ordered, that if any suddain invasion or insurrection shall bee, or that appearance of any such thing shall present * * * then itt is, or shall be in the power of * * * Magistrates, to raise, appoint and authorize any or all persons requisitt for the preservation of his Majestyes Collony and his subjects therein, to attend their allegiance and duty."{EN-429}
>
> • [1780] "WHEREAS * * * Six Hundred and Ten effective Men were ordered to be raised within this State * * * ; and although the same were apportioned to the respective Towns * * * , some of the said Towns have not yet returned a Man, and others are greatly deficient * * * :
>
> "BE it therefore Enacted * * * , That [certain named individuals] * * * are * * * empowered and directed, to form all male Persons whatsoever, of the Age of Sixteen Years and upwards, residing within their respective Towns (Deserters, Indians, Mulattos and Negroes excepted) into Classes, according to the Deficiencies of their said Towns * * * : And each of the said Classes is directed to furnish * * * One able-bodied effective Man * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> "IT is further enacted * * * , That if * * * the said Classes shall refuse or neglect to furnish an able-bodied Man * * * , the Persons appointed to Class the said Men * * * are empowered and directed * * * to detach from the Class * * * an able-bodied effective Man[.]"{EN-430}

• [1780] "Be it Enacted * * * , That Three Hundred and Eight able-bodied effective Men * * * be forthwith raised within this State, to serve during the War, or Three Years; and that the whole Number * * * be apportioned to the several Towns in this State, agreeable to a mean Proportion between the rateable Polls and the rateable Estates, compared with the whole number of Polls, and the whole rateable Property in the State * * * :

* * * * *

"AND * * * in Case the aforesaid Number of Men * * * shall not be raised and inlisted by such Town * * * , [certain named individuals] * * * are * * * empowered and required, to form all male Persons whosoever, of the Age of Sixteen Years and upwards, residing in their respective Towns (Indians, Mulattoes and Negroes, excepted) into Classes, according to the Deficiency of each Town * * * , that is to say, into as many Classes as there are Men to be inlisted by such Town; * * * class[ing] the whole of the Inhabitants of their respective Towns * * * as equitably as may be, according to the Number of Polls and the Value of the Estates of the Persons to be classed, mingling the Rich and Poor together, so as to make the Classes in Point of Estate as nearly equal as may be: * * * That each of the said Classes shall * * * procure a good, able-bodied effective Man, to serve during the War, or for Three Years: That in case any * * * of said Classes shall neglect or refuse to procure their Recruits, * * * such Town is * * * fully authorized and empowered to hire such Recruit for each of the said neglecting Classes, and may assess the said Class, or the several neglecting Individuals thereof, in the same Proportions as the Taxes * * * are assessed in said Town, against the Individuals of such Class * * * : And that each and every Town which shall neglect to raise their whole Quota of Men * * * shall forfeit and pay to the Treasurer of this State * * * double the Sum it shall cost upon an Average to procure a Recruit, for each and every Deficiency; to be collected by adding the same to the next State Tax which shall be assessed on said Town. And moreover, that if either of the said Classes shall neglect or refuse to furnish an able-bodied Man * * * the [named individuals] * * * are empowered and required thereupon to detach * * * from the Class which shall be deficient * * * an able-bodied effective Man, to serve in this State's Battalion in the Army of the United States, during the said Term of Three Years * * * . And in case any one or more Individuals in a Class shall procure a Recruit at his or their Expence, the Expence * * * shall be reimbursed and repaid to the Person or Persons advancing the same, by the said Class upon whom the same shall be assessed * * * and from whom the same shall be collected in the same Proportions as herein before directed[.]"{EN-431}

These statutes evidenced the full extent of Rhode Island's power to mobilize for what Americans later described as "the common defence",[513] in the sense of the commonality of responsibility among her inhabitants for its provision. The General Assembly called in earlier years upon "any or all persons", and in later years upon "all male Persons whatsoever, of the Age of Sixteen Years and upwards, residing within their respective Towns (Deserters, Indians, Mulattos and Negroes excepted)", then upon "all male Persons whosoever, of the Age of Sixteen Years and upwards" without exception.

The latter statute also demonstrated the reality of the government's representative nature and concern for what Americans later denoted "the general Welfare",[514] by distributing its burdens with an eye towards economic justice. The law apportioned "the whole Number [of draftees] * * * to the several Towns * * * , agreeable to a mean Proportion between the rateable Polls and the rateable Estates, compared with the whole number of Polls, and the whole rateable Property in the State", and established "Classes [for draftees]" "according to the Number of Polls and the Value of the Estates of the Persons to be classed, mingling the Rich and Poor together, so as to make the Classes in Point of Estate as nearly equal as may be". Moreover, it assessed its costs fairly both to each "Class, or the several * * * Individuals thereof"—"in the same Proportions as the Taxes * * * are assessed in said Town, against th[os]e Individuals"; and to each individual who "procure[d] a Recruit at his Expence"—in which case "the Expence" would "be reimbursed * * * by the * * * Class".

5. Because of the nature of Militiamen as "citizen-soldiers" whose permanent vocations as citizens transcended their temporary occupations as soldiers, actual service in the field was neither continuous for any individual nor complete for the Militia as a whole. Rather, the policy was one of rotation in tours of duty. This was of particular importance during long periods of continuous strife, such as the War of Independence:

> • [1777] "[T]he first division of the second draft of the militia, and alarm and independent companies * * * [shall] march to such part of the shores within their respective counties, as shall be directed by the commanding officer * * * , properly equipped, to relieve those that are now upon duty[.]"{EN-432}
>
> • [1777] "[T]hat the militia and alarm companies of the town of Little Compton be drafted into two divisions * * * .
>
> "That one of the said divisions do duty within the said town, to guard the shores of the same, for the space of thirty days * * * .

---

[513] See U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

[514] See U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

"That after the expiration of the said thirty days, the first division be relieved by the second, who shall do duty within the said town, for the space of thirty days.

"That they continue to relieve each other, and do duty in manner as aforesaid, until the further orders of this Assembly."{EN-433}

• [1781] "[T]he Persons who shall do Duty upon the present Tour, shall be excused from doing any further military Duty, until the remaining Part of the military Force within this State shall have done an equal Proportion of military Service, unless in case of a general Alarm, or Invasion of this State.

"AND * * * the aforesaid military Force shall not be marched or carried out of this State. And upon the End and Expiration of their serving within this State One Month, * * * if it shall appear necessary then to maintain a military Force, drawn from the Militia, * * * they shall be relieved by other military Force, to be drawn out of the respective Corps, in the same Manner as * * * the present military Force [is] to be embodied."{EN-434}

• [1781] "Whereas it is highly expedient that a Body of Troops, completely armed and accoutred, should be on the Island of Rhode-Island * * * for the Safety and Defence thereof: It is therefore Voted and Resolved, That the * * * Independent Companies, to wit: The Artillery of Providence; the Kentish-Guards, the Kingston-Reds, and the Pawtuxet-Rangers, forthwith turn out One Half of the[ir] Men * * * to March to Newport * * * : And that the * * * Men who shall do Duty * * * shall be excused from doing further Duty until the remaining Part of the Men in their respective Towns shall have done an equal Tour of Duty."{EN-435}

Once again, though, a plea of rotation did not excuse any Militiaman from service "in case of a general Alarm, or Invasion of this State".

D. The Alarm List. As in the other Colonies, in Rhode Island "times of general alarm" were "when the whole military force of th[e] state shall be ordered upon duty together, and at the same time".{EN-436}

1. During "alarms", Rhode Island required all able-bodied free men from sixteen to sixty years of age to muster in defense of their Towns and the Colony as a whole. Those from sixteen to fifty years of age were listed in the Trained Bands,[515] whereas those from fifty to sixty years of age were separately designated "the Alarm List":

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "That upon any Alarm in time of War, or other eminent danger of any Assault or Invasion, all Male Persons, both Listed Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Age of [515] See ante, at 125-126 and 208-220.

---

Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall upon notice of the same, forthwith Repair to the Colours and Ensigns of such Company, within whose Precincts they Inhabit or dwell, provided with Arms & Ammunition required of Trained Soldiers upon Training Days[.]"{EN-437}

• [1766] "[U]pon any Alarm in Time of War or other imminent Danger of any Assault or Invasion, all male Persons, both enlisted Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Ages of Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall upon Notice of the same forthwith repair to the Colours and Ensigns of such Company, within whose Precincts they inhabit or dwell, provided with Arms and Ammunition required of trained Soldiers upon training Days[.]"{EN-438}

• [1779] "That all Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the respective Town-Councils, shall be at all Times armed, accoutred and equipped * * * upon the same Penalty as though they were held to military Duty, provided that they be enrolled, and an exact List be taken of them, by the Colonel of the Battalion in whose District they live; that upon any Deficiency in Arms, &c. he issue his Warrant * * * : And that they be considered as the Alarm-List of the State, and be subject to all other Duties as those exempted from bearing Arms [in the Trained Bands]."{EN-439}

2. During an "alarm", exemptions even for those serving in high public office were limited.[516] For instance, in 1777 Rhode Island's General Assembly allowed "all [of its] Members * * * who are drawn in the second or third Division of the Alarm-List of this State, [to] be excused from doing Duty in said Divisions at any Time during a Session of this Assembly, and one Day before the Sitting thereof, and two Days after the Rising of the same".{EN-440} Otherwise they were required to serve.

The only excuse generally allowed for avoidance of duty during "alarms" was physical disability. For example, in 1777 the General Assembly ordered "the first division of the second draft of the * * * alarm * * * companies" to "march to such part of the shores within their respective counties, as shall be directed by the commanding officer * * * , properly equipped, to relieve those that are now upon duty", but also provided "that in case of sickness and inability to do duty (which alone shall excuse any person), it shall be in the power of * * * the field officers * * * to permit such a person to hire a man to do his tour of duty; and if such sick and unable person shall be so extremely poor * * * as to be unable to hire a person in his stead, * * * such field officer be empowered to remit such poor person's fine."{EN-441} Exemptions from service on account of disability, though, were closely confined. For example, in 1713, in response to the petition of one John Gavet "to be released and acquitted from martial discipline, by reason of an incurable lameness in one of his feet", the General Assembly enacted that "Gavet shall be, and is hereby acquitted and discharged for ever hereafter from all manner of martial discipline, alarms only excepted".{EN-442}

---

[516] See post, at 259-261.

Even the employment of substitutes might be curtailed where "alarms" were concerned. For instance, in 1777 the General Assembly decreed > that if any two men in this state, whether belonging to the militia, alarm list, or independent companies * * * shall * * * enlist and deliver * * * an able-bodied, effective man, to serve in the [Continental battalions], for three years, or during the war, and who shall pass muster, they shall be exempted from being drafted for, or doing, duty in any of the Continental battalions, for, and during the term for which such able-bodied man shall enlist * * * .

>
> Provided, nevertheless, that such exemption shall not extend to excuse any person from doing duty in time of an alarm, or in case of a draft for the immediate defence of this state.{EN-443}

On the other hand, although only men from fifty to sixty years of age were required to muster as part of "the Alarm List" during "alarms", all statutory and customary limitations with respect to age were generally inapplicable to or disregarded for volunteers.

Moreover, although women were neither expected nor allowed to serve within the Militia even in times of "alarms", they could be found as volunteer auxiliaries in such closely related martial activities as the manufacture of ammunition.[517]

3. An "alarm" was considered so serious that even severe restrictions on travel were imposed. For example, in both 1744 and 1766 the General Assembly ordered

> [t]hat after an Alarm is beaten in any Town in this Colony, no Man whatsoever shall leave or go out of said Town so alarmed, but by Leave or Order from the Commanding Officer there, upon the Penalty of paying to and for the Use of the Colony, the Sum of One Hundred Pounds, to be recovered * * * by Action of Debt, Bill, Plaint, or Information, in any Court of Record within this Colony; and in case any Person shall not have sufficient Estate to pay the same, then such Person shall be committed to Goal * * * for the Space of Six Month, or else shall be sent to the Fort, there to serve the Colony as a Soldier for * * * Six Months[.]{EN-444}

---

[517] See R. Gross, The Minutemen, ante note 379, at 69 (Massachusetts).

4. Organizationally, "the alarm-list, in each town" came to be "embodied in a separate company", the officers of which were "to be chosen by the company so embodied", and the members of which "equip[ped] themselves".{EN-445} So, as with all other components of the Militia, men on the Alarm List were expected to be fully armed,[518] and were subject to fines and other penalties for each and every default.[519] To enforce compliance, Militia officers were "directed to cause strict examination to be made of the state of the arms, &c., of the militia, alarm * * * and independent companies".{EN-446} These requirements demonstrate that the Alarm List was not something separate from, but instead was integral to, Rhode Island's Militia as a whole—its particular status being the product of nothing more than the commonsensical recognition that, on average, men of advanced years could not perform physically to the level required of the younger men organized in the Trained Bands.

Those on the Alarm List who were unable to provide their own firearms were supplied by Local governments. For example, in 1776 the General Assembly directed "[t]hat Two Thousand Stand of good Fire-Arms, with Bayonets, Iron Ramrods, and Cartouch-Boxes, be purchased for the Use of the Colony * * * and distributed to each Town, in Proportion to the Number of Polls upon the Alarm List therein", and "[t]hat the Town-Council of each Town shall have Power * * * to determine what Persons in their respective Towns shall have the Benefit and Use of the Arms provided * * * and be exempted from providing themselves as the Law requires".{EN-447} That same year, when "all Male Persons subject by Law to bear Arms, whether of the Militia, Alarm List or Independent Companies" were "draughted in three Divisions", the General Assembly directed "[t]hat the Town-Councils of each Town furnish such Persons as they shall certify to be unable to furnish themselves, with Arms * * * and Accoutrements, as by Law required; and that the same be paid out of the General Treasury".{EN-448} And in 1777, when "one Half of the Militia, Alarm, Independent, and Artillery Companies" were drafted, "if any Person * * * appear[ed] not duly equipped, * * * the Commanding Officer of the Company to which he belong[ed was] empowered to impress a Gun, or whatever Accoutrements he m[ight] stand in Need of".{EN-449}

5. Although exempt from regular training, Militiamen on the Alarm List were subject to drafts—a circumstance hardly surprising, inasmuch as any occasion that justified a draft would almost certainly have constituted a proper "alarm". For example, in addition to the instances noted above, in 1777 the General Assembly ordered "[t]hat One of the Divisions, consisting of the One Sixth Part of the Independent and Alarm Companies and Militia heretofore draughted, and One Half of a Division, be immediately called upon actual Duty", and that anyone who "shall neglect to appear * * * , either by himself or a good able-bodied and suitable Person in his Stead, compleatly equipped with Arms and Accoutrements, to enter upon and perform such military Duty as shall be enjoined him, * * * shall be liable to pay * * * a Fine for each Day's Neglect".{EN-450}

---

[518] See ante, Chapters 6 and 7.

[519] See post, Chapter 12.

E. The Senior Class. This was the name Rhode Island applied to the set of men between the ages of sixteen and fifty who were otherwise exempted from regular Militia service in the Trained Bands because of their important public offices or critical private occupations,[520] but who nevertheless were "at all Times [to] be armed, accoutred and provided, * * * and subjected to the same Regulations" as the Trained Bands.{EN-451} These requirements alone demonstrate that, as with the Alarm List, the Senior Class was not something separate from, but instead was integral to, Rhode Island's Militia—its particular status being the product of nothing more than the commonsensical recognition that men whose offices or occupations warranted their exemptions from the normal duties of the Trained Bands should nevertheless be fully prepared to assume when necessary all of the fundamental Militia duties incumbent upon everyone else. Thus, the exemptions for these men did not operate as exclusions from the Militia, but simply caused them to be assigned to a component separate from the Trained Bands and the Alarm List.

The separate status of the Senior Class did not entail inferior organization, however. To the contrary: The Senior Class was highly organized throughout Rhode Island. Its members were to "be officered in the same Manner as the Infantry Companies, with such Field and Staff Officers as their Numbers * * * entitle[d] them to, and who shall at all Times be armed, accoutred and provided * * * and subjected to the same Regulations as" the rest of the Militia. Members of "the Senior Class in the Town of Providence [were to] constitute one Company; those of the Town of Cranston, one Company; those of the Towns of Johnston and North-Providence, one Company; those of the Town of Smithfield, one Company; those of the Town of Cumberland, one Company; those of the Town of Scituate, one Company; and those of the Town of Gloucester, one Company: * * * the said Companies [to] be formed into one Battalion, to be commanded by one Lieutenant-Colonel Commandant, and one Major"—and on through the organization into Companies in a list of other Towns. In addition, "Companies of Horse" were "formed from the Senior Class of their respective Districts, at their own Election, * * * due Regard being had to their Abilities and local Situation".{EN-452}

F. Independent Companies. Rhode Island also permitted, encouraged, and provided a procedure for her residents to organize "Independent Companies" as separate components of her Militia. As with the Trained Bands, Independent Companies could consist of infantry,{EN-453} cavalry,{EN-454} and even artillery.{EN-455}

---

[520] See post, at 252-256.

1. Although the statutes creating them were variously titled—such as "An ACT for erecting…", "AN ACT establishing…", or "An ACT to incorporate…"—all of Rhode Island's Independent Companies were the products of governmental, not merely private, action: invariably, a petition by certain individuals to the General Assembly for permission to form such a Company, followed by a specific statutory grant of authority for that purpose alone. Thus, the enabling legislation might declare that:

> • [1755] "they are hereby made, constituted, and declared a special Company, to be called and known by the Name of, THE ARTILLERY COMPANY, and by that Name shall have and take perpetual Succession";{EN-456} or
>
> • [1774, 1775, and 1776] "this Assembly * * * have Ordained, Constituted, and Granted, That they * * * be, and they are hereby, declared to be an Independent Company, by the Name of The Light-Infantry, for the County of Providence: And by that Name they shall have perpetual Succession";{EN-457} or
>
> • [1774] "[i]t is hereby Enacted, Granted, Ordered, and Ordained, That the said Company now inlisted, and which shall hereafter inlist * * * be * * * incorporated into a distinct and separate Military Company, to be called * * * The Providence Grenadier Company".{EN-458}

Moreover, the General Assembly did not supinely accede to whatever petitions for the formation of Independent Companies were submitted, but instead investigated the requests. As in 1774, when it "appointed a committee, to take into consideration the several petitions * * * for establishing an independent company in the town of Newport; an independent company in the towns of East Greenwich, Warwick and Coventry; and a grenadier company in the town of Providence; and that they make report * * * as soon as conveniently may be".{EN-459}

2. Nonetheless, doubtlessly because of their origins in private petitions, Rhode Island considered her Independent Companies to be special establishments, with their own peculiar status. So the general Militia laws recognized:

> • [1766] "[N]othing in this Act * * * shall * * * take away or diminish any of the Liberties, Privileges,or Immunities of any independent * * * Companies established by Law in this Colony; but that the same, according to their Establishment, be preserved to them entire, any Thing herein before contained to the contrary notwithstanding[.]"{EN-460}
>
> • [1779] "[T]his Act shall not * * * have Influence upon or prejudice any Charters already granted to Independent Companies[.]"{EN-461}

That special status, however, was conditioned upon faithful compliance with the statutory grants, as enactments from 1774 made clear:

> • "[A]s soon as said Company shall cease to do their Duty * * * this Grant shall be void, and all Persons * * * shall do Duty in the Company in whose District they live, in the same Manner as if they had belonged to said Trained Bands."{EN-462}
>
> • "[I]n Case the Rules and Regulations, in this Charter contained, be not performed and complied with, then this Charter shall cease, determine, and be null and void."{EN-463}
>
> • "[T]he * * * Grant is on this Condition, that if the * * * Company shall, for the Space of One Year, neglect to Train, and exercise themselves, that then the * * * Charter shall be void and forfeit."{EN-464}

3. The statutes set out the reason for forming Independent Companies in variations on the same theme: namely, the need for instruction of Rhode Islanders in the military arts. Quite often, the statutes declared that "the Preservation of this Colony, in Time of War, depends, under God, upon the military Skill and Discipline of the Inhabitants".{EN-465} But a statute might be more specific, emphasizing that "the Preservation of this Colony, in Time of War, depends, under God, upon the military Skill and Discipline of the Inhabitants, and especially upon the skill and Discipline of Artillery Companies".{EN-466} Or it might simply acknowledge "[t]hat a Number of Persons in [a particular] * * * Town, animated by a laudable Motive of perfecting themselves in military Discipline, by more frequent and regular Exercisings than they can obtain in the Companies of Militia, in their present State, are desirous of being formed into an Independent Company".{EN-467}

In light of these intentions, hardly surprising was that the General Assembly responded "with a View to encourage a Purpose so Laudable and Useful"{EN-468} and "to give all due Encouragement to so laudable a Design".{EN-469} Thus, in contradistinction to contemporary times, in *pre-*constitutional Rhode Island citizens who sought to form Independent Companies were considered praiseworthy, not suspicious, let alone possibly subject to prosecution for supposedly criminal acts.[521]

4. Each statute specifically identified the men who had petitioned to form an Independent Company—the number varying widely, from two named individuals and other unnamed "Freemen, and Inhabitants of the Town of Providence" to ninety-three named individuals from the Towns of Smithfield and Cumberland.{EN-470} Almost all of the statutes specifically limited the enrollments in the Independent Companies they authorized—although, once again, the numbers varied, according to different formulae that included the petitioners "together with such others as shall be hereafter added to them (not exceeding 80, exclusive of

---

[521] See, e.g., New Hampshire Revised Statutes, Title VIII, Chapter 111, § 111:15.

Officers)",[EN-471] "not exceeding the Number of One Hundred in the whole, Officers included",[EN-472] "not exceeding the Number of One Hundred, exclusive of Officers",[EN-473] or "not exceeding the Number of One Hundred Men, Rank and File".[EN-474]

In some instances, a statute was more specific: One "Company shall consist of any Number of proper Men, not less than Twenty-four, nor exceeding One Hundred, Rank and File", and "are * * * empowered to inlist * * * a sufficient Number to complete their * * * full Compliment * * * within the Boundaries and Limits of the Providence Regiment".[EN-475] Another Company was "at all Times empowered to inlist Men sufficient to complete their full Complement of Sixty-four Men, Rank and File, out of the Town of North-Providence, and the Easternmost Company of the Town of Smithfield".[EN-476] In another instance, the authorization to recruit was less particular: "and such others as shall be added to them".[EN-477]

In any event, the statutes always implied that each Independent Company might choose its own members without any further governmental approval, supervision, or intervention—because none of the statutes named particular individuals who were to join (other than the original petitioners), thus necessarily leaving the matter in practice to the Companies' members themselves.

5. Presumably, in most cases the men who petitioned to form, and who thereafter joined, Independent Companies were at that time not exempt from ordinary Militia duty, and might even have then been serving in regular Militia Companies. For example, one Independent Company was formed "at the Request of the Company now associated and inlisted from the Company of Militia in North-Providence, and the Eastermost Company of Militia in Smithfield * * * , together with such others as may inlist with them, not exceeding Sixty-four Men, Rank and File".[EN-478]

Yet men who were exempt from Militia service could form Independent Companies, too. In one instance, in 1756 the petitioners declared that > they have, in Time past, had the Honor to be commissioned Officers in and over some of the Companies, or trained Band, of [Newport] * * * : That notwithstanding they are legally discharged from bearing Arms, as Soldiers in the Militia, they are desirous to be useful unto their Country: And thereupon prayed for an Act of th[e General] Assembly, to incorporate and make them, and such as they shall hereafter receive into their Number, an Independent Company[.]

The General Assembly granted their request, but with the proviso that "no Person shall be inlisted into said Company, that is by Law obliged to train in either of the other Companies".[EN-479]

6. In the vast majority of instances, the members of an Independent Company, "or the greater Number of them", were authorized "once in every Year" on a specified day to "meet and assemble themselves together in some convenient Place by them appointed, then and there to chuse their own Officers * * * by the greater Number of Voters present; the Captain, Lieutenants and Ensign, to be approved of by the Governor and Council * * * and * * * [to] be commissionated and engaged in the same Manner that other Military Officers in" Rhode Island were.{EN-480} In some cases, the Governor alone "order[ed], and direct[ed] Commissions to be issued to the[officers]".{EN-481} And in one case the General Assembly took the task of "Approbation" directly upon itself.{EN-482}

Typically, too, members of an Independent Company were not "subject to the Orders or Directions of the Colonel, or other Field Officers of the [regular Militia] Regiment in whose District they live[d], in their said Meetings and Exercisings [that is, training]".{EN-483} But the General Assembly sometimes directed that a particular Independent Company be subject to the command of officers other than its own on certain "Field-Days",{EN-484} or (as in one case) that "the * * * Company shall be at all Times under the Field-Officers of the First Battalion of the Brigade in the County of Providence, and take such Rank as they shall appoint on all general Muster-Days".{EN-485}

7. Very rarely, men petitioning to form an Independent Company explicitly "proposed the Laws of the Colony made for regulating the Militia, for the Rule of their Conduct".{EN-486} No less infrequently, the General Assembly prescribed that such a Company "shall have Power * * * to make such By-Laws for the better regulating and disciplining the same, from Time to Time, as they shall find necessary; provided that they make no Law, Regulation or Order, but what shall be consistent with the Laws of this Colony, at all Times, respecting Militia Companies".{EN-487} Doubtlessly, such pronouncements were few and far between, because everyone considered them unnecessary, naturally presuming that compliance by the Independent Companies with the pith of the Militia laws was implicit in any charter the General Assembly granted—every Independent Company, after all, being part and parcel of the Militia.

For that reason, most of the statutes simply recited that the members of the Company being established would have the power:

> • [1755, 1774, 1775, and 1776] "to make such Rules and Orders amongst themselves, as they shall think necessary, to promote the End of their Establishment, and lay such Fines and Forfeitures upon any of their own Company, for the Breach of any such Rules and Orders as they shall think proper, so as the same exceed not Forty Shillings for any one Offence; and also shall have full Power to levy the said Fines and Forfeitures * * * by a Warrant of Distress";{EN-488} or

> • [1774] "to appoint their Days for Meeting, and when met, to make all such Laws, Rules, Orders, and Regulations; and for the Breaches thereof, to impose such Fines, Penalties, and Forfeitures, as to them shall seem meet; and by their proper Officers to demand, recover, and receive, to and for the Use of said Company, all such Fines or Forfeitures: * * * Provided always, that no Fine or Forfeiture, for any single Offence, shall exceed the Sum of Twelve Shillings";{EN-489} or
>
> • [1774 and 1775] "[to] make all such Laws, Rules, and Orders, among themselves, as they shall deem expedient, for the well ordering, and disciplining, said Company; and lay any Penalty, or Fine, for the Breach of such Rules, not exceeding Twelve Shillings * * * for One Offence, to be collected [by Warrant of Distress]".{EN-490}

Once formed, though, Independent Companies were not necessarily left entirely to their own devices and without governmental supervision with respect to their internal discipline. For example, in 1779 the General Assembly concluded that "the Fines expressed in the Act * * * for incorporating the Captain-General's Cavaliers are so small that they are not by any Means adequate to the good Designs intended in and by said Act", and therefore decreed "That the Fines and Penalties for not meeting and exercising agreeable to the said Act" would be significantly augmented.{EN-491}

8. Almost all of the statutes that chartered Independent Companies were silent as to the requirement imposed on most other Militiamen that the Companies' members would supply their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements. Yet, obviously, if they were to perform their purpose, all of the Independent Companies had to be fully armed, no less than the Trained Bands, the Senior Class, and the Alarm List. Unless too poor to do so, members of the latter three divisions of the Militia were always obliged by statute to acquire their own equipment at their own expense by purchase in the free market.[522] Presumably no man too poor to furnish himself with suitable arms would seek or be allowed to form, or be chosen to join, an Independent Company (although Companies composed of wealthy men could have afforded to take on some less financially able members for the sake of social solidarity). Moreover, no provision was made by statute for the public to supply any member of an Independent Company with personal arms. So, implicit in the establishment of each such Company must have been the requirement that its members would conform to the otherwise standard Militia rules for each individual's acquisition and maintenance of necessary equipment. Surely, the power of their members to make "Laws, Rules, and Orders * * * as they shall deem expedient, for the well ordering, and disciplining" of Independent Companies, enforceable by fines, was sufficient to that end.

---

[522] See ante, Chapters 6 through 9.

In some instances, though, the statutes did explicitly address the matter of equipment:

> • [1774] An Independent Company of infantry known as the Providence Grenadier Company was required to "be furnished with suitable Arms, and Accoutrements, and Uniform, for a Grenadier Company, at all Times", and "to appoint their own Uniform, and alter, and change, the same, from Time to Time, as they shall think necessary".{EN-492}
>
> • [1775] An Independent Troop of Horse known as the Captain-General's Cavaliers was required to "be compleatly equipped with all Accoutrements and Furniture, commonly used by other Troops of Horse, with the Addition of a Carabine [that is, a short musket] to each and every of said Troopers".{EN-493}

These particulars were appropriate—and most likely originated with the petitioners themselves—because one of the Companies consisted of specialized infantry ("grenadiers") and the other intended to serve as a bodyguard or other élite force for the Militia's Commander in Chief. In any event, nothing in these statutes shifted to the government the burden of providing the mandated equipment.

In the case of artillery, however, public assistance in arming Independent Companies was sometimes forthcoming. For example, in 1774 the General Assembly "empowered and directed [the Captain of The Train of Artillery, for the County of Providence], to purchase at the Expence, and for the Use, of the Colony, Four Brass Cannon, Four Pounders, with Carriages, Implements, and Utensils, necessary for exercising them; And that they be lent to the said Company, to improve them in the Exercise of Cannon".{EN-494}

9. Howsoever they may have been equipped, Independent Companies were not the sole and final judges of their own readiness, but (as with other components of Rhode Island's Militia) were subject to inspections on that score. For example, in 1776 the General Assembly ordered that

> * * * [E]ach captain * * * of the several independent companies, and companies of militia in this state, [shall] notify his company to appear at some proper place * * * under arms, with all accoutrements, agreeably to law.
>
> That such captain * * * make out a list of the deficiency of each person in each article.
>
> That he send a proper officer to the dwelling-house of each person not attending, to examine how far such person be deficient.
>
> That each captain * * * of the companies of militia, make a proper return thereof, to the colonel of the regiment * * * .
>
> That each captain * * * of the independent companies, make a like return to th[e General] Assembly[.]"{EN-495}

And in 1779, an inspector was "directed to cause strict examination to be made of the state of the arms * * * of the militia, alarm and independent companies, within this state * * * as by law is required", and to "cause returns to be made to him of the particular deficiencies in each Company within five days next after such examination".{EN-496}

10. As were her Trained Bands, Rhode Island's Independent Companies were required—actually, obliged themselves—to train on a regular basis. The mandatory minimum was that "they be obliged to meet for exercising, at least four Times a Year, upon the Penalty of paying to and for the Use of said Company, [certain] Fines", differing by the rank of the offender from (for instance) "Five Pounds" for the Captain to "Twenty Shillings" each for "common Soldiers".{EN-497} But, inasmuch as they were units composed entirely of volunteers particularly enthusiastic for the duty, Independent Companies were expected and encouraged to train on a more frequent basis—typically, "at least four Times in a Year, and as many more as the Company shall agree upon".{EN-498} In point of fact, precisely the "laudable Motive of perfecting themselves in military Discipline, by more frequent and regular Exercisings than they can obtain in the Companies of Militia, in their present State," animated Rhode Islanders to form Independent Companies.{EN-499} That being so, the statutes were careful to allow that each "Company shall have Liberty"—or "License", as it was sometimes denoted—"to meet and exercise themselves * * * as often as they shall think necessary".{EN-500} And it was left to the Officers to decide when "to call together the * * * Company to exercise and perfect themselves in military Discipline, in such Manner as they may judge most expedient".{EN-501}

11. Membership in an Independent Company always conferred an exemption from other Militia duties—because, after all, membership in such a Company was a form of Militia duty, and perhaps a higher form in light of its voluntary nature and oftentimes expanded duties. Many of the statutes provided that "all those who shall be duly enlisted in this Company, so long as they shall continue therein, shall be exempted from bearing Arms, or doing military Duty (watching and warding excepted) in the several Companies or train'd Bands in whose District they respectively live, except such as shall at any Time be Officers in any of the said Companies".{EN-502} Some exempted "all those who shall be duly inlisted in the * * * Company, so long as they shall continue therein, * * * from bearing Arms, or doing military Duty (Watching and Warding excepted), in the several Trained Bands, in whose District they live".{EN-503} More favorably yet, the statute incorporating the North-Providence Rangers allowed that "the Persons * * * incorporated, whilst they belong to, and do Duty in, the * * * Company * * * , shall be exempt from doing Duty in any other Militia Company whatever".{EN-504} And the act incorporating the Providence Grenadier Company mandated that its members

"shall be free from all military Duty whatsoever, save with, and in, their own Company, so long as they belong thereto".{EN-505}

12. "Alarms", of course, were another matter altogether, with respect to which exemptions for members of Independent Companies (or anyone else) were unknown. The question the statutes answered was to whose command particular Independent Companies would be assigned on those dire occasions. Most of the statutes placed various Companies "in Time of an Alarm * * * under the immediate Direction of the Captain General of the Colony",{EN-506} "the Commander in Chief of the Colony",{EN-507} or " the Captain-General, Lieutenant-General, and Major-General of the Colony".{EN-508} In isolated instances, though, an Independent Company might "in Time of an Alarm, be under the Direction of the Field Officers of the County of Newport",{EN-509} or "upon all Field-Days, public Trainings, and Alarms * * * be under the Directions, and Orders, of the Field-Officers of the Regiment, in the County of Providence".{EN-510} Howsoever the command was assigned, nothing was left to chance.

13. To encourage and reward the formation of Independent Companies, Rhode Island's General Assembly often granted them special prerogatives and privileges. For example:

> • [1775] "[U]pon all general Reviews, and general Musters, the * * * Company shall rank the first Independent Company for the County of King's County[.]"{EN-511}
>
> • [1774] "[The] Company, on all Field-Days, [shall] take the Right Wing of the Third Battalion in the County of Providence[.]"{EN-512}
>
> • [1774] "[U]pon all Field-Days, and public Trainings, the * * * Company of Light-Infantry shall hold their Rank and Station in the Front of the left Wing of the Regiment in whose District they are included[.]"{EN-513}
>
> • [1774] "[O]n all general Field-Days, when the whole Providence Regiment shall be embodied, the Officers and Soldiers of the [Independent] Grenadier Company may * * * appear with their proper Arms, and in their Uniform, and on their proper Ground, * * * holding, and enjoying, at all Times, and upon all Occasions, such Rank, and Precedence, as is proper to them as a Grenadier Company[.]"{EN-514}
>
> • [1774] "Commissioned Officers of the * * * Company * * * shall take Rank before the Commissioned Officers of Militia, in the Colony[.]"{EN-515}
>
> • [1774] "[T]he * * * Company shall be under the particular Command of the present Major of the First Battalion in the County of Providence. And in Case of his being hereafter advanced in Command, * * * the * * * Company shall still continue to belong to, and be under his > Command, and be advanced with him to that Place and Station in the Regiment, which Companies, commanded by Officers of that Rank to which he may be advanced * * * are entitled to take[.]"{EN-516}

>
> • [1775] "[F]or the further Encouragement of the * * * Troop, it is further granted to them, who are (as this Assembly is informed by their humble Petition) designed to be composed of such as have sustained Offices in the civil and military Departments, and others of Worth, that [their officers be commissioned in various high ranks.]"{EN-517}

Whatever irony her General Assembly may have relished in acknowledging a "humble Petition" from men who vaunted their former "Offices" and present "Worth", Rhode Island's legislators recognized that honors were not wasted if they elicited patriotic efforts.

14. In the course of the Militia's general operations, too, Independent Companies were often afforded a certain deference. For example—

> • In 1775, the General Assembly "Enacted * * * That One Quarter Part of the Militia * * * be inlisted as Minute-Men, to meet together, and exercise themselves in military Discipline, Half a Day, Once in every Fortnight", and "That the said Minute-Men march for the Defence of the Colony, when and as often as they shall be called upon by the Colonel of the Regiment to which they respectively belong". Nonetheless, it also provided "That the several Independent Companies in this Colony, or such of them as shall think proper, form themselves into Companies of Minute-Men".{EN-518} Notwithstanding that the Independent Companies were presumably the most likely sources for "Minute-Men", because they were composed entirely of volunteers, they were allowed the option of refusing to reform themselves as such.
>
> • In 1777, the General Assembly "recommended to the Independent Company of Kingstown Reds, that they excuse George Tesst and Jeremiah Sheffield (who are employed in making and stocking Guns) from doing any Service in said Company".{EN-519} "[R]ecommended", rather than "ordered" or "directed"—even though, at that time, gunsmithing was a skill of critical importance to the community. And, > shall not voluntarily turn out to do Duty * * * , to detach the Men for the Service * * * and cause them to be marched to the * * * Rendezvous". But "where any Independent Company * * * shall be in any Town or Towns, *the * * * Commander of the Regiment, within whose District such Independent Company shall be, and the Commander of such Independent Corps, shall settle and fix the Number to be raised out of such Corps*, in the same Proportion as * * * taken from the Militia at large, in such Town".{EN-520} Thus, in contradistinction to Rhode Island's regular Militia Companies, as to which the matter was one of peremptory command, with her Independent Companies it was one of coöperation.
>
> • In 1781, the General Assembly "Enacted, That Twelve Hundred able-bodied effective Men of the Independent, Artillery, Senior and Junior Class Companies of Militia * * * rendezvous at [certain] Places within this State * * * to do Duty therein for One Month". With respect to most of the Militia, the "Commanders of each Regiment * * * shall forthwith issue their Warrants to the Captains of each Company * * * , setting forth the Number of * * * able-bodied effective Men, which such Company is required to furnish, and commanding such Captain * * * , if the said Number of Men

15. Independent Companies were not always granted special consideration, however. For example, as already noted, no less than the Trained Bands and the Alarm Companies, Independent Companies were subject to "strict examination to be made of the state of the[ir] arms".[523] Also, along with the Trained Bands and the Alarm List, their members were subject to being drafted.{EN-521} Indeed, in 1781, certain Independent Companies—doubtlessly because of their superior state of readiness—were singled out for such service:

> Whereas it is highly expedient that a Body of Troops, completely armed and accoutred, should be on the Island of Rhode-Island * * * for the Safety and Defence thereof: It is therefore Voted and Resolved, That the * * * Independent Companies, to wit: The Artillery of Providence; the Kentish-Guards, the Kingstown-Reds, and the Pawtuxet-Rangers, forthwith turn out One Half of the[ir] Men * * * to March to Newport * * * : And that the * * * aforesaid Men who shall do Duty * * * shall be excused from doing further Duty until the remaining Part of the Men in their respective Towns shall have done an equal Tour of Duty.{EN-522}

16. That Rhode Island's Independent Companies were composed of more than pampered "social soldiers", stylishly uniformed dandies, and dilletantes the career of Nathanael Greene illustrates. Although from a Quaker background, Greene enlisted in the Kentish Guards,{EN-523} provided himself with a British musket which he smuggled from Boston in defiance of General Gage's attempts at "gun control", and rose meteorically to become a Brigadier General in command of all of Rhode Island's troops at the siege of Boston in 1775.[524] Then, during the course of the War of Independence, he became George Washington's arguably most able and dependable commander.

---

[523] See ante, Chapter 8.

[524] J. Bartlett, Records of the Colony of Rhode Island, ante note 309, Volume VII, at 322; G. Carbone, Nathanael Greene, ante note 310, at 10-30; Louis Birnbaum, Red Dawn at Lexington: "If They Mean to Have a War, Let It Begin Here!" (Boston, Massachusetts: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1986), at 205-208.

G. The Watch and the Ward. If her Independent Companies represented a strain of voluntary service within Rhode Island's Militia, her Watch and Ward embodied the fullness of compulsory duty.

1. "Watch" variously means "[g]uard; vigilant keep", "[w]atchmen; men set to guard", and the "[p]ost or office of a watchman"[525]—or "[t]he act of watching", "wakeful, vigilant, or constantly observant attention", "preservative or preventive vigilance", and "guarding by night"; "a body of watchmen", "a sentry", "a guard"; "[t]he post or office of a watchman" and "the place where a watchman is posted, or where a guard is kept"; and "[t]he period of the night when a person does duty as a sentinel, or guard"[526]—and, in particular, "men set for a guard, either one person or more, * * * to espy the approach of an enemy or other danger, and to give an alarm or notice".[527] "Ward" variously means "[t]o guard; to watch", "[t]o defend; to protect"[528]—or "the act of guarding * * * specifically, a guarding during the day"; and "[o]ne who, or that which, guards", a "garrison"[529]—and "[t]o keep in safety", "to guard", "[t]o defend", "to protect"; "[t]o be vigilant"; and "[t]o act on the defensive with a weapon".[530] When distinctions are drawn between the two, "watch" usually denotes keeping guard during the night, and "ward" during the day.[531] Some authorities suggest that such a differentiation is a matter more of word-play than of reality.[532] But Rhode Island's pre-constitutional statutes treated it as substantial.

The Watch was an institution as ancient in origin as its necessity in Anglo-American society was always apparent. In positive law, it dates from at least the English Statute of Winchester in 1285, which commanded that [525] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 4, 5, and 7 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

---

[526] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1630, definitions 1 through 4. Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 2, at 3699, definitions 3, 6, 6b, 8, and 11.

[527] N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 5.

[528] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 1 and 2 in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions

[529] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note111, at 1626, definitions 1 and 2 (noun). Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 2, at 3684, definitions 1 and 11 (noun).

[530] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1627, definitions 1 and 2 (transitive verb), and definitions 1 and 2 (intransitive verb). Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, at 3684, definition 1 (verb).

[531] See, e.g., S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 8 ("watch" is "[a] period of the night") in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions; N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 8 ("watch") and definition 1 ("ward"); Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1630, definition 1 ("watch"), and 1626 and 1627, definition 1 ("ward"); The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11 Volume 2, at 3699, definition 4; Black's Law Dictionary, ante note 368, at 1761.

[532] The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 2, at 3699, definition 7 of "watch".

> all watches be made as it hath been used in times past * * * in every city by six men at every gate; in every borough, twelve men; every town, six or four, according to the number of the inhabitants of the town, and they shall watch the town continually all night from the sun-setting to the sun-rising. And if any stranger do pass by them he shall be arrested until morning[;]

and that > every man have in his house harness [that is, armaments] for to keep the peace * * * that is to say, every man between fifteen years of age and sixty years shall be assessed and sworn to armour according to the quantity of their lands and goods; that is to wit, from fifteen pounds lands, and goods forty marks, an hauberke, an helme of iron, a sword, a knife, and a horse; and from ten pounds of lands, and twenty marks goods, an hauberke, an helme of iron, a sword, and a knife; and from five pounds lands, a doublet, an helme of iron, a sword, and a knife; and from forty shillings of land, a sword, a bow and arrows, and a knife; and he that hath less than forty shillings yearly shall * * * keep gisarmes, knives and other less weapons; and he that hath less than twenty marks in goods, shall have swords, knives, and other less weapons; and all other that may shall have bows and arrows out of the forest, and in the forest bows and boults. And that view of armour be made every year two times. And * * * two constables shall * * * make the view of armour; and * * * present * * * such defaults as they shall find[.][533]

The Watch in Colonial America is often treated as the first institution established for the regular purposes of "law enforcement", and therefore as the precursor of modern-day municipal police forces.[534] This view, however, forgets that both the Watch and the Ward were effectively subsets of the *pre-*constitutional Militia (as probably no one who served in the Watch or the Ward was not a member of the Militia, too), and that to this day the Militia retain the explicit constitutional authority—that no police forces share (unless, as they should be, all police forces are deemed to be, and employed as, specialized units within the Militia[535])—"to execute the Laws of the Union" when specially "call[ed] forth" for that purpose,[536] and to execute the laws of their States at all other times.

---

[533] 13 Edward I, Chapter 6, ¶¶ IV and VI, as presented in William Stubbs, Select Charters and Other Illustrations of English Constitutional History from the Earliest Times to the Reign of Edward the First (Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, Eighth Edition, 1905), at 473, 474.

[534] See, e.g., Cynthia Morris & Bryan Vila, Editors, The Role of Police in American Society: A Documentary History (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1999), at 3-4.

[535] See post, at 327-328, 1135-1138, 1194-1202, 1276-1277, 1291-1293, and 1482-1488.

[536] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

2. As with her Militia—when the Trained Bands, Senior Class, Alarm List, and Independent Companies are aggregated—Rhode Island predicated her Watch and Ward on the principle of near-universal service.

a. In the earliest days, every man who could carry a firearm performed the functions of Watch and Ward as a practical matter:

> • [1639] "[N]oe man shall go two miles from the Towne unarmed, eyther with Gunn or Sword; and that none shall come to any public Meeting without his weapon."{EN-524}

> • [1643] "[E]very man do come armed unto the [general Town] meeting upon every sixth day."{EN-525}

b. As Rhode Island's legislators systematized the Watch and the Ward by statute, they determined that: (i) the duty should be enforced in both peace and war; (ii) any man of even the most modest physical capabilities who could perform the requisite functions should do so; (iii) a man's conscientious objection to the personal use of firearms should not preclude his service; (iv) women who were the heads of their households should be made financially responsible for providing suitable men to perform the duty; (v) members of Independent Companies should not be exempt; and (vi) even the utterly subservient status of Negroes within society should not disqualify them. Thus—

> • [1676] "[W]hosever in this Island [that is, Rhode Island] hath a negro man capable to watch the said negro, shall be lyable to that service, and capable negros to be as lyable to that service as Englishmen."{EN-526}

> • [1699, 1701, and 1705] "[A]ll persons within this Collony, above the age of sixteen, and under the age of sixty years, as well house keepers as others, shall be obliged to watch or ward, or find or procure a sufficient man to watch or ward, upon legall notice given to any of them[.]"{EN-527}

> • [1719 and 1744] "That the Town Council of each respective Town in this Colony, Be * * * Authorized and Impowered, to appoint, Settle and Order a Military Watch in Time of War * * * of such Number of Persons as they think proper"; and "[t]hat each respective Town Council * * * be * * * fully Impowered to appoint and Settle all Watches in Time of Peace".{EN-528}

> • [1730] Although this statute "exempted [conscientious objectors] from all Service, Fines and Forfeitures, accruing by any Law, for the Neglect of Training, bearing Arms, practicing the Art of War, or of attending on such Persons as do practice the same", it further provided "[t]hat this Act * * * shall not be deemed or constrained to exempt any Person from watching and warding in this Colony".{EN-529}

• [1740] "That all Persons making solemn Engagement * * * that it is against their Conscience to bear Arms at all, shall on an Alarm, appear * * * without Arms, to be employed as * * * Watches * * * or else * * * to watch against or extinguish any Fires that may be kindled at such Times, either by Design or Accident[.]"{EN-530}

• [1755] "[A]ll those * * * duly enlisted in this [Independent Artillery] Company * * * shall be exempted from bearing Arms, or doing military Duty (watching and warding excepted) in the several Companies or train'd Bands in whose District they respectively live[.]"{EN-531}

• [1766] This statute contained the same provisions as the statute of 1740.{EN-532}

• [1774] This statute contained the same provisions as the statute of 1755, albeit for a different Independent Company.{EN-533}

• [1776] "That a Watch, consisting of not more than Six Men, be kept in each of the Towns bordering upon the Sea * * * : That the Colonels of each respective Regiment be empowered and directed to place the said Watch[.]"{EN-534}

c. The only means by which men could obtain exemptions in practice from the Watch and the Ward were by providing suitable substitutes or paying fines. For instance—

• [1699, 1701, and 1705] "[A]ll persons within this Collony, above the age of sixteen, and under the age of sixty years, as well house keepers as others, shall be obliged to watch or ward, or find or procure a sufficient man to watch or ward, upon legall notice given to any of them * * * . And if any person shall refuse or neglect to watch * * * , he or they so neglecting or refusing, shall pay as a fine * * * five shillings * * * , to be taken and imprisoned in manner and form as the fines for neglecting of training or alarum are taken and proceeded in.

"And * * * all house keepers, as well widows as others, although there be no person in said family that is qualified according to law as to watching or warding, yet nevertheless, it shall be in the power and authority of the Captain, commander or head officer * * * , at their discretion, to order the said house keeper to find a suitable watcher or warder, or to pay such money as will hire or procure one; and upon neglect of refusall thereof, to be under the like fine and penalty[.]"{EN-535}

• [1744] "[W]hen it shall be thought necessary to set a double Watch in any Town in this Government, every Person that shall be legally notified to watch at such Times, and shall refuse or neglect to appear, * * * or send a good and sufficient Man in his Room, such Person for every such Offence, shall pay a Fine of Sixteen Shillings."{EN-536}

The statutory permission for employment of substitutes has been supposed by some to have weakened the Watch during *pre-*constitutional times, because the men most readily hired were also likely to be the least able to perform the duty.[537] Moreover, this practice—together with toleration of some men's avoidance of participation altogether upon their mere payment of money—has drawn the additional criticism that it enabled the wealthy to shirk their responsibility for performing personal service. Actually, the wealthy—if they chose to pay fines rather than appear in person—may have borne more than their proportionate share of the costs, because their fines were employed to provide necessary equipment and facilities for the Watch and the Ward. For example, at the turn of the Eighteenth Century, the General Assembly mandated that > all fines and forfeitures that shall arise upon persons neglecting in training and watching, shall be disposed of by the commissioned officers of each respective company, to provide drums, colors, ammunition, &c. And the fines that shall be from the warders, to be disposed of * * * for repairing of ward houses or other conveniences for his Majesty's service.{EN-537}

Had fines from defaulters with the ability to pay not subsidized these things, the expense would have been spread by taxation across the rest of the population, including those men who had faithfully performed their duties in person.

3. In the Watch and the Ward, Rhode Island's Militia carried out, not only "military", but also "police" functions. For example, in 1751 the General Assembly enacted

> [t]hat no Indian, Mulatto, or Negro Servant or Slave, may presume to be absent from the Family whereto he or she shall respectively belong, or be found abroad in the Night-time after Nine of the Clock, unless it be upon some Errand for his or her respective Master, or Mistress, or Owner.
>
> And * * * all Justices of the Peace, Constables, Watchmen, and others, * * * being House-holders, are hereby respectively impowered to take up and apprehend * * * any Indian, Mulatto, or Negro Servant or Slave, that shall be found abroad after Nine of the Clock at Night, and shall not give a good and satisfactory Account of his or her Business, and forthwith convey him, her, or them before the next Justice of the Peace * * * , or commit him, her, or them to the common Prison until Morning[.]{EN-538}

By extending to all "Watchmen, and others * * * being House-holders", this delegated authority to "police" all "Indian, Mulatto, or Negro Servant[s] or Slave[s]"

---

[537] See C. Morris & B. Vila, The Role of Police in American Society, ante note 534, at 4.

necessarily empowered a large proportion of the Militia to perform that function—including "Justices of the Peace" and "Constables" who, as public officials, would otherwise have been exempt from performing routine Militia duties.[538] It is difficult to imagine on what basis, other than its undoubted authority to impress everyone into some sort of Militia service, the General Assembly believed that it could command all "House-holders" to perform this possibly dangerous duty at all, let alone without any compensation. Powers of this sort were exercised even more extensively and in a more systematic fashion in the Slave States, where the Militia statutes deployed so-called "slave patrols" to the plantations and other places where slaves congregated, so as to keep the bondsmen in order and to deter or suppress criminal activities, escapes, plots, and rebellions.[539]

[538] On the last point, see post, at 252-253.

[539] See post, at 338-343, 392-395, and 718-723 (Virginia).

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Rhode Island granted various exemptions from service in her pre-constitutional Militia, based upon principles of social utility.

Rhode Island's pre-constitutional Militia organized all free males from sixteen to sixty years of age. To some of them the statutes granted various exemptions from service. In its best statement of the reasons for and substance of the basic exemptions available, in 1779 Rhode Island's General Assembly declared that, > whereas, by the Experience of all Ages, it has been found expedient, for the better Support of Subordination and military Discipline, to form separate and distinct Corps, which shall take in the different Degrees and Orders of effective Men, so far as respect their Offices and Stations in Life; and whereas this Assembly, influenced by this Principle of general Utility, have ever exempted certain Persons from serving promiscuously in the Militia Battalions; nevertheless, as the Public, in Cases of Necessity, had and have a Right to claim their personal Services, that the same beneficial Purposes may still be effected, It is Enacted, That all Persons under the following Description be exempted from serving in the Infantry Battalions, and Companies of Artillery, viz. all Persons who have served in the Place of General Officers, Justices of the Peace, or other commissioned Officers, the Ministers or Teachers of each Church or Congregation in this State, all sworn Practitioners in the Law, Physicians, Surgeons, Apothecaries, all Persons appointed to work the Fire-Engines, one Miller to each Grist-Mill, one Ferryman to each stated Ferry, all those who have lost a right Eye, or are disabled by Lameness, all Town-Councilmen, Treasurers, Clerks and Serjeants, while serving in their respective Stations.

>
> And be it further Enacted, That all Persons between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty Years, exempted as aforesaid from serving in the Infantry Battalions, be formed into separate Corps, to be known and called by the Name of the Senior Class, * * * who shall at all Times be armed, accoutred and provided, * * * and subjected to the same Regulations as the Battalions aforesaid.
>
> * * * * *
>
> Provided always, That this Act shall not extend * * * to any Persons who are excused from bearing Arms, by having taken the > Affirmation [of conscientious objection], or produced the Certificates from the Meeting of Friends, as by Law required; neither shall the same have influence upon or prejudice any Charters already granted to Independent Companies.{EN-539}

Thus, any and every exemption from Militia service depended upon a "Principle of general Utility", not an inherent individual right—and therefore was a matter of legislative discretion to grant or withhold. Moreover, because "the Public, in Cases of Necessity," at all times retained a "Right to claim [every man's] personal Services"—and therefore every man had a continuing duty to provide those "Services" if and when needed—even those to whom some exemption might be granted were nonetheless required to serve, or were at least always subject to service, in some capacity.

Exemption from any Militia duty usually required prior governmental approval, and in any other event demanded a showing of good cause on the part of the individual claiming it. As a statute from 1677 declared, "noe person or persons within this Collony from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares, shall be released from traininge or other duties in millitary affaires, exceptinge only the civill officers in this Collony, or such whose employments render them excusable by law, unless he or they doe render or give * * * a good and full satisfactory reason for their neglect".{EN-540} The basic exemptions were gender, age, physical disability, engagement in a critical public office or private occupation, conscientious objection, provision of a substitute, and payment of fines. Interestingly, conviction for some ordinary crime for which the perpetrator had completed his sentence and returned to society was never mentioned as a basis for exemption, exclusion, or other disqualification from service in Rhode Island's Militia—and, as a consequence, from personal possession of the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements required for such service, either.

A. Gender. Rhode Island implicitly exempted women from all active duties in her Militia in those provisions of her statutes that referred explicitly to "all Male Persons" (1719 through 1780),{EN-541} "all effective Males" (1779),{EN-542} "effective Men" or "effective Man" (1757 through 1780),{EN-543} or simply "men" (1643 through 1780){EN-544}—but never to "women", or generically to "persons" in a manner that could be taken to include women. For example, from 1699 into the early 1700s, Rhode Island's Militia statute did simply state that > if any person or persons listed under the command of any Captain * * * of the militia, shall or do not appear complete in arms * * * upon the * * * training Days * * * as when their respective Captain * * * shall call them together, either by alarum or any other time or times * * * during times of war. And if any persons listed * * * shall neglect their respective > duties and due obedience * * * [they] shall forfeit [certain sums of money.][EN-545]

Nonetheless, everyone doubtlessly understood without being told that, in practice, the "person or persons listed" to whom the statute referred without differentiation of gender were and could be men alone, because from the Colony's very earliest days only "Men" were "allowed and assigned to beare armes" and to "make their personall appearance completely armed with Muskett and all its furniture".[EN-546] Yet even this statute made the limitation of service to men clear enough in its further directives

> [t]hat all persons within this Collony, above the age of sixteen, and under the age of sixty years, as well house keepers as others, shall be obliged to watch or ward, or find or procure a sufficient man to watch or ward, upon legall notice given * * * .
>
> * * * That all house keepers, as well widows as others, although there be no person in said family that is qualified according to law as to watching and warding, yet nevertheless, it shall be in the power and authority of the Captain * * * to order the said house keeper to find a sufficient watcher or warder, or to pay so much money as will hire or procure one[.][EN-547]

Only "a sufficient man" qualified as a watcher or warder—a distinction that this statute needed to make explicit, because, in contradistinction to those "persons listed" in the Militia, who everyone knew had always been exclusively male, and even to the class of "householders" that earlier law had described as "men that find themselves armes and traine in their owne persones",[EN-548] this statute obviously included females within the class of all "house keepers as well widows as others" who were ordered to find or hire someone to watch or ward. The explicit requirement of "a sufficient man" precluded "widows" or other female "house keepers" from satisfying their obligations as to the Watch and the Ward by attempting to serve in those capacities themselves, or by finding other women desirous of doing so. Interestingly, too, "the warders [were] to be such persons as are not in the Captain's list" (that is, were not formally enrolled members of the Militia), whereas "the said persons appointed to watch do at all times and upon all occasions observe and follow such order and instructions as they shall * * * receive from their respective head officer" (and therefore were members of the Militia).[EN-549] Thus, a further differentiation between the two duties was made even among otherwise "sufficient m[e]n". Presumably, this was because the Ward, conducted during the day, could have been satisfactorily performed in many if not most instances by some physically infirm or superannuated men who might not have qualified for most service, or even "list[ing]", in the Militia; whereas the Watch, conducted at night, demanded the deployment of able-bodied and trained men, in light of the greater likelihood of criminal activity, slave revolts, and sneak attacks by hostile Indians or enemy forces at that time.

The general exemption of women from service in the Militia reflected neither a physical impossibility for women as a class to perform at least some of those functions, nor a lack of legal power in the General Assembly to require them to do so—for the Assembly could have mitigated or removed any and all of women's then long-standing legal disabilities, just as every State legislature gradually did after ratification of the Constitution. Rather, it was simply a matter of policy, based primarily upon considerations of feminine physiology and psychology, together with then-prevailing religious, social, and cultural mores. Nowhere did the General Assembly ever suggest that, by explicitly limiting actual service in the Militia to able-bodied adult free males, it was conceding that in extremis or at any other time it could not call upon all "persons" whatsoever, without distinction, whether free or slave, male or female, for whatever type, degree, and duration of service it considered necessary.

Moreover, all women were not exempted from all Militia duties. Rather, as just explained, female "house keepers" such as widows or spinsters were required to procure suitable male substitutes to serve in the Watch and the Ward. And independent women, such as widows, were obliged to provide firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements for those of their minor sons, other young male dependents, and servants who were enrolled in the Militia, and to ensure that the latter performed their other Militia duties, by being made personally liable in fines for any defaults by their male charges in those particulars:

> • [1665] "[F]or every defecte in not duely attending the trainings, each one listed, soe deficient, shall for every dayes defect, pay three shillings fine, to be levied by distraint on the partyes goods, or on the goods of the master or mistress, or parents of such sones or sarvents as are defective[.]"{EN-550}
>
> • [1677] "[I]f any person or persons to be" fined "be a son or servant, that have noe visible estate of their owne, * * * then the * * * fines and forfeitures shall be levied and distrained upon the estate of their respective masters, parents or other persons under whose service, command or tuition they are."{EN-551}
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Enlisted Person, that shall Refuse or Neglect to make his Personal appearance Accoutred as [required] * * * on * * * Training Days * * * shall for every such Default pay * * * Three Shillings in Mony * * * & if such defaulter shall Refuse so to do, * * * the Captain * * * shall Grant forth his Warrant * * * to take and distrain so much of the Personal Estate of such delinquent Person, or

such as have them in Tuition,[540] as near as conveniently may be will pay his Fine or Fines * * * ; and such Estate that shall be taken by distress, shall be duly Apprized by Two Free-Holders * * * , and the Captain is * * * Impowered to Administer the same, and the overplus if any there be, to be returned to the owner thereof, and if he shall refuse to receive the same, then the Clerk shall give him Credit * * * which shall be accounted for out of his next Fine that shall become due[.]"{EN-552}

• [1756] "[W]hen any Person under the Age of twenty-one Years, shall neglect or refuse to pay his Fine for Neglect of military Duty, the Clerk shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parents or Masters of such Persons[.]"{EN-553}

• [1766] "[I]n Case such Delinquent be under the Age of Twenty-one Years, the Clerk shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parents or Masters of such Delinquent Persons[.]" {EN-554}

• [1781] "[T]he Sergeant * * * shall take and distrain sufficient of the personal Estate of the Delinquent, if to be found, to satisfy and pay his Fine or Fines, having first required him to pay the same * * * : [and t]hat in case such Delinquent be under the Age of Twenty-one Years, the Sergeant shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parent or Master of such delinquent Person[.]"{EN-555}

B. Age. Although Rhode Island's Militia statutes never explicitly set out an individual's age as an exemption, they treated age as such implicitly. Because "the Public, in Cases of Necessity, had and have a Right to claim the[ ] personal Services" of all "the different Degrees and Orders of effective Men",{EN-556} the General Assembly could simply have imposed Militia duties on everyone who could physically have performed them, irrespective of age. (Obviously, the impossibility of any performance because of an individual's physical disability would have had to, and did, constitute an absolute excuse and even exclusion.[541]) Therefore, that some men were called but others were not, simply because of their different ages, constituted liability for or exemption from Militia service on that ground.

Rhode Island's statutes generally provided that: (i) able-bodied free males less than sixteen or more than sixty years of age were exempt from all compulsory service in the Militia; (ii) those between sixteen and fifty were liable for regular duty in "the Trained Bands"; (iii) those between fifty and sixty were required to be fully armed, and could be called forth in times of "alarm" as "the Alarm List"; and (iv) those between sixteen and fifty, who might be otherwise exempt, were required to

---

[540] Compare the use of the term "tuition" in 1718 and thereafter with its use in 1677, in light of the term's meaning of "[g]uardianship; superintendent care", particularly "over a young person". S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions; N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 1; Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, definition 1.

[541] See post, at 249-252.

be fully armed, and could be called forth in times of "alarm" as "the Senior Class". For example—

> • [1638] "[T]her shall be a generall day of Trayning for the Exercise of those who are able to beare armes in the arte of military discipline, and all that are of sixteen yeares of age, and upwards to fifty, shall be warned thereunto[.]"{EN-557}
>
> • [1699, 1701, and 1705] "[A]ny person or persons listed under the command of any Captain * * * of the Militia, shall * * * appear complete in arms, viz.: with a good or sufficient muskett or fuse, and sword or bagganett, cotouch box or bandelears, with twelve bullets, fit for his piece, half a pound of powder, six good flints upon the * * * training days * * * , as when their respective Captain * * * shall call them together, either by alarum or any other time or times * * * during times of war."{EN-558}
>
> This statute did not explicitly designate a range of ages for "persons listed" in the Militia. But it did mandate "[t]hat all persons within this Collony, above the age of sixteen, and under the age of sixty years * * * shall be obliged to watch or ward", and that the "persons appointed to watch do at all times and upon all occasions observe and follow such order and instructions as they shall from time to time receive from the respective head officer [of the Militia]".{EN-559} Inasmuch as those required to watch apparently had to be members of the Militia (they being subject to Militia officers' "order and instructions"), and inasmuch as watchers could range in age from sixteen to sixty, that range must have applied to Militiamen, too.
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll Male Persons Residing for the space of three Months within this Colony from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years, shall bear Arms in their Respective Train-bands or Companies whereto by Law they shall belong[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> "AND * * * upon any Alarm in time of War, or other eminent danger of any Assault or Invasion, all Male Persons, both Listed Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Age of Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall upon notice of the same, forthwith Repair to the Colours and Ensigns of such Company, within whose Precincts they Inhabit or dwell, provided with Arms & Ammunition required of Trained Soldiers upon Training Days[.]"{EN-560}
>
> • [1766] "[A]ll male Persons, who have resided for the Space of Three Months in this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen to Fifty, shall bear Arms in the respective trained Bands whereto by Law they shall belong * * * .
>
> * * * * *

"AND * * * all such Persons as are * * * excused from training, shall, notwithstanding, be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train. * * *

"AND * * * upon any Alarm in Time of War or other imminent Danger of any Assault or Invasion, all male Persons, both enlisted Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Ages of Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall upon Notice of the same forthwith repair to the Colours and Ensigns of such Company, within whose Precincts they inhabit or dwell, provided with Arms and Ammunition required of trained Soldiers upon training Days[.]"{EN-561}

• [1779] "[A]ll effective Males between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty, except such as are * * * excepted, shall constitute and make the military Force of this State; and that the same be divided into Companies, Battalions and Brigades[.]

* * * * *

"And * * * each and every effective Man * * * shall provide, and at all times be furnished, at his own Expence (excepting such Persons as the Town Councils of the Towns in which they respectively dwell or reside shall adjudge unable to purchase the same) with one good Musquet, and a Bayonet fitted thereto, * * * one Ram-rod, Worm, Priming-wire and Brush, and one Cartouch-Box.

* * * * *

"And * * * all Persons between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty Years, exempted * * * from serving in the Infantry Battalions, be formed into separate Corps * * * by the Name of the Senior Class, * * * who shall at all Times be armed, accoutred and provided, in Manner aforesaid, and subjected to the same Regulations as the Battalions aforesaid.

* * * * *

" * * * [A]ll Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the respective Town-Councils, shall be at all Times armed, accoutred and equipped, in Manner aforesaid * * * : And that they be * * * the Alarm-List of the State, and be subject to all other Duties as those exempted from bearing Arms."{EN-562}

Rhode Island based these different categories of service upon empirical observations of and practical judgments concerning the typical physical and psychological maturities, physical abilities, and continuing mental acuity among different groups of males in that era. Yet these categories were as inclusive as was then thought possible, in deference to the precept that "the Public, in Cases of Necessity, had and have a Right to claim the[ ] personal Services" of all "effective Men".

In addition, as with women, although exempted from actual service men over sixty years of age could be required to provide suitable substitutes for the Watch and the Ward, and to pay the fines their minor sons, male servants and apprentices, and other young male dependents incurred as a result of defaults in their own Militia duties.[542] Being limited to financial obligations, these services were only indirect—but they were services in the Militia nonetheless.

Moreover, the implicit exemption from compulsory service for Rhode Islanders above sixty years of age never precluded their voluntary service in whatever capacities they might have proven useful. After all, the vast majority (if not all) of the men over sixty who were still physically fit had served at one time or another in the Trained Bands, the Senior Class, or the Alarm List—and as a result had acquired possession of, and likely exercised extensively with, firearms. So, unless they had become disabled or had disposed of their arms after reaching sixty, they remained trained, equipped, and ready for some further service. And no statute in Rhode Island or anywhere else throughout America ever prohibited such men from volunteering for duty. For famous examples (albeit in a neighboring Colony), one of the first American casualties in the War of Independence, Jonas Parker, killed at Lexington, Massachusetts, on 19 April 1775, was in his sixties.[543] In Menotomy, "about a dozen of the elderly men * * * , exempts mostly," including a minister, ambushed and captured Lord Percy's baggage train as it passed through their Town on its way to Lexington.[544] In Arlington, "[o]ne of the most unequal duels of any war was fought * * * between the venerable Samuel Whittemore, aged eighty years, and a number of British soldiers, acting as a flanking party". Whittemore, who "[i]n his younger days * * * had been an officer in the militia", killed three British soldiers before being shot down, clubbed, and bayonetted. (Almost miraculously, he survived and lived eighteen more years.)[545] And in Somerville, > James Miller, about sixty-six years old, stood * * * awaiting the British. With him was a companion, and both fired with deadly effect, again and again, as the British marched by * * * . They were discovered finally, and Miller's companion urged him to retreat.

>
> "Come, Miller, we've got to go."
>
> "I'm too old to run," replied Miller, and he remained, only to be pierced with a volley of thirteen bullets.[546]

"[T]oo old to run", but not too old to fight.

---

[542] See ante, at 155-157 and 244-245.

[543] See, e.g., John R. Galvin, The Minute Men, The First Fight: Myths and Realities of the American Revolution (Washington, D.C.: Brassey's, 1989), at 194-195, 220-221; R. Gross, The Minutemen, ante note 379, at 117-118; R. Ketchum, Decisive Day, ante note 310, at 53.

[544] F. Coburn, The Battle of April 19, 1775, ante note 383, at 118-120.

[545] Id. at 141-142.

[546] Id. at 151-152 (footnote omitted).

Today, any exemptions for elderly individuals in revitalized Militia would be less far-reaching and more flexible than they were in *pre-*constitutional times. For many duties in these days would require education, experience, and enthusiasm far more than raw physical strength and stamina.

C. Disability. Because the Militia naturally required "effective Men", a significant physical or mental disability would always exempt an individual, on the ground that his performance of the required duty was simply not possible, either at that time alone (as the consequence of some temporary sickness) or at all (as the consequence of some irremediable condition). Lower and upper limits on the ages of Militiamen, of course, implicitly addressed that problem in terms of generalities: namely, (i) that those males less than sixteen years of age were typically small, weak, and psychologically immature, and thus in most cases the proper subjects (not the providers) of protection; and (ii) those males more than sixty years of age were often weak, with poor eyesight or hearing, sickly, and prone to mental deterioration, and thus also proper subjects for protection. Within those limits, Rhode Island's statutes further allowed for exemptions in individual cases of proven disability:

> • [1673] Those men "who cannot in conscience traine, fight, nor kill any person * * * shall be exempt from traynings, arminge, rallyinge to fight, to kill, and all such martiall service as men are by any other debility; as said lame, sick, weake, deafe, blinde, or any other infirmity exempteth persons in and by law[.]"{EN-563}
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "Excepting * * * all those that have lost one of their Eyes, or disabled by Lameness".{EN-564}
>
> • [1766] "[E]xcept * * * all those who have lost an Eye, or are disabled by Lameness".{EN-565}
>
> • [1777] "[I]n case of sickness and inability to do duty (which alone shall excuse any person), it shall be in the power * * * of the field officers * * * to permit such a person to hire a man to do his tour of duty; and if such sick and unable person shall be so extremely poor * * * as to be unable to hire a person in his stead, * * * such field officer [shall] be empowered to remit such poor person's fine."{EN-566}
>
> • [1778] "Whereas * * * the colonels of the respective [Militia] regiments in this state, have returned * * * many persons, as delinquents in the late expedition * * * , who were sick or incapable of doing personal service in camp * * * ; wherefore—
>
> " * * * the several field officers * * * do make return * * * of the names of all persons whom they have returned as delinquents, who at the time of the draught, and during the time of their tour of duty, were sick, or otherwise incapable of doing personal service in camp, * * * that they may be excused from the penalties * * * made for the punishing of said

> delinquents; the said officers taking great care and precaution that no one be excused, but those who are really deserving thereof[.]"{EN-567}
>
> • [1779] The "Persons" to "be exempted" included "all those who have lost a right Eye, or are disabled by Lameness".{EN-568}

The three basic categories of physical inability which warranted exemption throughout this era included some degree of blindness (total or partial), sickness (permanent or temporary), and lameness. "Lameness" doubtlessly included a very wide variety of debilitating conditions, because the noun meant, not simply "[t]he status of a cripple; loss or inability of limbs",[547] but also "[a]n impaired state of the body or limbs; loss of natural soundness and strength by wound or by disease; particularly applied to the limbs, and implying a total or partial disability".[548] So a man suffering from "lameness" might be chronically weak ("loss of natural soundness and strength") from any number of causes; constantly ill (as the result of a "wound or * * * disease"); or afflicted with one or more limbs incapable of full, or even any, function ("a total or partial disability"). In such a state, it would have been extraordinarily difficult, if not impossible, for such an individual to have fulfilled the normal Militia duties of training and service in the field. So such an individual's exemption would have been dictated by circumstances and common sense.

Yet even exemptions of this sort, which arose from conditions presumably beyond the control of the individuals involved, were neither automatic—for they required general legislative approval in the first instance; nor without fine discriminations based on the needs of the times—as the careful distinction in the statutes of 1718 through 1766, on the one hand, and 1779, on the other hand, between "those who have lost an Eye" and "those who have lost a right Eye" evidences.[549]

Moreover, in individual cases an exemption on the ground of physical disability could be narrowly tailored. In 1713, when one John Gavet "petition[ed] the Assembly to be released and acquitted from martial discipline, by reason of an incurable lameness in one of his feet", it "enacted * * * that * * * Gavet shall be * [547] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1 both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

---

[548] N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 1.

[549] An individual who had lost his left eye could still have sighted and fired a typical flintlock musket or rifle effectively, because he could have mounted the firearm on his right shoulder, could have viewed the target down the barrel with his right eye, and when the gun discharged would have avoided the flash from the pan as the sparks or flame vented away from his head towards the right. A man who had lost his right eye, conversely, could still have mounted the firearm on his right shoulder, but then would have had to crane his neck severely in order to have been able to sight down the barrel; and if he had mounted the firearm on his left shoulder, the flash from the pan would have vented directly in front of and across his face. A flintlock long gun made for a left-handed shooter, with the pan on the left side of the action so as to vent in that direction, would have been an extremely rare piece.

* * acquitted and discharged for ever hereafter from all manner of martial discipline, alarms only excepted".{EN-569}

Actually, in principle Gavet's case was nowhere near unique (other than that he had sought a ruling on the matter from the General Assembly itself). For Rhode Island's Militia statutes exempted merely moderately disabled individuals only from normal participation in the Trained Bands, never from extraordinary, last-ditch Militia service on "the Alarm List":

> • [1718, 1730, 1744, and 1766] "[A]ll Male Persons * * * from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years, shall bear Arms in their respective Train-Bands or Companies, * * * Excepting * * * all those that have lost one of their Eyes, or disabled by Lameness"—but "all such Persons * * * excus'd from Training, yet shall notwithstanding be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train"; and "upon any Alarm in time of War, or other eminent danger of any Assault or Invasion, all Male Persons, both Listed Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Age of Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall upon notice * * * forthwith Repair to the Colours * * * , provided with Arms & Ammunition required of Trained Soldiers upon Training Days[.]"{EN-570}
>
> • [1779] "[A]ll effective Males between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty, except such as are * * * excepted, shall constitute and make up the military Force of this State", the "exempt[ion] from serving in the Infantry Battalions, and Companies of Artillery" extending to "all those who have lost a right Eye, or are disabled by Lameness"—but, "all Persons between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty Years, exempted * * * from serving in the Infantry Battalions, [shall] be formed into separate Corps, * * * by the Name of the Senior Class, * * * who shall at all Times be armed, accoutred and provided, * * * and subjected to the same Regulations as the Battalions aforesaid"; and "all Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the respective Town-Councils, shall be at all Times armed, accoutred and equipped * * * [a]nd that they be considered as the Alarm-List of the State, and be subject to all other Duties as those exempted from bearing Arms"; and "in Cases of general Alarm", no one subject to duty "shall neglect or refuse appearing at the Alarm-Post * * * , armed and accoutred".{EN-571}

Thus, even the lame and the halt from sixteen to sixty years of age were subject to some type of Militia service, with those from fifty to sixty years of age to be excused only "if [not] able in the judgment of the respective Town-Councils". Presumably, though, this was no special exemption, as no man of any age who was truly *dis*abled from serving in any useful way perforce of some physical or mental problem could have been required, in justice or common sense, to "Repair to the Colours". But absent an utterly debilitating condition that rendered a man's potential contribution nil, in principle no one could expect to escape some sort of Militia service simply because of a disability.

In addition, along with women and elderly men, those men of eligible ages who were exempted from actual personal service on the grounds of some serious disability could nonetheless be required to provide suitable substitutes for the Watch and the Ward, and to pay the fines their minor sons or wards, or their male servants or apprentices, incurred as a result of defaults in their own Militia duties.[550] Being limited to financial obligations, these men's duties were only indirect—but withal they were services in and for the Militia.

D. Public offices and private occupations. The only able-bodied men between sixteen and sixty years of age, without conscientious objections, whom Rhode Island generally exempted from service in her Trained Bands included certain public officials, private parties in necessary occupations, some former officeholders, and a few special cases.

1. Public offices. Throughout the pre-constitutional period, Rhode Island exempted various of her public officeholders from regular training in her Trained Bands:

> • [1665] Eligible men were to "find themselves armes and traine in their owne persones; which all men from sixteene years of age to sixtye yeares old are * * * required to doe, * * * excepting such as are in publicke office".{EN-572}
>
> • [1677] "[N]oe person or persons within this Collony from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares, shall be released from traininge or other duties in millitary affaires, exceptinge * * * the civill officers in this Collony[.]"{EN-573}
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll Male Persons Residing for the space of Three Months within this Colony from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years, shall bear Arms in their respective Train-bands or Companies whereto by Law they shall belong, Excepting * * * one Goaler to each of his majesties Goals in the Colony, * * * and all Persons that are under Oath or Engagement to any Office."{EN-574}
>
> • [1766] "[A]ll male Persons, who have resided for the Space of Three Months in this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen to Fifty, shall bear Arms in the respective trained Bands whereto by Law they shall belong, * * * excepting * * * one Gaoler to each Gaol, * * * and all other Persons who are under Oath or Engagement to any Office."{EN-575}
>
> • [1779] "[A]ll Persons under the following Description be exempted from serving in the Infantry Battalions, and Companies of

---

[550] See ante, at 155-157 and 244-245.

> Artillery, viz. all Persons who have served in the Place of General Officers, Justices of the Peace, or other commissioned Officers, * * * all Town-Councilmen, Treasurers, Clerks and Serjeants, while serving in their respective Stations."{EN-576}

Rather than special privileges of an élitist cast, these exemptions merely recognized that individuals in some public offices or employments performed public duties of a civilian nature that contributed to the maintenance of "homeland security" as much as or even more than their serving as citizen-soldiers in the Trained Bands could have accomplished, and that the full performance of the duties peculiar to them required the partial relaxation of other duties usually applicable to all.

Only a partial relaxation it was, too, always limited to its specific purpose. For example, one would presume that legislators, of all public officials, perform a duty of the very highest importance, interference with which, on the grounds of almost any other, non-legislative duties appertaining to them, should be as limited as possible. Yet in 1777 Rhode Island's General Assembly provided that > all Members of the General Assembly, who are drawn into the second or third Division of the Alarm-List of this State, be excused from doing Duty in said Divisions at any Time during a Session of this Assembly, and one Day before the Sitting thereof, and two Days after the Rising of the same.{EN-577}

That even Rhode Island's legislators crafted an exemption for themselves so narrowly circumscribed—extending essentially only to the periods of their actual service in their official capacities—emphasizes how chary and niggardly they were in providing exceptions to their "Right to claim [every man's] personal Services" in the community's defense, and how sensitive they were to maintaining an equality of burdens in Militia service throughout the community. (Interestingly, the appropriateness of such a limited immunity was not lost on WE THE PEOPLE thereafter. For the Constitution provides that "[t]he Senators and Representatives [in Congress] * * * shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same"[551]—and at no other times.)

In any event, in at least some cases these exemptions doubtlessly proved only theoretical, as men in important public offices were likely to have earned the community's confidence, and therefore to have been chosen to serve as high-ranking Militia officers when danger threatened.

---

[551] U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 1.

On the other hand, some of these exemptions were capable of abuse, and needed to be restrained. In 1736, for example, the General Assembly observed that it is common for Persons to take Offices in the Militia, and keep them for a short Time, and then refuse to accept the same, for no other Reason, but to be excused from Training thereafter"—and therefore "ENACTED * * * [t]hat no Persons in Commission in the Militia, shall be excused from training, for having had an office in the Militia, if they lay the same down, unless they have served Five Years, or are excused by the General Assembly".{EN-578}

2. Private occupations. Rhode Island considered a select set of private occupations sufficiently critical that she exempted the men practicing them, too, from service in her Trained Bands:

> • [1677] "[N]oe person or persons within this Collony from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares, shall be released from traininge or other duties in millitary affaires, exceptinge * * * such whose employments render them excusable by law[.]"{EN-579}
>
> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll Male Persons Residing for the space of Three Months within this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years, shall bear Arms in their Respective Train-bands or Companies * * * Excepting * * * one Minister or Teacher of each respective Congregation in each respective Town, all Sworn Practitioners in Chirurgery and Physick, all Apothecaries and School-masters, and also one Miller to each Grist Mill, [and] one Ferry-man to each stated Ferry[.]"{EN-580}
>
> • [1766] "[A]ll male Persons, who have resided for the Space of Three Months in this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen to Fifty, shall bear Arms in the respective trained Bands where by Law they shall belong, * * * excepting * * * the Ministers or Teachers of each Church or Congregation in the Colony, all sworn Practitioners in the Law, Physicians, Surgeons, Apothecaries, School-masters, all Persons appointed to work the Fire-Engines in this Colony, one Miller to each Grist-Mill, [and] One Ferryman to each stated Ferry[.]"{EN-581}
>
> • [1778] "[T]he council of war * * * are * * * empowered to excuse from personal duty in the militia, such persons as may from time to time be employed within this state, in manufacturing military stores and other articles for the use of the United States, agreeably to * * * a resolution of Congress[.]"{EN-582}
>
> • [1779] "[A]ll Persons under the following Description be exempted from serving in the Infantry Battalions, and Companies of Artillery, viz. * * * the Ministers or Teachers of each Church or Congregation in this State, all sworn Practitioners in the Law, Physicians, Surgeons, Apothecaries, all Persons appointed to work the Fire-Engines, > one Miller to each Grist-Mill, [and] one Ferryman to each stated Ferry[.]"{EN-583}

Significant is how all of the exemptions extended to individuals in private occupations involved critical matters of what today would be included in "homeland security": namely,

> (i) maintenance of due process of law ("sworn Practitioners in the Law");
>
> (ii) public health ("Physicians, Surgeons, [and] Apothecaries");
>
> (iii) emergency services ("all Persons appointed to work the Fire-Engines");
>
> (iv) Local economic security, specifically with respect to the provision of food ("one Miller to each Grist-Mill", which was an absolutely necessary occupation in a largely agricultural community);
>
> (v) an efficient transportation-network ("One Ferryman to each stated Ferry", which was an highly regulated occupation{EN-584}); and even
>
> (vi) the community's spiritual well-being and general education ("the Ministers or Teachers in each Church or Congregation", many of whom were schoolmasters as well).

Indeed, the logical inference is that, although "exemptions" in form, they really amounted in substance to implicit assignments of particular duties in the Militia, which the exempted individuals fulfilled by performing those ostensibly private, but ultimately public, services. That is, one form of Militia service was substituted for another: An individual otherwise eligible for listing in the Trained Band fulfilled his Militia duty by (for example) practicing medicine or operating a ferry every working day of his life; and to enable him to do so he was granted an exemption from having to muster with the Band the four, six, or eight times a year that the statutes mandated for everyone else.

These exemptions must be taken with a practical grain of salt, however. For example, although "Physicians, Surgeons, [and] Apothecaries" were not required to "bear Arms in the * * * Train Bands", when the Militia served in the field they doubtlessly were expected to provide their medical and pharmacological services to the soldiers. Indeed, in some instances their services were mandated by law, as in the Militia Act of 1779, which stipulated "[t]hat besides the Officers and Non-commissioned Officers * * * to each Battalion there be appointed * * * one Surgeon, and one Surgeon's-Mate".{EN-585} And, even if they were never expected to bear arms in the normal course of performing their functions, ferrymen were vital to the Militia's ability to move men, equipment, and supplies through the countryside, especially during periods of "alarm". Therefore, someone would have been detailed exclusively to that duty in any event. On the other hand, even a legal exemption from service for men in such professions and trades did not amount to an absolute exclusion of them from voluntary Militia service anywhere in New England. At Concord, Massachusetts, on 19 April 1775, for instance, "the first on the ground was the minister, gun in hand"; other Ministers mustered in other Companies; the Captain of one Militia Company was a doctor; and a schoolmaster "locked the [schoolhouse's] door and went quietly away to join his company".[552] One surgeon's mate even carried a New England fowler from the siege of Boston throughout the War of Independence.[553]

3. Past services. Past services in the Militia or in some public offices also warranted exemption from participation in Rhode Island's Trained Bands:

> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll Male Persons Residing for the space of three Months within this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years, shall bear Arms in their Respective Train bands or Companies * * * Excepting * * * all Persons that shall have Served in the place of General Officers, Justices of the Peace or other Commission Officers[.]"{EN-586}
>
> • [1766] "[A]ll male Persons, who have resided for the Space of Three Months in this Colony, from the Age of Sixteen to Fifty, shall bear Arms in the respective trained Bands whereto by Law they shall belong, * * * excepting * * * all Persons who have served in the Place of General Officers, Justices of the Peace, or other Commissioned Officers * * * .
>
> "PROVIDED always, That no Person shall be excused from training for having had a Commission-Office in the Militia, unless he shall have served Five Years therein, or have been dismissed therefrom by the General Assembly."{EN-587}
>
> • [1779] "[A]ll Persons under the following Description be exempted from serving in the Infantry Battalions, and Companies of Artillery, viz. all Persons who have served in the Place of General Officers, Justices of the Peace, or other commissioned Officers[.]"{EN-588}

4. Required enlistment in "the Senior Class". Although not required to be listed in the Trained Bands, men less than fifty years of age who were exempted on the grounds of their public offices or private occupations were required to enlist in "the Senior Class". The Senior Class was fully organized in Companies of Infantry—and even Troops of Horse "at the[men's] own Election, * * * due Regard being had to their Abilities and local Situation"; its Companies in various Towns were to "be officered in the same Manner as the Infantry Companies, with such Field and Staff Officers as their Numbers * * * entitle[d] them to"; and its members were "at all Times [to] be armed, accoutred and provided, * * * and subjected to the same Regulations" as the Trained Bands.{EN-589} So the exemptions these men enjoyed from regular service in the Trained Bands were rather limited in scope.

---

[552] A. French, The Day of Concord and Lexington, ante note 469, at 150, 218, 228.

[553] B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 114-115.

5. No exemption from "the Alarm List". As with individuals suffering from disabilities, Rhode Island's Militia statutes exempted those who held important public offices or provided critical private services only from routine participation in the Trained Bands, never from active service on "the Alarm List":

> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] Although "Except[ed]" from the requirement that "[a]ll Male Persons Residing for the space of Three Months within this Colony from the Age of Sixteen, to the Age of Fifty Years, shall bear Arms in their Respective Train-bands or Companies whereto by Law they shall belong", nevertheless "all * * * Persons * * * excus'd from Training" were to "be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train, & * * * once every year, or oftner, * * * there shall be * * * a Survey and Examination made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is Required"; and "upon any Alarm in time of War, or other eminent danger of any Assault or Invasion, all Male Persons, both Listed Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Age of Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall * * * forthwith repair to the Colours * * * provided with Arms & Ammunition required of Trained Soldiers upon Training Days[.]"{EN-590}
>
> • [1766] Again, although "except[ed]" from the requirement that "[a]ll male Persons who have resided for the Space of Three Months in this Colony from the Age of Sixteen to Fifty, shall bear Arms in the respective trained Bands whereto by Law they shall belong", nevertheless "all * * * Persons * * * excused from training" were to "be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train * * * [a]nd Twice in every Year * * * there shall be * * * an Examination and Survey made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is required"; and "upon any Alarm in time of War or other imminent Danger of any Assault or Invasion, all male Persons, both enlisted Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Ages of Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall * * * forthwith repair to the Colours * * * provided with Arms and Ammunition required of trained Soldiers upon training Days[.]"{EN-591}
>
> • [1779] Again, the basic rule was still that "all effective Males between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty, except such as are * * * excepted, shall constitute and make up the military Force of this State". And "exempt[ion] from serving in the Infantry Battalions, and Companies of Artillery" extended to individuals in various public offices and private occupations. Yet, in derogation of this allowance, "all Persons between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty Years, exempted * * * from serving in the Infantry Battalions, [were to] be formed into separate Corps, to be known * * * by the Name of the Senior Class, * * * who shall at all Times be > armed, accoutred and provided, * * * and subjected to the same Regulations as th[os]e Battalions". Moreover, "all Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the respective Town-Councils, shall be at all Times armed, accoutred and equipped * * * [a]nd * * * be considered as the Alarm-List of the State, * * * subject to all other Duties as those exempted from bearing Arms". And "in Cases of general Alarm", no one subject to duty "shall neglect or refuse appearing at the Alarm-Post, * * * armed and accoutred".{EN-592}

Thus, even public officials and individuals in critical occupations from sixteen to sixty years of age were not suffered to avoid every type of Militia service—but instead were compelled to serve in the most dangerous of them all, "upon any Alarm in time of War, or other eminent danger of any Assault or Invasion"—with even those from fifty to sixty years of age to be excused only "if [not physically] able in the judgment of the respective Town-Councils", but not because of the arguable importance to the community of their normal work in normal times.

E. Exceptional cases. In addition to these regular categories, Rhode Island's statutes allowed for special exemptions in special circumstances. For example—

> • [1755] "[T]he Committee of War * * * is impowered to borrow or purchase on the best Terms they can, all the Arms that shall be necessary; and * * * any Person who shall lend or sell to the Colony, a good small Arm, shall be exempted from all Military Duty, for and during the Term of one Year[.]"{EN-593}
>
> • [1777] "That it be * * * recommended to the Independent Company of Kingston Reds, that they excuse George Tesst and Jeremiah Sheffield (who are employed in making and stocking Guns) from doing any Service in said Company[.]"{EN-594}
>
> • [1777] "[I]f any two men in this state, whether belonging to the militia, alarm list, or independent companies, * * * shall * * * enlist and deliver to any commissioned officer of either of the two Continental battalions, raising as the quota of this state, an able-bodied, effective man, to serve in the same, for three years, or during the war, and who shall pass muster, they shall be exempted from being drafted for, or doing, duty in any of the Continental battalions, for, and during the term for which such able-bodied man shall enlist[.]"{EN-595}
>
> • [1778] "Whereas * * * the colonels of the respective [Militia] regiments in this state, have returned * * * many persons, as delinquents in the late expedition * * * , who * * * were absent from this state before the militia were at first called out; * * * wherefore—
>
> " * * * the several field officers * * * do make return * * * of the names of all persons whom they have returned as delinquents, who * * * before the first draught of the inhabitants, were absent from this state, and had not any knowledge of the intended expedition, that they may be > excused from the penalties * * * made for the punishing of said delinquents; the said officers taking great care and precaution that no one be excused, but those who are really deserving thereof[.]"{EN-596}

Exemptions of these kinds emphasized the General Assembly's power to apply the "Principle of general Utility" even in the cases of specific individuals, specific situations, or specific tasks. Yet such ad hoc privileges were not granted for arbitrary reasons (such as out of naked political favoritism), or even for legitimate reasons unrelated to the purposes of the Militia. Rather, they plainly conduced to satisfying some of Rhode Island's specific needs in those particulars: namely, through the provision of firearms, the manufacture of firearms, and the recruitment of soldiers.

F. Those exempted nonetheless to be armed and to serve in emergencies. Because "the Public, in Cases of Necessity," always asserted a "Right to claim [every man's] personal Services", exemptions from Militia service were never complete (except where physical disability was involved). Rather, every able-bodied free male from sixteen to sixty years of age, even though he might be exempted from participation in the Trained Bands on various grounds, was required always to be ready to serve, and to come forth for service in the field during emergencies.

1. A fundamental principle of the pre-constitutional Militia being the universality and completeness of suitable armament among all eligible individuals, essentially no one, other than conscientious objectors,[554] enjoyed exemption from the requirement that he possess suitable firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements in readiness for use at all times. For example—

> • [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[A]ll * * * Persons * * * excus'd from Training, yet shall notwithstanding be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train, & that once every year, or oftner, * * * there shall be * * * a Survey and Examination made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is Required[.]"{EN-597}
>
> • [1766] "[A]ll such Persons as are * * * excused from training, shall, notwithstanding, be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train. And * * * Twice in every Year * * * there shall be an Examination and Survey made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is required[.]"{EN-598}
>
> • [1774] "[T]he Fines of all those who, being exempted from appearing on the Days of Training, are notwithstanding, obliged to be provided with Arms and other Accoutrements, shall be the same for every deficiency, as the Fines of the inlisted Soldiers: And * * * the examination > and survey [of Arms] * * * shall be made * * * on the first Monday in February, and on the last Monday in April."{EN-599}

---

[554] To be treated separately. See post, at 266-272.

>
> • [1775] "That a proclamation be immediately issued * * * , commanding every man in the colony, able to bear arms, to equip himself completely with arms and ammunition, according to law."{EN-600}
>
> • [1776] "[A]ll such Persons as are by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box, and who shall not by the Report of * * * [the] Town-Council be declared incapable of providing themselves * * * do provide themselves * * * , agreeable to Law[.]"{EN-601}
>
> • [1778] "[A]ll Persons * * * by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box, and who shall not, by Report of the Town-Council of the Town to which they belong, be * * * incapable of providing themselves * * * , do provide themselves therewith * * * , or with a Rifle-Gun and Sword * * * . Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend to any Person who shall produce a Certificate * * * that his Gun has been taken from him for public Service, and not accounted for[.]"{EN-602}
>
> • [1779] "[A]ll Persons between the Ages of Sixteen and Fifty Years, exempted * * * from serving in the Infantry Battalions, be formed into separate Corps, to be known * * * by the Name of the Senior Class, * * * and * * * shall at all Times be armed, accoutred and provided, * * * and subjected to the same Regulations as th[os]e Battalions[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [A]ll Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the respective Town-Councils, shall be at all Times armed, accoutred and equipped * * * upon the same Penalty as though they were held to military Duty, provided that they be enrolled, and an exact List be taken of them, by the Colonel of the Battalion in whose District they live * * * : And that they be considered as the Alarm-List of the State, and be subject to all other Duties as those exempted from bearing Arms[.]"{EN-603}

Taken together, the categories "every man in the colony, able to bear arms", "all * * * Persons * * * by Law obliged to equip themselves" with arms, and "all Male Persons between the Ages of Fifty and Sixty, if able in the Judgment of the * * * Town-Councils", included every able-bodied free male, other than conscientious objectors, who might be exempt from service in the Trained Bands.

2. Moreover, the requirements that all able-bodied males more than sixteen and less than sixty years of age who were exempted (other than for reasons of conscientious objection) from doing duty in the Trained Bands were to be embodied in the Senior Class or the Alarm List, and to be fully armed and accoutred at all times, had an eminently practical purpose: namely, the preparation of that part of the population not enrolled in the Train Bands to support the Train Bands in the field in the event of emergencies—so that everyone capable of assisting in the defense of the State could be mobilized to that end without misunderstanding, confusion, or delay.

3. Not surprisingly, then, service in emergencies was a condition of special exemptions, too, as in three instances in 1777:

> [T]he * * * colonel * * * shall, immediately after such draft, give in a list of all the persons [making conscientious objection] * * * to the town council * * * [which] shall depute and appoint one of their members immediately to hire so many able bodied men as shall equal the number returned * * * , and for the same term of time as the persons * * * shall be drafted, * * * ; each person so drafted, to pay the expense of hiring a person in his room * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> "*Provided always, * * * that this act shall not extend to times of general alarm, when the whole military force of this state shall be ordered upon duty together, and at the same time*; but operate only when detachments or parts of each respective company * * * shall be ordered to be drafted out or detached for actual service."{EN-604}

> [I]f any two men in this state, whether belonging to the militia, alarm list, or independent companies, * * * shall * * * enlist and deliver to any commissioned officer of either of the two Continental battalions, raising as the quota of this state, an able-bodied, effective man, to serve in the same, for three years, or during the war, and who shall pass muster, they shall be exempted from being drafted for, or doing, duty in any of the Continental battalions, for, and during the term for which such able-bodied man shall enlist * * * .
>
> Provided, nevertheless, that such exemption shall not extend to excuse any person from doing duty in time of an alarm, or in case of a draft for the immediate defence of this state.{EN-605}

> [A]ny two persons within this state, subject by law to bear arms, who shall procure one good, able-bodied recruit to enter the Continental service for the term of three years, or during the present war, shall be exempted from actual service, saving in cases of general alarm, during the time for which such recruit shall enlist[.]{EN-606}

G. Provision of a substitute. Individuals impressed for particular duty were not necessarily bound to serve personally, but often could fulfill their immediate obligations, or gain some other exemptions, by providing substitutes:

• [1744] "[W]hen it shall be thought necessary to set a double Watch in any Town in this Government, every Person that shall be legally notified to watch at such Times, and shall refuse or neglect to appear, * * * or send a good and sufficient Man in his Room, such Person for every such Offence, shall pay a Fine[.]"{EN-607}

• [1757] "[E]very man so impressed, shall be obliged to serve as a soldier, or find a good, able bodied, effective man to serve in his stead; unless he hath some reasonable or lawful excuse[.]"{EN-608}

• [1757] "[T]he names of all persons in the list of each company, shall be written on a scroll of paper, and rolled up, and then put into a hat or box; and one sixth part thereof, shall be drawn, (unless the company agree that the commissioned officers shall press said sixth part,) and the persons whose names shall be so drawn or pressed, shall go on this service.

"Provided, nevertheless, that any person drawn, who declines going, and shall immediately procure an able bodied, effective man to go in his room, shall be excused; but no person shall be excused without.

"Provided, also, that no person's name be put into the hat or box, who, through sickness or lameness, cannot go[.]"{EN-609}

• [1776] "[I]n case any Officer or Soldier, * * * draughted [from the Militia] * * * , shall refuse or neglect to appear * * * , either by himself or a good able-bodied and suitable Person in his Stead, to enter upon and perform such military Duty as shall be enjoined him, he shall be subject to and pay such Fines, Forfeitures and Penalties, as the * * * Laws and Regulations of this State direct in Cases of general Alarm."{EN-610}

• [1777] "[I]n case of sickness and inability to do duty (which alone shall excuse any person), it shall be in the power * * * of the field officers * * * to permit such a person to hire a man to do his tour of duty; and if such sick and unable person shall be so extremely poor * * * as to be unable to hire a person in his stead, * * * such field officer be empowered to remit such poor person's fine."{EN-611}

• [1777] "[I]in case any Officer or Soldier [of the Militia who is drafted] * * * shall neglect to appear * * * , either by himself or a good able-bodied and suitable Person in his Stead, compleatly equipped with Arms and Accoutrements, to enter upon and perform such military Duty as shall be enjoined him, he shall be liable to pay * * * a Fine for each Day's Neglect[.]"{EN-612}

• [1777] "[I]f any person [in the Militia] who shall be draughted * * * shall neglect to do duty, or hire a man to do his tour of duty, the town council of the town in which such person shall reside, are empowered to hire a man in the room of such delinquent person * * * [at his cost] if the delinquent person be adjudged * * * of sufficient ability to bear the expense[.]"{EN-613}

• [1779] "[E]very Officer, non-commissioned Officer or Private [in the Militia], who shall neglect or refuse appearing, armed, accoutred and provided * * * at the Time and Place of Rendezvous directed [when ordered into the field and upon actual service], shall forfeit and pay * * * the Sum of Six Pounds, Lawful Money, per Day * * * ; and if an Officer, shall also forfeit his Commission. Provided nevertheless, that each non-commissioned Officer and Private may appear by substitute, at the Discretion of the Commanding Officer."{EN-614}

• [1780] "[I]f any Person who shall be detached * * * shall absent himself, and not * * * be found, and shall not procure an able-bodied effective Man to do the Duty in his Stead, * * * such a Part of the Estate of the Person so detached shall be taken and disposed of * * * as shall be sufficient to procure an able-bodied Man to do the said Duty[.]"{EN-615}

• [1781] "[I]f any Person belonging to the military Force of this State shall absent himself, in order to elude or evade this Act, or shall refuse to march forward, upon being detached, by himself or Substitute, he shall be sent forward to the Continental Army, to do Duty for Six Months, in the Rhode-Island Battalion, as a common Soldier[.]"{EN-616}

• [1781] "[I]f any Person belonging to the military Force of this State shall absent himself, in order to elude or evade this Act, or shall refuse to march forward upon being detached, by himself or Substitute, he shall pay the Sum of Nine Pounds Lawful Silver Money per Month, as a Fine[.]"{EN-617}

In keeping with the principles of social solidarity and the common good, Rhode Island made special provision for the poor:

• [1777] "[T]hat the first division of the second draft of the militia, and alarm and independent companies, heretofore drafted * * * march to such part of the shores within their respective counties, as shall be directed by the commanding officer * * * , properly equipped, to relieve those that are now upon duty, and there to remain and do duty for fifteen days * * * .

* * * * *

"And * * * in case of sickness and inability to do duty (which alone shall excuse any person), it shall be in the power of * * * the field officers * * * to permit such a person to hire a man to do his tour of duty; and if such sick and unable person shall be so extremely poor * * * as to be unable to hire a person in his stead, that such field officer be empowered to remit such poor person's fine."{EN-618}

• [1777] "Whereas * * * one half of the militia, independent, artillery and alarm companies within this State were draughted, and have done duty for one month,—

> "It is voted * * * that the remaining half-part of said militia, independent, artillery and alarm companies, be draughted into two divisions * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [I]f any person who shall be draughted * * * shall neglect to do duty, or hire a man to do his tour of duty, the town council of the town in which such person shall reside, are empowered to hire a man in the room of such delinquent person, * * * if the delinquent person be adjudged by such town council of sufficient ability to bear the expense thereof[.]"{EN-619}

Importantly, a substitute would not suffice during "times of general alarm, when the whole military force of this state shall be ordered upon duty together, and at the same time", or "in case of a draft for the immediate defence of th[e] state".{EN-620} For in that event would apply the time-honored rule of community self-preservation "that if any suddain invasion or insurrection shall bee, or that appearance of any such thing shall present * * * then itt is, or shall be in the power of * * * Magistrates, to raise, appoint and authorize any or all persons requisitt for the preservation of * * * [the] Collony and [its] * * * subjects therein, to attend their allegiance and duty".{EN-621}

The foregoing justifies the following conclusions—

First, the statutory allowance of substitutes throughout the *pre-*constitutional period proves that the pool of manpower within Rhode Island's Militia more than sufficed for the varied duties her Militiamen were called upon to perform. Otherwise, very few men would have been available to serve as substitutes—a general permission for substitutes would have been unworkable—and therefore the General Assembly would not have adopted that system, let alone maintained it throughout most of the 1700s.

Second, the allowance for substitutes empowered Rhode Islanders freely to distribute some of the burdens of actual Militia and other military duty amongst themselves. For the statutes all explicitly provided, or implicitly presumed, that substitutes were to be hired in the free market, and at the prevailing market prices for their services, inasmuch as the statutes themselves established no scale of prices. At the margin, then, this system provided a means for the forces Rhode Island actually deployed to be composed largely of volunteers. For although every adult, able-bodied free male Rhode Islander had a duty in principle to perform Militia service, not every one of them was called upon to fulfill that responsibility in practice on every occasion in which any Militiamen were called forth to serve in the field. Some who were summoned were doubtlessly perfectly willing to go—so they were effectively volunteers. Others who were unwilling to serve if any alternative were available could have employed substitutes who accepted the prevailing free-market payments for their assumption of the duties—so the substitutes were effectively volunteers, too. If the then-current danger had not risen to the level of a "general alarm" (in which event substitution was prohibited)—and if the pool of Militiamen had remained sufficiently large in comparison to the numbers needed for immediate service so that adequate numbers of substitutes had remained available—Rhode Island's Militiamen in active service could have been as much a voluntary force as if the General Assembly had simply hired out of the marketplace in the first instance the men it needed beyond those who might have come forward spontaneously.

Of course, some Rhode Islanders who were called up neither desired to enter into actual duty themselves nor could afford to hire substitutes. So their service was, by any measure, compulsory. Thus, in its reliance on the free market, the system imposed a de facto discrimination based on wealth alone: The relatively rich very often could have avoided personal service in the field; the poor almost never could have done so. Discriminatory as it was, though, such a system was perfectly legal then—not only in Rhode Island but in almost all of the other Colonies and then in all of the independent States as well. And, all other things now being equal to what they were then, such economic discrimination in the enforcement of constitutional duties would be legal even today, because the principles and practices of the pre-constitutional Militia embodied in the statutes of that era define "the Militia of the several States" and "[a] well regulated Militia" for all constitutional purposes.[555] All other things, however, have not remained equal over time.[556]

Third, even though hiring in the free market was the method Rhode Islanders generally employed for obtaining substitutes, substitution was not allowed to be an utterly loose laissez-faire procedure. The purpose, after all, was to provide a replacement actually qualified to perform the duty of the individual seeking excusal. Therefore, standards and close supervision were necessary to ensure that the substitute was at least as competent in that regard as the Militiaman originally posted to duty. The statutory standards were couched in generalities: namely, "a good and sufficient Man" (1744); "a good, able bodied, effective man" (1757); "an able bodied, effective man" (1757, 1777, and 1780); or "a good able-bodied and suitable Person" (1776 and 1777). Yet these were hardly empty phrases, because to be eligible as a substitute a Rhode Islander had to be eligible for Militia service; and to be eligible for Militia service he had to be able-bodied,[557] and was required not only personally to possess firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements,[558] but also to be instructed in their use, usually in the Trained Bands or the

---

[555] See ante, at 63-76.

[556] See post, at 977-981.

[557] See ante, at 249-252.

[558] See ante, Chapters 6 through 8 .

Independent Companies.[559] So everyone knew from common experience over many decades the expansive meaning of the phrase "an able-bodied, effective man" in relation to Militia service. Sometimes, too, the statutes emphasized this: As in 1776, when the statute called for "a good able-bodied and suitable Person * * * , to enter upon and perform such military Duty as shall be enjoined him"{EN-622}—which the substitute could not have done without arms and training. Or even more pointedly as in 1777, when the statute specified "a good able-bodied and suitable Person * * * compleatly equipped with Arms and Accoutrements"{EN-623}—which presumably every potential substitute possessed perforce of his own general Militia duty. In any event, final judgement as to whether a proffered substitute was in fact "an able-bodied, effective man" in the full sense of that phrase obviously could not have been left either to the individual offering the substitute or to the substitute himself, but had to be exercised by the Militia Officers in the units to which the substitute was to be assigned. And as the effectiveness of their own commands (and potentially their own lives) depended on the quality, training, and equipment of their men, the Officers had every incentive to scrutinize potential substitutes carefully.

H. Payment of fines. Rhode Island's Militia laws imposed fines as penalties for most infractions of their requirements.[560] As a practical result, therefore, individuals capable of paying the applicable tariffs on delinquencies could purchase ad hoc exemptions from most of those requirements as each of them arose. Although this arrangement especially privileged those who were relatively well off economically, it persisted throughout the pre-constitutional period, either because the majority of Rhode Islanders considered its operation fair, or perhaps because the narrowness of the franchise precluded those whom it particularly disadvantaged from gaining sufficient influence in the General Assembly to compel reform.

In some situations, as in 1757, a fine was explicitly stipulated as the price of obtaining an exemption from duty: "[A]ny man so impressed, upon his paying a fine of £100 * * * to one of the field officers * * * shall be excused; and such field officer shall order another to be impressed in his stead, * * * and so on, * * * until the required number of soldiers shall be completed and made up."{EN-624}

I. Conscientious objection. During most of the pre-constitutional era, Rhode Island treated conscientious objection as a possible, but not necessary, basis for exemption from performance of some services in her Militia.

1. From her earliest days, Rhode Island allowed conscientious objectors in effect to disarm and demilitarize themselves. This self-separation from most Militia duties did not immunize them from all compulsory service, however.

---

[559] See ante, at 208-220 and 224-234.

[560] See post, at 275-284.

• [1673] "[N]oe person nor persons (within this Collony), that is * * * persuaded in his, their conscience or consciences (and by him or them declared), that he nor they cannot nor ought not to trayne, to learne to fight, nor to war, nor kill any person or persons * * *

" * * * shall at any time be compelled against his or their judgment and conscience to trayne, arm or fight, to kill any person nor persons by reason of, or at the command of any officer of this Collony, civill nor military nor by reason of any by-law * * * enacted; nor shall suffer any punishment, fine, distraint, pennalty nor imprisonment, who cannot in conscience traine, fight, nor kill any person nor persons"; but "such * * * men * * * shall be exempt from traynings, arminge, rallyinge to fight, to kill, and all such martiall service as men are by any other debility; as said lame, sick, weake, deafe, blinde, or any other infirmity exempteth persons in and by law[.]"

Nevertheless, "when any enemy shall approach or assault the Collony * * * then it shall be lawfull for the civill officers * * * (and not as martiall or military) to require such * * * persons as are of sufficient able bodye and of strength (though exempt from arminge and fightinge), to conduct or convey out of the danger of the enemy, weake and aged impotent persons, women and children, goods and cattle, by which the common weale may be the better maintained, and works of mercy manifested to distressed, weake persons; and shall be required to watch to informe of danger (but without armes in martiall manner and matters), and to perform any other civill service by order of the civill officers for the good of the Collony".{EN-625}

• [1701] "[I]t shall be in the power and authority of the Captain and commissioned officers of each respective Train Band in this Collony, if any person, as they shall judge, [is] really conscientious, being within their list, and that they cannot bear arms, in time of alarums, and that if said persons being so conscientious, be any ways serviceable in making discovery, or riding upon any expedition, or any thing else that may be judged convenient for the preservation of his Majesty's interest, * * * to remit the fine or fines imposed for their not appearing in arms[.]"{EN-626}

• [1726] "[I]f the said delinquent person or persons shall plead that it is against his or their consciences to fight or bear any sort of arms or weapons to defend himself, his interest, and the interest of the colony against a common enemy, and * * * produce * * * a certificate from the congregation and meeting to which he or they do belong, or frequent, * * * that they are persuaded and do believe him or them to be truly conscientious * * * , that then the commander * * * shall acquit and discharge such person or persons from paying any fine or fines, with the following proviso, viz.:

"That the person or persons so acquitted and discharged, do upon alarms or other special occasions, when the militia are in arms, and upon duty, appear and attend * * * and observe and perform all such orders and directions * * * in riding or going upon any discovery, carrying or bringing intelligence, and the like service; but in default or neglect thereof, such person or persons * * * shall not be acquitted and discharged of his or their fine or fines[.]"{EN-627}

• [1730] "[N]o Constraint shall be laid upon the Conscience of any Person whatsoever, by Force of any Act or Law for the keeping up or regulating the Militia within this Colony: Nor shall any Person be compelled to bear Arms, or learn or exercise himself in the Art of War, whose Principles are, that the same is inconsistent with the Doctrine of the Gospel * * * .

"AND * * * Assistants, Justices of the Peace, or Wardens, are * * * to admit any such Person to make * * * his Declaration and Affirmation, (provided his Life and Conversation be not contradictory to his Pretensions) and shall record the same, and give forth a Certificate * * * , whereby such Person shall be exempted from all Service, Fines and Forfeitures, accruing by any Law, for the Neglect of Training, bearing Arms, practicing the Art of War, or of attending on such Persons as do practice the same.

* * * * *

"AND * * * this Act * * * shall not * * * exempt any Person from watching and warding in this Colony."{EN-628}

• [1740] "[A]ll Persons making solemn Engagement * * * in the respective Counties where the Alarm is made, that it is against their Conscience to bear Arms at all, shall on an Alarm, appear * * * without Arms, to be employed as Scouts, Messengers, Watches, &c. or else * * * obey the * * * Order, to remove Women and Children, or sick Persons out of immediate Danger, or to watch against or extinguish any Fires that may be kindled at such Times, either by Design or Accident; and to do any other Duty consistent with their Religious Principles: And any Person as aforesaid not appearing, shall be obliged to pay the sum of Forty Shillings for each Day's neglect."{EN-629}

• [1744] "[A]ny Person * * * of a sober Life and Conversation, who can and shall Frankly and Freely, upon his solemn Affirmation * * * declare * * * that his Opinion and Religious Sentiments are, that in Matters relating to War, he ought to be Passive; and that the Practice of War, or the Art thereof, and the Use of Arms, and the Exercise thereof in War, are inconsistent with his Belief as a Christian, and that he declineth the Customary Use of Arms in War, and would be excused from the Law relating to Military Discipline for Conscience-Sake and out of Principle, and for no other End or Purpose whatever: In this Case such Person shall be exempted from bearing Arms as a Soldier, and from the Law * * * relating to Military Discipline or Equipment.

* * * * *

"Provided Nevertheless, That this Act * * * shall not exempt the Persons who take such Affirmation * * * from such Duties in Time of Alarm, as they are obliged to do, by [the statute of 1740.]"{EN-630}

• [1766] "[A]ll Persons making solemn Engagement * * * in the respective Counties where an Alarm is made, that it is against their Conscience to bear Arms at all, shall on an Alarm appear * * * (though without Arms) to be employed as Scouts, Messengers, Watches, &c. or else * * * they shall * * * obey * * * Orders about removing Women and Children, or the Sick, our of immediate Danger, or to watch against, or to extinguish Fires that may be kindled at such Times by Design or Accident; and to do any other Duty, consistent with their religious Principles: And any Person, not appearing as aforesaid, shall be obliged to pay the Sum of Twelve Shillings for each Day's Neglect[.]"{EN-631}

• [1777] "[A]ny Person inhabiting within this State, and of a sober Life and Conversation, who can and shall frankly and freely take the Affirmation [prescribed by statute] * * * and produce a Certificate thereof, or if one of the People called Quakers, shall produce a Certificate * * * that he is a Member of their religious Society, such Certificate shall excuse such Person from all military Duty whatever.

* * * * *

"AND * * * all Officers impowered * * * to administer this Affirmation * * * be careful to make Enquiry into the Lives and Conversations of such as apply to them for the Benefit of the same, and be satisfied that they are of sober Lives and Conversation, agreeable to the Intent of this Act * * * .

"PROVIDED nevertheless, That any Thing * * * contained in this Act * * * not * * * excuse th[os]e Persons * * * from appearing at the Request of any civil Magistrate to extinguish Fires, remove sick Persons, Women and Children, and from affording any Kind of Assistance, of a charitable or merely civil Nature, upon any Time of public Calamity and Distress."{EN-632}

• [1777] "Whereas, the invasion of this, and the other United States of America, by a powerful enemy, occasions great distress, and very heavy burthen of expense, upon the inhabitants; and whereas, many persons within this state * * * have * * * avoided contributing their equal and necessary proportion for the defence of our rights, privileges and estates; and from which they do, and will, derive, in all respects, equal benefit and protection with other subjects of this state, not exempted from personal military service; to prevent which, and that they shall in future bear their equal proportion thereof,—

" * * * [T]he captains of the several companies of militia and alarm men * * * shall make return to their respective colonels * * * of all persons * * * who have taken the affirmation [of conscientious objection], or produced certificates from the meeting of Friends, * * * upon any draft > being ordered to be made from their said companies; which colonel * * * shall cause them to be drafted in like manner, and in proportion to their numbers, as those of the several companies * * * shall be ordered to be draughted.

>
> "And the said colonel * * * shall, immediately after such draft, give in a list of all the persons, so drawn in each town, to the town council * * * [which] shall * * * hire so many able bodied men as shall equal the number returned * * * , and for the same term of time as the persons * * * shall be drafted, * * * upon the best terms he can, at the expense of the persons within their respective towns, so drafted * * * ; each person so drafted, to pay the expense of hiring a person in his room[.]"{EN-633}

> • [1779] "[T]his [Militia] Act shall not extend * * * to any Persons who are excused from bearing Arms, by having taken the Affirmation, or produced the Certificates from the Meeting of Friends, as by Law required[.]"{EN-634}

Thus, exemption on the grounds of conscientious objection consisted of three elements:

First, proof by the claimant that his objection to the use of arms actually sounded in his own conscience—which depended not only on his "solemn Affirmation" or "solemn Engagement", or on "a certificate from the [religious] congregation or meeting to which he * * * belong[ed]", but also (and doubtlessly of decisive importance) on an "Enquiry" by public officials as to whether he was "of a sober Life and Conversation" that were "not contradictory to his Pretensions".

Second, specification by the General Assembly of exactly what the exemption entailed—whether "from traynings, arminge, rallyinge to fight, to kill, and all such martiall service"; "from all Service, Fines and Forfeitures, accruing by any Law, for the Neglect of Training, bearing Arms, practicing the Art of War, or of attending on such Persons as do practice the same"; "from bearing Arms as a Soldier, and from the Law * * * relating to Military Discipline or Equipment"; or "from all military Duty whatever".

Third, imposition, in lieu of direct military service, of noncombatant duties that the objector had to perform in order to retain his exemption, including:

- "to watch to informe of danger";
- "to watch against or extinguish any Fires that may be kindled at such Times, either by Design or Accident";
- "to conduct or convey out of the danger of the enemy, weake and aged impotent persons, women and children, goods and cattle";
- to "mak[e] discovery", "rid[e] upon any expedition", "carry[ ] or bring[ ] intelligence", or "be employed as Scouts" and "Messengers";

- to "afford[ ] any Kind of Assistance, of a charitable or merely civil Nature, upon any Time of public Calamity and Distress";
- "to perform any other civill service by order of the civill officers for the good of the Collony";
- "to do any other Duty consistent with the[objector's] Religious Principles"; and
- to pay the expense of hiring a substitute for active service.

Plainly, then, conscientious objection was neither open to all, nor a way even for those with bona fide religious claims to avoid Militia service altogether, but instead simply the substitution of various ostensibly nonmilitary for military duties. Only "ostensibly nonmilitary", though, because, although all of these duties were noncombatant in nature, many of them furthered ulterior military purposes, and therefore would have been assigned to Militiamen had conscientious objectors not been available to perform them. Moreover, some of the duties conscientious objectors were required to fulfill could actually have been decidedly more difficult and dangerous than those assigned to regular Militiamen. For example, Militiamen captured by an enemy that abided by the Law of Nations would merely have been held as prisoners of war; whereas conscientious objectors called upon to "mak[e] discovery", "carry[ ] or bring[ ] intelligence", or "be employed as Scouts" and "Messengers", if captured near or behind the enemy's lines in the basically civilian garb Militiamen typically wore, might actually have been or might easily have been considered by the enemy to be spies, for whom the generally accepted punishment was death.

2. Importantly, conscientious objection was a statutorily granted immunity from some aspects of Militia service, not any kind of "inherent right". For that reason, legislators enjoyed complete discretion to extend, withhold, qualify, or condition that status as they saw fit, according to their own ideas of sound policy. For example, at various times Rhode Island explicitly excluded conscientious objection as a grounds for exemption from Militia duties.

In 1676, the General Assembly voted > that whereas there is a clause in a law made * * * [in] 1673, wherein is specified that persons declareinge that it is against their conscience or judgments to beare armes in martiall or millitary manner, that such shall not be lyable to the millitary authority, nor any wayes lyable to pay the fine by law * * * ordered and set; and findinge that severall, under pretence decline their duty, whereby great disturbance is in the severall Traine Bands; therefore, for the encouragment of the millitia in this Collony, the said clause in the said law is made voyd, null and repealed;

> and all persons in this Collony are to be observant actively or passively, as the former lawes have provided in millitary affaires[.]{EN-635}

This provision, though, was soon repealed, and the former law reinstated.{EN-636} Then, in 1677, the General Assembly complained that, > some [persons,]under pretence of conscience, hath taken liberty to act contrary, and make voyde the power, strength and authority of the millitary soe necessary to be upheld and maintained, that the civill power (in which the whole freedome and priviledges of his Majesty's subjects are kept and preserved), cannot without it be executed, and have soe far acted therein, that this * * * Collony at this time is in effect wholly destitute of the millitary forces for the preservation thereof, and inhabitants therein, and may thereby be made a prey unto the weakest and meanest of his Majesty's enemies. This Court * * * findinge that his Majesty in his Pattent hath required that the inhabitants of his Collony are to be led, conducted, and trained up in martiall affaires, doe * * * order, enact, and declare * * * > that noe person or persons within this Collony from the age of sixteen yeares unto the age of sixty yeares, shall be released from taininge or other duties in millitary affaires, exceptinge only the civill officers in this Collony, or such whose employments render them excusable by law, unless he or they doe render or give under their Captaine * * * a good and full satisfactory reason for their neglect[.]{EN-637}

>
> * * * * *
>

Thereafter, as detailed immediately above, throughout the remainder of the *pre-*constitutional period Rhode Island recognized conscientious exemption as a ground for exemption.

J. Commission or suspicion of some crime. Revealingly, Rhode Island's statutes never specified that any individual convicted of, indicted for, or the subject of an on-going investigation related to some alleged crime would therefore be exempted or excluded from, or otherwise disqualified for, her Militia, either permanently or temporarily.

To be sure, in the *pre-*constitutional era, in many instances an individual adjudged guilty of a "Felony" would have been executed, whereupon his ability, let alone his liability, for service in the Militia would have terminated forever.[561] In Rhode Island, for example, from the earliest days many crimes were denoted "Felony", and made punishable by death.{EN-638} Similarly, while an individual remained in custody on suspicion of criminal behavior, he would not have retained personal possession of his firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements, and could not have appeared at Militia training and musters either armed or disarmed.

---

[561] See ante, at 145, and post, at 983-984

Not all convictions for "Felony" necessarily resulted in the deaths of the perpetrators, though. For example, under English law it was "a settled Rule, That the King may pardon any Offence whatever, whether against the Common or Statute Law, so far as the Publick is concerned in it".[562] And "the effect of * * * pardon by the king, is to make the offender a new man; to acquit him of all corporal penalties and forfeitures annexed to that offence for which he obtains his pardon".[563] Pardons might "also be conditional", such as "transportation to some foreign country (usually to some of his majesty's colonies and plantations in America) for life, or for a term of years".[564] Of course, because "the offender also forfeit[ed] all his chattel interests absolutely" in "felonies of all sorts" "by conviction",[565] an individual adjudicated a "felon" who had somehow avoided execution would likely have been deprived of the Militia firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements he had possessed at the time of his conviction.[566] That result alone, however, would not have prohibited him from lawfully acquiring new "chattel interests"—including another firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements that were suitable for Militia service—after his return to society. Moreover, on the score of arming himself, Rhode Island's Militia laws granted no leeway for someone who had happened to have lost all of his possessions, for whatever reason. Rather, the laws directed public officials to provide the necessary equipment to any man too poor to obtain it on his own.[567] And if a prior conviction for a "Felony" of an individual who was not executed but was later returned to society as a free man did not necessarily preclude him from subsequent service in the Militia by disqualifying him from possessing a firearm, then conviction for some less serious crime surely did not, either. Similarly, an individual merely suspected of criminal activity, and permitted to remain at large during an investigation, would probably have retained possession of any firearm he had acquired theretofore. For no Rhode Island statute imposed any contrary restriction on such an individual. (Possibly, though, a court might have done so, as a special condition of the perpetrator's release, had the peculiar nature of the case warranted it.[568])

---

[562] W. Hawkins, A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book II, Chapter XXXVII, § 33, at 391 (footnote omitted).

[563] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 395.

[564] Id., Volume 4, at 394.

[565] Id., Volume 4, at 378, 380.

[566] Id., Volume 4, at 380.

[567] See ante, at 157-162.

[568] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 251-254; W. Hawkins, A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapters LX and LXI, at 126-133. See post, at 303-307

This did not mean that no wrongdoers were ever disarmed as a matter of course in the *pre-*constitutional era—for disloyal citizens were, in Rhode Island and other States, during the War of Independence.[569] Professing no loyalty to Rhode Island, they could hardly have been expected to have believed that they had a duty to keep and bear arms in her defense. Whereas, retaining their loyalty to Britain, they might have taken up arms in her behalf, if afforded the opportunity. So, as enemies at least potentially willing to fight against Rhode Island, they obviously wanted no place whatsoever in her Militia—they could not have been trusted to perform any duty to which they might have been assigned therein—and certainly they could not have been allowed, although they might have desired, to prepare themselves for service in some hostile armed force. Thus, their disarmament naturally followed.

K. Exemptions as a means for organizing the Militia. The foregoing survey establishes that exemptions under Rhode Island's *pre-*constitutional laws were not exclusions from, but special conditions for defining (and usually limiting) service within, her Militia—a principle which must be applied today as well.

In light of the highly practical grounds of "general Utility" upon which they rested, exemptions in Rhode Island could and did change over time. Nonetheless, whether exempted on the grounds of gender, age, physical disability, public office or private occupation, or conscientious objection, everyone was "organized" in some way. For Rhode Island always coupled exemptions with particular duties—such as possessing firearms and ammunition, or serving in some noncombatant capacity; or with conditions to or for the exemption—such as provision of substitutes or payment of fines; or with limitations —such as an exemption's not being applicable during "alarms". The only exception (if it can be called that, inasmuch as its beneficiaries were mere children) was for males less than sixteen years of age, for whom exemption was complete and unconditional.

Thus, in Rhode Island exemptions were actually a means for organizing the Militia. They did not create an oxymoronic "unorganized militia" composed of vast numbers of individuals simply cast aside, possibly (but not probably) to be "organized" only at some later date, as is the all-too-typical statutory pattern for neglect of the Militia today.[570] [569] See post, at 298-299 and 301-302 (Rhode Island); and 742-745 (Virginia).

---

[570] Compare 10 U.S.C. § 311(b)(2) with, e.g., General Laws of Rhode Island §§ 30-1-4(4) and 30-1-5.

CHAPTER TWELVE

Rhode Island enforced her *pre-*constitutional Militia statutes by imposing fines or other penalties for each individual's every infraction.

As did all but one of the other Colonies and all of the independent States during the *pre-*constitutional period, Rhode Island employed various penalties and punishments in order to compel compliance with her Militia regulations. The extent, specificity, and strictness of this system, and the General Assembly's perseverance in it over time, prove the seriousness with which Rhode Islanders took the duty of all able-bodied free adult males to be properly armed and ready to respond to a summons for service, and of most of them to train for that eventuality on a regular basis.

A. Fines. Fines constituted the usual penalties—imposed directly on the defaulter; or if he were a minor son, servant, or apprentice then on his parent, guardian, master, or mistress.

1. Fines were collected immediately in money, or at some temporal remove by the normal process of distraint and sale at public auction of the defaulter's or another responsible party's goods:[571]

> • [1639] "[N]oe man shall go two miles from the Towne unarmed, eyther with Gunn or Sword; and none shall come to any public Meeting without his weapon. Upon the default of eyther he shall forfeit five shillings."{EN-639}

> • [1639] "Mr. Eastone for breach of an order in coming to the public meeting without his weapon * * * is to pay five shillings."{EN-640}

> • [1640] "[E]ight severall times in the yeare the Bands * * * shall openlie in the field be exercised * * * . And * * * there shall be two Generall Musters in the yeare * * * ; and * * * if any shall faile to make their personal appearance * * * , he shall forfeit and pay * * * five shillings * * * . And if any person shall come to * * * Training or Generall Muster, defective in his armes or furniture equivalent, he shall pay * * * twelve pence[.]"{EN-641}

---

[571] On this procedure, see, e.g., W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 6-15. The statutes quoted immediately hereinafter in the text impose fines in "pence", "shillings", and "pounds". In the English system of money the American Colonists used, there were 12 pence (i.e., pennies) to the shilling, and 20 shillings to the pound.

• [1643] A named individual "is to order the dayes of trayning [and] judge [what is] to be the convenient tyme"; and others are to go "to every inhabitant [in Portsmouth and] see whether every one of them has powder, and what bullets run, within ten days of the [trayning]"; and "[e]very one deserting is to forfeit five shillings".{EN-642}

• [1643] A certain individual "shall go to every house and [see] what armes are defective; and that the men whose armes are [to be handed] in to be mended * * * . If the armes be not brought in timely, to forfeit five shillings."{EN-643}

• [1647] "[T]he Bands of each plantation or Towne, shall, openlie in the field, be exercised and disciplined by their Commanders * * * , all the Train Bands to make their personal appearances completely armed * * * ; and if any appear not, they shall forfeit and pay five shillings * * * ; and if any shall come defective in his Armes * * * he shall forfeit and pay y^{e} sum of twelve pence * * * ; Provided, herdsmen, lighter-men and such as be left of necessity at Farmes, shall pay two shillings and sixpence for each dayes absence[.]"{EN-644}

A "lighterman" operated a "lighter", a flat-bottomed boat or barge used to transfer cargo to and from ships anchored in a harbor or river at a distance from a wharf.[572] One might imagine that lightermen, along with herdsmen and "such as be left of necessity at Farmes", would have qualified for exemptions from Militia training perforce of the critical nature of their occupations. Exemplifying its ability to make fine distinctions, however, the General Assembly withheld complete exemptions from these workers, but in effect granted them partial exemptions by significantly reducing their fines for nonattendance in comparison to the fines it imposed on ordinary citizens.

• [1650] "[A]ll men that have gunns and pieces to mend * * * for their present defence, shall forthwith * * * carrie those pieces to mende, upon paine of forfeiting ten shillings a piece, which shall be levied by distraint from the head officer of the Towne[.]"{EN-645}

• [1664] "[T]he people listed to trayne vpon all such dayes * * * appoynted, for the exercise of trayning * * * [are] required * * * to appear in armes, compleat; and to exercise vnder their respective officers * * * . And * * * in case of defects * * * the penalty formerly sett to be taken by distraynt[.]"{EN-646}

• [1665] "[E]ach Captain * * * shall be fined in case he call not the listed soulders together * * * to make choyce of * * * officers milletary * * * the summe of ten pound starling * * * ; as alsoe fortye shillings for each defect of calling the * * * company together to traine on each of the

---

[572] See N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definition 2; Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 852.

training days * * * , or refusing then to exercise them in training; * * * and for every defecte in not duely attending the trainings, each one * * * soe deficient, shall for every dayes defect, pay three shillings fine, to be levied by distraint on the partyes goods, or on the goods of the master or mistress, or parents of such sones or sarvents as are defective[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very man in each towne be allwayes furnished with two pound of gunpowder, and fowre pound of lead or bulletts, vpon penalty of being fined ten shillings * * * to be levied by distraint[.]"{EN-647}

• [1666] Certain officials were empowered "to graunt forth warrant to any officer * * * of the Trayne Band * * * to take by distraynt the fine or fines of such person or persons who shall be defective in non-appearance".{EN-648}

• [1667] Certain individuals were ordered "to goe from house to house throughout the towne of Newport, the villages and precincts thereof, and to take a precise and exact account of all the armes, amunition and weapons of warr each person is furnished with, * * * and in what condition with regard to service the same is in * * * . And also to call vpon such as have deffects, that they may be supplyed in the place forthwith, under the penaltie the law hath provided, to repaire to such persons as may supply them."{EN-649}

• [1677] "[I]f any of the listed souldiers [in the Militia] shall neglect or refuse to appeare on the severall [training] days * * * every of them soe neglectinge, shall * * * pay * * * the just sum of two shillings"; "every listed souldier within this Collony shall * * * have one good gun or muskitt fit for service, one pound of good powder, and thirty bullets at least, upon the penalty of one shilling * * * for each day's defect"; "if any person or persons to be distrayned upon * * * be a son or servant, that have noe visible estate of their owne, * * * then fines and forfeitures shall be levied and distrained upon the estate of their respective masters, parents or other persons under whose service, command or tuition they are"; "each * * * Captaine * * * that shall neglect or refuse to give timely notice unto his * * * souldiers to appeare in armes on the days by law prefixed, shall for each default forfeit forty shillings"; and "if any of the * * * Captains shall neglect or refuse to give forth his or their respective warrants * * * unto such persons * * * appointed to gather in all such defects, fines and forfeitures, * * * every such Captain * * * shall * * * pay * * * the whole sum of what is due".{EN-650}

• [1680] "Whereas the Captains of the severall Traine Bands * * * are by law strictly required to grant forth their warrants * * * to levie and distraine all such fines and forfeitures * * * due * * * from all * * * listed * * * souldjers as shall not appeare compleat in their armes on the severall traininge days", then "whatsoever Traine souldjer * * * [who] shall refuse or deny to execute any such warrant * * * shall for every * * * default, pay a fine of tenn shillings".{EN-651}

• [1699, 1701, and 1705] "[I]f any * * * persons listed under the command of any Captain * * * of the militia * * * do not appear complete in arms * * * with a good or sufficient muskett or fuse, and sword or bagganett, cotouch box or bandelears, with twelve bullets, fit for his piece, half a pound of powder, six good flints upon * * * training days * * * [or] by alarum or any other time or times * * * during times of war * * * [they] shall forfeit for each neglect * * * for training or other meeting in arms, * * * two shillings * * * ; and for non-appearance or neglect in any alarum, * * * five shillings * * * , to be taken by distraint, or otherwise". "And * * * any person [who] shall refuse or neglect to watch * * * shall pay as a fine * * * five shillings * * * , to be taken and imprisoned in manner and form as the fines for neglecting of training or alarum are taken and proceeded in". Moreover, "all house keepers, as well widows as others, although there be no person in said family that is qualified according to law as to watching and warding * * * [shall] find a suitable watcher or warder, or * * * pay so much money as will hire or procure one; and upon neglect or refusall thereof, to be under the like fine and penalty[.]"{EN-652}

• [1702] "[T]he fine for not appearing in arms * * * on * * * training days, shall be three shillings for each day's defect, with sixpence for each distraint[.]"{EN-653}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Enlisted Person, that shall Refuse or Neglect to make his Personal appearance Accoutred as [required by statute], on * * * Training Days * * * shall for every such Default pay * * * Three Shillings in Money * * * , & if such Defaulter shall refuse so to do, * * * the Clerk of the Band * * * [shall] take and distrain so much of the Personal Estate of such delinquent Person, or such as shall have them in Tuition, as * * * will pay his Fine or Fines". "AND * * * all such Persons * * * excus'd from Training, yet shall notwithstanding be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train, & * * * there shall be * * * a Survey and Examination made, whether such Persons are provided as * * * is Required; and all such Persons as shall be found unprovided with such Arms * * * shall pay the Fine of Five Shillings for each default, to be Levied by Distress and Sale of the Defaulters Goods". "AND * * * upon any Alarm in time of War, or other eminent danger of any Assault or Invasion, all Male Persons, both Listed Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Age of Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall * * * forthwith Repair to * * * such Company, within whose Precincts they Inhabit or Dwell, provided with Arms & Ammunition * * * , and in Case any Person shall not appear * * * , such Defaulter shall Pay the Fine of Five Shillings, to be Levied * * * by Distress and Sale of such Defaulters Goods[.]"{EN-654}

• [1719 and 1744] "[E]very Person that shall refuse or neglect to Watch * * * shall pay a Fine of Three Shillings * * * for every such Offence[.]"{EN-655}

• [1726] "[T]he penalty upon [each] person who is within the lists of any company or train band in this colony, for his neglect of duty on training days, * * * [shall be] a fine of five shillings * * * for each neglect; and the penalty on each person that is obliged to appear on alarms or other special occasions when the militia are in arms, or upon duty, shall be a fine of ten shillings for each neglect of duty[.]"{EN-656}

• [1731 and 1736] "[A]ll enlisted Soldiers belonging to any of the respective Companys or Train'd Bands in this Government, that shall neglect to train * * * , shall for every Days Neglect * * * pay as a Fine the Sum of Five Shillings."{EN-657}

• [1740 and 1744] "[T]he Council of War * * * are * * * empowered to appoint such * * * Days as may be necessary to disciplilne the Militia, and make them expert in the Use of their Arms, over and above the Four Training Days by Law appointed * * * , and * * * every Soldier neglecting to give his Attendance and do his Duty in that Service, shall * * * pay as a Fine the Sum of Ten Shillings, and Forty Shillings for each Day's neglect on an Alarm[.]"{EN-658}

• [1742 and 1744] "[A]ny Person * * * that shall refuse to watch * * * shall pay a Fine of Eight Shillings in Money for each such Offence[.]"{EN-659}

• [1744] "[A]fter an Alarm is beaten [by drum] in any Town in this Colony, no Man whatsoever shall leave or go out of said Town so alarmed, but by Leave or Order from the Commanding Officer there, upon the Penalty of paying to and for the Use of the Colony, the Sum of One Hundred Pounds[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [W]hen it shall be thought necessary to set a double Watch in any Town * * * , every Person that * * * shall refuse or neglect to appear, * * * or send a good and sufficient Man in his Room, such Person for every such Offence, shall pay a Fine of Sixteen Shillings."{EN-660}

• [1755] "That the fines of every inlisted Soldier, who is not provided with Arms and Ammunition according to Law, be * * * Three Shillings for every Defect in each Article of Accoutrements, and of every Person excused from Training, for not being provided * * * , the Fines be * * * Five Shillings for every Defect in each Article of Accoutrements; and of every inlisted Soldier neglecting or refusing to appear accoutred * * * upon Training Days, the Fine be * * * Forty Shillings per Day; and of all Persons not appearing upon an Alarm * * * the Fine be * * * Eight Pounds * * * . And that every Person * * * by Law to be accoutred * * * is * * * to provide himself with Arms, and other Accoutrements * * * , upon the Penalties aforesaid[.]" And "all Goods taken by Distraint for Fines, shall be sold * * * at a Public Vendue[.]"{EN-661}

• [1756] "[W]hen any Person under the Age of twenty-one Years, shall neglect or refuse to pay his Fine for Neglect of military Duty, the Clerk shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parents or Masters of such Persons[.]"{EN-662}

• [1766] "[E]very enlisted Soldier of the * * * Militia, shall always be provided with One good Musket or Fuzee, the Barrel whereof not to be less than Three Feet and an Half in Length, to the Satisfaction of the Commission Officers, also one Pound of good Gun-Powder, Thirty Bullets fit for his Gun, Six good Flints, One good Sword or Bayonet, a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartridges of Powder and Ball, under the Penalty of Four Pence for each Article of Accoutrement aforesaid which he shall be deficient in, for every Time he shall be unprovided therewith[.]" "[E]very enlisted Person who shall refuse or neglect to make his personal Appearance, accoutred as aforesaid, on such training Days * * * shall for every such Default pay a Fine of Three Shillings[.]" "[W]ithin One Month after each training Day, the Captain shall grant forth his Warrant, directed to the Clerk, * * * to collect the Fines which have accrued, for Deficiency in Accoutrements, Disobedience or Misbehaviour, Neglect or Refusal to appear at Trainings * * * . And the said Clerk * * * shall take and distrain sufficient of the personal Estate of the Delinquent, if to be found, to satisfy and pay his Fine or Fines, having first required him to pay the same[.]" "[A]ll such Persons as are * * * excused from training, shall, notwithstanding, be provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to train. And * * * there shall be an Examination and Survey made whether such Persons are provided as * * * is required; and all such Persons as shall be found unprovided, shall pay a Fine of Four Pence for each Article of Accoutrement they shall be deficient in, to be levied * * * in the same Manner as the fines of enlisted Soldiers[.]" "[U]pon any Alarm in Time of War or other imminent Danger of any Assault or Invasion, all male Persons, both enlisted Soldiers and others in this Colony, of and between the Ages of Sixteen Years and Sixty, shall * * * repair to the Colours * * * , provided with Arms and Ammunition required of trained Soldiers upon training Days; and in Case such Persons shall not appear duly accoutred, such Defaulters shall each pay as a Fine the Sum of Twelve Shillings per Day, to be levied by Distress and Sale of his Goods[.]" "[A]ll Persons making solemn Engagement * * * in the Counties where an Alarm is made, that it is against their Conscience to bear Arms at all, shall on an Alarm appear * * * (though without Arms) to be employed as Scouts, Messengers, Watchers, &c. or else * * * obey * * * Orders about removing Women and Children, or the Sick, out of immediate Danger, or to watch against, or to extinguish Fires * * * and to do any other Duty, consistent with their religious Principles:

And any Person, not appearing * * * shall be obliged to pay the Sum of Twelve Shillings for each Day's Neglect[.]" "[A]fter an Alarm is beaten in any Town * * * , no Man whosoever shall leave or go out of such Town so alarmed, but by Leave or Order from the commanding Officer there, upon the Penalty of paying * * * the Sum of Twelve Pounds; to be recovered * * * by Action of Debt, Bill, Plaint, or Information, in any Court of Record within this Colony[.]" "[E]very Trooper shall always be provided with One good serviceable Horse of fourteen Hands high, * * * a Pair of good Pistols, One Carbine, One Sword, One Pound of Gunpowder, Thirty sizeable Bullets, Twelve good Flints * * * ; upon the Penalty of One Shilling and Six Pence for each Default in each Article of Accoutrement." "[T]he Captain * * * shall warn the Troop * * * to muster Two several Days in every Year at his own Appointment * * * ; and every Trooper who shall not appear * * * shall pay as a Fine Six Shillings, to be levied by Distress and Sale of his Goods[.]" "[A] Council of War * * * may appoint such other Days as may be necessary to discipline the Militia, and make them expert in the Use of their Arms, over and above the Two training Days * * * : and every Officer and Soldier neglecting to give his Attendance and to do his Duty, shall pay a Fine of Three Shillings[.]"{EN-663}

• [1774] "[E]ach inlisted Soldier, who shall not be provided with a sufficient Gun or Fuzee, * * * shall be fined Two Shillings * * * for each deficiency: And * * * every Soldier be provided with a good Bayonet fixed on his Gun, under the Penalty of Four Pence * * * for each default". And "the Fines of all those who, being exempted from appearing on the Days of Training, are notwithstanding, obliged to be provided with Arms and other Accoutrements, shall be the same for every deficiency as the fines of the inlisted Soldiers[.]"{EN-664}

• [1776] "[A]ll Male Persons subject by Law to bear Arms, whether of the Militia, Alarm List or Independent Companies" who are to be drafted and who "shall refuse or neglect to appear * * * , either by himself or a good able-bodied and suitable Person in his Stead, to enter upon and perform * * * military Duty * * * shall be subject to and pay such Fines, Forfeitures and Penalties, as the military Laws and Regulations * * * direct in Cases of general Alarm."{EN-665}

• [1777] "[E]ach and every person by law obliged to bear arms, who, when * * * called out to duty, shall neglect to appear in person, completely equipped with arms and accoutrements, shall be liable to pay, as a fine, for each and every day's neglect, * * * five shillings, * * * to be levied and collected by warrant or distress, * * * unless the person so deficient, shall * * * pay * * * the fines due[.]"{EN-666}

• [1777] "[I]n case any Officer or Soldier * * * shall neglect to appear * * * , either by himself or a good able-bodied and suitable Person in his Stead, compleatly equipped with Arms and Accoutrements, to enter upon and perform * * * military Duty * * * , he shall be liable to pay as a Fine for each Day's Neglect * * * Five Shillings * * * to be levied and collected by Warrant of Distress[.]"{EN-667}

• [1778] "[A]ll Persons who are by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box * * * do provide themselves therewith * * * , or with a Rifle-Gun and Sword * * * , upon the Penalty of Nine Pounds * * * for a Gun, and One Pound and Ten Shillings for a Cartouch-Box * * * ; and the * * * Town-Treasurer is * * * to issue his Warrant of Distress * * * for the Fines[.]"{EN-668}

• [1779] "[E]very Person * * * found deficient in any of the Arms, Accoutrements and Equipage * * * shall forfeit and pay as a Fine for every such Delinquency, and as often as such Delinquency shall appear, double the Value of each Article * * * , to be recovered by Warrant of Distress from the Commanding Officer * * * : And if such Commanding Officer shall neglect issuing his Warrant * * * he shall forfeit double the Sum due from such Delinquent[.]" "[E]very non-commissioned Officer or Private, who shall refuse or neglect appearing * * * shall pay as a Fine for every Days Neglect not less than Three or exceeding Six Pounds". "[I]n Cases of general Alarm" whoever " shall neglect or refuse appearing * * * armed and accoutred * * * shall forfeit and pay as a Fine * * * the Sum of Thirty Pounds, * * * and Six Pounds per Day, for each and every Day the Troops shall be on Duty in Consequence of said Alarm". "[W]henever the Forces * * * shall be ordered into the Field, and are upon actual Service, * * * who[ever] shall neglect or refuse appearing, armed, accoutred, and provided * * * at the Time and Place of Rendezvous * * * shall forfeit and pay * * * Six Pounds * * * per Day[.]"{EN-669}

• [1780] "[I]f any Person who shall be detached * * * shall absent himself, and not * * * be found, and shall not procure an able-bodied effective Man to do the Duty in his Stead, * * * such a Part of the Estate of the Person so detached shall be taken and disposed of * * * as shall be sufficient to procure an able-bodied Man to do the said Duty[.]"{EN-670}

• [1781] "[E]very Person, liable by Law to do military Duty, who shall refuse or neglect to make his personal Appearance * * * , accoutred as * * * directed, for training or doing other military Duty, shall pay as a Fine for every Default of Non-Appearance the Sum of Nine Shillings * * * for each Day's neglect * * * : That each Person, liable to do military Duty * * * (unless excused by the Town-Council of the Town to which he belongs for Inability to procure the same) who shall at any Time be found destitute of a good Gun, being his own Property, shall pay as a Fine Six Shillings, a Bayonet Three Shillings, * * * a Cartouch-Box Three Shillings, a Ram-Rod Two Shillings, a Wormer One Shilling, a Priming-Wire One Shilling, Three good Flints Three Shillings: All which Fines * * * shall be paid by each Delinquent for each Article deficient * * * .

"AND * * * the Sergeant * * * shall take and distrain sufficient of the personal Estate of the Delinquent * * * to satisfy and pay his Fine or Fines, having first required him to pay the same * * * : [and t]hat in case such Delinquent be under the Age of Twenty-one Years, the Sergeant shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parent or Master of such delinquent Person * * * : And that all Goods taken by Distraint shall be immediately advertised for Sale, and if not redeemed in Ten Days, shall be sold by such Sergeant at public Vendue, to pay such Fine or Fines and Fees[.]"{EN-671}

• [1781] "[I]f any Person belonging to the military Force of this State shall absent himself, in order to elude or evade [his military duty] * * * , or shall refuse to march forward upon being detached, by himself or Substitute, he shall pay the Sum of Nine Pounds Lawful Silver Money per Month, as a Fine[.]" {EN-672}

2. Fines could be remitted, however, on a plea of impoverishment, sickness, inability, force majeure, conscientious objection, or some other reasonable excuse:

• [1666] "[I]t * * * shall be in the power of any two magistrates in each towne, together with the Captain and Lieutenant of the band, or the major part of them, to judge of the excuses of such persons who are defective[.]"{EN-673}

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[E]very Enlisted Person, that shall Refuse or Neglect to make his Personal appearance Accoutred as [required] * * * on * * * Training Days * * * shall for every such Default pay * * * Three Shillings * * * or make his lawful excuse fo the Captain * * * if any he have[.]"{EN-674}

• [1726] "[I]f the * * * delinquent person or persons shall plead that it is against his or their consciences to fight or bear any sort of arms or weapons to defend himself, his interest, and the interest of the colony against a common enemy, and * * * produce * * * a certificate from the congregation and meeting to which he or they do belong * * * then the commander * * * shall acquit and discharge such person or persons from paying any fine or fines[.]"{EN-675} (Rhode Island did not always recognize conscientious objection as a valid excuse, however.[573])

• [1755] "[T]he Captain * * * [may] remit to all Persons their Fines * * * for Neglect of Duty, which shall happen by Means of Poverty, or [on] any other reasonable Excuse[.]"{EN-676}

• [1766] "[I]t shall be in the Power of the Captain * * * to remit any * * * Fines * * * for Neglect of Duty which may happen through Poverty, or on any other reasonable Excuse."{EN-677}

---

[573] See ante, at 271-272.

• [1776] "[A]ll such Persons as are by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box, and who shall not by the Report of * * * the Town-Council be declared incapable of providing themselves * * * do provide themselves * * * under the Penalty of Five Pounds[.]"{EN-678}

• [1777] "[I]n case of sickness and inability to do duty (which alone shall excuse any person), * * * the field officers * * * [may] permit * * * a person to hire a man to do his tour of duty; and if such sick and unable person shall be so extremely poor * * * as to be unable to hire a person in his stead, that such field officer be empowered to remit such poor person's fine."{EN-679}

• [1778] "[A]ll Persons who are by Law obliged to equip themselves with a good Fire-Arm, Bayonet and Cartouch-Box, and who shall not * * * be reported to [the] Town incapable of providing themselves * * * , do provide themselves * * * , or with a Rifle-Gun and Sword * * * , upon the Penalty of Nine Pounds * * * for a Gun, and One Pound and Ten Shillings for a Cartouch-Box * * * . Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend to any Person who shall produce a Certificate * * * that his Gun has been taken from him for public Service, and not accounted for[.]"{EN-680}

• [1779] "Whereas it appears from the late General Muster and Review throughout this State that there are many Deficiencies in Arms, Bayonets, and Cartouch-Boxes; and that, * * * while a Part [of the State] was in Possession of the Enemy, it was very difficult for the Inhabitants to provide themselves agreeable to Law: And whereas * * * the Delinquents are desirous of furnishing themselves as soon as may be: * * * Resolved, That the collecting the Fines * * * be suspended * * * : That all Delinquents, who shall furnish themselves * * * , be exempted from the said Fines[.]"{EN-681}

• [1779] "[E]very non-commissioned Officer or Private, who shall refuse or neglect appearing when warned * * * shall pay as a Fine for every Days Neglect not less than Three nor exceeding Six Pounds, at the Discretion of the Field-Officers, unless he shall render to them a sufficient Excuse[.]"{EN-682}

• [1781] "[E]very Person, liable by Law to do military Duty, who shall refuse or neglect to make his personal Appearance * * * for training or doing other military Duty, shall pay * * * a Fine for every Default * * * unless he shall make a sufficient Excuse to the commanding Officer of the Company"; and "each Person liable to do military Duty * * * (unless excused by the Town-Council * * * for Inability to procure the same) who shall at any Time be found destitute of a good Gun, being his own Property, shall pay * * * a Fine[.]"{EN-683}

B. Other penalties and punishments. In addition to fines and attendant seizures of their property, defaulters could face compulsory labor, imprisonment, conscription into service with the regular Armed Forces, loss of their commissions in the Militia, or other "pains and penalties".

1. Examples of these include:

• [1718, 1730, and 1744] "[I]n case such Persons * * * delinquent * * * shall have no Personal Estate * * * to satisfy * * * Fines * * * the Captain of [the delinquent's Militia] Company, shall set such delinquent Person to work, in mending the Highways of [that Person's] Town, not exceeding one Day for each Fine; and if such defective Person shall refuse to do the same, then the Captain * * * shall commit such Offenders to Prison, twenty-four Hours, or wait further to take his Estate by Distraint."{EN-684}

• [1744] "[A]fter an Alarm is beaten in any Town in this Colony, no Man whatsoever shall leave or go out of said Town so alarmed, but by Leave or Order from the Commanding Officer there, upon the Penalty of paying * * * One Hundred Pounds * * * ; and in case any Person shall not have sufficient Estate to pay the same, then such Person shall be committed to Goal * * * for the Space of Six Month, or else shall be sent to the Fort, there to serve the Colony as a Soldier for the Space of Six Months[.]"{EN-685}

• [1756] "[W]hen any Person under the Age of twenty-one Years, shall neglect or refuse to pay his Fine for Neglect of military Duty, the Clerk shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parents or Masters of such Persons; and for Want of such Goods and Chattels, to commit such delinquent Persons to Goal, until his Fines be paid; and where no personal Estate can be found, of any Person of Age, neglecting military Duty, the Clerk is * * * impowered to commit such Person to * * * Gaol[.]"{EN-686}

• [1766] "And for Want of sufficient Estate, Goods and Chattels of any Delinquent, to satisfy and pay * * * the * * * Clerk shall commit him to His Majesty's Gaol in the County, there to remain until such Fine or Fines be paid. And in Case such Delinquent be under the Age of Twenty-one Years, the Clerk shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parents or Masters of such Delinquent Persons, and for Want of such Goods and Chattels, to commit such Delinquent to Gaol[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [A]fter an Alarm is beaten * * * , no Man whosoever shall leave or go out of * * * Town * * * but by Leave or Order from the commanding Officer there, upon the Penalty of paying * * * Twelve Pounds; * * * and in Case any Person shall not have sufficient Estate to pay the same, then such Person shall be committed to Gaol * * * and there continue for the Space of Six Months, or else shall be sent to the Fort, there to serve the Colony as a Soldier for the Space of Six Months[.]"{EN-687}

• [1776] "[A]t the late alarm, when the militia and alarm-men, of this state, were ordered into service, many of them neglected or refused to appear; and of those who did appear, many absented themselves without leave, and deserted the service; which misconduct is not only of evil example and destructive of due order and discipline, but of the greatest ill consequence to the general safety; and therefore merits a particular attention,—

" * * * [T]he Governor * * * is * * * advised to issue his orders * * * to the colonels and field officers * * * , ordering and directing them to call courts martial within their respective counties, who shall have before them, hear, try, and pass upon, all persons within their regiments, offending, as aforesaid; and inflict such pains and penalties upon the offenders, as the said courts shall judge adequate to their offences, agreeably to the martial and military laws in force, in this state, at the time they committed the same."{EN-688}

• [1779] "[I]n Cases of general Alarm * * * , whatever Officer * * * shall neglect or refuse appearing at the Alarm-Post * * * , armed and accoutred * * * shall * * * forfeit his Commission[.]"{EN-689}

• [1780] "[I]f any Person who shall be detached * * * shall absent himself * * * and shall not procure an able-bodied effective Man to do the Duty in his Stead, * * * such a Part of the Estate of the Person so detached shall be taken and disposed of * * * as shall be sufficient to procure an able-bodied Man to do the said Duty * * * : That if such Person * * * shall not be possessed of a sufficient Estate for that Purpose, the Commanding-Officer of the Regiment to which he belongs shall advertise, in all the public News-Papers of this State, the Person * * * as a Delinquent, and offer a Reward of Three Hundred Pounds * * * to the Person or Persons who shall apprehend such Delinquent: That upon such Delinquent being apprehended, the said Officer is directed to deliver him to some One of the Officers of the * * * Continental Battalions to do Duty as a Soldier therein, for the Space of One Year[.]"{EN-690}

• [1780] "[T]he Delinquents in the last general Alarm, who were bound by Law to appear at the Places of Parade, shall furnish Recruits for Three Years, or during the War, in the following Proportions, to wit: every Twelve Delinquents shall furnish One Recruit[.]"{EN-691}

• [1781] "[I]f any Person belonging to the military Force of this State shall absent himself, in order to elude or evade [being drafted] * * * , or shall refuse to march forward, upon being detached, by himself or Substitute, he shall be sent forward to the Continental Army, to do Duty for Six Months, in the Rhode-Island Battalion, as a common Soldier[.]"{EN-692}

> • [1781] "[F]or Want of sufficient Estate, Goods and Chattels, of any Delinquent, to satisfy and pay [a fine] * * * , then * * * [the] Sergeant shall commit him to the public Gaol in the County, there to remain until such Fine or Fines be paid: That in case such Delinquent be under the Age of Twenty-one Years, the Sergeant shall make Distress upon the Goods and Chattels of the Parent or Master of such delinquent Person; and for Want of such Goods and Chattels, shall commit such delinquent Person to Gaol[.]"{EN-693}

2. Penalties harsher than fines could also be reduced to less onerous service or simply to fines, as occurred in 1781:

> WHEREAS by [certain] Act[s] of this Assembly * * * the Men who were called forth * * * to do the * * * Month's Tour of Duty, and refused or neglected to do the same, in Person or by Substitute, were directed to be sent forward to the Continental Army, to do Duty as common Soldiers for the Space of Six Months: And whereas a Number of Persons in this State did neglect to do Duty * * * , Part of whom have not as yet been sent forward * * * : And this Assembly being willing to mitigate the Penalty by the said Acts inflicted,
>
> * * * [I]t is Enacted, That * * * each and every such Delinquent, who hath not been sent forward, * * * shall pay as a Fine the Sum of Nine Pounds Lawful Silver Money * * * : And that in case any Delinquent * * * shall not have sufficient Estate to pay such Fine, he shall be sent forward to Newport, to do Duty as a common Soldier with the Militia of this State, for a Term of Two Months.{EN-694}

C. Fines and other penalties taken seriously. The seriousness with which Rhode Island's legislators dealt with the subject-matter of these enactments is evidenced by—

1. The universality of the statutes' requirements. First, they extended (among other equivalent verbal formulae) to "every inhabitant", "each Person" and "every Person", "all Male Persons", and "every man" eligible for various types of Militia service. Second, they encompassed "each and every day's neglect" and "every Default", "as often as such Delinquency shall appear". Thus, they allowed no able-bodied free male between the ages of sixteen and sixty to escape compliance, or punishment for noncompliance, on any occasion or in any detail, except for some good and sufficient reason.

2. The particularity of the statutes' requirements. First, they covered every Militia activity from "Training Days" to "any Alarm in time of War or other imminent Danger of any Assault or Invasion", or "other special occasions when the militia are in arms". Second, they included every type of Militia equipment, from generic references to "Arms", "Ammunition", and "Accoutrements"; through itemization of such things as "bulletts", "lead", "bagganette", "cotouch box", "bandalears", "Ram-Rod", "Wormer", and "Priming-Wire"; to the pointed specification of "good Gunpowder", "bullets, fit for his piece", "good Flints", a "good bayonet fixed on his gun", "a Cartouch Box, ready filled with Cartridges of Powder and Ball", "one good gun or muskitt fit for service", and "a good Gun, being his own Property". Third, they specified fines or other punishments for each and every kind of default, such as "not duely attending the trainings", failing "to appear in armes, compleat" at training, and any "neglect of duty on training days"; "non-appearance or neglect in any alarum", or "not appear[ing] complete in arms"; "not [being] provided with Arms and Ammunition", with specific penalties "for each Article of Accoutrement * * * [a Militiaman] shall be deficient in, for every Time he shall be unprovided"; not having "defective" arms "mended"; and, for those excused from training, not being "provided with the same Arms, Ammunition, &c. as * * * is required of such as are obliged to Train". Thus, nothing was left to mere implication, let alone to chance.

3. The severity of the statutes' requirements. The fines Rhode Island assessed against defaulters for various infractions of her Militia laws ranged from four pence to thirty pounds, with many from one to twelve shillings. Leaving aside the possibility that not a few imaginable violations could have resulted in several fines being assessed simultaneously (as when a Militiamen appeared for training without more than one piece of necessary equipment), even the smaller fines by themselves may have been difficult for many average Rhode Islanders to satisfy on individual occasions, because the Colonists throughout America always complained of a dearth of coinage in circulation (which is why Rhode Island emitted "bills of credit", as paper currency was called in those days, even to a dangerous excess not matched in any other part of New England).[574] In any event, the statutes themselves evidence that, throughout the pre-constitutional period, Rhode Islanders in significant numbers apparently could ill afford to pay—otherwise, no necessity would have arisen explicitly to provide by law for distraint and sale of defaulters' goods, or (in the absence of merchantable goods) their imprisonment or consignment to labor gangs. By the mid-1770s, the wages of a typical laborer might have averaged about two to three pounds per week, while the price of a serviceable musket fitted with a bayonet might have been up to twice that amount.[575] So, not just a few individuals who lacked regular employment must have been simply too impoverished both to purchase their required Militia firearms and to pay the fines that would have accrued against them as a result of remaining unsupplied. Which explains why Rhode Island's laws made allowance for individuals who were unable to comply "by Means of Poverty", to the point of providing such people with firearms at taxpayers' expense. This policy not only was prudent, because it aimed at equipping the maximum number of Militiamen, but also exemplified the social solidarity which lay at the base of the whole conception of the Militia. The duty of near-universal service engendered a corresponding obligation on the part of those individuals who were relatively well off economically to subsidize their poorer compatriots.

---

[574] See, e.g., E. Vieira, Jr., Pieces of Eight, ante note 39, Volume 1, at 67-90.

[575] See, e.g., R. Ketchum, Decisive Day, ante note 310, at 62; M. Stephenson, Patriot Battles, ante note 464, at 120.

To be sure, some rich individuals might have chosen to pay fines rather than obtain firearms and ammunition, appear for training, or perform other Militia duties. This, however, would not have denied, but instead would have proven, the existence and efficacy of those legal duties, inasmuch as fines were the statutorily mandated alternatives to personal performance. Thus, the very payment of fines amounted to recognition and enforcement of the duties. Moreover, the ability of some Rhode Islanders in effect to purchase exemptions from Militia service in those particulars apparently never caused significant concern, because that procedure was consistently followed throughout the *pre-*constitutional period. If the imposition of fines to enforce compliance had not to a satisfactory degree ensured that the underlying duties were actually performed by a sufficient number of individuals, other means would have been employed.

4. The sparsity of excuses for noncompliance with the statutes' requirements. Although the statutes often flexibly tempered justice with mercy, by allowing officials the discretion to take into account any "reasonable Excuse" or "sufficient Excuse", the excuses they did explicitly recognize all derived from circumstances largely beyond a defaulter's control—including "Poverty"; "sickness and inability to do duty"; inability to produce a firearm because "his Gun ha[d] been taken from him for public Service, and not accounted for"; or because he had lived in "a Part [of the State that] was in Possession of the Enemy"—and conscientious objection, although only with a bona fide "certificate from the congregation or meeting to which he * * * belong[ed]". Certainly very few men would likely have chosen lifelong poverty in an attempt to avoid their Militia duties; and true conscientious objection derived from the inflexible higher duty to put God's law ahead of man's. Sometimes, too, even what would appear to have been the best of excuses were only grudgingly accepted. For example, in 1713 one John Gavet "petition[ed] the [General] Assembly to be released and acquitted from martial discipline, by reason of an incurable lameness in one of his feet, he having been cleared in Boston, for said impotencies". But, unswayed by the opinions of mere Bostonians, the Assembly ruled that Gavet "shall be * * * acquitted and discharged * * * from all manner of martial discipline, alarms only excepted".{EN-695}

D. Difficulties in enforcement. As strict as it was, Rhode Island's system of fines and other penalties for noncompliance with her Militia statutes was not free from practical difficulties, vicissitudes, and frictions. In the 1830s, Justice Joseph Story warned that, although > the importance of a well-regulated militia would seem so undeniable, it cannot be disguised that, among the American people, there is a growing indifference to any system of militia discipline, and a strong disposition, from a sense of its burdens, to be rid of all regulations. How it is practicable to keep the people duly armed without some organization it is difficult to see. There is certainly no small danger that indifference may lead to disgust, and disgust to contempt; and thus gradually undermine all the protection intended by th[e Second Amendment.][576]

Story's concern that the people themselves might lose sight of the importance of, then seek excuses for shirking, their Militia duties was not simply the product of observations in his own time, but was well-founded in pre-constitutional history, too.

As early as 1664, Rhode Island's officials complained of "the great neglect and defficiency in the vse of the military exercise in most townes in this Collony" and "the danger, reproach, and other inconveniancyes lying vpon, or lyckly to ensue vnto the whole in that neglecte".{EN-696} And in 1665, the General Assembly took into its > consideration the great defect in training, occasioned by the remissnes of some vnder the pretence of the burden in training soe often as eight dayes in the yeare, and other complaining of the great inequality, in that the poorest being vnable to spare wherewith to maintaine armes and amunition, as powder, &c., yett are forced by the law to beare armes as well as the most able; to redresse which grevances, it is enacted and declared, that the sixe dayes only in the yeare be ordered * * * for the milletary exercise in training * * * . And for the incorradgement of the meaner sort [that is, the poor], there shall be alowed yearly nine shillings in currant pay to or for each soldiare listed in the traine band to be duely payed * * * at the Captain's discretion for the repaireing of armes, &c. * * * and * * * nine shillings yearly to be payed * * * to such parents and masters as find armes and amunition (as they must doe) for their sones and sarvants that are * * * to traine; * * * and for the raysing the * * * nine shillings a yeare for each souldier, * * * each towne shall * * * make a rate [that is, levy a tax] vpon each one rateable within the precinckes of the towne, with as much equality as may be, according to each ones estate[.]{EN-697}

---

[576] Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (Boston, Massachusetts: Little, Brown, and Company, Fifth Edition, 1905), Volume 2, § 1897, at 646 (footnote omitted).

Apparently, however, this indulgent approach was not entirely successful, because in 1666, > upon a petition presented by the commaunders and officers of the trayne band of the towne of Newport, and also upon the searious consideration of the great neglect of the due exicution of the enacted lawes of this Collony concerninge the militia, for the pennaltys of persons not attendinge the service of the millitary exercise according to law, is not duly taken by reason that the power of judging and takinge fines, is placed in such persons as either cannot or will not performe the same, the neglect whereof is licke to be an occasion of the ruin of the millitary exercise throughout the whole Collony, if not timely prevented. Vpon the consideration whereof, * * * [the General Assembly] declared * * * it * * * in the power of any two magistrates in each towne, together with the Captain and Lieutenant of the band, or the major part of them, to judge of the excuses of such persons who are defective; which being judged, * * * to graunt forth warrant * * * to take by distraynt the fine or fines of such person or persons who shall be defective in non-appearance[.]{EN-698}

Thereafter, problems of this sort persisted throughout the *pre-*constitutional era:

> • [1702] Although a statute of 1677 had provided "that there should be six training days in the year", "th[e General] Assembly * * * finding it to be a great burden to the poor in losing much time * * * therefore enacted * * * That * * * there shall be but four training days in one year".{EN-699}
>
> • [1726] "[T]his Assembly being advised that through the dissatisfaction and discontent of His Majesty's good subjects in the choice and election of commissioned officers, to lead and conduct them, and the smallness of the fine on delinquents, the militia is of late visibly declining, not only to the scandal and reproach of the government, but also to the imminent danger thereof * * * should it be invaded or assaulted by a common enemy;—
>
> "Be it therefore enacted * * * that the several * * * companies or trained bands * * * shall * * * meet together under military arms, * * * with the freemen within the limits of each band, and * * * shall nominate and elect a captain, [and other officers] * * * , by the Governor and council to be approbated and confirmed; without the Governor and council shall see just cause to reject or disapprove of any one or more of them * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> "And * * * for the further encouragement * * * of His Majesty's good subjects in this colony, as have a regard to the honor and interest of the same, and constantly do observe and attend upon their duty, and for bringing of such as contemn the same, and have little regard, if any, to good order and discipline to conformity * * *

"Do enact * * * that the penalty upon such person who is within the lists of any company or train band * * * , for his neglect of duty on training days * * * that he shall hereafter pay a fine of five shillings * * * for each neglect; and the penalty on each person that is obliged to appear on alarms or other special occasions when the militia are in arms, or upon duty, shall be a fine of ten shillings for each neglect of duty[.]"{EN-700}

• [1745] "WHEREAS the several Companies of the Militia, or train'd Bands, in this Colony, being obliged to muster four Times a Year in Time of War, is found to be of ill Consequence in sundry Respects,

"IT is therefore Voted and Enacted, That for the future, the said Companies, or train'd Bands, shall be obliged to muster but twice a Year in Time of War, as well as in Time of Peace[.]"{EN-701}

• [1755] "WHEREAS the several Fines for Neglect of Military Duty are found by Experience to be too low;

"*BE it * * * Enacted*, That the fines of every inlisted Soldier * * * not provided with Arms and Ammunition according to Law, be augmented to Three Shillings for every Defect in each Article of Accoutrements, and of every Person excused from Training, for not being provided * * * , the Fines be augmented to Five Shillings for every Defect * * * ; and of every inlisted Soldier neglecting or refusing to appear accoutred * * * upon Training Days, the Fine be augmented to Forty Shillings per Day; and of all Persons not appearing upon an Alarm, who are obliged thereto, * * * the Fine be augmented to Eight Pounds[.]"{EN-702}

• [1776] As the Governor of Rhode Island reported to General George Washington, "[f]or many past years, the inhabitants of this colony * * * thought themselves in a perfect state of security, and entirely neglected military discipline; and disposed of their arms so generally, that at the breaking out of the present war, the colony was in a manner disarmed.

"We have taken every method in our power, by purchasing, by employing manufacturers, and by importation, to procure a sufficient quantity, but are still so deficient, that the same arms which have been rated at $6 and $8, at Cambridge, are readily bought here ar $10 and $12. We shall scarcely be able to find arms for the troops we have ordered to be raised for our immediate defence. Besides which, the peculiar situation of the colony requires that every man in it should be provided.

"And the Assembly have accordingly ordered that every man should be furnished by the 15th day of April next, under severe penalties."{EN-703}

Of course, this cycle of complacency and sloth fueled by narrow self-interest—sometimes brigaded with genuine grievances over fair representation in the choice of leaders and equality of burdens in the performance of duties—followed by pressure for rejuvenation as dire circumstances developed, was not confined to Rhode Island's Militia. After the French and Indian War ended in 1763, the Colonists in neighboring Massachusetts, too, began to take their Militia duties less seriously than before. Regular musters become occasions more for socializing than for serious training in marching, maneuvering, and other orthodox military exercises. Yet many Militiamen still drilled in marksmanship and the maintenance of firearms, and engaged in mock engagements in the Indian-fighting style of Rogers' Rangers.[577] By 1774, however, as the urgency of the situation dawned on the Colonists, revitalization of their Militia proceeded apace.[578]

If, during the *pre-*constitutional period, some Rhode Islanders were captious in their criticism of the Militia system, and negligent in fulfillment of their Militia duties; and if some public officials were sometimes inclined overly to indulge their constituents, rather than to inculcate in the public's mind the necessity of the system and its duties; nonetheless Rhode Island's Militia did perdure substantially unchanged for generations. Its utility so outweighed its inconveniences as to render it, not merely expedient, but indispensable—as proven by the facts that: (i) *pre-*constitutional Rhode Island never did dispense with her Militia, even during the direst moments of the War of Independence; and (ii) thereafter, the Founding Fathers incorporated "the Militia of the several States", as they then existed, into the Constitution as permanent components of the federal system.[579] That is, the Militia were considered so important—as the Second Amendment declares, "necessary to the security of a free State"—that the institutions and the law providing for them were elevated from the merely statutory to the constitutional plane, notwithstanding the manifest difficulties Americans had experienced in fully enforcing compliance with Militia duty.

Or, perhaps, to some degree because of them. After all, a healthy skepticism of and resistance to needlessly burdensome Militia regulations on the part of the people themselves constitute effective "checks and balances" against overreaching by rogue public officials. Membership in the Militia is, always has been, and must be compulsory. But, at the same time, the primary responsibility of the Militia is "to execute the Laws", either of the Union when "call[ed] forth" for that purpose,[580] or of the States at all times—and even "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" in

---

[577] See, e.g., Gary Zaboly, American Colonial Ranger: The Northern Colonies 1724-64 (Oxford, England: Osprey Publishing Ltd., 2004).

[578] See J. Galvin, The Minute Men, ante note 543, at 60-61.

[579] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II.

[580] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

the most serious circumstances.[581] So, inasmuch as overly burdensome regulations may actually violate some of these "Laws", or tend towards a violation, they should be opposed—lest, by acquiescing therein, the Militia might defeat their own purpose.

E. Fines as evidence that Militiamen's firearms were a special form of private property. Their problems of enforcement aside, the fines Rhode Island imposed on individuals (other than those sunk in poverty) who were not provided with firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements suitable for Militia service confirmed two matters—

1. The system of fines established that most of such equipment was Rhode Islanders' personal property which they maintained in their personal possession at all times, not public property the use of which the government allowed them only under certain limited circumstances.

a. Members of the Militia in the Trained Bands were fined if they did not bring firearms and ammunition with them to their days of training. Under some circumstances, this would have been grossly unjust—indeed, utterly senseless—if throughout the rest of the year the equipment had been kept in armories or magazines, under the care of public custodians, to be passed out only at the time of training, and thereafter retrieved again for storage. Under those conditions, if anyone should have been fined for a Militiaman's default in appearing without arms, it should have been the custodian who failed to ensure that the Militiaman left the armory or magazine fully equipped (unless somehow a Militiamen who had been equipped at the armory nonetheless appeared unequipped in the field). But Rhode Island's Militia laws made no provision for fining custodians of armories or magazines for such official derelictions of duty—because they made no provision at all for such custodial duties, or even for such custodians.

b. All members of the Militia, including those on the Alarm List and in the Senior Class who were not required to attend training, were fined if, upon inspection, they proved to be without the requisite firearms and ammunition in good order and ready at hand in their own homes. Plainly, for such fines to have been just, or even rational, these individuals must have labored under a duty personally to possess the arms at all times. Otherwise, when an inspector appeared, a Militiaman would have had to repair to an armory, retrieve a firearm, return to his home, satisfy the inspector, and then surrender the firearm to the armory's custodian until the next inspection—with the Militiaman subject to a fine if the custodian refused to supply him with a firearm in proper repair! Actually, not only would the imposition of a fine on a Militiaman have been unfair if he had been unable to obtain possession from some public armory of the firearm assigned to him, but even the entire requirement of inspection of the Militiaman's home would have been absurd. Much more sensible would have been for the inspection to be conducted at the armory, where the custodian would have exhibited the firearms in his care to the inspectors, indicating which of the arms according to his records were to handed out to which Militiamen when the need arose. As no such inspections of public armories or interrogations of their custodians were ever mandated in Rhode Island's Militia laws, it obviously was never the case that Militiamen's arms in any significant numbers were sequestered in such establishments.

---

[581] See Declaration of Independence.

2. The system of fines also proved that firearms, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements not only were most Rhode Islanders' personal property, but also were very special forms of private property. For most of the other personal chattels individuals owned could be seized and sold at public auction to pay their fines. Thus, by holding almost all of the rest of each such individual's personal chattels hostage to his compliance with the requirement that he possess a firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements, the Militia laws elevated private property in those items above private property in almost all other personal chattels.

Of course, this should also have meant that firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements for use in the Militia could not have been taken by distraint from a debt-strapped Militiaman in aid of his private creditors, whose claims could not have been superior to the Militia's. Rhode Island's statutes did not explicitly recognize such an exemption. (Virginia's, however, did.[582]) Nonetheless, both legal precedent and the economic consequences of the situation compel the conclusion that such an exemption was necessarily implicit in Rhode Island's (and every other Colony's) laws.

a. "[T]he antient common law" always immunized from distraint "a man's tools and utensils of his trade * * * which [were] said to be privileged for the sake of the public, because the taking them away would disable the owner from serving the commonwealth in his station".[583] To have seized a debtor's firearm—the most important "tool[ ] and utensil[ ] of his trade" in "his station" within the Militia—would have prevented him from fulfilling his public duty to defend the community, which by any calculus must have taken (and must still take) priority over the payment of a merely private monetary obligation.

b. If the individual's firearm had been seized in consequence of a private debt that he had remained unable to satisfy, he could then have honestly pled a combination of impossibility and impoverishment as an excuse for not fulfilling his

---

[582] See post, at 715-717.

[583] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 9.

Militia duty thereafter. At that point, either the Militia itself or a Local government would have provided him with another firearm—in effect, using public funds to secure the creditor's claim by facilitating his retention of the debtor's own firearm as security for its payment. Thus removing a firearm from its intended use would have sacrificed part the common defense to serve a purely private purpose.

c. Obviously, too, an individual's firearm could never have been seized and sold, as Rhode Island's statutes allowed where other personal chattels were concerned, to satisfy some fine an individual incurred for a default in Militia service. As Blackstone explained, "perhaps the true reason, why * * * the tools of a man's trade were privileged [from distraint] at the common law, was because the distress was * * * merely intended to compel the payment of the [debt], and not as a satisfaction for it's nonpayment: and therefore, to deprive the party of the instruments and means of paying it, would counteract the very end of the distress".[584] This reasoning, however, would have excluded seizure and sale of a defaulter's firearm, because to satisfy an impecunious individual's fine by depriving him of the very thing necessary to avoid some future fine, thus guaranteeing that fine's imposition, would "counteract the very end" of the statute that men should possess firearms and thereby avoid fines, not be dispossessed of firearms and thereby incur fines.

---

[584] Id. (footnote omitted).

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Rhode Island's pre-constitutional Militia statutes embodied the antitheses of modern-day "gun control".

No greater contrast could be imagined than that between Rhode Island's pre-constitutional Militia Acts and related laws, on the one hand, and contemporary "gun control", on the other. Inasmuch as today's "gun controllers" aim ultimately at disarming everyone except members of the regular Armed Forces, para-military police departments, and quasi-civilian governmental agencies that ostensibly exercise powers of "law enforcement", their handiwork could not be more obviously and obnoxiously at odds with Rhode Island's Militia laws—and, as well, the Militia laws of almost every other pre-constitutional Colony and then of every independent State. For those laws uniformly required—just as their principles embodied in the Constitution still require—that every able-bodied adult male (and, today, perhaps every able-bodied adult female as well), not a conscientious objector, be personally possessed at all times of firearms at least equivalent to the types carried by modern light infantry and para-military police. The same stark dichotomy exists between the pre-constitutional Militia Acts and the techniques "gun controllers" now employ to approach their goal incrementally, including:

- extensive regulation of the types of firearms, ammunition, and related equipment that individuals may possess;
- pervasive controls over private commerce in firearms and ammunition that are not applicable to the manufacture of and trade in other commodities—so that no truly free market in arms exists;
- ever-expanding limitations on the possession and use of firearms and ammunition that supposedly reflect concerns for "public safety"; all contributing to
- step-by-step disarmament of one group after another.

A. Disarming individuals an exceptional practice. In pre-constitutional Rhode Island, laws that arbitrarily and aggressively disarmed particular groups of people were vanishingly few in number.

1. None of her Militia statutes, for instance, explicitly excluded individuals on the ground of their prior convictions for crimes.[585] And although the Militia laws

---

[585] See ante, at 272-274.

as applied would probably have exempted from service individuals suffering from serious mental disabilities, no statutes explicitly disbarred such people in general from possessing firearms.[586]

2. During periods of warfare, though, Rhode Islanders enacted legislation aimed specifically at disarming the enemies they found amongst them. In 1667, it was > ordered, that the Indians residing upon the Island [of Rhode Island] shall bee forthwith disarmed of all sorts of armes, and that the Captain and militarie officers meeting with any Indian armed, they are authorized to seize the armes, and * * * are to search and seize any armes to them belonging; and the said armes wherever so seyzed, to bee delivered to the Governor or some Magistrate, that so they may bee safely kept, and at his or their discretion to bee restored. It is also left to the Magistrates of Providence and Warwick to do as they shall think meet, as referring to disarming the Indians among them.{EN-704}

In 1669,

> [t]he Councill being sencible of the present fears, occasioned by the report of the combination of the Indians against the English, and seeing it necessary to put the Colony in aposture of defence, doe therefore heerby recommend itto the care of each respective Towne Councill in the Colony * * * that they make speedy and diligent provision for * * * seizing the armes of Indians that are in the hands of the English[.]{EN-705}

And in 1776, the General Assembly determined that,

> [w]hereas, the great danger to which this colony is exposed, makes it necessary to use every measure for detecting those persons among us, who are inimical to the United Colonies, and preventing their doing injury to the common cause,—
>
> * * * it is enacted, that all the male inhabitants of this colony, of sixteen years of age and upwards, who shall be suspected of being inimical to the United American Colonies, and the arduous struggle in which they are engaged, against the force of Great Britain, shall make and subscribe the follow declaration, or test, to wit:
>
> Declaration of Test, to be made by suspected persons in the Colony, relative to the War with Great Britain

---

[586] This may have been because most individuals with such conditions did not live alone, but were under the care and control of family members.

> "I * * * do solemnly and sincerely declare, that I believe the war, resistance and opposition, in which the United American Colonies are now engaged, against the fleets and armies of Great Britain, is on the part of the said colonies just and necessary; and that I will not, directly or indirectly, afford assistance of any sort or kind, whatever, to the said fleets and armies, during the continuance of the present war; but that I will heartily assist in the defence of the United Colonies."
>
> And be it further enacted * * * , that in case any such suspected person shall refuse to subscribe the same, * * * and if [upon being summoned and interrogated] he shall continue such refusal, without giving satisfactory reasons * * * , or shall refuse to appear upon being summoned, * * * [a] warrant [shall be issued], directed to the sheriff of the county * * * , commanding him * * * to make strict and diligent search for all arms, ammunition, and warlike stores, belonging to such persons so refusing, and to take deliver the same to the captain of the company of militia in whose district the delinquent shall live, to be made use of in time of an alarm, taking a receipt of the captain, therefor; which arms, ammunition and warlike stores, shall be appraised * * * and be paid for out of the general treasury.{EN-706}

Of no little moment, however, although many Indians in the 1600s were openly hostile to the Colonists, in not a few instances the arms seized from them were nonetheless "to be delivered to the Governor or some Magistrate, that so they may be safely kept, and at his or their discretion to be restored". Similarly, although those who refused to disavow disloyal affections were deprived of "all arms, ammunition, and warlike stores", they were nevertheless fully compensated for their losses "out of the general treasury". Under the circumstances, this was a fair and measured policy, inasmuch as egregiously disloyal inhabitants of Rhode Island might have suffered confiscation of all of their property, as well as death.[587]

B. Controlling traffic in firearms. Throughout the *pre-*constitutional era, Rhode Island did rather extensively regulate traffic in firearms, ammunition, and related accoutrements.

1. In statute after statute, the General Assembly specified the types of arms and related equipment her inhabitants were not simply allowed (because allowance was never at issue), but rather required, to possess—for the express purpose of thoroughly arming as many as possible with arms equivalent to those the regular armed forces of the day carried. Never did Rhode Island enact, or apparently even contemplate, a statute that outlawed or even seriously inhibited private trade in or possession of any military-grade firearm available at that time by her loyal and law-abiding residents. The salient purpose and effect of Rhode Island's *pre-*constitutional

---

[587] See post, at 301.

Militia laws was, not to suppress or even inhibit a free market in arms, but to rely upon and promote it, by requiring every adult able-bodied free male who could afford to do so to purchase in private commerce firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for his Militia service.[588] Thus, political liberty and economic freedom were integrated in perhaps the most direct manner possible.

2. Of course, from time to time, Rhode Island did rigidly control traffic in arms with her inhabitants' enemies. Indians were the Colonists' first antagonists. In 1642, legislators > ordered, that if any Person or Persons shall sell, give, deliver, or any other wayes convey any Powder, Shott, Gunn, Pistoll, Sword, or any other Engine of Warr, to the Indians that are, or may prove offensive to this State or to any Member thereof, he or they for the first offence * * * shall forfeit the sum of forty shillings; and for the second offence * * * shall forfeit five pounds[.]{EN-707}

In 1647, legislators expanded on this prohibition, such that > if any person or persons, shall sell, give, deliver, or any otherwayes convey any powder, shott, lead, gunn, pistoll, sword, dagger, halberd or pike to the Indians that are or may prove offensive to this Colonie, or any member thereof, he or they, for the first offence, shall forfeit y^{e} sum of five pounds; and for his second offence * * * shall forfeit ten pounds * * * . And it is further ordered, that if any person shall mend or repaire their Guns, * * * he shall forfeit the same penaltie.{EN-708}

And in 1650, they sought to expose evasions of the law, by directing that, > if in case of prohibitions (as concerning gunnes, powder, lead, &c.): it being proved that such and such, or any one had a gunn, &c.; or the Solicitor bona fide, in his owne knowledg, doe knowe and can sware, &c.; that such a one was posest of a gunn, &c., as his owne proper goods, and upon demand of the Solicitor cannot produce, or will not give a good account what is become of it, * * * he shall be judged guiltie of breach of the lawe * * * ; and that the lawe shall extend to enquirie especially of gunnes and other prohibitions, as powder, shott, leade, wine or liquors that hath been merchandized or convayed away to the Indians[.]{EN-709}

These restrictions plainly did not infringe upon any "right of the people to keep and bear Arms" (as the Second Amendment later summarized and codified the legal principle involved), because: (i) the individuals the statute targeted were not "keep[ing] and bear[ing]" the interdicted "Arms" themselves for their own lawful uses, but instead transferring them to others for those others' unlawful uses ; and (ii) no rational constitution would ever license individuals to deliver their own or any other "Arms" to the people's enemies in time of war.

---

[588] See ante, Chapters 6 through 9.

3. Later, the War of Independence exposed domestic enemies. In 1775, the General Assembly declared that

> WHEREAS the Ministry of Great-Britain have * * * steadily pursued a Plan for subjecting the Inhabitants of the British Colonies in America to an absolute unconditional State of Slavery; and have proceeded at length to the burning of our Towns, and spreading Desolation and Slaughter, as far as it hath been in their Power, through the Country, in a Manner totally inconsistent with the Practice of civilized Nations, and unworthy of the Reputation formerly sustained by British troops: And whereas the aforesaid Colonies have been reduced to the fatal Necessity of taking up Arms, in Defence of those inestimable Rights and Liberties, which they derive from the unerring Laws of Nature, and the fundamental Principles of the British Constitution; and which they cannot resign but with their Lives: And whereas several of the Inhabitants of the said Colonies, lost to every generous Sentiment of Liberty, of Love to their Country, and Posterity, have kept up a traitorous Correspondence with and supplied the ministerial Troops and Navy * * * whereby the Safety and Liberties of the said Colonies may be greatly endangered.
>
> BE it therefore Enacted * * * , That if any of the Inhabitants of the said Colonies, within this Colony, or any of the Inhabitants of this Colony, within any other Colony, shall be found guilty of holding a dangerous Correspondence with the Ministry of Great-Britain, * * * or of supplying the ministerial Army or Navy, that now is or may be employed in America against the United Colonies, with Provisions, Cannon, Arms, Ammunition, warlike or naval Stores, * * * he or they so offending shall suffer the Pains of Death, as in Cases of Felony, and shall forfeit his Lands, Goods and Chattels, to the Colony[.] {EN-710}

Again, no "right of the people to keep and bear Arms" was insulted by this prohibition and the punishments its violation incurred, because the individuals subject to them, in league with an hostile foreign power, were "endanger[ing]" Rhode Island's "Safety and Liberties", and thereby what the Second Amendment later called "the security of a free State".

Interestingly, the premiss of this statute did not sound in any novel and abstract "right of revolution", but rather in a practical judgment, based upon a political philosophy of long standing, that "the Ministry of Great-Britain"—because it had "steadily pursued a Plan for subjecting the Inhabitants of the British Colonies in America to an absolute unconditional State of Slavery"—had forfeited its authority as the legitimate government of Rhode Island (or of any among "the United Colonies"), whereupon that authority reverted to the people themselves. Thus, rather than asserting a "right of revolution" against usurpers and tyrants who could put forward no just claim to the people's allegiance in any event, Rhode Islanders relied upon a "right of restoration" that returned the exercise of sovereign powers to its true source and ultimate executors: the people themselves.[589] Otherwise, the statute could not rightfully have denounced those individuals who "kept up a traitorous Correspondence with and supplied the ministerial Troops and Navy".

Thus, in this case (as in all others) such limitations on traffic in firearms as Rhode Island enforced during *pre-*constitutional times did not threaten her people's sovereignty, but instead recognized, safeguarded, and effectuated it—in contrast to "gun control" of the modern variety, which whether by accident or design invariably undermines it, typically for purposes not directed to "the common good" (in the Constitution's phrase, "the general Welfare") at all, and inevitably in derogation of the Constitution's purpose to "provide for the common defence".[590]

C. Perfecting the free market in arms. Where maintaining quality and providing full disclosure were concerned, though, *pre-*constitutional legislation in Rhode Island moved on a track parallel to some contemporary regulations that reach commerce in firearms. In 1776, for instance, the General Assembly declared

> [t]hat if any Person or Persons, within this State, shall vend or expose to Sale any Gunpowder, manufactured within the same, unless said Gunpowder be packed in a good dry Cask, marked with the two first Letters of the Manufacturer's Name, and hath been examined and approved by the Inspector of Gunpowder, for said State, and by him marked with * * * Marks as are necessary to distinguish the several sorts of Gunpowder; the Person or Persons so offending, shall forfeit and pay six Pounds, lawful Money, for every Cask so exposed to Sale[.]{EN-711}

Rather than inhibiting, let alone suppressing, the private manufacture and sale of "several sorts of Gunpowder" in the manner of most modern "gun control", however, this regulation aimed instead at perfecting the market by assuring consumers of products fit for their intended uses.

D. Promoting "public safety". An ostensible concern for "public safety" with respect to firearms and ammunition is not unique to modern-day "gun controllers", but also really existed during the pre-constitutional period. The critical distinction, moreover, is that Rhode Island's laws in that era operated in a manner consistent with the most widespread possible private possession of arms among her inhabitants; whereas contemporary "gun controls" are invariably antagonistic to, and typically aim at maximally contracting the ambit of, such possession.

---

[589] See post, Chapter 32.

[590] U.S. Const. preamble and art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

1. Intentional misuse of arms. That Rhode Island's pre-constitutional laws required private citizens' possession of firearms did not entail helpless acquiescence on the part of the public in some individuals' intentional misuse of their arms. To the contrary, serious wrongdoing could have resulted in the perpetrators' disarmament.

Obviously, this was true for those individuals convicted of having committed a "Felony".[591] But it could have happened to men involved in lesser wrongdoing, too. For example, in 1642, the General Court of Election > ordered, that if John Weeks, Randall Holden, Richard Carder, Stephen Shatton or Robert Porter shall come vpon the Island [that is, Rhode Island] armed, they shall be by the Constable * * * disarm'd and carried before the Magistrate, and there find sureties for their good behaviour; and further be it established, that if that course shall not regulate them or any of them, then a further dew and lawfull course by the Magistrates shall be taken[.]{EN-712}

Although disarmament of these individuals was ordered, this episode exemplified, not a Colonial version of or precedent for modern "gun control", but rather the type of "people control" necessary in every age. The order to deprive these individuals of certain implements was issued, not because the implements were a threat to society in and of themselves, but because the particular individuals under scrutiny had proven themselves to be dangerously anti-social.

To appreciate what was going on in this case, one must understand the old English legal doctrine of "surety of the peace", upon which the General Court implicitly relied. Basically, the law provided the means by which "Security may be had against the Breach of the Peace before it happens".[592] As described by Blackstone,

> [T]HIS preventive justice consists in obliging those persons, whom there is probable ground to suspect of future misbehaviour to stipulate with and to give full assurance to the public, that such offence as is apprehended shall not happen; by finding pledges or securities for keeping > the peace, or for their good behaviour. * * * [T]he caution * * * is such as is intended merely for prevention, without any crime actually committed by the party, but arising only from a probable suspicion, that some crime is intended or likely to happen; and consequently it is not meant as any degree of punishment, unless perhaps for a man's imprudence in giving just ground of apprehension.

---

[591] See ante, at 272-274, and post, at 983-985 and 989-990.

[592] W. Hawkins, A Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter LX, at 126.

>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * THIS security consists in being bound, with one or more sureties,[593] in a recognizance or obligation * * * , entered on record, and taken in some court or by some judicial officer; whereby the parties acknowledge themselves to be indebted * * * in the sum required; * * * with condition to be void and of none effect, if the party shall appear in court on such a day, and in the mean time shall keep the peace: either generally, towards * * * [the public at large]; or particularly also, with regard to the person who craves the security. Or, if it be for the good behaviour, then on condition that he shall demean and behave himself well, * * * either generally or specially, for the time therein limited, as for one or more years, or for life.[594]

One branch of this doctrine was "Surety for keeping the Peace", perforce of which, as Hawkins explained, > any Justice of the Peace may, according to his Discretion, bind all those to the Peace, who in his Presence shall make any Affray, or shall threaten to kill or beat any Person, or shall contend together with hot Words, or shall go about with unusual Weapons or Attendants, to the Terror of the People; and also all such Persons as shall be known by him to be common Barrators; and also all those who shall be brought before him by a Constable for a Breach of the Peace in the Presence of such Constable; and all such Persons who, having been before bound to keep the Peace, shall be convicted of having forfeited their Recognizance.[595]

Under pre-constitutional English law, Blackstone pointed out,

> [A]FFRAYS (from affraier, to terrify) are the fighting of two or more persons in some public place, to the terror of his majesty's subjects * * * . Affrays may be suppressed by any private person present * * * . But more especially the constable * * * is bound to keep the peace; and to that purpose may * * * apprehend the affrayers; and may either carry them

---

[593] A "surety" is an insurer of another party's fulfillment of that party's obligation, who makes himself legally liable if that party defaults on his duty. See Black's Law Dictionary, ante note 368, at 1611.

[594] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 248-249, 249-250.

[595] A Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter LX, § 1, at 126.

> before a justice, or imprison them by his own authority for a convenient space till the heat is over; and may then perhaps also make them find sureties for the peace.[596]

"COMMON barretry is the offence of frequently exciting and stirring up suits and quarrels between his majesty's subjects, either at law or otherwise".[597] According to Hawkins, "a Barrator is a common Mover, Exciter, or Maintainer of Suits or Quarrels, either in Courts, or in the Country"; and "all Kinds of Disturbances of the Peace, and the spreading of false Rumors and Calumies, whereby Discord and Disquiet may grow among Neighbours, are * * * proper Instances of Barratry".[598]

A "Surety of the Peace" would be granted > where-ever a Person has just Cause to fear that another will burn his House, or do him a corporal Hurt, as by killing or beating him, or that he will procure others to do him such Mischief * * * ; and * * * every Justice of Peace is bound to grant it, upon the Party's giving him Satisfaction upon Oath, that he is actually under such Fear; and that he has just Cause to be so, by Reason of the other's having threatened to beat him, or lain in wait for that Purpose; [and]

>
> * * * * *
>
> it seemeth certain, That if the Person to be bound be in the Presence of the Justice, he may be immediately committed [to gaol], unless he offer Sureties; and from hence it follows, a fortiori, That he may be commanded by Word of Mouth to find Sureties, and committed for his Disobedience; but it is said, That if he be absent he cannot be committed without a Warrant from some Justice of Peace, in order to find Sureties[.][599]

Distinguishably, the authority of a "Magistrate" with respect to ordering a "Surety for * * * Good Behaviour" was not circumscribed by > any certain precise Rules for [his] Direction * * * , and therefore * * * he has a discretionary Power to take such Surety of all those whom he shall have just Cause to suspect to be dangerous, quarrelsome, or scandalous, as of those who sleep in the Day, and go abroad in the Night, and of such as keep suspicious Company, and of such as are generally suspected to be Robbers, &c. and of Eves-Droppers, and common Drunkards, and all other Persons * * * of evil Fame, who * * * seem in a great Measure to be

---

[596] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 145 (footnote omitted).

[597] Id., Volume 4, at 133 (footnote omitted).

[598] A Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter LXXXI, §§ 1 and 2, at 243.

[599] Id., Book I, Chapter LX, §§ 6 and 9, at 127, 127-128. See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 251-251.

> left to the Judgment of the Magistrate. But if he commit them for want of Sureties, he must shew the Cause, &c. with convenient Certainty.[600]

And if an individual gave his recognizance for good behavior, > such a Recognizance shall not only be forfeited for * * * actual Breaches of the Peace, * * * but also for some other[wrongdoing], * * * as for going armed with great Numbers to the Terror of the People, or speaking Words tending to Sedition, &c. * * * , but not for barely giving Cause of Suspicion of what perhaps may never actually happen.[601]

"[F]or, though it is just to compel suspected persons to give security to the public against misbehaviour that is apprehended; yet it would be hard, upon such suspicion, without the proof of any actual crime to punish them by a forfeiture of their recognizance."[602]

In the case with which Rhode Island's General Court dealt, Weeks, Holden, and the others were absent from the jurisdiction when they were commanded by the Court's formal order, in the nature of "a Warrant", not to "come vpon the Island armed" lest they be "disarm'd and carried before the Magistrate, and there [be required to] find sureties for their good behaviour". But public officials must have possessed sufficient evidence of those individuals' past misbehavior in Rhode Island or elsewhere to have formed "a probable suspicion, that some crime [was] intended or likely to happen" if any of them were allowed to sojourn on "the Island armed". So, in this situation, the order for disarmament was entered presumably for good cause, pursuant to what was then due process of law, and perhaps only temporarily if they had obtained sufficient sureties for their good behavior.

In addition, had Weeks, Holden, and the others remained in Rhode Island and comported themselves properly, and had they been able-bodied men less than fifty years old (as presumably they must have been to have made for themselves such a record of breaches of the peace), then they would have been required to arm themselves, and been fined if they had failed to do so, pursuant to one or another of the various orders extant at the time for regulating the Colony's Militia:

> • [1638] "It is ordered, that on [a certain date] * * * ther shall be a generall day of Trayning for the Exercise of thos who are able to beare armes in the arte of military discipline, and all that are of sixteen yeares of age, and upwards to fifty, shall be warned thereunto."{EN-713}

---

[600] A Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter LXI, § 4, at 132. See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 253.

[601] A Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book I, Chapter LXI, § 6, at 133.

[602] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 254.

> • [1639] "It is ordered * * * that the Body of the people, viz.: the Traine Band shall have free libertie to select and chuse such persons, one or more from among themselves, as they would have to be officers among them; to exercise and traine them * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> "It is ordered, that noe man shall go two miles from the Towne unarmed, eyther with Gunn or Sword; and that none shall come to any public Meeting without his weapon. Upon the default of eyther he shall forfeitt five shillings."{EN-714}
>
> • [1639] "Mr. Eastone for breach of an order in coming to the public meeting without his weapon * * * is to pay five shillings."{EN-715}
>
> • [1640] "It is * * * ordered, that all Men allowed and assigned to beare arms, shall make their personall appearance completely armed with Muskett and all its furniture; or pike with its furniture, * * * on such dayes as they are appointed to Traine. * * * And further it is ordered, that all men who shall come and remain the space of twenty days on the Island, he shall be liable to the injunctions of this order[.]"{EN-716}
>
> • [1641] "It is ordered, That the order concerning trainings made at Portsmouth, August 6, 1640, shall be dulie observed and kept in all points effectually [with some exceptions.]"{EN-717}
>
> • [1643] "It is * * * ordered, that every man shall have foure pounds of shot lying by him, and two pounds of powder * * * .
>
> "It is further ordered, that upon [a certain] day * * * , there be a generall trayning of the men; and that every man be in readiness at the beate of the drum."{EN-718}
>
> • [1643] "It is * * * ordered, that those last orders about trayning, and for every man to have so much powdr, and so many bulletts, and so the forwarning is to stand still in force; and also that every man do come armed unto the meeting upon every sixth day."{EN-719}

Indeed, to fulfill a recognizance for continued "good behaviour", they would have been compelled to obey the Militia laws in all of their particulars.

So, although in this type of case officials' concern for public safety would have counseled and the law would have allowed a temporary disarmament of individuals with known anti-social tendencies, the law also would have permitted those individuals to arm themselves if they had provided assurances for their future "good behaviour", and probably even would have required them to arm themselves as evidence of their "good behaviour".

2. Negligence with respect to firearms and ammunition. Pre-constitutional Rhode Islanders also recognized the prudential necessity for some general regulations of individuals' possible negligent use of firearms and careless possession of ammunition.

a. As to firearms, the laws generally prohibited only actual shooting under certain presumptively dangerous conditions.

(1) In 1731, the General Assembly decreed that:

> FOR AS MUCH as Damage has often been done in the Town of Newport, and other Towns in this Government, by firing of Guns and Pistols in the Streets or Taverns in the said Towns, and by firing and throwing of Squibs, Rockets, and other Fire-Works, even to the endangering the Loss of several Lives, and firing of the Towns,
>
> FOR the preventing whereof for the future:
>
> BE it Enacted * * * , That no Person whatsoever presume to fire any Gun or Pistol, or fire or throw any Squib, Rocket, or other Fire-work, in the Streets of any of the Towns of this Government, or in any Tavern of the same, after dark, on any Night whatsoever.
>
> AND if any Person shall do contrary hereunto, he, she or they so offending * * * shall * * * pay a Fine of Five Shillings for the first Offence, and for the second Offence Ten Shillings, and for every other Offence Twenty Shillings: And no Appeal shall be from any such Judgment.{EN-720}

The purpose of this law was not to regulate the use of firearms in particular, but to deter the reckless handling of incendiary devices most commonly to be found in private individuals' hands "in the Streets or Taverns"—including "Squibs, Rockets, or other Fire-works"—which negligence could have resulted in "firing of the Towns", largely composed as they were high inflammable wooden structures. And even then, the law imposed its prohibition only "after dark, on any Night whatsoever".

The statute recognized that many individuals—including possibly even women, as the reference to "she" indicates—might have carried both long guns ("Guns") and handguns ("Pistols"), loaded, "in the Streets or Taverns" of Rhode Island's Towns. Nevertheless, it neither deprived anyone of any firearm or ammunition, nor prohibited anyone from carrying a loaded firearm anywhere, but simply enjoined everyone to use their firearms (and other incendiaries) responsibly at certain times. Evidently, the legislators understood "the endangering the Loss of several Lives, and firing of the Towns" to derive, not from those things themselves, but from their possible misuse. So, rather than demonizing and banning the dumb implements (in the perverse style of modern "gun control"), the statute prohibited and punished their sentient individual possessors' misbehavior.

Moreover, although couched in comprehensive terms, this statute surely was not intended, and would never have been applied, to penalize the discharge of a firearm in self-defense even "after dark", because of the rule of construction known at that time as "the equity of interpretation". As Blackstone explained, > the most universal and effectual way of discovering the true meaning of a law, when the words are dubious, is by considering the reason and spirit of it; or the cause which moved the legislator to enact it. For when this reason ceases, the law itself ought likewise to cease with it. * * *

>
> FROM this method of interpreting laws, by the reason of them, arises what we call equity * * * "the correction of that, wherein the law (by reason of it's universality) is deficient."[603]

(2) Similarly, in 1768 the General Assembly decreed "[t]hat whosoever shall set up any Mark to be shot at, with a Gun or Pistol, the shooting at which may cross any Highway, Street, or Lane in this Colony, or shall shoot at such Mark with a Gun or Pistol, shall * * * pay a Fine of Twelve Shillings".{EN-721} Once again, the legislature recognized that individuals often carried loaded firearms or firearms together with readily accessible ammunition on or about the "Highway[s], Street[s], or Lane[s] in th[e] Colony", otherwise they would have been unable to "shoot at [a] Mark with a Gun or Pistol" in or about those places. If a statute was required to address this matter, Rhode Islanders must have been engaged in a significant amount of target practice (albeit some of it in an unsafe manner), which further evidences that a large number of firearms and sufficient ammunition for that purpose were always held in private hands. Actually, too, this prohibition was nothing more than the statutory application of common sense, today expressed by the shooters' rule: "know your target and what is beyond". No one shooting at a "Mark" across a road could have been sure of what his unintended target might suddenly have become, when people or animals could have moved across his line of fire without notice. In any event, the statute prohibited neither the possession of firearms and ammunition on or near "any Highway, Street, or Lane"; nor the carrying of firearms, either loaded or with ammunition near to hand, anywhere; nor the shooting at "Mark[s]" in any other, proper places.

(3) Then, in 1774 the General Assembly required that "there be no firing of cannon upon any public occasion, or of small arms; especially by the militia, or incorporated companies, on days of exercising, excepting only for perfecting themselves as marksmen * * * ; and that it be * * * recommended to all the inhabitants of this colony, that they expend no gun powder for mere sport and diversion, or in pursuit of game".{EN-722} This regulation served the two-fold purpose of training Militiamen, while otherwise preserving ammunition, so that the Militia would be as fully prepared and equipped as possible for active service in the field. And it evidenced that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" in pre-constitutional Rhode Island was primarily addressed to the inhabitants' collective military readiness, not to individuals' "sport", "diversion", or the "pursuit of game".

---

[603] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 61 (footnote omitted).

Revealingly, too, it did not command, but only "recommended", that individuals not waste gunpowder on sport or hunting.

b. As to ammunition, in 1762 the General Assembly mandated

> [t]hat every Person [in Newport, then the capital of Rhode Island,] who shall have Gun-powder in his or her Possession, and shall neglect or refuse to cause the whole of the same to be conveyed to the * * * Powder-House immediately, excepting 25 lb. [that is, pounds] which shall be kept in a Tin Powder-Flask, shall pay as a Fine into the Town Treasury * * * Ten Shillings in Lawful Money, for every Cask he or she shall neglect or refuse to be conveyed to the Powder-House * * * and in Proportion for any less Quantity.
>
> AND * * * no Person whatsoever shall fire a Gun or other Fire-Works within One Hundred Yards of the * * * Powder-House, upon the Penalty of paying a Fine of Ten Shillings Lawful Money, for every such Offence[.]{EN-723}

Plainly, this law aimed, not at anyone's disarmament—for it would have made just as much sense had the "Gun-powder" been suitable solely for fireworks—but at prevention and mitigation of devastating conflagrations and detonations in a populated area. Black powder (the only "Gun-powder" known in *pre-*constitutional times) is not only highly inflammable but also explosive, even when not confined. Most buildings in Rhode Island during the *mid-*1700s were constructed largely of wood, often (in Towns such as Newport) situated in close proximity to one another. Occupied homes, stores, and artisans' shops always contained sources of open flames—whether fireplaces for heat, ovens for cooking, forges for working metals, or simply candles and lanterns for light—burning for as long as twenty-four hours in each day. So, simply as a matter of elementary prudence, "Gun-powder" needed to be very carefully stored—"in a Tin Powder-Flask" or other suitable non-ferrous container, in order to protect it against stray sparks and static electricity—and its amount in any one location restricted, so as to minimize the damage should accidental ignition occur anyway. Experience had taught that dangerously large quantities needed to be secured in a communal "Powder-House" specially designed and situated for that purpose (although, even so, not perfectly immune from random sparks or flames), and subject to close supervision.

This statute does implicitly evidence, though, that many private individuals in Newport must cumulatively have possessed very large amounts of "Gun-powder", if the General Assembly believed that as much as twenty-five pounds represented a significant limitation. Moreover, even a maximum holding of twenty-five pounds of powder still enabled an individual in the *mid-*1700s to prepare from 1,750 to 2,500 cartridges (or loose loads) for a typical flintlock musket of that era.[604] So no one could have believed that compliance with this statute would have effectively disarmed anyone by depriving him of a reasonable stock of ammunition. And nothing in the statute precluded anyone from serially replenishing his store of twenty-five pounds of powder from the powder-house or any other source.

To be sure, this statute and the legislative power it reflected could conceivably have been (although it never was) misused by rogue public officials to obtain control of much (but hardly all) of the citizenry's ammunition in Newport, by requiring deposits from everyone, followed later on by refusing to allow withdrawals by anyone who needed his powder. Indeed, prohibition of withdrawals from powder magazines, seizure of their contents, or both was one of the tactics the British military governor of Massachusetts, General Thomas Gage, attempted to employ in order to reduce the supply of ammunition available to patriotic Militiamen in the environs of Boston. Gage knew that he had only two options for suppressing the patriots' resistance to British oppression: "He could seize [the patriots'] leaders * * * . Or he could seize their military stores; and that would be a blow almost equal to the first."[605] So he dispatched spies and relied on informers to ferret out the locations of the patriots' arms and ammunition in eastern Massachusetts.[606] On 1 September 1774, Gage's troops descended on the powder-house at Charlestown, carrying off some 250 half-kegs of gunpowder, then proceeded to Cambridge, where they seized two field guns. Before Gage's foray, however, the Towns had already withdrawn all of their own powder from the Provincial powder houses. So what remained at Charlestown was powder belonging to the Province, which was arguably Gage's to control. Nonetheless, misinformation about what had actually happened raised an alarm across New England, so inflaming the countryside that by 2 September upwards of some thirty thousand armed men were marching towards Boston.[607] Because the situation soon clarified, hostilities were avoided—for a while.[608] But in the immediate aftermath of what came to be called "the Powder Alarm", Israel Putnam warned his fellow patriots: "We much desire you to keep a strict guard over the remainder of your powder; for that must be the great means, under God, for the salvation of our country."[609]

---

[604] Depending upon what a particular shooter desires to accomplish, charges of black powder can vary widely even with one particular musket. For purposes of illustration, with 7,000 grains to the pound (avoirdupois), 25 pounds of gunpowder could produce 1,750 rounds at a charge of 100 grains and 2,500 rounds at a charge of 70 grains.

[605] A. French, The Day of Concord and Lexington, ante note 469, at 54.

[606] E.g., L. Birnbaum, Red Dawn at Lexington, ante note 524, Chapter 11.

[607] See T. Breen, American Insurgents, American Patriots, ante note 447, at 134-151.

[608] See Richard P. Richmond, The Powder Alarm: 1774 (Princeton, New Jersey: Auerbach Publishers, Inc., 1971), at 4-7, 11.

[609] Quoted in A. French, The Day of Concord and Lexington, ante note 469, at 25.

Next, on 26 February 1775, Gage dispatched another detachment to Salem, in search of cannon.[610] Although unsuccessful, this raid intensified the people's watchfulness. And their disdain for Gage's troops, too—one woman taunting them: "What, do you think we were born in the woods, to be frightened by owls?" When an angry Redcoat presented his musket, she challenged him: "Fire if you have the courage, but I doubt it."[611]

Finally, on the night of 18 to 19 April 1775, Gage ordered a large force to march to Concord, where one of his spies had reported the Militia to be storing firearms and ammunition.

> Gage * * * knew what the minutemen were doing. He even had a good estimate of their numbers. "The Minutemen amount to fifteen thousand are the picked men of the whole body of militia and all properly armed," he told his superiors in London.
>
> Gage also knew something else—knowledge that would eventually have fatal consequences. "Their whole magazine of powder * * * is at Concord." * * * If he somehow managed a swift march to Concord, seized or destroyed the gunpowder * * * , it would have a crippling, perhaps demoralizing impact on [the patriots'] plans * * * .[612]

Rather than submit to that, however, the Colonists countered Gage's last move with "the shot heard 'round the world"—proving the foresight of Thomas Jefferson's veiled admonition to King George III: "[a]n exasperated people, who feel that they possess power, are not easily restrained within limits strictly regular";[613] and of Samuel Adams' more pointed warning to Gage's own personal representative: "[t]ell General Gage * * * no longer to insult the feelings of an exasperated people".[614]

Thus, as the Colonists themselves attested in action at Lexington and Concord, rogue public officials' misuse of a legitimate power cannot validate an illegitimate power implied by that misuse. Rather, that illegitimate power should be resisted; and further "checks and balances" on the exercise of the legitimate power should be established.

---

[610] See, e.g., Thomas B. Allen, Tories: Fighting for the King in America's First Civil War (New York, New York: HarperCollins Publishers, 2010), at 44-47.

[611] See, e.g., William Gavett, "Account of the Affair at North Bridge", Essex Institute Proceedings, Volume I (1859), at 126-129; L. Birnbaum, Red Dawn at Lexington, ante note 524, at 108-109.

[612] T. Fleming, The First Stroke, ante note 383, at 34-35. See also L. Birnbaum, Red Dawn at Lexington, ante note 524, at 140-141.

[613] Thomas Jefferson, A Summary View of the Rights of British America (ca. 8 August 1774), in, e.g., R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume I, at 249.

[614] Quoted in John Fiske, "The Eve of Independence", The Atlantic Monthly (November 1888), at 366.

In stark contrast to General Gage's stratagem, which intended effectively to disarm the patriots of eastern Massachusetts by minimizing their supplies if not depriving them altogether of ammunition, Rhode Island implemented a policy aimed at maximizing the supply of ammunition available to her loyal citizens. In 1776, for instance, the General Assembly decreed that "no saltpeter, nitre or gunpowder, made and manufactured in this colony, or that shall be made or manufactured in this colony, shall be exported out of the same, by land or water, without the license of the General Assembly, or His Honor the Governor and committee of safety, under the penalty of £20, for every hundred weight of such saltpeter, nitre or gunpowder".{EN-724} Here, with respect to the very same subject, emerges the clear dichotomy between public officials who wield some power in a manner "destructive of the[proper] ends" of government, and public officials who exercise the identical power in a "just" manner in service of those ends: Both cases involved the power to "regulate". General Gage sought to "regulate" the Massachusetts patriots' access to and use of their own gunpowder by seizing and withholding it from them—thus contradicting the fundamental principle of "[a] well regulated Militia" that the people must be suitably and sufficiently armed at all times, and thereby denying them "their right" and interfering with "their duty, to throw off [an abusive] Government" "and to institute new Government".[615] Rhode Island's lawmakers, conversely, sought to "regulate" their people's access to and use of all the gunpowder produced within the State by securing and conserving it for them—thus ensuring that Rhode Island's Militia would be "well regulated", and thereby enabling them (with assistance from other patriots) finally "to throw off [the British] Government".

[615] Compare U.S. Const. amend. II with Declaration of Independence.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Virginia settled her pre-constitutional Militia in order to enable a self-governing community to provide for its own self-defense.

The legal history of Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia parallels that of Rhode Island.[616] Certainly the two Colonies' (and then independent States') purposes in settling their Militia, and then regulating those establishments with the identical forms and functions for decade after decade, derived from the selfsame consideration: namely, that self-defense for a self-governing community depends in the first, as well as the final, analysis upon collective self-reliance and self-help by the people themselves.

From the earliest days, Virginia recognized, as she declared in 1672 and reaffirmed in 1676, that "against all tymes of danger it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service".{EN-725} This entailed not merely the arming of individuals in isolation or in ad hoc groups, but also their systematic organization within effective Militia.

Virginians realized that their Militia was the community's "proper defence, in time of danger"—so whenever complaints arose (as in 1738 and 1755) that the existing establishment "hath proved very ineffectual", remedial action was taken specifically to improve the Militia, in terms of "training the persons listed to serve therein, and reducing them under a proper discipline" more efficaciously than before, not to replace that institution with some other, wholly untried means of defense.{EN-726} Indeed, "the good people of Virginia" did not learn only through their Declaration of Rights in 1776

> THAT all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; * * *
>
> * * * [t]hat all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them[; and]
>
> * * * * *

---

[616] For an overview of Virginia's Militia in that era, see James B. Whisker, The American Colonial Militia, Volume 5, The Colonial Militia in the Southern States, 1605-1785 (Lewiston, New York: The Edwin Mellor Press, 1997), at 5-93.

> * * * [t]hat a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state[;][{EN-727}]

or only in 1784 and 1785 that "the defence and safety of the commonwealth depend upon having its citizens properly armed and taught the knowledge of military duty";[{EN-728}] but knew from at least as early as 1723 that "a due regulation of the Militia is absolutely necessary for the defence of this country".[{EN-729}]

The practical reason was that, just as in 1705, throughout the entire pre-constitutional era the Militia could always "be ready on all occasions for the defence and preservation" of Virginia.[{EN-730}] Not just from 1727 through 1753, after all, was it apparent that > the frontiers of this dominion, being of great extent, are exposed to the invasions of foreign enemies, by sea, and incursions of Indians at land, and great dangers may likewise happen by * * * insurrections * * * ; for all which, the militia * * * is the most ready defence. And * * * the militia of those counties, where any of the dangers aforesaid shall arise, must necessarily be first emploied, and may, by the divine assistance, be able to suppress and repel such insurrections and invasions, without obliging that of other counties to be raised[.][{EN-731}]

Thus, in just these few enactments, Virginia summed up the essentials of community self-preservation for a free and self-governing society:

- "[A]ll power is vested in * * * the people"; and "magistrates are their trustees and servants, * * * at all times amenable to them".
- A "well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people," is "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state", and "absolutely necessary for the defence of the country".
- All men are to possess, not just "armes and habiliments", but "armes and habiliments for war"—that is, of contemporary military grade—which are always to be "kept fixed and fitt for service".
- Besides being "properly armed", the citizens are to be "taught the knowledge of military duty", "trained to arms", subjected to "a due regulation", and "reduc[ed] * * * under a proper discipline".
- They are "to be ready on all occasions for the defence and preservation" of their community. And,
- When so organized, the people themselves provide "the most ready defence"—which can be especially effective, because they are deployed throughout each Local jurisdiction, if possible to anticipate and in any event to meet "any of the dangers" when, where, and howsoever they "shall arise".

Coupled with the undeniable practical truth that "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[617] and the declaration in the Second Amendment that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed", the first point establishes that the people must always retain personal control over firearms, in defiance of any claim by mere public officials to disarm them.

The second point is expressly and exactly what the Second Amendment emphasizes: "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State".

The third point undergirds the declaration implicit in the Amendment: that, because "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms" must conduce at least to the maintenance of "[a] well regulated Militia", the people must possess "Arms" suited, not simply for individual self-defense, let alone for so-called "sporting purposes", but preëminently for the serious work of community self-preservation against every enemy, domestic as well as foreign, from private criminals to rogue public officials to invading armies—and therefore must possess "Arms" at least as good for military purposes as the "Arms" carried by equivalent troops in this country's regular Armed Forces.

And the remaining three points are inherent in the very concept of a "Militia" as it developed in American experience prior to the Amendment's ratification.

---

[617] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia was a governmental institution which proved itself the foundation for popular sovereignty.

As events demonstrated on and after 19 April 1775, in pre-constitutional America (as elsewhere throughout the modern world) "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'".[618] In Virginia, as well as in Rhode Island and the other Colonies, "the good People" (as the Declaration of Independence and Virginia's own Declaration of Rights styled them in 1776) held guns in their own hands. Therefore, in the ultimate analysis, where they stood was the locus of political power—as it always should be in a self-governing commonwealth. Yet, even during periods of actual fighting, no more than Rhode Island or any other Colony or independent State was Virginia home to some species of martial anarchy. For, just as in Rhode Island and elsewhere throughout America, Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia was a strictly governmental institution.

A. Neither "common law", nor the traditional authority of Sheriffs, nor private action the foundation of the Militia. Just as did almost every other Colony and every independent State, Virginia first "settled" and then "regulated" her pre-constitutional Militia,[619] not by reliance on "common law", the authority of County Sheriffs once-traditional in England, or least of all the independent and idiosyncratic initiatives of private individuals and groups, but (as this study demonstrates) by statute after statute after statute from Virginia's own legislature.

1. Not the product of "common law". "Common law" (in the sense of the lex non scripta) played no greater rôle in the establishment, organization, and operation of Virginia's Militia than it did of Rhode Island's—which was essentially little to none at all.[620]

2. Not subordinate to Sheriffs. Contrary to romantic notions circulating among some deluded patriots today—that Sheriffs enjoy unique status and powers under America's constitutional system—from Virginia's earliest Colonial days the provision of "homeland security" did not center around her Sheriffs exclusively or even in particular, but instead embraced the entire community:

---

[618] Id.

[619] On the distinction between these terms, see ante, at 100-102.

[620] See ante, at 108-113.

> • [1676] "WHEREAS of late there hath bin many unlawfull tumults, routs and riotts in divers parts of this country, for prevention of such insolences, and punishing offenders in that kind, * * * Be it therefore enacted * * * , that every respective officer and magistrate within this countrey, civill and military, from a constable to the highest civill magistrate, and from the lowest to the highest militia officer, be hereby impowered and strictly commanded for the suppressing and punishing all such unlawfull assemblies, routs, riotts and tumults, to use all lawfull wayes, authoritie, power and command, and whosoever shall be at any time disobedient to any the lawfull commands of any such civill or military officer or magistrate either in assisting, suppressing, quieting and punishing of any unlawfull assemblyes, routs or tumults * * * shall be accounted, judged and punished as mutinous and rebellious."{EN-732}
>
> • [1699] "That if any pirates, privateers or sea robers, or any other persons suspected to be such shall land and put on shoar * * * in this his majestyes collony and dominion upon notice given or knowledge thereof, all officers civill and military are hereby required * * * to raise and levy such a number of well armed men as he or they shall judge necessary for the seizing, apprehending and carrying to goal of all and every such person or persons[.]"{EN-733}

That the duty of community self-defense, and the power to carry it out, ran "from a constable to the highest civill magistrate, and from the lowest to the highest militia officer"—to whatever number of "well armed men" it might be "necessary" to muster in order to deal with the danger at hand—evidences that, from the start, "homeland security" in Virginia was in principle everyone's responsibility, not as it is today almost everywhere throughout America the province of just a few "leaders" who command professional "security units" separate from, independent of, and increasingly divorced from and even antagonistic to the people.

a. In *pre-*constitutional Virginia Sheriffs enjoyed no exalted authority, but were mere appointees of the Governor and his Council, exercising whatever powers—but no more than those—the General Assembly assigned to them.{EN-734} (Today, in Virginia Sheriffs are constitutional elected officials; but their specific "duties * * * shall be prescribed by general law or specific act".[621])

b. Early on, Virginia's Sheriffs were sometimes delegated specific authority to deal with the recurrent problem of runaway slaves:

> [1691] "WHEREAS many times negroes, mulattoes, and other slaves unlawfully absent themselves from their masters and mistresses service, and lie hid and lurk in obscure places killing hoggs and

---

[621] Const. of Virginia art. VII, § 4, ¶ 1.

> committing other injuries to the inhabitants of this dominion, * * * Be it enacted * * * that in all such cases upon intelligence of any such negroes, mulattoes, or other slaves lying out, two of their majesties justices of the peace of that county * * * shall be impowered and commanded * * * to issue out their warrants directed to the sherrife * * * to apprehend such negroes, mulattoes, and other slaves, which said sherriffe is * * * required upon all such occasions to raise such and soe many forces from time to time as he shall think convenient and necessary for the effectual apprehending such negroes, mulattoes and other slaves[.]"{EN-735}

But this was a special statutory grant, not a matter of any Sheriff's inherent authority (in which case, no statute would have been required). And later on, Virginia assigned to her Militia the exclusive responsibility for "slave patrols".[622]

c. Similarly, Virginia's Sheriffs were sometimes empowered to summon Militia officers to serve on draft boards:

> [1757] "[T]he sheriff of every county within this colony, and the serjeants of the city of Williamsburg and borough of Norfolk, shall cause to be summoned the several justices [of the peace], and field-officers, and captains of their respective counties, city and borough * * * [who] shall * * * hold a court, and examine and enquire into the occupation and employment of * * * inhabitants * * * between the age of eighteen and fifty years * * * : And the said courts are * * * required to prick down all such able-bodied persons * * * found loitering and neglecting to labor for reasonable wages; all who run from their habitations, leaving wives or children without suitable means for their subsistance, and all other idle, vagrant, or dissolute persons, wandering abroad without betaking themselves to some lawful employment * * * . And in a case a sufficient number of such persons * * * cannot be found * * * the said courts are hereby impowered to prick down such able-bodied men, not being freeholders or house-keepers qualified to vote at an election of burgesses, as they shall think proper * * * and * * * shall * * * draft out * * * one man for every forty effective soldiers in the militia of each county, city and borough."{EN-736}

And Sheriffs were sometimes called upon to round up individuals who might be suitable for impressment into military service:

> [1740 and 1754] "That * * * the justices of the peace of every county within this colony * * * [may] raise and levy such able-bodied men as do not follow or exercise any lawful calling or employment, or have not

---

[622] See post, at 339-343, 392-395, and 718-723.

> some other lawful and sufficient support and maintenance, to serve * * * as soldiers * * * . And to require and command all sherifs, under sherifs and constables * * * to be aiding and assisting them * * * ; and for that purpose, to issue out warrants * * * requiring and commanding such sherifs, under sherifs, and constables * * * to make search * * * for all such persons, as they can find, who are, or shall appear to them, to be within the description of this act; and to bring before the said justices, all such persons[.]"{EN-737}

But these, too, were special statutory grants of authority, without which the Sheriffs would have been powerless in the premises.

d. Otherwise, Sheriffs performed simply their workaday duties of enforcing judgments against debtors when they collected the fines and assessments courts-martial and Militia officers laid upon Militiamen delinquent in their duties or desirous of obtaining, by payment of a monetary penalty, a practical exemption from some aspect of their service:

> • [1705] "That the severall fines and penaltys * * * be levyed by distress and sale of the goods and chattles belonging to the defaulter or offender by warrant from the * * * chief officer of the county to the sheriff (in case the defaulter or offender refuse to pay the same in specie upon the ffield officers and captains order without further process)[.]"{EN-738}

> • [1723] "That where any person on whom any fine shall be laid * * * shall fail or refuse to pay the same to the sheriff, in specie, * * * the sheriff * * * [shall] levy the same by distress and sale of the offender's goods * * * . And if * * * the sheriff * * * can find no goods whereon to make distress, * * * the sheriff * * * [shall] cause the body of the said offender to be committed to the county goal, without bail or mainprize, until he shall satisfy the same fine, and all fees incident, in the same manner, as in executions served at common law."{EN-739}

> • [1755] "And after the holding of every such [Militia] court[-martial], * * * the sheriff of the county * * * [shall] demand and receive the money or tobacco * * * charged, of the [delinquents] * * * and in case of nonpayment * * * levy the same by distress and the sale of the goods of the person refusing * * * ; and where any delinquent shall remove out of the county, before he hath paid and satisfied all fines laid on him, * * * and shall not leave sufficient effects in the county, to satisfy the same, then the * * * clerk shall send copies of the * * * orders against such delinquents to the sheriff of the county, into which he or they shall be removed, and such sheriff is * * * required to collect, levy and account for the same[.]"{EN-740}

> • [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he field officers and captains of every county * * * [shall] meet at the court house * * *

following the general muster in September or October every year, * * * to hold a court martial * * * to enquire * * * of all delinquents * * * for absence from musters or appearing without arms, powder, or ball; * * * and to order the fines * * * to be levied upon all delinquents who shall not make out some just excuse, for not performing their duty * * * : And * * * the sheriff of the county * * * is * * * required to demand and receive the money * * * charged * * * , and in case of non-payment * * * to levy the same by distress and sale of the goods of the persons refusing * * * ; and where any delinquent shall remove out of the county before he hath paid and satisfied all fines * * * and shall not leave sufficient effects in the county to satisfy the same, * * * the * * * clerk shall send copies of the * * * orders against such delinquents to the sheriff of the county into which he or they shall be removed, and such sheriff is * * * required to collect, levy and account for the same[.]"{EN-741}

• [1781] "[W]here any quaker or menonist shall be allotted to any division of the militia, who is to perform the succeeding tour of duty, he shall not be compelled personally to serve the same, but * * * the commanding officer * * * [may] cause to be levied on all the society of quakers and menonists in such county according to their assessable property, by warrant * * * directed to the sheriff * * * , such sum * * * of money as he shall think sufficient to procure a substitute for each quaker or menonist whose tour of duty it is[.]"{EN-742}

• [1784 and 1785] "[S]hould any person [in the Militia] * * * charged with fines, fail to make payment, * * * the sheriff is hereby authorized to make distress and sale therefor, in the same manner as is directed in the collection of taxes."{EN-743}

e. In the performance of these responsibilities on behalf of the Militia, though, Virginia's Sheriffs enjoyed no autonomy, discretion, or any other special authority—rather, they were expressly made subject to punishment for their own derelictions of duty:

• [1738] "[I]f any sheriff shall refuse to receive the orders of any court-martial offered to him * * * , or to collect and levy the fines therein mentioned; such sheriff * * * shall be fined, for such refusal, fifty pounds current money[.]"{EN-744}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f any sheriff shall refuse to receive the orders of any court martial offered to him, * * * or to collect and levy the fines * * * , such sheriff * * * shall be fined for every such refusal, one hundred pounds[.]"{EN-745}

• [1762, 1766, and 1771] "[W]hereas it hath been doubted whether the sheriffs of York and James City are by law obliged to obey the orders of the courts-martial of the * * * city of Williamsburg, in receiving or collecting the fines to which the inhabitants of the said city may be > subject,[623] * * * Be it therefore enacted, * * * that * * * it shall and may be lawful to and for the courts-martial * * * to order and direct either the sergeant of the said city, or the sheriffs of the said counties of York and James-City, to receive and collect all such fines as shall be inflicted and ordered to be levied by them on such of the inhabitants of the said city as shall reside in their respective precincts; and thereupon the said serjeant or sheriff, respectively, shall proceed * * * to collect such fines, and shall be accountable for them to the courts-martial * * * , and shall be subject and liable to the same prosecution, in case of their failing, neglecting, or refusing, to collect the said fines, as are prescribed, directed and appointed, in the like cases, for the counties of this colony."{EN-746}

>
> • [1781] "[A]ny sheriff * * * failing to perform his duty" in collecting moneys levied against Quakers and Menonites to procure substitutes for their service in the Militia "shall forfeit and pay five thousand pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-747}

f. Perhaps most consequential, although Virginia's Militia statutes exempted various other civil officers from certain Militia duties, they never explicitly exempted Sheriffs in any way at all. In 1692, the Governor and Council "declared that it is reasonable Counstables and headboroughs should be * * * Exempted from Musters, dureing the time they remain in the said Offices",{EN-748} but did not exempt Sheriffs. The statute of 1705 withheld any power from Militia officers "to list [in the Militia] * * * any constable during his being such", but recited nothing whatsoever about Sheriffs.{EN-749} And no exemptions for either Constables or Sheriffs appeared in the Militia statutes of 1723,{EN-750} 1738,{EN-751} 1755,{EN-752} 1757 and 1759,{EN-753} 1762,{EN-754} 1766,{EN-755} 1775,{EN-756} 1777,{EN-757} or 1784 and 1785.{EN-758}

Interestingly, though, the Militia Acts of 1705, 1723, 1738, 1762, 1766, and 1771 did explicitly exempt Justices of the Peace in one manner or another—the Acts of 1705, 1723, and 1738 exempting any person who "shall be, or shall have been" in that office; whereas the Acts of 1762, 1766, and 1771 circumspectly privileged only those "who are really and bona fide acting justices of their respective counties (except such as now do, or hereafter shall, bear any commission as officers of the militia in their respective counties)". And, from 1705 onwards, "no person shall at any time * * * be capable to execute or enjoy the office of sheriff of any county * * * unless such person, at the time of his entering into and upon the said office, shall be a justice of the peace in the same county".{EN-759} So, under the Acts of 1705, 1723, and 1738, a Sheriff could have claimed an implied exemption from some Militia service, because he necessarily "shall have been" a Justice of the Peace before entering upon the office of Sheriff (unless, of course, he had also borne a commission as an officer in the Militia).

---

[623] Apparently, in light of the preceding statutes, this was doubted nowhere else.

Such an exemption was narrow, however. For under the Act of 1705, although Justices of the Peace were not to be "list[ed]", they were "required and enjoyned to provide and keep at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition * * * and to produce or cause the same to be produced in the county where they respectively reside yearly, and every year at the generall muster"; and "in case of any rebellion or invasion" they were "obliged to appear * * * and serve in such stations as are suitable for gentlemen, * * * under the same penaltys as any other * * * persons * * * listed in the militia".{EN-760} To that extent, they were fully active members of the Militia. And under the Act of 1723, although Justices of the Peace were not ordered "personally to appear at any musters", they were required "to find and provide one able-bodied white man, a good horse, and * * * trooper's accoutrements * * * who shall constantly appear and exercise at all musters".{EN-761} Presumably, had the substitute not been forthcoming, the exemption would have been forfeited. Under the Act of 1738, too, although Justices of the Peace were not compelled "to a personal attendance at musters", they were required "to send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters".{EN-762} Presumably, too, the benefit of this exemption depended upon satisfaction of the condition. So, under these Acts, with respect to some duties Sheriffs who qualified for exemption on the basis of prior service as Justices of the Peace were members of the Militia, and upon the possible failure of their exemption would have been subject to all of the duties incumbent upon rank-and-file members of the Militia who had no claim to any exemption.

The Militia Acts of 1755, 1757, 1759, 1775, 1777, 1784, and 1785 did not mention either Justices of the Peace or Sheriffs. So the latter had no basis on which to claim an exemption. Under the Acts of 1762, 1766, and 1771, though, present but not prior service as a Justice of the Peace entitled an individual to an exemption. So Sheriffs could have claimed an exemption only if an individual could simultaneously have held the offices of Sheriff and Justice of the Peace. Of course, this, too, would have amounted to only a limited exemption. For under the latter Acts Justices of the Peace were excused from normal mustering, but nonetheless were required to "provide complete sets of arms * * * for the use of the county", and to "always keep in [their] house[s] * * * such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia".{EN-763} Nothing, however, indicates that the two offices of Sheriff and Justice of the Peace could have been occupied by the very same individual at the very same time. Indeed, as Blackstone observed with respect to the powers of a Sheriff, "[n]either may he act as an ordinary justice of the peace during the time of his office: for this would be * * * inconsistent; he being in many respects the servant of the justices".[624] As was just observed, from 1705 onwards anyone seeking the office of Sheriff in Virginia had to be a Justice of the Peace in that County at the time of his becoming Sheriff there. But it was never made a condition upon, or a privilege of, an individual's being a Sheriff that he should or could remain a Justice of the Peace as well during his term as Sheriff. Being a Justice of the Peace was merely a qualification for becoming a Sheriff. By having become a Sheriff, the individual did not conflate the two offices.

---

[624] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 344 (footnote omitted).

So, throughout the pre-constitutional period, Sheriffs were always members of the Militia (in the sense of being subject to at least some, and often all, of its duties)—although at times they qualified for the limited exemptions certain Acts extended to Justices of the Peace. That their exemption under some of the statutes derived from another office, however, evidences the rather lowly position Sheriffs actually held vis-à-vis the Militia—hardly in keeping with the misguided notion all-too-current among many contemporary patriots that Sheriffs somehow are entitled to exercise plenary law-enforcement authority within their Counties.

g. In Virginia it would be more to the point as a matter of historical parallels—yet nonetheless in the final analysis pointless in practice—for misguided patriots to focus on the office of Constable, rather than of Sheriff, as their supposed supreme Local authority for law-enforcement. In Virginia today, after all,

> [a]ny locality may, by ordinance, provide for the organization of its authorized police forces. Such forces shall include a chief of police, and such officers and other personnel as appropriate.
>
> When a locality provides for a police department, the chief of police shall be the chief law enforcement officer of that locality. However, in towns, the chief law-enforcement officer may be called the town sergeant.[625]

Thus, in any Locality which provides for an organized "police force[ ]", by statute the Sheriff is not the chief law-enforcement officer. Moreover, in contemporary Virginia,

> [t]he police force of a locality is hereby invested with all the power and authority which formerly belonged to the office of constable at common law and is responsible for the prevention and detection of crime, the apprehension of criminals, the safeguard of life and property, the preservation of peace and the enforcement of state and local laws, regulations, and ordinances.[626]

---

[625] Code of Virginia § 15.2-1701.

[626] Code of Virginia § 15.2-1704.

Yet, even if the members of modern Local "police forces" in Virginia could be assimilated in legal principle to "constable[s] at common law", they still would not automatically qualify for some special exclusion from, let alone position superior to, the Militia. For (as was just explained), from 1723 through the end of the pre-constitutional era, Virginia's statutes granted Constables no exemption whatsoever from Militia duty.

h. Nonetheless, this legal history does indicate a possible constitutional status for Sheriffs incorporated within modern revitalized Militia, which they certainly could never otherwise claim. After all, the Constitution does not contain the noun "Sheriff" or, for that matter, the nouns "Constable", "policeman", "law-enforcement officer", or "emergency-services worker". So these and kindred officials can assert no specifically constitutional authority in their own right. Distinguishably, "the land and naval Forces" of the United States enjoy explicit constitutional sanction, inasmuch as Congress may exercise the powers "[t]o raise and support Armies", "[t]o provide and maintain a Navy", and "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of [both]",[627] and the President is declared to be "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States".[628] Even so, the Constitution does not require Congress "[t]o raise and support Armies" or "[t]o provide and maintain a Navy", if it should determine in good faith that neither establishment is "necessary and proper"[629]—and it explicitly enables each new House of Representatives alone to disestablish the Army, by refusing "an Appropriation of Money to that Use",[630] an effective legislative veto which in some situations each new House can impose on the maintenance of a Navy, too. In any event, no Sheriff (or other "law-enforcement officer" in the General Government or the States) has ever been considered part of the regular Armed Forces, and therefore can derive no constitutional status from them.

Distinct from Sheriffs, the Militia are explicitly incorporated within the Constitution of the United States.[631] And the Constitution devotes more words to setting out Congress's and the States' powers with respect to the Militia than it does to setting out Congress's powers with respect to the Army and the Navy, thereby attesting to the importance of the Militia within the federal system. Moreover, unlike "the land and naval Forces", which Congress—at the insistence of the House of Representatives alone—may refuse to establish at all or may quickly disestablish by cutting off "Appropriation[s]", the Militia are permanent constitutional [627] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 14. See also U.S. Const. amend. V.

---

[628] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[629] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

[630] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 7.

[631] In Virginia, Sheriffs are constitutional elected officers. Const. of Virginia art. VII, § 4.

institutions over the continued existence of which the General Government exercises no power whatsoever, because the Militia are "the Militia of the several States" not "the Militia of the United States". Neither can the States dispense or do away with their Militia—first and foremost, because the Militia are "necessary to the security of a free State",[632] which no State may imperil either for herself alone or for the sister States which depend upon her support; and second, because the Militia are forces upon which the General Government is always entitled to call in certain circumstances,[633] and therefore which the States must maintain in a condition of proper constitutional regulation at all times.[634] So, if Sheriffs and other "law-enforcement officers" were included, as they once were and should now be, in revitalized "Militia of the several States"—in the form of specialized units, somewhat along the lines of the "Minutemen" of *pre-*constitutional times—they could exercise some of the Militia's constitutional rights, powers, privileges, and immunities, as well as performing some of the Militia's duties. Indeed, when the Militia were properly revitalized, the statutes could assign to Sheriffs positions of high command in the Militia that would authorize them to perform the functions that not a few contemporary Americans desire that they perform now, but as to which they enjoy no constitutional, and in most cases little statutory, authority.[635]

3. Not a private establishment. Finally, as has been demonstrated for Rhode Island,[636] Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia could not possibly have been in any sense a "private" establishment, because from its inception it incorporated by force of law every able-bodied adult free male in the community, leaving nothing from which equivalent, but separate, "private" organizations of any consequence could have been formed.[637] For a prosaic example, when in 1758 a "Company [of Rangers] was not raised in a Manner conformable to Law" the Governor "discharge[d] the said Company, but employ[ed] the Men * * * as Part of the Militia, in garrisoning some of the Forts."{EN-764}

B. The central rôle of the Governor in the Militia. The leading rôle Virginia's Governor played in implementing the General Assembly's regulations of the Militia emphasized the latter's governmental character.

1. Other than under the most extraordinary conditions of political flux,[638] private individuals were never allowed to "appoint" themselves or others as

---

[632] U.S. Const. amend. II.

[633] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15; art. II, § 2, cl. 1, and § 3.

[634] Compare U.S. Const. art. VI, cls. 2 and 3 with amend. II.

[635] See post, at 1276-1277 and 1291-1293.

[636] See ante, Chapters 4 and 5.

[637] See post, Chapter 16.

[638] See post, at 567-597.

purported "officers" of (or, for that matter, simply as enlisted men in) Virginia's Militia. Rather, from the very beginning, in keeping with his unique position as the King's representative and chief executive officer in the Colony—and thus the delegate of the King's "undoubted right" to "the sole supreme government and command of the militia within all his * * * realms and dominions"[639]—Virginia's Governor commissioned her Militia's officers. These included the various County Lieutenants or "Camand[r]s in Cheife" whom the Governor "Nominated and approved off",{EN-765} "[f]or the better moddling the militia of this Colony, & bringing them under a more regular Discipline".{EN-766} In addition, the Governor approved commissions for officers of lesser rank.{EN-767} This practice continued throughout the *pre-*constitutional era. Typically, though, the Governor did not make his appointments arbitrarily and without consideration of Local conditions and sensibilities, but instead sought nominations from Local "Comand[rs] in Chiefe" "of fitt persons to be Commissionated" officers in the Militia in those areas.{EN-768} This practice, too, continued throughout the *pre-*constitutional era.{EN-769} Similarly, the Governor was directly empowered by the King to remove Militia officers, albeit for just cause and with due process of law—as a Royal instruction in 1688 made clear: "[A]ll Military Officers upon misbehaviour and unfaithfulness in the Execution of their Trust you [that is, the Governor] shall suspend or discharge as shall appear upon due Examination agreeable to Justice[.]"{EN-770}

2. Under English law, "the sole supreme government and command of the militia" may have been the King's "undoubted right", as to which "both or either house of parliament cannot, nor ought to, pretend".[640] But as the division of authority evolved in Virginia (and elsewhere throughout *pre-*constitutional America), ultimate control passed from the Governor to the General Assembly. From a very early date the General Assembly empowered "every commander of the severall plantations" in Virginia "to levy a partie of men out of the inhabitants of that place so many as may well be spared without too much weakening of the plantations and to imploy these men against the Indians, when they shall assault us neere unto our habitations".{EN-771} Yet, as with commissioning of officers, the Governor always played a significant part in the Militia's operations.

As Commander in Chief, Virginia's Governor was authorized to raise, call forth, and deploy her Militia (as well as all of her other military forces):

> • [1684] "And for the forming of a standing force for the more sure and safe guarding the frontiers, and preventing the murthers, depredations, incurtions and spoiles by the Indians, Bee it enacted * * * That four troops of horsemen * * * be raised * * * ; but in case the full

---

[639] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 262-263.

[640] Id.

number * * * compleatly mounted, armed and provided * * * cannot be raised by such as shall voluntarily offer themselves for that service, that then his excellency the governour * * * [may] issue forth his warrant for the raiseing soe many men * * * as shall be wanting[.]"{EN-772}

• [1705, 1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, 1753, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "That upon any invasion of the enemy by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * have full power to levy, raise, arm and muster such a number of forces out of the militia * * * as shall be thought requisite and needfull for repelling the invasion or suppressing the insurrection, and the same being raised, to order, direct, march, employ, continue, discharge and disband, as the occasion shall require, or the cause of danger ceases for which they were raised."{EN-773}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "And to the end a sufficient number of men may be appointed for guarding the batteries erected in the several rivers of this dominion, and to assist in the better managing the great guns there mounted, when occasion shall be, It is hereby further enacted, That it shall * * * be lawful for the governor * * * to appoint and assign such a number of the militia as he shall think fit to attend the said batteries[.]"{EN-774}

• [1780] "[W]hereas by the arts of the enemy joined by disaffected persons, riots have taken place in some counties injurious to the peace and dignity of government; to prevent such pernicious practices in future, and in order to aid the civil power in the due and effectual execution of the laws, Be it enacted, That wherever the governour shall have satisfactory information that any persons within this commonwealth shall be inclined to mutiny or riot, * * * he is * * * empowered to order one or more troop or troops of horse to be raised * * * in any county where such persons shall so resist or assemble together with an intention to resist."{EN-775}

• [1784 and 1785] "And whereas, it is necessary that adequate powers be vested in the executive for calling forth the militia and resources of the state, in cases of invasion or insurrection, or upon any probable prospect of such invasion or insurrection;

" * * * Be it further enacted, That the governor, with advice of the council, be authorized and empowered, on any such invasion or insurrection, or probable prospect thereof, to call forth such a number of militia, and from such counties as they may deem proper."{EN-776}

• [1787] "That the governor with the advice of council, shall be empowered to order out into actual service from time to time, so many scouts and rangers in any of the counties on the western frontier * * * , the expence whereof shall be defrayed out of the funds provided * * * for the support of government."{EN-777}

3. Officers and men in the Militia were subjected to fines for failing, neglecting, or refusing to report to, or to obey orders from, the Governor:

> • [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[I]f any officer of the militia who upon occasion of any invasion or insurrection, shall receive any orders or informations from the governor * * * , either for calling together the soldiers or marching them to any particular place, shall neglect or refuse to execute such orders or instructions in the best manner he is capable, every such officer so neglecting or refusing, shall respectively forfeit and pay the sums following, that is to say, every lieutenant of a county the sum of two hundred pounds; every lieutenant-colonel the sum of two hundred pounds; every major the sum of one hundred pounds; every captain the sum of seventy five pounds; every lieutenant the sum of fifty pounds; every ensign the sum of twenty five pounds; every serjeant or corporal twenty pounds; and every soldier who shall be summoned to appear * * * and shall fail so to do, or shall fail to bring with him his arms, with one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, or shall refuse to march, shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds[.]"{EN-778}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "That the following forfeitures and penalties shall be incurred for delinquencies, viz. By the county lieutenant * * * for failing * * * to transmit any recommendations of an officer * * * to the governor, * * * to make a general return of his militia to the governor * * * shall, for each and every such offence or neglect, forfeit and pay twenty pounds; failing to send into actual service any militia called for by the governor * * * , fifty pounds: By a lieutenant colonel commandant, for * * * failing to call forth from his regiment, with due dispatch, any detachment of men and officers, armed and equipped, as shall * * * be required * * * on any call from the governor, * * * twenty-five pounds: By a major for * * * failing to repair to his rendezvous when summoned upon any call of the governor, * * * he shall forfeit and pay sixteen pounds: By a captain, for * * * failing to call forth such officers and men, as the commanding officer shall * * * order from his company, upon any call from the governor, * * * or failing on any such occasion to repair to the place of rendezvous, he shall forfeit and pay twelve pounds: By a subaltern officer, for * * * failing to repair to his place of rendezvous armed as required, when ordered upon any call from the governor * * * he shall forfeit and pay six pounds. * * * By a non-commissioned officer or soldier, for * * * failing to repair to his rendezvous, when ordered upon any call from the governor * * * , he shall forfeit and pay two pounds."{EN-779}

4. Although Local Captains of the Militia were, of necessity, empowered to act on their own initiatives in emergency situations,[641] they were also enjoined to report such circumstances immediately to the Governor, obviously to enable the latter to appraise the situation and issue his own orders to the Militia:

---

[641] See post, at 549-555.

> • [1684] "[U]pon discovery, notice or advice of the approach * * * of an enemy, the * * * captain * * * [shall] give speedy advice thereof to the governour * * * , and in the mean time to attend the motion of the enemie, only unless the enemie dureing that time shall first committ some act of hostility, either in burning or in forcible entering into our houses, or by killing, maiming or carrying away any of the inhabitants, and then in such case to engage and destroy them, if he see cause[.]"{EN-780}

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1748, and 1753] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any insurrection or invasion, shall * * * raise the militia under his command, and * * * send immediate intelligence to the county-lieutenant * * * and to the next militia officer in the same county, informing them at the same time in what manner he intends to proceed; and shall, in the mean time, keep the militia, under his command, under arms, until he receives orders * * * . And every county lieutenant * * * to whom such intelligence shall be given * * * shall forthwith dispatch an express to the governor * * * . And until orders shall arrive from the governor, shall draw together the militia of his county, in such place or places, as he shall judge most convenient for opposing the enemy."{EN-781}

> • [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any invasion or insurrection, shall raise the militia under his command, and send intelligence * * * to the chief commanding office in the county, and shall moreover immediately proceed to oppose the enemy according to the orders he shall receive * * * until further orders arrive from the governor * * * , and such * * * chief commanding officer shall give immediate notice to the officers of the militia of the next adjacent counties of such invasion or insurrection, and the situation and circumstances of the enemy * * * ; and * * * [the chief commanding officer of each adjacent county] shall immediately raise the militia of his county and march part thereof, not exceeding two-thirds, against such enemy, if the circumstances of the case shall require it, * * * and * * * shall cause the remaining part of his militia * * * to remain in arms in the county for the defence and protection thereof, until he shall receive orders from the governor * * * : And every * * * chief commanding officer * * * to whom such intelligence shall be given * * * shall forthwith dispatch an express to the governor * * * , notifying the danger, and * * * the strength and motions of the enemy[.]"{EN-782}

5. The Governor was also authorized to deal with peculiar situations, such as denying certain privileges to conscientious objectors where and when exigencies demanded it:

> [1784 and 1785] "[T]his act shall not be construed to deprive the people called quakers[642] of any privilege granted to them by an act of assembly, intituled, 'An act to exempt quakers from attending musters.' Provided also, That the governor, with advice of council, shall have power * * * to suspend the operation thereof in the counties on the western waters, so long as they may think proper."{EN-783}

Or granting special privileges to members of certain religious denominations, as a means of reducing sectarian conflicts within Virginia's military forces:

> [1777] "[W]hereas there are within this commonwealth some religious societies, particularly Baptists and Methodists, the members of which may be averse to serving in the same companies or regiments with others, and under officers of different principles, though they would willingly engage in the defence of their country under the command of officers of their own religion: Be it enacted, That the governour, with the advice of the privy council, may * * * appoint proper persons of either of the said religious societies to enlist any members of the same who will engage to enter as volunteers * * * , and such volunteers shall be formed into separate companies, and may choose their own captains, lieutenants, and ensigns; and when a sufficient number of companies shall be raised to form a regiment, the governour, with the advice of the privy council, may appoint proper field officers out of their own societies to such regiment[.]"{EN-784}

6. Because of the apparently broad powers that Governors in Virginia as well as other Colonies and then independent States exercised over the Militia in pre-constitutional times, contemporary proponents of revitalizing "the Militia of the several States" are often assailed with the dire prediction that the Militia will simply become new tools in the hands of rogue State Governors, or a rogue President of the United States, or rogue Members of Congress, under the dictates of which WE THE PEOPLE will be made to oppress themselves. An archtypical fear is that the Militia of one State might be marched off into some other State to put down the people there, or somehow convinced or compelled to tyrannize over the people within its own State. These nightmares have next to no historical basis anywhere—and certainly not in Virginia. For, by their very delineation, the powers over the Militia that Virginia's General Assembly delegated to her Governor also entailed corresponding disabilities with respect to any actions in excess or in contradiction of those powers. And not always satisfied with that sort of implicit control, in areas of crucial concern the General Assembly imposed express limitations.

---

642 The Act of 1785 applied to "the people called quakers or menonists".

a. Virginia's Militia was usually not to be deployed at a far remove from her own boundaries:

> • [1742] When considering a request of the Governor of Maryland for military assistance against certain hostile Indians, the Governor and Council agreed that "it will be very difficult to perswade [Virginia's Militiamen] to pass over Patowmack River or Chesapeak Bay", because "the government of Virginia can not compel the militia, contrary to law, to march out of the colony".{EN-785}
>
> • [1755] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * impower the governor * * * to lead or march the militia of this colony, or cause them to be led or marched, more than five miles beyond where the inhabitants of this colony, shall be settled on the western frontiers."{EN-786}
>
> • [1756] "That nothing * * * shall * * * impower the governor * * * , or any other officer, to lead or march the soldiers hereby raised, or cause them to be led or marched out of this colony."{EN-787}

Virginia's Militia, after all, was that Colony's (or State's) own Militia, raised first and foremost to provide Virginia with security, not to be dragooned out of her territory in wide-ranging adventures without lawful and very specific authorization. The rule was different for Virginia's regular troops, though, as evidenced in 1775 when the Convention of Delegates declared: "whereas it may be necessary, for the publick security, that the forces to be raised * * * should, as occasion may require, be marched to different parts of the united colonies, * * * the officers and soldiers * * * shall * * * be under the controul, and subject to the order, of the committee of safety".[643] Distinguishably from Militiamen, though, these troops voluntarily enlisted in the first place, and could "not be compelled to continue [in the service] more than two years" in any event.{EN-788}

b. Virginia early established and consistently held that the Governor's power to call out her Militia was contingent upon the presence of particular exigent circumstances, not simply a matter of his own arbitrary will:

> • [1705] "[U]pon any invasion of the enemy by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * have full power to levy, raise, arm and muster such a number of forces out of the militia * * * as shall be thought requisite and needfull for repelling the invasion or suppressing the insurrection, and the same being raised, to order, direct, march, employ, continue, discharge and disband, as the occasion shall require, or the cause of danger ceases for which they were raised."{EN-789}

---

[643] When Virginia ousted her last Royal Governor, authority passed to a Convention, which appointed a Committee of Safety "invested with the supreme executive powers of government". William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large; Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia from the First Session of the Legislature, in the Year 1619, Volume IX, 1775-1778 (Richmond, Virginia: J. & G. Cochran, 1821), Preface, at [4].

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, and 1753] "[U]pon any invasion of an enemy by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * have full power and authority to levy, raise, arm, and muster, such a number of forces, out of the militia * * * as shall be thought needful for repelling the invasion, or suppressing the insurrection, or other danger, and the same to lead, conduct, march, transport and employ * * * for the suppressing of all such insurrections, and repelling of all such invasions * * * ; and such forces again to discharge and disband, as the cause of danger ceases, for which they were so raised."{EN-790}
>
> • [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[U]pon any invasion of any enemy, by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * shall have full power and authority to levy, raise, arm and muster such number of forces out of the militia * * * as shall be thought needful for repelling the invasion, or suppressing the insurrection or other danger; and the same to lead, conduct, march, transport and employ * * * for the suppressing and repelling of all such invasions and insurrections, and such forces again to discharge and disband as the cause of danger ceases."{EN-791}
>
> • [1780] "[W]hereas by the arts of the enemy joined by disaffected persons, riots have taken place in some counties injurious to the peace and dignity of government; to prevent such pernicious practices in future, and in order to aid the civil power in the due and effectual execution of the laws, Be it enacted, That wherever the governour shall have satisfactory information that any persons within this commonwealth shall be inclined to mutiny or riot, * * * he is * * * empowered to order * * * troops of horse to be raised * * * in any county where such persons shall so resist or assemble together with an intention to resist."{EN-792}

The importance of the requirements, repeated in statute after statute, that the Governor "shall have satisfactory information"—that he shall employ the Militia only for "the suppressing and repelling of all * * * invasions and insurrections" as necessitated the Militia's deployment—and especially that he should "discharge and disband [the Militia] as the cause of danger ceases" cannot be over-emphasized. His "full power and authority to levy, raise, arm and muster such a number of forces out of the militia" depended upon an actual "cause of danger", specifically in the form of an "invasion", "insurrection", or other disturbance that threatened "the due and effectual execution of the laws"—and therefore terminated as soon as that danger ran its course. Presumably, too, in the plain absence of an actual invasion, insurrection, or other dangerous disturbance, the Militia might justifiably have refused the Governor's call to "muster" and "march".

And surely Virginia's Militia would justifiably have refused a call to "muster" and "march" for a patently illegitimate purpose—as was most convincingly proven when her last Royal Governor, John Murray, the Earl of Dunmore, attempted to deploy the Colony's Militia in order to suppress what her Declaration of Rights soon thereafter denominated as "the good people of Virginia".[644] In 1775, Dunmore proclaimed that > a certain Patrick Henry * * * and a Number of deluded Followers, have taken up Arms, chosen their Officers, and styling themselves an Independent Company, have * * * put themselves in a Posture of War * * * : Wherefore I have * * * issue[d] this my Proclamation, strictly charging all Persons, upon their Allegiance, not to aid, abet, or give Countenance to, the said Patrick Henry, or any other Persons concerned in such unwarrantable Combinations; but, on the Contrary, to oppose them and their Designs by every Means; which Designs must, otherwise, inevitably involve the whole Country in the most direful Calamity, as they will call for the Vengeance of offended Majesty and the Insulted Laws, to be exerted here, to vindicate the constitutional Authority of Government.{EN-793}

When these threats of "direful Calamity" and "Vengeance" proved unavailing, Dunmore attempted to assert what he wrongly supposed were his plenary and unchallengeable gubernatorial powers:

> I do in Virtue of the Power and Authority to Me given, by His Majesty, determine to execute Martial Law, and cause the same to be executed throughout this Colony: and to the end that Peace and good Order may the sooner be restored, I do require every Person capable of bearing Arms, to resort to His Majesty's Standard, or be looked upon as Traitors to His Majesty's Crown and Government, and thereby become liable to the Penalty the Law inflicts upon such Offences; such as forfeiture of Life, confiscation of Lands, &c. &c.{EN-794}

But the patriotic Militiamen of Virginia refused to bend beneath the yoke of "Martial Law" and "to resort to His Majesty's standard".

So, during pre-constitutional times, neither was Virginia's Governor allowed to posture as some sort of what nowadays might be styled a Führer or Duce, nor did the Militia function mechanically and mindlessly as a Shutzstaffel or Praetorian Guard when the last of her Royal Governors attempted to behave in that high-handed fashion.

---

[644] The entire story of the episode appears, for example, in R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume III, "An Introductory Note", at 3-28, and with less scholarly detail but more accessibility for the average student in H.J. Eckenrode, The Revolution in Virginia (Hamden, Connecticut: Archon Books, 1964 [reprint of the 1916 edition]), Chapter II, and Michael Kranish, Flight from Monticello: Thomas Jefferson at War (New York, New York: Oxford University Press, 2010), at 45-90. These events form the foundation for the present study's survey of Independent Companies in pre-constitutional Virginia. See post, at 567-597.

7. Notwithstanding the Governor's significant measure of authority, Virginia did not organize her Militia rigidly "from the top down", on the basis of some early version of das Führerprinzip ("the Leader Principle"), but flexibly "from the bottom up", in reliance on what could be styled "the People Principle", which eventually encouraged and enabled Virginians to throw off an abusive monarchy and adopt in its place "a Republican Form of Government"[645] based fully upon "the consent of the governed".[646] Yet even this dependence on the people was not a nod towards anarchy, but instead a reinforcement of the Militia's governmental character. Virginia's *pre-*constitutional statutes drew lines of demarcation for her Militia around her Counties, the city of Williamsburg, and the Borough of Norfolk, not because these were simply convenient geographical territories in which to organize Militia units, but because they were political subdivisions that exercised the governmental authority necessary for operation of the Militia as a governmental establishment. As will be seen, though, this was governmental authority of a self-governmental character, with (as events eventually proved) the people themselves in ultimate control.[647]

C. The Militia entrusted with "police powers". The exercise of various "police powers" further evidenced that Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia were governmental institutions.

1. Suppression of crime. From the earliest days, Virginia empowered her Militia to execute the laws against criminal activities:

> • [1676] "WHEREAS of late there hath bin many unlawfull tumults, routs and riotts in divers parts of this country, for prevention of such insolences, and punishing offenders in that kind, * * * Be it therefore enacted * * * , that every respective officer and magistrate within this countrey, civill and military, from a constable to the highest civill magistrate, and from the lowest to the highest militia officer, be hereby impowered and strictly commanded for the suppressing and punishing all such unlawfull assemblies, routs, riotts and tumults, to use all lawfull wayes, authoritie, power and command, and whosoever shall be at any time disobedient to any the lawfull commands of any such civill or military officer or magistrate either in assisting, suppressing, quieting and punishing of any unlawfull assemblyes, routs or tumults * * * shall be accounted, judged and punished as mutinous and rebellious."{EN-795}
>
> • [1707] "It is * * * ordered that * * * Maj^{r} Harrison have Power to take under his Comm^{d} so many of the Militia of Surry County as he

---

[645] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[646] Compare Declaration of Independence with Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 3.

[647] See post, Chapter 21.

shall think Convenient for the better apprehending [certain suspected] murderers" among the Tuscaruro Indians.{EN-796}

• [1711] "Ordered that a detachment of the Militia * * * be forthwith sent to the Maherine [Indian] town to make Search for [certain] suspected [stolen] goods, and that upon discovery thereof they sieze all the Men of that Nation and send them under a guard to Williamsburgh in order to be examined and tryed[.]"{EN-797}

• [1732] When "a Number of the meaner sort of People of [Prince William] County consisting of fifty Men were got together in Arms designing * * * to destroy the Publick Warehouses in that & the adjacent Counties expecting to be joyn'd by other Malecontents from the neighbouring Counties", the Governor and his Council determined that, "for the more effectual Suppressing the s^{d} Insurrection it is necessary that Orders be forthwith Issued to the Comanding Officers of the Militia * * * to call together the several Troops & Companies under their respective Comands * * * & in Case the Mutineers * * * should presume to Continue in Arms that they then march ag^{t} & endeavour to suppress them".{EN-798}

2. Prevention of insurrections among the slaves. Throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, the Militia was charged with the responsibility to maintain local security in and around houses of worship:

• [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service and sermons both forenoon and afternoon, and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte."{EN-799}

• [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church uppon payne for every effence[.]"{EN-800}

• [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott[.]"{EN-801}

• [1736] The Governor issued a Proclamation which "strictly Charge[d] and Command[ed], That all Persons serving in the Militia, who shall during the * * * Holy-Days, repair to their Parish Churches or Chappels, do take with them their Arms, Ammunition, and Accoutrements; and the Captains * * * of the Militia, are to take Care the same be done accordingly".{EN-802}

• [1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]t shall and may be lawful, for the chief officer of the militia, in every county, to order all persons listed therein, to go armed to their respective parish churches[.]"{EN-803}

> • [1775] "[T]he * * * chief officer[ ] of the militia, shall and may order the other officers and soldiers under him to go armed to their parish churches on Sundays, and to any licensed meeting-houses, whenever he judges it necessary."{EN-804}

The Governor and his Council explained the intent of these statutes in 1730, in an order "that all persons repairing to their respective Churches or Chappells on Sundays or Holy Days do carry with them their arms to prevent any Surprize thereof in their Absence when the Slaves are most at Liberty & have greatest Opportunity for that purpose".{EN-805} This was no merely paranoiac concern, as plans for revolts fomented among Virginia's slaves were occasionally discovered and punished.{EN-806}

If the extensive population of slaves in pre-constitutional Virginia, with the attendant specter of slave revolts, did not counsel requiring proportionately large numbers of her Militiamen to bear arms at all times and in all places, it certainly created an apparent need to assign to her Militia (and to Militia elsewhere) the special police power to conduct regular "slave patrols".[648] For example:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, and 1744] "[C]ommanding officer[s] of the militia, in any county within this dominion * * * [may] appoint and direct such and so many of the militia of their respective counties, to be drawn out, and to patrole in such places as such commanding officer[s] shall think fit to direct, and from time to time, to cause to be relieved by other parties, for dispersing all unusual concourse of negroes, or other slaves, and for preventing any dangerous combinations which may be made amongst them at such meetings: Which said parties, so sent out to patrole, * * * shall have full power and authority to take up any slaves which they shall find convened together * * * to deliver to the next constable * * * . And if any parties of the militia be emploied in this service, for above the space of two days at any one time, such militia shall be paid[.]"{EN-807}
>
> • [1738] "[T]he chief officer of the militia, in every county, * * * [may] appoint an officer, and four men, of the militia, at such times and seasons as he shall think proper, to patrol, and visit all negro quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons. And such patrollers shall have full power and authority, to take up any such slaves, servants, or disorderly persons, * * * unlawfully assembled, or any other, strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress, or overseer, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace; who is to order every such slave, servant, stroller, or other disorderly person * * * to receive any number of lashes, not exceeding twenty, on his or her bare

---

[648] See generally Sally E. Horton, Slave Patrols: Law and Violence in Virginia and the Carolinas (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 2001).

back, well laid on: And in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies, consisting of the same number. And such patrollers shall be exempted from attendance at private [i.e., Company] musters [of the Militia], and from the paiment of all public, county, and partish levies, for their own persons, for those years in which they shall be emploied in that service."{EN-808}

• [1754] "[T]he chief officer of the militia * * * in every county * * * is hereby required * * * to appoint an officer, and so many men of the militia as to him shall appear to be necessary, not exceeding four, once in every month, or oftener if * * * required * * * , to patrol and visit all negroe quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons, and such patrolers shall have power and authority to take up any such slaves, servants, or disorderly persons * * * , unlawfully assembled, or any other strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress, or overseer, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace, who if he shall see cause, is to order every such slave, servant, stroller, or other disorderly person * * * to receive any number of lashes, not exceeding twenty, on his or her bare back well laid on: And in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies for the same service: * * * [A]nd if the[Militia officers] shall adjudge the patrollers to have performed their duty * * * the county court * * * are hereby impowered and required, at the laying of their county levy, to allow to, and levy for every one of the patrollers, ten pounds of tobacco for every twenty four hours they shall so patrole; and moreover such patrollers shall be exempt from attendance at private musters, and from the payment of public, county, and parish levies for their own persons, for those years in which they shall be employed in that service."{EN-809}

• [1755] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county * * * is hereby required * * * to appoint an officer. and so many men of the militia, as to him shall appear to be necessary, not exceeding four, once in every month or oftener * * * to patrol and visit all negroe quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons, * * * unlawfully assembled, or any other strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress or overseer, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace, who if he shall see cause, is to order every such slave, servant, stroller, or other disorderly person * * * to receive any number of lashes, not exceeding twenty, on his or her bare back, well laid on. And in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies,for the same service. * * * [A]nd if the[Militia officers] shall adjudge the patrollers to have performed their duty * * * the county court * * * are hereby impowered and required at the laying of their county

levy, to allow to, and levy for every one of the patrollers, ten pounds of tobacco for every twenty four hours they shall so patrol, and moreover, such patrollers shall be exempt from the payment of public, county, and parish levies, for their own persons, for those years in which they shall be employed in that service."{EN-810}

• [1757, 1759, and 1762] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county * * * is hereby required * * * to appoint an officer and so many men of the militia, as to him shall appear to be necessary, not exceeding four, once in every month or oftner if thereto required * * * , to patrol and visit all negroe quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons * * * , unlawfully assembled, or any other strolling about from one plantation to another without a pass from his or her master, mistress, or overseer, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace, who if he shall see cause, is to order every such slave, servant, stroller, or other disorderly person * * * to receive any number of lashes, not exceeding twenty, on his or her bare back well laid on; and in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies for the same service. * * * [A]nd if the[Militia officers] shall adjudge the patrollers to have performed their duty * * * the county court * * * are hereby impowered and required at the laying of their county levy to allow to, and levy for every one of the patrollers ten pounds of tobacco for every day or night they shall so patrol; and moreover such patrollers shall be exempt from the payment of public, county, and parish levies, for their own persons for those years in which they shall be employed in that service."{EN-811}

• [1766 and 1771] "[I]t shall and may be lawful for the chief officer of the militia in every county * * * to appoint an officer, and so many men of the militia, as to him shall appear to be necessary, not exceeding four, once in every month, or oftener if * * * required * * * , to patrol and visit all negro quarters and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons, * * * unlawfully assembled, or any other strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress or overseer, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace; who, if he shall see cause, is to order every such slave, servant, stroller, or other disorderly person * * * to receive any number of lashes, not exceeding twenty, on his or her bare back, well laid on; and in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies for the same service * * * ; and if the [county] court shall adjudge the patrollers to have performed their duty * * * , they are hereby impowered and required * * * to allow to and to levy for every one of the patrollers twenty pounds of tobacco, for every twelve hours they shall so patrol."{EN-812}

• [1775] "[T]he commanding-officer of the militia of every county, of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, shall appoint so many patrollers, as he may think fit, * * * who shall receive a reasonable allowance for their trouble, at the laying of the next county levy."{EN-813}

• [1777] "[I]t shall and may be lawful for the chief officer of the militia in every county * * * , yearly, to appoint an officer, and so many men of the militia as to him shall appear to be necessary, not exceeding four, once in every month, or oftener, if thereto required * * * , to patrol and visit all negro quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons, * * * unlawfully assembled, or any others strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress, or owner, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace, who if he shall see cause, is to order every such slave, servant, or stroller, or other disorderly person * * * to receive any number of lashes, not exceeding twenty on his or her bare back, well laid on.

"And in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies for the same service; * * * and if the[Militia officers] shall adjudge the patrollers have performed their duty * * * , the county court * * * are hereby empowered and required to levy fifteen pounds of tobacco, or two shillings and sixpence, for every twelve hours each of them shall so patrole."{EN-814}

• [1784 and 1785] "[T]he commanding officer of the militia in every county, shall * * * in every year, appoint an officer, and so many men of the militia as to him shall appear necessary, not exceeding four, once in every month, or oftener, if thereto required * * * , to patrole and visit all negro quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons * * * unlawfully assembled, or any others strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress, or owner, and carry them before the next justice of the peace, who, if he shall see cause, is to order every such slave, servant, stroller, or other disorderly person * * * to receive any number of lashes not exceeding twenty, on his or her bare back. And in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies for the same service. * * * [A]nd if the[court-martial] shall adjudge the patrollers have performed their duty * * * the county court * * * are thereupon empowered and required to levy twenty pounds of tobacco, or three shillings, for every twelve hours each of them shall so patrole."{EN-815}

The governmental nature of this activity is doubly apparent. First, inasmuch as slaves in Virginia were their owners' private property, when conducting "patrols" that doubtlessly often resulted in seizures and bodily punishment of the errant bondsmen, Militiamen were performing as a matter of routine a task that no one without express governmental authority could have undertaken except in such exigent circumstances as self-defense. Second, Militiamen were paid with public funds from some "county levy"—and for many years were also exempted from regular Militia musters, as well as being excused from "the payment of public, county, and parish levies for their own persons"—which public benefits would never have been granted to individuals performing some purely private function.

Virginia's "slave patrols" were prototypical "police forces", in every sense in which that term would be used today. In particular, they exercised the powers to patrol; to conduct surveillance of streets and roads where suspicious "strollers" might have been found; to investigate "places" which might have been the scenes of illicit activities; to stop and interrogate questionable characters in order to ascertain their identities and reasons for being abroad; to arrest any "disorderly persons" or other individuals whom they suspected of wrongdoing; and to turn over to judicial authorities for trial and punishment the persons they detained. In addition, although typically denominated "slave patrols", the Militia's jurisdiction extended as well to "servants" (who were not slaves) and "other disorderly persons" (all of whom presumably were free men and women). Furthermore, although typically the statutes directed the appointment of only a single patrol consisting of an officer and four men in each County, they also allowed for as many "more companies" to be mustered as might have been needed. And although generally the statutes mandated only one patrol each month, they also allowed for deployment to be made "oftener" if necessary. So, depending upon circumstances, *an*y greater number of Militiamen could have been called forth on *an*y more comprehensive schedule. Thus, Virginia's organization of her Militia for "slave patrols" was, in principle at least, actually superior to the organization of professional police and Sheriffs' departments in the several States today. For contemporary law-enforcement agencies are limited in the numbers of their personnel, with no significant ability to mobilize in their support the vast reserve of men and women who would be available—sufficiently trained in the basics of law-enforcement to complement, supplement, and otherwise support the regular forces of officers—were "the Militia of the several States" properly revitalized.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Every able-bodied adult free male resident in pre-constitutional Virginia had an enforceable duty to serve in her Militia in some capacity, but with the burdens of service spread so as to minimize their impacts on society.

The modern ultra-"libertarian" notion that men living in society labor under no duties to one another beyond those they voluntarily assume perforce of contracts every detail of which they freely negotiate amongst themselves flies in the face of traditional American political philosophy, which holds that a valid "social contract" must conform to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God"—"Laws" that are the products neither of human "contracts" nor even of human will.[649] During the pre-constitutional era, the vast majority of Virginians undoubtedly would have agreed with Blackstone that "civil liberty, rightly understood, consists in protecting the rights of individuals by the united force of society: society cannot be maintained, and of course can exert no protection, without obedience to some sovereign power: and obedience is an empty name, if every individual has a right to decide how far he himself shall obey".[650] As a practical consequence of this understanding, Virginians of that time generally held to the political and legal precept that free men should volunteer, and if they did not volunteer could and should be compelled, to defend—if needs be, with their very own lives—the society in, through, and by the aid of which they enjoyed their freedoms. So, throughout that era, Virginia regulated her Militia on the basis of three principles:

- near-universality—that all those eligible for service under arms should serve, by choice if possible and coercion if necessary;
- ubiquity—that everywhere within her territory, at all times, and in anticipation of every danger eligible residents should be suitably armed and trained; and
- equality—that the burdens of service should weigh no more heavily on some than on others, unless disproportionate duties would subserve a palpable public good.

For example:

---

[649] See Declaration of Independence.

[650] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 251.

• [1648] "THIS Assembly haveing knowledge that divers persons vpon occasion of a presse of souldiers by warrant from the Govern'r * * * out of a mistake in opinion do conceive their liberties and the lawes of the collonie thereby infringed and themselves particularly injured, the authority of an Assembly not concurring therein. It is therefore thought fitt * * * to declare the judgment of this Assembly * * * that * * * full and ample power is derived from his Majesty to the Governour and Council to make peace or warr, and as a necessary consequent to levy or presse men and other provisions for the warr vpon any emergent occasion[.]"{EN-816}

• [1672 and 1676] "[A]s against all tymes of danger it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service[.]"{EN-817}

• [1776] "That a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free State" and "that standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty[.]"{EN-818}

• [1779] "[I]t is just that the whole community should bear an equal part in publick defence[.]"{EN-819}

A. Impressment a general practice. Pursuant to this understanding, from the very beginning Virginia consistently asserted a sovereign right and power to require all able-bodied adult free men resident within her territory—except those to whom the General Assembly extended limited exemptions for some necessary and sufficient reason consistent with the common defense and the general welfare[651]—to perform various public services of a military or police nature in her Militia or regular armed forces:

• [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service * * * , and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte."{EN-820}

• [1624 and 1632] "That no man go or send abroad without a sufficient partie will armed" and "[t]hat men go not to worke in the ground without their arms (and a centinell upon them)."{EN-821}

• [1629] "[E]very commander of the severall plantations appointed by commission from the governor shall have power and authoritie to levy a partie of men out of the inhabitants of that place soe many as may well be spared without too much weakening of the plantations and to imploy these men against the Indians[.]"{EN-822}

• [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church[.]"{EN-823}

---

[651] See post, Chapter 22.

• [1639] "ALL persons except negroes to be provided with arms and amunition or be fined[.]"{EN-824}

• [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott[.]"{EN-825}

• [1644] "[T]he * * * counsell of warr shall have power to leavie such and soe manie men, arms, ammunition and other necessaries as emergencie of occasions shall require[.]"{EN-826}

• [1659 and 1662] "[T]hat a provident supplie be made of gunn powder and shott to our owne people, and this strictly to bee lookt to by the officers of the militia, (vizt.) That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least which are to be provided by every man for his family[.]"{EN-827}

• [1672] "[A]s against all tymes of danger it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service[.]"{EN-828}

• [1687] "His Excellency [the Governor] acquainting the Councell of the unsetled state of his Maj^{ties} Militia in this Collony, and that for the future the same may be brought into a better Method, * * * it is hereby Ordered, that the Collonells & Justices of every County * * * doe at their next County Court take an acc^{t} of all the ablest Freeholders and Inhabitants in their respective Counties that are Qualified either in Estate or person to finde and Maintaine a Man & Horse to be listed in a Troope for that County, or goe themselves when Occasion shall require, & likewise an account of all other Freeholders and Inhabitants that are fitt to be Listed for foot, and returne the Same to his Excellency[.]"{EN-829}

• [1690] The Governor admonished the Sheriffs that, "[h]aving observed in my being at Severall exercises of some of y^{e} Militia of this Colony that divers persons are resident in Severall Counties who for that they are neither free holders nor housekeepers, are not listed in y^{e} troops or foot Companies of y^{e} s^{d} Counties; and thereby want being exercised which should make them fit and Serviceable * * * to * * * this Country: when occasion should require they being full as proper as any. I do therefore * * * Comand * * * you publickly make known * * * that all tithables within your said County, (slaves and two other Servants in a family onely excepted) and all others without exception who have been resident in your s^{d} County one moneth, and are not listed, do within one moneth * * * list themselves either in y^{e} Troops or foot Compa^{s} of your said County, and provide themselves with armes and amunicon according to Law; And that you acquaint y^{e} Cap^{ts} of y^{e} Militia that they * * * return to y^{e} Comanders in Cheif, y^{e} names of all y^{e} Soldiers under their respective Comands, and that they take care none escape being listed."{EN-830}

• [1699] "[I]f any pirates, privateers or sea robers * * * shall land and put on shoar * * * , all officers civill and military are hereby required * * * to raise and levy such a number of well armed men as he or they shall judge necessary for the seizing, apprehending and carrying to goal of all and every such person or persons[.]"{EN-831}

• [1702] "And y^{t} y^{e} present State of y^{e} Militia * * * may be better known", the Governor ordered the "Commanders in chief of every respective County, to cause y^{e} Captains of y^{e} severall troops and Companys * * * at * * * particular Musters to examine and enquire what officers and Souldiers are dead since y^{e} last list of y^{e} Militia * * * was returned What officers are put in y^{e} Place of those deceased and what new additions of men have been made since y^{e} said time and how their said troops and Companys are now armed[.]"{EN-832}

• [1703] Recognizing that "the most effectual means for the defence of th[e] Colony depends upon the well ordering and disciplining the Militia", the Governor ordered the "Commanders in cheif of each County * * * to appoint a Gen^{ll} Muster of all the Militia under their respective commands, and take especial care & give strict directions that all Persons serving in the Militia be well provided with arms & ammunition according to Law. And * * * to give directions to the Captains of each Troop & Company * * * duly to exercise their said Troops & Companys once every three weeks, and to take care that all Persons without Priveledge or exemption be listed & Personally Performe their duty at the said Musters."{EN-833}

• [1705] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county have full power and authority to list all male persons whatsoever, from sixteen to sixty years of age, within his respective county, to serve in horse or foot[.]

* * * * *

" * * * That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * make * * * a new list of all the male persons in his respective county capable * * * to serve in the militia * * * to the end each trouper or ffoot soldier may be thereby guided to provide and furnish himself with * * * arms and ammunition[.]"{EN-834}

• [1723] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county, have full power and authority to list all free male persons whatsoever, from twenty-one to sixty years of age, * * * to serve in horse or foot[.]

* * * * *

" * * * That nothing * * * shall hinder or debar any captain from admitting any able-bodied white person, who shall be above the age of sixteen years, to serve in his troop or company, in the place of any person required by this act to be listed."{EN-835}

• [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, and 1753] "[U]pon any invasion of an enemy by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * have full power and authority to levy, raise, arm, and muster, such a number of forces, out of the militia * * * as shall be thought needful for repelling the invasion, or suppressing the insurrection, or other danger[.]"{EN-836}

• [1738] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons, above the age of one and twenty years, within this colony, under the command of such captains as he shall think fit."{EN-837}

• [1755] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within this colony, (imported servants excepted) under the command of such captain, as he shall think fit[.]"{EN-838}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "That upon any invasion of any enemy, by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * shall have full power and authority to levy, raise, arm and muster such a number of forces out of the militia of this colony as shall be thought needful for repelling the invasion, or suppressing the insurrection or other danger[.]

* * * * *

" * * *[T]o the end a sufficient number of men may be appointed for guarding the batteries erected in the several rivers of this dominion, and to assist in the better managing the great guns there mounted, when occasion shall be, It is hereby further enacted, That it shall * * * be lawful for the governor * * * to appoint and assign such a number of the militia as he shall think fit to attend the said batteries, * * * which number of the militia shall be drafted out of any of the militia of the county by the commanding officer of such county in which such battery is or shall be erected, and shall be exempted from all private musters, except at such battery only during their attendance at such battery[.]"{EN-839}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia, in every county, except the county of Hampshire, shall list all male persons above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within this colony (imported servants excepted) under the command of such captain as he shall think fit[.]"{EN-840}

• [1763] "The Council * * * were of Opinion that calling the [General] Assembly at this Juncture would be of no use, in as much as could they be prevail'd on to Levy Troops, they could not be rais'd in time to be of service this Year: They therefore advised [the Governor] to order Colo. Stephen to draught five hundred Men * * * out of [certain Counties], in proportion to the number of Militia in each County and to appoint Colo. Andrew Lewis County Lieutenant of Augusta, with directions to draught out of the Militia in that County as many Men as can well be spared, and then apply to [certain other Counties] for such a proportion of their Militia as he shall think will enable him to defend the Frontiers[.]"{EN-841}

• [1775] "[C]ertain portions of the militia throughout the whole colony should be regularly enlisted, under the denomination of minute-men, and more strictly trained to proper discipline than hath been hitherto customary, * * * from the age of sixteen to fifty[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [I]n each county * * * all free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, above the age of sixteen, and under fifty years, except such as are * * * excepted [by statute], shall be enlisted into the militia[.]"{EN-842}

• [1775] "And for the more expeditious, convenient, and speedy draughting into service detachments of the militia * * * , as occasion may arise, Be it farther ordained, That, at the general muster * * * the commanding-officer of each county or corporation shall, by fair and equal lot, cause to be drawn out of each company so many men as will amount to one tenth part thereof, and cause the names of the persons so allotted to be enrolled * * * as the first division of militia for such county or corporation; and * * * shall in like manner proceed, by lot, to fix * * * nine other divisions * * * ; and thereafter, if the militia * * * shall be called into duty, the same shall be performed by the divisions, in the order they shall so stand enrolled, one after another, so as to preserve the regular rotation of duty amongst them.

* * * * *

"Provided always, That if there shall * * * be a sufficient number of men, who will voluntarily enter into the service, to answer the demand made upon the militia * * * , such volunteers shall be accepted instead of calling on the divisions[.]"{EN-843}

• [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years [with various exceptions] * * shall * * * be enrolled or formed into [Militia] companies[.]

* * * * *

" * * * Every captain * * * shall, at every general muster, make up and report to his county lieutenant a state of the company last assigned to him, noting therein such as are dead, removed, or exempted, and adding the names of such persons, not already enrolled, as * * * ought to be enrolled[.]"{EN-844}

• [1777] "FOR making provision against invasions and insurrections, and laying the burthen thereof equally on all: Be it enacted * * * , That the division of the militia of each county into ten parts * * * shall be completed and kept up * * * , each part to be distinguished by fair and equal lot * * * .

" * * * The several divisions of the militia * * * shall be called into duty by regular rotation * * * ; and every person failing to attend when called on, or to send an able bodied man in his room, shall, unless there be good excuse, be considered as a deserter, and suffer accordingly. Any able bodied volunteers who will enter into the service shall be accepted instead of so many divisions of the militia * * * , or of the particular person in whose room they may offer to serve; but if the invasion or insurrection be so near and pressing as not to allow the delay of calling the division * * * next in turn, the commanding officer may call on such part of the militia as shall be most convenient to continue in duty until such division * * * can come in to supply their places."{EN-845}

• [1777] "FOR forming the citizens of Williamsburg, borough of Norfolk, and the professors and students of William and Mary college, into a militia, and better disciplining them: Be it enacted * * * , That all male persons between the ages of sixteen and fifty years, within the * * * city or borough, [with certain exceptions] * * * shall * * * be enrolled and formed into companies[.]"{EN-846}

• [1780] "WHEREAS a dangerous invasion of South Carolina now threatens * * * that state, and the troops engaged in its defence may be overpowered by superiour numbers, if timely aid not be sent to them. And as it is incumbent upon this state, on every principle of policy and good neighbourhood, to assist our friends and fellow citizens in distress, as speedily and effectually as possible; Be it enacted * * * That two thousand five hundred infantry be forthwith called into service, in legal rotation, from [certain] counties, and in [certain] proportions[.]

* * * * *

" * * * If any * * * soldier shall fail to attend when summoned, not having a just and reasonable excuse, or refuse to march when ordered into actual service according to his tour of duty, or find an able bodied man in his room, * * * such offender shall serve as a regular soldier in the troops of the state eight months[.]"{EN-847}

• [1780] "[T]hree thousand men shall be forthwith raised for the purpose of completing this state's quota of continental forces * * * . The several counties and corporations within this commonwealth * * * shall * * * furnish * * * after their militia shall have been laid off into divisions * * * one fifteenth man of such of their militia as exceed the age of eighteen years, including all * * * officers under the age of fifty years * * * . The * * * commanding officer of each county or corporation * * * shall * * * divide the county and militia into as many separate districts and divisions as the number of men required [to be drafted] * * * , in which districts they shall include all the assessable property * * * , and shall so arrange it * * * as to have as equal a distribution thereof as the nature of the case will admit among the several divisions, which shall consist, as nearly as may be, of fifteen men each. The divisions * * * may collect

among themselves any sum of money * * * and deposit it in the hands of some one of their body * * * , who shall * * * recruit a man to serve in the continental army * * * ; and if any division shall then fail to deliver a recruit * * * the * * * commanding officer * * * shall * * * draft an able bodied man by fair and impartial lot out of such division, to serve in the continental army * * * ; who may nevertheless be permitted to procure an able bodied man in his room; and any person who * * * shall enlist an able bodied soldier to serve in his stead during the war, shall * * * be exempted from all future drafts, except in case of actual invasion[.]"{EN-848}

• [1782] "FOR the more speedy recruiting this state's quota of troops in the continental service, Be it enacted, That three thousand men, of able bodies and sound minds, at least five feet four inches high, * * * and between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, shall be forthwith raised * * * : One able-bodied man * * * for every fifteen militia-men. And for effecting that purpose in the most equitable manner,

" * * * [Certain officers] of the militia * * * shall * * * divide each county into as many classes or districts as there are men required * * * , making such classes as equal as may be, having regard as well to an equal proportion of taxable property in the county, including the property of exempts, as the number of able-bodied men. * * *

" * * * [E]ach class or district * * * shall * * * enlist * * * one man * * * to serve as a soldier in the continental army for three years or during the war, * * * or pay a sum equal to one eighth part of the taxes payable by the several persons of which such class shall consist * * * to such person as they * * * shall appoint * * * . And in case of failure of the payment * * * or delivering such soldier * * * the class * * * may choose a collector * * * to receive the sums payable from the individuals of such class, or to enlist such soldier; * * * and in case the same shall not be paid or such soldier enlisted * * * [the] commanding officer of the company to which [the] delinquents * * * belong * * * [shall] cause one of the * * * able-bodied militia-men to be drafted, by fair and equal ballot[.]"{EN-849}

• [1784 and 1785] "[A]ll free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, [with certain exceptions] * * * shall be enrolled or formed into [Militia] companies[.]

* * * * *

" * * * Every captain * * * of a company * * * shall, within ten days after every regimental and general muster, make up and report to the commanding officer * * * a return of his company, * * * noting therein such as have died, removed, been exempted or added, and all persons within the bounds of his company not on his roll, who ought to be enrolled."{EN-850}

B. Source of the power of impressment. The foregoing establishes that a general power to impress men for military duty plainly existed and was regularly exercised in *pre-*constitutional Virginia. But from what source did this power derive?

1. Certainly not from any notion that every "government" claims the power to impose "slavery" or "involuntary servitude" on "its subjects", as many modern ultra-"libertarians" complain. Pre-constitutional Virginians would have scoffed at the charge that compulsory service in their own Militia—"composed of the body of the people" themselves, "trained to arms"[652]—constituted "slavery", "involuntary servitude", or any state or status akin to either of them. To the contrary: Virginians of that era would surely have agreed with Blackstone's admonition that

> [t]wo precautions are * * * advised to be observed in all prudent and free governments: 1. To prevent the introduction of slavery at all: or, 2. If it be already introduced, not to intrust those slaves with arms; who will then find themselves an overmatch for the freemen.[653]

So, true slaves—of which Virginia then had no dearth—were debarred from her Militia, and generally prohibited even from possessing firearms except under strict supervision.[654] And inasmuch as a, if not the, distinctive mark of slaves was their disability to keep and bear arms, while under the yoke of masters who were thoroughly armed, Virginians who were compelled to be armed along with the vast majority of their fellow citizens from every socio-economic class were not slaves—and in light of their armament and training, and the self-consciousness of their own physical power, could not have been reduced to slavery. So, some other basis must be found for the governmental authority for general impressment.

2. In his discussion "OF THE MILITARY AND MARITIME STATES" under English law, Blackstone related nothing in haec verba about the impressment of soldiers for the regular British Army, but observed only that,

> [W]HEN the nation [that is, England] was engaged in war, more veteran troops and more regular discipline were esteemed to be necessary, than could be expected from a mere militia. And therefore at such times more rigorous methods were put in use for the raising of armies and the due regulation and discipline of the soldiery: which are to be looked upon only as temporary excrescences bred out of the distemper of the state, and not as any part of the permanent and perpetual laws of the kingdom.[655]

With respect to the British Navy, however, although he opined that "[T]HE maritime state is * * * much more agreeable to the principles of our free constitution", he also pointed out that

---

[652] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[653] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 416.

[654] See post, at 365-369 and 733-742.

[655] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 412 (emphasis supplied).

> [t]he power of impressing men for the sea service by the king's commission, has been a matter of some dispute, and submitted to with great reluctance; though * * * the practice of impressing * * * is of very antient date, and hath been uniformly continued by a regular series of precedents to the present time * * * . The difficulty arises * * * that no statute has expressly declared this power to be in the crown, though many of them very strongly imply it. * * * All which do most evidently imply a power of impressing to reside somewhere; and, if any where, it must * * * reside in the crown alone.
>
> *BUT * * * this method of impressing * * * is only defensible from public necessity, to which all private considerations must give way*[.][656]

On this point, American political philosophy went beyond Blackstone. In 1776, the Declaration of Independence—which summarized the Colonists' understanding of the fundamental principles of political science applicable to them; from which the Constitution, the States' constitutions, and all the laws of this country thereafter derived; and upon which they all still depend for their legitimacy[657]—implicitly identified the source of the power of impressment as "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", from which issued the people's "right", and "their duty, to throw off [an abusive] Government" by force "whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of [men's 'unalienable Rights']".[658] Because the people as a whole have a political "duty, to throw off such Government", that "duty" can—indeed, as a true "duty" should and must—be enforced by the community on each of its members as an individual.

That same year, Virginia, too, endorsed the very same principle: "[W]henever any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to the[ ] purposes [of securing the common benefit, protection, and security of the community], a majority of the community hath an indubitable, unalienable, and indefeasible right, to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal".[659] An "indubitable" right is one that is "[u]ndoubted; unquestionable"; an "indefeasable" right, one that is "irrevocable"; an "unalienable" right, one "of which the property may [not] be transferred".[660] So, in the ordinary course of human events, the right "to reform, alter, or abolish" a government is as much under the majority's permanent and complete control—in conformity, of course, with "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God"—as is [656] Id., Volume 1, at 418-419 (emphasis supplied).

---

[657] See ante, at 22-27.

[658] Emphasis supplied.

[659] Declaration of Rights art. 3.

[660] See S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions. Johnson spelled "indefeasible" as "indefeisible".

conceivable. Because, in the ordinary course of events, a majority of the community exercises such an absolute "right" on behalf of the community as a whole and in its interest, and because the only way to effectuate that "right" may be by the application of main force against the community's enemies, therefore the minority of the community must labor under a corresponding duty to assist the majority in that regard—a duty the fulfillment of which the majority may compel by force. Yet it may also come to pass in extraordinary circumstances that the majority of the community aligns itself against the whole community's true interests, or in league with the community's foreign or domestic enemies, and thereby becomes a dangerous "faction", "united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community".[661] In that eventuality, the minority of the community which remains committed to securing the community's "permanent and aggregate interests" may compel the errant majority to participate in fulfilling the whole people's duty "to throw off [an abusive] Government". Meaning that the doctrine of universal impressment applies in favor of whichever segment of the community truly represents what is actually "conducive to the public weal".

Moreover, if the doctrine of the people's right and duty to abolish a bad government by force may not have been in the forefront of Americans' political discussions prior to the 1770s, certainly its correlate was, that it is the people's right and duty to maintain and defend a good government in the first place, "reform[ing]" or "alter[ing]" it incrementally if necessary; and to deter rogue public officials from transmogrifying a good government into a bad one. Meaning that the doctrine of universal impressment applies at all times.[662]

3. The universal and compulsory nature of the Militia is not merely an arbitrary policy that even the largest majority of citizens can change to suit its fancy. Quite the contrary. The Declaration of Independence did not create this set of interlocking and mutually dependent rights and duties ex nihilo. Rather, the Declaration treated and relied upon it as part of a collection of preëxistent "truths", generally recognized "to be self-evident" and with unchallengeable legal force, that enjoyed a status superior to any British law, because it provided the justification for supplanting British law in the Colonies. The source of these rights and duties the Declaration identified as "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God". For it was those "Laws" that "entitled" Americans "to assume among the powers of the earth, [a] separate and equal station". And the Colonists achieved this separation by forcibly "throw[ing] off [the British] Government". Therefore, a people seeking to enjoy "certain unalienable Rights", and to live under "Governments * * * deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed", have the absolute right, and labor under the absolute duty, to organize themselves in Militia—absolute, because this right and duty arise out of "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", which no merely human positive law can annul. Thus, the Militia do not derive from a political power of universal impressment—for a power of universal impressment could conceivably be employed to oppress the people; rather, the political power of universal impressment derives from the necessity for the Militia under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", and must be exercised so as to preserve the Militia as "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state", because "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State".[663]

---

[661] The Federalist No. 10 (James Madison).

[662] Today, these ideas would be explained on economic, as well as political, grounds. If some members of the community take up arms in its defense, and prevail, every member of the community will benefit, including those who do nothing. Conceivably, the malign self-interest of too many shirkers in receiving a "free ride" on the efforts of others could endanger everyone, by preventing an adequate defense from being mounted. To forefend this, coercion of the entire community through some variety of impressment—whether of persons, or property, or both—is warranted. See generally Mancur Olson, The Logic of Collective Action: Public Goods and the Theory of Groups (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, Revised Edition, 1971).

4. For that reason, from her earliest days, Virginia could safely take the practical position that her sovereign power of impressment would override "all private considerations". From time to time, Virginia did raise regular troops. But the first call on Virginians for participation in community self-defense always came from her Militia. Before anything else, every able-bodied free man was already drafted into the Militia as a consequence simply of his residence within the jurisdiction. Some might be exempted from service, in large measure or small.[664] But no one who was neither physically incapable of service (the very young, the very old, and the infirm), nor politically ineligible for service (women, slaves, and most people of color), enjoyed an immunity from impressment. Thus, the only individuals who remained subject to impressment outside of the Militia were those who either were not able-bodied at all (and therefore as a practical matter were ineligible for any draft) or were altogether excluded from normal Militia duty on some other ground (which constituted an extremely small, usually nonexistent, set of individuals). Any significant draft for the purpose of raising regular troops, then, had to came from among those who in principle at least were already Militiamen. That is, almost all of the men drafted to serve as regular troops had to be drafted out of the Militia. So a draft of men into Virginia's regular troops derived from and was an extension of the original draft of all able-bodied free men into the Militia, in effect "a draft upon a draft". A draft for the regular troops, moreover, could never be deemed generally superior to the original draft for the Militia, in the sense that the regular troops could always claim the first call on all of the available men, because that claim had already been settled in favor of for the all-important purpose of guaranteeing "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state" through the Militia.

---

[663] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 and U.S. Const. amend. II (emphases supplied).

[664] See post, Chapter 22.

Thus, any "draft upon a draft" labored under the inherent limitation that impressment for the regular Armed Forces could draw men from the Militia only up to the point at which a dangerous "standing army" might thereby be created, and the Militia sufficiently weakened by such attrition that it might be unable to oppose that army. Especially in Virginia, Americans in the *pre-*constitutional era knew the difference between their Militia and "standing armies"—namely, that "the people" in their Militia, on the one hand, and "standing armies", on the other hand, were categorically different things, and all too often mutual antagonists: "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state", but "standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty".[665] So, today, any drafts for "standing armies" in America must be put into practice according to the principles of constitutional federalism and therefore be based upon a strictly limited power to withdraw men from the States' Militia.[666]

C. The reserved power of the people to impress themselves. As evidenced by such designations as "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes", "ALL persons except negroes", and "every man able to beare armes", as well as the extremes of the ages upon and to which men were required to serve in the Militia at various times—the lowest being sixteen, the highest being sixty, years—*pre-*constitutional Virginia asserted and enforced a right and power to call forth essentially every free man of any age who presumably was physically, mentally, and emotionally capable of performing such service. That, from time to time, the extremities of actual mandatory service were narrowed or expanded—from "ALL men" and "ALL persons" of any age (in 1632 and 1639); to "every man able to beare armes" whatever his age (in 1659 and 1661); to sixteen to sixty years of age (in 1705); to twenty-one to sixty, with individuals sixteen to twenty permitted to volunteer in someone else's stead (in 1723); to over twenty-one (in 1738); to eighteen to sixty (in 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771); to sixteen to fifty (in 1775 and 1777); to eighteen to fifty (in 1780, 1784, and 1785)[667]—was no denial of Virginia's authority to require Militia service from individuals then outside of the statutorily stipulated ranges, but merely the exercise of her privilege to create temporary exemptions from universal service, based on age, when mobilization of her entire male population was considered unnecessary. In principle, every able-bodied adult free male residing in Virginia—which the range of ages from sixteen to sixty fairly well defined as a practical generality—was always a member of the Militia, in the sense that he labored under a permanent duty to serve whenever summoned.

---

[665] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[666] See post, Chapter 49.

[667] See post, at 611-614.

Which age-groups were actually called forth to fulfill that inchoate duty, the exact terms of each man's actual service, and the formalities under which that service might be required, however, depended upon other factors, such as the numbers of men of various ages and abilities available, the immediacy and severity of the threats the community faced, the types of duty deemed appropriate from one time to another, and the responsibilities to the community other than Militia service under which certain individuals labored. For example, in 1705 the Militia statute provided that > nothing * * * shall * * * give any power or authority * * * to list [in the Militia] any person that shall be, or shall have been of her majesty's councill in this colony, or any person that shall be, or shall have been the speaker of the house of burgesses, or any person that shall be, or shall have been her majesty's attorney general, or any person that shall be, or shall have been a justice of the peace within this colony, or any person that shall have born any military commission within this colony as high as the commission of a captain, or any minister, or the clerk of the councill for the time being, or the clerk of the general court for the time being, or any county court clerk during his being such, or any parish clerk or schoolmaster during his being such, or any overseer that hath four or more slaves under his care, or any constable during his being such, or any miller who hath a mill in keeping, or any servant by importation, or any slave, but that all and every such person * * * be exempted from serving in either the horse or foot. * * *

>
> Provided always, That if any overseer * * * exempted from being listed shall appear at any muster, either of horse or foot, he shall appear in arms fit for exercise, and shall perform his duty as other private soldiers do * * * . But for as much as severall of the persons exempted * * * , though they be of sufficient ability to find and keep a serviceable horse and horse arms, and such men whose personal service may not only be usefull, but necessary upon an insurrection or invasion, * * * will perhaps account themselves free from provideing and keep the same at the places of their abode, which is not intended:
>
> Be it therefore enacted * * * That the persons of a councellor, of a speaker of the house of burgesses, of a justice of the peace, of an attorney-general, and of a captain or an higher officer in the militia, are exempted from being listed and serving either in the horse or foot under command as the rest of the militia do, merely for the dignity of the office which they do or shall have held, and that * * * it is the true intent and meaning of this act, that all and every such person * * * , and also the clerk of the councill, the clerk of the general court, and every county court clerk shall provide and keep * * * at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition * * * , and to produce * * * the same * > * * in the county wherein they respectively reside yearly, and every year at the generall muster * * * .

>
> And in case of any rebellion or invasion shall also be obliged to appear when thereunto required, and serve in such stations as are suitable for gentlemen, under the direction of the * * * chief officer of the county where * * * they shall reside, under the same penaltys as any other person * * * enjoyned to be listed in the militia[.]{EN-851}

So, although not even allowed to be "listed", an overseer who "appear[ed] at any muster * * * [was to] appear in arms fit for exercise, and * * * perform his duty as other private soldiers d[id]". And other individuals, although excluded from "being listed and serving" perforce of their public offices, were nonetheless obliged to keep horses, arms, and ammunition; to produce that equipment "yearly" in their Counties and "every year at the generall muster"; and to serve in the field "in case of any rebellion or invasion". Moreover, these individuals were recognized as being part of the Militia—simply "exempted from being listed and serving either in the horse or foot under command as the rest of the militia do, merely for the dignity of the office which they * * * h[e]ld"; and "under the same penaltys *as any other person * * * enjoyned to be listed in the militia*".

For another example, in 1784 and 1785, although the Militia statutes required that "all free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years * * * be enrolled", they also provided that > whereas, it will be of great utility and advantage in establishing a well disciplined militia, to annex to each regiment a light company, to be formed of young men, from eighteen to twenty-five years old, whose activity and domestic circumstances will admit of a frequency of training, and strictness of discipline, not practicable for the militia in general, and returning to the main body on their arrival at the latter period, will be constantly giving thereto a military pride and experience, from which the best of consequences will result;

>
> * * * [T]he governor * * * shall * * * for each county, appoint and commission for each regiment therein [certain officers] of the most proper persons therefor, for a light company * * * . The captain * * * shall * * * enroll * * * a sufficient number of young men * * * . And as the men of such light company shall * * * arrive at the age of twenty-five years, * * * the county lieutenant * * * shall order them to be enrolled in the [regular] company whose districts they may respectively live in, and deficiencies shall be supplied by new enrollments.{EN-852}

This illustrated operational differentiations within the Militia based on the ages of men "whose activity and domestic circumstances will admit of a frequency of training", but nonetheless for the purpose of "establishing a well disciplined militia" overall. The young men in a "light company" were not some separate establishment, but merely an "annex to each regiment" who would "return[ ] to the main body" as they grew older.

Thus, formal "listing", "enrolling", or even "forming into companies" or special units did not create or define an individual's membership in the Militia, but followed from and evidenced the statutory activation of that membership. "Listing" or "enrolling" was merely the formality of recording the presence in the jurisdiction of individuals from whom the statutes required actual performance of Militia duties. "Listing" took men from membership in the Militia in principle to membership in practice. Both then and now, however, recordation was and is never the dispositive matter. An event occurs or a status obtains as the consequence of some fact, whether or not a formal record of it is made. Reality does not depend upon compliance with bureaucratic procedures and paperwork.[668] Nonetheless, "listing" was of practical import, because it brought to each individual Militiaman's attention in a formal manner the necessity to fulfill then and there the personal duties always incumbent upon him as a member of the community—as in 1705, when the statute required "a new list of all the male persons * * * capable * * * to serve in the militia * * * *to the end each trouper or ffoot soldier may be thereby guided to provide and furnish himself with * * * arms and ammunition*".{EN-853}

An absence of "listing" by itself—or even the absence of a statute providing for "listing"—could never have denied or precluded then, and cannot deny or preclude now, any man's actual (as opposed to merely formal) membership in the Militia. This is because, in an extreme situation, WE THE PEOPLE who constitute the Militia must be able to act on their own initiative, without observing any possibly inhibitory formalities demanded of them by rogue public officials whose acts of usurpation and tyranny THE PEOPLE must resist, and whose persons in places of public trust they must replace.

1. Summing up the political philosophy "the good people of Virginia" asserted during the *pre-*constitutional era, Virginia's Declaration of Rights announced in June of 1776:

> THAT all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

---

[668] For example, a birth certificate records a birth—but the certificate is not what causes an individual to be an human being, or to be born, or to be born in a certain country, or to be the child of certain parents, with all of the rights, powers, privileges, and immunities appertaining to that nature and those circumstances. Rather, the certificate simply records those facts, which are wholly independent of, subject to proof in ways other than by reference to, and legally consequential even without, that document.

> * * * * *
>
> * * * That government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security, of the people, nation, or community; * * * and that whenever any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes, a majority of the community hath an indubitable, unalienable, and indefeasible right, to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * That a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state[.]{EN-854}

Because "all men * * * by nature * * * have certain inherent rights" of which they cannot be "deprive[d] or divest[ed]"; and because one of these is the right to a "government * * * instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people"; and because "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state"—therefore, "the good people" of every "free state", or every "good people" seeking to live in a "free state", enjoy and may exercise an "indubitable, unalienable, and indefeasible right" to form and deploy themselves in Militia for the purpose of "reform[ing], alter[ing], or abolish[ing]" a rogue governmental apparatus "in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal", whenever and however in their own discretion they deem such a course unavoidably necessary.

Obviously, "the good people" must take this action while the rogue governmental apparatus is still in existence and (presumably) resisting their efforts, and before they have instituted a new government. For that reason, the legitimacy of their actions cannot be contingent upon any constitutional provision, statute, or other form of permission of or from either the rogue government, which is in the process of abolition, or the new government, which at that point may not even be in the process of construction. Instead, their authority must rest upon the principle that "all men * * * by nature * * * have certain inherent rights" that neither derive their existence from nor depend for their enforcement upon governments, constitutions, and statutes—and that one (or a complex) of these inherent rights empowers them to form "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".

As a corollary of this inherent right of community self-preservation, self-defense, self-help, and self-regeneration, rogue public officials are rightless and powerless, both legally and morally, to interpose any of their purported "governmental authority" against the people's self-mobilization of their Militia under such circumstances. For, by definition, rogue public officials have forfeited all claims to legitimate "governmental authority". And those officials who proceed mistakenly, albeit arguably in good faith, lack "governmental authority" to the extent of their errors. Neither the studied malevolence nor the simple ignorance of temporary officeholders can bind "the good people" where their inherent rights are at stake. That, after all, is the operational meaning of an "inherent right". Thus, in a political emergency "the good people" may impress themselves into their Militia, without authorization from, and even in the face of prohibition by, rogue public officials.

2. This reasoning was and remains applicable not only to Virginians. On behalf of all of "the good People" of the Thirteen Colonies, and their political descendants, the Declaration of Independence explained that "whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of [men's unalienable Rights], it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it", and "when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security". "[T]o throw off [a bad] Government" plainly implies main force—the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'"[669]—exercised by the people themselves, with arms in their own hands, because certainly the old despotic "Government" will not do so, and the Declaration identifies no one else to undertake this task. The employment of force is "the good People's" right, the right of popular sovereignty, because "Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed". And it is "the good People's" duty, because every right requires a remedy, a means of enforcement: "A right without a remedy is as if it were not. For every beneficial purpose it may be said not to exist."[670] Which implies impressment of the people themselves, by the people themselves, into a military force sufficient for that purpose.

The right and especially the duty "to throw off [a bad] Government" are never to be found within the "laws" of such a "Government"—for inevitably the products of such a "Government" are bad "laws", not really "laws" at all, but instead component parts of the "long train of abuses and usurpations * * * design[ed] to reduce the[people] under absolute Despotism". The "laws" of that "Government" will vehemently deny the existence of any such right, and strictly prohibit the fulfillment of any such duty. Neither can the right and the duty "to throw off [a bad] Government" in favor of a good one be found in the laws of the new government—for until the bad "Government" is replaced, they will have yet to be enacted. As the Declaration makes clear, the people's right and duty of community self-defense against usurpers and tyrants come from none of man's feeble and fallible positive laws at all, but from the highest and unerring body of law: "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God", to be construed and executed by the people themselves, there being no other earthly adjudicator of their grievances.

---

[669] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[670] United States ex rel. Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 71 U.S. (4 Wallace) 535, 554 (1867). Accord, Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 303 (1885); Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 163 (1803).

These principles were so clearly established in the pre-constitutional period that even Blackstone, himself anything but a panegyrist of any Colony's rebellion against the Mother Country, correctly opined that "[s]elf defence * * * , as it is justly called the primary law of nature, so it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[671] The positive "law" of some place (the so-called "municipal law") might purport to deny the right and duty of self-defense. But in fact they could and would be exercised and fulfilled on the basis of the higher "law of nature"—and through that exercise would supplant the old and usher in the new municipal law.

More specifically, in his discussion of "the rights of the people of England"—which all of the American Colonists demanded as the very minimum set of their rights, too—Blackstone elucidated the right > of having arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are allowed by law. Which * * * is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.[672]

But, self-evidently, "when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression", because those "sanctions" and "laws" are themselves the very rationalizations for and instruments of "oppression", then only "the good People" themselves remain to restrain their oppressors. At that point, ex necessitate, the "arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are allowed by law", are to be identified by the people themselves through their own recourse to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" and the proper definition of a "Militia".

D. Discriminations based on servitude. Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia statutes were in principle near-universal in scope. That catholicity was marred, however, by different forms of discrimination based on various individuals' conditions of servitude.

1. Although the understanding at the time was that servants and apprentices were not entirely "free", because they were bound to their masters by indentures or other contracts—service under some of which may have been little better than slavery for a term of years[673]—such men were generally included amongst those eligible for membership in the Militia. Recognizing these individuals' distinct status, however, Virginia's legislators often chose to enumerate them explicitly:

---

[671] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 3 (emphasis supplied).

[672] Id., Volume 1, at 143-144.

> • [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service * * * , and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte. * * * . But if a servant in this case shall willfully neglecte his [master's] comande he shall suffer bodily punishmente."{EN-855}
>
> • [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church * * * , yf the mayster allow not thereof to pay 2 lb. of tobacco * * * , and the servants to be punished."{EN-856}
>
> • [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott * * * , and servants being commanded and yet omitting shall receive twenty lashes on his or theire bare shoulders[.]"{EN-857}
>
> • [1705] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * give any power * * * to list [in the Militia] * * * any servant by importation * * * , but * * * all and every such person * * * be exempted from serving either in horse or foot."{EN-858}
>
> • [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within this colony, (imported servants excepted)[.]"{EN-859}
>
> • [1775] "[I]n each county * * * all free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, above the age of sixteen, and under fifty years, except such as are * * * excepted [under the statute], shall be enlisted into the militia[.]"{EN-860}
>
> • [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years [with various exceptions] * * * shall * * * be enrolled or formed into [Militia] companies[.]"{EN-861}

Not surprisingly in light of the latitude of control the law allowed masters to exercise over their servants and apprentices, the masters found themselves held responsible for their servants' and apprentices' derelictions of duty. For example, masters were generally required to enable their impecunious servants to participate in the Militia by providing them during their terms of service with the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements necessary to fulfill their Militia duties, or else paying the fines that otherwise would have been assessed against the servants for being unarmed.[674]

---

[673] See Edmund S. Morgan, American Slavery American Freedom: The Ordeal of Colonial Virginia (New York, New York: W.W. Norton & Company, Inc., 1975); David Galenson, White Servitude in Colonial America: An Economic Analysis (New York, New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981).

The servants' and their masters' joint liability in this regard was sometimes recognized even when the period of servitude ended. In 1705, a statute mandated that, "whereas there has been a good and laudable custom of allowing servants corn and cloaths for their present support, upon their freedom * * * , Be it * * * enacted * * * That there shall be paid and allowed to every imported servant, not having yearly wages, at the time of service ended, by the master or owner of such servant, viz: To every male servant, * * * one well fixt musket or fuzee, of the value of twenty shillings, at least[.]"{EN-862} This juxtaposition of a servant's "freedom" with his ownership of "one well fixt musket or fuzee" was neither accidental nor the result of some purposeless generosity. Virginia's General Assembly obliged masters to arm their servants "upon the[latters'] freedom" because all adult, able-bodied free men in the community were required (unless specifically exempted) to possess a firearm suitable for Militia service at all times.[675] Freedom and the personal possession of firearms were two sides of the same social and political coin.

Notwithstanding the great degree of control masters exercised over their servants and apprentices, they could not refuse to allow them to participate in the Militia. This inability contrasted starkly with the leeway the General Assembly was willing to provide to masters to forbid their servants and apprentices from voluntarily enlisting in Virginia's regular Armed Forces:

> • [1775] "[N]o recruiting officer shall be allowed to enlist into the service any servant whatsoever, except apprentices bound under the laws of this colony, nor any such apprentices unless the consent of his master be first had in writing[.]"{EN-863}
>
> • [1777] "[R]ecruiting officers * * * shall have power to enlist any able-bodied men willing to enter into the service, except apprentices and hired servants under written contracts at any iron works, * * * also imported servants, and those who are by law obliged to serve to thirty one years of age[.]"{EN-864}
>
> • [1778] "[I]t shall not be lawful * * * to enlist any artificer employed by contract * * * in the publick manufactories of fire arms, or at any iron works, nor any indentured apprentice in such manufactory or work, nor any imported servant, without leave in writing from the manager of such manufactory or work, or owner of such servant."{EN-865}

2. From the earliest days, in contrast to Caucasian servants (who were generally expected to be armed), even free Negroes, Indians, and other people of color were generally expected to be disarmed—and, in the case of slaves, were rigorously excluded from the unsupervised possession of firearms:

---

[674] See post, at 428-432.

[675] See post, Chapters 17 through 19.

> • [1639] "ALL persons except negroes to be provided with arms and amunition or be fined[.]"{EN-866}
>
> • [1680] "WHEREAS the frequent meeting of considerable numbers of negroe slaves under pretence of feasts and burialls is judged of dangerous consequence; for prevention whereof for the future, * * * that * * * it shall not be lawfull for any negroe or other slave to carry or arme himselfe with any club, staffe, gunn, sword or any other weapon of defence or offence[.]"{EN-867}
>
> • [1705] "That no slave go armed with gun, sword, club, staff, or other weapon, nor go off the plantation and seat of land where such slave shall be appointed to live, without a certificate of leave in writing * * * from his or her master, mistress, or overseer: And if any slave shall be found offending herein, it shall be lawful for any person or persons to apprehend and deliver such slave to the next constable * * * who is hereby * * * required, without further order or warrant, to give such slave twenty lashes on his or her bare back, well laid on[.]"{EN-868}
>
> Violators of this statute were threatened with being "prosecuted according to the Strictest Severity & Rigor of the Common Law as such Disobedience requires."{EN-869}
>
> • [1723 and 1748] "[N]o negro, mulatto, or Indian whatsoever", with certain exceptions,[676] "shall * * * presume to keep, or carry any gun, powder, shot, or any club, or other weapon whatsoever, offensive or defensive; but that every gun, and all powder and shot, and every such club or weapon * * * found or taken in the hands, custody, or possession of any such negro, mulatto, or Indian, shall be taken away; and * * * be forfeited to the seisor and informer, and moreover, every such negro, mulatto, or Indian, in whose hands, custody, or possession, the same shall be found, shall * * * receive any number of lashes, not exceeding thirty-nine, well laid on, on his or her bare back, for every such offence."{EN-870}
>
> (By the late 1700s, a "mulatto" was defined as "every person who shall have one-fourth part or more of negro blood".{EN-871})
>
> • [1785] "No slave shall keep any arms whatever * * * unless with written orders from his master or employer, or in his company with arms, from one place to another. Arms in possession of a slave contrary to this prohibition, shall be forfeited to him who will seize them."{EN-872}

Free Negroes, Indians, and people of mixed races, however, were allowed to serve in the Militia, but only in capacities that did not require them (and presumably did not normally allow them, either) to bear firearms:

---

[676] See post, at 734-736.

• [1705] This statute empowered "the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * to list all male persons whatsoever, from sixteen to sixty years of age * * * to serve in horse or foot, as in his discretion he shall see cause and think reasonable", but also provided that "any slave * * * be exempted from serving either in horse or foot". It did not, however, say whether and to what extent free Negroes, Indians, or persons of mixed race could be enlisted.{EN-873} Perhaps such individuals were excluded because Militia officers simply did not "see cause and think reasonable" to enlist them. If non-Whites had regularly been listed, the explicit statutory commands on the subject enacted in subsequent years would not have been necessary.

• [1723] "[S]uch free Negros, Mulattos, or Indians, as are capable, may be listed and emploied [in the Militia] as drummers or trumpeters: And that upon any invasion, insurrection, or rebellion, all free Negros, Mulattos, or Indians, shall be obliged to * * * march with the militia, and to do the duty of pioneers, or such other servile labour as they shall be directed to perform.

" * * * [I]f * * * any free Negro, Mulatto, or Indian, other than as before excepted, shall presume to appear at any muster whatsoever, the party so offending, shall for every such offence, forfeit and pay one hundred pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-874}

• [1738] "[E]very person * * * listed [in the Militia], (except free mulattos, negros and Indians,) * * * shall be armed * * * .

" * * * [A]ll such free mulattos, negros, or Indians, as are or shall be listed, * * * shall appear without arms; and may be emploied as drummers, trumpeters, or pioneers, or in such other servile labour, as they shall be directed to perform."{EN-875}

• [1755] "[E]very person * * * inlisted [in the Militia], (except the people commonly called Quakers, free Mulattoes, negroes and Indians) * * * shall be armed and accoutred * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [A]ll such free mulattoes, negroes and Indians, as are or shall be listed, * * * shall appear without arms, and may be employed as drummers, trumpeters or pioneers, or in such other servile labor, as they shall be directed to perform."{EN-876}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[E]very person * * * inlisted (except free mulattoes, negroes, and Indians) shall be armed[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [A]ll free mulattoes, negroes, and Indians as are or shall be inlisted [in the Militia] * * * shall appear without arms, and may be employed as drummers, trumpeters, or pioneers, or in such other servile labor as they shall be directed to perform."{EN-877}

• [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years" with certain exceptions "shall * * * be enrolled or formed into companies * * * . The free mulattoes * * * shall be employed as drummers, fifers, or pioneers."{EN-878}

Inevitably, slaves had to be excluded from the Militia on the perverse but highly practical principle that men held in perpetual bondage could never safely be entrusted with firearms, let alone trained to use them in military formations. In 1705, the statute explicitly exempted slaves from the Militia: "That nothing * * * shall * * * give any power or authority * * * to list * * * any slave, but that all and every such person * * * be exempted from serving either in horse or foot."{EN-879} Then, the statutes in 1723 and 1738 implicitly excluded slaves by authorizing "the chief officer of the militia of every county" to "list all free male persons" only.{EN-880} Thereafter, from 1755 through 1771, the statutes called for "list[ing] all male persons * * * (imported servants excepted)", with no reference to freedom or bondage, but apparently with the tacit understanding that slaves were not included among "persons" or even "imported servants",{EN-881} having long theretofore been declared a form of "real estate".{EN-882} For those same statutes also provided "[t]hat all such free mulattoes, negroes and Indians, as are or shall be listed, * * * shall appear [at musters] without arms"{EN-883}—indicating that "all male persons" did not include unfree "mulattoes, negroes and Indians". Finally, in 1775, 1784, and 1785, the statutes broadly mandated that "all free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices * * * shall be enlisted into the militia",{EN-884} or "all free male persons * * * shall be enrolled or formed into companies,"{EN-885} without any explicit disabilities being imposed upon free persons of color.

In practice, too, slaves could not have surreptitiously insinuated themselves within Militia Companies, because such Companies were always composed of Local residents at least some of whom knew which Negroes residing in the area were free, and which were not, and all of whom would have been particularly suspicious of Negro strangers who arrived claiming they were free men.

Enlistment in the regular Armed Forces of Virginia or the United States might have been easier for runaway slaves during the War of Independence than at other times, had not the Commonwealth enacted a prophylactic law in 1777: "[W]hereas several negro slaves have deserted from their masters, and under pretence of being free men have enlisted as soldiers * * * it shall not be lawful for any recruiting officer within this commonwealth to enlist any negro or mulatto into the service of this or either of the United States, until such negro or mulatto shall produce a certificate from some justice of the peace for the county wherein he resides that he is a free man."{EN-886}

In any event, although Virginia's Militia statutes neither required nor allowed even free Negroes, Indians, and people of mixed races to be armed for service in the Militia, they did not prohibit such individuals from possessing and using firearms at other times for other legitimate reasons. And various other statutes specifically allowed many of them to be armed.[677]

E. Preference for volunteers. Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia was near-universal in membership, compulsory in participation, and disseminated in operation in every Locality throughout the Commonwealth. Yet, although Virginia was thus a political community totally organized along *para-*military lines, she was not "a garrison state" or a "national-security state", but "a free state"—and it was precisely her "well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms," which secured that freedom.[678] Paradoxical? No. For although the statutes mandated total inclusion of the population of able-bodied free adult males in the Militia as an institution, they did not require total involvement of all Militiamen in the institution's every activity. Although all Militiamen (other than a few specially exempted) were always possessed of arms,[679] and "trained to arms",[680] not every one of them was always standing to arms at home or called to bear arms in the field. Rather, from the very beginning, Virginia always took account of the necessity to spread the burden of active service in order to maintain the socio-economic order in a state of normalcy to the greatest degree possible:

> [1629] "[E]very commander of the severall plantations appointed by commission from the governor shall have power and authoritie to levy a partie of men out of the inhabitants of that place soe many as may well be spared without too much weakening of the plantations and to imploy these men against the Indians, when they shall assault us neere unto our habitations[.]"{EN-887}

This was only the common sense of the situation: After all, as the Declaration of Independence summarized the accumulated political wisdom of *pre-*constitutional American patriots, "Governments are instituted among Men" for the purpose of "secur[ing certain unalienable] rights", foremost among which are "Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness". People will not be able to pursue happiness in the normal "Course of human events", though, if they are perpetually under arms, when being so is not necessary to secure their lives and liberties.

So, although in *pre-*constitutional Virginia service in her Militia was always obligatory, and service in her regular troops could be compulsory, in many instances in both the Militia and the regular troops the practice was to seek volunteers for

---

[677] See post, at 733-742.

[678] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[679] See post, Chapters 17 through 19.

[680] See post, at 541-549.

particular duty, and only if not enough of them were forthcoming to rely upon impressment:

> • [1645] "[T]he * * * counsell of warr shall have power to leavie such and soe manie men, arms, ammunition and other necessaries as emergencie of occasions shall require, * * * And * * * for the manageing the warr * * * , That evrie 15 tithable persons shall sett forth, compleatly furnish and maintain, one soldier * * * ; And * * * all negro men and women, and all other men from the age of 16 to 60 shall be adjudged tithable: * * * And where ffifteen are joyned to set forth one and cannot agree amongst themselves, * * * the council of warr shall press whom they shall think fitt[.]"{EN-888}

> • [1676] "[I]t shall * * * be lawfull to and for * * * [the] commander in cheife * * * to raise such number of volunteers for the more expeditious carrying on this warr, as shall freely offer themselves for this service * * * . Provided alsoe, that if * * * the number of volunteers * * * shall be * * * suffitient and fully effectuall for the prosecution of this * * * warr * * * , that then * * * [the commander in chief] is * * * impowered and authorized to dispense, and * * suspend the levying and raiseing of such part of all the forces, ammunition and provisions intended[.]"{EN-889}

> • [1679] "[T]hat fower houses for stores or garrisons be erected and built at the heads of the ffower greate rivers * * * . And * * * that every forty tythables within this colony be assessed and obleiged * * * to fitt and sett forth one able and suffitient man and horse, with furniture well and compleatly armed * * * , which fforty tythables * * * shall either refuse, neglect or be uncapable to fitt out such man and horse, armes, provisions and ammunition * * * , that then the justices and militia officers * * * impresse a man and horse with armes, ammunition and provisions * * * and send them to the said storehouse or garrison, and assesse the said delinquent tythables, the whole charge thereof [.]"{EN-890}

> • [1682] "[T]hat twenty men well furnished with horses and all other accoutrements be raised * * * in each of [certain] counties * * * of such housekeepers * * * as shall voluntarily offer themselves for this service, and for want of such or so many housekeepers, that then the said number shall be made of such freemen as shall willingly offer themselves * * * ; but in case such twenty men quallified * * * shall not be found in each of the said counties, then it shall and may be lawfull for the militia officers * * * to impresse such, and soe many men furnished * * * as shall be wanting[.]"{EN-891}

> • [1684] "That four troops of horsemen * * * be raised * * * , every way well horsed and armed * * * ; but in case the full number * * * compleatly mounted, armed and provided * * * cannot be raised by such as shall voluntarily offer themselves for that service, that then his excellency the governour * * * [may] issue forth his warrant for the raiseing soe many men * * * as shall be wanting[.]"{EN-892}

• [1684] "Whereas Cap^{t} Geo: Cooper Commander of y^{e} Thirty men appointed by Act of Assembly to range in Rappahanack County * * * finds an unwillingnesse in y^{e} former soldiers to continue y^{e} service & doubts he cannot raise y^{e} aforesaid number; It is therefore ordered, that * * * Capt: Geo: Cooper return to his Command, to compleat his number of men and horse, w^{ch} if he cannot doe * * * then he is hereby required to signifye y^{e} same to y^{e} Council, to y^{e} intent y^{e} number may be compleated by way of impresse by warrants w^{ch} will issue forth for that purpose. And whereas It is probable, y^{e} other Commanders may meet with y^{e} like difficulty, y^{e} same method is to be observed by them[.]"{EN-893}

• [1691] The Council, "takeing into their Consideration that there are soe many Young Lusty Men in this Country, which noe doubt will offer themselves Voluntiers for Rang^{rs} that none Neede be Imprest, Doe therefore Order that none be Imprest, and that the likelyest of those that Offer themselves to doe their Ma[jesties'] Service be taken".{EN-894}

• [1711] "[T]he commander in chief * * * [shall] constitute and appoint * * * lieutenants or commanders of the rangers for the * * * frontiers; each of which * * * shall choose * * * able bodyed men, with horses and accoutrements, arms and ammunition, residing as near as conveniently may be, to that frontier station * * * . But if such lieutenant cannot find a sufficient number of able bodyed men * * * to serve voluntarily * * * it shall and may be lawfull for the commander in chief of the militia in the same county * * * to order and impress out of the militia of that county, so many able bodyed men[.]"{EN-895}

• [1755] "That * * * a sum of money not exceeding two thousand pounds * * * be laid out for and in the raising and maintaining three companies of men * * * to be employed as rangers, for the protection of the subjects in the frontiers of this colony * * * , and shall not be sent out of this colony, nor incorporated with the soldiers now in his majesty's service, or made subject to martial law. And in case the * * * men, cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily enlist * * * chief officer[s] of the militia * * * [may] draft out of the militia * * * such and so many young men * * * who have not wives and children * * * to be employed in the * * * service."{EN-896}

• [1755] "[I]n case the [required] number of men cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily inlist * * * , it shall and may be lawful, for the field officers and captains of the militia * * * to draft out of the militia of their counties * * * such and so many of their militia, who have not wives or children, * * * to be employed in the * * * service[.]"{EN-897}

• [1756] Various officers "of the militia * * * shall * * * inlist all such able bodied men as will voluntarily enter into his majesty's service,

but in case so many of them will not voluntarily enlist as will make one of every twenty of the militia, then they shall cause so many distinct blank pieces of paper to be prepared, as the number of the able-bodied single men * * * , upon one of which pieces of paper for every twentieth man * * * shall be written the words * * * "This obliges me immediately to enter his majesty's service," which distinct pieces of paper * * * shall be put into a box * * * , and then * * * all the said able bodied men single men * * * one after another * * * [are] to draw forth one of the said pieces of paper * * * ; and the person * * * whose lot it shall be, to draw forth * * * any of the said papers, so written upon * * * , shall immediately * * * be deemed and taken to be an inlisted soldier[.]"{EN-898}

• [1775] "And for the more expeditious, convenient, and speedy draughting into service detachments of the militia of this colony, as occasion may require, Be it * * * ordained, That, at the general muster of the militia * * * the commanding-officer of each county or corporation shall, by fair and equal lot, cause to be drawn out of each company so many men as will amount to one tenth part thereof. and cause the names of the persons so allotted to be enrolled * * * as the first division of the militia for such county or corporation; and * * * in like manner proceed, by lot, to fix * * * the nine other divisions of the said militia * * * ; and thereafter, if the militia * * * shall be called into duty, the same shall be performed by the divisions, in the order they shall so stand enrolled, one after another, so as to preserve the regular rotation of duty amongst them.

* * * * *

"Provided always, That if there shall * * * be a sufficient number of men, who will voluntarily enter into the service, to answer the demand made upon the militia * * * , such volunteers shall be accepted instead of calling on the divisions[.]"{EN-899}

• [1777] "[F]or the more speedy and certain completion of the * * * new battalions, every county, city, and borough [with certain exceptions] * * * , in case the * * * officers by them appointed * * * shall not * * * enlist the[ir] quota * * * , shall make up such deficiency by draughts, to be taken from their respective militias in manner following * * * : The [field officers and magistrates in the commission of the peace] * * * shall first ascertain the * * * deficiency * * * , and immediately * * * divide the whole militia * * * into as many lots as there may be men wanting to supply their quota, * * * taking care to allot to each division * * * as many able bodied men as conveniency will admit, having regard to the property of each individual composing such divisions, so as to make the number of able bodied men, and the property in each, as equal as may be; that each of the * * * divisions shall be required to furnish one man; and in case any such division refuse, or neglect to do so * * * , that then the field officers and magistrates * * * shall fix upon and draught one man, who, in their opinion, can be best spared, and will be the most serviceable[.]"{EN-900}

• [1777] "FOR making provision against invasions and insurrections, and laying the burthen thereof equally on all: Be it enacted * * * , That the division of the militia of each county into ten parts * * * shall be completed and kept up * * * , each part to be distinguished by fair and equal lot * * * .

" * * * The several divisions of the militia * * * shall be called into duty by regular rotation * * * . Any able bodied volunteers who will enter into the service shall be accepted instead of so many of the divisions of the militia * * * , or of the particular person in whose room they may offer to serve; but if the invasion or insurrection be so near and pressing as not to allow the delay of calling the division * * * next in turn, the commanding officer may call on such part of the militia as shall be most convenient to continue in duty until such division * * * can come in to supply their places."{EN-901}

• [1777] "WHEREAS it is indispensably necessary that the regiments of infantry raised * * * , on continental establishment, be speedily recruited * * * : Be it therefore enacted * * * , That * * * the said regiments * * * be completed by recruits or draughts * * * .

* * * * *

"But as an encouragement to persons to enter voluntarily into the said service, and thereby avoid the necessity of making such draughts, as far as may be done, It is farther enacted, That * * * [certain public officials and Militia officers] shall have power to enlist any able-bodied men willing to enter into the service, except apprentices and hired servants under written contracts at any iron works, or persons solely employed in the manufacture of fire arms, not having leave in writing from the owner or manager of such works, except also imported servants, and those who are by law obliged to serve to thirty one years of age * * * ; and so many men as can be thereby enlisted into the said regiments * * * shall be deducted from the number of men to be draughted[.]"{EN-902}

• [1779] "WHEREAS [a previous statute] * * * hath not produced the end proposed, many counties having failed to furnish one twenty fifth man * * * ; and whereas it is just that the whole community should bear an equal part in publick defence: Be it enacted * * * , That the * * * commanding officer of the militia shall * * * cause his county to be immediately laid off into divisions, * * * each of which * * * shall furnish a man * * * ; and if * * * any division shall still have failed, the county lieutenant * * * by fair and impartial lot, [shall] draft one man out of such division, to serve as a regular soldier for * * * eighteen months[.]"{EN-903}

• [1782] "FOR the more speedy recruiting this state's quota of troops in the continental service, Be it enacted, That three thousand men, of able bodies and sound minds, at least five feet four inches high, not > being deserters and between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, shall be forthwith raised * * * : One able-bodied man * * * for every fifteen militia-men. And for effecting that purpose in the most equitable manner,

>
> " * * * That * * * [certain officers] of the militia * * * shall * * * divide each county into as many classes or districts as there are men required * * * , making such classes as equal as may be, having regard as well to an equal proportion of taxable property in the county * * * as the number of able-bodied men. * * *
>
> " * * * That each class or district * * * shall * * * enlist * * * one man * * * to serve as a soldier in the continental army * * * or pay a sum * * * for the enlistment of a soldier or payment of the money in lieu of him. * * * [A]nd in case the same shall not be paid or such soldier enlisted * * * the captain * * * of the company to which such delinquents * * * belong * * * [shall] cause one of the said able-bodied militia-men to be drafted, by fair and equal ballot[.]"{EN-904}
>
> In this instance, presumably the Militiamen decided who would go pursuant to some voluntary agreement amongst themselves, because the statute did not prescribe how they were to designate their recruit, only that if they failed to do so or to pay a fee then one of their own number would be drafted.

This preference for volunteers, of course, is precisely what one would expect in "a free state". For the essence of "a free state" is popular self-government. Popular self-government is not a process in which a few individuals are active participants and most others merely passive spectators. Rather, it aims at all individuals' acceptance of their responsibilities to concert their efforts with their neighbors in the necessary affairs of the community. The ideal is full voluntary participation by everyone, to the extent of each person's competence. So, in a perfectly self-governing community, coercion of individuals to perform public services would never be necessary, because everyone would always understand his civic duties and spontaneously carry them out. Individuals would willingly subordinate their purely private interests to "the common defence" and "the general Welfare", because they would realize that only in this way could they, in and through their community, "establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, * * * and secure the Blessings of Liberty to [them]selves and [their] Posterity".[681] Inasmuch, however, as every community is composed of morally weak and intellectually fallible human beings who on the basis of one facile rationalization or another will attempt to shirk their responsibilities and shift the burdens of their civic duties to others at least part of the time, no perfectly self-governing community can exist. For any community to practice self-government as well as can be expected in the face of its constituents' personal imperfections, universal impressment with respect to fundamental civic duties must be its basic principle of organization (although not necessarily its inevitable practice with respect to all of its members). This will vindicate the efforts of those who volunteer for public service—while, as to everyone else, promoting proper behavior, deterring improper behavior, and punishing misbehavior if deterrence fails.

---

[681] U.S. Const. preamble (emphasis supplied).

Inasmuch as participation in "a well regulated militia" is the most important of all civic duties—because "a well regulated militia" is "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state" and is "necessary to the security of a free State"[682]—universal impressment must ever be the first principle of the Militia. Nonetheless, the goal in operation of the Militia should be to encourage the socio-political ideal, by relying on volunteers to the degree that is possible and prudent—so that, outside of the most basic duties, impressment remains an abstract principle rather than a recurring practice; and that, in all but times of the most extreme danger, the community need not call upon every one or even most of its members to serve in the field, but can allow the great majority of them to remain trained and ready, but reposed in reserve. After all, "[t]hey also serve who only stand and wait".[683]

F. Selective drafts. Because volunteers in the first instance select themselves, reliance on them is always a chancy business. On the one hand, an individual volunteer might be someone who is more valuable to the community serving in his civilian capacity at home than as a Militiaman or regular soldier in the field. On the other hand, an individual volunteer might be someone who, although he can qualify as able-bodied, is of little use in the civilian community, yet still can be at least minimally desirable for military duty. The same, of course, is true with an indiscriminate draft. The service ends up taking the good along with the bad, in varying degrees, promiscuously.

1. Considerations of this kind no doubt subtended Virginia's adoption of selective impressments in certain circumstances:

> • [1740] "WHEREAS, his majesty hath * * * sen[t] instruction * * * to raise and levy soldiers, for carrying on the present war, against the Spaniards, in America * * * ; and taking into * * * consideration, that there are in every county, within this colony, able-bodied persons, fit to serve * * * , who follow no lawful calling or employment:
>
> " * * * [T]he justices of the peace * * * [may] raise and levy such able-bodied men as do not follow or exercise any lawful calling or employment, or have not some other lawful and sufficient support and maintenance, to serve * * * as soldiers * * * .

---

[682] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 and U.S. Const. amend. II.

[683] John Milton, Sonnet XIX, "When I consider how my light is spent", Poems (London, England: Thomas Dring, 1673).

" * * * [N]othing * * * shall extend to the taking or levying any person to serve as a soldier, who hath any vote in the election of * * * burgesses, to serve in the general assembly of this colony; or who is * * * an indented or bought servant."{EN-905}

• [1754] "WHEREAS his majesty has * * * sen[t] instructions * * * to raise and levy soldiers for carrying on the present expedition against the French on the Ohio * * * ; and * * * there are * * * able bodied persons, fit to serve his majesty, who follow no lawful calling or employment.

" * * * [T]he justices of the peace of every county and corporation with in this colony, * * * upon application made to them, by any officer * * * appointed or impowered to enlist men, * * * [may] raise and levy such able bodied men, as do not follow or exercise any lawful calling or employment, or have not some other lawful and sufficient support and maintenance, to serve his majesty, as soldiers in the present expedition * * * .

" * * * [N]othing * * * shall extend to the taking or levying any person to serve as a soldier, who hath any vote in the election of a Burgess or Burgesses to serve in the General Assembly * * * , or who is, or shall be an indented or bought servant, or any person under the age of twenty one years, or above the age of fifty years."{EN-906}

• [1755] "That * * * a sum of money not exceeding two thousand pounds * * * be laid out for and in the raising and maintaining three compa[n]ies of men * * * to be employed as rangers, for the protection of the subjects in the frontiers of this colony, * * * and shall not be sent out of this colony, nor incorporated with the soldiers now in his majesty's service, or made subject to martial law. And in case the * * * men, cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily enlist * * * chief officer[s] of the militia * * * [may] draft out of the militia * * * such and so many young men * * * who have not wives and children * * * to be employed in the said service."{EN-907}

• [1755] "[I]n case the * * * [required] number of men cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily inlist * * * , it shall and may be lawful, for the field officers and captains of the militia * * * to draft out of the militia of their counties * * * such and so many of their militia, who have not wives or children, * * * to be employed in the * * * service[.]"{EN-908}

• [1756] "[T]he * * * chief commanding officer of the militia in every county, and of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, except the county of Hampshire, * * * [shall] hold a council of war * * * at which * * * the * * * captains of the militia * * * shall deliver in lists * * * of all the single men in their * * * muster-rolls * * * ; which council of war shall enter the names of all the able-bodied single men upon a list, and shall immediately appoint a certain day * * * for the said able-bodied single men * * * to meet at the court-house of such county, city, or borough * * * : And the [various officers] of the militia * * * shall then inlist all such able bodied men as will voluntarily enter into his majesty's service, but in case so many of them will not voluntarily inlist as will make one of every twenty of the militia, then they shall cause so many distinct blank pieces of paper to be prepared, as the number of the able-bodied single men * * * , upon one of which pieces of paper for every twentieth man * * * shall be written the words * * * "This obliges me immediately to enter his majesty's service," which distinct pieces of paper * * * shall be put into a box * * * , and then the said council of war shall cause all the said able bodied men single men * * * one after another * * * to draw forth one of the said pieces of paper * * * ; and the person * * * whose lot it shall be, to draw forth * * * any of the said papers, so written upon * * * shall immediately * * * be deemed and taken to be an inlisted soldier[.]"{EN-909}

• [1757] "[F]or the more speedy raising the men * * * the several justices [of the peace], and field-officers, and captains of their respective counties, city and borough, * * * shall * * * hold a court, and examine and enquire into the occupation and employment of the several inhabitants * * * between the age of eighteen and fifty years * * * : And the said courts are * * * required to prick down all such able-bodied persons * * * as shall be found loitering and neglecting to labor for reasonable wages; all who run from their habitations, leaving wives or children without suitable means for their subsistance, and all other idle, vagrant, or dissolute persons, wandering abroad without betaking themselves to some lawful employment * * * . And in a case a sufficient number of such persons * * * cannot be found * * * , then the said courts are hereby impowered to prick down such able-bodied men, not being freeholders or house-keepers qualified to vote at an election of burgesses, as they shall think proper to make up the same. * * * [A]nd such court shall then proceed to draft out * * * one man for every forty effective soldiers in the militia of each county, city and borough."{EN-910}

• [1777] "[F]or the more speedy and certain completion of the * * * new battalions [for the Continental Army], every county, city, and borough [with certain exceptions] * * * , in case the * * * officers by them appointed * * * shall not * * * enlist the[ir] quota * * * , shall make up such deficiency by draughts, to be taken from their respective militias in manner following * * * : The * * * [field officers and magistrates in the commission of the peace] * * * shall first ascertain the * * * deficiency * * * , and immediately * * * divide the whole militia of each county, city, and borough * * * into as many lots as there may be men wanting to supply their quota, * * * taking care to allot to each division * * * as many able bodied men as conveniency will admit, having regard to the property of each individual composing such divisions, so as to make the number of able bodied men, and the property in each, as equal as may be; that each > of the * * * divisions shall be required to furnish one man; and in case any such division refuse, or neglect to do so * * * then the field officers and magistrates * * * shall fix upon and draught one man, who, in their opinion, can be best spared, and will be the most serviceable[.]"{EN-911}

>
> • [1777] "WHEREAS it is indispensably necessary that the regiments of infantry raised * * * , on continental establishment, be speedily recruited * * * : Be it therefore enacted * * * , That * * * the said regiments * * * be completed by recruits or draughts * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> "It is farther enacted, That * * * a number of men shall be draughted from the single men of the militia of the several counties, and the city of Williamsburg, * * * above eighteen years of age, who have no child * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> "And to the end that the draughts * * * may be fairly and equally made, It is farther enacted, That the * * * commanding officer of the militia in each county or corporation shall * * * collect from the muster rolls the names of all the * * * men * * * who have not a wife or child, or who are not exempted by this act, or from militia duty by having a substitute in the army, adding thereto the names of any other such single men as are * * * not enrolled, and who by the militia law ought to be enrolled, and shall direct all such single men to * * * meet * * * to determine, by fair and equal lot, which of them shall enter into the service[.]"{EN-912}

2. In principle, a selective draft is perfectly legitimate, now as much as then. Everyone may have a duty to serve in the Militia; but the existence of that duty does not necessarily entail uniformity in its fulfillment with respect to the time or type of service that may be required of each and every individual. Common sense and experience teach that, depending upon circumstances, some members of the Militia would best serve their community by continuing to perform their civilian functions, others by temporarily moving out of domestic life into military service. Inasmuch as a State's legislature may draft anyone and everyone for her Militia, and inasmuch as no one may claim an exemption from such service as a matter of "right" superior to the legislature's authority,[684] any call to or any exemption from active duty is a matter purely of legislative discretion or grace, to be determined according to the legislators' (and, ultimately, WE THE PEOPLE'S) well-formed conceptions of what will best serve "the common defence" and "the general Welfare" under the particular conditions affecting their State at that moment.[685] The practical problem, of course, will be whether the set of standards for selection or exemption does, in point of fact and law, reasonably advance "the common defence" and "the general Welfare", or is merely the product of arbitrary or invidiously discriminatory political, economic, or social considerations.

---

[684] See post, at 629-631.

[685] See U.S. Const. preamble.

In the case of Virginia's *pre-*constitutional selective drafts, the standards fell into three categories—

First, some were self-evidently proper, and even mandatory, on their face:

> (i) Selection of "able-bodied persons, fit to serve" (1740 and 1754) and men "who * * * will be the most serviceable" (1777) depended upon more or less objective observations and judgments that related directly to the abilities of the draftees to perform the duties to be required of them. And
>
> (ii) The exclusion from a draft of "any person under the age of twenty one years, or above the age of fifty years" (1754) or not "between the age of eighteen and fifty years" (1757) simply reflected limitations on the ages of Militiamen to be found in various Militia statutes,[686] and obviously served the selfsame purpose as the explicit preference for men "who * * * will be the most serviceable".

Second, some standards were justifiable, both then and now:

> (i) Such "men as do not follow or exercise any lawful calling or employment" (1740 and 1754); "persons * * * as shall be found loitering and neglecting to labor for reasonable wages" (1757); "all * * * idle, vagrant, or dissolute persons, wandering abroad without betaking themselves to some lawful employment" (1757); and particularly "all who run from their habitations, leaving wives and children without suitable means for their subsistence" (1757)—all individuals of this ilk provide little or nothing to the civilian community in which they live, and most likely are a constant drain upon it. Inasmuch as impressment for purely civilian labor is out of the question for those "idle, vagrant, or dissolute persons" who have not been convicted of a serious crime,[687] the only way to transform them into productive citizens, if they refuse to do so on their own, is to draft them for Militia or other military service.
>
> (ii) Although "young men * * * who have not wives and children" (1755), men "above eighteen years of age, who have no child" (1777), and all "single men" (1756 and 1777) may not be outright parasites or even unproductive citizens, they do labor under fewer responsibilities than married men who must support their families, which constitute the bone and sinew of any community. Therefore, all other things being equal, it is reasonable and socially prudent that "single men" should be consigned to military duty in preference to married men.

---

[686] See post, at 611-614.

[687] See U.S. Constitution amend. XIII.

(iii) To be sure, a "man, who, in the[ ] opinion [of Militia officers and civil magistrates], can be best spared" (1777) is a somewhat amorphous criterion. But, in the actual statute in which the phrase appeared, it meant "be best spared" in consideration of the man's relative lack of value to the Militia, with the caveat that he also would be "the most serviceable" for duty in the regular Army. The making of such judgments has always been rather commonplace in the assignment of duties within any military or para-military organization—and although it depends more upon a selecting officer's accumulated experience and practical acumen than upon written rules, it usually proves both workable and fair.

Third, some pre-constitutional standards for exclusion from a selective draft would be unacceptable today:

(i) Individuals "who hath any vote in the election of * * * burgesses" (1740 and 1754) and who were "freeholders or housekeepers qualified to vote at an election of burgesses" (1757) constituted a political élite able to wrangle special privileges from legislators in those days. Now, everyone who is "eighteen years of age or older" is constitutionally entitled to vote in elections for public office at every level in the federal system.[688] So exclusion from a draft on this basis would be impossible for the vast majority of Militiamen. "A well regulated Militia", though, should include individuals of both sixteen and seventeen years of age, too, who lack a right to vote. The question then would be whether any legitimate difference existed between those men sixteen and seventeen years old who could be drafted and those (say) eighteen and nineteen who could not. Even the most constrained application of the constitutional command that "[n]o State shall * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws"[689] would discountenance such a discrimination, for the simple reason that any "classification must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation".[690] Self-evidently, the right to vote vel non would have no "fair and substantial relation to the [only legitimate] object of the legislation", which would be to draft men particularly suitable for the intended service. And the older men would surely be at least as suitable on physical, mental, and emotional grounds as the younger ones—thus rendering the classification plainly "arbitrary".

[688] U.S. Const. amend. XXVI.

[689] U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

(ii) The exclusion from the draft of every man "who is * * * an indented or bought servant" (1740 and 1754) was doubtlessly enacted, not for the benefit of such servants, but for the benefit of the economic class composed of their masters. Servitudes of those types, though, do not and probably cannot exist today, except for individuals properly subjected to "slavery [ ]or involuntary servitude * * * as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted".[691] And any such convicts not recruited for a forlorn hope would almost surely be excluded from bearing arms whilst they served their sentences.

(iii) Finally, the draft of "men as do not follow or exercise any lawful calling or employment, or have not some other lawful and sufficient support and maintenance" (1740 and 1754) specially privileged "the idle rich" at the expense of the financially less well off, because those who did enjoy "lawful and sufficient support and maintenance" other than from "any lawful calling or employment" were not required to serve. Functionally, this was indistinguishable from granting an immunity from a draft simply on the basis of an individual's wealth: Those who did not need to work were not required to fight. Today, of course, the exercise of such fundamental rights as the right to vote,[692] or the right to due process in judicial proceedings,[693] cannot be conditioned on an individual's ability to pay for them. On what reasoning the Constitution might be construed to allow the burden of impressment to be conditioned in that manner—when the consequence might be an individual draftee's loss of life or limb—is not apparent.

---

[690] F.S. Royster Guano Company v. Virginia, 253 U.S. 412, 415 (1920) (emphasis supplied).

[691] U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1. See post, at 748-749, 993-998, and 1011-1013.

[692] E.g., U.S. Const. amend. XXIV; Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966); Bullock v. Carter, 405 U.S. 134 (1972).

[693] E.g., U.S. Const. amends. V and XIV, § 1; Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956); Burns v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 252 (1959); Smith v. Bennett, 365 U.S. 708 (1961); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963); Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487 (1963); Gardner v. California, 393 U.S. 367 (1969); Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971); Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56 (1972).

The foregoing illustrates that, although all of the statutory principles of the *pre-*constitutional Militia translated into constitutional principles upon the Constitution's incorporation of "the Militia of the several States" into its federal system, not all of the *pre-*constitutional statutory practices by which those principles may have been implemented in that era necessarily did. A selective draft is one such principle. Selection for a draft on the basis of mere wealth is one such practice. The first remains legitimate; but the second is no longer so. Which emphasizes why, in constitutional analysis, principles must always be carefully distinguished from practices.

G. Acceptance of substitutes. Not only did Virginia balance the burdens of Militia and other military service in the field against the domestic needs of the community by adopting selective drafts from time to time, but also she allowed individuals selectively to excuse themselves from certain duties by providing adequate substitutes to serve in their stead.

1. The personal privilege (and immunity as a consequence) of providing a substitute was available throughout the *pre-*constitutional era:

> • [1676] "[I]t shall and may bee lawfull for any person commanded to goe forth to the war to quitt his owne person by presenting any other such suffitient able man in his place as his perticuler commander shall approve, be he servant or ffreeman, provided the master of such servant be consenting and the servant willing, the master to have the pay allowed [to soldiers] by this act, and the servant the plunder [taken in the war] to his owne proper use."{EN-913}
>
> • [1723] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any person or persons that shall be, or shall have been, of his Majesty's council * * * , speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary of this colony, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, his Majesty's attorney-general, a justice of the peace, or any person that shall have born any military commission * * * as high as * * * captain, or the clerk of the council, for the time being, or the clerk of the general court, for the time being, or any county court clerk, during his being such, personally to appear at any musters: But that all, and every the persons aforesaid * * * are * * * required, to find and provide one able-bodied white man, a good horse, and * * * trooper's accoutrements * * * , who shall constantly appear and exercise at all musters."{EN-914}
>
> • [1723] "[N]othing * * * shall hinder or debar any captain from admitting any able-bodied white person, who shall be above the age of sixteen years, to serve in his troop or company, in the place of any person required by this act to be listed."{EN-915}
>
> Presumably, the "person required * * * to be listed" arranged for his substitute personally.

• [1738] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons herein after-mentioned, to a personal attendance at musters: that is to say, Such as are, or shall have been, members of his majesty's council, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary, receiver-general, auditor, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, attorney-general, clerk of the council, clerk of the house of burgesses, clerk of the secretary's office, a justice of the peace, clerk of any county court, or any person that shall have borne any military commission as high as that of a captain, or any of the people commonly called Quakers: Yet all the persons aforesaid, shall * * * send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters."{EN-916}

• [1755] "[I]n case the [required] number of men cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily inlist in the * * * service * * * the field officers and captains of the militia * * * [may] draft out of the militia of their counties * * * such and so many of their militia, who have not wives or children * * * . And if any person so drafted, shall refuse to serve * * * or find and provide some other able person to serve in his room, every person so refusing shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds * * * , and in case of failure in paying down * * * then such person shall * * * be committed to goal, there to remain until he shall agree to enter into the said service, or provide another * * * , or pay[.]"{EN-917}

• [1766 and 1771] "[T]he * * * chief commanding officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons of the people called Quakers, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, * * * under the command of such captain as he shall think fit; and if upon any invasion or insurrection the militia * * * shall be drawn out into actual service, and any Quaker so inlisted shall refuse to serve or provide an able and sufficient substitute in his room, if thereto required by the * * * chief officer of the militia of his county, * * * every Quaker so refusing * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds * * * , which sum shall be applied * * * towards providing a substitute in the room of the Quaker[.]"{EN-918}

• [1775] "And for the more expeditious, convenient, and speedy draughting into service detachments of the militia * * * as occasion may require, Be it * * * ordained, That * * * every person so enrolled, who shall fail to attend, when required, or find an able-bodied man to serve in his room, shall be subject to * * * fines[.]"{EN-919}

• [1777] "[F]or the more speedy and certain completion of the * * * new battalions, every county, city, and borough [with certain exceptions] * * * , in case the * * * officers * * * shall not * * * enlist the[ir] quota * * * , shall make up such deficiency by draughts, to be taken from their respective militias * * * ; and the person so furnished or draughted shall * * * be considered as a regular soldier * * * , unless he shall procure an able bodied man to serve in his room."{EN-920}

• [1777] "The several divisions of the militia * * * shall be called into duty by regular rotation * * * ; and every person failing to attend when called on, or to send an able bodied man in his room, shall, unless there be good excuse, be considered as a deserter, and suffer accordingly."{EN-921}

• [1777] "WHEREAS it is indispensably necessary that the regiments of infantry raised * * * , on continental establishment, be speedily recruited * * * : Be it therefore enacted * * * , That * * * the said regiments * * * be completed by recruits or draughts * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * And if any single man subject to the draught * * * shall procure an able-bodied man so to enlist, such single man shall be thereby exempted from the draught.

* * * * *

"And be it enacted, That quakers and menonists who shall be so draughted shall be discharged from personal service, and that the field officers and justices [of the peace] * * * shall * * * procure, upon the best terms they can, proper substitutes to serve in their stead, and to adjust and divide the charge thereof among all the * * * quakers and menonists[.]"{EN-922}

• [1779] "If any non-commissioned officer or soldier shall refuse to march when ordered into actual service according to his tour of duty, or find an able bodied man in his room, * * * such offender shall serve as a regular soldier in the troops of this state six months[.]"{EN-923}

• [1780] "If any * * * soldier [of the Militia] shall fail to attend when summoned, not having a just and reasonable excuse, or refuse to march when ordered into actual service according to his tour of duty, or find an able bodied man in his room, * * * such offender shall serve as a regular soldier in the troops of the state for eight months[.]"{EN-924}

• [1780] "[T]hree thousand men shall be forthwith raised for the purpose of completing this state's quota of continental forces"; "and if any division [of the Militia] shall * * * fail to deliver a recruit * * * the * * * commanding officer * * * shall immediately * * * draft an able bodied man by fair and impartial lot out of such division * * * ; who may nevertheless be permitted to procure an able bodied man in his room[.]"{EN-925}

• [1780] "[A]ny Quaker or Menonist who shall be so drafted, shall be discharged from personal service, and * * * the commanding officer * * * is * * * required to employ any two or more discreet persons, to procure on the best terms they can, a proper substitute or substitutes to serve in his or their room, and to adjust and divide the charge thereof among all the * * * Quakers or Menonists[.]"{EN-926}

• [1780] "The * * * commanding officer of the county or corporation shall assemble * * * his militia * * * ; and if any division shall then fail to deliver a recruit * * * , fit for present duty, between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, of able body and sound mind, who is neither a prisoner of war, a deserter from the enemy, nor engaged to serve for a longer term than eight months", then "[t]he said commanding officer * * * shall immediately * * * draft an able-bodied man, by fair and impartial lot, out of such division, to serve in the continental army * * * , who may nevertheless be permitted to procure a substitute * * * . No man shall be drafted, unless * * * he comes within the above description of a recruit; neither shall any recruit or substitute be accepted * * * unless he comes up to such description."{EN-927}

• [1781] "[E]very militia-man ordered into actual service, who shall refuse and neglect to appear * * * , without a reasonable excuse, or produce an able-bodied substitute to serve in his room * * * shall * * * be declared a regular soldier for six months[.]"{EN-928}

• [1781] "[W]here any quaker or menonist shall be allotted to any division of the militia, who is to perform the succeeding tour of duty, he shall not be compelled personally to serve the same, but * * * the commanding officer * * * [may] cause to be levied on all the society of quakers and menonists in such county according to their assessable property, by warrant * * * directed to the sheriff * * * , such sum * * * of money as he shall think sufficient to procure a substitute for each quaker or menonist whose tour of duty it is[.]"{EN-929}

• [1782] "[W]here any quaker or menonist shall be subjected to a tour of duty in consequence of the militia or invasion law, such quaker or menonist shall not be compelled to perform such duty, but the * * * commanding officer of the militia, shall * * * procure a substitute upon the best terms possible". And "the consideration agreed to pay" the substitute shall "be against the estate of each quaker or menonist so draughted * * * , to be levied on their lands, goods, and chattels * * * ; and i[f] any of the said quakers or menonists so draughted, shall not have sufficient property on which a levy can be made, then * * * such substitute money, shall be levied on the property of all the quakers and menonists * * * that are subject to militia service, each to pay in proportion to his taxable property."{EN-930}

2. The foregoing statutes allowed men, by providing a substitute, to obtain exemptions from specific service as the duties arose, with the statutes imposing the duties also granting the exemptions. During the War of Independence, though, Virginia's General Assembly went further, offering broad exemptions from most future duties upon a man's present provision of a recruit for the Continental Army:

• [1780] "[A]ny person who * * * shall enlist an able bodied soldier to serve in his stead during the war, shall * * * be exempted from all future drafts, except in case of actual invasion[.]"{EN-931}

• [1780] "[A]ny person enlisting a soldier between eighteen and fifty years of age, of able body, sound mind, at least five feet four inches high, and not being a deserter * * * , to serve during the war in the troops of this state in continental service, or a soldier in any * * * troops [of the United States], * * * shall be exempted from all future drafts and all musters of the militia, except in case of an insurrection or actual invasion of this state, and then shall be subject to serve within the state only."{EN-932}

3. Not surprisingly, the statutory allowance for substitutes was not immune from various abuses and inconveniences, which Virginia's General Assembly sought to extirpate:

• [1780] "[W]hereas it has been a practice of many tradesmen to entice their apprentices to enlist as soldiers, and to sell them as substitutes for large sums of money; Be it enacted, That if any tradesman or other person to whom any infant is, or shall be bound as an apprentice, shall directly or indirectly take or receive, or agree to take or receive any money or other gratuity in consideration of such apprentice, his enlisting as a soldier or sailor in any corps whatsoever, every such tradesman or person so offending, not being an able bodied man under the age of fifty years, shall forfeit and pay double the sum of money or worth of such other gratuity so taken, received, or agreed for * * * ; and every such offender, being an able bodied man under the age of fifty years, * * * shall be deemed a soldier to serve in this state's quota of continental troops during the war[.]"{EN-933}

This problem arose because, under the act of 1777, "all free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years" were to be "enrolled" in the Militia, and therefore were eligible for all military duty.{EN-934} And pursuant to the contractual terms of most apprenticeships, masters were empowered to sell their apprentices' services.

• [1781] "[E]very militia-man ordered into actual service, who shall refuse and neglect to appear * * * , without a reasonable excuse, or produce an able-bodied substitute to serve in his room (but no person shall be admitted as a substitute except he belongs to the militia of the same county, and if it shall come to such substitute's tour of duty before he returns, then the person employing him shall be obliged to serve in his room or procure a second substitute) shall * * * be declared a regular soldier for six months[.]"{EN-935}

This was designed to prevent the use of substitutes from reducing the pool of men in active service by the number of substitutes, as well as to maintain the onus of substitution on the individual seeking to avail > himself of it. It emphasizes, too, that many, if not most, substitutes must have come from the ranks of Militiamen themselves, because otherwise those substitutes would not have been subject to their own "tour[s] of duty". So substitution was usually a means of distributing the burdens of active service within the Militia, rather than drawing upon men outside of it. In addition, this statute evidences a policy to distribute those burdens among the men of each Local jurisdiction, rather than across jurisdictions, in keeping with Virginia's general preference for Local organization and operation.[694]

4. The conclusions to be drawn from Virginia's experience in this regard are largely the same as follow from Rhode Island's.[695] Virginia did, however, take advantage of substitutes in some ways that Rhode Island did not:

a. An allowance for substitutes was used to expand the range of ages eligible for service. In 1705, Virginia's Militia statute had provided that "all male persons whatsoever [other than certain individuals explicitly exempted], from sixteen to sixty years of age", were to be listed "to serve in horse or foot".{EN-936} In 1723, though, the statute mandated "list[ing] all free male persons whatsoever [other than certain individuals explicitly exempted], from twenty-one to sixty years of age * * * to serve in horse or foot"—but it also provided that "nothing in this act * * * shall hinder or debar any captain from admitting any able-bodied white person, who shall be above the age of sixteen years, to serve in his troop or company, in the place of any person required by this act to be listed".{EN-937} Thus, although the Act of 1723 reduced the number of classes subject to mandatory service, it retained the overall range under the Act of 1705 by making service for the classes from sixteen through twenty years of age voluntary in the form of substitution. Evidently, the legislators in 1723 determined that full participation by all of the younger men was not necessary as in 1705, but in part could still be useful. Interestingly, this was the only instance in which a statute specified a range of allowable ages for any substitutes. Subsequent statutes merely stipulated that a substitute needed to be an "able-bodied man, not being a convict" (1738), "an able and sufficient substitute" (1766 and 1771), or just "an able-bodied man" (1775, 1777, 1779, and 1780). Presumably, in these cases, that a substitute's age might be outside of the range of ages set for mandatory "listing" at the time was not necessarily a disqualifying factor if he met the applicable criterion of fitness to the satisfaction of his Militia officers.

b. In some special cases the provision either of a substitute or of arms for the Militia was required as the quid pro quo for an exemption—and the exemption itself was inoperative in times of "alarm". For example, in 1705 the statute provided that > the persons of a councellor, of a speaker of the house of burgesses, of a justice of the peace, of an attorney-general, and of a captain or an higher officer in the militia, are exempted from being listed and serving either in the horse or foot under command as the rest of the militia do, merely for the dignity of the office which they do or shall have held, and * * * that all and every such person * * * , and also the clerk of the councill, the clerk of the general court, and every county court clerk shall provide and keep * * * at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition * * * , and to produce or cause the same to be produced in the county wherein they respectively reside yearly, and every year at the generall muster * * * .

---

[694] See post, Chapter 21.

[695] See ante, at 261-266.

>
> And in case of any rebellion or invasion shall also be obliged to appear when thereunto required, and serve in such stations as are suitable for gentlemen * * * under the same penaltys as any other person * * * enjoyned to be listed in the militia[.]{EN-938}

So, although individuals in these categories were "exempted from being listed and serving either in horse or foot under command as the rest of the militia do", they were required to "provide and keep * * * at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition", and "in case of any rebellion or invasion shall also be obliged to appear * * * and serve". Thus, theirs was only a partial personal exemption—and none at all from mandatory armed service in the field in the most dangerous times.

In 1723, for a similar list,[696] the statute mandated that > nothing * * * shall * * * compel any person * * * that shall be, or shall have been, of his Majesty's council in this colony, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary of this colony, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, his Majesty's attorney-general, a justice of the peace, or any person that shall have born any military commission within this colony, as high as * * * captain, or the clerk of the council, for the time being, or the clerk of the general court, for the time being, or any county court clerk, during his being such, personally to appear at musters: But that all, and every the persons aforesaid, shall * * * find and provide one able-bodied white man, a good horse, and * * * trooper's accoutrements, * * * who shall constantly appear and exercise at all musters.{EN-939}

So, although these individuals were not required "personally to appear at musters", they did have to recruit suitable substitutes "who shall constantly appear and exercise at all musters" in their stead. This was a full personal exemption, but conditioned on its recipients' "find[ing] and provid[ing]" such substitutes at their own expense.

---

[696] This Act added to the catalogue of exempted individuals the "secretary of this colony" and the "judge of the court of vice admiralty".

The statute of 1738 added "any of the people commonly called Quakers" to the list of exempted individuals, and specified that all of the latter were required "to send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters".{EN-940}

The statutes of 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771 relieved from the duty > to muster * * * such as are members of the council, speaker of the house of Burgesses, receiver general, auditor, secretary, attorney general, clerk of the council, clerk of the secretary's office, ministers of the church of England, the president, masters or professors, and students of William and Mary college, the mayor, recorder, and Aldermen of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, the keeper of the public goal, any person being bona fide, an overseer over four servants or slaves, and actually residing on the plantation where they work, and receiving a share of the crop or wages, for his care and pains, in looking after such servants and slaves: Any miller having the charge and keeping of any mill, and founders, keepers, or other persons employed in or about any copper, iron or lead mine, who are all hereby exempted, from being inlisted, or in any way concerned in the militia, during the time they shall continue in any such station or capacity.

However, these same statutes required that > the several persons * * * exempted from mustering (except ministers of the church of England, the president, masters or professors, and students of William and Mary college, the keeper of the public goal, overseers and millers, and all workers in any mine whatsoever) shall provide arms for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside in the following manner; that is to say, each councillor not being an officer of the militia, four complete sets of arms * * * for a foot soldier: The speaker of the house of Burgesses not being an officer of the militia, four compleat sets of arms * * * : The receiver general, auditor, and secretary, not being a councillor or officer of the militia, each four compleat setts * * * : The attorney general, not being an officer of the militia, two compleat sets * * * : The clerk of the council, and clerk of the secretary's office, not being officers of the militia, each two compleat sets * * * : The mayor, recorder, and aldermen of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, (not * * * being officers of the militia) each two compleat sets[.]{EN-941}

In 1762, 1766, and 1771, the statutes included within > the several persons * * * to be free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective counties * * * : All of his majesty's justices of the peace within this colony who have qualified themselves for their offices by taking the oaths by law appointed * * * , and who are really and bona fide acting justices * * * (except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia * * *) all persons bred to and actually practising physick or surgery, and all inspectors at the publick warehouses appointed for the inspection of tobacco[.]

The statutes required, however, that these individuals "provide complete sets of arms * * * for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they shall respectively reside". In 1766 and 1771, the statutes also added "all the people called Quakers" to the list of those "free and exempt from appearing or mustering", but excused Quakers from having to "provide compleat sets of arms".{EN-942} In addition, these statutes mandated

> [t]hat every person so exempted [except Quakers after 1766] shall always keep in his house or place of abode, such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia of this colony * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition, at such place as shall be appointed by the commanding office of the militia * * * , and shall then be incorporated with, and be subject to the same discipline, rules and orders, and also the same fines, forfeitures and penalties, for non-appearance or misbehaviour, as the other militia of this colony are subject to.{EN-943}

In 1775, the statute provided that > the members of his majesty's council, and the committee of safety, the president of the convention, treasurer, attorney-general, auditor, clerk of the council, clerk of the secretary's office, clerk of the general convention, and clerk of the committee of safety (each of which exempts furnishing a stand of arms for a soldier) all clergymen and dissenting ministers, the president, professors, students, and scholars, of William and Mary college, the keeper of the publick jail, all overseers of four tithables residing on a plantation, and all millers, and persons concerned in iron works, shall be exempted from * * * enlistment.{EN-944}

Finally, the statutes of 1777, 1784, and 1785 dispensed with the requirement that individuals exempted from regular Militia duty should provide either substitutes or arms.{EN-945}

That, instead of requiring individuals who benefitted from exemptions to provide men as substitutes, many of the statutes required them to supply arms made practical sense in two respects: (i) Although the suitability of a substitute was always a matter of opinion, the quality of arms was more or less an objective matter—and with good arms in their hands, Militia officers could have properly equipped the good men they already had. Obviously, it would have been preferable to field a somewhat smaller number of reliable and well-armed Militiamen rather than a larger number not so well furnished and possibly of questionable personal reliability to boot. (ii) Many of the exemptions, and limitations on exemptions, set out in these statutes were largely theoretical, because the statutes themselves explicitly presumed that not a few of the individuals exempted in principle from such paperwork as "listing" and such mundane Militia duties as mustering were in practice "officers of the militia" who would have been in charge of "listing", mustering, training, disciplining, and leading Militiamen anyway. And (iii) in some cases the exemptions were entirely defeasible upon an "alarm".

In any event, the sequence that these statutes followed demonstrates the flexibility of the system: At first, individuals were exempted from appearing at musters, but were required to possess arms and to serve in the field under exigent circumstances. Then they were required to provide a substitute at all times. Then they were required simply to provide arms for others. Then they were required to provide arms and to serve personally during "alarms". The next step—which was not taken during the *pre-*constitutional period except in a rudimentary fashion (but which could be taken upon revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" today)[697]—was and would be to require individuals benefitting from exemptions to pay set fees for them, and to allow Local Militia units to decide whether to hire substitutes, to purchase equipment, or to make other use of the moneys.

H. Payment for services. Although participation in Virginia's Militia was compulsory—and even required almost all Militiamen to purchase their own firearms and ammunition[698]—along with other forms of military service it was not always uncompensated. Often, men were paid, in money or in kind, during periods of active service. The justification for this was the eminently fair idea that if the general public benefitted from the services of but a part of the Militia, the relatively few men who provided those services while others remained at home should be specially compensated by the rest of the community:

> [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, and 1753] "WHEREAS the frontiers of this dominion, being of great extent, are exposed to the invasion of foreign enemies, by sea, and incursions of

---

[697] See post, Chapter 43.

[698] See post, Chapter 17.

> Indians at land, and great dangers may likewise happen by the insurrections of negros, and others; for all which, the militia * * * is the most ready defence. And forasmuch, as the militia of those counties, where any of the dangers aforesaid shall arise, must necessarily be first emploied, and may, by the divine assistance, be able to suppress and repel such insurrections and invasions, without obliging that of the other counties to be raised: And it being reasonable, that such services as shall be performed by any part of the said militia, be rewarded at the public charge[. . .]"{EN-946}

1. Not surprisingly, the service for which Virginia's Militiamen most consistently received compensation from the public, year after year, was "the slave patrol".[699] The self-evident reason was that the patrols were absolutely necessary so long as slavery persisted as a permanent and widespread institution. For rebellions among the slaves were always a distinct possibility; and only by free Virginians' constant vigilance and resolute shows of force could conspiracies among their bondsmen be deterred or uncovered before they ripened into open revolt. So statutes were enacted to punish conspiracies and insurrections,{EN-947} plots were uncovered,{EN-948} informers among the slaves were even rewarded with their freedom{EN-949}—and "slave patrols" were deployed. The patrols must have constituted a most distasteful round of drudgery for the average Militiaman, though—doubtlessly dull, dirty, depressing, and possibly dangerous duty that demanded a suitable reward for even a passable performance, let alone a demonstration of zeal:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, and 1744] "[I]f any parties of the militia be emploied in this service [of slave patrols], for above the space of two days at any one time, such militia shall be paid for all that time they shall be so emploied[.]"{EN-950}
>
> • [1738] "[S]uch patrollers shall be exempted * * * from the paiment of all public, county, and parish levies, for their own persons, for those years in which they shall be emploied in that service."{EN-951}
>
> • [1754, 1755, 1757, 1759, and 1762] "[I]f the[court-martial] shall adjudge the patrollers to have performed their duty according to law, * * * the county court * * * are * * * impowered and required, at the laying of their county levy, to allow to, and levy for every one of the patrollers, ten pounds of tobacco for every twenty four hours[700] they shall so patrole; and moreover such patrollers shall be exempt * * * from the payment of public, county, and parish levies for their own persons, for those years in which they shall be employed in that service."{EN-952}

---

[699] On the nature of "the slave patrols", see ante, at 339-343.

[700] The Act of 1757 substituted "every day or night" for "every twenty four hours".

> • [1766 and 1771] "[I]f the [county] court shall adjudge the patrollers to have performed their duty * * * they are hereby impowered and required at the laying of their county levy, to allow to and levy for every one of the patrollers twenty pounds of tobacco, for every twelve hours they shall so patrol."{EN-953}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he commanding-officer of the militia of every county, of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, shall appoint so many patrollers, as he may think fit, * * * who shall receive a reasonable allowance for their trouble, at the laying of every county levy."{EN-954}
>
> • [1777] "[A]fter every patrol the officer of each party shall return to the captain * * * a report in writing, upon oath * * * of the names of those of his party who were upon duty, and of the proceedings in such patrol. And * * * if * * * the patrollers have performed their duty according to law, * * * the county court * * * are * * * empowered and required to levy fifteen pounds of tobacco, or two shillings and sixpence, for every twelve hours each of them shall so patrol."{EN-955}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "[A]fter every patrole, the officer of each party shall return to the captain * * * a report * * * of the names of those in his party who were upon duty, and of the proceedings in such patrole * * * ; and if the[next court-martial] shall adjudge the patrollers have performed their duty according to law, * * * the county court * * * are * * * empowered and required to levy twenty pounds of tobacco, or three shillings, for every twelve hours each of them shall so patrole."{EN-956}

Most revealing of the locus of practical economic-cum-political power in those days was that the general public paid for the Militiamen's services on slave patrols—either a reasonable wage in money (or its equivalent value in tobacco) dispensed from the public treasury, or exemptions from certain taxes allowed at the expense of the treasury, or both. Inasmuch as all free Virginians ostensibly benefitted from the patrols' presumed success at suppressing the slaves, charging the community with some of the cost may have appeared fair at first glance. But the underlying reality was that the patrols benefitted, not only the community, but also and especially the slaveholders, because the patrols shifted from the slaveholders to the general public much of the burden of controlling the slaveholders' fractious human "real estate"—but none of the enhanced returns the slaveholders derived from the labors of slaves whom the patrols intimidated into docility. Even if every taxpaying member of the community who owned no slaves derived economic advantage to some degree from the plantation system, and therefore from the suppression of the slaves in favor of the smooth working of that system, the slaveholders profited to a far greater degree. Moreover, if the community was in danger from rebellions amongst the slaves, the original and permanent source of that peril was the Peculiar Institution of slavery itself, and the avarice of the slaveholders who fattened on it. So, inasmuch as preventing and if necessary quelling rebellions among their slaves were part and parcel of the slaveholders' unavoidable costs of doing business, and inasmuch as that perilous business exposed the whole community to insurrections of the bondsmen and thereby compelled the establishment of the slave patrols in the first place, the lion's share (if not the totality) of the patrols' costs should have been assessed against the slaveholders, not the general public.

To some, this history might suggest that revitalization of "the Militia of the several States" would actually be politically unwise—for if the Militia upheld slavery in pre-constitutional times, might they not be subverted, corrupted, or otherwise inveigled into supporting some new form of oppression today? The short answer is "no". Slave patrols existed during the pre-constitutional era because slavery was accepted as legitimate in those days. The slaves, on the one hand, and the free men who made up the Militia, on the other hand, comprised two distinct, separate, and mutually antagonistic classes. The Militia were "composed of the body of the people"—but individuals of African ancestry in America, both bond and free, were often considered not part of "the people" at all.[701] Today, though, with the abolition of slavery "except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted",[702] no community in any of the States can be divided as a matter of law into such irreconcilably hostile factions. There can be neither a "master race" or a "master class",[703] nor "an establishment of religion",[704] nor any other scheme or ideology of physical, economic, political, or spiritual superordination that permanently subordinates some Americans to others claiming to be somehow "superior" Americans, or (even worse) to be separate from and superior to all Americans yet entitled to reside in America against the wishes of real Americans.[705] A fortiori, no such scheme or ideology that purports to subordinate some, or even all, Americans to foreigners or their domestic fellow travelers and "fifth columnists" can possibly be countenanced, either. Under these circumstances, modern Militia can be expected to resist any inroads on common Americans' freedoms, by quickly suppressing each and every self-chosen élitist group of whatever provenance that tries to pervert the law in order to set itself above "the people" as a whole. (This, no doubt, is why such groups are adamantly opposed to revitalization of the Militia. If

---

[701] Contrast Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 with Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 403-421 (1857) (opinion of Taney, C.J.).

[702] U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1.

[703] U.S. Const. amends. XIV, § 1; XV, § 1; XIX; and XXIV, § 1.

[704] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3 and amend. I.

[705] "Claiming to be", because no one can actually be an "American" unless he subscribes in belief, word, and deed to the tenets of the Declaration of Independence, and in particular to the self-evident truth "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness".

the Militia were likely to aid and abet their schemes, they would be singing a different tune.)

Besides, in the absence of slavery as a widespread institution, disarmament of any sizeable portion of "the people" is legally impossible. How, then, could the Militia in each Locale—"composed of the body of the people, trained to arms", and permanently in possession of arms—oppress "the people"? Would members of the Militia in significant numbers be sufficiently psychotic, politically at least, to attempt to oppress each other, let alone to oppress themselves? To be sure, a corrupted majority in some Militia unit might seize upon an evil design to oppress the minority. This would not be a danger peculiar to the Militia, but could occur in any group composed of weak and fallible human beings tempted by avarice, ambition, and the appetite for abusive powers. At least within the Militia, though, the minority—already organized, armed, and trained to deal with precisely such usurpation and tyranny from any quarter—could defend itself against the majority.

2. Virginians also received compensation for Militia and other military duties of a general nature, both when they enlisted voluntarily and when they were impressed into actual service:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, and 1744] Upon any invasion or insurrection "there shall be raised, and paid by the public, to the officers and soldiers which shall be drawn out into actual service * * * [certain per diem] rates[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [F]or the pay and allowance * * * every horseman shall find and provide himself with a horse and horse-furniture, arms, and ammunition; and every foot soldier shall find and provide himself with a foot soldier's arms, and ammunition.
>
> " * * * [W]hensoever any part of the militia * * * shall be discharged again, within two days, no pay or allowance shall be given * * * , but every man shall bear his own charge: And that when any part of the militia * * * shall be kept in service above two days, the same shall be paid and allowed for the whole time of service[.]"{EN-957}
>
> • [1748 and 1753] When the Militia were to be deployed during invasions or insurrections, "there shall be raised paid, by the public, to the officers and soldiers drawn out into actual service * * * [certain per diem] rates[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * Provided always, That for the pay aforesaid, every trooper shall find and provide himself with a horse, and horse furniture, arms and ammunition; and every foot soldier, with a foot soldier's arms and ammunition; and that when any part of the militia * * * shall be discharged again within two days, no pay or allowance shall be given for the same, but every man shall bear his own charges; and when they shall be kept in service above two days, then the whole time shall be paid for[.]"{EN-958}

• [1754] "[T]he pay of every soldier enlisted * * * shall commence from the time of his being taken, and delivered to such officer * * * appointed or impowered to enlist men [by impressment]."{EN-959}

• [1755] "[I]n case the [required] number of men cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily inlist in the * * * service * * * , it shall and may be lawful, for the field officers and captains of the militia * * * to draft out of the militia of their counties * * * such and so many of their militia, who have not wives or children, * * * to be employed in the * * * service, who shall be entitled to the same privileges, exemptions, and pay, as if they had voluntarily enlisted themselves."{EN-960}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[T]here shall be raised and paid by the public to the officers and soldiers drawn out into actual service [upon an invasion or insurrection] * * * , and to the look-outs after the rates following: * * * to the county lieutenant * * * ten shillings per day; a colonel, lieutenant colonel each ten shillings per day; major eight shillings per day; captain six shillings per day; lieutenant three shillings per day; ensign two shillings per day, serjeant and corporal each one shilling and four-pence each day; drummer one shilling and two-pence per day; soldier one shilling per day; and to a look-out after the rate of thirty shillings per month."{EN-961}

• [1775] "[T]he officers and minute-men shall be allowed one day's pay for every twenty miles travelling to the place appointed for the general rendezvous of the several battalions, and the same for returning home; and moreover, sixpence per day in lieu of provisions. * * * [A]nd the officers and minute-men * * * shall be also allowed six-pence per day each, besides their pay, for the four days they shall exercise in their respective counties, in lieu of provisions.

* * * * *

"And for the more regular pay of the battalions, Be it farther ordained, That one paymaster shall be appointed by the committee of safety for each of the sixteen districts; and the pay of the officers and soldiers, when on duty in their counties, or in battalion, or when drawn out into actual service, shall be as followeth, to wit: To a colonel, fifteen shillings per day; a lieutenant-colonel, twelve shillings and sixpence; a major, ten shillings; a captain, six shillings; a lieutenant, four shillings; an ensign, three shillings; a serjeant, two shillings; corporal, drummer, and fifer, each one shilling and eightpence; and a private man, one shilling a four pence per day; a chaplain, ten shillings per day; a surgeon, when the battalion is in training duty, or actual service, ten shillings per day; a surgeon's mate, five shillings; an adjutant, holding no other office, six shillings; if in other office, three shillings; a quarter-master to be appointed, and allowed the same as an adjutant; a commissary of musters to each battalion, * * * ten shillings per day * * * ; and to a serjeant-major, to be chosen by the commanding-officer out of the most expert serjeants, two shillings and sixpence per day.

"And * * * the pay of the several officers and minute-men * * * shall commence from the completion of their respective battalions, and their meeting at the general rendezvous to be appointed[.]"{EN-962}

•[1784 and 1785] "Whenever any militia shall be in actual service, they shall be allowed pay and rations * * * , to commence from the time of rendezvousing in their counties, and to end on being discharged, viz. [here followed a specification of rates of pay and rations for all ranks]. And moreover, every militia man upon his discharge from actual service, shall be entitled to, and receive one day's pay for each twenty miles such place of discharge shall be distant from his place of abode."{EN-963}

3. Very early on, Virginia offered pay for men who brought their own firearms to Militia or other military service. For example,

[1682] "[T]he pay of each officer and soldier shall be as followeth: To the captain * * * finding himself horse, armes, ammunition and provision, eight thousand pounds of tobacco * * * for one whole yeare * * * ; and to each soldier finding himselfe horse, armes[,] furniture, provision, amunition and other necessaries * * * , two thousand pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-964}

This policy continued throughout the pre-constitutional period.[706] In some measure, this compensated for the requirement that every Militiamen who could afford to do so should purchase his own firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements.[707]

4. Also from an early date, Virginia reimbursed men who lost their arms while on active duty. For example,

[1676] "[I]f any horse or horses be killed in service, or armes lost, the owner or owners of such horse or armes soe lost, shall be satisfyed for the same of the publique, hee or they produceing a certificate from the cheife commander of the trueth thereof[.]"{EN-965}

This policy, too, continued throughout the pre-constitutional period.[708] Again, this somewhat mitigated the burden under which most Militiamen labored of having to equip themselves with arms.

---

[706] See post, at 432-435 and 437.

[707] See post, Chapter 17.

[708] See post, at 435-436.

5. During the *pre-*constitutional period, various Militia officers and functionaries received salaries derived either from fines imposed on defaulters or from Local taxes:

> • [1705 and 1723] "[F]ield officers and captains have full power and authority to appoint and imploy a clerk to attend them at [Militia musters] * * * , and to keep a register of all their proceedings, and to allow the said clerk such sallary for his said service * * * as * * * they shall think fit and reasonable, and to pay the same out of the penaltys and fines accrewing [against defaulters.]"{EN-966}

> • [1777] "One or more adjutants shall be appointed by the court martial of each county to attend musters general and private, and instruct the officers and soldiers in military duty, who shall * * * have an allowance * * * to be paid out of the fines; or if they not be sufficient, the deficiency to be supplied * * * in the[ ] next county levy[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> "The * * * court[-martial of each County] shall have power to appoint a clerk * * * , and may also appoint a provost martial * * * for the preservation of order and good behaviour * * * . And the said court martial shall also appoint * * * a bursar, who shall receive from the collector all fines by him collected * * * .
>
> "All fines imposed [on delinquents in the Militia] * * * shall be appropriated, in the first place, to the payment of the salaries and allowances to the adjutant, clerk, provost martial, collectors, and bursar[.]"{EN-967}

> • [1784 and 1785] "Each [Militia] court or board * * * are empowered to appoint a clerk and provost marshal" who shall "receive such allowance, to be paid out of the fines arising from delinquencies, as the said court or board shall think reasonable."{EN-968}

6. Finally, Virginia provided pensions for men disabled as the result of their military service. For example,

> • [1754] "[I]f any person or persons enlisted [as soldiers] * * * shall be so maimed or wounded, as to be rendered incapable of maintaining themselves, they shall, upon their return [from the campaign], be supported at the public expence."{EN-969}

> • [1775] "[I]f any of the regulars, minute, or militia-men * * * shall be so maimed or disabled as to be rendered incapable of maintaining themselves, they shall, upon their discharge, be supported at the expense of the publick."{EN-970}

I. Rotation in service. The burden of actual service was also distributed among the men through regular rotation:

• [1775] "[A]s well for the ease of the minute-men, as that they may be returned in regular rotation to the bodies of their respective militias, Be it * * * ordained, That after serving twelve months sixteen minute-men shall be discharged from each company * * * , and the like number at the end of every year, beginning with those who stand first on the roll, and who were first enlisted[.]"{EN-971}

• [1775] "[F]or the more expeditious, convenient, and speedy draughting into service detachments of the militia * * * , as occasion may require, Be it * * * ordained, That, at the general muster * * * the commanding-officer of each county or corporation shall, by fair and equal lot, cause to be drawn out of each company so many men as will amount to one tenth part thereof, and cause the names of the persons so allotted to be enrolled * * * as the first division of militia for such county or corporation; and * * * shall in like manner proceed, by lot, to fix * * * nine other divisions * * * ; and thereafter, if the militia * * * shall be called into duty, the same shall be performed by the divisions, in the order they shall so stand enrolled, one after another, so as to preserve the regular rotation of duty amongst them."{EN-972}

• [1776] "[W]here it shall be necessary to call on duty the militia of any colony [sic, 'county' must have been meant], upon an invasion or insurrection within the same, or any county adjoining, the commanding-officer shall have full power and authority to order into service such part of the militia of his said county as to him shall seem necessary, and shall also call in the divisions, or any part thereof, according to allotment; and the militia first called on duty shall be discharged as soon as the divisions called in shall be ready to perform the service required of such division."{EN-973}

• [1777] "FOR making provision against invasions and insurrections, and laying the burthen thereof equally on all: Be it enacted * * * , That the division of the militia of each county into ten parts * * * shall be completed and kept up * * * , each part to be distinguished by fair and equal lot * * * .

" * * * The several divisions of the militia * * * shall be called into duty by regular rotation * * * ; but if the invasion or insurrection be so near and pressing as not to allow the delay of calling the division * * * next in turn, the commanding officer may call on such part of the militia as shall be most convenient to continue in duty until such division * * * can come in to supply their places."{EN-974}

• [1780] "WHEREAS a dangerous invasion of South Carolina now threatens * * * that state, and the troops engaged in its defence may be overpowered by superiour numbers, if timely aid not be sent to them. And as it is incumbent upon this state, on every principle of policy and good neighbourhood, to assist our friends and fellow citizens in distress, as speedily and effectually as possible; Be it enacted * * * , That two > thousand five hundred infantry be forthwith called into service, in legal rotation, from [certain] counties, and in [certain] proportions[.]"{EN-975}

>
> • [1782] "[T]he governor shall cause to be delivered to the * * * commanding officers of the militia of such counties as are most exposed to the incursions of the enemy, and to the officers of the militia of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, such a number of arms as he may think necessary, not less than sufficient to arm three tenths of their militia, * * * which such * * * commanding officers * * * shall deliver * * * to such of the militia as are first to be called on duty * * * ; who, on having served their tour of duty, shall return their arms, in good order, * * * to be delivered in like manner to such of the militia as stand next in rotation."{EN-976}
>
> • [1786] "That * * * the * * * commanding officers * * * are hereby required to enroll the militia within their several counties and corporations, into distinct companies; and * * * to divide [each] company into divisions, * * * from one to ten, for the purpose of a regular rotine of duty when called into actual service[.]"{EN-977}

Rotation was feasible, of course, only when more than enough men were available to perform the necessary duty. But that was generally the situation, because the Militia incorporated in principle every able-bodied adult free man. Thus, if the number of volunteers for some service in the field proved insufficient, impressment could be employed to fill the ranks. Even men who were impressed could provide substitutes. And those without substitutes might be called upon to serve only in rotation. Moreover, all of the men who might have volunteered or otherwise been called up were likely to have had at least rudimentary Militia training. As one contemporary observer marveled, "[i]t may be asserted that North-America is entirely military, and inured to war, and that new levies may continually be made without making new soldiers".[709]

Today, revitalized "Militia of the several States" could do as well, if not better, than their pre-constitutional ancestors in spreading the burden of service throughout their communities on an efficient and equitable basis. For, with far larger populations composed of more highly educated people—and with greater capital investment, technology, and productivity in every area of human endeavor—than any of the Colonies ever enjoyed, the States could grant generous exemptions from routine Militia service for men with crucial civilian occupations; could employ very selective drafts, carefully qualified systems of substitution, and rapid rotation when men were called forth for special duties; and could pay reasonable compensation for many of the services Militiamen performed.

---

[709] Marquis de Chastellux, Travels in North-America, in the Years 1780, 1781, and 1782 (London, England: G.G.J. & J. Robinson, 1787), Volume 1, at 19.

J. Limitations on Militia duty. Finally, that every adult, able-bodied free man in pre-constitutional Virginia might have been required to perform some form of military service, in person or through a substitute, did not entail an absolutely unlimited commitment.

1. Virginia herself had to be in actual danger:

> • [1705] "[U]pon any invasion of the enemy by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * have full power to levy, raise, arm and muster such a number of forces out of the militia * * * as shall be thought requisite and needfull for repelling the invasion or suppressing the insurrection, and the same being raised, to order, direct, march, employ, continue, discharge and disband, as the occasion shall require, or the cause of danger ceases for which they were raised."{EN-978}
>
> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, and 1744] "[U]pon any invasion of an enemy by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * have full power and authority to levy, raise, arm, and muster, such a number of forces, out of the militia * * * as shall be thought needful for repelling the invasion, or suppressing the insurrection, or other danger * * * ; and such forces again to discharge and disband, as the cause of danger ceases, for which they were raised."{EN-979}
>
> • [1748 and 1753] "[U]pon any invasion of an enemy by sea, or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * shall have full power and authority to levy, raise, arm, and muster, such a number of forces, out of the militia * * * as shall be thought needful for repelling the invasion, or suppressing the insurrection, or other danger * * * , and such forces again to discharge, and disband, as the cause of danger ceases."{EN-980}
>
> • [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[U]pon any invasion of any enemy, by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * shall have full power and authority to levy, raise, arm and muster such a number of forces out of the militia * * * as shall be thought needful for repelling the invasion, or suppressing the insurrection or other danger; * * * and such forces again to discharge and disband as the cause of danger ceases."{EN-981}

So, notwithstanding that Virginia was fully organized and armed at all times, she was not "a garrison state" or "a para-military police state". For her people, although always possessed of arms, were not always under arms, but took up their arms only when confronted with a real "cause of danger".

2. Except under extraordinary circumstances, Virginians could not be required to serve outside of Virginia's own territory; and when they were, they remained under the command of Virginia's own authorities:

> • [1755] "That * * * a sum of money * * * be laid out for * * * raising and maintaining three compa[n]ies of * * * rangers, for the > protection of the subjects in the frontiers of this colony, as the governor shall direct from time to time, and [they] shall not be sent out of this colony, nor incorporated with the soldiers now in his majesty's service, or made subject to martial law."{EN-982}

>
> • [1755] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * impower the governor * * * to lead or march the militia of this colony, or cause them to be led or marched, more than five miles beyond where the inhabitants of this colony, shall be settled on the western frontiers."{EN-983}
>
> • [1756] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * impower the governor * * * to lead or march the soldiers hereby raised, or cause them to be led or marched out of this colony."{EN-984}
>
> • [1775] "[W]hereas it may be necessary, for the publick security, that the forces to be raised * * * should, as occasion may require, be marched to different parts of the united colonies, * * * the officers and soldiers * * * shall, in all things, * * * be under the controul, and subject to the order, of the committee of safety."{EN-985}

3. Restrictions of these kinds, repeated over and over again throughout the years, reflected two fundamental principles "the good people of Virginia" later codified in her Declaration of Rights in 1776: namely, (i) "[t]hat government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security, of the people, nation, or community" (equality of public benefits for the people); and (ii) "[t]hat a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state; that standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty; and that, in all cases, the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power" (equality of public service from the people).{EN-986}

a. Without special authorization from "the good people" "of a free state", a government established by the people for the benefit of themselves, their communities, and their nation as a whole should never be allowed, on its own recognizance, to deploy the Militia to fight for other peoples, communities, or nations—particularly when, having been dispatched to foreign lands, Militiamen would no longer be available to defend their own communities and nation from imminent threats to their own "homeland security". Which is why the Constitution delegates to Congress the power "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia" only "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions",[710] tasks that, in almost every conceivable instance, the Militia would be expected to perform within or in close proximity to the territory of the United States, and of "the several States" whose establishments they are.[711]

---

[710] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[711] See post, at 870-871 and 1187-1188.

b. In addition, in "a free state" not caught up in the coils and toils of a total war for its very survival, the people are not always under arms and thereby potentially subject to some species of "martial law".[712] If any substantial portion of the people are permanently so regimented in "a standing army", their polity is not "a free state", but "a garrison state", "a national-security state", or "a para-military police state"—which is not simply dangerous to liberty, but inevitably fatal. A true "Militia" settled and regulated on the pre-constitutional pattern is not "a standing army", because inter alia: (i) Its members consist of "the body of the people" themselves, not some élitist force that imagines itself separate from, independent of, and superior to the people. (ii) Its members are mobilized and deployed in full military array only during times of actual danger, but otherwise remain for the large part diffused throughout the community in their ordinary walks of life. And, especially, (iii) its members are not subject to "martial law", except perhaps when in actual service during those times—and then only to "martial law" administered by members of the Militia themselves for the sole purpose of disciplining the Militia. Which is why the Constitution provides that "[n]o person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger".[713] Importantly, too, this "except[ion]" allows for the possible application of some variety of "martial law" "in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger", but does not require it.

"[T]he land or naval forces" constitute what the Founding Fathers understood as "a standing army";[714] and therefore their members, as the consequence of the nature of the institutions in which they are enrolled, arguably may be exposed to some species of "martial law" peculiar to them throughout the time they remain in service. Even strictly confined to those "forces" alone, such a régime would be bad enough. For, as Blackstone observed, > martial law, which is built upon no settled principles, but is entirely arbitrary in it's decisions, is * * * is truth and reality no law, but something indulged, rather than allowed as a law: the necessity of order and discipline in an army is the only thing which can give it countenance; and therefore it ought not to be permitted in time of peace, when the * * * courts are open for all persons to receive justice according to the laws of the land.[715]

---

[712] On the significantly different definitions of so-called "martial law" possible, see post, Chapter 48.

[713] U.S. Const. amend. V (emphasis supplied).

[714] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 14.

[715] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 412 (footnote omitted).

Far worse yet would the situation be if the "martial law" peculiarly applicable to "a standing army" were extended at all times to the Militia—which today should consist of potentially every able-bodied adult throughout "the several States". For then, if the terms "War or public danger" were imaginatively construed, civilian law in serious criminal cases might simply disappear; and, in that event, "the military [would not] be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power"—but instead "the civil power" would find itself largely at the mercy of "the military"—with all of the disastrous consequences to individual liberty that inversion of authority would entail. (Unless, of course, the Militia themselves refused, as they should, to acquiesce in that result.)

If not politically impossible were America to find herself squeezed in the iron grip of militaristic usurpers and tyrants, such an over-extension of "martial law" is always constitutionally impossible. In 1781, Virginia's General Assembly declared "martial law" on quite specific grounds:

> WHEREAS it is necessary for the safety of the army that all persons within a limited distance thereof should be subject to martial law; Be it enacted, That all persons whatsoever either in the American army or within twenty miles thereof, and also all persons within twenty miles of the enemy's camp, shall * * * be subject to martial law, as declared by the continental rules, articles and regulations of war; and any person within the said limits, guilty of disobedience of orders or any other offence, punishable by the said articles of war, shall be tried, acquitted or condemned, and punished as in and by the said rules and articles of war is ordered and prescribed.{EN-987}

Plainly, the conditions precedent that these patriotic lawmakers required were: (i) a time of actual "war"; (ii) geographical boundaries that fairly represented the immediate range of the Army's operations, including areas in which spies, informers, or other subversives or irregulars could operate profitably and in which movements by civilians loyal to either side could embarrass or complicate the Army's activities; and (iii) the reasonable conclusion flowing from the latter two circumstances that a declaration of "martial law" applicable to civilians in that area was "necessary for the safety of the army", because the civilian authorities in the area (if any there were) could not, in fact, deal with the situation.

Thus, the restrictions pre-constitutional Virginia imposed on the employment of her Militia ultimately reflected the political principle of practical popular sovereignty that remains equally compelling today: namely, that WE THE PEOPLE are not mere "human resources" available for scheming politicians, avaricious factions, rogue public officials, and Napoléonic "men on white horses" to misuse for their pet projects, particularly when those projects involve aggressive military adventures abroad or police-state oppression at home. A free people does not exist to provide cannon fodder and logistical support for "a garrison state" or a "national-security state", or informers, investigators, and enforcers for "a para-military police state". Rather, the critical mass of military force available in "a free state" must remain in the people's own hands, through their organization in the Militia, in order to prevent the emergence of such conditions in the first place, and to prevail against any attempts to maintain and expand any such conditions that rogue public officials might somehow insinuate into the polity behind the people's backs.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Virginia required most of the members of her pre-constitutional Militia to supply their own firearms and ammunition, and otherwise encouraged and rewarded the use of private arms in public service.

Article 13 of Virginia's Declaration of Rights in 1776 emphasized that "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state"; and the Second Amendment in 1791 added that "[a] well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed". Yet, then as now, that all able-bodied adult free males were or are simply nominal members of a "Militia" was and is, by itself, not enough to provide a "safe defence" or "the security of a free State". That degree of organization is necessary, to be sure; but withal it is insufficient. Equipment suitable for performing the Militia's tasks must also be at hand. Indeed, such equipment may even be arguably more important than organization—because no variety of mere organization can guarantee to provide equipment; whereas proper equipment will serve whatever form of organization can eventually be adopted. Thus, the conditions sine qua non to put into effect the essential organizational principle that the "militia, composed of the body of the people, [must be] trained to arms" are that: (i) in fact, the people themselves actually possess sufficient quantities of "arms" suitable specifically for Militia service*; and (ii) in law, their possession is guaranteed by an* absolute and fully enforceable *"right * * * to keep and bear Arms".*

During the pre-constitutional era, Virginians never doubted the wisdom of these conclusions. From at least 1672, they knew that "as against all tymes of danger it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service[.]"{EN-988} Based on this precept, the acquisition, ownership, and permanent possession of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements by the people themselves for their own service in their Militia was always the general rule in Virginia (as, indeed, it always was in almost every other Colony and thereafter in every independent State throughout America).

A. The community to be thoroughly armed. From the earliest days of her settlement, Virginia considered a thoroughly armed populace vital to the community's "homeland security":

> • [1624] "That the commander of every plantation take care that there be sufficient of powder and amunition within the plantation * * * and their pieces fixt and their arms compleate."{EN-989}
>
> • [1639] "ALL persons except negroes to be provided with arms and amunition[.]"{EN-990}
>
> • [1644] "[I]n places of danger it shall not be lawfull for any to seat or inhabitt without ten sufficient men at the least, and arms and ammunition accordingly[.]"{EN-991}
>
> • [1645] "WHEREAS the carelesse stragling of many people hath exposed them to the slaughter of the enemie, Be it enacted, that [certain officers] * * * in the severall precints, shall hereby have power to restraine all such persons (as not being considerable party to defend themselves) shall either hunt in the woods or travell abroad[.]"{EN-992}

These early enactments—which set the tone for everything that followed—embodied the very antithesis of modern-day "gun control", which aims at preventing ordinary individuals from acquiring the most effective firearms. In pre-constitutional Virginia, "ALL persons" (other than women, children, and persons of color) in "every plantation" were required to possess firearms and ammunition "sufficient", "compleate", and "fixt". In general usage at that time, just as now, anything that was "fixed" was "ma[d]e fast, firm, or stable".[716] So, in relation specifically to arms, "fixt" plainly meant "put in order[,] * * * adjust[ed,] * * * set or place[d] in the manner desired or most suitable" or "repair[ed]"[717]—that "use", of course, being individual and especially collective self-defense against every conceivable threat. Moreover, in the starkest contrast to contemporary "gun control", which aims at preventing ordinary individuals from carrying firearms in public as a matter of course, when Virginians in pre-constitutional days "travell[ed] abroad" they were to form some "considerable party to defend themselves" so as to be able adequately to deal with whatever dangers might have lain in wait for them. Thus, Virginians could have defended themselves, their homes, and their businesses, and moved about their communities in safety, because at all times they themselves as individuals possessed effective firearms and ammunition, in good working order, and among themselves as a community they had organized "considerable part[ies]" for the purposes of mutual aid and assistance.

B. An individual duty to acquire and possess firearms. For most able-bodied adult free male Virginians, their duty was, not simply to be armed, but

---

[716] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions. Accord, Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 565, definition 1; Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 958, definition 1.

[717] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 565, definition 5. Accord, The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, ante note 11, Volume 1, at 1012, definition 14.a.; Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 861, definition 3a.

specifically to arm themselves out of their own resources if they were capable of doing so, and thereafter to maintain personal possession of their arms at all times:[718]

> • [1659 and 1662] "[T]hat a provident supplie be made of gunn powder and shott to our owne people, and this strictly to bee lookt to by the officers of the militia, (vizt.) That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least which are to be provided by every man for his family[.]"{EN-993}
>
> • [1673 and 1676] "FOR the better supply of the country with armes and ammunition, Be it enacted * * * , that the captaines of ffoote and horse in each county doe take a strict and perticuler account of what armes and ammunition are wanting in their severall companies and troops * * * : And be it further enacted * * * , that the perticuler county courts be * * * impowred upon their respective counties to lay and raise a levy for the provideing of armes and ammunition for supplying the wants aforesaid, that is to say, muskitts and swords for the ffoote, and pistolls, swords and carbines for horse, as alsoe for every lysted souldier at the least two pounds of powder and six pounds of shott, the said armes and ammunition * * * to remaine in the hands of the officers of the militia for them to dispose of the same as there shalbe occasion; and that those to whome distribution of armes and ammunition shalbe made doe pay for the same at a reasonable rate[.]"{EN-994}
>
> • [1684] "FOR the encouragement of the inhabitants * * * of Virginia, to provide themselves with arms and ammunition, for the defence of this * * * country, and that they may appear well and compleatly furnished when commanded to musters and other * * * service, which many persons have hitherto delayed to do, for that their arms have been imprest and taken from them * * * it is hereby enacted, That all such swords, musketts, pistolls, carbines, guns, and other armes and furniture, as the inhabitants of this country are already provided, or shall provide and furnish themselves with, for their necessary use and service, shall * * * be free and exempted from being imprest or taken from him or them, * * * neither shall the same be lyable to be taken by any distresse, seizure, attachment or execution * * * .
>
> "And * * * That * * * every trooper * * * shall furnish and supply himself with * * * all arms and furniture, fitt and compleat for a trooper, and that every foot soldier, shall furnish and supply himselfe, with a sword, musquet and other furniture fitt for a soldier, and that each trooper and foot souldier, be provided with two pounds of powder, and eight pounds of shott, and shall continually keep their arms well fixt, cleane and fitt for * * * service."{EN-995}

---

[718] As to those individuals eligible for the Militia but not financially capable of providing their own firearms, see post, at 424-432.

• [1705] "That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * make * * * a new list of all the male persons in his respective county capable * * * to serve in the militia, and to order and dispose them into troops or companys, according to * * * the respective circumstances of the ability of the persons listed, to the end each trouper or ffoot soldier may be thereby guided to provide and furnish himself with * * * arms and ammunition * * * .

" * * * That every ffoot soldier be provided with a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed, a good sword and cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and appear constantly with the same at * * * muster and exercise, and that besides those each foot soldier have at his place of abode two pounds of powder and eight pounds of shott, and bring the same into the field with him when * * * required, and that every soldier belonging to the horse be provided with * * * a case of good pistolls well fixed, * * * double cartouch box, and twelve charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * to muster and exercise, and that besides those each soldier belonging to the horse have at his usuall place of abode a well fixed carabine, * * * two pounds of powder and eight pounds of shott, and bring the same into the field with him, when * * * required.

* * * * *

" Provided always * * * That eighteen months time be given and allowed to each trooper and ffoot soldier not heretofore listed to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * .

"And for the encouragement of every soldier in horse or ffoot to provide and furnish himself * * * and his security to keep his * * * arms and ammunition, when provided,

" * * * That the musket or ffuzee, the sword, cartouch box and ammunition of every ffoot soldier, and * * * the carbine, pistolls, sword, cartouch box and ammunition of every trooper provided and kept in pursuance of this act to appear and exercise withal be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever, and likewise from being seized or taken by any manner of distress, attachment or writt of execution[.]"{EN-996}

• [1723] "That every soldier belonging to the horse, be provided with * * * a case of pistols, cutting sword, or cutlace, and double cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise; and shall keep at his place of abode, a well fixed carbine * * * , one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot, and bring the same into the field with him when * * * required. And that every foot soldier be provided with a firelock, musquet, or fuzee, well fixed, and bayonet fitted to such musquet or fuzee, or a good cutting sword or cutlace, a cartouch box, and three charges of powder, and appear constantly with the same * * * for muster and exercise; and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot, and bring the same into the field with him, when * * * required[.]

* * * * *

" * * * Provided always * * * That eighteen months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * —So as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters with such arms as he is already furnished with.

* * * * *

" * * * And for an encouragement of every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * , and his security to keep his horse, arms, and ammunition, when provided, * * * That the * * * arms and ammunition, provided and kept, * * * be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever; and likewise, from being seized or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writ of execution."{EN-997}

• [1738] "That every person * * * listed [in the Militia], (except free mulattos, negros and Indians,) and placed or ranked in horse or foot, shall be armed and accoutred in manner following: * * * Every horse-man shall be furnished with a * * * carbine or fuzee, * * * a case of pistols, cutting sword or cutlass, double cartouch-box, and six charges of powder; and constantly appear with the same, at * * * muster and exercise; and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball, and bring the same into the field with him, when * * * required. And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock, musket, or fuzee, well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, or a cutting sword or cutlass, a cartouch-box, and three charges of powder; and appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise * * * ; and shall also keep at his house, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball; and bring the same into the field, when * * * required.

* * * * *

" * * * Provided always * * * That eighteen months time be given and allowed to each soldier to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * ; so as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters, with such arms as he is already furnished with.

" * * * And, for encouragement to every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * , and his security to keep his arms and ammunition, when provided, * * * That the * * * arms and ammunition, provided and kept, * * * be free and exempted, at all times, from being impressed upon any account whatsoever; and likewise from being seised or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writ of execution."{EN-998}

• [1755] "[E]very person * * * inlisted [in the Militia], (except the people commonly called Quakers, free Mulattoes, negroes and Indians) and placed or ranked in the horse or foot, shall be armed and accoutred in the manner following, that is to say; every horseman shall be

furnished with a * * * carbine * * * , a case of pistols, cutting sword, double cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise, and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same into the field with him when * * * required: And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a cutting sword, a double cartouch box, and three charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise * * * , and shall also keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same with him into the field when * * * required.

* * * * *

" * * * Provided also * * * That twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * , so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with: And if any soldier shall appear at any muster not armed and accoutred, * * * it shall and may be lawful, for the captain of the troop or company to which such soldier shall belong, to examine such soldier upon oath, whether he hath any, and what arms and ammunition he really hath of his own property, and if on such examination it shall appear, that such soldier hath any arms or ammunition of his own property, and hath not brought the same, * * * he shall be liable to * * * penalties * * * although he hath not been inlisted twelve months * * * . And for an encouragement to every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * and his security to keep his arms and ammunition when provided:

" * * * That the * * * arms and ammunition, provided and kept * * * , be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever; and likewise, from being seised or taken by any manner of distress, attachment or writ of execution[.]"{EN-999}

•[1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[E]very person * * * inlisted [in the Militia] (except free mulattoes, negroes, and Indians) shall be armed in the manner following, that is to say: Every soldier shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a double cartouch-box, and three charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise, and shall also keep at his place of abode one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same with him into the field when * * * required[.]

* * * * *

" * * * Provided also * * * That twelve months shall be given and allowed to each soldier, not already inlisted, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * , so as such soldier do appear at all musters during the said twelve months with such arms as he hath and is already furnished with: And if any soldier shall appear at any muster not armed, and with ammunition * * * it shall and may be lawful for the captain of the company * * * to examine such soldier, upon oath, whether he hath any, and what arms and ammunition he really hath of his own property, and if on such examination it shall appear that such soldier hath any arms or ammunition of his own property, and hath not brought the same, * * * he shall be liable to * * * penalties * * * altho' he hath not been inlisted twelve months * * * .

" * * * And for an encouragement to every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * , and his security to keep his arms and ammunition when provided, * * * That the arms and ammunition provided and kept * * * be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever, and likewise from being seized or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writ of execution[.]"{EN-1000}

• [1775] "That every militia man so to be enlisted shall furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise with a * * * common firelock, bayonet, pouch, or cartouch box, three charges of powder and ball, * * * and shall constantly keep by him one pound of powder and four pounds of ball * * * .

"Provided always, That no person shall be subject to * * * penalties * * * for the not providing or producing the quantity of powder required, who shall make it appear * * * that he has used his best endeavours to procure such powder, and hath not been able so to do * * * .

* * * * *

"That the soldiers shall be allowed six months after enlisting to provide themselves with arms, and in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have * * * ; and that all arms of the militia shall be exempted from executions or distresses[.]"{EN-1001}

• [1777] "Every * * * soldier shall appear at his respective muster-field * * * armed and accoutred * * * with a rifle and tomahawk, or good firelock and bayonet, with a pouch and horn, or a cartouche or cartridge box, and with three charges of powder and ball; and, moreover, * * * shall constantly keep one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer. * * *

" * * * Every * * * soldier shall be allowed six months after his * * * enrollment [in the Militia] to provide such arms or accoutrements as he had not at the time. All arms and ammunition of the militia shall be exempted from executions and distresses at all times[.]"{EN-1002}

• [1784] "Every officer and soldier [in the Militia] shall appear at his respective muster-field * * * , armed, equipped, and accoutred, as follows: * * * every non-commissioned officer and private, with a good clean musket, carrying an ounce ball, and three feet eight inches long in the barrel, with a good bayonet and iron ramrod well fitted thereto, a cartridge box properly made, to contain and secure twenty cartridges fitted to his musket * * * ; and moreover, each non-commissioned officer and private shall have at every muster, one pound of good powder and four pounds of lead; including twenty blind cartridges; * * * provided, that the militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining thereto, shall not be obliged to be armed with muskets, but may have good rifles with proper accoutrements in lieu thereof. And every of the * * * non-commissioned officers, and privates, shall constantly keep the aforesaid arms, accoutrements and ammunition ready to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer.

* * * * *

" * * * That twelve months after the commencement of this act shall be allowed for providing the arms and accoutrements herein directed; but in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them the best arms and accoutrements they can get.

* * * * *

" * * * All arms, ammunition, and equipments of the militia, shall be exempted from executions and distresses at all times * * * .

" * * * That no arms or accoutrements, which may hereafter be lost in service, shall be paid for by the public, unless the loser shall be killed, wounded, or otherwise incapacitated in the opinion of a court-martial, from preserving his arms."{EN-1003}

• [1785] "Every officer and soldier [in the Militia] shall appear at his respective muster-field * * * , armed, equipped, and accoutred, as follows: * * * every non-commissioned officer and private, with a good, clean musket, carrying an ounce ball, and three feet eight inches long in the barrel, with a good bayonet and iron ramrod well fitted thereto, a cartridge box properly made, to contain and secure twenty cartridges fitted to his musket * * * , and moreover, every non-commissioned officer and private shall have at every muster one pound of good powder, and four pounds of lead, including twenty blind cartridges * * * . Provided, That the militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining thereto, shall not be obliged to be armed with muskets, but may have good rifles with proper accoutrements, in lieu thereof. And every of the * * * non-commissioned officers, and privates, shall constantly keep the aforesaid arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, ready to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer.

* * * * *

" * * * That two years after the commencement of this act, shall be allowed for providing the arms and accoutrements herein directed; but in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them, the best arms and accoutrements they can get.

* * * * *

" * * * All arms, ammunition, and equipments, of the militia, shall be exempted from executions and distresses at all times * * * . No arms or accoutrements, which may hereafter be lost in service, shall be paid for by the public, unless the loser shall be killed, wounded, or otherwise incapacitated * * * from preserving his arms."{EN-1004}

In each and every one of these instances over a period of some one hundred twenty-five years, the statutes explicitly required every member of the Militia who was financially capable of doing so to supply himself with his own firearm, ammunition, and necessary accoutrements:

- In 1659 and 1662, the arms "every man able to beare armes" was required to "have in his house" were "to be provided by [that very] man".

- In 1673 and 1676, "distribution of armes and ammunition" was to be made to "lysted soldier[s]" who lacked that equipment, who would "pay for the same at a reasonable rate", and who thereafter would own and possess it as their private property.

- In 1684, each man was commanded to "furnish and supply himself with" certain arms and accoutrements. He was also required to "be provided with" ammunition, the source of which was not expressly identified, but in context must have been "himself" as well, there being nothing in the statute to suggest that the individual would "furnish and supply" part of his mandatory equipment, but that some unnamed someone else would "provide[ ]" the remainder.

- In 1705, each Militiamen was to "be * * * guided to provide and furnish himself with [certain specified] arms and ammunition". In this context, when the statute further mandated that he was "to be provided with" and to "have at his place of abode" or to "have at his usual place of abode" additional enumerated equipment, it plainly intended that he himself would supply those items, too. Then, the explicit emphasis on each man's acquiring his equipment on his own was repeated in the allowance of time "to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition", and in "the encouragement * * * to provide and furnish himself * * * and his security to keep his horse, arms and ammunition, when provided", by exempting "the [arms and ammunition] provided and kept" from being taken from him.

- In 1723, the statute first required in general terms that every Militiaman should simply "be provided with" certain arms and ammunition, "keep at his place of abode" additional ammunition, and "be furnished and provided with [such] arms and ammunition" at musters. But that these requirements imposed on each Militiaman the duty to acquire that equipment on his own became obvious from the statutory period of grace "allowed" for each of them "to furnish and provide himself with [the necessary] arms and ammunition", and otherwise to "appear * * * with such arms as he is already furnished with", which could only have been his own personal arms. In addition, the statute encouraged each man "to provide and furnish himself" with the necessary arms and ammunition, by guaranteeing "his security to keep his * * * arms, and ammunition, when provided", through exemption of such "arms, and ammunition, provided and kept", from seizures. That is, each Militiaman was originally to acquire arms and ammunition, and thereafter to keep them, on and as his own, legally secured in his right of possession.

• In 1738, although some of the verbal formulae in the statute differed trivially from those employed in 1723 ("be furnished with" as opposed to "be provided with"; "keep at his house" as opposed to "keep at his place of abode"; and "for encouragement to every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * and his security to keep his arms and ammunition" as opposed to "for an encouragement of every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * and his security to keep his arms and ammunition"), the rest were identical ("to furnish and provide himself with", "with such arms as he is already furnished with", "to provide and furnish himself", and "keep at his place of abode")—so that the meaning of the former statute was exactly the same as that of the latter.

• In 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771, the statutes adopted essentially the same verbiage as the statutes of 1723 and 1738, with one internally redundant exception ("with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with" as opposed to "with such arms as he is already furnished with")—which emphasized even more strongly that each Militiaman himself was responsible for supplying his own arms. Revealingly, too, in 1755 through 1771, the statutes authorized "the captain of the [Militia] company * * * to examine * * * upon oath" "any soldier" who "appear[ed] at any muster" without arms and ammunition, in order to determine "what arms and ammunition he really hath of his own property". This inquiry would have been pointless if the norm had been other than for each Militiamen initially to supply, and then to maintain in his own possession, his very own arms and ammunition.

• In 1775, the statute required each Militiaman to "furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had"—that is, if he could find one, presumably in the free market; and "otherwise" to furnish himself "with a * * * common firelock"—doubtlessly, in the same manner and from the same source. The additional command that he "constantly keep by him one pound of powder" was followed by the mitigation of "penalties" for any Militiaman who "has used his best endeavours to procure such powder, and hath not been able to do so"—thus plainly establishing that it was the Militiaman's personal responsibility to obtain the powder in the first instance. (Certainly the statute identified no one else to whom he could have delegated that task.) Moreover, the statutory "allow[ance]" of time for Militiamen "to provide themselves with arms, and in the mean time [to] bring with them such arms as they have", unequivocally identified the men themselves as the only sources of both their new and their old arms.

•In 1777, the statutory period of grace during which each Militiaman was "allowed * * * to provide such arms or accoutrements as he had not at the time" clearly intended that the man himself was to "provide" in the future the arms he had not so "provide[d]" before—and, otherwise, "to provide such arms" that satisfied statutory standards as he did have "at the time". That is, the presence or the absence of arms, or both, resulted from the same individual's own actions or inactions, past, present, or future. Also, although not as explicit as in 1775, the additional requirement that each Militiaman "constantly keep one pound of powder and four pounds of ball" could have been construed only as requiring him personally to acquire that ammunition in the first place—for nothing in the statute pointed to any other actor or source; and no reason exists why one rule should have applied to a Militiaman's basic complement of arms and an altogether different one to his further stock of "powder and * * * ball".

•In 1784 and 1785, the statutes did not explicitly identify who should be "allowed" the period of grace "for providing the arms and accoutrements". But the permission-cum-requirement that "in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them, the best arms and accoutrements they can get" obviously implied that the new arms and accoutrements were to be "provid[ed]" in the future by the selfsame men then using—because they had previously acquired—"the best arms and accoutrements they c[ould] get" sometime in the past. The statutes simply required them to "get" arms better than the ones they already possessed, if the latter did not measure up to the Militia's standards. Then, too, if "the militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining" were "not * * * obliged to be armed with muskets, but [might] have [had] good rifles with proper accoutrements in lieu thereof", who initially was to decide whether particular "rifles" were "good", and whether they should be substituted for "muskets" in Militia service, other than the Militiamen who actually owned those firearms? Moreover, the special allowance in these two statutes that Militiamen's "arms * * * lost in service, shall be paid for by the public" identified those arms as privately held. For "the public" would hardly have paid anyone had public arms been "lost in service"—rather, the derelict Militiamen would have been held financially accountable. So, because "the public" absorbed the losses, any such "arms" must have been some Militiaman's own personal property, as the statutes themselves recognized in describing the equipment as "his arms". And, if "his" at the time of their loss, the arms must have been supplied by him ab initio.

Sometimes, of course, a Militia statute was not as explicit as those described above, although the result of its application was the same. For example:

> [1777] "FOR forming the citizens of Williamsburg, borough of Norfolk, and the professors and students of William and Mary college, into a militia, and better disciplining them: Be it enacted * * * , That all male persons between the ages of sixteen and fifty years, within the * * * city or borough, except the persons exempted by an [earlier Militia A]ct * * * and such of the professors and students of William and Mary college as would otherwise be part of the militia of James City county * * * , shall * * * be enrolled and formed into companies * * * .
>
> " * * * And the militia of the said city and borough, with the professors and students of the said college, shall be mustered, trained, and employed, * * * and * * * shall be armed with the same weapons, and be subject to the same * * * regulations * * * as the militia of a county * * * are * * * by the before mentioned act[.]"{EN-1005}

The "before mentioned act" was also passed in 1777.[719] Under the two statutes read together, then, "the professors and students of William and Mary college" were all required to appear at musters each "with a rifle and tomahawk, or good firelock and bayonet", along with ammunition and accoutrements, if such they possessed at the time of their enrollments in the Militia, or to obtain within six months whatever of that equipment they "had not at th[at] time".

Inasmuch as "the professors and students" would naturally have kept their firearms and ammunition in their residences at the college itself or somewhere close by, this statute alone proves how repulsive *pre-*constitutional Virginians (and, truly, all Americans of that era) would have found the notion of "gun-free schools" (or of any "gun-free zones") so fashionable today among the enemies of "a free State" and their fellow travelers, ideological transmission-belts, and assorted hangers-on and dupes.[720] Virginians then knew that, especially in a college, professors should teach and their students (and the professors as well) should learn by example, controlled experimentation, and experience, as well as by mere exhortation, wherein a Militia is "well regulated"; why "a well regulated militia" is "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state", and therefore "necessary to the security of a free state"; and what constitute the first two principles of such a Militia: namely, that (i) "a well regulated militia" is "composed of the body of the people" themselves, "trained to arms"; and (ii) the people enjoy an absolute "right"—and, indeed, a duty—"to keep and bear Arms" in order to render the Militia effective.[721] True enough, inasmuch as the lowest age for eligibility in Virginia's Militia in 1777 was sixteen years, some college students would have been both minors and Militiamen.{EN-1006} But at what better time and under what better circumstances to form their characters and fill their minds according to the principles of freedom?

---

[719] Quoted ante, at 413 & {EN-1002}.

[720] See post, at 1415-1418.

Thus, throughout this entire period, other than with respect to individuals too impoverished to purchase their own firearms and ammunition,[722] or in other special circumstances,[723] Virginia (as well as Rhode Island and all but one of the other Colonies and then all of the independent States) considered a nearly complete dependence upon her Militiamen's own acquisition of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements to be a fully adequate way to "regulate" her Militia. Inasmuch as what was generally recognized as proper "regulation" throughout *pre-*constitutional America defines constitutional "regulation" today,[724] it would now be acceptable and even advisable for Congress "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia"[725] by first establishing minimal National standards for Militia firearms and ammunition, and then allowing WE THE PEOPLE in the States immediately to arm themselves with whatever they might have to hand or could purchase in a truly free market, until in due course and with no excessive economic burden they could acquire whatever new or additional arms they might need. Or, recognizing that revitalization of the Militia under contemporary conditions must be to some significant degree an experimental enterprise, Congress could encourage each State to set a separate standard that reflected the peculiar imperatives of "homeland security" within her own territory, and then to start a process of gradual compliance with that standard among her people through their utilization of the free market.

C. Even otherwise exempted individuals required to supply arms. In *pre-*constitutional Virginia, even certain individuals who were to some degree exempted from Militia service were nonetheless required to provide firearms to their Local governments or to the Militia, personally or through a substitute, or to possess firearms for their own possible active Militia service, or both:

> • [1705] "[F]or as much as severall of the persons exempted * * * , though they be of sufficient ability to find and keep * * * horse arms, and such men whose personal service may not only be usefull, but necessary upon an insurrection or invasion * * * , will perhaps account

---

[721] See Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 and U.S. Const. amend. II. See post, at 1331-1333 and 1401-1423.

[722] See post, at 424-432.

[723] See post, at 437-439

[724] See ante, at 63-81.

[725] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

themselves free from provideing and keep[ing] the same at the places of their abode, which is not intended:

"Be is therefore enacted * * * That the persons of a councellor, of a speaker of the house of burgesses, of a justice of the peace, of an attorney-general, and of a captain or an higher officer in the militia, are exempted from being listed and serving either in horse or foot under command as the rest of the militia do, merely for the dignity of the office which they do or shall have held, and * * * all and every such person or persons, and also the clerk of the councill, the clerk of the general court, and every county court clerk shall provide and keep * * * at their respective places of abode a troopers * * * arms and ammunition * * * .

"And in case of any rebellion or invasion shall also * * * appear * * * and serve in such stations as are suitable for gentlemen[.]"

Under this statute, "a troopers * * * arms and ammunition" included "a case of good pistolls well fixed, sword and double cartouch box, and twelve charges of powder", as well as "a well fixed carbine" and "two pounds of powder and eight pounds of shott".{EN-1007}

• [1723] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any person or persons that shall be, or shall have been, of his Majesty's council * * * , speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary of this colony, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, his Majesty's attorney-general, a justice of the peace, or any person that shall have born any military commission within this colony, as high as * * * a captain, or the clerk of the council, for the time being, or the clerk of the general court, for the time being, or any county court clerk, during his being such, personally to appear at any musters: But that all, and every the persons aforesaid * * * are hereby required, to find and provide one able-bodied white man * * * and * * * trooper's accoutrements, * * * who shall constantly appear and exercise at all musters."

Under this statute, a "trooper's accoutrements" included "a case of pistols, cutting sword, or cutlace, and double cartouche box, and six charges of powder" along with "a well fixed carbine, * * * one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot". Presumably, too, the "able-bodied white man" who "appear[ed] and exercise[d]" as a substitute for an exempted individual would not have been entitled to claim the statutory period of "eighteen months * * * to furnish and provide himself with [such] arms and ammunition", because the substitute's principal was required "to * * * provide one able-bodied white man" with "trooper's accoutrements" then and there.{EN-1008} of burgesses, clerk of the secretary's office, a justice of the peace, clerk of any county court, or any person that shall have borne any military commission as high as * * * captain, or any of the people commonly called Quakers: Yet all the persons aforesaid, shall, and are hereby required, to send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters."

• [1738] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons herein after-mentioned, to a personal attendance at musters: that is to say, Such as are, or shall have been, members of his majesty's council, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary, receiver-general, auditor, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, attorney-general, clerk of the council, clerk of the house

Under this statute, an ordinary "footman" was to "be furnished with a firelock, musket, or fuzee, well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, or a cutting sword or cutlass, a cartouch-box, and three charges of powder"; whereas a "horse-man" needed a "carbine or fuzee, * * * a case of pistols, cutting sword or cutlass, double cartouch-box, and six charges of powder"; and both were further required to keep "one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball" ready at hand. Presumably here, too, an able-bodied substitute who was "constantly to appear, and exercise at musters" could not have availed himself of the statutory allowance of "eighteen months * * * to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition", because the person in whose stead he "appear[ed]" was "to send one able-bodied man * * * armed and accoutred", not a man bearing only an excuse.{EN-1009}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he several persons * * * exempted from mustering * * * *shall provide arms for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside* in the following manner; that is to say, each councillor not being an officer of the militia, four complete sets of arms * * * for a foot soldier: The speaker of the house of Burgesses not being an officer of the militia, four compleat sets of arms * * * : The receiver general, auditor, and secretary, not being a councillor or officer of the militia, each four compleat setts * * * : The attorney general, not being an officer of the militia, two compleat sets * * * : The clerk of the council, and clerk of the secretary's office, not being officers of the militia, each two compleat sets * * * : The mayor, recorder, and aldermen of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk (* * * not being officers of the militia) each two compleat sets[.]"

Under these statutes, a "complete set[ ] of arms * * * for a foot soldier" included "a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a cutting sword, a double cartouch box, and three charges of powder", with "one pound of powder and four pounds of ball" in reserve.{EN-1010}

• [1762] "[T]he several persons herein after-mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective companies * * * : All his majesty's justices of the peace within this colony, who have qualified themselves for their offices * * * and who are really and bona fide acting justices * * * (except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia * * *) all persons bred to and actually practising physick or surgery, and all inspectors at the publick warehouses appointed for the inspection of tobacco * * * .

" * * * [T]he persons so exempted * * * *shall provide complete sets of arms * * * for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside*[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person so exempted shall always keep in his house or place of abode such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition * * * and shall then be incorporated with * * * the other militia[.]"

Under this statute, a "complete set[ ] of arms" was the same as that required under the statutes of 1755, 1757, and 1759, quoted immediately above.{EN-1011}

• [1766 and 1771] "[T]he several persons herein after mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective counties, that is to say, all his majesty's justices of the peace * * * who have qualified themselves for their offices * * * and who are really and bona fide acting justices * * * (except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia * * *) all persons bred to, and actually practising physick or surgery, all the people called Quakers, and all inspectors at the public warehouses, appointed for the inspection of tobacco * * * .

" * * * [T]he persons so exempted (not being Quakers) *shall provide compleat sets of arms * * * for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside*[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person so exempted (not being a Quaker) shall always keep in his house or place of abode, such arms, accoutrements and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition * * * and shall then be incorporated with * * * the other militia[.]"

Under this statute also, a "complete set[ ] of arms" was the same as that required under the statutes of 1755, 1757, and 1759, quoted immediately above.{EN-1012}

• [1775] "That the members of his majesty's council, and the committee of safety, the president of the convention, treasurer, attorney-general, auditor, clerk of the council, clerk of the secretary's office, clerk of the general convention, and clerk of the committee of safety (each of which exempts furnishing a stand of arms for a soldier) * * * shall be exempted from * * * enlistment [in the Militia]."{EN-1013}

Interestingly, some of these exemptees' liability to provide firearms and ammunition was more extensive than a regular Militiaman's—because, whereas each regular Militiaman furnished arms only for himself, and continued to own those arms, some exempted individuals would have owned only the arms they had provided for themselves or for substitutes, but would have surrendered any claim of title to the arms they had provided to their Local governments.

Finally, exemplifying how peculiarly specific such conditional exemptions might become are statutes from:

> • [1705] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * give any power * * * to list [in the Militia] * * * any overseer that hath four or more slaves under his care * * * .
>
> "Provided always, That if any overseer that is * * * exempted from being listed shall appear at any muster, * * * he shall appear in arms fit for exercise, and shall perform his duty as other private soldiers do[.]"
>
> Distinguishably from every regular Militiaman, who was allowed "eighteen months * * * to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition" after being initially "listed", an overseer had to produce sufficient arms the very first and every other time he appeared.{EN-1014}
>
> • [1775] "[O]verseers, heretofore exempted, shall be obliged to furnish themselves with arms and ammunition, in the same manner as the militia men, and shall be obliged to act as patrollers when thereto required[.]"{EN-1015}
>
> That overseers were required to arm themselves in order "to act as patrollers" was hardly surprising, though, inasmuch as the basic duty of both overseers and patrollers was to police the behavior of slaves.[726]

D. Provision made for those unable to acquire arms on their own. The general rule that each Militiaman should supply himself with the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements necessary for his Militia service did not—because it justly could not—apply to anyone who was simply unable to do so through no fault of his own. For example, a statute in 1740 allowed Militia courts-martial to "excuse and acquit any soldier, who [s]hall not * * * be furnished and provided with arms * * * and whom they, in their consciences, shall * * * adjudge to be unable to furnish and provide the same, from the fines and forfeitures * * * for want thereof".{EN-1016}

1. Lack of supply in the marketplace. Because most Militiamen were expected to rely upon the free market as the source of their personal arms, and because the trade in firearms extended across the Atlantic Ocean to England, a temporary excess of demand over supply in the Local marketplace would have excused a Militiaman's failure to comply with the statutory requirements:

---

[726] See ante, at 339-343 and 392-395; and post, at 718-723.

> • [1692] "[B]ut for that some persons have been lately listed who have not had time to be provided with Armes * * * none being to be had but from England. It is Ordered that they be * * * Exempted from the penalty of the Law relateing thereto till after a Fleete of Ships hath gon from hence for England, and a return from thence made hither, it not being reasonable any person should be fined till after it hath been possible for him to be provided[.]"{EN-1017}
>
> • [1775] "[N]o person shall be subject to * * * penalties * * * for the not providing or producing the quantity of powder required, who shall make it appear * * * that he has used his best endeavours to procure such powder, and hath not been able so to do[.]"{EN-1018}

2. Financial inability of the individual. Most commonly, though, the difficulty stemmed from a particular Militiaman's straitened financial situation. This was a problem Virginians had long faced. As early as 1690, for example, the Colony's Council had sought to petition the King "to Ord[r] some Armes, Swords, Biggonetts [Baggonetts, Bayonets] & Amunition to be Sent into this Colony that those persons that are really Indigent may upon all Occasions be furnished, that they may all Joyne in the defence of this * * * Country and the Inhabitants thereof".{EN-1019} Under those conditions, the Militia itself, the public treasury, or some private party personally responsible for such an individual subsidized the provision of his equipment.

a. The adult poor. An adult male Virginian who was neither a servant nor an apprentice, and was simply too poor to purchase the arms required of him, could depend upon the Militia or some other governmental institution to assist him—because Virginia's goal was to arm every eligible man fully and properly, whatever his ability to pay vel non.[727] Where required, any necessary moneys could come from fines imposed upon other Militiamen for their infractions of the Militia's rules (whom the statutes typically denoted as "delinquents"), or from taxes.[728] For the community to aid the poor in this regard was a matter both of social solidarity and of political and economic self-interest, because it promoted the common defense and the general welfare for everyone. Thus—

> • [1691] "On takeing into Consideration the returnes of their Ma[jesties'] Armes * * * in the Severall Counties in this Colony * * * , It appeare[d]" to the Governor and his Council that "those few there be, are almost Spoyled with Rust unfixt * * * and that lyeing Scattered up and downe the Charge of haveing them got together and fixed here, or sent for England to be fixed, will Exceede the Reall value of them, and * * * the onely way to make them Serviceable is to dispose them to the Inhabitants

---

[727] On the special rule applicable to minors, servants, and apprentices, see post, at 428-432.

[728] See post, at 439-446.

of this Country who are without and Cannot be Supplyed, they getting them well fixed and keepeing them soe for their Ma[jesties'] Service, It is therefore Ordered that the said Armes * * * be * * * distributed among the Comand[rs] in Cheife of this Colony * * * (but Cheifely to the Comand[rs] in Cheife of the Frontier Countyes) which said Comand[rs] are to distribute them to the Soldiers und[r] their Comand, who are in Want * * * the Severall persons to whom they are soe distributed * * * giveing notes under their perticular hands to keepe the said Armes well fixed for their Ma[jesties'] Service, and in case of their removall out of the County where they dwelt at the receipt thereof, or Death, that the said Armes * * * be returned to the Comander in Cheife or Cap[t] under whom they Served, who is to dispose of them to Such as shall be in want takeing the like Notes."{EN-1020}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f it shall be made [to] appear to the court of any county, by the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, and captain of any company, that any soldier inlisted in the foot, is so poor, as not to be able to purchase the arms * * * [required of a Militiaman]; then such court shall, and they are hereby required immediately, to depute some person to send for the same to England, by the first opportunity, and to levy the charge * * * in the next county levy, which arms so to be sent for, shall be marked with the name of the county; and if any person shall presume to buy or sell any such arms * * * then * * * every person so buying or selling, shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds * * * , one moiety whereof shall be * * * for the use of the county, to which the arms shall belong, for the purchasing other arms * * * ; and all arms purchased by any county, and delivered to any poor soldier * * * , shall on his death or removol out of the county, be delivered to the chief officer of the militia in the county, or to the captain of the company to which such poor soldier did belong, to be * * * delivered to any other poor soldier, that the commanding officer * * * shall adjudge unable to provide himself with arms[.]"{EN-1021}

• [1775] "[I]f it be certified by a court-martial that any soldier enlisted is so poor as not to be able to purchase the arms [required of him] * * * , then such arms shall * * * be procurred so soon as may be, at the expense of the publick. And if any person shall presume to sell or buy any arms thus provided, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds; and all arms so purchased and delivered to any such poor soldier shall on his death, or removal out of the county, be delivered to the chief officer of the militia in the county, or to the captain of the company to which such poor soldier did belong, to be * * * delivered to any other poor soldier * * * adjudge[d] unable to provide himself with arms[.]"

And the fines levied against Militia officers for failing to appear properly armed were to be "appropriated to the purchasing arms and ammunition for the use of such [Militiamen] as are not able to procure the same".{EN-1022}

• [1777] "If any soldier be certified to the court martial to be so poor that he cannot purchase * * * [the required] arms, the said court shall cause them to be procured at the expense of the publick, to be reimbursed out of the fines on the delinquents of the county, which arms shall be delivered to such poor person to be used at musters, but shall continue the property of the county; and if any soldier shall sell or conceal such arms, the seller or concealer, and purchaser, shall each of them forfeit the sum of six pounds. And on the death of such poor soldier, or his removal out of the county, such arms shall be delivered to his captain, who shall * * * deliver the same to such other poor soldier as the[next court-martial] shall order.

"And if any poor soldier shall remove out of the county, and carry his arms with him, he shall incur the same penalty as if he had sold such arms[.]

* * * * *

"All fines * * * shall be appropriated, in the first place, to the payment of the salaries [of certain Militia personnel] * * * , then to reimbursing the publick treasury for any arms purchased for the poor soldiers of such county, and for drums, fifes, and colours, bought for the severall companies; and if any surplus remain, it shall be laid out * * * in establishing and furnishing, for the use of the[ ] county, a magazine of small arms, field pieces, ammunition, and such other military stores as may be useful in case of invasion and insurrection."{EN-1023}

• [1784 and 1785] "If any private shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court * * * appointed for trying delinquencies * * * that he is so poor that he cannot purchase * * * the arms * * * required, such court shall cause them to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents. The arms * * * shall * * * be delivered to the captain of the company to which such poor private may belong, who shall deliver such arms to the private, but they shall continue the property of the county; and if any private shall sell or conceal the same, the seller, concealer, and purchaser, shall each forfeit and pay four pounds * * * . And on the death, disability, or exemption of such poor private, or his removal out of the county, such arms, shall be delivered to the commanding officer of the company, who shall * * * deliver the same to s[ome] other poor private * * * . And if any poor private shall remove out of the county, and carry such arms with him, he shall incur the same penalty as if he had sold them. * * * And to the end that such arms may be known, the commanding officer shall cause to be stamped or engraved on them, the name of the county, together with the number of the regiment to which they may belong."{EN-1024}

> • [1788] "[E]ach of the militia in the several counties on the western waters, shall keep always ready a good musket or rifle, half a pound of good powder, and one pound of lead, to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer * * * ; unless he be so poor as to be unable to furnish the same, in which case the former regulations [in 1785] * * * concerning poor soldiers, shall be in force."{EN-1025}

These provisions for assisting the poor supply more evidence that every Militiaman who was financially able to do so was required to furnish or provide himself, out of his own private resources, with a firearm (or firearms), ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for Militia service. Self-evidently, the statutes would not have singled out solely the poor to be supplied with arms at some form of public expense—"in the next county levy", "at the expense of the publick", "at the expense of the public, to be reimbursed out of the fines on the delinquents of the county", or "out of the money arising from delinquents"—if public officials had supplied arms to everyone. Neither would the statutes have emphasized that only arms supplied to the poor "shall be marked with the name of the county", "shall continue the property of the county", and on the basis of rotation would be "delivered to any other poor soldier" (not to just any other Militiaman), except to distinguish those arms which were public property from all the other arms, purchased for themselves by Militiamen with the financial means to do so, which were private property.

In addition, the statutes' requirements for evidence that the individual in question was "so poor, as not to be able to purchase" the required firearms and ammunition emphasized the narrowness of the exception in favor of a truly impoverished Militiaman. For a man to be relieved of the duty to provide his own arms, his poverty had to be "made [to] appear to the court of any county" by a Militia officer, to be "certified by a court-martial", or to "appear to the satisfaction of the court * * * appointed for trying delinquencies". This proves how dependent Virginia in fact was—and, in light of the consistency among her Militia statutes in this regard throughout the period, was willing to be—on the private provision and ownership of firearms used for Militia service.

Finally, the statutes' commands to supply poor Militiamen quickly—that officials should "immediately * * * send for the [arms] to England", and that the arms should be "procurred so soon as may be"—reflected Virginia's goal of maintaining as many men as possible actually armed at all times. As described above, other Militiamen were allowed some period of grace during which to furnish themselves with arms that met statutory requirements—but in the meantime were nonetheless enjoined to bring to Militia service "such arms as [they] hath" or were "already furnished with", or "the best arms * * * they c[ould] get". The poor obviously enjoyed none of those options. Were they to be seasonably and suitably armed, the necessary equipment had to be procured for them as soon as practicable by someone else.

b. Minors, servants, and apprentices. For most of the 1700s, free White male Virginians less than twenty-one years of age, as well as apprentices and many servants both below and above that age, were required to serve in the Militia (unless specifically exempted).[729] Yet not a few able-bodied free males in all of these categories might have enjoyed no regular incomes or accumulated wealth of their own, or might have earned little or no ready money from their labor during the periods of their service. If these individuals were not to be treated as being too poor to purchase their own firearms, and therefore entitled to receive arms at public expense, the fulfillment of their Militia duties in this regard had to be guaranteed by someone else with both some legal responsibility under the circumstances and the ability to pay. Because minors were entirely under the legal control of their parents or guardians, and apprentices and servants under the direction of their masters to varying degrees pursuant to contracts, liability for their defaults in Militia duty came naturally to be imposed upon their parents, guardians, and masters.

In 1705, a statute provided that, "whereas there has been a good and laudable custom of allowing servants corn and cloaths for their present support, upon their freedom * * * , Be it * * * enacted * * * That there shall be paid and allowed to every imported servant, not having yearly wages, at the time of service ended, by the master or owner of such servant, viz: To every male servant, * * * one well fixt musket or fuzee, of the value of twenty shillings, at least[.]"{EN-1026} The motive for this enactment was not disinterested charity. Rather, the statute recognized that, "upon their freedom", servants would have to fend for themselves. And under the statutes of 1705,{EN-1027} and then of 1723 and 1738,{EN-1028} if already listed in the Militia they would have been required to appear at musters "with a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed"; or, if not so listed, they would have been allowed "eighteen months time * * * to furnish and provide [themselves] with [such] arms"—and if they had then appeared at musters without being "furnished and provided with arms and ammunition" or "compleatly armed and accoutred", they would have been fined. Although these statutes did not so specify, under general principles of law the payment of such fines incurred by minors would surely have been the responsibility of the parents or guardians who failed to forefend their charges' misbehavior; and when incurred by servants could possibly have been the responsibility of masters who improperly prevented their otherwise willing servants from complying with the regulations. (The statute of 1705 did exempt "any servant by importation" from being "list[ed]" in the Militia; but the statutes of 1723 and 1738 granted no such allowance.{EN-1029})

---

[729] See ante, at 363-365, and post, at 611-614.

Later statutes expressly forged the links of vicarious financial liability in such cases:

> • [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within this colony, (imported servants excepted) * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [E]very person inlisted to serve in the horse, appearing at muster without a * * * carbine * * * , a case of pistols, cutting-sword, double cartouch-boxes, and six charges of powder and ball shall pay five shillings, for every such failure; and every person listed to serve in the foot, appearing at such muster without a firelock well fixed, and a bayonet fitted to the same, * * * [and] without a cutting-sword, a double cartouch-box, and three charges of powder and ball shall pay three shillings, for every such failure * * * . Provided, That no person be fined above six times in the year for any particular default[.[730]]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * That twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * , and that no soldier be fined for appearing without, or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been inlisted twelve months * * * , so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with: And if any soldier shall appear at any muster not armed and accoutred, * * * it shall and may be lawful, for the captain of the troop or company to which such soldier shall belong, to examine such soldier upon oath, whether he hath any, and what arms and ammunition he really hath of his own property, and if on such examination it shall appear, that such soldier hath any arms or ammunition of his own property, and hath not brought the same, * * * he shall be liable to * * * penalties * * * , although he hath not been inlisted twelve months[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]he fines and penalties incurred by infants and servants for the breach or neglect of their duty in any particular service * * * required, of them, shall be paid by the parent, guardian or master, respectively; and if the breach or neglect of such servants is not occasioned by their master's influence or direction, then the fines incurred by them, and so paid by the master, shall be repaid to the master by the

---

[730] In 1757 through 1771, the equivalent provision read: "[E]very soldier appearing at muster without a firelock well fixed, and a bayonet fitted to the same, shall pay three shillings for every such failure, and for appearing at muster without a double cartouch-box shall pay one shilling, and without three charges of powder shall pay two shiilings for every such failure * * * . Provided, That no person be fined above six times in the year for any particular default."

> further service of such servant, after the time they are bound to serve is expired[.]"{EN-1030}
>
> • [1775] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, above the age of sixteen, and under fifty years, except such as are * * * excepted, shall be enlisted into the militia[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [E]very soldier * * * appearing without proper arms, [shall be fined] five shillings; or for not bringing with him three charges of powder and ball, three shillings; or failing to bring into the field when required by his commanding officer, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball, five shillings.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]he soldiers shall be allowed six months after enlisting to provide themselves with arms, and in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have, under the penalty of five shillings[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [A]ll fines and penalties incurred by infants or servants, for breach or neglect of duty in any particular service * * * required of them, shall be paid by the parent, guardian, or master, of such infant or servant; and if the breach or neglect of such servants is not occasioned by their masters influence or direction, then the fines incurred by them, and so paid by their masters, shall be repaid to their masters, by the farther service of such servants after the times they are bound to serve are expired."{EN-1031}
>
> • [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years * * * [except those individuals exempted] shall * * * be enrolled or formed into companies[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * Every officer and soldier shall be allowed six months after his appointment or enrollment to provide such arms or accoutrements as he had not at the time. * * * For failing to appear at any * * * muster, properly armed or accoutred, every * * * soldier [shall forfeit] five shillings. * * * Every officer failing to furnish himself with one pound of powder shall forfeit and pay ten shillings, and the same for failing to furnish himself with four pounds of ball; and every soldier failing therein shall likewise be liable for the same penalties, which penalties, when incurred by infants, shall be paid by the parent or guardian, and where incurred by servants shall be paid by the master, who, if such delinquency were without his influence or direction, may retain so much out of the hire of such servant, or be compensated by farther service[.]"{EN-1032}

This was no inconsequential matter, because, for a large part of the 1700s, whatever the population of servants or such individuals' eligibility for enrollment in the Militia may have been in Virginia, most able-bodied free males there (as elsewhere throughout America) began their Militia service as minors. Evidently, these statutes aimed at putting the required firearms and ammunition into the hands of minors, apprentices, and servants as soon as possible, by imposing the financial burden on whichever individuals with legal exposure enjoyed the apparent ability to pay. A parent or guardian would have had to supply a minor in his care with a suitable firearm as either an outright gift or a loan presumably without any guarantee of eventual payment. Whereas, if an apprentice or servant had earned sufficient wages out of which to purchase a firearm, but had obstinately refused to do so, his master would have been required to supply the firearm in the first instance, the cost of which the servant would have been compelled to pay off later. Even if an apprentice or servant had earned no or insufficient wages at the time, he would not have been deemed "too poor to purchase" a firearm if his master could have advanced the necessary funds, and then have recouped the cost by demanding further service from the servant (if the master paid no wages) or by withholding installments from the servant's wages, or both.

The sums involved in obeying these statutes were not excessive, at least in comparison to the alternative cost of serial noncompliance. In 1705, a master was obliged to give "[t]o every male servant", upon the latter's release from service, "one well fixt musket or fuzee, of the value of twenty shillings, at least".{EN-1033} So Virginia's General Assembly did not consider that amount an exorbitant burden to lay on a master. (Presumably, too, an equivalent cost would have been borne by a parent or guardian with a minor son listed in the Militia.) Because the Militia statutes of 1705 and 1723 set the fine for an individual's failure to appear properly armed at a muster at "one hundred pounds of tobacco", rather than money, the financial impact remains somewhat conjectural.{EN-1034} In 1738, however, the fine for a foot soldier in the Militia was set at "five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, at their election" for each muster, with at least five musters to be held each year, but no more than five fines allowed per annum—for a possible total fine of twenty-five shillings or two hundred fifty pounds of tobacco.{EN-1035} In 1755 through 1771, the fine was ten shillings for each muster, with no less than six musters to be held each year, and no more than six fines to be imposed per annum—for a possible total fine of sixty shillings.{EN-1036} In 1775, the fine was five shillings for each muster, with twenty musters to be held each year—for a possible total fine of one hundred shillings.{EN-1037} And in 1777, the fine was five shillings for each muster, with twelve musters annually—for a possible cumulative fine of sixty shillings.{EN-1038} Against these amounts, the average cost of a firearm suitable for Militia service ranged from about twenty shillings in 1705 to several times that much in the mid-1770s.[731]

---

[731] In October of 1774, the Provincial Congress of Massachusetts proposed to purchase five thousand muskets (with bayonets) for £2 (or 40 shillings) each. See The Journals of Each Provincial Congress of Massachusetts in 1774 and 1775 (Boston, Massachusetts: Dutton and Wentworth, 1838), at 30. And from September of 1775 to July of 1776, Virginia's Committee of Safety purchased from Virginia's gunsmiths some 3,325 muskets and 2,098 rifles for a total cost of approximately £20,212, or an average cost per firearm of slightly less than £4 (or

Under these conditions—and because servants' indentures typically ran for several years, and a son's or ward's minority could embrace as much as five years' enlistment in the Militia—it probably would have behooved a minor's parent or guardian, a servant's master, or a servant himself (possibly through a loan from his master) to have purchased the necessary firearm as soon as financially possible, rather than being mulcted seriatim with fine after fine (the total eventually exceeding the price of a good firearm), while still remaining liable to provide one in any event. No doubt the intent of the legislation was to create precisely that incentive for quick action. Also, a parent or guardian would have been unlikely to have absorbed the cost of fines for his own minor son's or ward's lack of a firearm—thereby imposing upon the latter a practical inability to learn, let alone to perform, his Militia duties—when the parent or guardian knew that those fines would be used to provide arms to poor individuals outside of his own family.

Finally, making parents, guardians, and masters financially liable for their sons and servants effectively extended Militia duty to women, as well as to men. For a widow might have been the sole surviving parent of one or more sons, or the head of a household which included one or more servants—and in such cases would have been financially responsible for providing the necessary arms either finally (with respect to a son) or initially (with respect to a servant). So, although in Virginia women were always ineligible to be actual listed members of, some of them could thus have become indirect participants in, the Militia.

E. Public funds laid out for private firearms. Further to encourage, or at the least to take advantage of, the widespread private ownership of firearms throughout Virginia, the General Assembly paid bounties to individuals who supplied their own arms for, reimbursed individuals whose arms were lost in, and purchased arms from individuals for use by themselves or others during, various forms of military service.

1. Not surprisingly, paying or otherwise compensating individuals who supplied their own firearms, ammunition, and other accoutrements for Militia and other miliary service began very early on, and then continued throughout the pre-constitutional period:

> • [1682] "[T]he pay of each officer and soldier shall be as followeth: To the captain * * * finding himself horse, armes, ammunition and provision, eight thousand pounds of tobacco with caske out of the publique leavy for one whole yeare * * * ; and to each soldier finding himselfe horse, armes, furniture, provision, amunition and other necessaries * * * , two thousand pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1039}

---

80 shillings). See Harold B. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia (Williamsburg, Virginia: The Colonial Williamsburg Foundation, 1974), at 109-124. At this juncture, however, the prices of firearms were surely rising due to apprehensions about the possibility of armed conflict with Britain, and then the war's actual outbreak.

• [1684] "[T]he pay of each captain finding himselfe provision, ammunition, horse, armes and all other necessaries for one whole yeare, shall be ten thousand pounds of tobacco and cask, and so after that rate for a longer or shorter time, * * * and the pay for every private souldier mounted, armed and provided * * * shall be three thousand pounds of tobacco and cask * * * , all which summes shall be paid by the country.

* * * * *

" * * * [U]pon the incursion, invasion or inroad of any Indian enemie * * * , it shall and may be lawfull to and for the militia officers * * * (as the emergency or occasion shall require) to put the souldiers under their command, into a posture of war and defence for the safeguard of the counties, and if they shall happen to continue in such service, above the space [o]f six dayes (which six dayes they shall serve at their owne charge) that then * * * each person (if a horseman, well mounted, armed and furnished, and finding himselfe ammunition and provision * * * , shall have the like allowances * * * as a trooper or horseman by this act appointed, * * * and every foot souldier, well armed, and finding himselfe armes, ammunition and provision * * * , after the rate of two thousand pounds of tobacco and caske per annum[.]"{EN-1040}

• [1691, 1692, 1693, and 1695] "[T]he pay of each officer and soldier be as followeth: The * * * commander of each party of souldiers finding himselfe horse, armes, ammunition and provision shall have * * * five thousand pounds of tobacco and casque out of the publique levie for one whole year, and so after that rate for a longer or shorter time, and each soldier finding himselfe horse, armes, furniture, ammunition and other necessaries, three thousand pounds of tobacco and casque[.]"{EN-1041}

• [1711] "[T]here shall be levyed and paid to every * * * commander of the rangers, for himself, his horse, with accoutrements, arms and ammunition, for his service for one year, five thousand pounds of tobacco, with cask, and in proportion to that for a lesser time than a year. And to every man listed * * * , for himself, his horse, with accoutrements, arms and ammunition, for his service for one year, three thousand pounds of tobacco, with cask, * * * out of the public levy * * * . And for the greater encouragement of the said rangers, every officer and other persons listed under him shall * * * be free and exempted from the payment of the * * * county and parish levys dureing their continuance in the said service."{EN-1042}

• [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, and 1753] "[A]s the militia of these counties, where * * * dangers * * * shall arise, must necessarily be first emploied, and may, by the divine assistance, be able to suppress and repel * * * insurrections and invasions, without obliging that of the other counties to be raised: And it being reasonable, that such services as shall be performed by any part of the said militia, be rewarded at the public change,

* * * * *

" * * * there shall be raised, and paid by the public, to the officers and soldiers which shall be drawn out into actual service [certain per diem wages payable in tobacco]. * * *

" * * * Provided always, * * * That for the pay and allowance * * * , every horseman shall find and provide himself with a horse, * * * arms, and ammunition; and every foot soldier shall find and provide himself with a foot soldier's arms, and ammunition.

* * * * *

" * * * Provided also, That whensoever any part of the militia * * * shall be discharged again, within two days, no pay or allowance shall be given * * * , but every man shall bear his own charge[.]"{EN-1043}

• [1775] "[T]he soldiers to be enlisted shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet, cartouch box, or pouch * * * ; and, until such musket can be provided, * * * they bring with each of them the best gun, of any sort, that can be procured; and that such as are to act as rifle-men bring with them each one good rifle, to be approved by their captain, for the use of which he shall be allowed at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]ach minute-man * * * to be enlisted shall be furnished with proper arms at the publick expense, and until such can be provided shall bring into service the best gun that he can procure; and for every good rifle, to be approved by the respective captains, there shall be allowed to the owner making use of the same at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]"{EN-1044}

• [1775] "[T]he soldiers to be enlisted * * * shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet, cartouch box, or pouch * * * ; and until such musket can be provided * * * they bring with them the best gun of any other sort that they can procure; * * * and that such as are to act as riflemen bring with them one good rifle and tomahawk, each to be approved by their captain, for the use of which guns they shall be allowed as follows, to wit: For the smooth-bores, or muskets, the rate of 20[shillings] and for the rifles * * * after the same rate by the year[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]ach minute-man who shall furnish himself with a good musket, or other gun, to be approved of by his captain, shall be allowed by the publick ten shillings per annum, as a consideration for the use thereof[.]"{EN-1045}

• [1776] "That six troops of horse, consisting of thirty each, rank and file, be immediately raised * * * . And that the several officers and troopers shall, at their own expense, be furnished with horses, proper arms, and accoutrements, and shall be allowed * * * [certain rates of] pay per day, * * * which pay * * * of the troopers [shall commence] from the time of their being provided with a sufficient horse, and properly armed, in the opinion of any field officer of the militia of the county wherein they are enlisted."{EN-1046}

• [1776] "[E]very cadet who shall enter into the service, * * * and furnish himself with a good horse, and the arms and accoutrements herein directed, shall be allowed * * * pay[.]"{EN-1047}

This was a matter not only of Legislative command but also of Executive policy, as in 1758, when the Governor's Council noted that "General Forbes will do what he can, to procure Arms for our Thousand Men, but recommends * * * to give some small Gratuity to those Men who can furnish their own Arms".{EN-1048}

2. Virginia also created an incentive for men to employ their own arms and accoutrements in public service, by reimbursing those who through no fault of their own lost their personal equipment:

• [1676] "[I]f any horse or horses be killed in service, or armes lost, the owner or owners of such horse or armes soe lost, shall be satisfyed for the same of the publique, hee or they produceing a certificate from the cheife commander of the trueth thereof[.]"{EN-1049}

• [1684] "And for encouragement of officers and souldiers in each troop. Bee it enacted, that in case any souldier shall loose his horse or armes * * * in actual engagement against the enemie, he shall be allowed the vallue thereof by the country, he makeing proofe of the reall vallue before the county court[.]"{EN-1050}

• [1778] "FOR strengthening the continental army * * * , Be it enacted * * * , That a regiment of horse * * * shall be raised within this commonwealth * * * . If any of the * * * troopers shall furnish himself with a horse, arms, or accoutrements, such horse, if * * * lost, not through the default of the trooper, and such arms and accoutrements, if captured, or otherwise lost, without the default of the trooper, shall be made good to such trooper by the publick."{EN-1051}

• [1780] "[W]herever the governour shall have satisfactory information that any persons within this commonwealth shall be inclined to mutiny or riot, * * * he is * * * empowered to order one or more troop or troops of horse to be raised * * * in any county where such persons shall so resist or assemble together with an intention to resist. * * * The officers and privates of each troop or troops, shall furnish their own horses, arms, and accoutrements, which shall be paid for by the publick in case they are lost or destroyed in the service, without the neglect of the owner. Provided nevertheless, That all such horses, arms, and accoutrements, shall be valued by two respectable freeholders upon oath, at the time of entering into the said service."{EN-1052}

> • [1784 and 1785] "[W]hereas the practice of paying for arms and accoutrements by the public, which are lost in service, is productive of the most mischevious consequences, in as much as it takes away a very great incentive to the holding them fast in action, and the preservation of them elsewhere;[732]
>
> " * * * Be it enacted, That no arms or accoutrements, which may * * * be lost in service, shall be paid for by the public, unless the loser shall be killed, wounded, or otherwise incapacitated in the opinion of a court-martial, from preserving his arms."{EN-1053}

This was no merely theoretical allowance, but one that the highest British authorities, too, considered expedient, if not required by simple justice. For example, during the height of the French and Indian War, General James Abercromby wrote to Prime Minister William Pitt, concerning the provision of arms to Colonial troops in New Jersey:

> [T]he greatest Difficulty of all was about the Arms, in relation to which I repeated to [the Colonial authorities] His Majestys Expectations, that they shou'd with particular Diligence immediately collect and put into the best condition, all such serviceable ones as cou'd be found within their Government; The Number of these by private Information being likely to fall very short of the Complement Wanted, I found it necessary in Order to lose no Time, to insinuate to them, that as most of their Men had their own Private Arms, to which they were accustomed, and consequently wou'd give the Preference, as being much surer of their Mark with them, than with those they had never handled before, that therefore I wou'd propose they shou'd come provided with them, and that they might not suffer any Loss on that Account, I wou'd engage to make good, in Money, to the Proprietors, such of those arms as shou'd be spoiled or lost in Actual Service[.][733]

It may be that men with their own arms were simply reluctant to volunteer for service, whereas the men most likely to volunteer often did not have arms or the wherewithal to buy them.[734] But perhaps the more plausible explanation is that most men simply did not want to bring their own arms to even a short term of regular military service, during which their equipment might be ruined or lost—because in New Jersey (as elsewhere throughout pre-constitutional America) at all other times they would be required to possess and to appear with them for Militia duty, and be subject to fines if they did not.{EN-1054}

---

[732] This explanatory preamble does not appear in the 1785 Act.

[733] Letter of 28 April 1758, quoted in De Witt Bailey, Small Arms of the British Forces in America, ante note 428, at 122.

[734] Id.

3. Virginia's government also purchased firearms from individuals for their own use in performing military service, as in 1779:

> [T]hat blankets and tents * * * be provided for them [that is, the volunteers], together with necessaries for travelling and camp uses, arms, ammunition, and accoutrements; and if it shall so happen that any soldier who shall be enlisted into the service, shall have it in his power to furnish any of the conveniences and accoutrements which may be necessary, the same may be purchased from him for the publick use, at a reasonable and adequate price.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [F]or the defence and protection of the western frontiers against the Indian or other enemies, * * * battalions shall be furnished with such clothing, arms, and accoutrements, as are most proper for that service; and if any soldier * * * shall be willing to furnish himself with proper clothing, arms, and accoutrements, the governour, with advice of council, may fix the sum to be paid for the purchase or use of such clothing, arms, and accoutrements, and direct the * * * officer commanding * * * to take care that such necessaries, especially the arms, are in proper order and kind, and fit for the service.{EN-1055}

F. Impressment of private firearms. Just as Virginia often impressed men into various forms of military service—including of course the Militia as a whole, which was never voluntary in nature—she sometimes drafted them along with their own arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, or impressed their arms alone:

> • [1645] "[T]he * * * counsell of warr shall have power to leavie such and soe manie men, arms, ammunition and other necessaries as emergencie of occasions shall require, * * * And * * * for the manageing the warr * * * , That evrie 15 tithable persons shall sett forth, compleatly furnish and maintain, one soldier * * * ; And where ffifteen are joyned to set forth one and cannot agree amongst themselves, * * * the council of warr shall press whom they shall think fitt * * * , And the said counsell of warr shall have power to arme the soldier with all necessaries out of the said fifteen men, provided that the soldier be responsible for his arms (in case he shall negligently loose or spoyle them)[.]"{EN-1056}
>
> • [1676] "[W]hatsoever the cheife commander or commanders * * * shall finde wanting in the severall armies, whether ammunition, provision, armes, baggage horses, or other necessaries whatever, the same shall * * * have full power to impress it * * * , and that the charge of whatsoever shall be soe impressed be defrayed by the publique[.]"{EN-1057}
>
> • [1679] "[T]hat fower houses for stores or garrisons be erected and built at the heads of the ffower greate rivers * * * . And * * * that every forty tythables within this colony be assessed and obleiged * * * to

fitt and sett forth one able and suffitient man and horse, with furniture well and compleatly armed with a case of good pistolls, carbine or short gunn and a sword, together with two pounds of powder and tenn pounds of leaden bullett or high swan shott, * * * which fforty tythables * * * shall either refuse, neglect or be uncapable to fitt out such man and horse, armes, provisions and ammunition * * * , that then the justices and militia officers * * * impresse a man and horse with armes, ammunition and provisions * * * and assesse the said delinquent tythables, the whole charge thereof [.]"{EN-1058}

• [1682] "[T]hat twenty men well furnished with horses and all other accoutrements be raised * * * in each of [certain] counties * * * of such housekeepers belonging to the said counties as shall voluntarily offer themselves for this service * * * ; but in case such twenty men qualified * * * shall not be found in each of the said counties, then it shall and may be lawfull for the militia officers * * * to impresse such, and soe many men furnished * * * as shall be wanting[.]"{EN-1059}

• [1684] "That four troops of horsemen * * * be raised * * * , every way well horsed and armed: viz. Every man to have a good able horse for service, a case of pistolls, a carbine, sword and all other [f]urniture [ ]usual and necessary for horse-souldiers * * * ; but in case the full number * * * compleatly mounted, armed and provided * * * cannot be raised by such as voluntarily offer themselves for that service, that then his excellency the governour * * * [may] issue forth his warrant for the raiseing soe many men * * * as shall be wanting[.]"{EN-1060}

• [1711] "[T]he commander in chief * * * [shall] constitute and appoint * * * lieutenants or commanders of the rangers for the * * * frontiers; each of which * * * shall choose * * * able bodyed men, with horses and accoutrements, arms and ammunition, residing as near as conveniently as may be, to that frontier station * * * . But if such lieutenant cannot find a sufficient number of able bodyed men, furnished and provided * * * , to serve voluntarily * * * it shall and may be lawfull for the commander in chief of the militia in the same county * * * to order and impress out of the militia of that county, so many able bodyed men, furnished as aforesaid[.]"{EN-1061}

• [1764] "[W]here arms have been impressed for * * * [Militia] service, and the proprietor thereof hath refused * * * such arms when returned, * * * commissioners shall allow such proprietor the appraised value thereof, and such arms shall be delivered to the * * * commanding officer, for the use of the publick, to be used by the militia as occasion requires[.]"{EN-1062}

• [1777] "The several divisions of the militia of any county shall be called into duty by regular rotation * * * . The soldiers of such militia, if not well armed and provided with ammunition, shall be furnished with > the arms and ammunition of the county, and any deficiency in these may be supplied from the publick magazines, or if the case admit not that delay, by impressing arms and ammunition of private property, which ammunition, so far as not used, and arms, shall be duly returned, as soon as they may be spared."{EN-1063}

In such situations, Virginia supplied, but did not originally own and in most cases probably never took title to, the firearms and ammunition she impressed into her service. Moreover, the very employment of impressment in these statutes rested on the presumption that suitable firearms and ammunition were sufficiently widespread as private property within the community so that the tasks at hand could be served by impressing them, either by themselves or together with their owners.

Actually, this was just another example of, or occasion for, use of the Commonwealth's power of conscription that underlay the entire Militia system, whereby all men were required to serve (unless specifically exempted) and to provide their own arms (unless too poor to do so). In practice, each man and his arms were considered an integral unit.

G. Firearms and ammunition supplied by the government. At various times during the *pre-*constitutional era, Virginia also provided some of her residents who engaged in Militia and other military service with arms purchased with or manufactured by dint of funds derived from Militia fines, taxes, or other sources of public revenue. Of course, in "a free State" wherein "WE THE PEOPLE * * * do ordain and establish th[e] Constitution",[735] although a formal distinction exists between THE PEOPLE and their government, a substantial difference or degree of separation—and certainly an inherent conflict of interest, let alone an antagonism—should not. So there existed no inconsistency between these instances and Virginia's more widespread policy of requiring her Militiamen to provide their own arms out of their own private resources.

That in some cases the government assisted individuals in performing their duty to be armed obviously did not detract from that duty, nor draw into question Virginians' right to keep and bear arms that flowed from their duty to do so. Individuals' duty (and right) to keep and bear arms was not an adventitious consequence of the government's sometime provision of arms. Rather, the government's provision of arms was a consequence of individuals' permanent duty to have them at hand. Just as today, if Congress exercised its power "[t]o provide for * * * arming * * * the Militia"[736] by actually delivering sufficient arms to individual Militiamen through expenditures of the General Government, public officials could not plausibly claim that, because Congress had once adopted this procedure for arming Americans, it could then turn around and totally *dis*arm them, on the grounds that their duty (and right) to be armed were merely consequences of Congress's exercise of its power "[t]o provide for * * * arm[ing]" them, and that therefore if Congress chose to disarm them it would deny them no right in the premises.

---

[735] U.S. Const. amend. II and preamble.

[736] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

1. One early expedient for amassing sufficient public stores of ammunition was a tonnage duty to be paid in kind:

> • [1645] "[F]or this present yeare all shipps which have arrived since the Governor's last comeing in, or that shall arrive before midsumer next shall pay one halfe pound of powder to the publique, for every tunne of there burthen, And * * * all shipps arriveing after midsumer next shall pay to the publique [one-half] pound of powder and three pound of leaden shott or lead for every tunne of their burthen[.]"{EN-1064}
>
> • [1683] "Whereas y^e^ Barbarous Seneca Indians have lately made Incursions & Inroads * * * , that wee may be therefore in all readinesse, not only to defend our selves, but if occasion should require, that we may be likewise in a posture to oppose and debar their further progresse, all * * * Collectors * * * are requested and ordered by [the Council] * * * to use their best care and endeavours to provide att their entry of ships one thousand weight of shot, bullet, Carbine, pistoll, swan and goose, for w^ch^ charge they shall be allowed againe att their making up their accounts of fort Duties att y^e^ Audit."{EN-1065}
>
> • [1689] "Whereas upon the veiw [that is, inspection] of his Majesties Magazine of Powder Shott for this Colony, it is found to be very Short in proportion to what may be thought fitt," the Governor and Council ordered that the "Audit^r^ * * * doe take Care to Send to England, for fourty barrells of Powder with Musquett Bulletts, Carbine and Pistoll Bulletts, proportionable (to be and remain as the Standing Magazine of his Colony) and the Same be accompted for and paid out of the Mony ariseing from Port Duty's."{EN-1066}

Of course, today, "[n]o State shall * * * lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws", or "lay any Duty on Tonnage", in either case "without the Consent of Congress".[737] But nothing precludes any State from taxing ordinary businesses within her jurisdiction in amounts of ammunition (or amounts of money required to be paid in the form of ammunition), and even stipulating that the goods come from manufacturers located within that State.[738] Besides simply stimulating a domestic industry, such a policy would tend to provide a ready, sure, and secure supply of ammunition, without which firearms in Militiamen's hands would be of very limited use. And it could be enacted in every State, because every State with a fully functioning Militia needs such a sure and steady local supply.

---

[737] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cls. 2 and 3.

[738] See Lane County v. Oregon, 74 U.S. (7 Wallace) 71, 76-78 (1869).

2. Throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, fines imposed for violations of Militia or other military duty[739] were a major source of funds with which public arms and ammunition were purchased:

> • [1655 and 1658] "WHEREAS * * * the comon enemie the Indians, if opportunity serve, would suddenly invade this collony to a totall subversion of the same, and whereas the only means for the discovery of their plotts is by allarms, of which no certainty can be had in respect of the frequent shooting of gunns in drinking, whereby they proclaim, and as it were, justifie that beastlie vice spending much powder in vaine, that might be reserved against the comon enemie, Be it therefore enacted that what person or persons soever shall * * * shoot any gunns at drinkeing (marriages and ffuneralls onely excepted,) * * * shall forfeit 100 lb. of tobacco * * * to be disposed of by the militia in amunition towards a magazine for the county where the offence shall be comitted."{EN-1067}
>
> • [1659 and 1662] "That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least * * * , and whosoever shall faile of makeing such provision to be fined ffiftie pounds of tobacco to bee laied out by the county courts for a common stock of amunition for the county."{EN-1068}
>
> • [1666] "WHEREAS the officers of the militia have complained that divers refractory persons have * * * refused to appeare upon the dayes of exercise * * * , It is enacted * * * that every person soe neglecting to appeare, shall * * * be * * * fined one hundred pounds of tobacco to be disposed of by the militia to the use of the regiment[.]"{EN-1069}
>
> • [1705] "[T]he * * * ffield officers * * * have full power and authority to * * * dispose the tobaccoes which shall * * * arise upon the ffines * * * for furnishing the severall troops and companys belonging to the county with necessary drums, colours, trumpets, leading staffes, partizans and halberts, and for procuring * * * books of military dissipline * * * , and after all these for providing arms and ammunition for the countys use with the overplus."{EN-1070}
>
> • [1723] "[T]he * * * field officers * * * have full power and authority to * * * dispose of the fines * * * for furnishing the several troops and companies belonging to the county, with necessary drums, colours, trumpets, leading-staffs, partizans, and halberts, and after all those, for providing arms and ammunition for the county's use."{EN-1071}

---

[739] See post, at 666-697.

• [1738] A Militia court-martial shall "order and dispose of all * * * fines, in the first place, for buying drums, trumpets, and trophies, for the use of the troop or company from whence the same arise; and afterwards, for supplying the militia with arms." And fines collected from certain officers shall be divided "one moiety * * * for and towards the better supplying the county with arms; and the other moiety to the informer, to his own proper use."{EN-1072}

• [1755] The penalty for buying or selling publicly owned arms shall be "six pounds * * * , one moiety whereof shall be to, and for the use of the county, to which the arms shall belong, for the purchasing other arms, and the other moiety to the informer[.]"

And a court-martial may "order and dispose of all * * * fines [on delinquents], for buying drums, trumpets and trophies for the use of the militia of the county, and for supplying the militia of the * * * county with arms".{EN-1073}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] A court-martial shall "order the fines * * * to be levied upon all delinquents * * * and * * * order and dispose of all such fines for buying drums and trophies for the use of the militia of the county, and for supplying the militia of the * * * county with arms[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fine * * * imposed on the * * * chief commanding officer of the militia for neglecting to order general musters, shall be one moiety to the informer and the other to and for the use of the county for providing arms[.]"{EN-1074}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1769, and 1772] "[A]ll the fines inflicted by this act, and not otherwise directed, shall be one half * * * for and towards supplying with arms the militia of the county to which the offender belongs, and the other half to the informer[.]"{EN-1075}

• [1775] Fines levied against Militia officers for failing to appear properly armed shall be "appropriated to the purchasing arms and ammunition for the use of such as are not able to procure the same.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fines imposed * * * on the chief officer for not enlisting the men in his county, and on the commanding-officer present in the county for not appointing general musters, shall be to the use of the county, for providing arms[.]"{EN-1076}

• [1777] "All fines * * * shall be appropriated, in the first place, to the payment of the salaries [of certain Militia personnel] * * * , then to reimbursing the publick treasury for any arms purchased for the poor soldiers of such county, and for drums, fifes, and colours bought for the several companies; and if any surplus remain, it shall be laid out * * * in establishing and furnishing, for the use of the[ ] county, a magazine of small arms, field pieces, ammunition, and such other military stores as may be useful in case of invasion or insurrection."{EN-1077}

• [1784 and 1785] "[E]ach serjeant shall have a pair of moulds fit to cast balls for their respective companies, to be purchased * * * out of the monies arising on delinquencies[.]"

And a court-martial "shall cause [firearms supplied to poor Militiamen] to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents".{EN-1078}

That these fines were actually applied to such purposes Virginia's records evidence. For example, in 1692, the Governor and his Council became aware that "the fines on delinquent Soldiers in Severall Countyes in this Colony, have not been putt to the uses the Law directs", and "therefore Ordered that the Law * * * be both duely observed and performed".{EN-1079} And in 1772, when her Governor informed his Council "that he had been applied to, to remit certain Militia Fines" and "ask[ed] their advice", the Council "gave it as their Opinion, that all such Fines being appropriated by the Act of Assembly to particular Purposes, it was not in his Excellency's Power to remit them".{EN-1080}

3. Virginia's officials also relied on general tax revenues for the funds necessary to purchase firearms and ammunition:

• [1645] "That [certain named individuals] be imployed by themselves joyntly and severally or by any whom they shall think fitt in the behalfe of the collony for purchasing of powder and shott at the cheapest rates they can, And that they * * * receive of severall sherriffs all the present readie tobacco and dispose of the same for that purpose[.]"{EN-1081}

• [1656] "[T]hat for this present year the com'rs. of the militia in every county endeavour to provide four barrels of powder with shot proportionable for each regiment which shall be allowed the next year out of the several county levies[.]"{EN-1082}

• [1666] "WHEREAS there is a generall complaint of the want of ammunition for defence of the country in these times of eminent danger, * * * every county shall * * * make such provision thereof at a county charge as their severall occasions shall necessarily require."{EN-1083}

• [1673 and 1676] "FOR the better supply of the country with armes and ammunition, * * * the captaines of ffoote and horse in each county doe take a strict and perticuler account of what armes and ammunition are wanting in their severall companies and troops * * * : And * * * that the perticuler county courts be * * * impowred * * * to lay and raise a levy for the provideing of armes and ammunition for supplying the wants aforesaid[.]"{EN-1084}

• [1740] "WHEREAS, during the present war, it will be necessary, that the militia * * * should be * * * better armed; the better to enable them to contend with regular troops:

" * * * [T]he treasurer of this colony shall be * * * impowered and directed, out of the public money in his hands, to issue and apply the sum of two thousand pounds, in providing arms for the militia[.]"{EN-1085}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f * * * any soldier inlisted in the foot, is so poor, as not to be able to purchase the arms * * * [required of a Militiaman]; then [a county] court shall, and they are hereby required immediately, to depute some person to send for the same to England, by the first opportunity, and to levy the charge * * * in the next county levy[.]"{EN-1086}

• [1775] "[T]he soldiers to be enlisted [in the regular forces] shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet, cartouch box, or pouch[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f * * * any soldier enlisted [in the Militia] is so poor as not to be able to purchase the arms [required of him] * * * , then such arms shall * * * be procurred so soon as may be, at the expense of the publick."{EN-1087}

• [1775] "WHEREAS, in this time of imminent danger, it is found expedient, for the better defence of this colony, to provide an ample supply of arms and ammunition, by encouraging the manufacturing the same within this colony: Be it therefore ordained * * * , That a manufactory of arms be erected * * * and that * * * artificers be employed * * * at the expense of the public, and be constantly employed in manufacturing of arms * * * .

* * * * *

"And be it further ordained * * * , That the committee of safety shall have * * * authority to purchase in the neighboring colonies, or elsewhere, any number of stands of arms, not exceeding three thousand, which they may judge necessary for the use of the troops * * * , and also any number of gun locks * * * wanted for the arms made at the aforesaid manufactory, if * * * proper locksmiths cannot be employed: and * * * a sufficient quantity of gun flints and cartridge paper * * * .

"And for the greater encouragement of persons to make saltpetre and sulphur, Be it further ordained, That * * * three shillings for every pound of good saltpetre, and * * * one shilling per pound for * * * good sulphur, which shall be manufactured * * * of materials of the natural produce of this colony, * * * shall be paid to the proprietor * * * by the [public] treasurer * * * ; and the * * * committees [of safety] shall * * * forward all such saltpetre and sulphur to some manufacturer of powder * * * , obliging himself to deliver for the public use as much powder, in exchange for the said saltpetre and sulphur, as shall be agreed on * * * .

"And for the more immediate provision of lead, Be it farther ordained, That the committee for the county of Fincastle shall and may contract with the proprietors or certain lead mines * * * for such quantities of lead as may from time to time be judged necessary[.]"{EN-1088}

• [1775] "[T]o the end that the forces to be raised may be well and speedily supplied with * * * arms, * * * Be it farther ordained, That the committee of safety shall * * * appoint some fit person * * * to provide arms * * * upon the best and cheapest terms[.]"{EN-1089}

• [1775] "[T]he soldiers to be enlisted * * * shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet[.]"{EN-1090}

• [1775] "[T]he committee of safety * * * are hereby required to contract, upon the best terms they can, with such gunsmiths, or others, as they may approve, for manufacturing or supplying such quantity of arms as they shall judge proper for the defence of this colony.

* * * * *

"And for the more speedy and effectual providing of powder, * * * the committee of safety * * * are hereby required to contract with proper persons willing to manufacture the same on the publick account, and to erect, or cause to be erected, one or more powder mills, at the publick expense, at such places as the said committee of safety may judge to be free from danger, and conveniently situated with respect to the colony in general."{EN-1091}

• [1784] "That the governor with the advice of council, be authorized and required to purchase on the best terms he can, either in the country or by importation, in the ensuing year, as many thousand stand of arms and accoutrements brass mounted, of the descriptions directed in the militia law, with the words 'Virginia militia' engraved thereon, as the money which from time to time may be appropriated for that purpose will purchase.

* * * * *

" * * * That the governor, with advice of council, shall also in like manner * * * import ten tons of musket powder, two hundred thousand gun-flints; and one hundred ream of musket cartridge paper, to be deposited in the public magazines."{EN-1092}

• [1787] "[T]he governor with the advice of council, shall apply the money by law appropriated to the purchase of arms, in procuring such artillery, small arms, accoutrements and ammunition, as may to him with such advice seem proper; and the small arms so procured shall be distributed to the different counties in proportion to the number of their militia. Every private receiving such arms and accoutrements shall hold the same subject to the like rules, penalties and forfeitures, as are prescribed for a poor private in and by the [Militia A]ct of [1785.]"{EN-1093}

Yet it was always clear that, notwithstanding the government's provision of firearms and ammunition for public purposes, Militiamen were not absolved of their personal duties to furnish themselves with that equipment. As early as 1692, for example, the Governor and his Council, > takeing into their Consideration that the Powder their Ma[jesties] have * * * Sen[t] to this Colony for the defence thereof, being disperst in the Severall Counties, may give some persons occasion to think it is Sent * * * to be used at Musterings, and to Excuse them from being provided as the Law directs, to the End therefore that no person may be soe deceived, It is hereby declared that the said Powder is onely for the defence of the Country, and not to be used but when the Comand^{rs} * * * in Chief shall finde Emergent Occasion requires, and doth not Excuse any person from being provided according to Law[.]{EN-1094}

An admonition that, with respect to all arms in private hands, applied throughout the pre-constitutional era.

4. Notwithstanding all of this, perhaps the most sweepingly negative summation of the extent to which Virginians towards the close of the pre-constitutional period relied upon direct governmental provision of firearms is that "[a]t the beginning of the [W]ar [of Independence,] Virginia had no supply of firearms except those in private hands".[740] Doubtlessly, though, the author of this conclusion meant to say "no [significant or sufficient] supply of firearms", because some firearms and ammunition owned by the public, even if ultimately to prove inadequate in supply, quality, or state of repair when most needed, must surely have reposed in public magazines, or in the custody of various Militia officers or other public officials or agents, not only in 1776 but throughout the preceding decades. For example:

> • [1643] "VPON consideration * * * of the scarsity of powder and aminition in the plantation and the difficultie in procureing the same, It is thought fitt and enacted that the Governour * * * do allott a barrel of powder to each countie, to be kept and preserved * * * a publique stock, for which the comander of each county is to be responsible."{EN-1095}
>
> • [1682] "Whereas * * * his Majesties stores att middle Plantation will be exposed to great hazards and dangers, if not guarded, * * * It's resolved and * * * ordered that M^{r} Thomas Broomer (who hath y^{e} care and custody of his Majesties Stores), doe deliver unto Coll John Page * * * all y^{e} Armes, partizans, Halberts, Drums, Swords, pikes and amunition * * * All w^{ch} * * * Coll John Page do Cause to be carted unto [his] house * * * to be then secured[.]"{EN-1096}

---

[740] H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia, ante note 731, at 33.

• [1683] "That y^e^ brick wind mill att Green Springs is y^e^ securest place for y^e^ Powder and all other his Majesties Stores, to be kept in[.]"{EN-1097}

• [1691] After the Governor and his Council "read a Letter from [certain Militia officers] * * * wherein the[latter] signifye[d] that they shall provide the Men appointed them to raise for Rangers, but know not where to furnish them with Pistolls and Carabines", it was "Ordered that if [those officers] cannot otherwise provide the said persons with Carabines that they Send to Ralph Wormeley Esq^re^ for as many of those at his House belonging to their Ma[jesties William and Mary] as will supply their Wants, which he is desired to deliver to their Ord^r^ takeing receipt for them."{EN-1098}

• [1691] The Governor and his Council, "takeing into Consideration that there is noe Fort nor place of defence to keepe that small quantity of Powder which remains undisposed of in this Country, and that it will be great Charge to build a Storehouse on purpose * * * , also that it will be dangerous to keepe the said Powder at one Place for fear of being blowen up or otherwise," concluded "that the best way to preserve the same for * * * this Countryes Service, is to Cause it to be placed in the Severall Counties of this Colony in small quantities, * * * distributed * * * to the Severall Comand^rs^ in Cheife of the forces of this Colony * * * and by them Securely kept in such Convenient places as they shall finde fitt, takeing receipts of the persons with whom they shall place the same not to make use of any part thereof, but upon Emergent Occasion of Suddain Invasion or Insurrection, and to Render an account of the same when demanded."{EN-1099}

• [1693] The Governor and his Council ordered "that a powder roome and a small building over itt be forthwith built in James Citty and paid for * * * out of their Maj^ts^ Revenue of this Colony".{EN-1100}

• [1699] The Governor and his Council "Ordered, that the severall Commanders in Cheif of the respective Countyes within this Colony, do take an exact account of all such Armes and Amunition as have at any time been sent into the Countyes under their commands for the publick service, and how the same have been disposed of and in what condition they are now".{EN-1101}

• [1701] The Governor prepared a proclamation "Commanding the Comand^rs^ in Cheif of Each and Every Countie * * * that they make strict and publick Enquiry of all ancient officers & all others w^th^in their respective Counties w^ht^ publick armes or ammunition is in their severall Counties and in whose Custody[.]"{EN-1102}

• [1703] "Whereas Edward Ross * * * hath * * * undertaken to clean & keep in good order all the arms now in the Magazine * * * It is ordered * * * he be allowed fifty Pounds[.]"{EN-1103}

• [1705] One "Edw^{d} Ross [was to] carefully look to y^{e} * * * Powder & the other Stores of war under his charge that none be spoiled or dammaged".{EN-1104}

• [1707] "Ordered that a supply of arms & ammunition be sent to the County of New Kent and King William and lodged in such manner as may be most usefull for the defence * * * ag^{t} the Indians."{EN-1105}

• [1708] "Ordered that a barrell of powder & a proportionable quantity of Shott with thirty Musquetts and Swords be sent to Yorktown and lodged at Major Buckners for the use of the Inhabitants in case any attempt be made on that place by the Enemys Privateers."{EN-1106}

• [1710] "Upon consideration of the best way to preserve the arms sent to the respective Countys and which by reason of the extreem poverty of the Inhabitants cannot be sold", the Governor and Council "ordered that the Commanders in Cheif of the several Countys give directions to the officers in whose hands the s^{d} arms are to deliver them out to such persons serveing in the Militia as they shall judge responsible takeing their bond for keeping their said arms in good order and to return the same or the value thereof when thereunto required."{EN-1107}

• [1710] "The Hon^{ble} Collonel Robert Carter is impowered and desired to cause the arms lodged at his house for the use of the Northern Countys to be cleaned & fixed and to return an account of the charge thereof that the same may be paid."{EN-1108}

• [1710 and 1713] "Whereas the arms lodged at Williamsburgh for the use of the adjoining Inhabitants upon any emergency are in a great measure useless for want of being kept clean and fitt for Service It is ordered that the Clerk of the Council be impowered * * * to agree with an Armourer at a certain Sallary per annum to keep the arms clean and fitt for Service."{EN-1109}

• [1714] "WHEREAS our late sovereign lady queen Anne * * * was pleased to bestow a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, for the service of this colony, which are in danger to be imbezzled and spoilt, for want of a convenient and proper place to keep them in.

" * * * [T]here shall be erected and finished one good substantial house of brick, which shall be called the magazine * * * : In which * * * all the arms, gun-powder, and ammunition, now in this colony, belonging to the king, * * * may be lodged and kept."{EN-1110}

• [1717] "Ordered That the Arms and Stores of War belonging to his Majesty which were dispersed through y^{e} several Countys * * * be called in and lodged in his Majesties Magazine at W^{ms}burgh the same being in danger of becoming unservicable for want of due care taken thereof[.]"{EN-1111}

• [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, 1753, 1757, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1771] "[W]hereas it may be needful, in time of danger, to arm part of the militia, not otherwise sufficiently provided, out of his majesty's magazine, and other stores, within this colony,

" * * * if any person * * * so to be armed * * * shall detain or imbezzle any arms, accoutrements, or ammunition, * * * [such person shall] be imprisoned * * * till he * * * ha[s] made satisfaction for the arms, accoutrements, or ammunition[.]"{EN-1112}

• [1738] "Whereas the Inhabitants on Sherrando River * * * have prayed for a Supply of Arms & Ammunition for their defence, It is * * * Ordered that out of his Majesties Stores there be delivered to John Lewis Gent who is hereby Approved to be a Capt over such of the Inhabitants as live in Beverly Mannor, Thirty Muskets & Eight pair of Pistols with a proportionable quantaty of Powder and Ball[.]"{EN-1113}

• [1775] "[T]he militia or volunteers to be employed, if not well armed, shall be furnished with arms out of such as belong to the county or corporation, to be returned as soon as they shall be discharged from the service."{EN-1114}

• [1777] "The several divisions of the militia of any county shall be called into duty by regular rotation * * * . The soldiers of such militia, if not well armed and provided with ammunition, shall be furnished with the arms and ammunition of the county, and any deficiency in these may be supplied from the publick magazines[.]"{EN-1115}

• [1780] "That the governour, with the advice of the council, do adopt the most speedy and effectual measures for completely arming and accoutring one third part of the militia in * * * [certain named] counties, taking care that there be sent therewith a proper quantity of ammunition. And that the said arms, accoutrements, and ammunition may be effectually preserved, * * * the captain of each company shall take a receipt from every man to whom he delivers a gun, bayonet, cartouch box, powder, or ball; and every such person shall be liable to pay double the value of the same if lost, or damaged by his default[.]"{EN-1116}

• [1781] "That two legions * * * be forthwith raised to serve during the war * * * in cases of actual or threatened invasion, during which, they shall continually remain in the field * * * . Immediately after any invasion shall cease, or the business of training shall be over, the men shall be marched to some magazine, there to deliver their arms, ammunition, and accoutrements * * * .

" * * * All * * * arms, and every military apparatus * * * shall be furnished at the expense of the state, and shall whilst the men are out of service, be safely stored in some magazine to be provided for that purpose."{EN-1117}

Indeed, in 1714 Virginia erected a public magazine, and appointed a "keeper" "to look after and take charge of the magazine, and the ammunition which shall be lodged therein", as well as an "armourer" "to take care of, keep clean, and mend the arms which shall be kept in the said magazine".{EN-1118} And, notwithstanding occasional complaints that a "great part of the Arms in the Magazine and at the Governors House are much out of repair & unfitt for Service" and "that if the present Armourer, do not put in sufficient repair, the said Arms, his Salary be stopt, and applyed towards amending and repairing the same",{EN-1119} an armorer (but only one) appeared on the public payroll throughout the 1700s.{EN-1120} So some not entirely insignificant supply of public firearms, meant to be maintained in a reasonable serviceable condition at all times, must have lain in storage during that period.

And certainly the firearms purchased with Militiamen's fines or other public funds, and distributed to individuals too poor to buy their own, remained public property, albeit temporarily entrusted to private hands.[741]

Nonetheless, the raw numbers of firearms recorded at various times during the pre-constitutional period as having reposed in public ownership and possession in Virginia were often less than impressive. For example:

> • In 1698, "[a]n Acco^{t} of Stores in his Maj^{ts} Magazeen in James City" catalogued "Burnt Snaphaunce Match lock & Carabine barrels from Middle Plantation 270", "Burnt Locks * * * from Middleplantation: 336", "Old broke Muskets 135", "Old Pistolls 8", "burnt barrels of Musket at y^{e} State house 197", "burnt locks * * * 180", but no more than "Good Muskets: 3".{EN-1121}
>
> • In 1699, "it Appear's there are not any Armes Amunicon or Stores, Except only those at James Citty Yorke and Tindalls pointe, * * * nor hath any Armes been sent into this Colony Since the year 1692 at w^{ch} time about two hundred were Sent in * * * which were all burnt last fall in the State house Except three or four".{EN-1122}
>
> • In 1705, a table prepared for the Governor and his Council of "the Arms and Shott to be sent to ye several Countys for the Service of the Militia on any emergency" listed only three hundred twenty-two carbines, three hundred twenty-two cases of pistols (that is, six hundred forty-four handguns all told), and eight hundred twenty muskets.{EN-1123}
>
> • In 1713, the Council recorded "the arms belonging to her Majesty now at Williamsburg [as] consisting of two hundred Sett of Footmans Arms and one hundred of horse arms".{EN-1124}

---

[741] See ante, at 424-428.

• In 1728, Virginia's public "Stores of War" totaled only "serviceable Musquets 404, Carbines with swivel belts 100 and cases of Pistols with holsters 100".[742]

By themselves, these small quantities of arms could hardly have sufficed to defend the entire Colony at those times. Perhaps even more revealing, during the period 1756 through 1763, which coincided with the years of the French and Indian War, Virginia imported from Britain six hundred muskets for public service, but three thousand eight hundred and eighty-five—more than five times as many—for private sale and use.[743]

Of course, during the great crisis of the War of Independence, Virginia sought to amass as extensive an arsenal as practicable in the shortest time possible. So, from September of 1775 to July of 1776, her Committee of Safety purchased from Local gunsmiths some three thousand three hundred and twenty-five muskets and two thousand ninety-eight rifles.[744] (Had the public not purchased these arms, though, they might have been sold to private citizens fulfilling their Militia duties.)

5. Also highly consequential to any assessment of the limited rôle that public arms usually played in equipping her Militia is that many of the firearms and much of the ammunition that Virginia initially acquired were then sold to Militiamen or other members the general public. For example—

a. In 1699, the Governor and his Council noted that

> [w]hereas Edward Ross Gunner at James City hath this day laid * * * an acco^{t} of y^{e} powder which he hath delivered according to order for y^{e} use of y^{e} severall Countyes whereby it appeares that much y^{e} greatest part of y^{e} Powder is yet remaining in his Custody whereupon he hath prayed directions how he shall dispose thereof because y^{e} vault where it lyes being very damp will prove very prejudiciall to it if some speedy care be not taken therefore
>
> Ordered that the said Ross do take y^{e} first oppertunity of Sending to such of y^{e} Commanders in Cheif of y^{e} Militia as have not already received y^{e} proportion of Powder allotted for their respective Countyes and desire them to send for y^{e} same as soon as may be; but if * * * any of them shall neglect sending accordingly, the said Ross is Directed to make Sale of such powder as shall remain in his hands * * * to y^{e} best advantage he can[.] {EN-1125}

---

[742] De Witt Bailey, Small Arms of the British Forces in America, ante note 428, at 110.

[743] Id. at 237. Of the arms for public service, 500 muskets with bayonets were "for the Province", and 100 for the Militia of a single County. Of the arms "for the Planters" (that is, private parties), only 110 were muskets with bayonets. The remainder, however, would have sufficed at least temporarily for Militia service if supplemented with swords or tomahawks, and might later have been fitted with bayonets by Local gunsmiths.

[744] H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia, ante note 731, at 109-124.

> For the prevention of any accident which may happen to the powder now lyeing at Jame's Citty, Ordered that the same be distributed into the Severall Counties * * * ; and that it may not be decayed and Spoiled after it is Soe distributed, the Comanders in Cheif of the Militia are hereby impowered to make sale of half the powder in their respective Counties, and with the money which they receive for the Same, they shall send for other new and good powder[.] {EN-1126}

b. In 1703, the Governor and his Council considered > how the arms & Ammunition sent in for the use of the Militia * * * may be disposed of in the most convenient manner * * * and * * * Are of opinion that 12½ percent be laid upon the prime cost * * * & therefore

>
> Ordered that an Estimate of the Price of each Species of the said arms (including the s^{d} 12½ per cent) be drawn & sent to every County, together with one of each sort of the said arms, and * * * Commanders in chief of the said respective Countys cause the said arms to be publickly showed at their General Muster * * * , giving notice to every Person not already provided with arms & Ammunition as the Law directs that they take care to furnish themselves out of her Matys Stores now at James City, Certifying such as shall be deficient after the s^{d} intimation that they shall be proceeded against and fined according to law. And for the more easie furnishing the several Countys with arms & ammunition out of the said Stores, every * * * Commander in chief is hereby directed to take an acco^{t} of all Persons within his County who shall desire any of the said Arms or Ammunition, * * * provided always that if any Person desire horsemans arms, he shall be obliged to take a compleat Sett viz Carbine & belt, Pistols and holsters & Swords & belt; and also every foot Soldier, to take Musquets, Sword & belt & Cartouch box; but in case the Person buying the said arms shall not have occasion for the whole, he may dispose of what he has not occasion for as he thinks fitt[.] {EN-1127}

In 1704, however, the Governor complained that > whereas her * * * Majesty * * * hath * * * sen[t] in a considerable Supply of Armes and Ammunition for the Service of the militia which are to be sold at easier rates than any other of the like goodness can be purchased here, and timely notice having been given [in 1703] * * * to all Persons who pleased to furnish themselves therewith, so that such as have not yet provided themselves with Armes and Ammunition are rendered inexcusable, I have thought fitt to signify my intentions to the * * * Comanders in Chief, who are * * * to intimate the same to the Militia under their Command that all such Persons as have hitherto neglected to furnish themselves with armes and Ammunition as by Law they are required, shall no longer escape the Penaltys by the said Law enjoyned,

> And to that end I do require the * * * Commanders in Chief to cause exact Lists to be taken of those Persons that shall appear at the * * * General Musters unprovided of Armes and Ammunition[.]{EN-1128}

Shortly thereafter, though, the Governor and Council,

> [u]pon representation * * * that the poorer sort of Inhabitants serving in the Militia by reason of the Low Price of Tob[acco] this year are not able to buy Arms & Ammunition according to y^e^ late order of his Excell^ey^ in Council; His Excell^cy^ & the Council * * * have thought fitt to give notice that all Persons who shall purchase any Arms or Ammunition out of her Maj^ties^ Stores * * * shall have time given them * * * for paying for the same. And ordered * * * exact Lists to be taken * * * of all Persons, who after y^e^ Publication of this Order shall appear either at Gen^ll^ or particular musters not provided w^th^ Arms & Ammunition according to Law they having been allowed so long time & such favourable terms to provide themselves.{EN-1129}

This offer having proven insufficient to move the goods, the Governor and Council, > willing to make the Purchase of the said Arms as easie as possible, * * * Ordered that where any Person cannot advance money for the Arms & Ammunition w^ch^ he shall be desireous to purchase, the * * * Comand^r^ in chief of any County to whom application shall be made for the same, shall have Power & liberty, to sell & dispose of the said Arms & Ammunition for Tob[acco] or any other Commodity offered, and make what bargain he thinks best, he being obliged to Acco^t^ * * * for such quantity of Arms & Ammunition as he shall send for, and dispose of, at the rate formerly ascertained by his Excell^cy^ & y^e^ Council & no more.{EN-1130}

Then, in 1705, the Governor and his Council ordered that "Commanders in cheif of the Countys who have received any of y^e^ * * * arms & ammunition be required to transmitt * * * an accompt how they have disposed of them, and that they remitt * * * the Price of all such arms or ammunition as they have sold".{EN-1131} But later that year the Council finally conceded that, > not only by any Pirate or Privateer who shall attain to the knowledge of the condition they ly in, but also easily seized by our own Serv^ts^ and Slaves or any ill disposed Persons and made use of ag^t^ the Country is case any Insurretion should happen. And therefore * * * it will be very effectuall for the preservation of the arms from being spoiled by rust, and the dangers of surprize * * * & be also very serviceable to the Country that y^e^ same be dispersed through the several Countys in proportion to y^e^ number of Inhabitants and y^e^ wants of the said Countys that the said Arms be intrusted to the Commander in Cheif of the Militia of each County * * * who may be directed to distribute y^e^ same to such of the Inferior Officers of the Militia * * * to be by them kept in good order and fitt for Service, and to be made use of only upon an Alarm. Which officers may also have power to sell the said arms at the price already sett thereon if an offer be made * * * . That a proportionable quantity of Shott may be sent to every County * * * for the Service of the Militia and not to be used but ag^t^ an enemy. That the Powder be distributed throughout the several Countys * * * . That one half of the Powder * * * be kept for y^e^ supply of the County on any emergency, and the other half sold * * * , And y^e^ * * * Officers * * * are to take care that none of y^e^ said Powder be sold to any but such as are listed in y^e^ Militia.{EN-1132}

> [w]hereas the Arms and Ammunition sent in by her Majesty for y^e^ Service of the Militia of this Country lyes now at James City and by y^e^ slow & inconsiderable sale * * * it is very improbable that any quantity can be expected to be sold as was intended, occasioned party by the high price sett thereon, and partly by the poverty of the Inhabitants[.] * * * [T]he Storehouse at James City where they now ly is very unsafe for keeping y^e^ said arms, * * * it lying upon a Navigable River where there is no Fortification nor other defence, so that they are lyable to be surprised

Evidently, then, the government originally intended to sell all of these arms to Militiamen as their private property—"at easier rates than any other of the like goodness can be purchased" and "on favorable terms"—and only because economic circumstances prevented such sales were the arms stored as public property for use by the Militia "through the several Countys" "upon an Alarm".

c. In 1712, the Council "Ordered that the Officer having the charge of the Queen's powder in [certain] Countys deliver to the Officers of the Militia in the Frontier Countys a quantity of the said powder for the use of the Soldiers under their command not exceeding one pound per man at the rate of three Reals per pound."{EN-1133} (A "Real" was one-eighth of a silver Spanish milled dollar.)

d. In 1760, the Council reported that "many stands of Arms had been lately imported for the Militia of King and Queen, Gloucester and James City", and that the Governor "would write to the commanding Officers of those Counties requesting them to purchase and Collect the said Arms for the * * * service".{EN-1134}

e. And in 1763, "[t]he Governour acquainting the Council there was a large quantity of old Gun powder in the Magazine which was in danger of spoiling, they advis'd that the same be sold at public Auction".{EN-1135}

6. In sum, Virginia's pre-constitutional practice rather blurred the distinction between "public" and "private" arms, to the decided advantage of "private" arms. No doubt this was largely the consequence of the unique character of the Militia: namely, its being the one governmental entity that consists of WE THE PEOPLE themselves, who at the same time also compose the free market. But of no little significance, too, was that, for almost the entire pre-constitutional period, even the arms that Virginia originally acquired came, directly or indirectly, from the free market. To be sure, although statute after statute instructed some official or other to expend public moneys on firearms and ammunition, none of them recited in so many words that any official should repair to or rely upon the market for that purpose. Yet the only reasonable way to read this legislation is by implicit reference to the free market. For example—

a. In 1701, the Governor proclaimed that "no armes Nor ammunition upon any Pretence w^{t} soever be Exported or Carried out of this Country [and] that all merch^{ts} and Dealers in this Colony give an acco^{t} to the Comd^{r} in Cheif of that County where they Inhabitt w^{ht} Guns Carabines Swords Pistolls and Ammunition they have to dispose of And at w^{ht} rates they will dispose thereof to the End y^{t} y^{e} same may be purchased and bought up for the Necessary defence of this Colony in time of Eminent danger".{EN-1136}

b. In April of 1702, Virginia ordered from the British Board of Ordinance five hundred muskets, three thousand pairs of pistols, and three thousand five hundred carbines "for the complete arming of the Militia of Virginia". In August of that same year the Board shipped another one thousand snaphaunce muskets, four hundred carbines, and four hundred pairs of pistols.[745] These firearms the Governor and his Council then undertook to sell to Militiamen.[746] And in 1712, three hundred more snaphaunce muskets were sent from England.[747] In the final analysis, however, all of these arms came from the free market, because the Board did not manufacture firearms itself, but instead simply contracted with private concerns to provide them.[748]

c. In 1750, the Colony ordered "from England five Hundred Muskets (to be mark't with Virginia 1750) Bayonets and Catouch Boxes of the best sort",{EN-1137} some of which upon arrival were issued to Militiamen commanded by George Washington—but these guns and accoutrements, too, were supplied by a private manufacturer.[749]

d. Even during the War of Independence, when the government's direct involvement in the production of firearms might have been expected to expand by leaps and bounds had public institutions been capable of expeditious and efficient action, the Commonwealth purchased large quantities of firearms from private

---

[745] De Witt Bailey, Small Arms of the British Forces in America, ante note 428, at 22-23.

[746] See ante, at 451-454.

[747] De Witt Bailey, Small Arms of the British Forces in America, ante note 428, at 110.

[748] Id. at 93-100.

[749] B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 135.

gunsmiths, including the Rappahannock Forge (under what was apparently the very first governmental contract of that kind in America).[750]

e. Moreover, only one statute during the entire *pre-*constitutional period ever mandated "[t]hat a manufactory of arms be erected [in Virginia] * * * and that * * * artificers be employed * * * at the expense of the public, and be constantly employed in manufacturing of arms".{EN-1138} And although this was the first governmental factory for the production of firearms established by any of the Colonies, it operated only from 1775 until 1783.[751]

The salient points of this mass of historical evidence are that, throughout the entire *pre-*constitutional period, the free market supplied the vast preponderance of the firearms in Virginia, and most firearms were "provided and furnished" to Virginians by Virginians themselves, as those Virginians' own private property—and remained such, even when their owners dedicated them in large part to public use in their Militia or other military service. Which compels the further conclusion that, throughout this era, her legislators believed that the free market for firearms and ammunition was, not only adequate for Virginia's purposes, but also preferable to (or at least more expedient than) any other source of such equipment.[752]

Of course, the use of private property and reliance on the free market for this particular public purpose posed no problem in political philosophy or practice, because the people themselves were always the central actors. The purpose of arming the people was to secure their own freedom—and the best way to do that, Virginians believed, was to conjoin use with ownership (and, as the next Chapter of this study explains, personal possession), by having the people for the most part arm themselves out of their own economic resources.

---

[750] See Edward R. Flanagan, "Virginia Militia Small Arms", in The American Society of Arms Collectors, Longarms in America, ante note 468, Volume 1, at 427; B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 148, 150. See post, at 519.

[751] See H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia, ante note 731, at 38-41; B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 148-149.

[752] See post, Chapter 20.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Throughout the pre-constitutional era, most Virginians not only owned the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements they used for their Militia service, but also personally possessed that equipment at all times.

Just as in Rhode Island (as well as in almost every other Colony and then every other independent State),[753] not simply ownership, but also permanent personal possession, of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements was almost always an indicium of an individual's membership in Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia. Therefore, such possession is one of the indispensable elements of the very definition of "the Militia of the several States" and "[a] well regulated Militia" under the Constitution.[754]

A. Militiamen's personal possession of their firearms the rule. The previous review of Virginia's pre-constitutional statutes—which her General Assembly phrased again and again in such terms as "furnish and supply himself with", "furnish and provide himself with", "be furnished with", "be provided with", "furnish himself with", "provide themselves with", and have "arms and ammunition of his own property"—establishes beyond any reasonable doubt that members of the Militia who were financially able to do so acquired their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements at their own expense through purchase in the free market.[755] Where impecunious minors, servants, or apprentices listed in the Militia were concerned, their parents, guardians, or masters supplied the requisite arms.[756]

Upon their acquisition by these Militiamen, though, the firearms and ammunition did not become public property or come under governmental control (other than that the government required Militiamen to remain in possession of their arms). And nothing in the statutory record suggests that any individuals who bought or otherwise obtained firearms for their Militia service ever at any other time dedicated title to, or surrendered possession of or control over, these arms to the government as a matter of course.

---

[753] See ante, Chapter 6.

[754] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II. See ante, at 63-81, and post, Chapters 38 and 39.

[755] See ante, at 407-423.

[756] See ante, at 428-432.

Indeed, quite the opposite: From the earliest days, individual Virginians might have purchased firearms from the government for their own use in Militia service. For example:

> [1673 and 1676] "[T]hat the perticuler county courts be * * * impowred upon their respective counties to lay and raise a levy for the provideing of armes and ammunition * * * , that is to say, muskitts and swords for the ffoote, and pistolls, swords and carbines for horse, as alsoe for every lysted souldier at the least two pounds of powder and six pounds of shott, the said armes and ammunition * * * to remaine in the hands of the officers of the militia for them to dispose of the same as there shalbe occasion; and that those to whome distribution of armes and ammunition shalbe made doe pay for the same at a reasonable rate, to be collected by the sherriffe or collector as in the case of levyes and publique dues, to the use and towards the reimbursement of the county[.]"{EN-1139}

Or they might have been specially compensated for supplying their own firearms for their own use in public service. For example:

> [1682] "[T]hat the pay of each officer and soldier shall be as followeth: To the captain * * * finding himself horse, armes, ammunition and provision, eight thousand pounds of tobacco * * * for one whole yeare * * * ; and to each soldier finding himselfe horse, armes[,] furniture, provision, amunition and other necessaries * * * , two thousand pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1140}

Or they might have been reimbursed for the value of their own arms lost in such service. For example:

> [1684] "[T]hat in case any souldier shall loose his horse or armes * * * in any actual engagement against the enemie, he shall be allowed the vallue thereof by the country[.]"{EN-1141}

Those too poor to purchase their own arms, of course, formed a separate class. But if they did not actually own the firearms made available for their use, they usually did possess them.[757]

This cannot be overemphasized, because modern-day soldiers, sailors, and airmen in America's extensive "standing army"[758] neither actually own the firearms they carry when in training or on deployment, nor maintain (or even enjoy a legal claim to) personal possession of those arms at all times. Ownership of the Armed Forces' firearms is vested in the General Government; and, as a consequence of that, final control over their use rests in the hands of civilian public officials, not of the service personnel themselves. This situation is eminently desirable—yea, indispensable—for any "standing army" maintained by "a Republican Form of Government" in "a free State".[759] For WE THE PEOPLE themselves must jealously guard the Power of the Sword in their very own hands—especially as it relates to who may possess military equipment, and for what purposes. Not only because the General Government is nothing but THE PEOPLE'S agent, the public property in the temporary custody of which they may distribute among themselves at any time—and even the very existence of which they may terminate—either by constitutional processes or by extraordinary actions.[760] But also because THE PEOPLE may want to disband their "standing army", in part or in whole, if they determine that it is not necessary, or that it is too expensive or otherwise inefficient, or especially that it threatens their liberties, or for any other reason sufficient unto themselves.[761]

---

[757] See ante, at 424-432, and post, at 486-495.

[758] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 through 14; and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

If, however, the "standing army" and para-militarized police forces brigaded with it are always armed, and THE PEOPLE are unable to disarm them, but THE PEOPLE can be disarmed by the army and the police, then the polity must be considered, not "a free State", but "a national-security state", "a garrison state", or "a police state". Such a polity would not be "a free State", because it lacked "[a] well regulated Militia". And it would lack "[a] well regulated Militia" because THE PEOPLE would not enjoy an absolute right to possess firearms suitable for Militia service at all times—a right enforceable by themselves because they always maintained in their own hands the means to do so. Observe carefully: not simply a right to own such firearms. For, in principle, rogue public officials could concede individuals' rights to formal ownership of firearms, yet also deny them any right to untrammeled possession of arms under all circumstances, and thereby all the legitimate uses such possession allowed. In the contemporary judicial jargon, private ownership would be recognized, but possession would be "regulated" in order to achieve some supposed "compelling governmental interest", such as protecting society from criminal misuse of firearms—but in fact to suppress THE PEOPLE in the guise of defending them. Actual legal ownership of firearms is not necessary for their possession; but without possession use is impossible. And without at least the potential for WE THE PEOPLE'S immediate use of firearms at all times, "the security of a free State" cannot be achieved.

---

[759] See U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4 and amend. II.

[760] Compare U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 2, and art. V, with Declaration of Independence.

[761] See, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 12: "no Appropriation of Money [to raise and support Armies] shall be for a longer Term than two Years".

B. Militiamen's firearms afforded extensive legal protection. The firearms with which individual Virginians "provide[d] themselves" constituted a very special form of private property, protected by sweeping legal immunities:

> • [1645] "That the act [of] the last Assembly excepting servants, armes, amunition, and corn for present subsistence from the rigor of exec'n. be still in full force and power and so to continue till the twentieth of October next."{EN-1142}
>
> • [1684] "FOR the encouragement of the inhabitants * * * of Virginia, to provide themselves with arms and ammunition, for the defence of this * * * country, and that they may appear well and compleatly furnished when commanded to musters and other * * * service, which many persons have hitherto delayed to do, for that their arms have been imprest and taken from them * * * it is hereby enacted, That all such swords, musketts, pistolls, carbines, guns, and other armes and furniture, as the inhabitants of this country are already provided, or shall provide and furnish themselves with, for their necessary use and service, shall * * * be free and exempted from being imprest or taken from him or them, * * * neither shall the same be lyable to be taken by any distresse, seizure, attachment or execution[.]"{EN-1143}
>
> • [1705] "[F]or the encouragement of every soldier * * * to provide and furnish himself * * * and his security to keep his horse, arms and ammunition, when provided,
>
> " * * * That the musket or ffuzee, the sword, cartouch box and ammunition of every ffoot soldier, and the horse, * * * the carbine, pistolls, sword, cartouch box and ammunition of every trooper provided and kept * * * to appear and exercise withall be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever, and likewise from being seized or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writt of execution, and that every distress, seizure, attachment or execution made or served upon any of the premises, be unlawfull and void, and that the officer or person that presumes to make or serve the same be lyable to the suit of the paty grieved, wherein double damages shall be given upon a recovery."{EN-1144}
>
> • [1723] "And for an encouragement of every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * , and his security to keep his horse, arms, and ammunition, when provided, Be it enacted * * * , That the horses and furniture, arms and ammunition, provided and kept * * * be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever; and likewise, from being seized or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writ of execution. And that every distress, seizure, attachment, or execution, made or served upon any of the premises, be unlawful and void: And that the officer or person that presumes to make

or serve the same, be liable to the suit of the party grieved: wherein double damages shall be given upon a recovery."{EN-1145}

• [1738] "[F]or encouragement to every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * , and his security to keep his arms and ammunition, when provided, Be it enacted * * * , That the furniture, arms, and ammunition, provided and kept * * * be free and exempted, at all times, from being impressed upon any account whatsoever; and likewise from being seised or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writ of execution. And that every distress, seisure, or execution, made or served upon any of the premises, be unlawful and void: And that the officer or person that presumes to make or serve the same, be liable to the suit of the party grieved; wherein double damages shall be given, upon a recovery."{EN-1146}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "And for an encouragement to every soldier to provide and furnish himself * * * and his security to keep his arms and ammunition when provided:

" * * * That the furniture, arms and ammunition, provided and kept * * * be free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever; and likewise, from being seised or taken by any manner of distress, attachment or writ of execution, and that every distress, seisure or execution, made or served, upon any of the premises, be unlawful and void, and that the officer or person who presumes to make or serve the same, be liable to the suit of the party grieved, wherein double damages shall be given upon a recovery[.]"{EN-1147}

• [1775] "[A]ll arms of the militia shall be exempted from executions or distresses[.]"{EN-1148}

• [1777] "All arms and ammunition of the militia shall be exempted from executions and distresses at all times[.]"{EN-1149}

• [1784 and 1785] "All arms, ammunition, and equipments of the militia, shall be exempted from executions and distresses at all times[.]"{EN-1150}

1. From 1705 through 1771, the statutes declared Militia firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements "free and exempted at all times from being impressed upon any account whatsoever". The statute of 1684 declared them "free and exempted from being imprest or taken", without any exception, which should have been construed as applying in all cases, too (but perhaps erroneously was not so interpreted by over-zealous officials, in light of the emphatic language later employed). In any event, these provisions would or should have prevented the equipment from being taken for some public purpose unrelated to Militia service, even when a Militiaman who owned and possessed it was not himself being called forth for duty in the field. Moreover, in the case of an individual too poor to purchase a firearm by himself, and therefore to whom the government had supplied one on loan, these statutes would have disabled public officials from seizing that firearm, even though it was public property, so long as the poor Militiaman possessed it for the performance of his Militia service—one essential aspect of which was precisely his permanent personal possession of that firearm.

2. From 1705 through 1771, Virginia's statutes declared Militia firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements "free and exempted at all times * * * from being seized or taken by any manner of distress, attachment, or writ of execution", and from 1777 through 1785, "exempted from executions and distresses at all times". The statute of 1684 provided that they were not "lyable to be taken by any distresse, seizure, attachment, or execution", and the statute of 1775 that they were "exempted from executions or distresses" in general, both of which would have been construed as conferring a blanket immunity, too, because they identified no situations in which the exemption did not apply. Thus, Militiamen were absolutely protected from being dispossessed of their arms in satisfaction or as security for payment of their civil debts and judgments entered against them. Such an immunity would not have been needed, though, in the case of a poor Militiaman, because the firearm he possessed was public, not private, property held by him for a public purpose, and therefore could not have been taken by some private party in order to satisfy a private claim.

3. Whether expressed in so many words, or merely implied by the absence of any explicit exception, the qualification "at all times" in these enactments pointed up the importance to Virginia's legislators of her Militiamen's continuous personal possession of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements. For all of these statutes went far beyond the immunity "from arrests in civil cases" and other legal exposure that some of them afforded to the "persons" of Militiamen in relation to musters, courts-martial, and other actual service in the field.[762] Self-evidently, the General Assembly believed that Virginia should promote, not only the widespread availability of firearms and ammunition through the free market, and not only the private ownership of arms by as many individuals as could afford them, but also the permanent personal possession of arms in all circumstances by the largest number of adult, able-bodied male residents possible. Because, whatever the ultimate locus of title, individuals' actual possession of firearms and ammunition always serves a critical public purpose—indeed, the ultimate public purpose, "the security of a free State". Revealingly, the earliest statute in this group, in 1645, emphasized just how important Virginia considered its inhabitants' "armes" and "ammunition", by grouping them with "corn for present subsistence" as items "except[ed] * * * from the rigor of exec'n." Along with food, arms were deemed the very stuff of life itself. Indeed, they were considered more precious even than food, as the later statutes did not exempt from seizure any of the materials of "present subsistence" (perhaps on the tacit understanding that a man with a gun could always acquire food).

---

[762] See post, at 717-724.

C. Militiamen's firearms usually stored in their own homes. Further evidence that the vast majority of Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militiamen personally possessed their firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements at all times is that nowhere in the relevant statutes of that period are most Militiamen ordered first to repair to some arsenal, magazine, or other public facility in order to retrieve their arms, and then to return those arms to such a place after they had performed their service. Of course, some exceptional cases existed.[763] But that these had to be spelled out at all proves the general rule to have been quite the opposite.

1. In most instances, Virginia commanded her Militiamen themselves to maintain possession of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements in their own homes; to keep all of that equipment in good working order; and to assume full personal responsibility for appearing with it for training, musters, and actual service in the field. Thus:

> • [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service * * * , and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte."{EN-1151}
>
> • [1624 and 1632] "That no man go or send abroad without a sufficient partie will armed"; and "That men go not to worke in the ground without their arms (and a centinell upon them.)"{EN-1152}
>
> • [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church * * * , yf the mayster allow not * * * the servants to be punished."{EN-1153}
>
> • [1643] "[T]hat masters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott * * * , and servants being commanded and yet omitting shall receive twenty lashes[.]"{EN-1154}
>
> • [1672] "[A]s against all tymes of danger it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service[.]"{EN-1155}
>
> • [1684] "[E]very trooper * * * shall furnish and supply himself with a good able horse * * * and all arms and furniture, fitt and compleat for a trooper, and that every foot soldier, shall furnish and supply himselfe, with a sword, musquet and other furniture fitt for a soldier, and that each trooper and foot souldier, be provided with two pounds of powder, and eight pounds of shott, and shall continually keep their armes well fixt, cleane and fitt for * * * service."{EN-1156}

---

[763] See post, at 486-489.

• [1705] "[I]f any overseer * * * exempted from being listed shall appear at any muster * * * , he shall appear in arms fit for exercise, and shall perform his duty as other private soldiers do[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he persons of a councellor, of a speaker of the house of burgesses, of a justice of the peace, of an attorney-general, and of a captain or an higher officer in the militia, are exempted from being listed and serving either in horse or foot under command as the rest of the militia do, merely for the dignity of the office * * * , and that notwithstanding * * * all and every such person or persons, and also the clerk of the councill, the clerk of the general court, and every county court clerk shall provide and keep * * * at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition * * * , and to produce or cause the same to be produced in the county where they respectively reside yearly, and every year at the general muster * * * .

"And in case of any rebellion or invasion shall also be obliged to appear * * * and serve in such stations as are suitable for gentlemen[.]

* * * * *

" * * * That every ffoot soldier be provided with a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed, a good sword and cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and appear constantly with the same at * * * muster and exercise, and that besides those each foot soldier have at his place of abode two pounds of powder and eight pounds of shott, and bring the same into the field with him when * * * required, and that every soldier belonging to the horse be provided with a good serviceable horse, * * * a case of good pistolls well fixed, * * * double cartouch box, and twelve charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * to muster and exercise, and that besides those each soldier belonging to the horse have at his usuall place of abode a well fixed carabine, * * * two pounds of powder and eight pounds of shott, and bring the same into the ffield with him, when * * * required.

* * * * *

" * * * That eighteen months time be * * * allowed to each trouper and ffoot soldier * * * to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition [.]"{EN-1157}

• [1723] "That every soldier belonging to the horse, be provided with a good serviceable horse, * * * and a case of pistols, cutting sword, or cutlace, and double cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise; and shall keep at his place of abode, a well fixed carbine * * * , one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot, and bring the same into the field with him when * * * required. And that every foot soldier be provided with a firelock, musquet, or fuzee, well fixed, and bayonet fitted to such musquet or fuzee, or a good cutting sword or cutlace, a cartouch box, and three charges of powder, and appear constantly with the same * * * for muster and exercise; and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot, and bring the same into the field with him, when * * * required.

* * * * *

" * * * That eighteen months time be * * * allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * So as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters with such arms as he is already furnished with."{EN-1158}

• [1738] "[E]very person * * * listed [in the Militia], (except free mulattos, negros and Indians,) * * * shall be armed and accoutred in manner following: * * * Every horse-man shall be furnished with a serviceable horse, * * * carbine or fuzee, * * * a case of pistols, cutting sword or cutlass, double cartouch-box, and six charges of powder; and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise; and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball, and bring the same into the field with him, when * * * required. And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock, musket, or fuzee, well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, or a cutting sword or cutlass, a cartouch-box, and three charges of powder; and appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise * * * ; and shall also keep at his house, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball; and bring the same into the field, when * * * required.

* * * * *

" * * * And further, it shall and may be lawful, for the chief officer of the militia, in every county, to order all persons listed * * * to go armed to their respective parish churches * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * That eighteen months time be * * * allowed to each soldier to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition, * * * so as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters, with such arms as he is already furnished with."{EN-1159}

• [1748, 1753, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[E]very soldier who shall be summoned to appear, upon any such occasion" of invasion or insurrection shall "bring with him his arms and accoutrements, together with one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball[.]"{EN-1160}

• [1755] "[E]very person * * * inlisted [in the Militia], (except the people commonly called Quakers, free Mulattoes, negroes and Indians) and placed or ranked in the horse or foot, shall be armed and accoutred in the manner following, that is to say; every horseman shall be furnished with a serviceable horse, * * * carbine * * * , a case of pistols, cutting sword, double cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise, and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same into the field with him when * * * required: And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a cutting sword, a double cartouch box, and three charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise * * * , and shall also keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same with him into the field when * * * required.

* * * * *

" * * * And every captain shall have the power to appoint a clerk to his troop or company, * * * and such clerk shall be exempted from mustering but shall appear with arms at all * * * musters. And, further, it shall and may be lawful, for the * * * chief officer of the militia in the county, to order all soldiers listed therein, to go armed to their respective parish churches.

* * * * *

" * * * That twelve months time be * * * allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and amunition, * * * so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with[.]"{EN-1161}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[E]very person * * * inlisted [in the Militia] (except free mulattoes, negroes, and Indians) shall be armed in the manner following, that is to say: Every soldier shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a double cartouch-box, and three charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise, and shall also keep at his place of abode one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same with him into the field when * * * required[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very captain shall have power to appoint a clerk to his company, * * * and such clerk * * * shall be exempted from mustering, but shall appear with arms, and powder, and ball * * * at all such musters: And further, it shall and may be lawful for the * * * chief officer of the militia in the county, to order all soldiers inlisted therein to go armed to their respective parish churches.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]welve months shall be * * * allowed to each soldier, not already inlisted, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * , so as such soldier do appear at all musters during the said twelve months with such arms as he hath and is already furnished with[.]"{EN-1162}

• [1762] "[E]very person * * * exempted [from regular Militia duty] shall always keep in his house or place of abode such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition * * * and shall then be incorporated with * * * the other militia[.]"{EN-1163}

• [1766 and 1771] "[E]very person so exempted (not being a Quaker) shall always keep in his house or place of abode, such arms, accoutrements and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition * * * and shall then be incorporated with * * * the other militia[.]"{EN-1164}

• [1775] "[E]ach minute-man * * * shall be furnished with proper arms at the publick expense, and until such can be provided shall bring into service the best gun that he can procure[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very militia man * * * shall furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise with a * * * common firelock, bayonet, pouch, or cartouch box, three charges of powder and ball, and appear with the same * * * for mustering, and shall constantly keep by him one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer.

* * * * *

" * * * And the * * * chief officer of the militia, shall and may order the other officers and soldiers under him to go armed to their parish churches on Sundays, and to other licensed meeting-houses, whenever he judges it necessary.

* * * * *

" * * * [The soldiers shall be allowed six months after enlisting to provide themselves with arms, and in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have[.]"{EN-1165}

• [1777] "Every officer and soldier [in the Militia] shall appear at his * * * muster-field * * * armed and accoutred as follows: * * * every captain and lieutenant with a firelock and bayonet, a cartouch box, a sword, and three charges of powder and ball; * * * every non-commissioned officer and private with a rifle and tomahawk, or good firelock and bayonet, with a pouch and horn, or a cartouch or cartridge box, and with three charges of powder and ball; and, moreover, each of the said officers and soldiers shall constantly keep one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer.

* * * * *

" * * * Every officer and soldier shall be allowed six months after his appointment or enrollment to provide such arms or accoutrements as he had not at the time."{EN-1166}

• [1784 and 1785] "Every officer and soldier [in the Militia] shall appear at his respective muster-field * * * , armed, equipped, and accoutred, as follows: * * * the captains, lieutenants, and ensigns, with a > sword and espontoon; every non-commissioned officer and private, with a good clean musket, carrying an ounce ball, and three feet eight inches long in the barrel, with a good bayonet and iron ramrod well fitted thereto, a cartridge box properly made, to contain and secure twenty cartridges fitted to his musket * * * ; and moreover, every non-commissioned officer and private shall have at every muster, one pound of good powder and four pounds of lead; including twenty blind cartridges; * * * provided, that the militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining thereto, shall not be obliged to be armed with muskets, but may have good rifles with proper accoutrements in lieu thereof.

>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]welve months * * * shall be allowed for providing the arms and accoutrements * * * ;[764] but in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them the best arms and accoutrements they can get."{EN-1167}

2. Implicitly or explicitly, Virginia's statutes also specified, not only who should appear for Militia service with firearms, but who should not:

> • [1723] "[S]uch free Negros, Mulattos, or Indians, as are capable, may be listed and emploied as drummers or trumpeters: And that upon any invasion, insurrection, or rebellion, all free Negros, Mulattos, or Indians, shall be obliged to attend and march with the Militia, and to do the duty of pioneers, or such other servile labour as they shall be directed to perform."{EN-1168}
>
> • [1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[A]ll such free mulattos, negros, or Indians, as are or shall be listed [in the Militia] * * * shall appear without arms; and may be emploied as drummers, trumpeters, or pioneers, or in such other servile labour, as they shall be directed to perform."{EN-1169}
>
> • [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years" (with certain exceptions) "shall * * * be enrolled or formed into companies [within the Militia] * * * . The free mulattoes in the said companies * * * shall be employed as drummers, fifers, or pioneers."{EN-1170}

3. Virginia would hardly have needed to repeat these statutory commands, again and again throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, if—rather than being held in the personal possession of her Militiamen themselves—all or even most firearms and ammunition actually used for Militia service had been sequestered, unavailable for any other purpose, in public arsenals and magazines.

---

[764] The Act of 1785 allowed for two years in this regard.

a. Had that been the case, at least one sufficient arsenal or magazine would have been established in every County, as well as the City of Williamsburg and the Borough of Norfolk—because Virginia organized her Militia primarily on a County basis, and quick access to arms in the Locales subject to danger was always imperative. For example:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, and 1753] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any insurrection or invasion, shall have full power and authority * * * forthwith to raise the militia under his command, * * * and shall, in the mean time, keep the militia * * * under arms, until he receives orders[.]"{EN-1171}
>
> • [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any invasion or insurrection, shall raise the militia under his command * * * and shall moreover immediately proceed to oppose the enemy according to the orders he shall receive from his chief commanding officer[.]"{EN-1172}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "If a sudden invasion shall be made into any county of this commonwealth, or in case of an insurrection in any county, the county lieutenant is * * * required to order out the whole, or such part of his militia as he may think necessary, and in such manner as he may think best, for repelling or suppressing such invasion or insurrection, and shall call on the * * * commanding officers of the adjacent counties for such aid as he may think necessary, who shall forthwith in like manner furnish the same."{EN-1173}

Self-evidently, the Militia could not have been "order[ed] out * * * for repelling or suppressing s[ome] invasion or insurrection" without arms in the Militiamen's hands. And if Militiamen's arms had largely been kept in public arsenals and magazines, those facilities would have had to have been conveniently located in every County, because transportation in those days was slow and uncertain. Necessarily, too, had the government established arsenals and magazines throughout Virginia, numerous public officials would have had to have been appointed to administer them; to supervise the distribution of firearms to, and collection of those firearms from, members of the Militia in the course of their performance of their duties; and to maintain appropriate records and exercise other administrative controls.

Yet no systematic statutory scheme was ever set up to provide any such extensive facilities, numerous personnel, or comprehensive procedures. Instead, dispersal of public arms was often effected on a catch-as-catch-can basis. For instance, in 1705, the Governor and his Council determined that > can be expected to be sold as was intended * * * it will be very effectuall for the preservation of the arms from being spoiled by rust * * * & be also very serviceable to the Country that y^e^ same be dispersed through the several Countys in proportion to y^e^ number of Inhabitants and y^e^ wants of the said Countys that the said Arms be intrusted to the Commander in Cheif of the Militia of each County * * * who may be directed to distribute y^e^ same to * * * the Inferior Officers of the Militia * * * to be by them kept in good order and fitt for Service, and to be made use of only upon an Alarm. * * * That a proportionable quantity of Shott may be sent to every County * * * for the Service of the Militia and not to be used but ag^t^ an enemy. That the Powder be distributed throughout the several Countys * * * . That one half of the Powder * * * be kept for y^e^ supply of the County on any emergency, and the other half sold[.] {EN-1174}

> [w]hereas the Arms and Ammunition sent in by her Majesty for y^{e} Service of the Militia of this Country lyes now at James City and by y^{e} slow & inconsiderable sale * * * it is very improbable that any quantity

Then, following this counsel, in 1710 they ordered that "Collonel Robert Carter is impowered and desired to cause the arms lodged at his house for the use of the Northern Countys to be cleaned & fixed". {EN-1175} But in 1717, they ordered "[t]hat the Arms and Stores of War belonging to his Majesty which were dispersed through y^e^ several Countys * * * be called in and lodged in his Majesties Magazine at W^ms^burgh the same being in danger of becoming unserviceable for want of due care taken thereof". {EN-1176}

b. If firearms and ammunition for Militia service had been under the control of public officials, Militiamen would have had to have been instructed as to when, according to published schedules of regular musters and training, or under other circumstances, they were to have repaired to particular public arsenals or magazines in order to obtain their equipment. The statutes commanded, however, not that Militiamen should assemble at certain central locations where they would receive temporary custody of firearms and ammunition from public officials, but instead that they "shall provide and keep" that equipment "at their respective places of abode" (1705), and "keep by them the best arms and accoutrements they can get" (1784 and 1785). And the statutes ordered Militiamen, not simply to secrete their firearms and ammunition in the hidden recesses of their homes, but instead to "constantly appear with the[ir arms and ammunition] * * * for muster and exercise" (1705, 1723, 1738, 1755, and 1757 through 1771), "bring with" them their arms and accoutrements (1643, 1748 through 1772, and 1775), "appear at all musters with such arms as [they are] already furnished with" (1723, 1738, 1755, and 1757 through 1771), "bring into service the best gun[s they] can procure" (1775), "bring [firearms and ammunition] into the field with [them] when * * * required" (1705, 1723, 1738, 1755, and 1757 through 1771), and even "go armed to their respective parish churches" (1738, 1755, 1757 through 1771, and 1775).

Plainly, it would have been nonsensical for the statutes simply to have ordered Militiamen to "appear" with firearms with which they were "already furnished", or to "bring" firearms "with" them, unless all the men had actually possessed, as well as mostly owned, those very firearms in the first instance. If the firearms had been lodged originally in public arsenals, the statutes would have ordered Militiamen first to withdraw arms from the arsenals according to some procedure, and then simply to assemble at musters or for training. No need would have existed to command them also to "bring" the firearms "with" them, because that would have been the only allowable purpose for the release of the guns into the Militiamen's temporary possession in the first place. And "free mulattos, negros, or Indians, as are or shall be listed" in the Militia would not have had to have been ordered to "appear without arms" (1738 through 1771), because the custodians of the public arsenals and magazines would have known not to supply such persons with that equipment in any event. Moreover, the statutes would have set up some further procedures for the Militiamen's return of firearms and ammunition to the arsenals and magazines after musters, training, or other service in the field, in order to ensure that all of the firearms to be returned were returned. But such procedures—let alone the extensive facilities and numerous personnel necessary to implement them—being conspicuously absent throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, Virginia's plan was obviously for the vast majority of her Militiamen to maintain personal possession of their own firearms and ammunition in their own "place[s] of abode"—to bring that equipment along with themselves to Militia musters, training, and other service in the field—and then to return it to their own homes, where it would remain subject to their own control at all times.[765]

c. That Virginia's *pre-*constitutional statutes assigned to her Militiamen themselves the primary responsibility, not only for obtaining suitable firearms and ammunition in the first place, but also for maintaining that equipment in satisfactory working order at all times thereafter, provides further proof of who actually possessed those arms. Had the arms most Virginians used for Militia service reposed in public arsenals or magazines as a matter of course, the officials in charge of such facilities would have been responsible for the condition of the equipment, as well as for its mere presence, in their custody. Prudent legislators would have delegated the vital task of caretaking to qualified armorers, gunsmiths, and other operatives in the public employ sufficient in number to maintain in working order the many firearms reposed in public magazines if not also the few remaining in private hands. In fact, however, although during the *pre-*constitutional period Virginia did call upon private gunsmiths to repair firearms individuals employed for Militia and other military service, she never put into motion any large-scale, systematic effort to employ numerous public armorers even to maintain the relatively few firearms held in the public magazines.[766] Rather, throughout the [765] On the few exceptions to this rule, see post, at 486-495.

---

[766] See ante, at 446-451, and post, at 519-522.

1700s, only one armorer was regularly employed at the capital.[767] And only in 1775 did Virginia erect a public workshop for manufacturing firearms, which might also have attended to defective pieces brought in for repairs.[768]

Instead, from the Colony's earliest days—as in statutes enacted in 1672 and 1684—the rule in Virginia was that "it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service", and that Virginians themselves "shall continually keep their armes well fixt, cleane and fitt for * * * service".[769] The goal was to field a self-actuating, self-reliant, and self-sufficient armed force throughout the community. So the statutes required the Militiamen themselves to maintain "fixed and serviceable gun[s]" (1643)—and not just any working "gun[s]", but "arms fit for exercise" (1705)—and not "fit" for just any "exercise", but "musquet[s] and other furniture fitt for a soldier" (1684). Even Virginia's Minutemen of the 1770s and 1780s, who were generally the most highly trained and best equipped of all her Militiamen,{EN-1177} were often expected to provide their own firearms:

> • [1775] "[E]ach minute-man * * * shall be furnished with proper arms at the publick expense, and until such can be provided shall bring into service the best gun he can procure; and for every good rifle, to be approved by the respective captains, there shall be allowed to the owner making use of the same at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]"{EN-1178}
>
> • [1775] "[E]ach minute-man who shall furnish himself with a good musket, or other gun, to be approved of by his captain, shall be allowed by the publick ten shillings per annum, as a consideration for the use thereof[.]"{EN-1179}

True enough, ultimately his Captain had to "approve[ ]" the firearm a Minuteman "furnished"; yet the initial responsibility for seeing to it that the "rifle", "musket, or other gun" was in fact "good"—in design, workmanship, repair, and suitability for service—was each Minuteman's own. Self-evidently, Virginia's legislators would never have assigned to her Militiamen the responsibility for keeping their firearms "fixed and serviceable", "fit for exercise", and "fitt for a soldier"—let alone for ascertaining in the first instance whether those arms were "good" enough to be "approved" for service—if the men had not also been required personally to possess those arms, and had not been presumed to have the attitudes, knowledge, and skills necessary to maintain their equipment in good working order at all times.

D. Inspections to insure that Militiamen actually possessed the requisite arms. Compliance with the statutory requirement that each Militiaman should

---

[767] See ante, at 450.

[768] See ante, at 456, and post, at 521.

[769] Quoted and cited ante, at 463.

personally possess a firearm both suitable and properly maintained for service was not left to chance, either. If "as against all tymes of danger it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service,"{EN-1180} eventually someone in authority with appropriate expertise needed to verify that such was the case. So, from the earliest days, investigatory procedures were adopted in order to ascertain the facts.

1. Early inquiries were conducted to determine who stood in need of armaments, and to remedy any deficiencies that were discovered:

> • [1632] "That the comanders of all the severall plantations, doe upon holy days exercise the men under his comand, and that the comanders yearlie doe likewise uppon the first day of December, take a muster of theire men, * * * as also of armes and munition[.]"{EN-1181}

> • [1673 and 1676] "FOR the better supply of the country with armes and ammunition, Be it enacted * * * , that the captaines of ffoote and horse in each county doe take a strict and perticuler account of what armes and ammunition are wanting * * * And * * * the perticuler county courts be * * * impowred * * * to lay and raise a levy for the provideing of armes and ammunition for supplying the wants aforesaid, that is to say, muskitts and swords for the ffoot, and pistolls, swords and carbines for horse, as alsoe for every lysted souldier at the least two pounds of powder and six pounds of shott, the said armes and ammunition * * * to remaine in the hands of the officers of the militia for them to dispose of the same as there shalbe occasion; and that those to whome distribution of armes and ammunition shalbe made doe pay for the same at a reasonable rate[.]"{EN-1182}

> • [1702] Aware that "since y^{e} last returns of y^{e} Melitia Lists there has been great quantity of armes and ammunition brought into this Country", the Governor ordered the "Commanders in chief to * * * cause strict and dillig^{t} inquiery to be made what armes and ammunition are at present in their respective Countys and in whose custody".{EN-1183}

The evident purpose of this exercise was to put arms into individual Virginians' private ownership and possession. For, had the firearms and ammunition been intended to remain public property stored in armories or magazines, they would not have been subject to "distribution" and the recipients required to "pay for the same at a reasonable rate"; and public officials would always have known "in whose custody" the arms were lodged.

2. Regular, formal inquiries invariably took place at Militia musters. These were intended, not to assist men in acquiring firearms, but to compel that acquisition, by determining which Militiamen were not in actual compliance with the laws, and punishing them for their derelictions of duty.

a. All of Virginia's Militia statutes provided for general investigations of "defaults"—into which category fell a Militiaman's failure personally to possess firearms and ammunition under various circumstances:

> • [1705 and 1723] "[T]o the end no wilfull and obstinate defaulter or offender * * * may escape the penalty * * * for his default or offence, * * * all captains of troops and foot companies * * * be required * * * at every muster * * * to take * * * an exact account in writing of every * * * default or offence made or committed in his troop or company, by whom the default or offence was made or done, and at what time[.]"
>
> Perhaps the most serious "default or offence" was when a Militiaman "shall not be furnished and provided with arms and ammunition * * * for muster and exercise, or shall not keep at his place of abode what * * * he is directed there to have and [shall not] bring into field with him all and singular the arms and ammunition * * * when thereunto specially required". For, not being properly "furnished and provided, he could not perform a Militiaman's most important function.{EN-1184}
>
> • [1723] The Act of 1705 had allowed "eighteen months time * * * to each trouper and ffoot soldier * * * to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition" before he was subject to a fine. But the Act of 1723 qualified this immunity with the requirement "[s]o as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters with such arms as he is already furnished with".{EN-1185} Having every man armed, to whatever degree was possible, was so important that all usable arms in private hands—whatever their shortcomings—were to be mobilized.
>
> • [1738] To ensure that all Militiamen were "furnished" with the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements statutorily required, "every captain * * * shall duly make a list of all the persons upon his muster-roll, who * * * do not appear at any of the * * * musters, armed and accoutred, as * * * is directed[.]"
>
> Again, the main goal was to compel compliance by penalizing "[e]very person listed to serve in the horse * * * [a]nd every person listed in the foot * * * , for not appearing at muster, compleatly armed and accoutred".
>
> A related default occurred when a Militiaman, during the first eighteen months of his service, failed both "to furnish and provide himself with" and "hav[e] * * * at his place of abode" the specific "arms and ammunition" the statute mandated, and to "appear at all musters, with such [other] arms as he is already furnished with."
>
> Yet another penalty applied to "every person ordered to go to church armed, failing to do his duty therein".{EN-1186}

• [1748, 1753, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[U]pon occasion of any invasion or insurrection * * * every [Militiaman] who shall be summoned to appear * * * shall * * * bring with him his arms and accoutrements, together with one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball", or be severely fined.{EN-1187} Presumably, in serious situations of this kind, Militia officers paid special attention to who within their units failed to appear at all, or to bring with him the full panoply of required equipment.

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[E]very captain * * * shall duly make a list of all the persons upon his muster-roll, who * * * do not appear at any of the * * * musters armed and accoutred[.]"

One serious default occurred whenever any "person inlisted to serve in the horse, appear[ed] at muster without a * * * carbine * * * , a case of pistols * * * , and six charges of powder and ball"; or when any "person listed to serve in the foot, appear[ed] at such muster without a firelock well fixed, and a bayonet fitted to the same, * * * and three charges of powder and ball".

Another offense involved Militiamen who failed or refused "to go armed to their respective parish churches" when ordered by a "chief officer of the militia in the county".

Wrongdoing was also assignable to a Militiamen who, during his first "twelve months" of service, failed both "to furnish and provide himself with" and "hav[e] * * * at his place of abode" the specific "arms and amunition" required by the statute, and to "appear at all musters * * * with such [other] arms as he hath, and is already furnished with".{EN-1188}

• [1775] "[E]very captain * * * shall make return of all delinquencies in his company, either at general or private musters * * * ; and the better to enable him so to do, the senior sergeant * * * shall act as a clerk, and call over the roll at each muster."

And following the by then long-familiar pattern, one serious default occurred for "every soldier, not appearing, or appearing without proper arms, * * * or for not bringing with him three charges of powder and ball, * * * or failing to bring into the field, when required by his commanding officer, one pound of powder, and five pounds of ball". Another offense involved Militiamen who failed or refused "to go armed to their parish churches on Sundays, and to any licensed meeting-houses", whenever any "chief officer[ ] of the militia" "judged it necessary".{EN-1189}

• [1777] "Each captain shall, at every muster, * * * note down the delinquencies occurring in his company", which included any Militiaman's "failing to appear at any general or private muster, properly armed or accoutred", and "failing to furnish himself with one pound of powder" and "four pounds of ball"—although, as an accommodation to the economic stringencies of the time, "[e]very officer and soldier shall be allowed six months after his appointment or enrollment to provide such arms or accoutrements as he had not at the time".{EN-1190}

• [1780] "[E]very captain appointed to command such part of the * * * militia as are * * * directed to hold themselves in readiness, shall once in every fortnight call them together at some convenient place within their respective counties, * * * for the purpose of inspecting and examining * * * their arms, ammunition, and accoutrements."{EN-1191}

• [1784 and 1785] "At every muster, each captain * * * shall call his roll, examine every person belonging thereto, and note down all delinquencies occurring therein[.]"

As throughout the pre-constitutional period, the quintessential violation to be uncovered was whether any officer or soldier "fail[ed] to attend at any muster, with the arms, ammunition, and equipments, as directed by" these statutes. This list was extensive, including (for rank-and-file Militiamen): "a good clean musket, carrying an ounce ball, and three feet eight inches long in the barrel, with a good bayonet and iron ramrod well fitted thereto, a cartridge box properly made, to contain and secure twenty cartridges fitted to his musket * * * ; and moreover, * * * at every muster, one pound of good powder and four pounds of lead; including twenty blind cartridges; * * * provided, that the militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining thereto, shall not be obliged to be armed with muskets, but may have good rifles with proper accoutrements in lieu thereof." Nonetheless, scrutiny might also be given as to whether a Militiaman had any available arms, of any type or quality, at all—because the Acts provided "[t]hat twelve months * * * be allowed for providing the arms and accoutrements [t]herein directed; but in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them the best arms and accoutrements they can get".{EN-1192}

b. Investigations on this score could amount to highly particularized inquisitions, not only as to the existence of arms, but also as to their suitability for Militia service:

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "That twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition, * * * and that no soldier be fined for appearing without, or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been inlisted twelve months, * * * so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with: And if any soldier shall appear at any muster not armed and accoutred, * * * the captain * * * [may] examine such soldier upon oath, whether he hath any, and what arms and ammunition he really hath of his own property, and if on such examination it shall appear, that such soldier hath any arms or ammunition of his own property, and hath not brought the same, or so much thereof as th[e statutes] require[ ], he shall be liable to * * * penalties * * * , although he hath not been inlisted twelve months[.]"{EN-1193}

• [1784 and 1785] "Every captain * * * of a company shall, within ten days after every regimental and general muster, make up and report * * * a return of his company, including all arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, by th[e statutes] directed, distinguishing effective and good from non-effective and bad[.]"{EN-1194} No such "return" could have been made unless the Captain had closely examined the state of the equipment his men brought to the muster.

Obviously, though, if most Militiamen had not been required to maintain personal possession of their own firearms and ammunition, but instead had been expected to obtain their equipment on temporary loan from some public armory or magazine only when called into actual service, inquiries at musters directed towards "what arms and ammunition [any Militiaman] really hath of his own property" would have been pointless. If a man appeared for duty without a firearm or ammunition, the fault more likely than not would have been traceable to the custodian of some public armory or magazine who should have supplied the equipment, and in any event would not have been correctable by grilling the defaulter about what firearms (if any) he himself owned. Conceivably, a defaulter might simply have failed, through sloth, to repair to the armory on time. But then the proper order from his Captain would have been to do so; and the statutes would have directed as much.

3. Besides through regular and searching inquiries at musters, Militiamen's constant personal possession of firearms and ammunition was subject to verification by special requirements that the equipment be produced for inspection, be brought into the field, and be made available for "spot checks" at any time:

• [1705] "[T]he persons of a councellor, of a speaker of the house of burgesses, of a justice of the peace, of an attorney-general, and of a captain or an higher officer in the militia, are exempted from being listed and serving either in horse or foot under command as the rest of the militia do, merely for the dignity of the office * * * , and that notwithstanding * * * all and every such person or persons, and also the clerk of the councill, the clerk of the general court, and every county court clerk * * * are * * * required and enjoyned to provide and keep at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition * * * , and to produce or cause the same to be produced in the county where they respectively reside yearly, and every year at the generall muster * * * to the * * * chief officer present[.]" And an ordinary Militiaman would be fined if he failed to "bring into the field with him all and singular the arms and ammunition directed by th[e statute] * * * when thereunto specially required".{EN-1195}

> • [1723] Every Militiaman was enjoined to "bring [all of his arms and ammunition] into the field with him, when thereunto specially required".{EN-1196}
>
> • [1738] Every Militiaman was ordered to "bring [his arms and ammunition] into the field, when he shall be required".{EN-1197}
>
> • [1755] Every Militiaman was ordered to "bring [his arms and ammunition] into the field with him when thereunto required".{EN-1198}
>
> • [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] Every Militiaman was ordered to "bring [his arms and ammunition] with him into the field when he shall be required".{EN-1199}
>
> • [1775] "[E]very militia man * * * shall furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise with a * * * common firelock, bayonet, pouch, or cartouch box, three charges of powder and ball, and appear with the same * * * for mustering, and shall constantly keep by him one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, to be produced whenever called for by his commanding-officer."{EN-1200}
>
> • [1777] "[E]ach of the * * * officers and soldiers shall constantly keep one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer."{EN-1201}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "Every officer and soldier [in the Militia] shall appear at his respective muster-field * * * armed, equipped, and accoutred * * * . And every of the said officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, shall constantly keep the[ir] * * * arms, accoutrements and ammunition ready to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer."{EN-1202}

Self-evidently, if the typical Militiamen's firearms and ammunition had been locked away in public armories and magazines, it would have been utterly ridiculous for these statutes to have commanded, for example, that "every of the said officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates * * * constantly keep the[ir] * * * arms, accoutrements and ammunition ready to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer", or "bring [his arms and ammunition] into the field, when he shall be required"—because, most of the time, "his commanding officer" would always have known exactly where every Militiaman's arms were, and could himself have verified their status en masse at any time simply by consulting the keeper of the magazine. (Presumably, the statutes also applied when a Militiaman turned out for actual service in the field. Then, however, he was likely to be in the very presence of, or close by, his "commanding officer".) So, that the statutes required every Militiaman himself to "produce[ ]" his arms "whenever called for" or "required", proves that the law intended for each man to maintain personal possession of his arms at all times.

4. These statutes, furthermore, were not paper tigers. Rather, from the earliest days, the Governor and his Council took steps to see to their enforcement. For example:

> • [1684] "[O]rdered, that Letters be writt unto the militia officers of every respective County forthwith to render to his Excellency y^{e} condition of their militia, what number they consist of, both horse and foot, as likewise how furnished with armes[.]"{EN-1203}
>
> • [1690] "Ord^{r}d that the Respective Comand^{rs} in Cheife, doe * * * return an account * * * of the Severall Captaines of Horse and Foot, and the Number of Souldi^{rs} under every of their Comands, and how furnished[.]"{EN-1204}
>
> • [1691] "[T]he respective Cap^{ts} of Horse, Dragoones and foot * * * to return * * * an Exact List of the Names of the Souldiers under their Comand, how armed, and * * * that they take all possible Care the Souldiers under their comands be furnished with Horses Armes and Amunition according to Law[.]"{EN-1205}
>
> • [1695] "Ordred the Severall Comanders in Cheife of this Colony to Inspect the State of the Militia and to se how Armed & to returne account thereof."{EN-1206}
>
> • [1701] "[R]equire[d] all & Every y^{e} Colls and Comand^{rs} in Cheife of Each and Every County * * * Imediately to Issue out orders to y^{e} sev^{ll} officers und^{r} their Command to return a true and perfect List of y^{e} sev^{11} troops of horse & Companies of foot under their respective Commands, & how & in what they are fitted & Equipt wth Armes an Amunition Setting the same down in Distinct Columns[.]"{EN-1207}
>
> • [1703] The commanders in chief of the Militia in each County were "to cause dilligent enquiry to be made & an exact acco^{t} taken of all arms, Powder and Shott within their respective Countys, and of what quality the said arms are".{EN-1208}
>
> • [1706] "[T]he Chiefe officer of the Militia residing in each County do forthwith give notice to y^{e} respective Troops & Companys under their Command * * * that all persons serving in the militia be in areadiness with arms and ammunitions, and provisions to march for y^{e} defense of the Country."{EN-1209}
>
> • [1706] "[T]he late [statute] for settling the militia [in 1705] having strictly enjoyned all persons to provide armes on a certain penalty, the due execution of that Law will oblige people to be more diligent in purchasing."{EN-1210}
>
> • [1709] "Ordered that the Commanders in Cheif of the Militia * * * appoint Masters of the Militia * * * for training & exerciseing the Soldiers and that they take particular Care that the said Soldiers be provided with arms and ammunition according to Law & have their arms constantly well fixed & themselves in a readiness to draw together on an hours warning, hereby strictly chargeing all the said Officers to take particular notice of any person who on this Occasion shall prove deficient in their duty that they may be punished according to Law[.]"{EN-1211}

• [1711] "That a General Muster of the Militia of each County be forthwith appointed and an exact account taken how they are armed & provided with ammunition."{EN-1212}

E. Fines imposed on Militiamen who did not possess the necessary arms. Additional evidence that most Militiamen personally possessed firearms and ammunition even when not actually at musters, in training, or in the field appears in the elaborate scheme of fines Virginia's statutes imposed on men who were discovered to have defaulted on any part of that obligation.

1. The statutes extended over a long period of time and were mutually consistent in substance:

• [1705] "[T]he persons of a councellor, of a speaker of the house of burgesses, of a justice of the peace, of an attorney-general, and of a captain or an higher officer in the militia, are exempted from being listed and serving * * * , and that notwithstanding * * * all and every such person or persons, and also the clerk of the councill, the clerk of the general court, and every county court clerk shall provide and keep * * * at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition * * * , and to produce or cause the same to be produced in the county where they respectively reside yearly, and every year at the generall muster * * * , upon pain of forfeiting for every neglect * * * twenty shillings current money of Virginia.

* * * * *

" * * * That every ffoot soldier be provided with a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed, a good sword and cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and appear constantly with the same * * * for muster and exercise, and that besides these each foot soldier have at his place of abode two pounds of powder and eight pounds of shott, and bring the same into the field with him when thereunto specially required, and that every soldier belonging to the horse be provided with a good * * * horse, * * * a case of good pistolls well fixed, sword and double cartouch box, and twelve charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * to muster and exercise, and that besides those each soldier belonging to the horse have at his usual place of abode a well fixed carbine, * * * two pounds of powder, and eight pounds of shott, and bring the same into the ffield with him when thereunto specially required.

" * * * [W]hatsoever trooper or ffoot soldier * * * shall not be furnished and provided with arms and ammunition * * * for muster and exercise, or shall not keep at his place of abode what * * * he is directed there to have and bring into field with him all and singular the arms and ammunition * * * when thereunto specially required, such trooper or ffoot soldier shall for his neglect in any of the premises, be fined one hundred pounds of tobacco, every time he is * * * to appear."{EN-1213}

• [1723] "That every soldier belonging to the horse, be provided with a good * * * horse, * * * a case of pistols, cutting sword, or cutlace, and double cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise; and shall keep at his pace of abode, a well fixed carbine, * * * one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot, and bring the same into the field with him when thereunto specially required. And that every foot soldier be provided with a firelock, musquet, or fuzee, well fixed, and bayonet fitted to such the musquet or fuzee, * * * a cartouch box, and three charges of powder, and appear constantly with the same, at * * * muster and exercise; and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot, and bring the same into the field with him, when thereunto specially required.

" * * * [W]hatsoever soldier * * * shall not be furnished and provided with arms and ammunition * * * for muster and exercise, or shall not keep at his place of abode, what * * * he is directed, such soldier, for every such failure, shall be fined one hundred pounds of tobacco.

" * * * [T]hat no soldier be fined for appearing without [arms and ammunition], or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been listed eighteen months * * * —So as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters with such arms as he is already furnished with."{EN-1214}

• [1738] "Every horse-man shall be furnished with a serviceable horse, * * * carbine or fuzee, * * * a case of pistols, cutting sword or cutlass, double cartouch-box, and six charges of powder; and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise; and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball, and bring the same into the field with him, when thereunto required. And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock, musket, or fuzee, well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, * * * a cartouch-box, and three charges of powder; and appear with the same at * * * muster and exercise * * * ; and shall also keep at his house, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball; and bring the same into the field, when he shall be required.

* * * * *

" * * * Every person listed to serve in the horse, shall pay seven shillings and six pence, or seventy five pounds of tobacco: And every person listed in the foot, shall pay five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, at their election, for not appearing at muster, compleatly armed and accoutred * * * .

" * * * [T]hat no soldier be fined for appearing without [arms and ammunition], or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been listed eighteen months * * * so as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters, with such arms as he is already furnished with. .

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person ordered to go to church armed, failing to do his duty therein, shall pay five shillings."{EN-1215}

• [1748, 1753, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[E]very [Militiaman] who shall be summoned to appear [upon an invasion or insurrection]* * * and shall fail so to do, or shall fail to bring with him his arms and accoutrements, together with one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball, shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds[.]"{EN-1216}

• [1755] "[E]very horseman shall be furnished with a serviceable horse, * * * carbine * * * , a case of pistols, cutting sword, double cartouch box, and six charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise, and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same into the field with him when thereunto required: And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a cutting sword, a double cartouch box, and three charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same, * * * for muster and exercise * * * , and shall also keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same with him into the field when he shall be required.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person inlisted to serve in the horse, appearing without a serviceable horse, * * * carbine * * * , a case of pistols, cutting-sword, double cartouch boxes, and six charges of powder and ball shall pay five shillings, for every such failure; and every person listed to serve in the foot, appearing at such muster without a firelock well fixed, and a bayonet fitted to the same, * * * a cutting-sword, a double cartouch-box, and three charges of powder and ball shall pay three shillings, for every such failure; * * * every soldier ordered to go armed to church, neglecting to do so, shall pay five shillings, for every such failure[.]

* * * * *

" * * * That twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition, * * * and that no soldier be fined for appearing without, or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been inlisted twelve months, * * * so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with[.]"{EN-1217}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "Every soldier shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a double cartouch-box, and three charges of powder, and constantly appear with the same * * * for muster and exercise, and shall also keep at his place of abode one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, and bring the same with him into the field when he shall be required[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very soldier appearing at muster without a firelock well fixed, and a bayonet fitter to the same, shall pay three shillings for every such failure, and for appearing at muster without a double cartouch-box shall pay one shilling, and without three charges of powder shall pay two shillings for every such failure * * * . Every soldier ordered to go armed to church neglecting to do so shall pay five shillings for every such failure[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]welve months shall be given and allowed to each soldier, not already inlisted, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition according to the directions of this act, * * * so as such soldier do appear at all musters during the said twelve months with such arms as he hath and is already furnished with[.]"{EN-1218}

•[1762, 1766, and 1771] "[E]very person * * * exempted [from regular Militia duty by these statutes, other than Quakers,] shall always keep in his house or place of abode such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia of this colony; and if he shall fail or refuse so to do he shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition * * * , and shall be incorporated with, and be subject to the same * * * fines, forfeitures and penalties, for non-appearance * * * as the other militia[.]"{EN-1219}

•[1775] "[E]very [regular] soldier or minute-man failing to appear, and not bringing with him his arms, shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very militia man * * * enlisted shall furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise with a * * * common firelock, bayonet, pouch, or cartouch box, three charges of powder and ball, and appear with the same * * * for mustering, and shall constantly keep by him one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, to be produced whenever called for by his commanding-officer.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very soldier [in the Militia] * * * appearing without proper arms, [shall forfeit and pay] five shillings; or for not bringing with him three charges of powder and ball, three shillings; or failing to bring into the field, when required by his commanding-officer, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball, five shillings.

* * * * *

> " * * * [T]he soldiers shall be allowed six months after enlisting to provide themselves with arms, and in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have, under the penalty of five shillings[.]"{EN-1220}
>
> • [1775] "[E]ach minute-man who shall furnish himself with a good musket, or other gun, to be approved of by his captain, shall be allowed by the publick ten shillings per annum, as a consideration for the use thereof, and shall be liable to a fine of twenty shillings for not appearing with the same when called on duty.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [O]verseers * * * shall be obliged to furnish themselves with arms and ammunition, in the same manner as militia men * * * ; and if any militia man, or overseer, shall neglect or refuse to do so, he or they * * * shall be liable to a fine of five shillings for every neglect or refusal[.]"{EN-1221}
>
> • [1777] "For failing to appear at any general or private muster, properly armed and accoutred, * * * every non-commissioned officer or soldier [shall pay] five shillings. * * * Every officer failing to furnish himself with one pound of powder shall forfeit and pay ten shillings, and the same for failing to furnish himself with four pounds of ball; and every soldier failing therein shall likewise be liable[.]"{EN-1222}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "By a non-commissioned officer or soldier, for failing to attend any muster, with the arms, ammunition, and equipments, as directed by th[e statute], he shall forfeit and pay ten shillings[.]"{EN-1223}

And that these statutes were not paper tigers, either, an order from the Governor and Council in 1736 evidences:

> [T]o the End all Persons oblig'd to serve in the Militia, and who ought to be furnished with Arms and Ammunition, as the Law directs, may no longer be excused from this necessary part of their Duty, * * * the County Lieutenant * * * in each County * * * do take care, that a Court Martial be appointed and held * * * and to cause to be fined, all Persons whatsoever, who shall have absented themselves from General or Private Musters, or shall have appeared there not Armed and Accoutred as the Act of Assembly doth direct and require.{EN-1224}

2. The pattern throughout these statutes is pellucid: They imposed fines on the vast majority of Militiamen if they failed: (i) to furnish and provide themselves with firearms and ammunition suitable for Militia service; (ii) to keep in their houses or places of abode such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition as were required, ready for use at all times; and (iii) to appear completely armed and accoutred with their equipment at musters, in training, or for other duty in the field—including such assignments as going armed to church. Even when the statutes granted a Militiaman an allowance of time in which to obtain the particular type of firearm the laws required, he nonetheless was liable to a fine if he did not "appear * * * with such arms as he is already furnished with" (1723, 1738, 1755, 1757 through 1771, and 1775), or if he "hath any arms or ammunition of his own property, and hath not brought the same" (1755 through 1771). Thus, the statutes' plain intent was that the typical Militiaman's appearance "compleatly armed and accoutred" depended upon his own acquisition and possession of that equipment; and such possession was not only personal but also permanent, by himself in his own home at all times.

Nowhere does this extensive body of pre-constitutional Militia laws with respect to fines even suggest that—let alone set out any procedures whereby—most Militiamen repaired to public armories or magazines to obtain the firearms and ammunition necessary for their service as that service arose; and then returned the equipment whence it came when their service ended. The typical Militiaman was never threatened with fines for (say) "not withdrawing firearms and ammunition from the public armory" when he should have done so—although a Militiaman entrusted with public arms could have been penalized for not returning that equipment after he had finished his particular service.[770] Rather, most Militiamen were fined for not keeping the requisite arms at their own places of abode.

Certainly it would have been unjust, as well as irrational, to fine a man (as all of these statutes did) for not keeping arms at his place of abode, if those arms were to be stored in some public armory instead; or to fine a man for not bringing with him to his Militia service the arms and accoutrements mandated by statute, if his ability to do so depended upon the coöperation of some public functionary who through bureaucratic punctiliousness, incompetence, or just plain individual pique or spite might have neglected, failed, or refused to make the equipment available. Conceivably, Militiamen directed to obtain their arms from public armories could have been justly punished if they had refused or neglected to follow those instructions. But the existence of such a punishment would have depended upon the availability of such a procedure, which Virginia's statutes nowhere evidenced.

And if the custodians of public arsenals or magazines had exercised determinative authority over when almost all of Virginia's Militiamen were granted access to publicly owned firearms and ammunition, the statutes would have explicitly enjoined those custodians to take care to arm Militiamen in full and on time, and imposed on those custodians fines the immensity of which would have been commensurate with the harm that might have been visited on the community by the custodians' failures to perform their duties. Yet, although the statutes overflowed with detailed specifications of fines for many other forms of misbehavior,[771] they never imposed a single shilling's penalty upon any such custodian—self-evidently because, even if such custodians existed here and there, they played no significant part in actually putting arms into most Militiamen's hands.

---

[770] The latter type of control did apply to some Militiamen, however. See post, at 489-490 and 492-494.

3. Furthermore, the statutory provisions for verification of Militiamen's possession of firearms and ammunition must have been rather broadly interpreted and applied. For example, statute after statute specified that every Militiaman should keep certain equipment "at his place of abode" or be fined for noncompliance.{EN-1225} Nevertheless, none of Virginia's statutes explicitly set out a procedure for house-by-house inspections of Militiamen's stores of arms, as Rhode Island's Militia laws did.[772] To be sure, regular inspections that occurred at musters and other service in the field, or ad hoc inspections incident on some special call-up, would have discovered what a Virginian who was required to appear actually possessed in his home, because that is what he would have brought with him. And if he brought nothing (or not enough), many of the statutes mandated that he could be interrogated "upon oath" about what he did possess.{EN-1226} Yet some Virginians were both exempted from the normal duty to muster and enjoined to maintain arms in their own homes, subject to fines if they failed to do so.{EN-1227} Plainly, these individuals' compliance with the requirement personally to possess firearms and ammunition in their homes could not have been enforced through their attendance at musters, because they were exempt from appearing. And although they were ordered to appear, armed and accoutred, "in case of any invasion or insurrection", the discovery of noncompliance at such a critical time would doubtlessly have proven too late for effective remedy. The Act of 1705 did require all such exempts "to produce or cause the[ir arms] to be produced in the county where they * * * reside[d] yearly, and every year at the generall muster".{EN-1228} But no such procedure appeared in later Militia statutes. So some practical measures, not specifically prescribed by statute, must have been put into operation to see to it that the men so exempted did possess the arms required of them. And if for them, then for others as well.

F. Public arms in Militiamen's possession. Many of *pre-*constitutional Virginia's regular soldiers did receive firearms and ammunition directly from the government, rather than through private purchases. And some of her Militiamen did, too. Yet, although those Militiamen did not own the arms they used, many of them often possessed those arms for long stretches of time.

1. During the *pre-*constitutional era, Virginians were fully aware of the legal distinction between public and private arms:

---

[771] See post, at 666-697.

[772] See ante, Chapter 8.

> • [1643] "VPON consideration * * * of the scarsity of powder and aminition in the plantation and the difficultie in procureing the same, It is thought fitt and enacted that the Governour * * * do allott a barrel of powder to each countie, to be kept and preserved * * * a publique stock, for which the comander of each county is to be responsible."{EN-1229}
>
> • [1714] "WHEREAS * * * queen Anne * * * bestow[ed] a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, for the service of this colony, which are in danger to be imbezzled and spoilt, for want of a convenient and proper place to keep them in.
>
> " * * * That * * * there shall be erected and finished one good substantial house of brick, which shall be called the magazine * * * : In which * * * all the arms, gun-powder, and ammunition, now in this colony, belonging to the king, * * * may be lodged and kept."{EN-1230}

Virginians always knew the difference between "a publique stock" of gunpowder and "the arms, gun-powder, and ammunition * * * belonging to the king", on the one hand, and private arms and ammunition, on the other. But ownership was one thing, possession often a different matter altogether. Public arms were usually lodged in some public magazine or under the care of some Militia officer.[773] And although private arms might sometimes be impressed into public service,[774] they generally remained in some private individuals' possession, as when those individuals were employing in their own Militia service the very arms taken from other individuals.

a. For example, during the War of Independence, Virginia raised her own regular Armed Forces, to which she distributed public arms for training and active duty—arms that were stored in public magazines when not in actual use:

> [1781] "WHEREAS at this critical juncture, when the enemy have made this state the object of their vengeance, it is necessary to provide a standing force, for the immediate defence thereof, It is therefore enacted, That two legions * * * be forthwith raised to serve during the war * * * in cases of actual or threatened invasion, during which, they shall continually remain in the field * * * . Immediately after any invasion shall cease, or the business of training shall be over, the men shall be marched to some magazine, there to deliver their arms, ammunition, and accoutrements * * * .
>
> "And to encourage men to engage in so useful a service, It is farther enacted, That all persons who shall serve in the said legions, shall be exempt from all militia duty and from all manner of drafts * * * . All * * * arms, and every military apparatus * * * shall be furnished at the > expense of the state, and shall whilst the men are out of service, be safely stored in some magazine to be provided for that purpose."{EN-1231}

---

[773] See ante, at 446-451.

[774] See ante, at 437-439.

But, then, in *pre-*constitutional Virginia, her regular troops also used their own private arms in the performance of their duties—arms which never left their own hands for storage in public armories:

> • [1775] "[T]he soldiers to be enlisted shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet * * * ; and, until such musket can be provided, * * * they bring with each of them the best gun, of any sort, that can be procured; and that such as are to act as rifle-men bring with them each one good rifle, to be approved by their captain, for the use of which he shall be allowed at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]"{EN-1232}

> • [1775] "[T]he soldiers to be enlisted * * * shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet * * * ; and until such musket can be provided that they bring with them the best gun of any sort that they can procure; * * * and that such as are to act as riflemen bring with them one good rifle * * * , each to be approved by their captain, for the use of which guns they shall be allowed * * * [f]or the smooth-bores, or muskets, after the rate of 20[shillings] and for the rifles * * * after the same rate by the year[.]"{EN-1233}

Even for these limited levies, though, at first the government evidently could not find enough smoothbored muskets in the public stocks, because it had to hire them, just as it had originally been forced to hire rifles, an adequate supply of which it never acquired.

b. Similarly, small portions of Virginia's Militia, too, were sometimes issued public arms, or paid for the use of their own arms, while on active service. For instance:

> • [1775] "[E]ach minute-man so to be enlisted shall be furnished with proper arms at the publick expense, and until such can be provided shall bring into service the best gun that he can procure; and for every good rifle, to be approved by the respective captains, there shall be allowed to the owner making use of the same at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]"{EN-1234}

> • [1775] "That the militia or volunteers to be employed, if not well armed, shall be furnished with arms out of such as belong to the county * * * , to be returned as soon as they shall be discharged from the service."{EN-1235}

But (as the dearth of statutes so providing proves) this method was employed only in exigent circumstances, when Virginia had to maximize the forces available for immediate deployment in a particular campaign. During normal times, when some Militiamen proved too poor to purchase their own firearms and ammunition—and therefore were "not well armed"—they returned the firearms loaned to them only upon death, disability, exemption from Militia service, or removal out of the jurisdiction.[775] It could be said, however, that this rule was functionally the same in both instances: Militiamen called up for a particular campaign who for whatever reason were "not well armed" returned the public arms loaned to them when they were discharged from that service—which occurred at the end of that campaign. Whereas poor Militiamen also returned the public arms loaned to them when they were discharged from their service—which occurred at the end of their membership in the Militia altogether. Obviously, though, a tension existed between application of the rule in the two different circumstances. If substantial numbers of poor Militiamen had not received public firearms slowly but surely in the course of their normal Militia service over the years, because such arms were unavailable, they could not have been issued public arms all at once in some emergency, because sufficient stocks of such arms would then surely have been lacking.

2. In any event, many of those Militiamen who did not furnish themselves with their very own firearms and ammunition personally possessed—for longer than just during their actual service in the field—the publicly owned arms issued to them.

a. This is clear enough in the general case:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, 1753, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[W]hereas it may be needful, in time of danger, to arm part of the militia, not otherwise sufficiently provided, out of his majesty's magazine, and other stores, within this colony, * * *
>
> " * * * if any person or persons, so to be armed out of his majesty's stores * * * , shall detain or imbezzle any arms, accoutrements, or ammunition, which shall be delivered to him * * * , when he shall be thereunto required, it shall and may be lawful * * * to cause to be imprisoned such person or persons, till he or they have made satisfaction for the arms, accoutrements, or ammunition * * * detained or imbezzled."{EN-1236}
>
> • [1777] "The soldiers of such militia, if not well armed and provided with ammunition, shall be furnished with the arms and ammunition of the county, and any deficiency in these may be supplied from the publick magazines, or if the case admit not that delay, by impressing arms and ammunition of private property, which ammunition, so far as not used, and arms, shall be duly returned, as soon as they may be spared. And any person embezzling any such publick or private arms,

---

[775] See post, at 492-495.

> or not delivering them up when required by his commanding officer, shall * * * be committed to prison without bail or mainprize, there to remain till he deliver or make full satisfaction for the same[.]"{EN-1237} > • [1782] "WHEREAS sundry arms and accoutrements belonging to the public are in the hands of individuals, who have neglected to return them to the proper officers; and it is necessary that such arms and accoutrements should be recovered as speedily as possible:
>
>
> " * * * [I]f * * * any person possessing any such public arms or accoutrements, shall be convicted of having failed to deliver them up * * * , such person shall * * * be liable to the penalty of twenty pounds[.]"{EN-1238}
>
> • [1782] "[T]he governor shall cause to be delivered to the * * * commanding officers of the militia of such counties as are most exposed to the incursions of the enemy, and to the officers of the militia of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, such a number of arms as he may think necessary, not less than sufficient to arm three tenths of their militia, * * * and [the commanding officer of the Militia] shall deliver the same to such of the militia as are first to be called on duty * * * ; who, on having served their tour of duty, shall return their arms, in good order, * * * to be delivered in like manner to such of the militia as stand next in rotation.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [E]very militia-man to whom arms shall be delivered * * * , who shall neglect or refuse to return the same * * * , shall forfeit and pay the sum of twelve pounds; and on failing so to do * * * , every such militia-man shall be obliged to serve in the continental army the term of three years or during the war."{EN-1239}

(1) Of singular significance is that most of these statutes explicitly described themselves as "making provision against Invasions and Insurrections" (1727 through 1772) or "providing against Invasions and Insurrections" (1777); and justified their mandates as generally "needful, in time of danger" (1727 through 1772) or specifically warranted in "such counties as are most exposed to the incursions of the enemy" (1782).

The tone of urgency sounded most ringingly in the preamble to the statute of 1727, which declared that:

> [W]HEREAS the frontiers of this dominion, being of great extent, are exposed to the invasions of foreign enemies, by sea, and incursions of Indians at land, and great dangers may likewise happen by the insurrections of negros, and others; for all which, the militia * * * is the most ready defence. * * * And it being reasonable, that such services as shall be performed by any part of the * * * militia, be rewarded at the public charge[. . .]{EN-1240}

Thus, unsurprisingly, this statute not only allowed for "arm[ing] part of the militia, not otherwise sufficiently provided, out of his majesty's magazine", but also "paid by the public" various wages "to the officers and soldiers which shall be drawn out into actual service", on the condition that "every horseman shall find and provide himself with a horse * * * , arms, and ammunition; and every foot soldier shall find and provide himself with a foot soldier's arms, and ammunition."{EN-1241}

(2) As urgent as was the danger "Invasions and Insurrections" posed, however, these statutes did not make public arms available to everyone. Rather, their purpose was "to arm part of the militia, not otherwise sufficiently provided, out of his majesty's magazine" (1727 through 1772), or to furnish "[t]he soldiers of such militia, if not well armed and provided with ammunition, * * * with the arms and ammunition of the county" (1777). The remainder of the Militiamen would be "otherwise sufficiently provided" and "well armed" by their own efforts and through their own resources, as the Militia laws applicable to normal times required. Thus, these statutes constituted supplementary measures designed to meet sudden, sharp, and short-term emergencies.

The statute of 1782 (quoted above) exemplifies the limited nature of the Virginia's reliance on public arms, even in the most pressing emergency to arise during the entire pre-constitutional era. First, the Governor was authorized to deliver arms only to "such counties as are most exposed to the incursions of the enemy, and * * * the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk"—those less or not so "exposed" having to get along with what arms they already possessed. Second, although the statute required the supply to be "not less than sufficient to arm three tenths of their militia", it did not command the Governor to arm the whole, even in those few most-threatened areas. Rather, he was to furnish arms only "to such of the militia as are first to be called on duty * * * ; who, on having served their tour of duty, shall return their arms, in good order, * * * to be delivered in like manner to such of the militia as stand next in rotation." Plainly enough, arming three-tenths of the Militia in a few Counties, one City, and a Borough would not suffice to arm the remaining seven-tenths in those places—particularly in the eventuality of an invasion or insurrection in which all or most of the local Militia would likely be called forth instanter. And, of course, it would arm no one else anywhere else in the Commonwealth to any degree. Presumably, the General Assembly settled on this formula because it knew that no greater amount of public arms needed to be supplied, inasmuch as many Militiamen had already provided themselves with suitable arms; or the amount of public arms available was sufficient only to supply a minority of Militiamen in a few selected areas; or both.

(3) Most revealingly, these statutes themselves presumed that many Militiamen to whom public arms had been distributed would maintain personal possession of that equipment under conditions in which their behavior would not be closely monitored by their officers. The statutes imposed penalties on "any person * * * [who] shall detain or imbezzle any [public] arms, accoutrements, or ammunition" (1727 through through 1772); "any person embezzling any * * * publick or [impressed] private arms, or not delivering them up when required by his commanding officer" (1777); "individuals, who have neglected to return * * * to the proper officers" "sundry arms and accoutrements belonging to the public" (1782); and "every militia-man to whom arms shall be delivered * * * who shall neglect or refuse to return the same" (1782). But if an unscrupulous Militiaman could have improperly "detain[ed]" the equipment entrusted to him, let alone "imbezzle[d]" it outright, he must have had, not only personal possession, but also quite unscrutinized and undisturbed possession over an indefinite period of time. Certainly, any such villain could not have been required to make a strict accounting for the arms both when they were handed out and when they should have been turned in immediately after he had completed his service—or else so much "detain[ing] or imbezzl[ing]" could never have gone on that serious statutory penalties had to be created (and maintained for over half a century) in order to suppress and punish such misbehavior. Even if only lax scrutiny characterized the process of distributing and then collecting these public arms, why were not the caretakers of public armories and magazines held to account when the equipment for which they were ultimately responsible turned up missing? (The statutes made no provision for inquiry into their behavior, let alone punishment for their maladministration.) Obviously, then, the burden of returning public arms to public magazines rested squarely on the shoulders of the Militiamen to whom those arms had been distributed. Which means that they must have possessed—and generally been considered justified in possessing—those arms at some times and in some places not connected with their performance of Militia duties other than the basic duty personally to possess a firearm.

b. Private individuals' long-term personal possession of public arms was even clearer where Militiamen who were rated too poor to purchase their own firearms were concerned:

> • [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "And if * * * any soldier inlisted * * * is so poor, as not to be able to purchase * * * arms * * * then [the county] court shall * * * immediately * * * depute some person to send for the same to England by the first opportunity, and to levy the charge * * * in the next county levy; which arms so to be sent for, shall be marked with the name of the county; and if any person shall presume to buy or sell any such arms, * * * then * * * every person so buying or selling shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds * * * ; and all arms purchased by any county and delivered to any poor soldier, * * * shall on his death or removal out of the county, be delivered to the chief officer of the militia in the county * * * , to be by such officer delivered to any other poor soldier * * * adjudged unable to provide himself with arms[.]"{EN-1242}

• [1775] "[I]f it be certified * * * that any soldier enlisted is so poor as not to be able to purchase the arms [required for service in the Militia] * * * , then such arms shall * * * be procurred so soon as may be, at the expense of the publick. And if any person shall presume to sell or buy any arms thus provided, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds; and all arms so purchased and delivered to any such poor soldier shall on his death, or removal out of the county, be delivered to the chief officer of the militia in the county, or to the captain of the company to which such poor soldier did belong, to be * * * delivered to any other poor soldier * * * adjudge[d] unable to provide himself with arms[.]"{EN-1243}

• [1777] "If any soldier be certified to the court martial to be so poor that he cannot purchase such arms, the said court shall cause them to be procured at the expense of the publick, to be reimbursed out of the fines on the delinquents of the county, which arms shall be delivered to such poor person to be used at musters, but shall continue the property of the county; and if any soldier shall sell or conceal such arms, the seller or concealer, and purchaser, shall each of them forfeit the sum of six pounds. And on the death of such poor soldier, or his removal out of the county, such arms shall be delivered to his captain, who shall * * * deliver the same to such other poor soldier as the [next court-martial] shall order.

"And if any poor soldier shall remove out of the county, and carry his arms with him, he shall incur the same penalty as if he had sold such arms; and if any persons concerned in selling or concealing such arms shall be sued for the said penalty, and * * * shall fail to make payment, he shall suffer * * * corporal punishment * * * , not exceeding thirty nine lashes."{EN-1244}

• [1784 and 1785] "If any private shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court * * * appointed for trying delinquencies * * * that he is so poor that he cannot purchase the arms * * * required, such court shall cause them to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents. The arms so purchased, shall * * * be delivered to the captain of the company to which such poor private may belong, who shall deliver such arms to the private, but they shall continue the property of the county; and if any private shall sell or conceal the same, the seller, concealer, and purchaser, shall each forfeit and pay four pounds * * * . And on the death, disability, or exemption of such poor private, or his removal out of the county, such arms, shall be delivered to the commanding officer of the company, who shall make report thereof to the next court * * * , and deliver the same to such other poor private as they shall direct. And if any poor private shall remove out of the county, and carry such arms with him, he shall incur the same penalty as if he had sold them. And if any person concerned in selling, purchasing, concealing or > removing such arms shall be prosecuted * * * , and upon conviction shall fail to make instant payment, or give security to pay the same * * * , he shall suffer such corporal punishment as the court * * * may think fit, not exceeding thirty-nine lashes.[776] * * * And to the end that such arms may be known, the commanding officer shall cause to be stamped or engraved on them, the name of the county, together with the number of the regiment to which they may belong."{EN-1245}

>
> • [1787] "[T]he governor with the advice of council, shall apply the money * * * appropriated to the purchase of arms, in procuring such artillery, small arms, accoutrements and ammunition, as may to him * * * seem proper; and the small arms so procured shall be distributed to the different companies in proportion to the number of their militia. Every private receiving such arms and accoutrements shall hold the same subject to the like rules, penalties and forfeitures, as are prescribed for a poor private in and by the [Militia] act [of 1785.]"{EN-1246}

These arms were purchased with public funds from "the next county levy" (1755 through 1771), "at the expense of the publick" (1775 and 1777), or "out of the money arising from delinquents" (1784 and 1785). For that reason, they were to "continue the property of the county" (1784, 1785, and 1787)—and even to be "marked with the name of the county" (1755 through 1771), or "stamped or engraved" with "the name of the county, together with the number of the regiment to which they may belong" (1784 and 1785). Yet they were actually "delivered to [the] poor soldier" (1755 through 1771, 1775, 1777, 1784, 1785, and 1787). Inasmuch as he lacked the rights of an owner, though, a poor Militiaman could neither "buy or sell any such arms" (1755 through 1771, and 1775), nor "sell or conceal such arms" (1777, 1784, 1785, and 1787), nor "remove out of the county, and carry his arms with him" (1777, 1784, 1785, and 1787). And upon his "death or removal out of the county" (1755 through 1771, 1775, and 1777), or his "death, disability, or exemption * * * or * * * removal out of the county" (1784, 1785, and 1787), the arms had to be "delivered to the chief officer of the militia" (1755 through 1787). Then, however, they were once again "delivered to any other poor soldier * * * unable to provide himself with arms" (1755 through 1787).

Thus, in practice, these public arms were as much in a poor soldier's personal possession throughout his enlistment in the Militia as if he had actually owned them. Certainly they were not subject to constant control or oversight by Militia officers—otherwise, Virginia's legislators would not have considered it necessary explicitly to prohibit poor soldiers from selling or concealing them, or removing them out of their Counties. Moreover, the arms were not treated as a separate public stock, because, as soon as one poor soldier had no further need of them, they were distributed to another poor soldier on the selfsame terms of personal possession.

---

[776] The Act of 1785 deleted the qualification "not exceeding thirty-nine lashes".

True enough, public arms were distributed to poor soldiers in order to serve public purposes relating to the Militia. One statute even mandated specifically that they were "to be used at musters" (1777). Yet obviously they also were implicitly intended to be used for each and every other possible Militia activity—one of which was the basic duty of personal possession of a firearm suitable for Militia service. And no statue ever explicitly precluded the use of Militia firearms for other purposes. Under those circumstances, how and why could poor soldiers, necessarily in possession of such firearms at all times, and usually under only their own supervision, have been easily prevented from, or fairly punished for, putting these arms to other uses—such as hunting, target shooting, or personal self-defense—as long as those poor soldiers always kept their arms "well fixed" and regularly appeared with them at musters, training, and service in the field? Certainly target shooting was an obvious preparation for Militia service; and self-defense was such service through the execution of the laws at the individual level. From very early on, too, the close connection between hunting and Militia service was recognized, as in a statute from 1632 which provided "that any man be permitted to kill deare or other wild beasts or fowle in the common woods, forests, or rivers * * * that thereby the inhabitants may be trained in the use of theire armes".{EN-1247}

G. The constitutional significance of Militiamen's personal possession of arms. That most Militiamen owned—and if they did not own at least continuously possessed in their places of abode—the firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements they brought to their Militia service provides an important insight into the meaning of the Second Amendment's command that "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed".

Distinguishably from most Militiamen, members of Virginia's regular Armed Forces and Militiamen who received public arms "in time of danger" were supposed to surrender them to public officials upon the completion of their service. Indeed, on one occasion, in 1775 Virginia specified and even required some of her "soldiers, either of regulars or minute-men," to take an oath to that effect:

> [t]hat the militia or volunteers to be employed, if not well armed, shall be furnished with arms out of such as belong to the county or corporation, to be returned as soon as they shall be discharged from the service[,]

> *I * * * swear, that I will be faithful and true to the colony and dominion of Virginia; that I will serve the same to the utmost of my power, in defence of the just rights of America, against all enemies whatsoever; that I will,*

> *to the utmost of my abilities, obey the lawful commands of my superiour officers, * * * and lay down my arms peaceably, when required to do so, either by the General Convention or General Assembly of Virginia.*{EN-1248}

(At that time, along with Virginia's regular troops, "each minute-man * * * to be enlisted" was to be "furnished with proper arms at the publick expense", and only "until such c[ould] be provided" was he to "bring into service the best gun that he c[ould] procure".{EN-1249})

In contrast, Militiamen who owned and possessed their own arms were never compelled to surrender them to public officials, even when some of them were properly exempted from part or all of their Militia duties because of disability, superannuation, removal from the jurisdiction, or any other reason (except, of course, conviction of some crime the punishment of which included disarmament). No statute purporting to impose such a general surrender ever saw the light of day in Virginia, in Rhode Island, or in any other Colony or independent State during the pre-constitutional era. True enough, poor Militiamen who received arms from the government also returned those arms to their Militia officers as soon as their own service in the Militia ended.[777] But, although they never attained actual legal title to the arms the public supplied, while their service continued these poor Militiamen were never deprived of personal possession of those arms, except perhaps to turn them over to other Militiamen for the performance of those Militiamen's service (as, for example, in the case of rotation in duty{EN-1250}). So, save for those unavoidable (and presumably short) periods of time during which Militia officers transferred possession from one poor Militiaman to another, a public firearm used for this purpose never left the personal custody of some Militiaman required to employ it as his own firearm in the fulfillment of his own Militia duties.

All this, of course, was the result of a statutory structure, in Virginia as elsewhere throughout *pre-*constitutional America. But when the Constitution incorporated into its federal system "the Militia of the several States" as they existed during those times, every member of every one of "the Militia of the several States", unless properly exempted according to constitutional principles, thereafter became and remains today subject to a constitutional duty at least to possess, if not also actually to own, a firearm, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable in some manner for Militia service. And, howsoever he may lawfully acquire that equipment, every member of any of "the Militia of the several States" enjoys at least a constitutional right to possess it in order to perform that constitutional duty. Thus, although every soldier in the regular Armed Forces today can constitutionally be required to take an oath to "lay down my arms peaceably, when required to do so" by public officials, and can legally be compelled to surrender whatever arms he has been issued even without such an oath, because the Armed Forces lack any constitutionally guaranteed permanent existence,[778] no member of "the Militia of the several States" can ever be required either to take such an oath or to make such a surrender—certainly of the arms he owns as his personal property, and arguably of any public arms he possesses in order to perform his Militia duties (unless other arms are simultaneously substituted for them).

---

[777] See ante, at 492-495.

[778] Contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12 and 13, with art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16, and art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

If her pre-constitutional Militiamen could not acquire firearms of military grade, Virginia required them to use whatever readily available arms were at all suitable for their Militia service.

As the preceding Chapters of this study have proven beyond any reasonable doubt, pre-constitutional Virginia required most of her Militiamen to purchase their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements directly or indirectly through the free market; supplied such equipment to those men too poor to buy it for themselves; and ordered just about every Militiaman, whatever his financial status, to maintain personal possession of those arms in his own place of abode at all times. But exactly what sort of arms were these, in those days—and therefore exactly what sort of arms would they be today, in the hands of revitalized "Militia of the several States"?

A. Firearms suitable for "soldiers". The nature of the arms Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia were required to carry can be deduced from the service to which those were to be put. From the earliest days, Virginians aimed at being thoroughly armed:

> • [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott[.]"{EN-1251}

> • [1659 and 1662] "That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least which are to be provided by every man for his family[.]"{EN-1252}

But "masters of every family" and "every man" in the community were required "to beare armes", and their arms were required to be "fixed and serviceable", for precisely what purposes?

To this question, Virginians always knew the answer: Firearms in every man's place of abode would conduce, not only to each individual's, or to each isolated family's, but also and especially to the entire community's, self-defense. Throughout the pre-constitutional era, Virginia's Militiamen were thoroughly armed in order, first and foremost, to provide the most extensive possible military and police protection to the community. And the Constitution still embodies this central purpose of each of "the Militia of the several States" in the power it delegates to Congress "[t]o provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"[779]—the first being almost exclusively a police function, the third being primarily a military function, and the second exhibiting the characteristics of the first, the third, or both, depending upon circumstances.

Although an armed establishment, Virginia's Militia was not a "standing army", because its members were "citizen-soldiers"—citizens, first and foremost; soldiers, second. Their ultimate loyalty was always to the people, because they were the people. This, in stark contrast to the members of a "standing army" who—as soldiers, first and foremost; citizens, perhaps not at all—too often throughout history have centered their loyalties on some "leader", or on the army itself, because they viewed themselves as separate from, independent of, and somehow superior, and therefore possibly antagonistic, to the people.

Moreover, although her statutes commanded almost every able-bodied adult free male to be armed, Virginia was neither "a garrison state", nor "a para-military police state", but instead what Article 13 of her own Declaration of Rights in 1776 called "a free state"—and "a free state" precisely because she always maintained "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms". In every American Colony and independent State, Militiamen were never regular "Troops", a distinction upon which the Constitution still insists.[780] Which is why Virginia contrasted "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms" at all times, with "standing armies, in time of peace". Not because the two establishments performed radically different functions—for, at base, both were agents of physical coercion, often employed in the same circumstances. But instead because their employment resulted in radically different political consequences—the Militia being then (as well as now) what Article 13 described as "the proper, natural, and safe defense of a free state"; whereas "standing armies" were then (and still are) "dangerous to liberty".[781]

Nonetheless, although primarily citizens, Virginia's Militiamen "trained to arms" did function as "soldiers" part of the time. Which is why her statutes often denoted them as such:

> • [1676] "[E]ach county * * * is required to furnish its perticular soldiers * * * with good and well fixt guns and other armes[.]"{EN-1253}
>
> • [1684] "FOR the encouragement of the inhabitants * * * of Virginia, to provide themselves with arms and ammunition, for the defence of this * * * country, and that they may appear well and

---

[779] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[780] Compare and contrast U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 3 with art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16; art. II, § 2, cl. 1; and amend. II.

[781] See post, Chapters 47 through 49.

compleatly furnished when commanded to musters and other * * * service * * * .

" * * * [E]very trooper [in the Militia] * * * shall furnish and supply himself with * * * all arms * * * fitt and compleat for a trooper, and * * * every foot soldier, shall furnish and supply himselfe, with a * * * musquet * * * fitt for a soldier, * * * and shall continually keep their armes well fixt, cleane and fitt for * * * service."{EN-1254}

• [1705] "That every ffoot soldier [in the Militia] be provided with a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed * * * , and that every soldier belonging to the horse be provided with * * * a case of good pistolls well fixed * * * and * * * have at his usuall place of abode a well fixed carabine[.]"{EN-1255}

• [1723] "[E]very soldier [in the Militia] belonging to the horse, be provided with * * * a case of pistols, * * * and shall keep at his place of abode, a well fixed carbine * * * . And * * * every foot soldier be provided with a firelock, musquet, or fuzee, well fixed[.]"{EN-1256}

• [1738] "Every horse-man shall be furnished with a * * * carbine or fuzee, * * * a case of pistols * * * and every footman shall be furnished with a firelock, musket, or fuzee, well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same [.]

* * * * *

" * * * That eighteen months time be * * * allowed to each soldier to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition, * * * so as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters, with such arms as he is already furnished with."{EN-1257}

• [1755] "[E]very person * * * inlisted * * * shall be armed and accoutred * * * ; every horseman shall be furnished with a * * * carbine * * * , a case of pistols * * * : And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [I]t shall * * * be lawful, for the * * * chief officer of the militia in the county, to order all soldiers listed therein, to go armed to their respective parish churches.

* * * * *

" * * * That twelve months time be * * * allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with[.]"{EN-1258}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "Every soldier [in the Militia] shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same[.]

* * * * *

> " * * * [I]t shall * * * be lawful for the * * * chief officer of the militia in the county, to order all soldiers inlisted therein to go armed to their respective parish churches.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]welve months shall be * * * allowed to each soldier, * * * to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * , so that such soldier do appear at all musters during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath and is already furnished with[.]"{EN-1259}
>
> • [1777] "Every * * * soldier [in the Militia] shall appear at his * * * muster-field * * * armed * * * with a rifle * * * or a good firelock and bayonet[.] * * *
>
> " * * * Every * * * soldier shall be allowed six months after his * * * enrollment to provide such arms or ammunition as he had not at the time."{EN-1260}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "Every * * * soldier [in the Militia] shall appear at his respective muster-field * * * armed * * * with a good clean musket * * * ; provided, that the militia of [certain] counties * * * may have good rifles[.]"{EN-1261}

All of these statutes drew the same straight line, in terms of "good and well fixt guns" for "soldiers" (1676)—a "musquet * * * fitt for a soldier" (1684)—and "a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed" or "a case of good pistolls well fixed * * * and * * a well fixed carabine" (1705); "a case of pistols * * * and * * * a well fixed carbine", or "a firelock, musquet, or fuzee, well fixed" (1723); "a firelock, musket, or fuzee, well fixed" (1738); "a firelock well fixed" (1755, and 1757 through 1771); "a rifle * * * or a good firelock" (1777); and "a good clean musket" or "good rifles" (1784 and 1785) for every "soldier" or "trooper". In this context, "well fixt" and "well fixed" meant properly made and maintained for a particular purpose.[782] From the very beginning, that purpose was military service—as when "every trooper" and "every foot soldier" were commanded "continually [to] keep their armes well fixt, cleane and fitt for * * * service"; and the ultimate end for which "every trooper" and "every foot soldier" was to be so armed was "the defence of this * * * country" (1684).

Virginia's Militiamen were not to be just parade-ground soldiers, or least of all ornamental "honor guards" for governors or other public officials, mustered merely to march in period costume with flags and dummy firearms at patriotic ceremonies. To the contrary: Throughout the *pre-*constitutional period, the emphasis was always on the Militia's preparation for actual combat:

> • [1672 and 1674] "[A]s against all tymes of danger it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service[.]"{EN-1262}

---

[782] See ante, at 408.

> • [1740] "WHEREAS, during the present war, it will be necessary, that the militia * * * should be kept under stricter discipline, more frequently trained and exercised, and better armed; the better to enable them to contend with regular troops[.]"{EN-1263}

Thus, in 1775, a statute that provided for raising both regular soldiers and Militiamen established the same requirements for each group with respect to their arms:

> [T]he soldiers to be enlisted shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet, cartouch box, or pouch * * * ; and, until such musket can be provided, that they shall bring with each of them the best gun, of any sort, that can be procured; and that such as are to act as rifle-men bring with them each one good rifle, to be approved by their captain, for the use of which he shall be allowed at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [E]ach minute-man so to be enlisted shall be furnished with proper arms at the publick expense, and until such can be provided shall bring into service the best gun that he can procure; and for every good rifle, to be approved by the respective captains, there shall be allowed to the owner making use of the same at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]{EN-1264}

Obviously, this statute itself implicitly defined "proper arms" for a Militiaman as the "one good musket and bayonet, cartouch box, or pouch" to be furnished to a regular soldier, because: (i) no other definition appeared in the enactment; and (ii) in lieu of such arms, both a Militiaman and a soldier could have substituted "the best gun[s]" they could have "procure[d]", particularly "good rifle[s]".

So, the conclusions are inescapable that: (i) Virginia considered her Militiamen to be real "soldiers". (ii) Their "service" was to a great degree military service, no different in principle and sometimes in practice from the service of regular troops. And therefore, (iii) ideally Militiamen were to be equipped at all times with firearms specifically suitable for real soldiers in actual military service.

B. Statutory standards for firearms. The foregoing would be true even had Virginia's statutes commanded no more than that "soldiers" in her Militia be equipped simply with firearms and ammunition "fitt", "proper", "good", or "well fixt" for their Militia service. But the statutes went beyond such generalities, and specified the types, qualities, and quantities of arms Militiamen were to acquire, keep, and bear.

1. At first, as in 1643, Virginia's legislators presumed that men would know what was required without being told: "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott[.]"{EN-1265} Then the lawmakers set out, with increasing exactitude, what Militiamen should possess at all times:

> • [1659 and 1662] "That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn, two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least[.]"{EN-1266}
>
> • [1676] "[E]ach county * * * is required to furnish its perticular soldiers with two pounds of powder and six pounds of shott a man with good and well fixt guns[.]"{EN-1267}
>
> • [1684] "[E]very trooper of the respective counties * * * shall furnish and supply himself with * * * all arms * * * , fitt and compleat for a trooper, and * * * every foot soldier, shall furnish and supply himselfe, with a * * * musquet and other furniture fitt for a soldier, and that each trooper and foot souldier, be provided with two pounds of powder, and eight pounds of shott[.]"{EN-1268}
>
> • [1705] "[E]very ffoot soldier be provided with a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed, a good sword and cartouch box, and six charges of powder * * * , and that besides those each foot soldier have at his place of abode two pounds of powder and eight pounds of shott * * * , and * * * every soldier belonging to the horse be provided with * * * a case of good pistolls well fixed, sword and double cartouch box, and twelve charges of powder * * * , and that besides those each soldier belonging to the horse have at his usuall place of abode a well fixed carabine, * * * two pounds of powder and eight pounds of shott[.]"{EN-1269}
>
> • [1723] "That every soldier belonging to the horse, be provided with * * * a case of pistols, cutting sword, or cutlace, and double cartouch box, and six charges of powder, * * * and shall keep at his place of abode, a well fixed carbine * * * , one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot * * * . And that every foot soldier be provided with a firelock, musquet, or fuzee, well fixed, and bayonet fitted to such musquet or fuzee, or a good cutting sword or cutlace, a cartouch box, and three charges of powder, * * * and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot[.]"{EN-1270}
>
> • [1738] "Every horse-man shall be furnished with a * * * carbine or fuzee, * * * a case of pistols, cutting sword or cutlass, double cartouch-box, and six charges of powder, * * * and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball * * * . And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock, musket, or fuzee, well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, or a cutting sword or cutlass, a cartouch-box, and three charges of powder, * * * and shall also keep at his house, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball[.]"{EN-1271}

• [1755] "[E]very horseman shall be furnished with a * * * carbine * * * , a case of pistols, cutting sword, double cartouch box, and six charges of powder, * * * and shall keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder and four pounds of ball * * * : And every footman shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a cutting sword, a double cartouch box, and three charges of powder, * * * and shall also keep at his place of abode, one pound of powder and four pounds of ball[.]"{EN-1272}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "Every soldier shall be furnished with a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same, a double cartouch-box, and three charges of powder, * * * and shall also keep at his place of abode one pound of powder and four pounds of ball[.]"{EN-1273}

• [1775] "[E]very militia man * * * shall furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise with a * * * common firelock, bayonet, pouch, or cartouch box, three charges of powder and ball, * * * and shall constantly keep by him one pound of powder and four pounds of ball[.]"{EN-1274}

• [1777] "Every * * * soldier [in the Militia] shall appear * * * armed * * * with a rifle and tomahawk, or good firelock and bayonet, with a pouch and horn, or a cartouch or cartridge box, and with three charges of powder and ball; and * * * shall constantly keep one pound of powder and four pounds of ball[.]"{EN-1275}

• [1784 and 1785] "Every * * * soldier [in the Militia] shall appear * * * armed, equipped, and accoutred * * * with a good clean musket, carrying an ounce ball, and three feet eight inches long in the barrel, with a good bayonet and iron ramrod well fitted thereto, a cartridge box properly made, to contain and secure twenty cartridges fitted to his musket * * * ; and moreover, * * * shall have * * * one pound of good powder and four pounds of lead; including twenty blind cartridges; * * * provided, that the militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining thereto, shall not be obliged to be armed with muskets, but may have good rifles with proper accoutrements in lieu thereof."{EN-1276}

2. Overall, these statutes made clear that, as least ideally, Virginia's Militiamen were to acquire, keep, and bear firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for military duty:

a. With respect to Militia cavalrymen ("troopers" or "horsemen"), the statutes from 1705 through 1755 delineated sets of arms peculiar to that service: namely, "a case of [that is, two] pistols", a "carbine", a "double cartouche box", several "charges of powder", and a "cutting sword". Neither ordinary hunting nor any sport in which firearms might have been involved in those days called for this particular mix of equipment, or even would have found it useful.

b. The statutory requirements for Militia infantrymen ("soldiers" or "footmen") were directed at military service, too. The simple specification of a "musquet * * * fitt for a soldier" in 1684 presumed that Virginians knew what such a standard entailed. In any event, by definition, a "musquet * * * fitt for a soldier" was not a firearm usable solely for hunting or other sport, or likely to be one designed primarily for those purposes. In 1705, the statute defined how a firearm would be "fitt for a soldier": namely, a "firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed, [and] a good sword". The "good sword" made up for the absence of a bayonet, for which many "firelock[s], muskett[s] or fusee[s]" readily available to common Virginians at that time may not have been fitted. But the requirement of "a good sword" indicated that the "firelock, muskett or fusee" was not intended to be used simply for hunting or sport. The statutes of 1723 and 1738 modified the Militiamen's table of equipment to include "a firelock, musquet, or fuzee, well fixed, and bayonet fitted to such musquet or fuzee, or a good cutting sword or cutlace". By then, the standard was to be a firearm originally designed or properly modified to take a bayonet, with a "cutting sword or cutlace" as an allowable substitute if such a firearm was unavailable. And in 1755, the requirement was "a firelock well fixed, bayonet fitted to the same, a cutting sword"—indicating either that all Militiamen were to appear with both bayonets and swords, or perhaps that swords could be substituted for bayonets where the latter were not to be had. In any event, throughout this period the ideal was the purely military combination of a musket with a bayonet properly fitted, with a sword serving as a substitute for or supplement to a bayonet. Then, from 1757 through 1771, the statutes mandated "a firelock well fixed, a bayonet fitted to the same", with no mention of swords. Obviously, during that period the General Assembly presumed that most Militiamen could easily acquire such a "firelock" with "bayonet fitted".

So, from the late 1600s through the early 1770s, the firearms Militiamen were supposed to acquire and bring to service in the field were either military-grade muskets already fitted with bayonets; or muskets or fusees made for the civilian market but capable of taking bayonets;[783] or firelocks of one sort or another originally designed for civilian use which could have been (and were) put to military purposes when swords made up for a lack of bayonets—but, in every instance, firearms somehow suitable for employment by soldiers.

In the 1770s and 1780s, Virginia's Militia statutes began mandating or allowing the use of rifles in the places of smoothbored muskets—but for the selfsame military purpose. The statute of 1775 called for "a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise * * * a * * * common firelock, bayonet". And the statute of 1777 specified "a rifle and tomahawk, or good firelock and bayonet". Thus, a rifle was to mount a bayonet, if one were fitted; if not, a tomahawk was to fulfill the bayonet's function in combat at close quarters. Moreover, a rifle was preferred over "a common firelock" even when the latter carried a bayonet. In 1784 and 1785, the statutes required each Militiaman to appear with "a good clean musket, carrying an ounce ball, and three feet eight inches long in the barrel, with a good bayonet and iron ramrod well fitted thereto"; but "the militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining thereto, shall not be obliged to be armed with muskets, but may have good rifles". Obviously, the General Assembly believed that men from Virginia's back country, well practiced with their own "good rifles", and even without bayonets, could perform military duty as effectively as men with muskets and bayonets. (Presumably, these statutes did not explicitly require riflemen to supply tomahawks, swords, or other edged weapons in lieu of bayonets—but instructed them simply to bring "proper accoutrements"—because legislators understood that men from the hinterlands experienced with "good rifles" would have known what to do without prompting.)

---

[783] See, e.g., B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 103.

Besides their firearms, Militiamen's accoutrements were designed for military, not sporting, purposes. Every statute throughout the period 1705 through 1785 required each man to supply: (i) a "cartouche box" or "cartridge box" to hold semi-fixed ammunition of gunpowder and lead ball, ready for loading; (ii) several "charges of powder" for quick use; or (iii) "a pouch" (to hold lead balls) "and horn" (to hold gunpowder) for riflemen. The combination of a "pouch and horn" would normally have been used by civilian riflemen, too, for hunting and sport. But a "cartouche box" was primarily, if not exclusively, an accoutrement designed for soldiers, who in that era usually depended for success in set-piece battles upon their ability to produce a high rate of fire.

c. All of Virginia's statutes from about 1660 through the *mid-*1780s commanded her Militiamen to maintain in their possession at all times amounts of gunpowder and lead shot or ball well in excess of what a typical hunter or sportsman would have been likely to have kept always ready to hand. From 1723 through 1785, for example, the requirement was "one pound of powder, and four pounds of shot", "ball", or "lead". (And even larger amounts had been required in earlier years.)

Inasmuch as the statutes of 1784 and 1785 called for "a good clean musket, carrying an ounce ball" for those Militiamen who armed themselves with muskets, the "four pounds of ball" those two statutes required would have provided 64 lead balls, each weighing 437.5 grains.[784] The "one pound of good powder" for which the statutes called would have produced 64 charges (main and priming), containing

---

[784] One avoirdupois pound contains 16 ounces, or 7,000 grains. So "an ounce ball" contains: 7,000 divided by 16 equals 437.5 grains of lead.

109.4 grains each.[785] Because firearms using black powder as a propellant can be loaded to various levels of power, depending on their intended uses, comparisons are always somewhat speculative. Nonetheless, in 1759, the standard lead ball for a British musket measured 0.693 inches in diameter and weighed 493.0 grains; and the standard charge was 165.0 grains of powder, reduced to 109.4 grains for the lighter load of an "exercise" cartridge.[786] Presumably, the lighter American ball, propelled by the same charge of powder used in a British "exercise" load, would have produced a round more powerful in terms of kinetic energy. Similarly, the British Pattern 1776 Rifle, with a 0.615 inch bore, took a regulation charge of 110.0 grains of powder; but this was likely reduced in the field to 82.5 grains, which apparently produced a more accurate load.[787] Because its lead ball with an approximate diameter of 0.615 inches weighed about 344.6 grains, the reduced British rifle load probably approximated the American musket load.[788]

In addition to the sixty-four rounds that could have been made up from "one pound of good powder and four pounds of lead", Virginia's Militia statutes of 1784 and 1785 also required each Militiaman to possess "a cartridge box properly made, to contain and secure twenty cartridges fitted to his musket". Which means that each man possessed some eighty-four rounds available on or about his person before any fighting had started and he could have expected to receive more ammunition in the field. This was more than twice the thirty-six rounds carried by each of the British soldiers who marched with Colonel Smith and Major Pitcairn to Lexington and Concord on 19 April 1775.[789] Surely, considerations of military necessity alone controlled this matter, because such a large initial supply of ammunition far exceeded what a typical hunter or sportsman of that day would likely have carried with him (or perhaps even maintained in his home).

Thus, Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia statutes establish that her Militiamen's firearms were either military-grade arms in their original design, or else dual-purpose or civilian arms Militiamen could have easily put to or modified for military use. Moreover, the statutes plainly evidenced Virginia's intent to secure and improve the military effectiveness of Militiamen's arms whenever possible—first, by [785] One pound equals 7,000 grains, and divided by 64 equals 109.4 grains.

---

[786] De Witt Bailey, Small Arms of the British Forces in America, ante, note 428, at 247.

[787] De Witt Bailey, British Military Flintlock Rifles, ante note 471, at 34.

[788] If a lead ball with a diameter of 0.693 inches weighed 493.0 grains, one with a diameter of 0.615 inches weighed: $(0.615)^3$ divided by $(0.693)^3$ times 493 equals 344.6 grains. Assuming a direct proportion between the weight of the powder charge and the weight of the ball, a charge of 109.4 grains of powder behind a ball of 437.5 grains of lead should have approximated a charge of 86.2 grains of powder behind a ball of 344.6 grains of lead: 344.6 divided by 437.5 times 109.4 equals 86.2. The British load was 82.5, rather than 86.2, grains, a negligible difference.

[789] See Letters on the American Revolution 1774-1776, Margaret W. Wheeler, Editor (Port Washington, New York: Kennikat Press, Inc., 1968), at 197.

phasing in the use of bayonets as required equipment (from 1723 through 1757); second, by allowing or even requiring the use of rifles (from 1775 through 1785); and third, by mandating accoutrements with almost exclusively military purposes (from 1705 through 1785). In addition, the statutes throughout the 1600s and 1700s demonstrate a consistent concern for requiring, in each individual Militiaman's possession, amounts of ammunition economically justifiable only for military service.

C. "Substitute standards" allowable. If, during the *pre-*constitutional era, firearms and ammunition designed and usable solely for "hunting", other "shooting sports", and "personal self-defense"—and to no degree suitable for "military" or "police" service—had been readily available to, let alone in common usage among, Virginians and other Americans, Virginia, along with the rest of the Colonies and then independent States, would not have allowed her Militiamen to bring such firearms and ammunition to the performance of their duties. Of course, a class of firearms and ammunition not to any degree suitable for any sort of Militia service did not exist then, any more than it exists now. Moreover, although the ideal at which Virginia's Militia statutes aimed throughout the *pre-*constitutional period was for her "soldiers" to be armed with "well fixed" muskets, usually fitted with bayonets (bayonet fighting being the norm amongst the regular armed forces of that day), or "good rifles", the statutes themselves recognized that this ideal probably could not be achieved in practice, and therefore foresightfully provided for that very contingency by allowing Militiamen to equip themselves with what today might be called "substitute standards":

1. As early as 1684, the law clearly distinguished between ideality and reality:

> FOR the encouragement of the inhabitants * * * of Virginia, to provide themselves with arms and ammunition * * * and that they may appear well and compleatly furnished when commanded to musters and other * * * service * * * That all such swords, musketts, pistolls, carbines, guns, and other armes and furniture, as the inhabitants of this country are already provided, or shall provide and furnish themselves with, for their necessary use and service, shall * * * be free and exempted from being imprest or * * * lyable to be taken by any distresse, seizure, attachment or execution * * * .
>
> And * * * every trooper * * * shall furnish and supply himself with * * * all arms * * * fitt and compleat for a trooper, and * * * every foot soldier, shall furnish and supply himselfe, with a * * * musquet fitt for a soldier[.]"{EN-1277}

The second paragraph stated what was desirable—that every man should possess "all arms * * * fitt and compleat for a trooper" or a "musquet fitt for a soldier"—but the first paragraph listed as acceptable, and guaranteed Virginians' possession of, "all such * * * musketts, pistolls, carbines, guns * * * as the inhabitants of this country are already provided, or shall provide and furnish themselves with". That is, whatever firearms Virginians "provide[d] and furnish[ed] themselves with" would suffice as "fitt * * * for a trooper" or "fitt for a soldier" were nothing better available.

2. In 1705, the Militia statute mandated simply "[t]hat every ffoot soldier be provided with a firelock, muskett or fusee well fixed" and every cavalryman with "a case of good pistols" and "a well fixed carabine", but explicitly allowed for no substitutions.{EN-1278} Yet, in November of that same year, the Council of Colonial Virginia complained that > the Arms and Ammunition sent in by her Majesty for y^e^ Service of the Militia of this Country lyes now at James City and by y^e^ slow & inconsiderable sale that hath hitherto been made thereof it is very improbable that any quantity can be expected to be sold as was intended > and tho the said arms are very necessary and much wanted for the defence of the Country, yet the poverty of the Inhabitants and their inability to procure the price thereof in money hath hitherto obstructed y^e^ said sale, to which the high price of y^e^ said Arms (being more than y^e^ Merchants generally demand for arms of the like kind when purchased for tobacco) hath not a little contributed[.]{EN-1279}

>
> * * * * *
>

Apparently, then, Militiamen who could pay in tobacco, but not in money, bought their arms from private "Merchants", rather than from the government. But if their low prices were any indication, although the arms the "Merchants" sold might have been of "like kind", they were not necessarily as good as, or even uniform in type or quality in comparison to, "the Arms and Ammunition sent in by her Majesty for y^e^ Service of the Militia"—thus leading to a situation not unlike the one the statute of 1684 explicitly condoned. (Of course, it may also have been the case that many Virginians preferred lighter and handier firearms designed primarily for civilians to the heavier types produced specifically for military use.[790]) A few months later, the Councillors opined "that the late act [of 1705] for settling the militia having strictly enjoyned all persons to provide armes on a certain penalty, the due execution of that Law will oblige people to be more diligent in purchasing"{EN-1280}—but forgot that even "a certain penalty" would not necessarily result in cash-strapped Virginians' buying the government's higher-priced arms when cheaper goods were still available from "Merchants". Indeed, just a few years later, the Council finally conceded that "by reason of the extreem poverty of the Inhabitants" the government's arms "cannot be sold", and therefore ordered Militia officers "to deliver the[arms] out to such persons serveing in the Militia as they shall judge responsible takeing their bond for keeping their said arms in good order and to return the same or the value thereof when thereunto required".{EN-1281} Self-evidently, these "responsible" recipients of arms did not constitute the entirety, or perhaps even the majority, of Militiamen needful of firearms—leaving the rest to provide themselves from whatever mix of arms private "Merchants" could supply.

---

[790] See H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia. ante note 731, at 13.

3. In 1723 and 1738, the Militia statutes allowed "[t]hat eighteen months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition, according to this act * * * —So as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at musters with such arms as he is already furnished with".{EN-1282} (The statute of 1705 also "allowed" "eighteen months * * * to each trooper and ffoot soldier * * * to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition according to [law]", but did not explicitly require that in the interim he should employ whatever other arms he happened to possess.{EN-1283})

4. In 1755 through 1771, the Militia statutes allowed

> [t]hat twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and amunition, according to the directions of this act, * * * , so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with: And if any soldier shall appear at any muster not armed and accoutred, * * * it shall and may be lawful, for the captain * * * to examine such soldier upon oath, whether he hath any, and what arms and ammunition he really hath of his own property, and if on such examination it shall appear, that such soldier hath any arms or ammunition of his own property, and hath not brought the same, or so much thereof, as this act requires, to such muster, he shall be liable to * * * penalties[.]{EN-1284}

5. In 1775, a statute for raising regular troops, Minutemen, and other Militiamen provided that > the soldiers to be enlisted shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet, cartouch box, or pouch * * * ; and, until such musket can be provided, that they shall bring with them the best gun, of any sort, that can be procured; and that such as are to act as rifle-men bring with them each one good rifle, to be approved by their captain, for the use of which he shall be allowed at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]

>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [E]ach minute-man * * * to be enlisted shall be furnished with proper arms at the publick expense, and until such can be provided shall bring into service the best gun that he can procure; and for every good rifle, to be approved by the respective captains, there shall be allowed to the owner making use of the same at the rate of twenty shillings a year[.]

* * * * *

* * * [I]n the present time of danger, * * * the remainder of the militia not included in the minute-men should be armed, accoutred, trained, and disciplined, in the best manner the circumstances of the country will admit of [.]

* * * * *

* * * [E]very militia man * * * shall furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise with a * * * common firelock [.]{EN-1285}

In that same year, another statute for raising troops and Minutemen mandated that > the soldiers to be enlisted * * * shall, at the expense of the publick, be furnished each with one good musket and bayonet, cartouch box, or pouch * * * ; and until such musket can be provided that they bring with them the best gun of any other sort that they can procure; * * * and that such as are to act as riflemen bring with them one good rifle and tomahawk, each to be approved by their captain, for the use of which guns they shall be allowed as follows, to wit: For the smooth-bores, or muskets, the rate of 20s and for the rifles * * * the same rate by the year[.]

>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [E]ach minute-man who shall furnish himself with a good musket, or other gun, to be approved of by his captain, shall be allowed by the publick ten shillings per annum, as a consideration for the use thereof[.]{EN-1286}

6. Even as late as 1784 and 1785, Virginia's Militia statutes recognized that the ideal state of armament for Militiamen could not always be met:

> Every * * * commanding officer of a company shall, within ten days after every regimental and general muster, make up * * * a return of his company, including all arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, * * * distinguishing effective and good from non-effective and bad[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [T]welve months * * * shall be allowed for providing the arms and accoutrements herein directed;[791] but in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them the best arms and accoutrements they can get.{EN-1287}

Thus, Virginia's Militia statutes evidenced the consensus in pre-constitutional times that what might appear at first blush to be the inhabitants' "non-military" firearms could and were to be put to Militia purposes whenever the need arose. Or, stated as a general principle, in those days essentially any working firearm could be a "Militia-grade" firearm in Virginia, depending upon the circumstances. The statutes established very broad standards for acceptability of firearms, because the goal was first and foremost to arm Militiamen—if necessary with whatever happened to be available—and only thereafter to standardize their arms as to type (particularly with respect to caliber and the capability to mount bayonets); then to standardize their arms as to quality; and finally to take advantage of innovations in technology (in particular, the superiority of rifles to smoothbored muskets).

---

[791] The Act of 1785 allowed for "two years" of grace.

The simple rule upon which the entire sequence rested—availability equals acceptability—was the only one the statutes always employed, because it was the only one Virginia's legislators knew always had to be met, inasmuch as something *un*available could hardly be acceptable; and the only one they knew almost always could be met, inasmuch as what was usually available was also usually at least marginally serviceable. The verbal formulae "all such * * * musketts, pistolls, carbines, guns * * * as the inhabitants of this country are already provided, or shall provide and furnish themselves with" (1684), "such arms as he is already furnished with" (1723 and 1738), "what arms and ammunition he really hath of his own property" (1755 through 1771), "the best gun, of any sort, that can be procured" (1775), "armed * * * in the best manner the circumstances of the country will admit of" (1775), "a good rifle, if to be had" (1775), "the best gun of any * * * sort that they can procure" (1775), and "the best arms * * * they can get" (1784 and 1785) were plainly all-inclusive. Moreover, the core of the statutory requirement did not change for an entire century—from 1684 to 1785—except insofar as in 1775 through 1785, if Militiamen had a practical choice, they were enjoined to obtain "the best gun * * * [t]he[y] can procure" and "the best arms * * * they can get" and not to appear with just anything they happened to possess at the time. Self-evidently, Virginians did not believe that many, if any, firearms were utterly unusable for Militia purposes. Rather, they knew that, although some firearms might be the best of all, and some might be better than others, something was invariably better than nothing; and it was everyone's duty to provide himself with something.

Nonetheless, if essentially any firearm could in principle have sufficed for Militia service even though it might not have been the best firearm among all types, or even if better firearms in its particular class were known to exist, it had to be "good" in the sense that it actually worked. So the later Militia statutes explicitly imposed the additional requirement that the firearms the men themselves supplied—whether rifles, muskets, "or other gun[s]"—needed "to be approved by their captain[s]" (1775), who were to "distinguish[ ] effective and good [firearms] from non-effective and bad" (1784 and 1785). The statutes did not specify "to be approved" or to be "effective and good" for what. The implicit practical standard, however, had to be usability at all for Militia service. Militia Captains could not have afforded to be arbitrary or punctilious in grading their men's firearms for fitness, because their ultimate duty was to see the men armed with something at least marginally suitable for the task at hand and in proper working order. They had to approve what was actually available, if it were mechanically capable of functioning, because the alternative was likely for a Militiamen to bring no firearm at all into the field.

D. Superior firearms adopted when possible. If Militiamen in *pre-*constitutional Virginia were sometimes "armed * * * in the best manner the circumstances of the country will admit of" with only "the best gun[s] of any * * * sort that they c[ould] procure" (1775), sometimes their firearms were actually superior to, or at least in advance of the times in comparison with, the standard military firearms of that era. The American flintlock rifled musket (such as the so-called "Pennsylvania rifle") provides the quintessential example of this technological and tactical superiority.

In those days, for a Colonial or State Militia to be as well armed, man for man, as typical infantry in the British Empire's regular Army was not difficult in principle—not only because many good flintlocks, including the very same types the British or French Armies employed, were readily available to Militiamen,[792] but also because many Militiamen appeared in the field armed with their own rifles. These were not only the thoroughly tested products of decades of development under field conditions (albeit largely in civilian uses),[793] but also were firearms their owners knew how to employ to the best effect under battlefield conditions[794]—as at Saratoga against General Burgoyne,[795] and in the Southern campaign against General Lord Cornwallis's protégés, Major Patrick Ferguson at King's Mountain[796] and Lieutenant Colonel Banastre Tarleton at The Cowpens.[797]

For example, in 1775 Virginia enacted two statutes for raising regular troops, Minutemen, and Militia, which provided:

---

[792] See generally Bill Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution and Other Colonial Wars (Lincoln, Rhode Island: Andrew Mowbray Incorporated, Publishers, 2005).

[793] See, e.g., Edwin N. Gewirz, "Long Rifles in the Valley of Virginia", in Longarms in America, ante note 468, Volume 1, at 183; Crosby Milliman, "Evolution of the Pennsylvania Rifle", in id. at 87; Harmon C. Leonard, "The Kentucky Rifle", in id. at 97.

[794] On Americans' employment of rifles in combat, see generally H. Peterson, Arms and Armor in Colonial America, ante note 465, at 192-203. That under the peculiar conditions of the times special tactics sometimes needed to be employed in order to gain the maximum advantage from rifles did not detract from their usefulness. See M. Stephenson, Patriot Battles, ante note 464, at 129-135.

[795] See, e.g., Don Higginbotham, Daniel Morgan, Revolutionary Rifleman (Chapel Hill, North Carolina: University of North Carolina Press, 1961), Chapter V. See also, e.g., John F. Luzader, Saratoga: A Military History of the Decisive Campaign of the American Revolution (New York, New York: Savas Beatie LLC, 2008), at 187, 243-244, 260.

[796] E.g., Hank Messick, King's Mountain: The Epic of the Blue Ridge "Mountain Men" in the American Revolution (Boston, Massachusetts: Little, Brown & Co., 1976), especially at 31-34, 98-99, 131-133.

[797] See, e.g., D. Higginbotham, Daniel Morgan, ante note 795, Chapters VIII and IX.

> [T]hat such as are to act as rifle-men bring with them each one good rifle, to be approved by their captain, for the use of which he shall be allowed at the rate of twenty shillings a year * * * .
>
> And * * * That the companies to be raised in * * * [certain] districts * * * shall consist of expert rifle-men; and shall be * * * allotted two to each regiment, to be employed as light infantry.{EN-1288}

> [T]hat such as are to act as riflemen bring with them one good rifle and tomahawk, each to be approved by their captain, for the use of which guns they shall be allowed 20[shillings] * * * by the year[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> And * * * That, over and above the rifle companies belonging to the German regiment, there be raised seventeen companies of expert riflemen, in * * * [various] counties * * * which shall be allotted * * * to the respective regiments[.]{EN-1289}

If any one of these "expert rifle-men" had earlier served in an established Militia Company, he may have appeared for duty with his rifle under the previous statutory allowance "with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with",{EN-1290} because rifles were not then even standard, let alone mandatory, Militia equipment. And if he had become truly "expert" in the use of his rifle, it was not likely through any regular Militia training, which was of limited duration and of necessity focused on drilling in rigid formations tailored to the capabilities (as well as the limitations) of the smoothbored flintlocks most Militiamen then carried. On the other hand, some Militiamen west of the Blue Ridge Mountains must have successfully incorporated the rifle, and its different tactical employment, into their training well before 1775, or legislators in that year could not have provided with any confidence for the formation and deployment of Militia "companies * * * of expert rifle-men". In any event, Virginia's recruitment of native "expert rifle-men" in 1775 and thereafter amounted to an innovation and improvement in personnel, equipment, and tactics compared to whom and what the Militia had theretofore employed, and was even then employing.

Interestingly enough, though, Virginia's enlistment of "expert rifle-men" was not entirely novel, but actually brought her forces onto at least a par with the most advanced units of the British Army in that particular. Although popular histories usually emphasize American patriots' use of rifles during the War of Independence, the British certainly appreciated the tactical advantages of such arms, and employed them widely, too, typically dispersed among their regular light infantry, as well as in the hands of their German mercenaries and AmericanTory militias.[798] Indeed, all told, the British and their native and foreign allies and auxiliaries probably carried more rifles into battle during the War of Independence than did the patriots.[799]

---

[798] See De Witt Bailey, British Military Flintlock Rifles, ante note 471, at 8 and Chapters 4 and 5; H. Peterson, Arms and Armor in Colonial America, ante note 465, at 203-204.

Whether American Militiamen in Virginia and elsewhere were the original innovators in the use of rifles in the military operations of that time and place, or were proving themselves dominant with such firearms, or were trying simply to maintain at least parity with their British opponents, their arms were not necessarily antiquated or inferior to those of the regular armed forces they faced, but were to a great degree on the very cutting edge of the firearms technology and tactics of that day.

---

[799] De Witt Bailey, "British Military Small Arms in North America, 1755-1783", in Longarms in America, ante note 468, Volume 1, at 23-24; H. Peterson, Arms and Armor in Colonial America, ante note 465, at 218-221. The British Army missed an opportunity to take a significant lead in this field, though, by not encouraging its armorers to perfect the Ferguson or some equivalent type of breech-loading flintlock rifle. See De Witt Bailey, British Military Flintlock Rifles, ante note 471, Chapter 3 & Appendices 3 and 6.

CHAPTER TWENTY

Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia and other military laws presupposed the existence of, and relied upon, a free market in firearms, ammunition, and the services of private gunsmiths.

For more than a century, the members of Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia could never have been expected to bring to their service the arms specified by her Militia statutes—such as "such arms as he is already furnished with", "a good rifle, if to be had", "the best gun of any other sort that they can procure", or "the best arms * * * they can get"[800]—if no reliable source had existed from which those very arms could have been obtained. Neither could they have kept their arms "well fixed" if persons qualified to repair firearms had not been available in many communities. That source was the free market, and those persons private gunsmiths.

A. The free market in arms. A free market developed early in Virginia's history:

> [1645, 1658, and 1662] "That ffree trade be allowed to all the inhabitants * * * to buy and sell at their best advantage[.]"{EN-1291}

And—with the exception of slaves, certain persons of color, hostile Indians, and disloyal individuals[801]—that market extended to firearms and ammunition:

> [1677] "[A]ll persons have hereby liberty to sell armes and ammunition to any of his majesties loyall subjects inhabiting this colony[.]"{EN-1292}

Moreover, the trade in arms was open to nearly all Virginians without anything remotely akin to modern-day "gun control", because (had the term been in then-current usage) "gun control" in pre-constitutional times meant that: (i) the government required just about every free adult able-bodied male to obtain from the free market at least one firearm and ammunition suitable for Militia service; and (ii) to facilitate the latter policy, the government itself participated in and encouraged a free market in arms for its citizens. That is, the market in firearms and ammunition was open to nearly all residents of Virginia not because her General Assembly did not "regulate" their acquisition, possession, and use of those things, but precisely because the success of its comprehensive "regulation" of the Militia necessitated a free market.

---

[800] See ante, at 509-514.

[801] See ante, at 365-369, and post, at 733-742.

All of Virginia's Militia and related statutes presupposed, required, encouraged, and protected a free market in firearms and ammunition. First, most Militiamen had to provide their own firearms[802]—which, even with the government sometimes acting as a middleman,[803] they could not have done without a well-functioning free market. Second, the government obtained arms for military service from the people themselves—by purchasing firearms individuals brought to their service,[804] by paying individuals who supplied their own firearms for such service,[805] by reimbursing individuals who lost their own firearms during their service,[806] and by impressing firearms from some individuals in order to arm others[807]—none of which the government could have done if the people had not been possessed of suitable firearms that in the main they themselves had earlier acquired from the free market. Third, the government purchased firearms from the free market for its own use, there being no public arms manufactory in Virginia until 1775.[808] Fourth, in competition with private merchants,[809] the government sold its own firearms and ammunition, both new and surplus, into the free market. For example:

> • [1762] "WHEREAS * * * a large quantity of gunpowder is constantly kept in the publick magazine * * * which, being left entirely unguarded, may be of dangerous consequence * * *
>
> " * * * the governor * * * [may] cause the said gunpowder * * * to be sold and disposed of for the best price that can be got[.]"{EN-1293}

> • [1764] "[W]hereas the arms, ammunition, provisions, and necessaries purchased at the publick expense, and now on hand, ought to be sold for the publick benefit: Be it enacted * * * , That the commanding officer of each of the companies from which the militia has been sent into service * * * shall * * * sell, for the best price that may be had for the same, all arms, ammunition, provisions, and necessaries purchased at the publick expense * * * and pay the money arising from such sale to the treasurer of this colony * * * for the use of the publick."{EN-1294}

---

[802] See ante, at 408-423.

[803] See ante, at 451-454.

[804] See ante, at 437.

[805] See ante, at 432-435.

[806] See ante, at 435-436.

[807] See ante, at 437-439.

[808] See ante, at 456, and post, at 521.

[809] See ante, at 451-454.

> • [1764] "WHEREAS there are considerable quantities of military stores * * * in the public magazine in * * * Williamsburg, which are of little use or value, and in a short time will be rendered entirely useless, if they continue there: Be it therefore enacted * * * , that [certain named individuals] * * * are * * * appointed commissioners * * * and * * * , after having carefully examined into the condition of the arms and other military stores * * * , to sell and dispose of such of them as they shall judge unnecessary to retain * * * for publick use, or which may be destroyed or rendered useless by continuing there any longer[.]"{EN-1295}

Thus, Virginians of the *pre-*constitutional era found it perfectly compatible with—indeed, necessary for—public safety to distribute "a large quantity of gunpowder" and "considerable quantities of military stores" from "the publick magazine" into private hands through the free market. On the other hand, the firearms the General Assembly presumed that ordinary Virginians could sell outright, or loan to the government in the course of their military service, could be expected to be "in proper order and kind, and fit for the service"—that is, firearms suitable for the military applications of the times.{EN-1296} So no real distinction existed between "public" and "private" when it came to the propriety of ordinary citizens' possessing large quantities of firearms and ammunition of military capability. The political theory that subtends modern "gun control"—namely, that all firearms, and particularly the most modern military firearms, in the government's possession are invariably "good", but the same (or even any) firearms in the hands of private individuals are presumptively "bad"—had no currency in *pre-*constitutional Virginia, and had it circulated would have attained no credence. That was because most "ordinary citizens" then were members of the Militia, and thereby direct participants in the government, themselves personally wielding the ultimate Power of the Sword. So the rights enjoyed by Virginians to a thoroughly free market in arms were not simply, or even primarily, "individual rights", but instead were fundamentally "the rights of an individual in and on behalf of his community": rights necessary for the individual, not only so that he could defend himself against isolated aggression, but especially so that all individuals together would have access to the arms necessary for their community's collective self-defense.

B. Reliance on private gunsmiths. During the *pre-*constitutional period, many firearms would not have become available in Virginia at all had local or regional gunsmiths not produced them. And the members of Virginia's Militia could never have kept their arms "well fixed"—as the statutes required them to do—if persons qualified to repair firearms had not been available in many communities.

At least two hundred twelve gunsmiths have been identified as having worked in Virginia between 1608 and 1800.[810] Their skills were so important to the community, and so beyond the ability of the government to harnass in any other way, that gunsmiths were not only encouraged to provide, but even regularly impressed into, public service:

---

[810] H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia, ante note 731, at 69-108.

> • [1633] "THE necessitie of the present state of the country requiringe, It is thought fitt, That all gunsmiths * * * be compelled to worke at theire trades and not suffered to plant tobacco or corne or doe any other worke in the ground—And the commissioners in the several parts of this colony, shall take care * * * that they have good payment made unto them for theire worke[.]"{EN-1297}

> • [1672 and 1676] "[F]or as much as against all tymes of danger it ought to be the care of all men to provide that their armes and habiliments for war, be alwayes kept fixed and fitt for service, and that armourers and smyths may be encouraged to worke, It is enacted * * * that the commissioners * * * assertaine the rates for the worke of armourers and smyths and such artificers; and for the prevention of the great trouble that usually accrues to artificers in collecting severall small parcells in payment for worke done, * * * the artifficers to be paid entire by the counties and the countyes reimburst by the persons for whome the worke was done; and that the said artificers may not delay people which repaire to them with their armes be strictly enjoyned under a fine to be imposed by the said commissioners to lay aside all other worke to goe about this of armes."{EN-1298}

> • [1692] "Complaint being made to th[e Governor and his Council] by the Comand[rs] in Chief of this Colony, that the Souldiers under their Comands cannot get their Guns fixt, the Smiths refuseing to worke for Tobacco, and for that the same may be of very bad Consequence in these times of danger, It is Ordered that the respective Smiths in this Colony doe without delay fix all Armes * * * brought them by any of the Souldiers of this Countrey, keepe an account of the Worke done and for whom, and returne the same to the next Gen[ll] Assembly that then such care may be taken for payment thereof, as shall be found fitt."{EN-1299}

> • [1705, 1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, 1753, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[U]pon any invasion of the enemy by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * have full power to levy, raise, arm and muster such a number of forces out of the militia * * * as shall be thought requisite and needfull * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * That it shall and may be lawfull by warrant * * * to impress any smith * * * or artificer whatsoever, which shall be thought usefull for the fixing of arms * * * .
>
> * * * * *

> " * * * That every smith * * * imprest * * * and employed about fixing of arms * * * shall be paid and allowed by the public * * * fifty pounds of tobacco[[811]] per day[.]"{EN-1300}

During the first years of the War of Independence, when imports from Britain were largely cut off and trade with France and other foreign countries was sporadic and uncertain, Virginia was particularly dependent upon local private gunsmiths to manufacture new firearms and to repair existing ones. The Commonwealth's major private manufactory of firearms was the Rappahannock Forge, located in Falmouth.[812] In 1776, Virginia's Committee of Safety contracted for the forge's maximum output over the ensuing year. Even so, the forge proved to be a risky business. In 1777, the General Assembly exempted from Militia service "persons concerned in iron or lead works, or persons solely employed in manufacturing fire arms".{EN-1301} In 1778 it prohibited recruiting officers for Virginia's regular Armed Forces from "enlist[ing] any artificer employed by contract in writing for hire in the publick manufactories of fire arms, or at any iron works, nor any indented apprentice in such manufactory or work, nor any imported servant, without leave in writing from the manager of such manufactory or work".{EN-1302} Yet in 1777 it had allowed for the impressment of "any unnecessary number of waggons or horses" "employed at any lead, copper, or iron works", which had embarrassed the forge's operations.{EN-1303} Worse yet, by 1780 the forge's efficiently had been seriously compromised by a lack of necessary workers and equipment. And in 1781 it closed down as the result of British General Lord Cornwallis's military operations in the region. The only other relatively large facility for manufacturing firearms in Virginia at that time—the public State Gun Factory at Fredericksburg—opened in 1775, operated through 1780, but failed by 1783.[813]

Not surprisingly, then, the shortage of gunsmiths during that period remained sufficiently critical that Thomas Jefferson, as Governor of Virginia, in 1781 directed his Commissioner of War "[t]o find some proper person to send out to collect gunsmiths".[814] And the Commonwealth's dependence on the free market remained so nearly complete, that even in October of 1784, three years after the British surrender at Yorktown, the General Assembly "authorized and required [the Governor] to purchase on the best terms he can, either in this country or by importation, * * * as many thousand stand of arms and accoutrements * * * with [811] The Acts from 1757 through 1772 substituted "four shillings" as the rate of pay.

---

[812] See H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia, ante note 731, at 34-38, 125-127; B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 148, 150.

[813] H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia, ante note 731, at 38-41; B. Ahearn, Flintlock Muskets in the American Revolution, ante note 464, at 149. The other twelve States relied primarily on purchases of arms in the free market, rather than public manufacture. See H. Peterson, Arms and Armor in Colonial America, ante note 465, at 180-188.

[814] Quoted in H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia, ante note 731, at 43-44 (footnote omitted).

the words 'Virginia militia' engraved thereon, as the money which from time to time may be appropriated for that purpose will purchase".{EN-1304}

Thus, a thoroughly free market in firearms and ammunition—which enabled average Virginians to acquire firearms suitable for Militia service, and to keep them in working order in their personal possession at all times—was not just incidental, but instead was integral, to the pre-constitutional Militia. Virginia never even questioned, let alone dispensed with or attempted to suppress, a free market in arms, but instead always relied upon it. The existence of a vibrant free market was the practical presupposition underlying Virginia's Militia laws. More than that, the free market actually made the Militia a workable establishment, because without an efficient means to place arms in common Virginians' hands, and to keep those arms in working order, it would have been a "militia" in name only.

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

Virginia enlisted, organized, armed, trained, commanded, and deployed her pre-constitutional Militia on a Local basis.

In 1776, Article 13 of Virginia's Declaration of Rights stated "[t]hat a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state". And in 1791, the Second Amendment reiterated that position in its assertion that "[a] well regulated Militia", predicated upon "the right of the people to keep and bear Arms", is "necessary to the security of a free State". At those times, these were anything but novel and merely theoretical political principles.

From her inception as a Colony, Virginia claimed and exercised the power to marshal "the body of [her] people" in her Militia. In principle, this power reached every adult, male or female, free or in whatever condition of bondage—although in practice it was applied almost exclusively to able-bodied free White males within the range of sixteen to sixty years of age.[815] This was why, after more than one hundred years of the most practical experience possible, Virginians could declare with assurance that "a well regulated militia * * * is the * * * safe defence of a free state"—because, being "composed of the body of the people", "a well regulated militia" is not a "standing arm[y]", which (the Declaration of Rights warned) "in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty". Indeed, "[a] well regulated Militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State" precisely because it consists of WE THE PEOPLE in arms, and thereby renders large "standing armies, in time of peace" unnecessary and any argument for raising them impolitic, impertinent, and in the final analysis improper.

Yet, although in pre-constitutional Virginia (as well as elsewhere throughout America in that era) the Militia was a force as massive as the population of able-bodied adult free males itself, it was not an agglomeration of armed robots, ruled "from the top down" according to some early variant of das Führerprinzip. To the contrary: For Virginians, "a well regulated militia" was one "settled" by a Colonial or State statute but organized on the basis of Local communities—the County, the City, and the Borough.

Virginians knew that the ultimate purpose of "a well regulated militia" is the "defence of a free state". "[D]efence" is primarily conducted where what is worth

---

[815] See ante, Chapter 16, and post, at 611-614.

defending is located. And the "defence of a free state" aims at the security of the people themselves—all of the people, not just a few factions and other special interests—where they live. Not just where they happen to live, either, but especially how they desire to live. "[A] free state" is one in which the people live their own lives as they choose to live them: to enjoy the fruits that derive from what the Declaration of Independence described as "the pursuit of Happiness". And men of reason and good will, if afforded the opportunity, will invariably choose prosperity over poverty, and therefore peace over war, and therefore defense over aggression. Thus, the purpose of the "defence of a free state" is to secure for the people the ability to live peaceful, prosperous lives. Of course, then, "a well regulated militia * * * is the * * * natural * * * defence of a free state". For "natural" means "[p]roduced or effected by nature"[816]—and it is the nature of the people in "a free state" to defend themselves, as part and parcel of self-government. In a like vein, "natural" means "within the scope of human reason or experience", such as "a natural law"[817]—and in a "free state" rational people conversant with political philosophy and history recognize their right and duty under "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" to organize within their own communities for the purpose of defending themselves collectively, with the fullest manifestation of such organization being "a well regulated militia". Moreover, "natural" imports "having an "essential" and "characteristic" relationship[818]—and the self-evidently "essential" and "characteristic" relationship between "a well regulated militia" and "a free state" centers on the people, because the people are the constituents of both "a free state" and the Militia. And of course "a well regulated militia * * * is the proper * * * defence of a free state", not simply because it is "[f]it; accommodated; adapted; suitable; [and] qualified" for that purpose, but because it is truly "[p]eculiar" to that purpose[819]—in the sense that "a well regulated militia" is "not common" to the defense of any other type of "state" but instead uniquely suitable for and the product of "a free state".[820] This is because, being composed of "the body of the people, trained to arms", "a well regulated militia" "pertains to the constitution", "belongs to [the] natural character", "[c]onforms to the order, laws, or actual facts", and "[c]onforms to the truth or reality" of "a free state" in a manner that no other institution can.[821] Thus, "[a] well regulated Militia" is an essential part of a free

---

[816] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[817] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 964, definition 3. Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1630, definition 4.

[818] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 964, definition 1. Accord, Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1506, definition 4.

[819] See S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definitions 5 and 1, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[820] See id., definition 1, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions.

[821] See Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 964, definitions 1, 2, and 4. Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1983, definitions 2 and 4.

people's way of life, because, as the Second Amendment declares, it is "necessary to the security of a free State", not simply in the practical sense of "[n]eedful, indispensably requisite",[822] but especially in the philosophical sense of not only being "[c]onsonant" with and "[d]erived from [the] nature of "a free state", but also "carrying with [it] as natural an evidence as self-evident truths themselves".[823] That being so, "a well regulated Militia" must be organized and must operate primarily on a Local basis, because that is where "the people" who comprise both "a free state" and "a well regulated militia"—as well as the places, the things, and the way of life they seek to protect—are to be found, and therefore where their ultimate defense must be mounted.

In *pre-*constitutional times, this was not merely some idle musing of political philosophers and philologists, but an appreciation that derived from decades of experience of the most seriously practical kind on the part of most Virginians. The obvious reasons for Local organization were two: First, the Militia was always a governmental establishment;[824] and the County, the City, and the Borough were Virginia's basic governmental units. So that arrangement served administrative regularity and convenience. Second, and more pointedly, the absolute practical necessities of the case required it:

> [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, and 1753] "WHEREAS the frontiers of this dominion, being of great extent, are exposed to the invasions of foreign enemies, by sea, and incursions of Indians at land, and great dangers may likewise happen by the insurrections of negros, and others; for all which, the militia * * * is the most ready defence. And foreasmuch, as the militia of those counties, where any of the dangers aforesaid shall arise, must necessarily be first emploied, and may, by the divine assistance, be able to suppress and repel such insurrections and invasions, without obliging that of other counties to be raised[. . .]"{EN-1305}

Not surprisingly, then, every structural and operational aspect of Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia was Local in nature—

A. Militiamen in general. From the beginning, Virginia's Militia was "composed of the body of the people", organized in suitable units where they lived:

> •[1691] "In Obedience to their Ma[jesties'] Instructions Comanding that Care be taken for y^e^ easeing the Inhabitants of this

---

[822] S. Johnson, Dictionary, ante note 50, definition 1, in both the First (1755) and the Fourth (1773) Editions ("necessary").

[823] N. Webster, An American Dictionary, ante note 15, definitions 5 and 6 ("necessary"). Accord, Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1635, definitions 2 and 7.

[824] See ante, Chapter 15.

Country from the trouble of goeing far to Exerciseings and Musters," the Governor and his Council "Ordered that the Comand[rs] in Cheife doe forme into Troopes of Horse & Companies of Foot all the persons fitt to beare Armes in the Severall Counties und[r] their Respective Comands Contriveing them as Conveniently together as possible, not Exceeding fifty persons at the most in a Troope, and Seventy in a foot Company[.]"{EN-1306}

• [1705] "That * * * the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county have full power and authority to list all male persons whatsoever, from sixteen to sixty years of age, within his respective county, to serve in horse or foot, * * * and to order and place * * * them under the command of such captain in the respective countys of their abode, as he shall think fitt.

* * * * *

" * * * That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * make * * * a new list of all the male persons in his respective county capable * * * to serve in the militia, and to order and dispose them into troops or companys, according to the directions of the governor[.]"{EN-1307}

• [1723] "That * * * the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county, have full power and authority to list all free male persons whatsoever, from twenty-one to sixty years of age, within his respective county, to serve in horse or foot * * * and to order and place them under the command of such captain as he shall think fit."{EN-1308}

• [1723, 1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, 1771, and 1775] "[W]hereas it may happen, that the chief magistrates, and other inhabitants of the * * * city [of Williamsburg], may be listed and compelled to serve under the command of the officers of the militia, in the counties of James City, and York, respectively, without the said city; and forasmuch as the same may be very inconvenient, and may render the governor's house, public magazine, and capitol, in the said city, defenceless in times of danger, Be it * * * enacted * * * That no inhabitant of the said city, capable of serving in the militia, shall * * * be compellable to make his or their appearance at any muster of the militia * * * out of the said city[.]"{EN-1309}

• [1738] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons, above the age of one and twenty years, within this colony, under the command of such captains as he shall think fit."{EN-1310}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county[825] shall list all male persons above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within this colony

---

[825] The Act of 1757 excepted "the county of Hampshire".

(imported servants excepted) under the command of such captain as he shall think fit [.]"{EN-1311}

• [1775] "[I]n each county within this colony * * * all free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, above the age of sixteen, and under fifty years, except such as are * * * excepted, shall be enlisted into the militia by the commander in chief of the county, and formed into companies of not less than thirty two, nor more than sixty eight, rank and file[.]"{EN-1312}

• [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years [with various exceptions] * * * shall, by the commanding officer of the county in which they reside, be enrolled or formed into companies of not less than thirty two, nor more than sixty eight, rank and file[.]"{EN-1313}

• [1777] "FOR forming the citizens of Williamsburg, borough of Norfolk, and the professors and students of William and Mary college, into a militia, and better disciplining them: Be it enacted * * * That all male persons between the ages of sixteen and fifty years, within the * * * city or borough, except the persons exempted by an [earlier Militia A]ct * * * and such of the professors and students of William and Mary college as would otherwise be part of the militia of James City county, in which the college is situate, shall, by the commanding officers of the said city and borough, be enrolled and formed into companies of not less than thirty two nor more than sixty eight, rank and file[.]"{EN-1314}

• [1784 and 1785] "[A]ll free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years [with various exceptions] * * * shall be enrolled or formed into companies of five serjeants, three corporals, a drummer, and fifer, and not less than fifty-five[826], nor more than sixty-five, rank and file; and these companies shall again be formed into regiments of not more than one thousand, nor less than five hundred men, if there be so many in the county."{EN-1315}

• [1786] "[T]he * * * commanding officers in the respective counties within this commonwealth, also in the city of Williamsburg and borough of Norfolk, * * * are hereby required to enroll the militia within their several counties and corporations, into distinct companies[.]"{EN-1316}

And such Local enrollment may have been quite specific as to particular groups of individuals:

[1766 and 1771] "[T]he lieutenant or chief commanding officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons of the people called Quakers, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years,

---

[826] The Act of 1785 provided for "three serjeants" and "not less than forty" men in each Company.

within his county, under the command of such captain as he shall think fit[.]"{EN-1317}

B. Militia officers. As with the men in the ranks, most Militia officers were residents of the Localities in which their commands existed. This, for the obvious reasons that: (i) Even more than the men, the officers needed to be intimately familiar with the environs of their commands as well as the resources available and the realism of the plans devised for defending them. (ii) The officers had to know their men, which was unlikely if they did not live amongst them. And (iii) the men would not have had the same degree of confidence in strangers as in Local residents who had attained sufficient social standing to be commissioned as Militia officers.

1. From the beginning, Virginia's Governors, as Commanders in Chief of the Militia in loco regis, appointed officers:

- [1699] "In Order to the Setling of the Militia in the Severall Counties * * * , His Excellency [the Governor] in Councill was pleased to Nominate and appointe the principall Officer's thereof", followed by a long list of the appointees.{EN-1318}

- [1701] "His Ex^{cy} * * * appoint[ed] Gawin Corbin * * * to be Coll: and Comand^{r} in Cheife of all y^{e} Militia horse and foot in y^{e} County of Middlesex.

  "W^{m} Tayloe * * * to be Coll: and Comand^{r} in Cheife of y^{e} County of Richmond[.]"{EN-1319}

- [1702] "[F]or the better Government of the Militia of King William County, [the Governor] * * * appoint[ed] John West to be Collonel * * * of all the Militia within y^{e} said County, William Clayborne to be Lieu^{t} Collonel, and John Waller Major, and they are * * * to transmitt to his Excellency a List * * * of such Persons * * * most fitt to be Captains and other Commissions officers of the several Troops and Companys under their command within y^{e} said County."{EN-1320}

- [1707] "Coll^{o} W^{m} Bassett is appointed Commander in Chiefe of the Militia of King W^{m} County & Coll^{o} Jn^{o} Smith Commander in Chiefe of the Militia of King and Queen County[.]"{EN-1321}

- [1715] "For the better moddling the militia of this Colony, & bringing them under a more regular Discipline, the Governor * * * appoint[ed] * * * [certain] persons to be Lieutenants of the severall Countys", followed by a long list of those selected.{EN-1322}

In the prudent exercise of their executive discretion, though, the Governors did not act arbitrarily, but instead were open to consultation with the people their appointments affected:

- [1684] "That the chief officers of the militia for the upper counties, on the * * * rivers, * * * may present to his excellency [the Governor] the fittest and most able person to command under the captain as lieutenant of each troop, who, in the absence of the captain * * * is to command, lead, train and exercise the troope."{EN-1323}

• [1705] "His Excellency in Council was pleased to recommend to Coll^{o} W^{m} Randolph to advise with the principal Inhabitants of the French Settlement at Manican Town, who are the most proper Persons to be appointed Military Officers among them, his Excell^{cy} intending to forme a foot Company of the Refugees there settled."{EN-1324}

And aggrieved Militiamen enjoyed a right to petition the Governor and his Council to remove an abusive or incompetent commander.{EN-1325}

2. Virginia's General Assembly repeatedly required that Militia officers came from amongst the men whom they were to command:

• [1705] "That * * * the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county have full power and authority to list all male persons whatsoever, from sixteen to sixty years of age within his respective county, to serve in horse or foot, * * * and to order and place * * * them under the command of such captain in the respective countys of their abode, as he shall think fitt."{EN-1326}

Presumably, not just the men, but also their captains, would hail from "the respective countys of their abode", if only because of the impracticality of any other arrangement for command.

• [1723, 1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[A]ll and every such inhabitant [of the city of Williamsburg] * * * (except the maior, recorder, and alderman * * *) shall be listed and trained [in the Militia], * * * under the command of one or more person or persons, of the principal inhabitants of the said city, as shall be thereunto commissionated by the governor[.]"{EN-1327}

• [1723 and 1738] "That every commission-officer in the militia, shall, before he acts under, or executes any such commission, in the court of his county, take the oaths appointed by law[.]"{EN-1328}

An officer would hardly have taken the oath "in the court of his county" unless that County had been the locus of his command.

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "That * * * all county lieutenants, colonels, lieutenant colonels, and other inferior officers, bearing any commission in the militia of this colony, shall be an inhabitant of, and resident in the county of which he is, or shall be commissioned to be an officer of the militia."{EN-1329}

• [1775] "[I]n each county within this colony there shall be a county-lieutenant, colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major, to be commissioned * * * upon the nomination of the committees [of safety] of the respective counties[.]

* * * * *

> " * * * [I]f any officer, when on duty, shall misbehave, * * * the committee [of safety] of the county, city, or borough, by whom such officer was nominated, * * * shall have full power to displace and remove such officer from his post, if they shall judge it expedient for the good of the publick[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [N]othing * * * shall * * * oblige [the inhabitants of the city of Williamsburg or the borough of Norfolk] to muster or serve in the militia out of the said city or borough; but that such inhabitants shall be enlisted and trained within the limits of the said city and borough * * * under a colonel, a major, and the necessary number of captains and other officers, all of whom shall be nominated by the committees of safety of the said city and borough * * * and commissioned by the committee of safety."{EN-1330}
>
> Presumably, a Local Committee of Safety would have nominated Local residents whom the Committeemen knew and trusted.
>
> • [1777] "Each company shall be commanded by a captain, two lieutenants, and an ensign; each battalion by a lieutenant colonel, and major * * * , and the whole by a county lieutenant. These officers shall be resident within their county[.]"{EN-1331}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "Each company shall be commanded by a captain, a lieutenant, and an ensign; each regiment by a lieutenant colonel commandant, and two majors; and the whole by a county lieutenant * * * . These officers shall be resident within their county[.]"{EN-1332}

Even when raising a force of regular troops in 1775, the General Assembly provided that "the deputies of each district[[827]] * * * , excepting the counties of Accomack and Northampton, shall appoint one captain, two lieutenants, and one ensign, to command the company of men to be raised in such district".{EN-1333} Presumably, "the deputies" would not have appointed men they did now know, or men wholly unacquainted with their Counties, and therefore selected prominent and trustworthy County residents.

C. Militiamen's general armament. As detailed above, in terms of the firearms and ammunition generally available to Militiamen, Virginia's Militia was thoroughly Local in nature. Public arms were stored in such arsenals, magazines, and ad hoc arrangements as the government maintained from time to time.[828] But, as required by law during the entire *pre-*constitutional period, at least one firearm and ammunition suitable for Militia service had to repose in each and every Militiaman's possession at all times—and most firearms used for Militia service were [827] These "district[s]", each consisting of two or more Counties, were specially created by this statute.

---

[828] See ante, at 446-451.

private property, which Militiamen themselves purchased in the free market and thereafter held in their own hands, in their own homes, dispersed throughout their own communities to the selfsame degree that they were.[829] Because "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[830] its locus must be where and in whose hands the guns actually are. In pre-constitutional Virginia, the guns were to be found in Local communities; the people who possessed and trained to use the guns were the residents of Local communities; and therefore in both principle and practice the focal points of political power were Local communities.

D. Provision of firearms and ammunition. Inasmuch as, in the final analysis, "the Sword and Soveraignty always march hand in hand",[831] that the County, the City, and the Borough throughout Virginia were also the loci for provision and distribution of public arms to Militiamen is highly significant.

1. Fines assessed against defaulting Militiamen under the Militia Acts were expended in and for the benefit of the Localities in which they arose, usually to supply firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements for Local Militia Companies.[832]

2. Other of Virginia's statutes empowered Localities to see to, or to act as intermediaries with regard to, the provision of additional arms for Militiamen's use:

> • [1643] "VPON consideration * * * of the scarsity of powder and aminition in the plantation and the difficultie in procureing the same, It is thought fitt and enacted that the Governour * * * do allott a barrel of powder to each countie, to be kept and preserved * * * a publique stock, for which the comander of each county is to be responsible."{EN-1334}
>
> • [1656] "IT is ordered that for this present year the com'rs. of the militia in every county endeavour to provide four barrels of powder with shot proportionable for each regiment which shall be allowed the next year out of the several county levies[.]"{EN-1335}
>
> • [1666] "WHEREAS there is a generall complaint of the want of ammunition for defence of the country in these times of eminent danger, It is enacted * * * that each county shall by their by-laws be impowered to make such provision thereof at a county charge as their severall occasions shall necessarily require."{EN-1336}
>
> • [1673 and 1676] "FOR the better supply of the country with armes and ammunition, Be it enacted * * * , that the captaines of ffoote and horse in each county doe take a strict and perticuler account of what armes and ammunition are wanting in their severall companies and troops

---

[829] See ante, Chapters 17 through 21.

[830] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[831] AN ARGUMENT, Shewing, that a Standing Army Is inconsistent with A Free Government, ante note 27, at 7.

[832] See ante, at 441-443, and post, at 538-541 and 692-696.

* * * : And be it further enacted * * * , that the perticuler county courts be impowred * * * upon their respective counties to lay and raise a levy for the provideing of armes and ammunition for supplying the wants aforesaid, that is to say, muskitts and swords for the ffoote, and pistolls, swords and carbines for horse, as alsoe for every lysted souldier at the least two pounds of powder and six pounds of shott, the said armes and ammunition * * * to remaine in the hands of the officers of the militia for them to dispose of * * * as there shalbe occasion; and that those to whome distribution of armes and ammunition shalbe made doe pay for the same at a reasonable rate, to be collected by the sherriffe or collector as in the case of levyes and publique dues[.]"{EN-1337}

• [1676] "[E]ach county * * * is required to furnish its perticular soldiers with two pounds of powder and six pounds of shott a man with good and well fixt guns and other armes for the present, and for what ammunition more shall be wanting that it be provided by and at the charge of the publique[.]"{EN-1338}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f it shall be made appear to the court of any county, by the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, and captain of any company,[833] that any soldier inlisted in the foot, is so poor, as not to be able to purchase the arms [required by law] * * * ; then such court shall * * * immediately depute some person to send for the same to England * * * , and to levy the charge * * * in the next county levy, which arms * * * shall be marked with the name of the county[.]"{EN-1339}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] Certain "persons * * * exempted from mustering * * * shall provide arms for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they shall respectively reside * * * . And if they shall fail or refuse so to do, * * * the several courts of the counties, wherein the persons * * * shall reside, * * * are * * * impowered and required to levy the value of the same on each of them[.]"{EN-1340}

• [1762] "[T]he several persons herein after-mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective companies * * * : All his majesty's justices of the peace * * * (except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia * * *) all persons bred to and actually practising physick or surgery, and all inspectors at the publick warehouses appointed for the inspection of tobacco * * * .

" * * * Provided always, That the persons so exempted * * * shall provide complete sets of arms * * * required for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside, and if they shall fail or

---

[833] In 1757 and thereafter, the facts were to be "certified to the court of any county, by order of [a] court-martial".

refuse so to do, * * * the courts of the several counties, city or borough, wherein the persons * * * shall reside * * * are * * * empowered and required, to levy the value of such arms on each of them[.]"{EN-1341}

• [1766 and 1771] "[T]he several persons herein after mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective companies, that is to say, all his majesty's justices of the peace * * * (except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia * * *) all persons bred to, and actually practising physic or surgery, all the people called Quakers, and all inspectors at the public warehouses, appointed for the inspection of tobacco * * * .

" * * * Provided always, That the persons so exempted (not being Quakers) shall provide compleat sets of arms * * * required for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside: And if they shall fail or refuse so to do, * * * the courts of the several counties, city or borough, wherein the persons * * * shall reside * * * are * * * impowered and required to levy the value of such arms on each of them[.]"{EN-1342}

• [1775] "[T]he members of his majesty's council, and the committee of safety, the president of the convention, treasurer, attorney-general, auditor, clerk of the council, clerk of the secretary's office, clerk of the general convention, and clerk of the committee of safety (each of which exempts furnishing a stand of arms for a soldier) * * * shall be exempted from * * * enlistment [in the Militia]."{EN-1343}

3. In addition, on numerous occasions Virginia's Governor and Council delivered arms to Local jurisdictions for the latters' use. For example—

• [1705] The Governor and Council arranged for "the distribution of * * * Arms and Shott" —to the number of three hundred thirty-two carbines, six hundred forty-four pistols, and eight hundred twenty muskets—"to be sent to ye several Countys for the Service of the Militia on any emergency".{EN-1344}

• [1707] "Ordered that a supply of arms & ammunition be sent to the County of New Kent and King William and lodged in such manner as may be most usefull for the defence * * * ag^{t} the Indians."{EN-1345}

• [1708] "Ordered that a barrell of powder & a proportionable quantity of Shott with thirty Musquetts and Swords be sent to Yorktown and lodged at Major Buckners for the use of the Inhabitants in case any attempt be made on that place by the Enemys Privateers."{EN-1346}

• [1738] "Whereas the Inhabitants on Sherrando River * * * have prayed for a Supply of Arms & Ammunition for their defence, It is * * * Ordered that out of his Majesties Stores there be delivered to John Lewis * * * who is hereby Approved to be a Capt over such of the Inhabitants > as live in Beverly Mannor, Thirty Muskets & Eight pair of Pistols with a proportionable quantaty of Powder and Ball[.]"{EN-1347}

Thus, Virginians in the *pre-*constitutional era expected that, when Local governments acquired firearms and ammunition, it was for the people's use in those Localities. And, until the Earl of Dunmore's abortive and self-destructive attempt to suppress the patriots in 1775,[834] what they expected always came to pass. Overall, this dispersal and decentralization of arms within Virginia's Localities embodied the very opposite of the "top-down" policy of "gun control" touted today by all too many public officials, aspirants for political office, special-interest groups, members of the intelligentsia, and spokesmen for the big media who know next to nothing about *pre-*constitutional legal history and appear to care even less.

E. Enforcement of discipline. Wherever Militiamen served, they could conceivably misbehave. And by mandating that the initial disciplinary action addressed to such misbehavior should occur at the Local level, the statutes demonstrated where effective responsibility and authority started (and often ended).

1. Local Militia officers were authorized to punish Militiamen's misbehavior at musters and training immediately:

> • [1705] "[A]ll soldiers in horse and ffoot during the time they are in arms, shall observe and obediently perform the commands of their officer relating to their exercising according to the best of their skill, and * * * the chief officers upon the place shall * * * imprison mutineers and such soldiers as do not their dutys as soldiers at the day of their musters and training, and shall and may inflict for punishment * * * any mulct not exceeding fifty pounds of tobacco, or * * * imprisonment without bail or mainprise, not exceeding ten days."{EN-1348}

> • [1723] "[A]ll soldiers, during the time they are in arms, shall observe and obediently perform the commands of their officer, relating to their exercise, according to the best of their skill. And if any soldier * * * shall, at any * * * muster, disobey his officers' commands, or behave himself disorderly or refractorily thereat, * * * the chief commanding officer then present, [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time not exceeding twenty minutes. And if any such soldier shall thereafter offend, it shall and may be lawful for the said commanding officer * * * to commit such offender to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days[.]"{EN-1349}

> • [1738] "[I]f any soldier, during the time he is in arms at a general muster, shall refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, * * * the chief commanding officer, then present, [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels,

---

[834] See post, at 567-597.

for any time, not exceeding five minutes: And for a second offence, at such general muster, the offender shall be * * * commit[ted] * * * to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days. And if any soldier, during the time he is in arms, at any private muster, shall misbehave, * * * such offender shall be * * * tied neck and heels, for any time, not exceeding five minutes, for the first offence; and for the second offence * * * commit[ted] * * * to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days."{EN-1350}

• [1755] "[I]f any soldier, shall at any general or private muster, refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at the courts martial, * * * the chief commanding officer, then present, * * * [may] fine every such soldier, * * * which fine shall be immediately paid down to such officer * * * . And in case any soldier so fined * * * shall refuse or fail to pay down his fine, or to give * * * security for paying the same * * * such officer * * * [may] commit every such soldier to the county goal, there to remain without bail or mainprize, for any time not exceeding three days[.]"{EN-1351}

• [1757 and 1759] "[I]f any soldier shall, at any general or private muster, refuse to perform the command of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at the courts martial * * * the chief commanding officer, then present, * * * [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes, or inflict such corporal punishment as he shall think fit, not exceeding twenty lashes."{EN-1352}

• [1762, 1766, 1771, and 1775] "[I]f any soldier shall at any general or private muster refuse to perform the command of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at * * * [a] court-martial, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of forty shillings[[835]] * * * ; or * * * the chief commanding officer then present * * * [may] cause such offender to be tied, neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes, and shall not inflict any other corporal punishment."{EN-1353}

• [1775] "[I]f any officer or soldier [among the Minutemen], during the time of his attendance on training duty, in battalion or companies, * * * shall refuse to obey the commands of his superiour officer, or behave himself mutinously or refractorily, or shall in any other manner transgress the rules of good order and decency, every such offender shall * * * be confined, for any time not exceeding twenty four hours, or fined, in any sum not exceeding one month's pay[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f any [regular] soldier [in the Militia] shall, at any general or private muster, refuse to obey the command of his officer, or [835] The Act of 1775 dispensed with the fine.

shall behave himself refractorily and mutinously, or misbehave himself at a court martial, * * * the commanding-officer then present * * * [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes."{EN-1354}

• [1777] "If any soldier, at any muster, shall refuse to obey the command of his officer, or shall behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at a court martial, the commanding officer, or court martial, may * * * put him under arrest for the day, or may cause him to be bound, neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes."{EN-1355}

• [1779] "Every non-commissioned officer or private, who at any muster shall not obey the lawful commands of his superiour officer, or shall behave mutinously, riotously, get drunk or not demean himself as a non-commissioned officer or soldier, shall be put under guard for the day, and * * * shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding ten pounds."{EN-1356}

• [1784 and 1785] "If any non-commissioned officer or soldier, shall behave himself disobediently or mutinously when on duty, on, or before any [Militia] court or board, * * * the commanding officer, court or board may either confine him for the day, or cause him to be bound neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes."{EN-1357}

Local Militia officers could also summarily punish obstreperous individuals who either were not members of the Militia at all, or who although being members were not in service at that particular time:

• [1777] "If any bystander interrupt, molest, or insult any officer of soldier while on duty, at any general or private muster, or misbehave before any court martial, the commanding officer, or court martial, may put him under arrest for the day."{EN-1358}

• [1779] "If any by-stander interrupt, molest, or insult any officer of soldier when on duty, or misbehave before any court-martial, he may be put under guard by the commanding officer for the day, and shall be fined in any sum not exceeding ten pounds."{EN-1359}

• [1784 and 1785] "If any bystander shall interrupt, molest, or insult any officer or soldier while on duty at any muster, or shall be guilty of the like conduct before any court or board * * * , the commanding officer, or such court or board, may cause him to be confined for the day."{EN-1360}

2. Other punishments for breaches of Militia regulations could be imposed later on, at Local courts-martial:

• [1705 and 1723] "That the field officers and captains of every county * * * have full power and authority to meet yearly at the court-house in their respective countys * * * in October * * * to inspect the severall lists or accounts given by the captains * * * and thereupon to mulct every defaulter or offender therein charged, according to the merit of his default or offence * * * .

"Provided always, That nothing * * * be construed to give any power or authority to the said ffield officers and captains to meet or act as aforesaid at any other place or times[.]"{EN-1361}

• [1723] The "maior, recorder, and alderman * * * in the[ ] * * * court of hustings [in Williamsburg], upon the complaint of any officer * * * appointed to command the militia within the said city; and upon sufficient proof, shall and may give judgment against any person * * * listed under the command of such officer * * * for the fines which such person * * * shall be liable to, by means of his * * * not appearing, or not doing his * * * duty at any muster, or upon any other service within the said city[.]"{EN-1362}

• [1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]t shall and may be lawful, for the field officers, and captains, of every county, * * * and they are hereby required to meet at the court-house of their counties * * * on the day next following the general muster, then and there to hold a court martial * * * , and to enquire * * * of all delinquents returned by the captains, for absence from musters, or appearing without arms and accoutrements[.[836]]"{EN-1363}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he colonel, major, and captains of the militia of the * * * city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, * * * shall * * * hold a court martial at the court houses of the said city and borough * * * in the same manner, and for the same purposes as the courts martial * * * held in the counties[.]"{EN-1364}

• [1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]t shall and may be lawful to and for the courts-martial [of the city of Williamsburg] * * * to order and direct either the sergeant of the said city, or the sheriffs of the * * * counties of York and James-City, to receive and collect all such fines as shall be inflicted and ordered to be levied by them on such of the inhabitants of the said city as shall reside in their respective precincts[.]"{EN-1365}

• [1775] "[I]t shall and may be lawful for the field-officers and captains of every county * * * to meet at the courthouse of their respective counties the day next following the general muster in * * * April and October in every year, * * * then and there to hold a court-martial * * * to inquire * * * of all delinquents * * * for absence from musters, or appearing without arms, powder, or ball.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he * * * militia officers, as well as soldiers, [in the city of Williamsburg and the borough of Norfolk] shall be liable to all the

---

[836] The Acts of 1757 through 1771 substituted "without arms, powder, or ball" for "without arms and accoutrements".

penalties * * * to be inflicted on the officers and soldiers in the counties, either for neglect of duty or misbehaviour, in any respect whatsoever, to be adjudged by the courts of hustings both in the said city and borough[.]"{EN-1366}

• [1776] "[W]hereas * * * the court of Hustings in the city of Williamsburg is to have jurisdiction and to adjudge all penalties to be inflicted * * * on the militia officers and soldiers in the said city, either for neglect of duty or misbehaviour, and * * * it is difficult and inconvenient to hold such courts: For remedy whereof, * * * That courts-martial for punishing delinquents * * * in the said city shall be held by the field-officers and captains * * * , and not by the court of Hustings."{EN-1367}

• [1777] "The county lieutenant, field officers, and captains * * * shall hold a court martial at the courthouse of their county, or at, or convenient to, the place where the general muster shall be, on the day following their general muster * * * . The said court * * * shall * * * inquire * * * into all delinquencies[.]"{EN-1368}

• [1784 and 1785]"[T]he governor, with advice of council, shall have power to arrest the county lieutenant or commanding officer of a county, and all other officers, for any misconduct whatever, and upon trial and conviction, may censure or cashier them. * * * All officers under the county lieutenant or commanding officer of a county, may also be arrested by such commanding officer, and reported to the governor for trial, or at the option of such commanding officer, a general court-martial * * * may * * * be held * * * . Any non-commissioned officer or soldier offending, shall be tried by a like general court-martial, and may, on conviction, be censured or fined at the discretion of the court; and failing to make instant payment of such fine, or to give sufficient security therefor, within such time as the court may think proper, shall receive corporal punishment, not exceeding twenty lashes. * * *

" * * * [T]he commander of a county, shall on some day in * * * May and November (his general muster being over) summon all his field officers, and an equal number of the senior magistrates, and with them * * * shall form a court of enquiry, and assessment of fines * * * . The county lieutenant shall then lay before the said court, all the returns of delinquencies * * * , whereupon they shall proceed to hear and determine on them. All fines to be assessed * * * shall be collected by the sheriff of the county, upon a list thereof * * * . And should any person so charged with fines, fail to make payment, * * * the sheriff is * * * authorized to make distress and sale therefor, in the same manner as is directed in the collection of taxes."{EN-1369}

F. Use of Militia fines. An old adage recommends that one "follow the money" in order to assess where real political power, influence, and benefit lie. In *pre-*constitutional Virginia, enforcement of Militia discipline usually resulted in the assessment of fines against defaulters.[837] And, typically, the moneys collected were allotted directly to the Militia itself or to Local governmental units to subsidize the procurement of firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements for the Localities' own Militiamen:

> • [1659 and 1662] "BEE it enacted that a provident supplie be made of gunn powder and shott to our owne people, and this strictly to bee lookt to by the officers of the militia, (vizt.) That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least which are to be provided by every man for his family * * * , and whosoever shall faile of makeing such provision to be fined ffiftie pounds of tobacco to bee laied out by the county courts for a common stock of amunition for the county."{EN-1370}
>
> • [1705 and 1723] "[T]he * * * ffield officers and captains * * * have full power and authority to order and dispose the tobaccoes which shall * * * accrew and arise upon the ffines, penaltys and fforfeitures * * * , in such manner as in their discretions shall seem best * * * for furnishing the severall troops and companys belonging to the county with necessary drums, colours, trumpets, leading staffes, partizans and halberts, and for procuring such and so many books of military dissipline as shall be thought convenient[838], and after all these for providing arms and ammunition for the countys use with the overplus."{EN-1371}
>
> • [1738] Courts-martial composed of "the field officers, and captains, of every county * * * shall have power * * * to order and dispose of all * * * fines, in the first place, for buying drums, trumpets, and trophies, for the use of the troop or company from whence the same arise; and afterwards, for supplying the militia with arms."{EN-1372}
>
> • [1738, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] The fine against "the lieutenant of any county * * * failing to appoint a general muster" was to be dispersed "one moiety to our sovereign lord the king * * * for and towards the better supplying the county with arms; and the other moiety to the informer".{EN-1373}
>
> • [1740] Penalties under this statute were "[t]o be recovered * * * to the same uses" as stipulated in the statute of 1738.{EN-1374}
>
> • [1748 and 1753] "[O]ne moiety of all * * * forfeitures" assessed against delinquent Militiamen "shall go * * * for and towards the better supplying with arms that county where such offence shall be committed, and the other moiety to him or them that will inform or sue for the same".{EN-1375}

---

[837] See post, at 666-697.

[838] The Act of 1723 dispensed with "books of military dissipline".

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] Fines imposed on persons selling or buying public arms were to be dispersed, "one moiety * * * for the use of the county, to which the arms shall belong, for the purchasing other arms, and the other moiety to the informer".

The courts-martial of every County were to "order and dispose of all * * * fines [imposed on delinquents for not performing their duties], for buying drums, trumpets and trophies for the use of the militia of the county, and for supplying the militia of the said county with arms."{EN-1376}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[A]ll the fines * * * shall be one half * * * for and towards supplying with arms the militia of the county to which the offender belongs, and the other half to the informer[.]"{EN-1377}

• [1766 and 1771] "[T]he persons so exempted (not being Quakers) shall provide compleat sets of arms * * * required for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they shall respectively reside: And if they shall fail or refuse so to do, * * * the courts of the several counties, city or borough * * * are hereby impowered and required to levy the value of such arms on each of them respectively."{EN-1378}

• [1775] The Militia "captains [of each Company] shall provide drums, fifes, colours, and halberds, at the publick expense, to be reimbursed out of the fines [imposed on delinquents]".

Certain fines "levied by a court-martial" in each County against officers were to be "appropriated to the purchasing arms and ammunition for the use of such as are not able to procure the same".

And "the fines imposed * * * on the chief officer for not enlisting the men in his county, and on the commanding-officer present in the county for not appointing general musters, shall be to the use of the county, for providing arms[.]"{EN-1379}

• [1777] "All fines * * * shall be appropriated, in the first place, to the payment of the salaries [of certain Militia personnel] * * * , then to reimbursing the publick treasury for any arms purchased for the poor soldiers of such county, and for drums, fifes, and colours, bought for the several companies; and if any surplus remain, it shall be laid out * * * in establishing and furnishing, for the use of their county, a magazine of small arms, field pieces, ammunition, and such other military stores as may be useful in case of invasion or insurrection."{EN-1380}

• [1784 and 1785] "[E]ach sergeant shall have a pair of moulds fit to cast balls for their respective companies, to be purchased by the commanding officer, out of the monies arising on delinquencies; * * * [and] the court[-martial] * * * appointed for trying delinquencies * * * shall cause * * * [arms for poor Militiamen] to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents.

* * * * *

> " * * * The lieutenant or commanding officer of a county shall cause to be purchased out of the money arising from the fines, for every regiment in his county, the usual set of colours, * * * also a drum and fife for each company[.]"{EN-1381}

These requirements were taken seriously. For example, when in 1772 the Governor sought advice as to his authority "to remit certain Militia Fines", the Council "gave it as their Opinion, that all such Fines being appropriated by the Act of Assembly to particular Purposes, it was not in his Excellency's Power to remit them".{EN-1382}

G. Musters and training. If "'[p]olitical power grows out the barrel of a gun'" in an effective manner, it does so, not simply to the extent that the people adventitiously possess firearms, or to the extent that they know how to use the arms they possess as isolated individuals, but instead largely (if not only) to the degree that they are prepared and willing to employ those arms in a collective and organized fashion for a common goal. This is the lesson Virginia learned from all of her *pre-*constitutional experience: namely, "[t]hat a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state".[839]

Virginia's goal was always near-universal—and, to the extent practical, comprehensive and thoroughgoing—preparedness. As early as 1688, the King instructed his Governor to > take care that all Planters and Christian Servants be well and fitly provided with arms and that they be listed under Officers and when as often as you shall think fit mustered and trained whereby they may be in a better readiness for the Defence of our * * * Colony * * * .

>
> * * * And you are to take special Care that neither the frequency nor unreasonableness of remote Marches Musters and trainings be an unnecessary Impediment to the affairs of the Planters.{EN-1383}

And to that same end (albeit under a different Monarch), in 1701 the Governor issued a proclamation that "(for our better defence) all & Every the militia horse and foot be alwaies in readynes at an hours warning well armed and Equipt for warr".{EN-1384}

1. To approach such a high degree of readiness in a community of widely dispersed population, though, required that "the body of the people" be "trained to arms" in geographical proximity to where they lived and worked, so as to maximize their practical ability to muster and exercise on a regular basis while simultaneously minimizing the disruption of their normal lives. So, from the beginning of the

---

[839] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13 (emphasis supplied).

Colony, musters and training of Militiamen centered in each County, City, and Borough:

> • [1632] "That the comanders of all the severall plantations, doe upon holy days exercise the men under his comand, and that the comanders yearlie doe likewise uppon the first day of December, take a muster of theire men, * * * as also of armes and munition[.]"{EN-1385}
>
> • [1682] "[T]hat twenty men well furnished with horses and all other accoutrements be raised * * * in each of * * * [certain] counties * * * . And * * * that each captain * * * shall once every month muster, treine, exercise, instruct and discipline the troop of soldiers under his command[.]"{EN-1386}
>
> • [1684] "[E]very collonell of a regiment within this country, shall once every yeare * * * cause a generall muster, and exercise of the regiment under his command, or oftner if occasion shall require.
>
> "And * * * every captain or commander of any troop of horse or foot company, within this country, shall once at the least in every three months, muster, traine and exercise, the troop or company under his command, to the end, they may be better fitted and enabled, for * * * service, when they shall be commanded thereunto."{EN-1387}
>
> • [1684] "[E]ach captain [of the militia for the upper Counties, on the rivers,] * * * shall once every month, at the least, muster, traine, exercise, instruct and discipline the troope under his command[.]"{EN-1388}
>
> • [1703] Recognizing that "the most effectual means for the defence of this Colony depends upon the well ordering and disciplining the Militia", the Governor ordered the "Commanders in cheif of each County * * * to appoint a Gen^{ll} Muster of all the Militia under their respective commands, and take especial care & give strict directions that all Persons serving in the Militia be well provided with arms & ammunition according to Law. And * * * to give directions to the Captains of each Troop & Company * * * duly to exercise their said Troops & Companys once every three weeks, and to take care that all Persons without Priveledge or exemption be listed & Personally Performe their duty at the said Musters."{EN-1389}
>
> • [1704] The Governor ordered the "Commanders in Chief of the respective Countys * * * to appoint a Generall Muster of all the Militia under their respective Commands at such time and place as they shall judge most convenient, at which they are to require all Persons serving in the Militia to appear * * * then to give Orders & directions to the Captaines of the sev^{ll} Troops and Companys * * * that they duly exercise their said Troops and Companys once every moneth at the most convenient places for their meeting[.]"{EN-1390}
>
> • [1705] "That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county once every year at least, cause a generall muster and exercise of all the horse and ffoot in his county * * * and oftener if there be occasion, and that every captain both of horse and foot once in every three months, muster, train and exercise his troop or company, or oftener if occasion require.

"Provided, That no soldier in horse or foot, be fined above five times in one year for neglect in appearing."{EN-1391}

Musters of individual Companies were denominated "particular" musters, to distinguish them from the countywide, or "generall", musters. Thus, the number of possible fines delimited the extent of mandatory training—in this case, five musters were specified (one "generall" and four "particular"). A chief officer could call for "generall" musters "oftener if there be occasion"; and a captain could call for particular musters "oftener if occasion require[d]"—but no Militiaman could be fined for failing to attend any such additional muster.

• [1711] The Governor and his Council determined that "it is necessary the Country be put into an imediate posture of defence by training the Militia, and that the following Scheme proposed by the Governor for the more effectual prevention of the Enemy's attempts be put in execution Viz[t]

"That a General Muster of the Militia of each County be forthwith appointed and an exact account taken how they are armed & provided with ammunition.

"That the Militia of each County be divided into three parts * * * and that each of the said Divisions do meet and exercise once a Week * * * .

"That the Commanding Officers of each County shall notify to the Governor the places of Rendevouze for the respective Divisions of their Militia, and shall likewise appoint a place of Gen[ll] Rendevouze for the whole Militia of the County upon an Alarm[.]"{EN-1392}

Interestingly, to the Governor,"training the Militia" included not only "exercis[ing]" the men but also taking an inventory of their arms and planning for their deployment during "an Alarm".

• [1712] The Governor "Ordered that for preventing any sudden Attempts of * * * [certain] Indians, at least a Troop or Company of the Militia in each of the Frontier Countys be drawn together and exercised once a Week untill further Order."{EN-1393}

• [1723] "[T]o the end, the militia of this * * * colony and dominion, being settled and armed, * * * may be the better fitted for service, Be it * * * enacted * * * That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county, once every year at least, cause a muster and exercise of all the troops and companies in his county, at one or more place or places, or oftner, if there shall be occasion:—And that every captain, once in every three months, muster, train, and exercise his troop or company, or oftner, if occasion require. Provided, that no officer or soldier be fined above five times in one year."{EN-1394}

• [1723, 1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[N]o inhabitant of the * * * city [of Williamsburg], capable of serving in the militia, shall hereafter to compellable to make * * * appearance at any muster of the militia * * * out of the said city: But all and every such * * * inhabitants (except the maior, recorder, and alderman of the said city) shall be listed and trained, * * * under the command of one or more person or persons, of the principal inhabitants of the said city[.]"{EN-1395}

• [1738] "[F]or the better training and exercising the militia, and rendering them more serviceable, Be it * * * enacted, That every captain shall, once in three months, or oftner, if required, muster, train, and exercise his troop or company: And the * * * chief commanding officer in every county, shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the troops and companies within his county, to be made in the month of September, every year"—"so that no person be fined above five times a year for * * * failure" to "appear[ ] at muster, compleatly armed and accoutred".{EN-1396}

• [1740] "[E]very captain, once in every two months, or oftner, if required, shall muster, train, and exercise his troop or company: And the * * * chief commanding officer in every county, shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the troops and companies within his county to be made, in the months of March and September, in every year, or oftner, if there shall be occasion"; and "officers and soldiers * * * offending against the[se] directions * * * shall, for every offence, incur * * * penalties", "so that no person be fined above eight times in any year".

This, however, was a special wartime measure, enacted "that the militia * * * should be kept under stricter discipline, more frequently trained and exercised, * * * the better to enable them to contend with regular troops"; and, upon a "proclamation of peace, this act, as to so much thereof, as relate[d] to the disciplining and exercising the militia, [was to] be * * * repealed and made void".{EN-1397}

• [1755] "[E]very captain shall once in three months, and oftner if thereto required, by the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, muster, train and exercise his troop or company, and the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the troops and companies within his county, in the months of March and September yearly[.]

* * * * *

" * * * Provided, That no person be fined above six times in the year for any particular default[.]"{EN-1398}

• [1757 and 1759] "And for the better training and exercising the militia, and rendering them more serviceable, Be it * * * enacted * * * , That every captain shall, once in three months, and oftner if thereto required by the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, muster, train, and exercise his company, and the * * * chief commanding officer in the county shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the companies within his county, * * * in the months of March or April, and September or October, yearly[.]

* * * * *

" * * * Provided, That no person be fined above six times in the year for any particular default."{EN-1399}

• [1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he * * * chief commanding officer, of the militia of the several counties of this colony, and also of the city of Williamsburg and borough of Norfolk, shall cause a general muster of the several companies of their militia once only in every year, * * * in the months of March or April[.]"{EN-1400}

• [1775] "[T]here shall be a private muster of the several companies in each county once a fortnight, except in the months of December, January, and February * * * and moreover, there shall be a general muster in every county, in the months of April and October in each year[.]"{EN-1401}

• [1776] "[W]hereas, by the * * * ordinance [of 1775], it is * * * ordered, that there shall be a private muster of the several companies of each county once a fortnight, which, from experience, is found burthensome: Be it * * * ordained * * * That there shall be a private muster of the several companies in each county or corporation once in four weeks, and no oftener."{EN-1402}

• [1777] "There shall be a private muster of every company once in every month, except the months of January and February, at such convenient time and place as the captain * * * shall appoint, and a general muster in each county at a convenient place, near the centre of the county, on some day in the months of April and October, in every year, to be appointed by the county lieutenant[.]"{EN-1403}

• [1777] "[T]he militia of the said city [of Williamsburg] and borough [of Norfolk], with the professors and students of the * * * college, shall be mustered, trained, and employed, at the same times, and in the same manner, and * * * shall be armed with the same weapons * * * as the militia of a county[.]"{EN-1404}

• [1779] "[I]n every county where there are more than one battalion, there shall be a muster of each battalion in the months of March and October in every year, to be appointed by the county lieutenant, * * * at, or as near the centre of the districts of such battalions as may be."{EN-1405}

• [1780] "[E]very captain appointed to command such part of the * * * militia as are * * * directed to hold themselves in readiness, shall once in every fortnight call them together at some convenient place > within their respective counties, for the purpose of training and disciplining them[.]"{EN-1406}

>
> • [1784] "There shall be a private muster of every company once in every three months, at such convenient time and place as the captain * * * shall appoint; a muster of each regiment, on some day in the month of March or April, in every year, to be appointed by the commanding officer thereof, at a convenient place, near the centre of the regiment; and a general muster of the whole on some day in the month of October or November, in every year, to be appointed by the county lieutenant * * * at a convenient place near the centre of the county * * * . Every officer and soldier shall appear at his respective muster-field on the day appointed, by eleven o'clock in the forenoon, armed, equipped, and accoutred[.]"{EN-1407}
>
> • [1785] "There shall be a private muster of every company once in two months, except December and January, at such convenient time and place as the captain * * * shall appoint; a muster of each regiment on some day in the month of March or April, in every year, to be appointed by the commanding officer thereof, at a convenient place, near the centre of the regiment; and a general muster of the whole on some day in the month of October or November, in every year, to be appointed by the county-lieutenant * * * at a convenient place near the centre of the county * * * . Every officer and soldier shall appear at his respective muster-field on the day appointed, by eleven o'clock in the forenoon, armed, equipped, and accoutred[.]"{EN-1408}

The annual burden of required musters and exercises varied widely over the years, reflecting different levels of perceived danger: five under the laws enacted in 1684, 1705, 1723, and 1738; six for 1755, 1757, 1759, and 1784; seven for 1785; eight for 1740; eleven for 1776; twelve for 1682, 1684, 1704, and 1777; seventeen for 1703; twenty for 1775; twenty-four for 1780; fifty-two for 1711 and 1712; and even one on each "holy day[ ]" and "uppon the first day of December" pursuant to the law of 1632. As in 1740, the large numbers of musters in certain years were intended "the better to enable the[Militia] to contend with regular troops" (although that, of course, was inevitably one major purpose of all Militia training at all times). In any event, the annual pattern was always the same: one or two "general" musters of all the Militia Companies in each County, and several "particular" (sometimes called "private") musters for each individual Company—as the statutes of 1777, 1784, and 1785 explicitly required, but as must always have been the actual practice, "at a convenient place, near the centre of the county" for the general, and at some "convenient time and place" for the particular, musters. Within this pattern, the emphasis lay on the particular musters—for (i) it was obviously more convenient to assemble individual Militia Companies for training according to flexible schedules that took into account the men's economic and social burdens than to aggregate all of a County's Companies for a general muster on some rigid timetable; and (ii) much, if not most, of what Militiamen needed to learn could be taught in exercises at the Company level. Moreover, in light of the geographical proximity of some Companies to each other, nothing would have prevented, and propinquity would have encouraged, two or more Companies' holding joint musters or special exercises if their Captains considered it meet.

This consistent pattern evidences that, for more than a century, Virginians were willing to base their "homeland security" on the beliefs: First, that their Militia should and could be adequately trained at the Local level, as to both general musters (for all the Companies within a County as a whole) and particular musters (within each Company's own area). Second, that the return the community received in terms of preparedness from Militia training conducted along those lines constituted a fair exchange for the amount of time, effort, and expense such training required. Only in exigent circumstances were Militia musters on a larger scale employed—such as the organization of highly trained Minutemen by so-called "districts".[840]

2. In some circumstances, special consideration for particular Militia units might have been deemed appropriate, as in one instance in 1699 when, because "some difficulties ha[d] arisen in the Settlem^{t} of the Militia of New Kent County, therefore for the better and more speedy accommodation thereof, His Excellency [the Governor] * * * Order[ed] that upon [a certain date] * * * a generall Muster sh[ould] be had of all the Militia in that County, * * * where his Excellency himself w[ould] be personally p^{r}sent".{EN-1409}

Or particularized consideration might have come into play because of the peculiar needs of certain units that related to their special equipment—the most obvious example being the use by some Militiamen of rifled rather than smoothbored muskets. For instance, towards the end of the *pre-*constitutional period, Militia statutes provided that:

> • [1775] "[E]very militia man * * * shall furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise with a * * * common firelock, bayonet, pouch, or cartouch box, [and] three charges of powder and ball[.]"{EN-1410}
>
> • [1777] "Every * * * soldier shall appear at his respective muster-field * * * armed and accoutred * * * with a rifle and tomahawk, or good firelock and bayonet, with a pouch and horn, or a cartouche or cartridge box, and with three charges of powder and ball[.]"{EN-1411}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "[T]he militia of the counties westward of the Blue Ridge, and the counties below adjoining thereto, shall not be obliged > to be armed with muskets, but may have good rifles with proper accoutrements in lieu thereof."{EN-1412}

---

[840] See post, at 559-563.

Those Militiamen who armed themselves with rifled muskets not only utilized a procedure for loading their firearms different from that common to men carrying smoothbored muskets, but also must have practiced (and probably themselves devised) special tactics by which they could have taken advantage of their rifles' relatively great range and accuracy, while minimizing the disadvantages they faced from the extra time normally required to load, coupled with the general absence of bayonets fitted to, such arms.[841]

3. Naturally, a modicum of central direction was mandatory in all of this, because every Militiaman's basic training needed to be reasonably uniform:

> • [1728] "The Governor proposing * * * in what manner the Militia may be rendred most usefull * * * had prepared a form of exercise as well for the horse as the foot, but that it was necessary to have some person to train and instruct them therein, so as being once disciplin'd in one uniform method of exercise, they may be more usefull when there shall be occasion to call together the Troops of several Counties for the defence of the Countrey; It is the opinion of the Council that the most effectual way to render the Militia serviceable will be to appoint an Adjutant to go into the several Counties, and to instruct the officers as well as Souldiers in the form of exercise prepared for them[.]"{EN-1413}

> • [1752] The Governor and his Council, "upon the Death of * * * [the] late Adjutant, taking under Consideration, the great Advantage of an Adjutant to this Country, in instructing the Officers and Soldiers in the Use and Exercise of their Arms in bringing the Militia to a more regular Discipline, and fitting it for Service, besides polishing and improving the meaner people, and finding by Experience the Insufficiency of one, fully to discharge a Business of so much Importance, it was * * * agreed to divide the Colony into four Districts [each consisting of several counties], and the following Gentlemen were nominated and approved of * * * , Viz, Thomas Bentley[,] * * * William Fitzhugh * * * [,] George Muse * * * [, and] George Washington[.]"{EN-1414}

> • [1784 and 1785] "[T]he plan of major general baron Steuben * * * for forming and disciplining the troops of the United States, shall be the guide for the militia of this commonwealth * * * . It shall be the duty of every commander of a county regiment and company, at every of their respective musters, to cause the militia to be exercised and trained, agreeable to the said plan * * * ; and for this purpose the said officers are * * * authorized to order the most expert and fit officer in their respective companies to perform that duty."{EN-1415}

---

[841] See, e.g., D. Higginbotham, Daniel Morgan, ante note 795, at 119-155.

Even this training was to be performed in and for the Counties, however.

H. Command and deployment. The purpose of organizing, arming, and training the Militia was to provide Virginia with actual defense—which required that Militiamen be called forth, led to, and deployed in the field for intelligence, military, and police duties. At least in the initial stages of active service, command of the Militia was largely a Local prerogative. This was a matter of necessity.

1. During the pre-constitutional era, the ability to gather intelligence of impending danger was extremely limited. Methods of communication were slow and uncertain. Warnings of threats often consisted of only whatever observations could be made on the spot by Militiamen assigned to "the Watch" (at night), "the Ward" (during the day), and "the Rangers" (on the frontiers):

> • [1624 and 1632] "[T]here be dew watch kept by night."{EN-1416}
>
> • [1682] "[E]very captain * * * shall at the least once in every fourteen daies range and scout about the frontiers of the county for which they serve, and in such other places as shall be most likely for the discovery of the enemy[.]"{EN-1417}
>
> • [1684] "[E]very captain [of the militia for each of the upper counties, on the rivers,] * * * shall once every weeke (and oftner if occasion shall require) range and scout * * * in such * * * places as shall be most likely for the discovery of the enemy[.]"{EN-1418}
>
> • [1699, 1700, 1701, 1703, 1704, and 1705] The Governor and Council "require[d] the Commanders in Chief of the Militia of * * * [various] Counties * * * that they do provide and appoint sufficient persons * * * to look out upon the Sea Coast * * * ; which persons appointed * * * if they See any Ship or Vessel upon the Sea, are diligently to take notice of and observe their Courses and Actions and particularly if any Boat or boats be sent on Shoar; and if there appears any Suspicion of their being Pyrates, that they doe immediately give notice thereof to the next Commission [Commissioned] Officer of the Militia, and he is forthwith to intimate the same to the Commander in Cheif of the Militia in that County where he resides; who is * * * directed to take such care and give such Orders as shall be necessary for the defence of his County, and for the pursueing and app^{r}hending such suspicious Person's, * * * and also to give immediate notice to the Commanders in Cheif of the Militia in the other Counties bordering upon the Sea, that they may also be p^{r}pared to defend themselves and to pursue and app^{r}hend the said suspicious Person's[.]"{EN-1419}
>
> Evidently, in today's jargon the men performing these duties could have been described as comprising an "anti-terrorism early warning network", "pyrates" being the quintessential "international terrorists" of that era.

> • [1709] "Ordered that the Commanding Officers of the Militia in * * * [certain] Countys * * * appoint fitt persons to be Lookouts in those Countys and take care that they diligently attend that Service in the usual Station with Suitable directions to them for giving Alarms upon discovery of an Enemy."{EN-1420}
>
> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, 1753, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[F]or the better discovery of the approach of enemies by sea.
>
> " * * * That in each of * * * [certain] counties * * * , at such times and places as the governor * * * shall * * * direct, one man be appointed by the chief officer of the militia, residing in each of the said counties, respectively: Which men shall keep a constant look-out to seaward, by night and by day, and diligently observe the courses and motions of all such ships or vessels, as they * * * shall discover upon the coast: And if, upon such observation, such person shall suspect the said ships or vessels to belong to an enemy, he shall immediately give notice thereof, to the next field officer in his county; who is thereupon to transmit an account * * * to the governor * * * and the county lieutenant, or to the chief commanding officer of the militia in the said county."{EN-1421}

Rather than being outmoded, though, the pre-constitutional practices of "rang[ing] and scout[ing]", keeping "constant look-out * * * by night and day", "diligent[ ] observ[ation]", and "immediate[ ] * * * notice" of the least suspicion that something may be amiss provide a good summary of an intelligence officer's duties in any era.[842] Technology may have made rapid advances since the late 1700s, but the fundamental task of the Watch, the Ward, and even "ranging" has remained constant. Le plus ça change le plus c'est la même chose.

2. Once some danger had become apparent and imminent, and an "alarm" had been sounded, the responsibility and prerogative for marshaling an immediate defense and assuming command of whatever forces might be available in that vicinity always devolved in the first instance upon Virginia's Local Militia officers.

a. Again, practical constraints rendered this unavoidable. In the nature of things, any danger would have arisen in a particular geographical area—perhaps within several Localities at once; but, even so, in each one the residents would have been affected where they lived and worked. For that reason, Virginia's goal was that "all & Every the Militia horse and foot be alwaies in readynes at an hours warning well armed and Equipt for warr".{EN-1422} Yet even Militiamen apprised of an "alarm" at once, and fully prepared to move out at a moment's notice, could not have mustered and marched very far in that amount of time, especially across rough countryside or during inclement weather. With men spread throughout the area at their normal occupations, to be alerted only by slow and uncertain communications, the rapid assembly of large numbers from distant Companies was always problematic. So "readynes" in any Locality inevitably depended largely upon the forces available on the ground then and there. Moreover, Local "readynes" in terms of men and their equipment alone was not enough. Someone on the spot had to exercise the authority to call forth, command, and deploy the Militia at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, just as Militiamen were enlisted and trained Locally, and their officers selected from among Local residents, so too was the initial command of Militia Companies in times of danger entrusted to Local officers:

---

[842] Further details on the Rangers appear post, at 563-564.

> • [1684] "[U]pon discovery, notice or advice of the approach or attempt of an enemy, the * * * captain [of the militia troop for each of the upper counties, on the rivers,] * * * is hereby required to give speedy advice thereof to the governour * * * , and in the mean time to attend the motion of the enemie, only unless the enemie dureing that time shall first commit some act of hostility, either in burning or in forcible entering into our houses, or by killing, maiming or carrying away any of the inhabitants, and then in such case to engage and destroy them, if he see cause[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [U]pon the incursion, invasion or inroad of any Indian enemie into [certain Counties] * * * , it shall and may be lawfull to and for the militia officers * * * (as the emergency or occasion shall require) to put the souldiers under their command, into a posture of war and defence for the safeguard of the counties[.]"{EN-1423}
>
> • [1691] The Lieutenant Governor and the Council "Ord^{r}d that upon the [watchmen's] least notice of the approach of any Forreign Indians, or French they Imediatly send to the next Militia Officer, who is forthwith to rayse the Militia under his Comand, and to give Notice to the other Offic^{rs} of that County who are all to rayse the Soldiers under them to resist or repell any of Our said Enemies, and the said * * * Officers are to give Speedy Notice to the Comander in Cheif of that County and to follow such Ord^{rs} and Comands as they shall receive from him, and in case there be occasion for any Assistance the Comand^{r} in Cheif is to rayse soe many of the Militia of the Adjacent Counties as he shall think fitt and cause them to march to the assistance where Occasion shall be, and the said Comander in Cheif of the said Counties forthwith to give an account of the same to the Gov^{r} * * * and observe such Ord^{rs} and Comands as he shall receive from him".{EN-1424}
>
> • [1699] The Governor and his Council "Ordered, that * * * in Case of any Incursion or Invasion the next Comicon officer of the Militia, upon Notice thereof, Shall * * * raise Such and Soe many Men and armes as Shall be Sufficient to oppose the Invador's, untill they Shall receive further direccons therein from His Excellency or the Commander in Cheif

of the Militia in the County where such men Shall be raised, unto whom, every Such Comicon [officer] Shall imediately * * * dispatch Severall Expresses with particular accounts thereof."{EN-1425}

• [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, and 1753] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any invasion or insurrection, shall have full power and authority, * * * and is hereby required, forthwith to raise the militia under his command, and to send immediate intelligence to the county-lieutenant, * * * and to the next militia officer in the same county, informing them at the same time in what manner he intends to proceed; and shall, in the mean time, keep the militia, under his command, under arms, until he receives orders from his superior officer. And every county lieutenant * * * to whom such intelligence shall be given * * * shall forthwith dispatch an express to the governor * * * , notifying the danger * * * . And until orders shall arrive from the governor, shall draw together the militia of his county, in such place or places, as he shall judge most convenient for opposing the enemy."{EN-1426}

• [1755] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any invasion or insurrection, shall raise the militia under his command, and send intelligence to the county lieutenant * * * and shall * * * immediately proceed to oppose the enemy, according to * * * orders * * * , and such county lieutenant * * * shall give immediate notice to the officers of the militia of the next adjacent counties, of such invasion or insurrection, and the situation and circumstances of the enemy, according to the best of his information and judgment; and such officer to whom such notice shall be given, if not the chief commanding officer in the county, shall give immediate notice to his commanding officer, * * * who shall immediately raise the militia of his county, and march part thereof, (not exceeding two thirds) against such enemy, if the circumstances of the case shall require it * * * ; and such commanding officer shall cause the remaining part of his militia not so marched, to remain in arms in the county, for the defence and protection thereof, until he shall receive orders from the governor[.]"{EN-1427}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any invasion or insurrection, shall raise the militia under his command, and send intelligence to the county lieutenant, or * * * the chief commanding officer in the county, and shall moreover immediately proceed to oppose the enemy according to the orders he shall receive * * * , and such * * * chief commanding officer shall give immediate notice to the officers of the militia of the next adjacent counties of such invasion or insurrection, and the situation and circumstances of the enemy according to the best of his information and judgment; and such officer to whom such notice shall be given, if not the chief commanding officer of the county, shall give

immediate notice to his commanding officer * * * , who shall immediately raise the militia of his county and march part thereof, not exceeding two-thirds, against such enemy, if the circumstances of the case shall require it * * * ; and such commanding officer shall cause the remaining part of his militia, not so marched, to remain in arms in the county for the defence and protection thereof, until he shall receive orders * * * . And every * * * chief commanding officer in any county to whom such intelligence shall be given * * * shall forthwith dispatch an express to the governor * * * , notifying the danger, and * * * the strength and motions of the enemy[.]"{EN-1428}

• [1776] "[W]here it shall be necessary to call on duty the militia of any colony [sic, in the context 'county' must have been meant], upon an invasion or insurrection within the same, or any county adjoining, the commanding-officer shall have full power and authority to order into service such part of the militia of his said county as to him shall seem necessary[.]"{EN-1429}

• [1784 and 1785] "If a sudden invasion shall be made into any county in this commonwealth, or in case of an insurrection in any county, the county lieutenant is hereby authorized and required to order out the whole, or such part of his militia as he may think necessary, and in such manner as he may think best, for repelling or suppressing such invasion or insurrection, and shall call on the lieutenants or commanding officers of the adjacent counties for such aid as he may think necessary, who shall forthwith * * * furnish the same."{EN-1430}

b. In some cases, because of special circumstances, not only was Local command the order of the day, but also Militiamen could refuse to march out of their communities without direction from the Governor or their own Local officials:

• [1723, 1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[W]hereas it may happen, that the chief magistrates, and other inhabitants of the * * * city [of Williamsburg], may be listed and compelled to serve under the command of the officers of the militia, in the counties of James City, and York, * * * ; and forasmuch as the same may be very inconvenient, and may render the governor's house, public magazine, and capitol, in the said city, defenceless in times of danger, Be it * * * enacted * * * , That * * * such persons * * * listed and trained [in the Militia of the city of Williamsburg], shall not be compelled to go out of the said city, on any military service, without the express order of the governor * * * or, in his absence, the order of the * * * maior, recorder, and aldermen[.]"{EN-1431}

• [1775] "[N]othing in this ordinance * * * shall extend * * * to the inhabitants of the city of Williamsburg or borough of Norfolk, so as to oblige them to * * * serve in the militia out of the said city or borough"; and "without * * * [the] orders and directions [of the Courts of Hustings in the City of Williamsburg and the Borough of Norfolk] neither of the * * * militias [of those Localities] shall at any time be obliged to march out of the said city or borough".{EN-1432}

c. Of course, some provision was always made for ordering out the Militia en masse, as for instance in:

> • [1748 and 1753] "[U]pon any invasion of an enemy by sea or land, or upon any insurrection, the governor * * * have full power and authority to levy, raise, arm, and muster, such a number of forces, out of the militia of this colony, as shall be thought needful for repelling the invasion, or suppressing the insurrection, or other danger, and the same to lead, conduct, march, transport and employ, * * * as well within the several counties and places to which they belong, as into any other counties or places within this dominion[.]"{EN-1433}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he * * * committee of safety * * * shall * * * have full power and authority to call forth into actual service any detachments or companies of minute-men, or any parts of the militia from any district or county within this colony, having regard to the convenience and vicinity of such district or county to the place of immediate danger, and also to the internal security of such district or county.
>
> * * * * *
>
> "Provided always, That the militia at large of any county shall not be called into actual service, except in cases of the most urgent and imminent danger, nor continued, on any pretence whatever, longer on duty than their places can be supplied by minute-men, to be drawn from the most convenient districts. * * *
>
> "And whereas, till the forces are raised and embodied, it may be necessary to the security of the country that the militia and volunteer companies should be called into service, * * * the said committee of safety shall have full power and authority to call into service, in cases of danger, * * * so many volunteer companies, and such parts of the militia, as they may think necessary for the defence and security of any part of the country[.]"{EN-1434}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "[W]hereas, it is necessary that adequate powers be vested in the executive for calling forth the militia and resources of the state, in cases of invasion or insurrection, or upon any probable prospect of such invasion or insurrection;
>
> " * * * That the governor, with advice of the council, be authorized and empowered, on any such invasion or insurrection, or probable prospect thereof, to call forth such a number of militia, and from such counties as they may deem proper."{EN-1435}

Obviously, the extreme circumstances of an invasion, widespread insurrection, or other "most urgent and imminent danger" would necessarily have required a response greater than a few Local Militia Companies could have provided. Yet it was not unlikely—and the statutes plainly foresaw—that "any probable prospect of [an] invasion or insurrection" would have been discovered, reported, and at least initially resisted by Local Militiamen no matter how extensive and intense the invasion or insurrection might then have been or might later have become.

3. Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia also performed "police" functions at the Local level.

a. The Militia were always authorized and available to be called forth to suppress adventitious criminal behavior, particularly when it rose to the level of tumult, riot, or insurrection. For instance, in 1682, Virginia's Deputy Governor issued a Proclamation "prohibiting all riotous and tumultuous meetings":

> Whereas many riotous tumultuous and ungoverned Inhabitants of Glocer[r] County, have contrary to ye Peace * * * invaded the rights and properties of many of the Inhabitants of the said County, by cutting up all plants on Plantations were they come, to the ruin and destruction of many of his Majesties Subjects, highly tending to the subversion of Governm[t] for preservation whereof and to the intent the peace of the Country may be entirely preserved by a timely suppression of all tumults and riotous disorders, I doe * * * strictly command all and every the * * * Inhabitants of this * * * Colony well and truly to demean and behave themselves quietly, peaceably and obediently in all respects answerable * * * to the well being and safety of each other, and if any * * * Inhabitants shall presume to persist or goe forward in their riotous, tumultuous and ruinous disorders in Gloc[r] or any * * * Inhabitantns of any County or Counties in this Colony shall be soe evilly bent to enter into any such like combinations and evill practices; I doe * * * command all officers both Civill and Military in * * * Virginia, to use their utmost case, industry & circumspection, according to the authority by Law placed in them to prevent and suppress, all such meetings and riotous actings for the preservation of his Majesties peace of this Colony, and rights and properties of the Inhabitants thereof[.]

And he "Ordered * * * the Commanders of the respective Counties, to Command to armes such a number of the militia horse and foot of their Counties, as they shall find convenient for the preservation of the peace * * * and from time to time to keep in armes such numbers of horse and foot as they shall find the Exigency of the affaire requires".{EN-1436} Plainly, the authority to call forth the Militia "for the preservation of * * * [the] peace of this Colony, and rights and properties of the Inhabitants thereof" made the Militia in principle into an ubiquitous, almost universal "police force"—which, doubtlessly, is why the very first (and, one must presume, most likely) purpose for which Congress may "provide for calling forth the Militia" in "the Service of the United States" is "to execute the Laws of the Union".[843]

b. In pre-constitutional Virginia, though, the Militia's "police powers" were primarily directed, not at the adventitious depredations of ordinary criminals, but towards the then-continuous problem of controlling her large population of slaves, who (not without just reason) posed the distinct and ever-present danger of "riotous, tumultuous and ruinous disorders". The purpose of Virginia's "slave patrols" was to maintain order among the bondsmen in the immediate vicinity of the plantations on which they labored, and to uncover and suppress conspiracies aimed at revolt or escape. These patrols were, in effect, the earliest form of regular Local police, albeit specifically directed towards the slaves, rather than executing the laws against just any transgressors. Today, "slave patrols" are generally recognized as forerunners of modern "police forces"—and for good reason, as the first such force in modern form was created only in 1845, in New York City, for the not dissimilar purpose of maintaining control over what were then perceived to be socially disruptive elements in the population.[844] This new force (as well as every other similar "law-enforcement agency" which has emulated it thereafter, even unto this very day) was not part of the Militia, though—no doubt because it would have been problematic for the politically dominant classes in society to suppress other segments of the community through an institution in which those segments participated on an equal legal basis with everyone else, and perhaps on a favorably unequal numerical basis.

Obviously, because patrollers had to operate where the slaves actually lived and worked, the patrols were always entirely Local matters:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, and 1744] "Commanding officer[s] of the militia, in any county within this dominion * * * are * * * impowered, * * * as there shall be occasion, to appoint and direct such and so many of the militia of their respective counties, to be drawn out, and to patrole in such places as such commanding officer shall think fit to direct, and from time to time, to cause to be relieved by other parties, for dispersing all unusual concourse of negroes, or other slaves, and for preventing any dangerous combinations which may be made amongst them at such meetings: Which said parties, so sent out to patrole, * * * shall have full power and authority to take up any slaves which they shall find convened together * * * to deliver to the next constable, in order to be dealt with[.]"{EN-1437}
>
> • [1738] "[T]he chief officer of the militia, in every county, * * * [may] appoint an officer, and four men, of the militia, at such times and

---

[843] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 15 and 16.

[844] See, e.g., David A. Sklansky, "The Private Police", 46 U.C.L.A. Law Review 1165 (1999), at 1207-1208.

seasons as he shall think proper, to patrol, and visit all negro quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons. And such patrollers shall have full power and authority, to take up any such slaves, servants, or disorderly persons, * * * unlawfully assembled, or any other, strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress, or overseer, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace * * * : And in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies, consisting of the same number."{EN-1438}

• [1754, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia * * * in every county * * * is hereby required * * * to appoint an officer, and so many men of the militia as to him shall appear to be necessary, not exceeding four, once in every month, or oftener if * * * required * * * , to patrol and visit all negroe quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, and other disorderly persons, and such patrolers shall have power and authority to take up any such slaves, servants, or disorderly persons * * * unlawfully assembled, or any other strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress, or overseer, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace * * * : And in case one company of patrolers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies for the same service[.]"{EN-1439}

• [1775] "[T]he commanding-officer of the militia of every county, of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, shall appoint so many patrollers, as he may think fit[.]"{EN-1440}

• [1777, 1784, and 1785] "[I]t shall and may be lawful for the chief officer of the militia in every county * * * , yearly, to appoint an officer, and so many men of the militia as to him shall appear to be necessary, not exceeding four, once in every month, or oftener, if thereto required * * * , to patrol and visit all negro quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons, * * * unlawfully assembled, or any others strolling about from one plantation to another, without a pass from his or her master, mistress, or owner, and to carry them before the next justice of the peace * * * .

"And in case one company of patrollers shall not be sufficient, to order more companies for the same service[.]"{EN-1441}

c. A closely related "police" function that Militiamen—and, indeed, sometimes all armed Virginians—performed was to appear with their arms in their hands at their churches on days of worship. The purpose of this regulation was "to prevent any Surprize * * * when the Slaves are most at Liberty & have the greatest Opportunity for that purpose".{EN-1442} As with "the slave patrols", the requirement that men attended church fully armed operated Locally, because churches were Local establishments:

> • [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service and sermons both forenoon and afternoon, and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte."{EN-1443}
>
> • [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church uppon payne for every effence[.]"{EN-1444}
>
> • [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott[.]"{EN-1445}
>
> • [1736] The Lieutenant Governor "strictly Charge[d] and Command[ed], That all Persons serving in the Militia, who shall during the * * * Holy-Days, repair to their Parish Churches or Chappels, do take with them their Arms, Ammunition, and Accoutrements".{EN-1446}
>
> • [1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]t shall and may be lawful, for the chief officer of the militia, in every county, to order all persons listed therein, to go armed to their respective parish churches[.]"{EN-1447}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he * * * chief officer[ ] of the militia, shall and may order the other officers and soldiers under him to go armed to their parish churches on Sundays, and to any licensed meeting-houses, whenever he judges it necessary."{EN-1448}

Unlike "the slave patrols", though, which consisted of small units specially formed for the task, this duty applied at first to every free adult male Virginian capable of bearing arms, and later on to every Virginian enlisted in the Militia. Nonetheless, it was less of a burden, because Virginians were simply taking their firearms along with them in the course of one of their normal activities, rather than performing a special duty that interfered with their regular routines of work and family life.

I. Specialized Militia units. Virginia never established a so-called "select militia"—that is, a group of individuals, far less in number than all of the eligible men within the jurisdiction, who were singled out to constitute "the militia", while everyone else remained "unorganized". Yet Virginia did make various selections within her Militia. These specialized units did not purport to supersede the Militia, but instead subsisted as integral parts of it, alongside the regular formations in which most Militiamen were enlisted. Thus, although their existence does not support the false notion that "a well regulated militia" can be comprised exclusively of small "select" units, it does point out that "a well regulated militia" can be sufficiently flexible in organization to combine a number of different units designed and assigned to perform different tasks, given different training, and provided with different equipment. Revealingly, too, even the special Militia units that Virginia did create remained basically Local in their formation and operation, in keeping with standard Militia practice.

1. Minutemen. The most famous of these special units was "the Minutemen". The purpose of this establishment was eminently practical:

> [1775] "[I]t is judged necessary, for the better protection of the country in times of imminent danger, that certain portions of the militia throughout the whole colony should be regularly enlisted, under the denomination of minute-men, and more strictly trained to proper discipline than hath been hitherto customary, and, to this end, * * * the whole colony should be divided into proper and convenient districts[with each such district to be composed of two or more specified counties, cities, and the borough of Norfolk.]"{EN-1449}

a. This description renders obvious, though, that the Minutemen were part and parcel of the Militia, because they were constituted from "certain portions of the militia throughout the whole colony". And having come from within the main body of the Militia, to that main body did Minutemen return:

> • [1775] "And as well for the ease of the minute-men, as that they may be returned in regular rotation to the bodies of their respective militias, Be it farther ordained, That after serving twelve months sixteen minute-men shall be discharged from each company * * * , and the like number at the end of every year, beginning with those who stand first on the roll, and who were first enlisted[.]"{EN-1450}
>
> • [1776] "[F]or as much as the minute company in the city of Williamsburg, by the frequent enlistments of the privates into the regular service, is reduced to so small a number that the same cannot be again completed: Be it therefore ordained * * * , That the remaining minute-men in the said city shall be discharged, and from that service return to be enlisted with the militia thereof."{EN-1451}
>
> • [1776] "[W]hereas the minute companies formerly raised in this country are already greatly reduced by enlistments into the regular service, and are likely to be more so by future enlistments, so that there remains little prospect of their answering the purposes of their institution, and moreover it will tend to weaken the militia of this commonwealth, and may create discontents, if such broken companies of minute-men continue exempt from militia duty, * * * all the minute battalions, companies, and parts of companies, throughout this state shall be totally dissolved and discharged, and the said minute-men shall thereafter be considered as militia, and be subject to all such rules and regulations * * * established for the better training and disciplining the militia; and the captains of each minute company shall * * * receive of each man in their respective companies all such arms and accoutrements as have been provided at the publick expense[.]"{EN-1452}

b. As with everyone else in the Militia, Minutemen were recruited and approved for service in Local jurisdictions:

> • [1775] "[W]ithin * * * [one particular] district * * * there shall be forthwith raised one regiment, consisting of six hundred and eighty men, from the ages of sixteen to fifty, to be divided into ten companies, sixty eight each rank and file * * * .
>
> " * * * [W]ithin each of the other districts there shall be immediately enlisted one battalion, consisting of five hundred men rank and file, from the ages of sixteen to fifty, to be divided into ten companies of fifty men each[.]"
>
> Committees of Safety in the various Counties were to appoint deputies who "shall settle the number of minute-men to be enlisted in each county".{EN-1453}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he several officers appointed for that purpose shall immediately proceed to enlist the minute-men within their respective counties, city, or borough; and the said officers shall not go into any other county, city, or borough, to complete their quotas, until the officers in such other county, city, or borough, have completed their quotas, nor, in that case, without the permission of the committee [of safety] of such other county, city, or borough, in writing, first had and obtained."{EN-1454}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he committee [of safety] of each county, city, and borough, shall appoint one certain place of rendezvous within their county, city, or borough, whither the captain, and other officers, * * * shall resort with their men * * * . And if it shall appear to such committee that the company is complete, of able and proper men, and that they have been regularly enlisted, * * * the said committee shall grant to the captain a certificate[.]"{EN-1455}

Officers in the Minutemen, too, could be chosen Locally: In 1775, Committees of Safety in the various Counties were authorized to appoint deputies who "shall proceed to the choice of the several officers".{EN-1456}

c. The Minutemen's training was far more rigorous than that of ordinary Militiamen. But all of it took place at the Local level:

> [1775] "[M]inute-men in each respective district * * * shall be * * * formed into separate battalions, and shall be kept in training * * * for twenty successive days * * * ; and, after performing such battalion duty, the several companies of each battalion shall in their respective counties be mustered, and continue to exercise four successive days in each month, > except December, January, and February,[845] at such times and places as shall be appointed by their respective captains * * * .

>
> "And * * * in order to render them the more skilful and expert in military exercise and discipline, the several companies of minute-men shall twice in every year, after the exercise of the twenty days, be again embodied, and formed again into distinct battalions within their districts, and shall at each meeting continue in regular service and training for twelve successive days, at such convenient places within each district as shall be appointed * * * and at * * * stated times [in May and October.]"{EN-1457}

In comparison, in that year regular Militiamen were required to attend only eighteen or twenty particular (or private) musters and two general musters, each of one day's duration—which musters also were to occur Locally "in each county" and "in every county".{EN-1458}

d. Not surprisingly, either, as with other units in Virginia's Militia, command and deployment of her Minutemen devolved upon Local officers:

> [1775] "That every officer of the minute-men receiving notice from any other officer of the minute-men, in any other county than that wherein the regular forces are stationed, of any invasion or insurrection, shall forthwith raise the men under his command, and send intelligence to the commanding-officer of the minute-men of that county, and also the commanding-officer of the militia, or, being himself commanding-officer of the minute-men of that county, shall immediately raise the men under his command, and proceed to oppose the enemy, taking care to despatch intelligence to the commanding-officer of the district, and also to the officer of the minute-men in the next adjacent county, who is to proceed in the same manner * * * . And the commanding-officer of the militia receiving such intelligence shall immediately summon a council of his field-officers and captains, to consider and determine whether it is necessary to march his militia, or what part thereof, to the place of danger[.]"{EN-1459}

e. Interestingly enough, the substance of the Minutemen's selection, training, and especially deployment was not something that suddenly appeared among Virginia's Militia only in the 1770s. Quite the contrary. In fact, if not in name, the Minutemen had numerous precursors. For example, special selections of men especially fit for the most arduous Militia duty can be found as early as 1702, when the Governor ordered that, "whereas by an order of Councill [in 1701] * * * y^{e} * * * Commanders in chief of each Respective County * * * were ordered to returne a List of y^e^ names of every fifth man within their * * * troops and Companys being young Brisk fitt and able to go out to war upon any Emergent occasion[,] * * * a New List of y^e^ said fifth man be taken[.]"{EN-1460} Extra extensive training had often been required during periods of heightened danger:

---

[845] This was amended that same year to include February among the months for required training.

> • [1711] The Governor and his Council determined "that it is necessary the Country be put into an imediate posture of defence by training the Militia, and that the following Scheme proposed by the Governor for the more effectual prevention of the Enemy's attempts be put in execution Viz^t^
>
> "That a General Muster of the Militia of each County be forthwith appointed and an exact account taken how they are armed & provided with ammunition.
>
> "That the Militia of each County be divided into three parts * * * , and that each of the said Divisions do meet and exercise once a Week[.]"{EN-1461}

> • [1712] Fearing an attack of the Tuscaruros, the Governor and Council "[o]rdered that for preventing any sudden attempts of the said Indians, at least a Troop or Company of the Militia in each of the Frontier Countys be drawn together and exercised once a Week[.]"{EN-1462}

And being prepared for immediate deployment had been required of Militiamen on numerous occasions:

> • [1709] Concerned with a possible attack by French privateers, the Governor and Council "[o]rdered that the Commanders in Cheif of the Militia * * * forthwith appoint Masters of the Militia * * * for training & exerciseing the Soldiers and that they take particular Care that the said Soldiers be provided with arms and ammunition according to Law & have their arms constantly well fixed & themselves in a readiness to draw together on an hours warning, hereby strictly chargeing all * * * Officers to take particular notice of any person who on this Occasion shall prove deficient in their duty that they may be punished according to Law And * * * that the Commanding Officers [o]f the Militia in * * * [certain] Countys * * * appoint fitt persons to be Lookouts * * * and take care that they diligently attend that Service[.]"{EN-1463}

> • [1736] Anticipating an attack by the Spanish, the Governor and Council "[o]rdered that the * * * Chief Commanding Officer of the Millitia in the Several Countys do forthwith give directions to the Officers of the Several Troops and Companys * * * to Examine how the said Troops and Companys are Armed and provided with ammunition and to Require every person oblig'd to serve in the Millitia to furnish himself with such Arms and Ammunition as the Law Enjoyns and also to be in a readiness upon the first Notice of an Invasion to parade to a Convenient place in each County * * * thence to March where the appearance of danger shall require[.]"{EN-1464}

• [1743] Concerned with maintaining "the best posture of Defence upon the * * * uncertain State of Public Affairs", the Governor's Council advised "that all Commanding Officers in their several respective Counties be advertiz'd to keep themselves prepar'd & in readiness against any Attempt that may be made upon this Colony from any Quarters whatsoever & to see that the Militia be kept under good Order & Discipline & that they be provided with Arms & Ammunition as the Law directs[.]"{EN-1465}

• [1745] Apprised of a possible attack by the French, the Governor "acquainted [his Council] that he sent the necessary Orders to the Commanding Officers of the lower Counties to have the Militia in Readiness and to keep a constant diligent Look Out[.]"{EN-1466}

2. Rangers. Another special category of Militiamen which saw significant service was "the Rangers". In essence, Rangers were peripatetic scouts—the verb "to range" means "[t]o rove over or through" and "[t]o rove at large; to wander without restraint or direction; to roam"[846]—who adopted and perfected the stealthy, slashing style of warfare that subsequently became commonplace among guerrilleros, irregulars, and partisans.[847] Necessarily, they were organized and operated on a Local basis, because most "ranging" took place across Virginia's so-called "frontier counties":

• [1711] "[T]he commander in chief * * * is impowered * * * to constitute and appoint * * * lieutenants or commanders of the rangers for the * * * frontiers; each of which * * * shall choose out and list * * * able bodyed men, with horses and accoutrements, arms and ammunition, residing as near as conveniently may be, to that frontier station for which he shall be lieutenant of the rangers, to serve under him as their commander. But if such lieutenant cannot find a sufficient number of able bodyed men, furnished and provided * * * , to serve voluntarily under him, * * * it shall * * * be lawfull for the commander in chief of the militia

---

[846] Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, ante note 11, at 1188, definitions 5 (transitive verb) and 1 (intransitive verb). Accord, Webster's Third New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 1880, definition 2a; Webster's New International Dictionary, ante note 330, at 2060, definition 4.

[847] See Thomas Church, The Entertaining History of King Philip's War, Which Began in the Month of June, 1675, As Also of Expeditions More Lately Made Against the Common Enemy, and Indian Rebels, in the Eastern Parts of New England: With Some Account of the Divine Providence Towards Col. Benjamin Church (Newport, Rhode Island: Solomon Southwick, 1772). Originally published in 1716, Church's History described the Ranger tactics Americans early developed and employed in their frontier wars. Probably the most famous of American Rangers, Robert Rogers, recounted his own later experiences in irregular warfare in the Journals of Major Robert Rogers: Containing An Account of the several Excursions he made under the Generals who commanded upon the Continent of North America, during the late War (London, England: J. Millan, 1765). Rogers set down his classic "Rules for Ranging" in 1757. See, e.g., Jennifer Quasha, Robert Rogers: Rogers' Rangers and the French and Indian War (New York, New York: The Rosen Publishing Group, Inc., 2002), Appendix, at 90-99. For a Hollywood production, the 1940 Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer film Northwest Passage (starring Spencer Tracy and Robert Young) captures rather well the raw essence of the Rangers' grueling style of frontier warfare. Unfortunately, Rogers himself remained a Loyalist during the War of Independence. See T. Allen, Tories, ante note 610, at 175-177, 182.

in the same county * * * to order and impress out of the militia of that county, so many able bodyed men, furnished * * * , residing next to that frontier station, as shall make up the number [required.]"{EN-1467}

• [1711 and 1712] "For the better protection of the Inhabitants of this Colony against the Incursions of Indians" the Governor and his Council "Ordered that ten men & an Officer out of each of the Frontier Countys be appointed to Range three days in a Week above the Inhabitants, and that the said party be from time to time relieved by a like number, with power to the Commanding Officers of the Militia * * * to augment the number of the said Rangers, as the cause of danger shall require."{EN-1468}

• [1713] The Governor and Council decided "that twenty five men of the Militia of each of * * * [certain] Countys be ordered out to range four days in a Week, and so reliev'd from time to time by detachments of the like number, during the present danger".{EN-1469}

• [1713] "The Governor * * * upon divers late Alarms on the Frontiers * * * Ordered fifty men of the Militia of Surry, and the like number of the Militia of Prince George to range out in the woods for the space of six days, * * * and that in case these Detachments should discover any thing * * * , the said detachments be weekly relieved by others of the like number[.]"{EN-1470}

• [1755] "That * * * a sum of money not exceeding two thousand pounds * * * be laid out for and in the raising and maintaining three compa[n]ies of men * * * to be employed as rangers, for the protection of the subjects in the frontiers of this colony * * * . And in case the * * * men, cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily enlist * * * , it shall * * * be lawful for the * * * chief officer of the militia of each of * * * [certain] counties * * * to draft out of the militia * * * such and so many young men * * * who have not wives or children, as will make up the * * * number, to be employed in the said service."{EN-1471}

• [1787] "[T]he governor * * * shall be empowered to order out into actual service from time to time, so many scouts and rangers in any of the counties on the western frontier * * * , the expence whereof shall be defrayed out of the funds provided * * * for the support of government."{EN-1472}

Interestingly, too, Rangers performed more than typically military Militia duty—as in 1716, when "some discoverys ha[d] lately been made by the Rangers of a Passage over the great mountains to the westward of this Colony and * * * [the Governor] intended * * * to send a greater Body of the Rangers upon further discoverys which * * * m[ight] be of great advantage to this Country".{EN-1473}

3. Other specialized units. Virginia employed various other forms of selective service within her Militia, all of which always operated initially at the Local level. For example—

a. By reason of their likely physical condition, young men were sometimes singled out for duties more intensive than those demanded of the average Militiaman:

> • [1701] The Governor required "all and every the Coll^{s} & Comad^{rs} in Cheife of Each Respective County * * * to returne * * * a List of the names of Every fifth man wthin their respctive Troopes and foot Comp^{as} being Persons young, brisk, fit, & able (upon any Emerg^{t} occasion) to go out to warr and * * * to forme the same into Distinct Troopes and foot Comp^{as} Each Troope not to Exceed thirty able men well mounted armed and Equipt and Each foot Comp^{a} not to Exceed fifty able men well armed and equipt".{EN-1474}
>
> • [1703] The Governor commanded the commanders in chief of the Militia in each County "to cause the Captains under their respective commands [to] draw out every fifth man in their several Troops and Companys being young & able to go out to warr upon any emergent occasion, which said fifth men * * * shall have liberty from among themselves to name their own officers".{EN-1475}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] Although these Militia statutes required that "all free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years [with certain exceptions] * * * be enrolled", they also recognized that "it will be of great utility and advantage in establishing a well disciplined militia, to annex to each regiment a light company, to be formed of young men, from eighteen to twenty-five years old, whose activity and domestic circumstances will admit of a frequency of training, and strictness of discipline, not practicable for the militia in general, and returning to the main body on their arrival at the latter period, will be constantly giving thereto a military pride and experience, from which the best of consequences will result"—and therefore provided that "the governor * * * shall * * * for each county, appoint and commission for each regiment therein [certain officers] * * * of the most proper persons therefor, for a light company * * * . The captain * * * shall * * * enroll * * * a sufficient number of young men * * * . And as the men of such light company shall * * * arrive at the age of twenty-five years, * * * the county lieutenant * * * shall order them to be enrolled in the [regular] company whose districts they may respectively live in, and deficiencies shall be supplied by new enrollments."{EN-1476}

All of these men came from the ranks of regular Militia Companies. In the first two instances, they were presumably the fittest to fight at first (although the rest of the Militiamen would surely have fought, too, if the circumstances of any "warr" or other "emergent occasion" had so warranted); and, presumably too, as they grew older and less lithe these men reverted to the regular Militia Companies in their communities. In the second two instances, the young men were to form essentially "demonstration units", in order to prove and practice what could be done by way of extensive training, then to return to the Militia's regular ranks, "giving thereto a military pride and experience, from which the best of consequences w[ould] result" for everyone else. So, plainly, these were not "select militia", but instead well-considered selections from within the Militia for the purpose of rendering the Militia as a whole more effective than otherwise.

b. Selection might also be made on the basis of particular duty or branch of service:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1740, 1744, 1748, and 1753]. "And forasmuch as it is necessary, that a sufficient number of men be appointed, for guarding the batteries erected in the several rivers, within this dominion, and for assisting in that better managing the great guns there mounted, in times of danger,
>
> " * * * it shall and may be lawful, to and for the governor * * * to appoint and assign such a number of the militia, residing next to the several batteries, respectively, as he shall think fit, to attend the said batteries * * * : Which said militia, so assigned for the service aforesaid, shall * * * be exempted from all private musters, except at the said battery only[.]"{EN-1477}
>
> • [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[T]o the end a sufficient number of men may be appointed for guarding the batteries erected in the several rivers of this dominion, and to assist in the better managing the great guns there mounted, when occasion shall be, It is hereby * * * enacted, That it shall * * * be lawful for the governor * * * to appoint and assign such a number of the militia as he shall think fit to attend the said batteries, * * * which number of the militia shall be drafted out of any of the militia of the county by the commanding officer of such county in which such battery is or shall be erected, and shall be exempted from all private musters, except at such battery only during their attendance at such battery[.]"{EN-1478}
>
> • [1782] "WHEREAS experience hath proved the great utility of cavalry in this state, as well to controul the operations of the enemy, as to give extent and efficacy to those of our own troops:
>
> " * * * Be it enacted * * * , That every sixteenth man of the militia shall be formed into a body of cavalry * * * , that is to say, the lieutenant or commanding officer of the militia in every county, shall call a general muster * * * and shall propose to the militia of his county, that such as incline to act as horsemen * * * give in their names to such lieutenant or commanding officer. * * *

> " * * * [T]he field officers of each battalion, with the approbation of the * * * commanding officer of the county, shall nominate proper persons to command the cavalry * * * who shall be commissioned by the governor. The officers * * * shall call the said horsemen once in every month, to some convenient place in each county, for the purpose of training and disciplining. The said cavalry shall be exempt from attendance in all other private musters[.]"{EN-1479}

c. As a matter of practical necessity,[848] the equipment particular Militiamen carried sometimes served as the basis for special selection:

> [1775] "That * * * there be raised seventeen companies of expert riflemen, in * * * the counties of Bedford and Loudoun, each two companies; in the counties of Albemarle, Amhurst, Berkeley, Botetourt, Buckingham, Charlotte, Culpeper, Dunmore, Fauquier, Halifax, Orange, Pittsylvania, and Prince Edward, each one company[.]"{EN-1480}

d. And in order to heighten esprit de corps and morale, Virginia even organized parts of her Militia into special units on the basis of ethnicity:

> [1775] "That of the six regiments to be levied * * * , one of them shall be called a German regiment, to be made up of German and other officers and soldiers, as the committees [of safety] of the several counties of Augusta, West Augusta, Berkeley, Culpeper, Dunmore, Fincastle, Frederick, and Hampshire (by which committees the several captains and subaltern officers of the said regiment are to be appointed) shall judge expedient."{EN-1481}

J. Independent Companies. Independent Companies could fairly be considered the very quintessence of Local organization in the Militia. Although during the post-constitutional period Virginia's Militia statutes dealt explicitly and extensively with what were then called "volunteer companies",{EN-1482} Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia statutes contained far less information about such Companies than did Rhode Island's.[849] Not, however, because Independent Companies were insignificant in Virginia. Rather, in her time of greatest need, Independent Companies forged to the forefront of her defenses against British oppression. Formed entirely by Local people "from the bottom up" on their own initiatives at the apogee of a political crisis, Independent Companies provided conclusive evidence of the truly self-governmental nature and essentially democratic character of the Militia.

---

[848] See ante, at 514-515.

[849] See ante, at 224-234.

The crisis began in the 1760s, and intensified over the next decade. The first step that eventually led to the mobilization of Independent Companies in Virginia against the British was the formation of voluntary "Associations" across America in opposition to the Stamp Act. For example, in 1766 citizens of Westmoreland County, Virginia, declared that > [r]ouzed by Danger and alarm'd at Attempts foreign & domestic [to] reduce the People of this Country to a State of abject and detestable slavery by destroying that free and happy constitution of Government under which they have hitherto lived,—We who subscribe this Paper have associated & do bind ourselves to each other, to God and to our Country, by the firmest Tyes that Religion and Virtue can frame, most sacredly and punctually to stand by, and with our Lives & Fortunes to support, maintain and defend each other * * * .

>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * If any Attempt shall be made upon the Liberty or Property of any Associator for any Action or Thing to be done in consequence of this Agreement, we do most solemnly bind ourselves * * * at the utmost risk of our Lives and Fortunes to restore such Associate to his Liberty, and to protect him in the enjoyment of his Property.[850]

At least implicitly, these Virginians were contemplating and accepting the possibility of armed resistence to British authority. For their mutual pledge—that "[i]f any Attempt shall be made upon the Liberty or Property of any Associator for any Action or Thing to be done in consequence of this Agreement, we do most solemnly bind ourselves * * * at the utmost risk of our Lives and Fortunes to restore such Associate to his Liberty, and to protect him in the enjoyment of his Property"—would have been incapable of fulfillment unless these patriots had been willing and able to oppose force with force. And at least able to do so they surely were, if the Militia statutes in operation since 1738 had been enforced in Westmoreland County.{EN-1483}

By 1774, "Associations" formed to resist British oppression had blossomed into a general movement. Perhaps the most influential of these from any single Colony was produced by the first of Virginia's Conventions, on 6 August of that year.[851] After the Continental Congress adopted on 20 October what came to be treated as "the Association", that body assumed titular leadership of the movement. "The Association" sought to boycott British trade by a non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation agreement amongst the inhabitants of the [850] Resolutions of the Westmoreland Association in Defiance of the Stamp Act (27 February 1766), reprinted in R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume I, at 23 and 24.

---

[851] See id., Volume I, at 230-235.

Colonies,[852] as a means "[t]o obtain redress of * * * grievances, which threaten destruction to the lives, liberty, and property of his majesty's subjects, in North America".[853] The mechanism of enforcement was ostracism of those who sided with Britain, whether individuals or political entities:

> * * * That a committee be chosen in every county, city, and town, by those who are qualified to vote for representatives in the legislature, whose business it shall be attentively to observe the conduct of all persons touching this association; and when it shall be made to appear, to the satisfaction of a majority of any such committee, that any person within the limits of their appointment has violated this association, that such majority do forthwith cause the truth of the case to be published in the gazette; to the end, that all such foes to the rights of British-America may be publicly known, and universally contemned as the enemies of American liberty; and thenceforth we respectively will break off all dealings with him or her.[854]

> * * * And we do further agree and resolve, that we will have no trade, commerce, dealings or intercourse whatsoever, with any colony or province, in North-America, which shall not accede to, or which shall hereafter violate this association, but will hold them as unworthy of the rights of freemen, and as inimical to the liberties of their country.[855]

As one careful student of these events has pointed out, although "the Association" may have been authorized and encouraged "from the top down" through the Continental Congress, it was to be organized and enforced "from the bottom up" in every County, City, and Town, thereby of necessity leaving the details of its day-to-day administration for the people themselves to settle, according to the requirements of their own peculiar situations, through committees—some of them denoted "Committees of Safety", others designated "Committees of Observation"—formed in hundreds of Localities throughout the Colonies.[856] (In Virginia, such committees were composed on average of some twenty-one members.[857]) So, to the extent that "the Association" embodied political power, it was the people's own power, because they themselves exercised it. And if "the Association" was legitimate, it was because the people themselves actually enforced it in each of the Colonies, not simply because the Continental Congress had [852] Journals of the Continental Congress, ante note 42, Volume I (5 September to 26 October 1774), at 75-80.

---

[853] Id., Volume I, at 76.

[854] The Association, ¶ 11, in Journals of the Continental Congress, ante note 42, Volume I, at 79.

[855] The Association, ¶ 14, in Journals of the Continental Congress, ante note 42, Volume I, at 79.

[856] See T. Breen, American Insurgents, American Patriots, ante note 447, Chapters 6 and 7.

[857] Id. at 200.

promulgated it originally—for the Continental Congress could have recommended such action for all of the Colonies only under the aegis of the people themselves, it having no authority of its own under British law. Nonetheless, as a practical matter, protection of the Local committees remained a problem, if the regularly constituted British authorities and their Loyalist supporters tried to suppress them. To intimidate recalcitrant Loyalists within and outside of public office, the patriots needed to cast the long, dark shadow of physical force throughout their communities.[858]

In Virginia, though, a major difficulty immediately intruded itself. The Colony's then-latest Militia Act, originally enacted in and thereafter continued with various revisions and amendments from 1738, had expired in 1773.{EN-1484} So, on 10 May 1774, Virginia's House of Burgesses (which along with the Governor's Council formed her General Assembly) resolved that the Militia Act "which expired on the twentieth Day of July last past ought to be revived"; and a bill for that purpose was presented.[859] On 26 May 1774, however, Virginia's Royal Governor, John Murray, the Earl of Dunmore, dissolved the House of Burgesses, supposedly because he "ha[d] in [his] hand a Paper published by the Order of your House, conceived in such Terms as reflect highly upon [that is, disparage] his Majesty and the Parliament of Great Britain; which makes it necessary for me to dissolve you; and you are dissolved accordingly".[860] Dunmore then repeatedly prorogued the Assembly until June of 1775, so that no new Militia Act (or any other legislation) could be enacted.[861] This was in keeping with the high-handed attitudes of America's British overlords, evidenced in the charge against King George III in the Declaration of Independence that "[h]e has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance".

Patriotic Virginians, however, were not of a mind to tarry, pending the full formalities of a new statute, when their security was at stake—for their enemies were anything but inactive. On 24 December 1774, Dunmore had warned Lord Dartmouth, the British Secretary of State for the Colonies, that

> [t]he associations * * * recommended by the people of this colony, and adopted by what is called the continental congress, are now enforcing throughout this country, with the greatest rigour. A committee has been chosen in [e]very county, whose business it is to carry the association of the congress into execution; which committee assumes an authority to inspect the books, invoices, and all other secrets of the trade

---

[858] See, e.g., id. at 193-196.

[859] JOURNALS of the HOUSE of BURGESSES of VIRGINIA, ante note 318, at 84-85, 88-89.

[860] Id. at 132.

[861] Id. at 165-171, 173.

> and correspondence of merchants; to watch the conduct of every inhabitant, without distinction; and to send for all such as come under their suspicion into their presence, to interrogate them respecting all matters which, at their pleasure, they think fit objects of their inquiry; and to stigmatise * * * such as they find transgressing, what they are now hardy enough to call the laws of the congress; which stigmatising is no other than inviting the vengance of an outrageous and lawless mob to be exercised upon the unhappy victims. Every county [in Virginia], besides, is now arming a company of men, whom they call an independent company, for the avowed purpose of protecting their committees, and to be employed against government, if occasion require. The committee of one county has proceeded so far as to swear the men of their independent company to execute all orders which shall be given them from the committee of their county.
>
> As to the power of government which your lordship * * * directs should be exerted to counteract the dangerous measures pursuing here, I can assure your lordship that it is entirely disregarded, if not wholly overturned.
>
> * * * * *
>
> Independent companies, &c. so universally supported, who have set themselves up superior to all other authority, under the auspices of their congress, the laws of which they talk of in a stile of respect, and treat with marks of reverence, which they never bestowed on their legal government, or the laws proceeding from it, I can assure your lordship, that I have discovered no instance where the interposition of government, in the feeble state to which it is reduced, could serve any other purpose than to suffer the disgrace of a disappointment, and thereby afford matter of great exultation to its enemies, and encrease their influence over the minds of the people.[862]

Even as Lord Dartmouth pondered these dire tidings in England, Virginians were preparing themselves for trouble at home.[863] For example, on 17 January 1775, the Fairfax County Committee of Correspondence

> RESOLVED, that the defenceless state of this country renders it indispensably necessary that a quantity of ammunition should be immediately provided; and as the same will be for the common benefit, protection, and defence, of the inhabitants thereof, it is but just and reasonable that the expenses incurred in procuring the same should be defrayed by a general and equal contribution. It is therefore recommended

---

[862] Reprinted in R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume III, at 66-67 (footnote omitted).

[863] The tumultuous events of 1775 are put into context and well chronicled in Ivor Noël Hume, 1775: Another Part of the Field (London, England: Eyre & Spottiswoode (Publishers) Ltd., 1966).

> that the sum of three shillings * * * be paid, by and for every tithable person in this county, to the sheriff, or such other collector as may be appointed, who is to render the same to this committee, with a list of the names of such persons as shall refuse to pay the same, if any such there be.[864]

Actually, Northhampton County had assumed jurisdiction over the Militia within its territory about a month earlier; but Fairfax County was the first to impose an actual tax for such purposes.[865] In fact, though, the "general and equal contribution" that Fairfax County mandated was nothing new in substance. From the very beginning, Virginians had been assessed taxes for the purchase of, or themselves been required to supply, arms for their Militia. Procedurally novel was that, with Virginia's central government wracked by internal dissensions, Local governments took the initiative in this regard.

Lord Dunmore was thinking along the very same lines as the Fairfax County Committee of Correspondence. Anxious to disarm his opponents by depriving them of ammunition, he suddenly and secretly dispatched British marines to remove the Colony's store of gunpowder from the magazine in the Capital at Williamsburg. On 3 March 1775 he rationalized this foray to the public on the grounds that

> [a]lthough I consider myself, under the authority of the crown, the only constitutional judge, in what manner the munition, provided for the protection of the people of this government, is to be disposed of for that end; yet for * * * removing from the minds of his majesty's subjects the groundless suspicions they have imbibed, I think proper to declare that the apprehensions which seemed to prevail throughout this whole country of an intended insurrection of the slaves, who had been seen in large numbers, in the night time, about the magazine, and my knowledge of its being a very insecure depositary, were my inducements to that measure, and I chose the night as the properest season, because I knew the temper of the times, and the misinterpretations of my design which would be apt to prevail if the thing should be known. * * * But, whenever the present ferment shall subside, and it shall become necessary to put arms into the hands of the militia, for the defence of the people against a foreign enemy or intestine insurgents, I shall * * * exert my best abilities in the service of the country.{EN-1485}

So, Dunmore expected Virginians to believe, it was not preëmptively to disarm the patriots, but instead to thwart a threat from rampaging slaves that he sequestered the very gunpowder Virginians would have needed to put down a supposed [864] Reprinted in R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume II, at 242 (footnote omitted).

---

[865] See id., Volume II, at 243 note 1.

"intended insurrection" among the bondsmen! And Dunmore "chose the night" for this maneuver—even though that was when "slaves * * * had been seen in large numbers", presumably knew what was happening, and could possibly have intercepted the movement of the powder—because, under cover of darkness, he could prevent "misinterpretations of [his] design" by keeping the transfer a secret from the common Virginians upon whom he would have had to call to put down a slave rebellion! Yet he also admitted that he would "put arms into the hands of the militia" only when "the present [political] ferment shall subside", thus evidencing his belief that the existing "ferment" was far more dangerous to himself and his supporters than any imagined attack by "a foreign enemy or intestine insurgents".

With the Royal Governor running amok and the House of Burgesses stymied, patriots assembled in a Convention in which, on 23 March 1775, they

> [r]esolved that a well regulated Militia composed of Gentlemen and Yoemen is the natural Strength and only Security of a free Government: that such a Militia in this Colony would forever render it unnecessary for the Mother Country to keep among us for the purpose of our Defence any standing Army of mercenary Forces, always subversive of the Quiet, and dangerous to the Liberties of the People; and would obviate the Pretext of taxing us for their Support:
>
> That the Establishment of such a Militia is at this Time peculiarly necessary by the State of our Laws for the protection and Defence of the Country, some of which are already expired and others will shortly do so; and that the known Remissness of Government in calling us together in a Legislative Capacity renders it too insecure in this time of Danger and Distress to rely[ ] that Opportunity will be given of renewing them in General Assembly, or making any provision to secure our inestimable Rights & Liberties from those further Violations with which they are threatened.[866]

Two days later,

> [t]he Convention then took into their Consideration * * * [a Committee's] Plan for embodying, arming and disciplining the Militia, which * * * was unanimously agreed to, as follows[:]
>
> The Committee propose that * * * the Colony diligently * * * put in Execution the Militia Law passed in the Year 1738 * * * which has become in force by the Expiration of all subsequent Militia Laws.

---

[866] Reprinted in id., Volume II, at 366 (footnote omitted). The Virginia Convention, first convoked in August of 1774, was composed primarily of the members of the House of Burgesses, who had been effectively displaced from participation in the titular government by Lord Dunmore's intransigeance. See id., Volume I, at 219-222.

> The Committee are further of Opinion that, as from the Expiration of the * * * latter Laws, and various other Causes, the legal and necessary disciplining of the Militia has been much neglected, and a proper Provision of Arms and Ammunition has not been made, to the evident Danger of the Community in Case of Invasion or Insurrection, that it be recommended to the Inhabitants of the several Counties of this Colony that they form one or more voluntier Companies of Infantry and Troops of Horse in each County and be in constant training and Re[a]diness to act on any Emergency.
>
> * * * * *
>
> That each Company of Infantry consist of sixty eight Rank and File * * * ; That every man be provided with a good Rifle if to be had, or otherwise with a Common Firelock, Bayonet and Cartouch Box; and also with a Tomahawk, one pound of Gunpowder, and four pounds of Ball at least fitted to the Bore of his Gun; that he be cloathed in a hunting Shirt by Way of Uniform; and that all endeavour as soon as possible to become acquainted with the military Exercise for Infantry appointed to be used by his Majesty in the Year 1764.
>
> That each Troop of Horse consist of thirty exclusive of Officers: That every Horseman be provided with a good Horse, * * * with pistols * * * , a Carbine or other short Firelock * * * , and one pound of Gunpowder and four pounds of Ball at the least * * * .
>
> That in order to make a further & more ample Provision of Ammunition it be recommended to the Committees of the several Counties that they collect from their Constituents in such Manner as shall be most agre[e]able to them so much money as will be sufficient to purchase half a pound of Gunpowder, one pound of Lead, necessary Flints and Cartridge paper, for every Titheable person in their County * * * . And it is earnestly recommended to each Individual to pay such proportion of the Money necessary for these purposes as by the respective Committees shall be judged requisite.[867]

Well aware that the Local Committees of Correspondence were supporters and to some degree agents of the Continental Congress, which itself was the focal point for unification of patriots throughout America, on 28 March 1775 Dunmore attempted to suppress Virginians' further participation in that assembly:

> Whereas certain Persons, stiling themselves Delegates of several of his Majesty's Colonies in America, having presumed, without his

---

[867] Reprinted in id., Volume II, at 374-375 (footnotes omitted). As the historians who compiled the documents in Revolutionary Virginia correctly pointed out, the Militia Act of 1738 was not force in 1775, and the Convention's invocation of it could have amounted to no more than a recommendation that the Act be consulted as the source of standards for arming and training Independent Companies. See id., Volume II, at 379 note 8.

> Majesty's Authority or Consent, to assemble together at Philadelphia * * * have thought fit * * * to resolve * * * that another Congress should be held * * * , unless Redress of certain pretended Grievances be obtained * * * and to recommend that all the Colonies in North America should chuse Deputies to attend such Congress, I * * * require all Magistrates and other Officers to use their utmost Endeavours to prevent any such Appointments of Deputies, and to exhort all Persons whatever within this Government [that is, Virginia] to desist from such an unjustifiable Proceeding[.]{EN-1486}

Reading the dire signs of the times in Dunmore's exhortations, patriotic Virginians continued to prepare for the worst. For example, on 18 April 1775 the "Gentlemen Volunteers" who comprised Independent Companies in Albemarle County agreed that

> We * * * volunteers * * * for the county of Albemarle, do most Solemnly bind ourselves by the sacred ties of virtue, Honor & love to our Country, to be at all times ready to execute the command of the [County C]ommittee [of Correspondence], in defence of the rights of America (unless incapacitated) * * * .
>
> * * * We resolve should we fall or fly back on being called into service to be held unworthy the rights of freemen & as inimical to the cause of America[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * We oblige ourselves to obey the commands of the officers by ourselves elected from the Inlisted Volunteers, to Muster four times in the year or oftener If necessary. To provide Gun[,] shotpouch, powder horn[, and] to appear on Duty in a hunting shirt.[868]

(These men could confidently invoke "ties of virtue, Honor, & love to our Country" because—being drawn from the same Locality, with much the same experiences in life, and often with close familial interrelationships—they all knew and trusted one another.) On 29 April 1775, "officers and special deputies of fourteen companies * * * , consisting of upwards of six hundred well armed and disciplined men, friends of constitutional liberty and America", rendezvoused at Fredericksburg, Virginia, and upon dispersing broadcast the following statement:

> considering the just rights and Liberty of America to be greatly endangered by the violent and hostile proceedings of an arbitrary Ministry, and being firmly resolved to resist such attempts at the utmost hazard of our lives and fortunes, [we] do now pledge ourselves to each > other to be in readiness, at a moment's warning, to re-assemble, and, by force of arms to defend the laws, the liberty, and rights of this, or any sister colony, from unjust and wicked invasion.[869]

---

[868] Reprinted in id., Volume III, at 48.

On 3 May 1775, the Committee of Correspondence of Amelia County met—

> It appearing to this committee, that the militia of this county, since the expiration of the late militia laws, hath been totally neglected; and it being indispensably necessary, for the internal security of the county, that the same be properly and regularly disciplined, and that patrollers in every neighbourhood be constantly kept on duty:
>
> Resolved, that application be made to the Lieutenant of this county, to direct forthwith a general muster of the militia of the county; that he do his utmost to carry into execution the law made in the year 1738, for embodying and disciplining the militia of this colony; that he give all the countenance and encouragement in his power to the officers who are recruiting or embodying independent companies, agreeable to the resolution of the Convention of the 25th day of March last.[870]

That same day, the Committee for New Kent County

> Resolved, that * * * [then-recent events] make it particularly necessary for the inhabitants of this county to prepare for their defence, against any dangers that may ensue * * * , by keeping their arms in the best order, and the greatest readiness, to act on any occasion.
>
> Resolved, that it be recommended to the inhabitants of this county immediately to form a company of volunteers, * * * ready to act on any emergency, as may be found necessary.[871]

Then, on 16 May 1775, the Committee for the western portion of Augusta County

> resolved, that the recommendation of the Richmond convention, of the [25]th of last March,[[872]] relative to the embodying, arming, and disciplining the militia, be immediately carried into execution with the greatest diligence in this county, [and]
>
> * * * * *
>
> Ordered, That the standing committee be directed to secure such arms and ammunition as are not employed in actual service, or private property, and that they get the same repaired, and deliver them to such

---

[869] Reprinted in id., Volume III, at 70-71.

[870] Reprinted in id., Volume III, at 83 (footnotes omitted).

[871] Reprinted in id., Volume III, at 85 (footnote omitted).

[872] See ante, at 573-574.

> captains of independent companies as may make application for the same[.][873]

Meanwhile, realizing that his bluster has done nothing to abate, but rather had exacerbated, the people's dissatisfaction with his régime, on 6 May 1775 Dunmore tried to poison Virginians' hearts and minds against their most ardently patriotic leaders by traducing the latter as seditious agitators, violent para-military rebels, and even terrorists:

> [A] certain Patrick Henry * * * and a Number of deluded Followers, have taken up Arms, chosen their Officers, and styling themselves an Independent Company, have marched out of their County * * * and put themselves in a Posture of War; and have written and dispatched Letters to divers Parts of the Country, exciting the People to join in these outrageous and rebellious Practices, to the great Terrour of all his Majesty's faithful Subjects, and in open Defiance of Law and Government; and have committed other Acts of Violence, * * * whence it undeniably appears, that there is no longer the least Security for the Life or Property of any Man: Wherefore I * * * strictly charg[e] all Persons, upon their Allegiance, not to aid, abet, or give Countenance to, the said Patrick Henry, or any other Persons concerned in such unwarrantable Combinations; but, on the Contrary, to oppose them and their Designs by every Means; which Designs must, otherwise, inevitably involve the whole Country in the most direful Calamity, as they will call for the Vengeance of offended Majesty and the Insulted Laws, to be exerted here, to vindicate the constitutional Authority of Government.{EN-1487}

That Henry and his adherents had formed "an Independent Company" to oppose him could hardly have surprised Dunmore, because those patriots—and several generations of their forebears in Virginia—had learned their martial independence in her Militia's school, through their personal experience of Local recruitment, organization, training, command, and deployment. Virginia's Militiamen had long enjoyed explicit statutory authority to act on their own initiatives whenever danger threatened:

> • [1727, 1732, 1734, 1738, 1744, 1748, and 1753] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any insurrection or invasion, shall have full power and authority * * * forthwith to raise the militia under his command, and to send immediate intelligence * * * to the chief commanding officer residing in the county, and to the next militia officer in the same county, informing them at the same time in what manner he intends to proceed; and shall, in the mean time, keep the

---

[873] Reprinted in R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume III, at 138-139.

> militia, under his command, under arms, until he receives orders from his superior officer. And every * * * chief commanding officer in any county, to whom such intelligence shall be given of any insurrection or invasion, shall forthwith dispatch an express to the governor, * * * notifying the danger; and shall therewith signify, in the best manner he can, the strength and motions of the enemy. * * * And until orders shall arrive from the governor, shall draw together the militia of his county, in such place or places, as he shall judge most convenient for opposing the enemy."{EN-1488}
>
> • [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[E]very officer of the militia, to whom notice shall be given of any invasion or insurrection, shall raise the militia under his command, and send intelligence * * * to the chief commanding officer in the county, and shall moreover immediately proceed to oppose the enemy according to the orders he shall receive * * * , and such * * * chief commanding officer shall give immediate notice to the officers of the militia of the next adjacent counties of such invasion or insurrection, and the situation and circumstances of the enemy according to the best of his information and judgment; and such officer to whom such notice shall be given, if not the chief commanding officer of the county, shall give immediate notice to his commanding officer * * * , who shall immediately raise the militia of his county and march part thereof, not exceeding two-thirds, against such enemy, if the circumstances of the case shall require it * * * ; and such commanding officer shall cause the remaining part of his militia, not so marched, to remain in arms in the county for the defence and protection thereof, until he shall receive orders * * * . And every * * * chief commanding officer * * * to whom such intelligence shall be given * * * shall forthwith dispatch an express to the governor * * * , notifying the danger, and * * * the strength and motions of the enemy[.]"{EN-1489}

Implicit in this was the further authority, even under the British "constitution", to act with complete autonomy if confronted by an "insurrection" of rogue public officials, including no less than the Governor himself.[874] For once the officials went wrong, only the people themselves could set things right. Thus, Virginia's patriots were not bound to abide by or acquiesce in Governor Dunmore's commands, after they had concluded that his edicts would be nothing but additions to what the Declaration of Independence later denounced as "a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object [that] evince[d] a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism". Neither did they need to "dispatch an express to the governor * * * , notifying the danger, and * * * the strength and motions of the enemy"—when the Governor and his minions themselves constituted "the enemy". The patriots' preparations for self-defense comprised the only notice he could have expected or deserved.

---

[874] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 143-144, and Volume 4, at 81-82.

Temporizing, on 6 June 1775 Lord Dunmore dispatched to the House of Burgesses a written message in which he attempted to allay the Burgesses' concerns:

> The removing, by my Order, fifteen half Barrels of the King's Powder  * * from the public* Magazine, *has * * * given great uneasiness to the People. * * * The* Magazine *was represented to me as a very insecure Depository and from Experience I find it so, all the Arms which have been kept there being now taken away * * * ; but * * * I do promise you that as soon as I see the* Magazine *in a proper State for securing the Powder and other public Stores, I will replace it * * * .*[875]

Unsatisfied by these evasive assurances, the very next day the House again resolved that the Militia Act of 1738, "which hath been continued and amended by several other Acts and which expired on the twentieth Day of July, 1773, ought to be revived"; and a bill for that purpose was introduced two days later.[876]

Aware that he had not dispelled the "great uneasiness" which his behavior had "*given * * * to the People*", on 8 June 1775 Dunmore—admitting that he and his family were fearful of the "constant danger of falling sacrifices to the blind and unmeasurable fury which has so unaccountably seised upon the minds and understanding of great numbers of People"—announced that he had "fixed [his] *residence * * * on board his Majesty's Ship the* Fowey", a British man-of-war.[877] Yet only two days thereafter, a letter from the fugitive but still fulminating Dunmore was read to the House, peremptorily demanding that the Burgesses "disarm[ ] all independent companies, or other bodies of Men raised and acting in defiance of lawful authority", and "oblig[e] those who have taken any of his Majesty's public store of Arms to deliver them up immediately".[878] The Burgesses did not comply.

Instead, on 14 June 1775, a committee reported to the House on "the Causes of the late disturbances and Commotions" that were "occasioned by the Governor's removing some Powder from the public Magazine" in Williamsburg.[879] The evidence that had been collected was all of a piece:

> It * * * appears by the Testimony of John Dixon, * * * Mayor of the City of Williamsburg, That in the Opinion of the Inhabitants the Militia of the

---

[875] JOURNALS of the HOUSE of BURGESSES of VIRGINIA, ante note 318, at 194-195.

[876] Id. at 200-201, 209.

[877] Id. at 206.

[878] Id. at 215.

[879] Id. at 231.

City being on a different footing and having heard of an independent Company established at Norfolk, were desirous of forming one in Williamsburg. That such Company was accordingly formed * * * the said Dixon never heard [the Governor] disapproved of it, that * * * while the Governor was out on the Indian Expedition, [an official] directed the Keeper of the Public Magazine, to furnish the Company with Muskets. * * *

It also appears by the Testimony of Joseph Hutchings Colonel of the Militia of the Borough of Norfolk, that some years ago the inhabitants judging it would be a means of their greater Security, proposed raising an independent Company, that by their being more regularly trained, they might be more capable of acting upon an Emergency. That some time afterwards his Excellency Lord Dunmore being at Norfolk, the said Hutchings informed him of the intention of the inhabitants and asked his advice how to act as to granting Commissions, the Company intending to choose their own Officers that his Lordship highly commended the proposal[,] advised the said Hutchings to encourage and grant Commissions to such Officers as might be chosen and expressed his Wishes that the example might be followed throughout the Country; and that about two Years afterwards his Lordship was again at Norfolk when the Company was completely formed and Regimented and having drawn them up his Lordship marched through the lines in order to review them and again expressed great satisfaction.

* * * * *

It appears from the Testimony of Hugh Hamilton of the County of Westmoreland * * * [t]hat * * * independent Companies [have been] formed in his and the neighboring Counties * * * for the Defence of the Colony * * * . That in his County the Gentlemen, have been at proper pains to preserve Order. And it has been recommended to the Militia to acquire a knowledge of the military Exercise. That the people * * * have been very orderly and that he never saw any Commotion before the Powder was taken from the Magazine. That there was an alarm concerning the Slaves prior to this transaction, which was greatly increased by the Report of the Governor's intention to declare them free. * * *

It appears from the Testimony of Thomas Mitchell of the County of Louisa * * * [t]hat no independent Company was formed in the said County until the eighth of May 1775 * * * and it is his opinion that the said Company was raised with a view to put the Colony into a state of Defence, but believes it would assist their Committee, if called on. * * *

It appears from the Testimony of James Lyle and Robert Donald of the County of Chesterfield * * * [t]hat no independent Company was formed in Chesterfield till a few Weeks ago, and that they were intended for the general Defence of the Country, and not * * * designed for the Protection of the Committee, or to be under their Direction, but * * * would protect the Committee if required. That the inhabitants were quiet and peaceable prior to the Removal of the Powder, and were greatly alarmed and exasperated at the Governor's Declaration of giving Freedom to the Slaves, since which uncommon diligence has been used in training the independent Company and the Militia to Arms, but the People have always behaved themselves orderly, paying the greatest Regard to the prudent Advice of their Officers. * * *

It appears from the Testimony of Thomas Hodge and James Robinson of King George County, Charles Yates and Henry Mitchell of Spotsylvania, and Robert Gilchrist and Patrick Kennon of Caroline, * * * [t]hat Committees have been established to inforce the Resolutions of the General Congress, and independent Companies formed to learn the Use of Arms, at different Periods. * * * They * * * believe the Defence of the Colony was the first and principal Motive. That some of the independent Company of Spotsylvania have acted under the direction of their Committee, but the Caroline Company refused to inlist unless they were to be solely under the Direction of Officers of their own choosing. That there never was any Commotions among the People, till after the Powder was removed from the Magazine, in Consequence of that transaction there was a great Assemblage of armed men at Fredericksburg and adjacent places, but they were very orderly and peaceable, and upon the advice of a Council they appointed, and some of the Delegates of this Colony, they all retired to their respective Homes. * * *

It appears from the Testimony of Archibald Ritchie of the County of Essex * * * [t]hat the Voluntier Company in the County of Essex was formed about three Weeks ago, not merely for protecting the Committees, but believes they would be so if required. That previous to the Seizure of the Powder the State of the Colony * * * was a general Acquiescence in the Resolves of the provincial and General Congress, and that in Consequence thereof, no Commotion happened in that County. * * *

It appears from the Testimony of Charles Duncan of the County of Chesterfield * * * [t]hat a Voluntier Company in the said County was formed * * * solely for putting the Country into a posture of Defence without any Regard to the protection of the Committee. That the state of the Colony before the Removal of the Powder, was peaceable and orderly, and a strict Compliance with the Resolves of the continental and provincial Congress, was * * * the Cause of maintaining that good order so little to be expected in a County deprived of so essential a part of its laws. That the removal of the Powder certainly occasioned the Commotions complained of * * * .

It appears by the Testimony of Archibald Bryce of the County of Henrico * * * [t]hat the independent Company of Henrico has not been formed above six Weeks, and * * * the principal Design of their Institution was to put the Colony in a proper state of Defence. That he > knew of no Commotions in the County before the seizure of the Powder * * * .

>
> It appears by the Testimony of Thomas Montgomery of the County of Prince William, That previous to the Powders being seised, Committees of Correspondence and of Observation to carry into effect the Resolutions of the Congress, Voluntier Companys were formed, Military Discipline was taught, Arms and Ammuntion were industriously procured. That upon the Report of the Governor's having seised the Powder, many People marched to Fredericksburg, where * * * it was determined in Consultation, they should return to their respective Homes. * * * That the independent Company was formed in that County about September, and its design was to protect the Colony, in General, and the County in particular, and that * * * this institution would aid the Execution of the Resolutions of the Committee * * * .
>
> It appears by the Testimony of Archibald Govan, Thomas Evans, John Johnson and George Braickenridge of the County of Hanover, That * * * [i]n November a Committee, in conformity to a Regulation of the Congress, was chosen, to carry into execution the American Association, an Independent Company enlisted, but not embodied. * * * That as to Commotions * * * , none have occurred except in one instance, which proceeded from the Governor's seising the Powder, which was heightened and encreased by his threatening to enfranchise the Slaves; That those Causes induced the Independent Company to choose their Officers and march out about twenty Miles towards Williamsburg * * * . That * * * the Independent Companies were formed to put the Country into a state of defence, yet they suppose they would have aided the Committee. * * *
>
> It appears * * * from the Testimony of Andrew Sprowle, Archibald Cambpell and James Ingram of the County of Norfolk and Samuel Donaldson of the County of Nansemond, * * * [t]hat the Town of Norfolk as yet, has no independent Company but one formed before the existence of Committees, with the approbation of the Governor, and under his Commission; in Nansemond County an independent Company was formed in May last, not for the avowed purpose of protecting Committees, but in Conformity to the direction of the last Convention. That before the Seizure of the Powder a general acquiescence under the Resolutions of the General and Provincial Congress, marked the political Character of this Colony * * * .[880]

This provides, not merely a catalogue of dry facts, but beyond that a compendium of important principles—

- Independent Companies were formed so that Virginians might "learn the Use of Arms" and "acquire a knowledge of the military Exercise".

---

[880] Id. at 233-237.

• This knowledge was of practical necessity. For, "by their being more regularly trained, the[people] might be more capable of acting upon an Emergency".

• Through such preparedness, Independent Companies "would be a means of the[people's] greater Security".

• Moreover, the purpose of forming Independent Companies was entirely defensive, not at all aggressive. The "design was to protect the Colony, in General, and the County in particular"; they were "intended for the general Defence of the Country"; "the defence of the Colony was the first and principal Motive"; and "the principal Design * * * was to put the Colony in a proper state of Defence".

• Even Governor Dunmore himself had approved of Independent Companies—when he apparently had imagined that they might have served his own purposes. For during their early formation, Virginians had "never heard [the Governor] disapproved of [them]"; and on at least one occasion "his Lordship * * * [had] review[ed]" one Independent Company "and * * * expressed great satisfaction".

• Far from being the cause of the then-recent "disturbances and Commotions", the formation and mobilization of Independent Companies were the people's natural responses to Dunmore's doubly rogue behavior in office. For in one County there was "never * * * any Commotion before the Powder was taken from the Magazine". In another County "the inhabitants were quiet and peaceable prior to the Removal of the Powder, and were greatly alarmed and exasperated at the Governor's Declaration of giving Freedom to the Slaves, since which uncommon diligence has been used in training the independent Company and the Militia to Arms". And in yet another County "the Governor's seising the Powder, which was heightened and encreased by his threatening to enfranchise the Slaves", had "induced the Independent Company to choose their Officers and march out".

Patriotic Virginians well understood that these were not isolated instances of Dunmore's overreaching, but instead integral, coördinated parts of what might have proven to be a simple, but very effective scheme for suppressing rebellion: On the one hand, depriving the people of ammunition would have rendered them defenseless against Dunmore's regular troops; while, on the other hand, arming the slaves would have put into the field under the Royal standard masses of men animated by the strongest possible personal emotions of hatred and vengeance to destroy not only the institution of slavery but also the persons of their former masters, as well as the strongest possible material incentives to appropriate their masters' property as the spoils of civil war.[881]

• That the underlying problem was the people's well-justified fear of oppression by the central Colonial government doubtlessly counseled them to demand Local control of their Independent Companies—so that they "refused to inlist unless they were to be solely under the Direction of Officers of their own choosing". And,

• Confronted by Lord Dunmore's intransigeance, freedom-loving Virginians had no choice but to transfer their political allegiances to other governmental institutions of their own making—namely, the Continental Congress, Virginia's Convention, and the Local Committees of Correspondence and Observation. And, having done so, they had no choice but to employ their Independent Companies to protect those bodies against retaliation from Dunmore, and otherwise to assist them in their operations. That is, the Independent Companies took the first steps in implementing the principle "that whenever any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to the[true] purposes [of government], a majority of the community hath an indubitable, unalienable, and indefeasible right, to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal".[882]

On 19 June 1775, in an address to Governor Dunmore, the Burgesses exhaustively disputed the charges he had communicated to Lord Dartmouth some six months theretofore:[883]

> [Y]ou were pleased to inform your noble Correspondent [Lord Dartmouth], that "every County in this Colony was arming a Company of Men, whom they call an independent Company, for the avowed Purpose of protecting their Committees, and to be employed against Government, if Occasion required; and that the Committee of one County had proceeded so far as to swear the Men of their independent Company to execute all Orders which should be given them from their Committee.["] These, my Lord, are things entirely without our Knowledge, and upon the strictest inquiry, we are convinced they deserve no Credit. There were a few Companies of Gentlemen formed, who were desirous of perfecting themselves in Military Exercise, but we find not more than six or

---

[881] As matters turned out during the War of Independence, the intestine conflict between Patriots and Loyalists (or Tories) in the Middle and Southern Colonies was often brutal in the extreme. See, e.g., Thomas B. Allen, Tories: Fighting for the King in America's First Civil War (New York, New York: HarperCollins Publishers, 2010). One can easily imagine how much more horrific the fighting might have been had the British pressed to the limit Dunmore's plan to arm the slaves.

[882] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 3.

[883] See ante, at 570-571.

seven throughout the whole Colony, which consists of fifty one Counties. This was designed to distinguish them from the Militia at large; the first, and most considerable of these, was instituted for the better Protection of the Inhabitants of Norfolk *Borough, and afterwards received your Lordship's Approbation * * * ,That these Companies were connected with the Committees, or that they were ever designed to act against, or in any sort to interfere with, what you are pleased to call Government, we do not know, or believe, but, on the Contrary, we are verily persuaded that they were always ready and willing to exert themselves to support the Laws, and his Majesty's Government, to the utmost of their Power.*

* * * * *

How the Proceedings of the General Convention, in the Month of March last [i.e., in 1775] *may have been represented, we know not; but * * * it is to be presumed in no very favourable light. These Meetings, my Lord, unless it can be supposed that a whole Country could entirely lose sight of its Security and most essential Interests, were rendered absolutely necessary, first by the dissolution, and afterwards by repeated Prorogations, of the General Assembly. Upon Enquiry into the State of the Colony, it was found that there had been almost a total inattention to the proper training and disciplining of our Militia. Various subsequent Acts of our Legislature, amendatory of the Law of 1738, had expired; the Act providing against Invasions and Insurrections was near expiring, and it was uncertain whether an opportunity would be given the General Assembly to revive it. Taking a further view of our situation, it was found that our Inhabitants were exposed to the Incursions of a barbarous and savage Enemy. From the best Accounts received from* Great Britain, there was too much Reason to be convinced that his Majesty's Ministry was prosecuting the most vigorous and arbitrary Measures towards subjugating the Continent of America *to their despotic Rule; which Measures, it is more probable, had been suggested from hence, and the other Colonies: That a Scheme, the most diabolical, had been meditated, and generally recommended, by a Person of great Influence, to offer Freedom to our Slaves, and turn them against their Masters. The Convention, to guard against these Dangers not clearly seen into before that time, recommended a strict attention to the Militia Law of 1738; but thinking this defective in many essential Points, considering that under this Law the whole Militia were not obliged to exercise so frequently as might be necessary, it was recommended that voluntier Companies should be formed in each County, for the better Defence and Protection of the whole Country. These Proceedings, according to an unusual Style, * * * have been represented as designed to oppose Government; whereas * * * Nothing was farther from the Intentions of the Convention. * * * But if it is expected that they should sit down supinely, and submit to Yokes which neither they nor their Forefathers were able to bear, they must acknowledge that they have the sensibility of Feelings of Freemen, actuating them to a proper and justifiable Defence of those Rights which are guaranteed by the Laws and Principles of the* [British] Constitution.

* * * * *

*The Inhabitants of this Country * * * could not be strangers to the many Attempts in the Northen Colonies to disarm the People, and thereby depriving them of the only Means of defending their Lives and Property. We know * * * that the like Measures were generally recommended by the Ministry, and that the Export of Powder from* Great Britain had been prohibited. Judge then how very alarming a Removal of the small Stock which remained in the public Magazine, for the Defence of the Country, and the striping the Guns of their Locks, must have been to any People, who had the Smallest Regard for their Security.

* * * * *

 * * It appears, that during this general uneasiness an Account was received from the Northward of the Engagement at Concord; the General* [that is., Thomas Gage] *it seems, had sent an armed Force to seize a Provincial Magazine. This * * * increased the Apprehensions of our People, as it held out to them an additional Proof that the steps you had taken formed a Part of that general System adopted to render the Colonies defenceless. If upon such Alarms, when the Minds of People were fretted to an extreme Degree, some irregularities were committed, the Causes may be found in those extraordinary Attempts to stretch the Powers of Government so much beyond their ancient and constitutional Limits.*

* * * * *

*The Occasion and Design of forming Independent Companies at first, and the Rise of Voluntier Companies afterwards, we have already explained, and cannot see the Necessity of abolishing them. They are not designed to interfere with * * * the exercise of the legal and constitutional Powers of your Government, which we would wish to have supported on all Occasions; and are of Opinion that the Laws in force are competent to that End. But, if it is expected that the Country should again be thrown into a defenceless State, Self-Preservation, the first Law of Nature, forbids it*[.][884]

Here, too, important principles stand out—

• First and foremost, Virginians rightly understood their community's own self-preservation to be the highest law: "[I]f it is expected that the Country should again be thrown into a defenceless State, Self-Preservation, the first Law of Nature, forbids it." This, of course, accorded perfectly with the fundamental principle of Anglo-American law, long-established at that time, that "[s]elf-defence * * * , as it is justly called the primary law of nature, so it is not, neither can it be in fact, taken away by the law of society".[885]

---

[884] JOURNALS of the HOUSE of BURGESSES of VIRGINIA, ante note 318, at 255-261 (footnotes omitted).

[885] W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 3, at 4.

• The people themselves were the ultimate source of their own security: "These Meetings [of the General Convention] * * * , unless it can be supposed that a whole Country could entirely lose sight of its Security and most essential Interests, were rendered absolutely necessary[.]"

• The people would always support a true "government"—that is, one acting justly in their best interests: "That these [Independent] *Companies * * * were ever designed to act against, or in any sort to interfere with, what you are pleased to call Government, we do not know, or believe, but, on the Contrary, we are verily persuaded that they were always ready and willing to exert themselves to support the Laws, and his Majesty's Government, to the utmost of their Power.*"

• But Virginians could not properly defend themselves, because no Militia was settled by statute at the time: "Upon Enquiry into the State of the Colony, it was found that there had been almost a total inattention to the proper training and disciplining of our Militia. Various subsequent Acts of our Legislature, amendatory of the Law of 1738, had expired; the Act providing against Invasions and Insurrections was near expiring, and it was uncertain whether an opportunity would be given the General Assembly to revive it."

• Virginia's Colonial legislature was unable to act in the public interest: "These Meetings [of the General Convention] * * * , unless it can be supposed that a whole Country could entirely lose sight of its Security and most essential Interests, were rendered absolutely necessary, first by the dissolution, and afterwards by repeated Prorogations, of the General Assembly."

• Parliament, too, was affirmatively acting against the people's interests: "From the best Accounts received from Great Britain, there was too much Reason to be convinced that his Majesty's Ministry was prosecuting the most vigorous and arbitrary Measures towards subjugating the Continent of America to their despotic Rule[.]"

• In particular, the people would not acquiesce in their own disarmament—especially the attempts at home and abroad to cut off their supplies of ammunition, which were recognized as key steps in a systematic scheme of oppression: "*The Inhabitants of this Country * * * could not be strangers to the many Attempts in the Northen Colonies to disarm the People, and thereby depriving them of the only Means of defending their Lives and Property. We know * * * that the like Measures were generally recommended by the Ministry, and that the Export of Powder from* Great Britain had been prohibited." And "an Account was received from the Northward of the Engagement at Concord; the General [that is, Thomas Gage] it seems, had sent an armed Force to seize a Provincial Magazine."

• Under these trying circumstances, forming Independent Companies was the most effective, if not the only practical, way of quickly raising a sufficiently large and trained force through the deployment of which the people could protect themselves against the dangers threatening them: "The Convention, to guard against these Dangers not clearly seen into before that time, recommended a strict attention to the Militia Law of 1738; but thinking this defective in many essential Points, considering that under this Law the whole Militia were not obliged to exercise so frequently as might be necessary, it was recommended that voluntier Companies should be formed in each County, for the better Defence and Protection of the whole Country."

• The people's reasonable perceptions of usurpation and tyranny by rogue public officials justified extra-legal action on their part: "If upon such Alarms, when the Minds of People were fretted to an extreme Degree, some irregularities were committed, the Causes may be found in those extraordinary Attempts to stretch the Powers of Government so much beyond their ancient and constitutional Limits."

• If the formation of Independent Companies was arguably irregular, the irregularity was excusable, and even justifiable, because it was necessary to defend the rights of free men: "*These Proceedings, according to an unusual Style, * * * have been represented as designed to oppose Government; whereas * * * Nothing was farther from the Intentions of the Convention. * * * But if it is expected that they should sit down supinely, and submit to Yokes which neither they nor their Forefathers were able to bear, they must acknowledge that they have the sensibility of Feelings of Freemen, actuating them to a proper and justifiable Defence of those Rights which are guaranteed by the Laws and Principles of the* [British] Constitution."

• Once formed, the Independent Companies would not be disbanded, because they would continue to be useful, particularly in support of a true "government": "*The Occasion and Design of forming Independent Companies at first, and the Rise of Voluntier Companies afterwards, we have already explained, and cannot see the Necessity of abolishing them. They are not designed to interfere with * * * the exercise of the legal and constitutional Powers of your Government, which we would wish to have supported on all Occasions*[.]"

So, the evident lesson this episode teaches is that, in pre-constitutional Virginia, when the normal political institutions failed, the people deemed themselves entitled to organize Militia Companies for their own collective self-defense and in aid of whatever just government they could then establish. And the rump officialdom of the previously established, but then discredited, government could claim and was accorded no say in the process.

Meanwhile, and with good reason, the Burgesses were intent upon ensuring that public arms and ammunition would be supplied for the people's own use and would remain subject to their own control. On 17 June 1775, they prepared an Address to the Governor on that score:

> *We * * * beg leave to inform your Lordship, that the Public Magazine is now repaired, and in fit condition for the Reception of Arms and Ammunition.*
>
> *We therefore request your Lordship will * * * order the Powder, lately removed from thence, to be returned * * * ; We further * * * inform your Lordship, that it appears * * * that there are no Arms therein fit for service. At this critical time, * * * when you Excellency assures us of the great probability of an* Indian *Invasion, at a time too when an Insurrection of our Slaves may be encouraged, merely from a Notoriety of a total Deficiency in our public Stores of Arms and Ammunition, it is a Duty we owe to our Country and ourselves to remind your Lordship, that the Legislature of this Colony have long since made ample Provision for the purchase of Arms and Ammunition, and established a competent Fund for that purpose, by granting to his Majesty one shilling and three pence Sterling upon the Tonnage of all Vessels trading to this Country. * * * But * * * this House, finding a total inattention in Government to this important Provision, altho' it must have appeared essential more than twelve Months ago, and still observing that no means are pursued to supply a Deficiency so alarming, now conceive it to be their Duty, not only to represent this Grievance to your Lordship, but also request that you will * * * order that two thousand Stand of Arms, five Tuns of Powder, and twenty Tuns of Lead, at the least, with a sufficient Quantity of other Military Stores, be immediately provided for the Defence of this Colony, in Case of an Invasion or Insurrection, and that the same be lodged in the Public Magazine.*[886]

On 20 June 1775, Lord Dunmore responded quite positively in the negative:

> As the Care Custody and disposal of publick Stores of Ammunition belong alone to the Kings Representative, I cannot consent to return the Powder, lately removed from the Magazine, to Williamsburg, *which, experience has demonstrated to me, is an improper place for the residence of the Governor, therefore as I could not attend to its preservation, I could not confidently depend upon its being in security there: the Powder in question besides * * * belonged to one of His Majesty's Ships; I am therefore in a particular manner accountable for it; but * * * I shall be ready to apply it, if I find it wanted for the Protection of the Colony.*
>
> *The duty upon the Tonnage of all Vessels trading to this Colony has been applied * * * towards the regular and necessary charges of Government,* > *which without this fund could not have been supported and therefore requires it all. This Colony has hitherto been preserved from Invasion and Insurrection by the Care and attention of Government; * * * So it exposes the injustice of your present attempt, if it does not induce you to forbear others, of bringing your legal and Constitutional Government, at this unhappy Conjuncture, into discredit among the People.*

---

[886] JOURNALS of the HOUSE of BURGESSES of VIRGINIA, ante note 318, at 250.

>
> *As to your request that I order a certain quantity of Arms, Powder and other Military Stores to be provided;—When you have complied with the requisition Submitted to your consideration * * * offering to concur in any measure proper for my Security * * * ; and when the legal executive Power of Government is restored, and I may with certainty rely that Arms Powder and other Military Stores Will be employed no otherwise than as I shall direct, who as his Majesty's Representative have the sole Authority in the Case, then I shall be happy, with the means you furnish me, to provide everything * * * which may be requisite for securing the Inhabitants of* Virginia from Invasion and Insurrection.[887]

In reply, on 21 June 1775 both the Council and the House of Burgesses wrote to Governor Dunmore, rehearsing his contention > that Experience hath shewn the Insecurity of the Magazine, and that, as the Palace [that is, the Governor's residence] *hath hitherto been respected, you thought it improper to give any other Orders, than that the Arms belonging to the King * * * may still remain, in the Palace; and that they may, on no account be touched without your express Permission.*

But, they dissented,

> [t]*hough these Arms * * * may be considered, in some sort as belonging to his Majesty, as the supreme Head of this Government and that they are properly under* [the Governor's] *Direction, yet * * * they were originally provided, and have been preserved, for the Use of the Country, in Cases of Emergency.*
>
> * * * * *
>
>  * * We must * * * once more entreat your Excellency to order the Arms to be removed to the public Magazine.*[888]

So, in pre-constitutional Virginia, even arms the formal title to which resided in the government were to be held at and for the service of the people, not as the exclusive property of public officials or the governmental apparatus. The people enjoyed a beneficial interest in the arms; public officials were merely trustees and custodians; and therefore the arms were to be kept where the people could immediately gain possession of them whenever the people decided that they were needed for the people's own purposes.

---

[887] Id. at 270-271.

[888] Id. at 273.

In their letter of 21 June, the Councillors and Burgesses also emphasized > *that the important Business of this Assembly hath been much impeded by your Excellency's removal from the Palace. * * * There are several Bills of the last importance to this Country, now ready to be presented to your Excellency for your Assent*[889]

—and one of the "Bills of the last importance" then under consideration proposed the revival of the Militia Act, likely the very last action of the General Assembly that Dunmore desired to approve.

The next day, however, recognizing the hopelessness of trying to enact new legislation that would strengthen the people's hand against the recalcitrant Governor, the House of Burgesses "Ordered, that the Committee of the whole House, to whom the Bill, to revive an Act, intituled An Act for the better regulating and disciplining the Militia, was committed, be discharged from proceeding upon the said Bill", and "that the said Bill do lie upon the Table".[890] This was a realistic assessment of the situation, in light of a letter from Dunmore, read that same day, in which he stated that

> *I have already declared my intentions in regard to the Arms at the Palace; and I conceive the Council and House of Burgesses are interfering in a Matter which does not belong to them. * * **
>
>  * * I know of no Bills of importance which, if I were inclined to risk my Person again among the People, the Assembly have to present to me, nor whether they be such as I could assent to.*[891]

Certainly a bill to revive the Militia Act (or enact a new one) would never have received the Governor's assent, because disarming, disorganizing, and ultimately dividing the people against themselves to the maximum possible extent was his obvious goal. This behavior, too, smacked of the same arrogance and disdain for his subjects that led King George III to earn the indictment in the Declaration of Independence that "[h]e has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good".

Finally, on 24 June 1775, the House of Burgesses

---

[889] Id.

[890] Id. at 275 (footnote omitted).

[891] Id. at 276.

> Resolved, that the unreasonable delays thrown into the Proceedings of this House by the Governor, and his evasive Answers to the sincere and decent Addresses of the Representatives of the People, give us great reason to fear, that a dangerous attack may be meditated against the unhappy People of this Colony; it is therefore our Opinion that they prepare for the preservation of their property, and their inestimable rights and liberties, with the greatest care and attention.[892]

The House then adjourned, for the last time; and the Royal Government of Virginia came to an end.

During this period, one historian observed, Virginia's "militia system, fallen into decay * * * , was replaced by volunteer companies of minute-men * * * . Several of them were organized before the end of 1774, and by the summer of 1775 thirty or more existed".[893] Actually (as the foregoing discussion explains), patriots in the House of Burgesses wanted to revive and maintain Virginia's Militia in 1774 according to an expansion of the basic pattern set in 1738, but were prevented from doing so by Governor Dunmore's refusals to coöperate. Rather than having "fallen into decay" through legislators' inadvertence or insouciance, or because of its own obsolescence, Virginia's Militia was obstructed in its revitalization by a single rogue public official, for the very purpose of oppressing the Colony. Yet the obstruction blocked only one path—for the Militia then reappeared in the form of Independent Companies spontaneously formed by the people in Local communities. Virginia's Militia was not somehow "replaced" by Independent Companies, but instead Independent Companies became the vehicles by means of which the people on their own initiative maintained the continuity of their Militia even in the temporary absence of enabling legislation.

When patriotic Virginians were once again in a position to enact such legislation, they quickly revitalized their Militia as a whole, with Independent Companies of volunteers as integral components. On the 19th of July, 1775, Virginia's Convention—having finally superseded the impotent General Assembly under the revolutionary conditions then extant—"Resolved, that a sufficient armed Force be immediately raised and embodyed, under proper Officers for the Defence and protection of this Colony".[894] An "Ordinance" to this effect was subsequently enacted.[895] It provided for normal Militia and Minutemen, as well as regular soldiers, and specified that "the several volunteer companies, raised in pursuance

---

[892] Id. at 281.

[893] H. Eckenrode, The Revolution in Virginia, ante note 644, at 109-110 (footnote omitted).

[894] Reprinted in R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume III, at 319 (footnote omitted).

[895] The Convention styled this measure an "Ordinance", rather than an "Act", because technically only the House of Burgesses—still in nominal existence, but rendered legally impotent by the Governor's refusal to coöperate with it—could pass an "Act". See id., Volume III, at 324 note 6.

of the resolutions of a former convention,[896] shall be disbanded, as soon as the battalions in the several districts where the said volunteer companies respectively reside are fully and completely embodied".{EN-1490}

At the same time, the Convention enacted an Ordinance appointing a general Committee of Safety. As the Editors of Virginia's Statutes at Large described the situation, > [t]he regal government * * * was TOTALLY DISSOLVED;—no other form had then been adopted;—the militia laws had been suffered to expire;—and the revenues of the crown were in the hands of its late officers, from which they were not extracted until a late period. Thus the fathers of the revolution, when they dared that hazardous enterprize, found themselves without a government,—without men,—and without money. Indeed, they had nothing to support them, in the awful contest, but their own virtue and talents, and a firm reliance on the SOVEREIGN DISPOSER OF ALL EVENTS. The progress of the revolution shows with what facility all these difficulties were surmounted.

>
> One of the first measures adopted by the American people to resist the encroachments of the government of Great Britain, was a system of self-denial, generally called the Continental Association, or non-importation agreement. To enforce this, the General Congress had recommended the appointment of Committees of Safety in the several colonies. But the number of committeemen as well as their duration in office being unlimited, the Convention of Virginia gave them a more distinct organization. A General Committee of Safety was appointed by the convention, who were invested with the supreme executive powers of government. County committees were elected by the freeholders of the several counties and corporations; from which district committees were deputed. On these committees devolved the appointment of the captains and subaltern officers of the regulars and minute men, and the general superintendence of the recruiting service. So practically useful had the General Committee of Safety been found, that their powers were transferred to the Governor and Council, and continued long after the adoption of the constitution [of Virginia]. These committees constituted the executive department of the government. The legislative was formed by delegates to the convention, annually elected by the freeholders of the several counties, and corporations, by law, entitled to send burgesses to the general assembly. A judiciary, consisting of three judges appointed by the convention, and five members of each county committee, commissioned by the general committee of safety, was appointed to decide on cases arising under the ordinance "for establishing a mode of punishment for the enemies of America in this colony."[{EN-1491}] The [896] This referred to the Convention's Resolution of 25 March 1775. See ante, at 573-574.

---

> *militar*y was composed of regulars, minute-men, or certain portions of the militia, more strictly trained, and the main body of the militia, newly organized.[897]

Among other authority, Virginia's Committee of Safety was delegated > full power and authority to call forth into actual service any detachments or companies of minute-men, or any parts of the militia from any district or county within this colony, having regard to the convenience and vicinity of such district or county to the place of immediate danger, and also to the internal security of such district or county[; and]

>
> * * * * *
>
> full power and authority to call into service, in cases of danger, to be judged by the said committee, so many volunteer companies, and such parts of the militia, as they may think necessary for the defence and security of any part of the country; and shall appoint some fit and able person, or persons, to command the same, as need may require.{EN-1492}

Thus, Independent Companies in Virginia in 1774 and 1775 filled in until, while, and even after her normal Militia could be properly settled, regulated, mobilized, and deployed—just as Independent Companies could and should be utilized today as part of the process of revitalizing "the Militia of the several States".[898] Then (as would be the case today, too) these Companies were not "vigilante" outfits or some species of Freikorps. To the contrary, they sought guidance from, and were controlled by, the superior governmental authorities they considered legitimate. For instance, on 3 August 1775, the Convention received "a Letter from the Officers of the Voluntier Companies in Williamsburg, requesting that some certain Line for their Conduct might be laid down, lest in their Zeal to serve their Country, they might precipitate their Countrymen into unnecessary Calamities"—to which two days later the the Convention responded, "that this Convention doth applaud the Zeal of the Gentlemen Officers and Voluntiers in the City of Williamsburg and do recommend that they keep themselves on the defensive, exerting their utmost Endeavours & Vigilance to discover and defeat any hostile Attempts of the Enemies of this Country".[899] In some cases, of course, the times being what they were, an Independent Company might go too far, and be reprimanded by the Convention, as when "the Voluntier Company" in Brunswick County attempted to compel a local merchant and his associates "to enlist as Soldiers therein under pain of incurring the Displeasure of the * * * Company and [897] W. Hening, The Statutes at Large, ante note 643, Volume IX, Preface, at [4-5] (footnotes omitted).

---

[898] See post, Chapter 44.

[899] Reprinted in R. Scribner, Revolutionary Virginia, ante note 318, Volume III, at 393 and 401 (footnote omitted).

of being treated as Enemies to the Country", and the Convention "wr[o]te to the commanding officer * * * requiring them to desist from a further prosecution of th[os]e Measures".[900] But generally, until the Militia were fully revitalized and regular troops raised, the Convention relied on Independent Companies, as on 14 August 1775, when it "[r]esolved, that the Committee for the * * * City [of Williamsburg] and the Committees of York and James City be desired to pay particular Attention to the Subject and if Lord Dunmore or any other Person shall land or attempt to Land any armed Troops in their Neighbourhood, that they immediately request the Assistance of the Voluntier Companies now in the City to repel such Troops by Force, and if need be, to call in the Assistance of other Voluntier Companies or Militia for effecting that purpose".[901]

Confronted with this defiance, on 7 November 1775 a desperate Lord Dunmore—drafting his bombastic Proclamation behind the wooden walls and cannon of the British man-of-war H.M.S. William— > determine[d] to execute Martial Law, and cause the same to be executed throughout this Colony: and to the end that Peace and good Order may the sooner be restored, * * * require[d] every Person capable of bearing Arms, to resort to His Majesty's Standard, or be looked upon as Traitors to His Majesty's Crown and Government, and thereby become liable to the Penalty the Law inflicts upon such Offenses; such as forfeiture of Life, confiscation of Lands, &c. &c.{EN-1493}

A more extensive assault of that nature on Americans' liberties brought down on King George III the execration that "[h]e has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power".

Even more desperately, Dunmore also tried to arm the slaves against their masters, thus attempting to bring about in his own interest the very slave revolt that he had earlier claimed it was his intent to forestall:

> And I do hereby further declare all indented Servants, Negroes, or others, (appertaining to Rebels), free that are able and willing to bear Arms, they joining His Majesty's Troops as soon as may be, for the more speedily reducing this Colony to a proper Sense of their Duty, to His Majesty's Crown and Dignity.{EN-1494}

No less than George Washington himself believed that, by emancipating and arming the slaves and indentured servants, Dunmore could have become "the most formidable enemy America has".[902] But, although Dunmore did enlist hundreds of runaway slaves in a so-called "Ethiopian Regiment",[903] his efforts eventually came to naught. As did King George III's—albeit not before the Declaration of Independence had denounced him for "ha[ving] incited domestic insurrections amongst us".

---

[900] Reprinted in id., Volume III, at 413.

[901] Reprinted in id., Volume III, at 440 (footnote omitted).

Even more unfortunately for Dunmore, decisive numbers of the Virginians "capable of bearing Arms" turned out to be patriots who shunned "His Majesty's Standard". And within less than a month, "the good people" of Virginia—refusing sheepishly to bow to "martial law"—instead declared that > the earl of Dunmore, by his many hostile attacks upon the good people of this colony, and attempts to infringe their rights and liberties, by his proclamation declaring freedom to our servants and slaves, and arming them against us, by seizing our persons and properties, and declaring those who opposed such his arbitrary measures in a state of rebellion, hath made it necessary that an additional number of forces be raised for our protection and defence[.]{EN-1495}

The progression in Dunmore's decrees is revealing: First, he tried to impose political control "from the top down", relying on "all Magistrates and other Officers" in the governmental apparatus. Second, when that did not suffice, he expanded his call for help, "charging all Persons" to "oppose the[patriots] and their Designs by every Means", and threatening recalcitrant Virginians with "the Vengeance of offended Majesty and the Insulted Laws". Third, when even that bluster and bluff proved unavailing, he sought at last to marshal "from the bottom up" the "'[p]olitical power [that] grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[904] by summoning to his side "every Person capable of bearing Arms". At that point, Dunmore discovered the dearth of power he actually wielded—that his authority depended utterly upon the common people's voluntary support—and that the people did not have to accede to his paper commands, because they exercised the real power, embodied in steel and lead, to disregard and frustrate them. The people could and did "just say No!", perhaps not easily but nonetheless unequivocally. Thus, Dunmore learned the hard way that freedom-loving people in a Militia built "from the bottom up" would not mechanically take orders "from the top down" that they understood to be in aid of usurpation and tyranny directed against themselves. Indeed, such inevitable and inexorable disobedience—proven in the crucible of her own struggle for independence against Britain—is precisely the reason that Virginia adopted the [902] Quoted in M. Kranish, Flight from Monticello, ante note 644, at 79.

---

[903] Id. at 76-77.

[904] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

constitutional principle that "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state".[905]

K. An exemplar of federalism in action. The evident conclusion to be derived from all of this historical experience is that Virginia's Militia was a practical exemplar of the truest and most worthwhile "federalism", because its membership, leadership, training, command, deployment, and in an emergency even self-mobilization were organized and operated "from the bottom up", with their foundations resting securely—not on charismatic "leaders" or self-styled élites, factions, or special-interest groups—but instead on the ordinary men resident within Local communities. Inasmuch as in the final analysis "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'", and those who wield political power are the true sovereigns in any community, the thoroughly decentralized structure of Virginia's Militia—always and everywhere "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms"—vested sovereignty in the people themselves in the most direct and efficacious manner possible. The people themselves had the numbers, the armaments, the organization, the training, the physical possession of most of the property, and the legal authority in over one hundred years of Militia statutes and practices sufficient to protect themselves as individuals and their Commonwealth as a whole from all enemies, both foreign and domestic—whether the immediate danger took the form of an invading army, marauding pirates, hostile Indians, rioters, or homegrown rogue public officials infesting the highest levels of their government.

[905] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

Virginia granted various exemptions from service in her pre-constitutional Militia, based upon eminently practical considerations.

Although Virginia's General Assembly asserted an overarching authority to compel every able-bodied adult free male within her territory to serve in her Militia, it allowed Militiamen various exemptions from fulfillment of that duty. Yet, although no "inherent right" to any exemption was ever recognized, exemptions were never simply arbitrary in nature, either. Rather, the legislature's operating principle was that every exemption had to be consistent with both the structure of the Militia as "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms", and the purpose of the Militia as "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state".[906] That is, every exemption served some purpose of the Militia.

So, first and foremost, exemptions could not be, and never were, suffered to undermine the Militia either in its fundamental principle of organization, by denying the near-universal duty of service, or in its practical deployment in the field, by removing too many otherwise eligible men from the pool of those immediately available for service. Of equal importance, though, a lack of exemptions could not be suffered to overly weaken normal domestic society by calling forth too many men too often for too much service. The degree to which the near-universal duty needed to and could be enforced depended upon the actual dangers confronting the community balanced against its ability to muster forces sufficient to deal with those dangers while simultaneously maintaining "the home front" in a condition not too far removed from normalcy. As the General Assembly declared as early as 1629, "every commander of the severall plantations appointed by commission from the governor shall have power and authoritie to levy a partie of men out of the inhabitants of that place soe many as may well be spared without too much weakening of the plantations and to imploy these men against the Indians".{EN-1496} Pre-constitutional Virginia, after all, was not a "garrison state". Her society did not exist in order to supply a reason for and to support with blood and treasure her Militia. Rather, the Militia existed in order to protect the society which had settled it. The people's safety and welfare were the ends, the institution designed to secure them the means—"the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state", to be sure; but withal only an instrument to that end. Nonetheless, the Militia consisted, not of just some small portion of society, but of its vital core and most active component: "the body of the people". Unless the totality of the Militia were to be called forth upon every occasion that warranted the appearance of any Militiamen in the field, regular processes of selection for, and excusal from, actual service were absolutely necessary. Calls for volunteers, acceptance of substitutes, impressment, and rotation served as means for affirmative selection, depending on circumstances.[907] Exemptions constituted forms of negative selection from service that released certain men from particular duties otherwise incumbent upon them.

---

[906] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

All exemptions shared several characteristics: First, exemptions had specific practical justifications sounding in real social utility. They were intended to serve important public purposes, not the parochial and ephemeral special and anti-social interests of politically or economically influential factions. Second, although exemptions were sufficiently extensive to achieve their particular ends, the total of all exemptions was sufficiently limited not to endanger the Militia's overall readiness. For example, it might have been politically popular for the legislature to exempt from actual service every Militiaman (say) younger than twenty-two and older than twenty-five years of age, and to require even the men in that range of ages to muster for training only once a year. Such a policy, however, would implicitly have subverted the fundamental conception that near-universal duty was the foundation of Militia service—and therefore would have been bad in legal principle. And it would inevitably have proven disastrous in practice, too—because, even if such a small pool of Militiamen might have sufficed for the community's defense when such exemptions were first allowed, over ensuing years the extent of those exemptions would have precluded the training and seasoning of enough other men to enable the Militia to field a force large and competent enough to deal with seriously elevated threats, particular if they arose very suddenly. Third, exemptions were sometimes more formal than substantive. For example, some individuals who were excused from personally appearing at Militia musters on account of their positions as governmental officials were likely to be high-ranking officers in the Militia who probably would have attended musters voluntarily, and in any event would have commanded Militia units in the field. Fourth, exemptions were always subject to change—being granted, expanded, contracted, or withdrawn as circumstances demanded. No one could claim an "inherent" or "vested" right, privilege, or immunity in any exemption.

The basic categories of exemptions from Militia service available in pre-constitutional Virginia included gender, race or condition of servitude, age, physical disability, public office or private occupation, provision of a substitute, payment of fines, and conscientious objection. Virginia also afforded her Militiamen time to comply with certain requirements, which amounted to temporary exemptions. But Virginia enacted no general exemption—or, perhaps more descriptively put, no general exclusion—from Militia service for individuals who had returned to society after having been convicted of criminal behavior.

---

[907] See ante, at 369-375; 382-391; 346-363 and 375-382; and 392-400.

A. Gender. That the political, economic, and social positions and activities of women in *pre-*constitutional Virginia differed decidedly from those of men decisively influenced the legislature with regard to how it structured her Militia. The General Assembly never explicitly abjured a power to call forth adult able-bodied free women for some kind of service in, with, or for the Militia, at least in situations of direst necessity. Indeed, any such abjuration would have been incredible on its face, in that, in true situations of direst necessity, everyone who is not a pacifist or a coward will fight for his or her freedom whether ordered to do so by public officials or not, because the alternative of sheepish submission to murder, rapine, and subjugation is suicidal and dishonorable. In any event, as dangerous as conditions sometimes became in *pre-*constitutional Virginia, situations of direst necessity never actually arose—as proven by the General Assembly's consistent implicit exemption of women from almost all types of Militia duty throughout that entire period.

1. This broad exemption appeared in two forms.

a. Virginia's Militia statutes and other legislation providing for military duties called explicitly upon "men" or "male persons" to serve, with no mention or even intimation of women as being eligible. For example,

> • [1644] "[P]ersons * * * may remove and dispose of themselves for their best advantage and convenience, Only in places of danger it shall not be lawfull for any to seat or inhabitt without ten sufficient men at the least, and arms and ammunition accordingly[.]"{EN-1497}
>
> • [1705] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county have full power and authority to list all male persons whatsoever, from sixteen to sixty years of age, within his respective county, to serve in horse or foot[.]"{EN-1498}
>
> • [1723] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county, have full power and authority to list all free male persons whatsoever, from twenty-one to sixty years of age, * * * to serve in horse or foot[.]"{EN-1499}
>
> • [1738] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons, above the age of one and twenty years, within this colony, under the command of such captains as he shall think fit."{EN-1500}
>
> • [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within this colony

(imported servants excepted) under the command of such captain, as he shall think fit[.]"{EN-1501}

• [1775] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, above the age of sixteen, and under fifty years, except such as are * * * excepted, shall be enlisted into the militia by the commander in chief of the county[.]"{EN-1502}

• [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years [with various exceptions] * * * shall, by the commanding officer of the county in which they reside, be enrolled or formed into companies[.]"{EN-1503}

• [1784 and 1785] "[A]ll free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years [with various exceptions] * * * shall be enrolled or formed into companies[.]"{EN-1504}

b. When Virginia's Militia statutes did use the inclusive term "persons", the contexts showed that, other than in some perhaps not impossible yet predictably quite extraordinary case, "persons" always referred to "men". For example, [1705] "That * * * the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county have full power and authority to list all male persons whatsoever, from sixteen to sixty years of age within his respective county * * * .

"Provided * * * That nothing * * * shall * * * give any power or authority * * * to list any person that shall be, or shall have been of her majesty's councill in this colony, or any person that shall be, or shall have been speaker of the house of burgesses, or any person that shall be, or shall have been her majesty's attorney general, or any person that shall be, or shall have been a justice of the peace within this colony, or any person that shall have born any military commission within this colony as high as * * * captain, or any minister, or the clerk of the councill for the time being, or the clerk of the general court for the time being, or any county court clerk during his being such, or any parish clerk or school-master during his being such, or any overseer that hath four or more slaves under his care, or any constable during his being such, or any miller who hath a mill in keeping, or any servant by importation, or any slave[.]"{EN-1505}

This statute precluded "list[ing] any person" whom it specifically identified by public office or private occupation. But the only "persons" whom the statute required to be "list[ed]" in the first place were "all male persons whatsoever". So, all of the "persons" specifically identified must have been taken to have been men, and only men, because only male "persons" were possibly needful of such exemptions. Indeed, because at this time women were never elected or appointed to the public offices that some of these "persons" held, and except in rare instances did not carry on the private occupations of others of these "persons", the "persons'" gender was implicit in their offices or occupations. Conceivably, of course, the widow of a miller might have continued to operate the mill with the aid of children, servants, or hirelings, and therefore might properly have been designated a "miller" herself. Yet even if every one of these public offices and private occupations might have been held or carried on by women, the statute's generic exemption—as well as its primary reference to "all male persons whatsoever"—prevented any such women from being "list[ed]". And obviously no one in the *pre-*constitutional era would ever have contended that, absent an explicit statutory prohibition, any female "servant by importation" or "slave" would or should have been considered eligible in principle for "list[ing]" in the Militia.

> • [1723] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * [shall] list all free male persons * * * .
>
> " * * * Provided nevertheless, That nothing * * * shall * * * compel any person or persons that shall be, or shall have been, of his Majesty's council in this colony, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary of this colony, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, his Majesty's attorney-general, a justice of the peace, or any person that shall have born any military commission * * * as high as * * * captain, or the clerk of the council, for the time being, or the clerk of the general court, for the time being, or any county court clerk, during his being such, personally to appear at any musters: But that all, and every the persons aforesaid, * * * are * * * required to find and provide one able-bodied white man * * * who shall constantly appear and exercise at all musters.
>
> " * * * Provided nevertheless, That nothing * * * shall * * * cause to be listed, any minister of the church of England, or the president, masters, professors, or students, of the college of William and Mary, during the time of their being such; or any person being emploied as an overseer, and having four or more slaves under his care; or any miller, having a mill under his charge and keeping; or the founders, keepers, or any other persons emploied in or about any iron, copper, or lead work, or any mine, during the time of their being so emploied; or any free Negro, Mulatto, or Indian."{EN-1506}
>
> • [1738] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons * * * .
>
> " * * * Provided always, That nothing * * * shall * * * compel any persons herein after-mentioned, to a personal attendance at musters: that is to say, Such as are, or shall have been, members of his majesty's council, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary, receiver-general, auditor, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, attorney-general, clerk of the council, clerk of the house of burgesses, clerk of the secretary's office, a justice of the peace, clerk of any county court, or any person that shall have borne any military commission as high as * * * captain, or any of the people commonly called Quakers, Yet all the[se] persons * * * are * * * required to send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters.

> " * * * Provided also, That nothing * * * shall * * * enable any * * * chief officer of the militia, to list or cause to be listed, any of the ministers of the church of England, the president, masters, or professors, and students, of the college of William and Mary, during the time of their being such, any overseers residing on the plantation where the slaves under their care are worked, all millers, having the charge and keeping of any mill, nor the founders, keepers, or other persons emploied in or about any iron, copper, or lead work, or any other mine, during the time of their being so emploied; who are * * * exempted from being any ways concerned in the militia."{EN-1507}

In their first provisos, these statutes exempted various "persons", not from being "list[ed]", but from having "personally to appear at any musters", and as a condition of such exemption required each of those "persons" "to find and provide one able-bodied white man", or "to send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse", as a personal substitute. So, even if women could conceivably have been among the "persons" to whom the exemption from personally appearing at musters had applied, that exemption would nonetheless have required a man to appear in an exempted woman's place. In their second provisos, the statutes also exempted "other persons" from being "list[ed]" at all. The only "persons" who could have been "list[ed]", however, were "free male persons" So, once again, even if women could conceivably have been included in principle among the "other persons" to whom this exemption had applied, in practice the exemption would have been unnecessary.

> [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons * * * (imported servants excepted) under the command of such captain, as he shall think fit * * * .
>
> " * * * Provided always, That nothing * * * shall * * * compel any persons hereafter mentioned, to muster, that is to say, such as are members of the council, speaker of the house of Burgesses, receiver general, auditor, secretary, attorney general, clerk of the council, clerk of the secretary's office, ministers of the church of England, the president, masters or professors, and students of William and Mary college, the mayor, recorder, and Aldermen of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, the keeper of the public goal, any person being bona fide, an overseer over four servants or slaves, and actually residing on the plantation where they work, and receiving a share of the crop or wages, for his care and pains, in looking after such servants and slaves: Any miller having the charge and keeping of any mill, and founders, keepers, or other persons employed in or about any copper, iron or lead mine, who are all hereby exempted from being inlisted, or any other way concerned in the militia[.]
>
> * * * * *

> " * * * That the several persons herein after exempted from mustering (except ministers of the church of England, the president, masters or professors, and students of William and Mary college, the keeper of the public goal, overseers and millers, and all workers in any mine whatsoever) shall provide arms for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside * * * that is to say, each councillor * * * : The speaker of the house of Burgesses * * * : The receiver general, auditor, and secretary * * * : The attorney general * * * : The clerk of the council, and clerk of the secretary's office * * * : The mayor, recorder, and aldermen of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk[.]"{EN-1508}

These statutes exempted various "persons" either from having to muster, albeit on the condition that they would supply arms to their Local governments for the Militia's use; or from being "inlisted". The only individuals who were ever "listed", though, were "male persons". And only "male persons" were ever required to muster, because: (i) Only "male persons" were ever "listed * * * under the command of [some] captain". (ii) "[E]very captain" regularly "muster[ed] * * * his troop or company". And therefore (iii) no one who was not so "listed"under such a "captain" could possibly be mustered.{EN-1509} So, even if women could conceivably have been among the "persons" to whom these exemptions had applied, the exemptions would have be pointless as to them, because the statutes did not require women to appear at musters or to be "inlisted" in any event.

Similarly, Virginia's Militia statutes of 1775, 1777, 1784, and 1785 set out exemptions from enlistment in the Militia for individuals: (i) in various public offices—none of whom were described generically as "persons", and in none of which women would likely ever have served in that era; and (ii) in certain private occupations, some of which—such as "millers", "persons concerned in iron works", and "persons solely employed in manufacturing fire arms"—a few women could conceivably have followed. Even if women could have been found in such offices or occupations, however, they could not possibly have been the beneficiaries of exemption from enlistment, because each of these statutes specified that only "free male persons" were to be enlisted in the first place, and as a consequence of their enlistment required to muster.{EN-1510}

Other statutes also treated the term "persons" as including only "men". For example, > • [1740] "[T]he justices of the peace * * * [may] raise and levy such able-bodied men as do not follow or exercise any lawful calling or employment, or have not some other lawful and sufficient support and maintenance, to serve * * * as soldiers * * * .

>
> " * * * Provided always, That nothing * * * shall extend to the taking or levying any person to serve as a soldier, who hath any vote in the election of * * * burgesses * * * ; or who is * * * an indented or bought servant."{EN-1511}

• [1754] "[T]he chief officer of the militia * * * in every county * * * is hereby required * * * to appoint * * * men of the militia * * * once in every month, or oftener if * * * required * * * , to patrol and visit all negroe quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, and other disorderly persons[.]"{EN-1512}

• [1754] "WHEREAS his majesty has been pleased to send instructions * * * to raise and levy soldiers for carrying on the present expedition against the French on the Ohio; * * * and * * * that there are * * * able bodied persons, fit to serve * * * , who follow no lawful calling or employment.

" * * * [T]he justices of the peace of every county and corporation within this colony * * * , upon application made to them, by any officer or officers appointed or impowered to enlist men, * * * [may] raise and levy such able bodied men, as do not follow or exercise any lawful calling or employment, or have not some other lawful and sufficient support and maintenance, to serve * * * as soldiers in the present expedition[.]"{EN-1513}

2. Yet if Virginia's statutes did not explicitly include women fully within the Militia alongside men, they did not absolutely exclude all women from the performance of all Militia duties, either. Instead, women who were the heads of their households were required to assume the financial burdens arising out of defaults in Militia service on the parts of their minor sons or servants:

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he fines and penalties incurred by infants and servants for the breach or neglect of their duty in any particular service * * * required, of them, shall be paid by the parent, guardian, or master, respectively[.]"{EN-1514}

Plainly, in this and any like statute, "parent, guardian, or master" must have been taken to include both men and women, as the General Assembly could never have intended either for women who were the sole surviving "parent[s]" or "guardian[s]" of male "infants" to be mulcted for the minors' misbehavior, while women who had exclusive control of male "servants" could escape the financial consequences of their charges' misconduct; or for male "servants" to shirk their duties in the Militia without penalty simply because the heads of the households in which they lived and to whom they were subject happened to be women.

• [1775] "[A]ll fines and penalties incurred by infants and servants, for breach or neglect of duty in any particular service * * * required of them, shall be paid by the parent, guardian, or master, of such infant or servant[.]"{EN-1515}

• [1777] "Every officer failing to furnish himself with one pound of powder shall forfeit and pay ten shillings, and the same for failing to > furnish himself with four pounds of ball; and every soldier failing therein shall likewise be liable for the same penalties, which penalties, where incurred by infants, shall be paid by the parent or guardian, and where incurred by servants shall be paid by the master[.]"{EN-1516}

To be sure, the liabilities connected with Militia service which might have been imposed on these women were only financial in substance and vicarious in legal character—but they nonetheless derived from the selfsame source, and were as legally enforceable and costly, as the liabilities to which men were exposed in those regards.

3. In sum, any assertion that women played no part whatsoever in Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia is inaccurate. Their involvement was narrow, their general exemption from duty broad—but the former was as real as the latter. Virginia eventually described her "well regulated militia" as "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms".[908] And, as her Militia statutes specified without exception throughout the entire *pre-*constitutional era, those "people, trained to arms" under the compulsion of law were "male persons" only. Women—either as a class in general or as individuals in particular instances—were never statutorily required to be "trained to arms" themselves. Yet some of them did participate in the Militia by being held financially responsible for some men in their own households who were required to be "trained to arms" and who defaulted on their Militia duties. So, as to these women, Virginia did require fulfillment of a vicarious duty to be "trained to arms". Therefore, Virginia's "well regulated militia" was not defined, in operation at least, as being composed exclusively of men. That Virginia's General Assembly had the undoubted right and the power to hold women who were heads of their households financially responsible for failing to supervise and control the behavior of their minor sons and servants in relation to the performance of those individuals' Militia duties proves that women were subject to some Militia duties at that time, and so could be made subject to some duties, too, in revitalized "Militia of the several States" today. And if to some duties, why not to others, or even to all? That, of course, is largely a political question for which only a political answer in the future is possible.[909]

B. Condition of servitude or race. From the very beginning, Virginia discriminated against people of color, whether bond or free, not just in relation to service in the Militia and other military duty, but also with respect to their very possession of arms for any purpose: As in the declaration of 1639 that "ALL persons except negroes to be provided with arms and amunition or be fined".{EN-1517} This is hardly surprising, inasmuch as "'[p]olitical power grows out of the barrel of a gun'",[910] and during the *pre-*constitutional era even free Negroes and other people of color were "considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them".[911] For example, in 1705 the General Assembly decreed that no "negro, mulatto or Indian, shall * * * bear any office, ecclesiasticall, civill or military, or be in any place of public trust or power, within * * * Virginia".{EN-1518} In 1723, it declared that "no free negro, mullatto, or indian whatsoever, shall * * * have any vote at the election of burgesses, or any other election whatsoever".{EN-1519} In 1748, it ordained that, "whereas * * * negroes, mulattos, and Indians, are commonly of such base and corrupt principles, that their testimony cannot be depended upon", therefore "no free negroe, mulatto, or Indian, shall be admitted or sworn a witness, in any cause whatsoever, except against or between negroes, mulattos, or indians".{EN-1520} And in that same year it ordered that, "if any negroe, mulattoe, or Indian, bond or free, shall at any time, lift his, or her hand, in opposition to any christian, not being a negroe, mulattoe, or Indian, he, or she so offending, shall * * * receive thirty lashes on his, or her bare back, well laid on".{EN-1521} Such discrimination carried over into the Militia, too.

---

[908] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[909] See, e.g., Kingsley Browne, Co-Ed Combat: The New Evidence That Women Shouldn't Fight The Nation's Wars (New York, New York: Sentinel, 2007).

1. Slaves were always exempted—or perhaps more descriptive of the effect, excluded—from the Militia, for two self-evident reasons: First, because "a well regulated militia" in *pre-*constitutional Virginia was "composed of the body of the people", slaves could take no part in the Militia inasmuch as, being *un*free themselves, they were not among "the people" who formed "a free state". "[N]either the class of persons who had been imported as slaves nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were * * * acknowledged as a part of the people".[912] Second, because "a well regulated militia" in *pre-*constitutional Virginia was "composed of the body of the people, trained to arms", slaves could take no part in the Militia inasmuch as the bondsmen's thoroughgoing personal disarmament was the preëminent and absolutely necessary "badge and incident" of slavery. As Blackstone pointed out,

> [t]wo precautions are * * * advised to be observed in all prudent and free governments: 1. To prevent the introduction of slavery at all: or, 2. If it be already introduced, not to intrust those slaves with arms; who will then find themselves an overmatch for the freemen.[913]

---

[910] Quotations From Chairman Mao, ante note 28, at 61.

[911] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 Howard) 393, 404-405 (1857) (opinion of Taney, C.J.).

[912] Id. (19 Howard) at 407.

[913] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 416.

So, in 1705, slaves were explicitly exempted from the Militia:

> That * * * the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county have full power and authority to list all male persons whatsoever * * * .
>
> Provided nevertheless, That nothing * * * shall * * * give any power or authority to any * * * chief officer whatsoever, to list * * * any slave, but that all and every such person * * * be exempted from serving in either horse or foot.{EN-1522}

Thereafter, the slaves' exclusion was implicit in the requirement (described above) that only "free male persons" were to be enlisted in the Militia.

To be sure, the power of impressment that Virginia's General Assembly wielded over her free citizens was broad and unrestrained enough to sweep slaves within its ambit—and might have been exercised for that purpose, just as other Colonies and independent States exercised their powers of impressment to incorporate slaves into their Militia under carefully controlled conditions.{EN-1523} But Virginia never found herself in circumstances sufficiently dire to render that policy necessary. Indeed, during the *pre-*constitutional era, Virginia never relaxed any of the disabilities her military laws imposed with regard to slaves. For example,

> [1777] "[W]hereas several negro slaves have deserted from their masters, and under pretence of being free men have enlisted as soldiers: For prevention whereof, Be it enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any recruiting officer within this commonwealth to enlist any negro or mulatto into the service of this or either of the United States, until such negro or mulatto shall produce a certificate from some justice of the peace for the county wherein he resides that he is a free man."{EN-1524}

2. If slaves were always subject to an absolute debarment out of necessity, free people of color were exempted out of social prejudice: Sometimes they were exempted altogether, while at most other times they were formally listed but usually required to perform servile labor rather than to muster as soldiers on equal terms with White Virginians:

> • [1691] "Council Order the Militia Officers not to list the following persons, * * * Negroes[.]"{EN-1525}
>
> • [1723] "That * * * the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county, have full power and authority to list all free male persons whatsoever * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * Provided nevertheless, That nothing * * * shall * * * cause to be listed * * * any free Negro, Mulatto, or Indian.

" * * * Provided always, That such free Negros, Mulattos, or Indians, as are capable, may be listed and emploied as drummers or trumpeters: And that upon any invasion, insurrection, or rebellion, all free Negros, Mulattos, or Indians, shall be obliged to attend and march with the militia, and to do the duty of pioneers, or such other servile labour as they shall be directed to perform.

" * * * [I]f * * * any free Negro, Mulatto, or Indian, other than as before excepted, shall presume to appear at any muster whatsoever, the party so offending, shall for every such offence, forfeit and pay one hundred pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1526}

• [1738] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person * * * listed, (except free mulattos, negros and Indians,) * * * shall be armed * * * .

" * * * [A]ll such free mulattos, negros, or Indians, as are * * * listed, * * * shall appear without arms; and may be emploied as drummers, trumpeters, or pioneers, or in such other servile labour, as they shall be directed to perform."{EN-1527}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons * * * within this colony (imported servants excepted)[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person * * * inlisted, (except * * * free Mulattoes, negroes and Indians) and placed or ranked in the horse or foot, shall be armed and accoutred[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [A]ll such free mulattoes, negroes and Indians, as are * * * listed, * * * shall appear without arms, and may be employed as drummers, trumpeters or pioneers, or in such other servile labor, as they shall be directed to perform."{EN-1528}

• [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices * * * (except [various individuals] * * *) shall * * * be enrolled or formed into companies * * * . The free mulattoes * * * shall be employed as drummers, fifers, or pioneers."{EN-1529}

Virginia's Militia statutes of 1775, 1784, and 1785 made no such distinctions as to duties, based on race, with respect to "all free male persons" who were to be "enlisted into the militia" or "enrolled or formed into companies"—the only exemptions set out therein being for individuals who filled certain public offices and engaged in various private occupations, and racially neutral in form.{EN-1530} To be sure, at that time no free persons of color would likely have held any of the public offices the statutes identified; yet some might have been found, along with White men (or possibly women), in such private occupations as "overseers of four tithables residing on a plantation", "millers", "persons concerned at iron or lead works", or "persons solely employed in repairing or manufacturing fire arms".

But if Virginia's later Militia statutes could have been read so as to include free men of color in her Militia, racial discrimination among free American men persisted, even after ratification of the Constitution, in the General Government's very first Militia statute in 1792: "[E]ach and every free able-bodied white male citizen of the respective states * * * of the age of eighteen years, and under the age of forty-five years * * * shall * * * be enrolled in the militia".[914] This statute would not have precluded the States from listing Negro male citizens in their Militia, because ultimately the Militia are "the Militia of the several States", each of which retains jurisdiction concurrent with Congress over her Militia's regulation. Nonetheless, such colored Militiamen would presumably have been exempt from marching if the Militia had been "call[ed] forth" pursuant to some Congressional statute "to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions",[915] because Congress had specified in the Act of 1792 that it wanted only "free able-bodied white male citizen[s]" to form the "Part of th[e Militia] as m[ight then] be employed in the Service of the United States".[916]

Today, of course, exemptions, exclusions, or other forms of discrimination predicated purely upon an individual's race or some previous condition of servitude would be unconstitutional, as to both the States and Congress.

C. Age. As with exemptions based on gender, exemptions based on age were implicit. The General Assembly never doubted its authority to, and often did, summon for Militia or other military duty every able-bodied free man who could perform some useful service. But, for practical reasons, it always stipulated a particular range of ages within which men were subject to call. Men of ages above or below that range were understood to be wholly exempt. For example,

> • [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church[.]"{EN-1531}
>
> • [1639] "ALL persons except negroes to be provided with arms and amunition or be fined[.]"{EN-1532}
>
> • [1659 and 1662] "[T]hat a provident supplie be made of gunn powder and shott to our owne people, and this strictly to bee lookt to by the officers of the militia, (vizt.)That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least which are to be provided by every man for his family[.]"{EN-1533}

---

[914] An Act more effectually to provide for the National Defence by establishing an Uniform Militia throughout the United States, Act of 8 May 1792, CHAP. XXXIII, § 1, 1 Stat. 271, 271 (emphasis supplied).

[915] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15.

[916] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 16.

> • [1705] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county [shall] have full power and authority to list all male persons whatsoever, from sixteen to sixty years of age within his respective county, to serve in horse or foot[.]"{EN-1534}
>
> • [1723] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * [shall] list all free male persons whatsoever, from twenty-one to sixty years of age, * * * to serve in horse or foot[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [N]othing in this act * * * shall hinder or debar any captain from admitting any able-bodied white person, who shall be above the age of sixteen years, to serve in his troop or company, in the place of any person required by this act to be listed."{EN-1535}

The contrast between the statutes of 1705 and 1723 is particularly enlightening. Under the Act of 1723, able-bodied men between sixteen and twenty-one years of age were exempted from Militia duty formerly required under the Act of 1705 unless they voluntarily chose to serve as substitutes. Obviously, in both 1705 and 1723 the General Assembly believed that able-bodied men from sixteen to twenty-one years of age could serve in the Militia. So the partial exemption of men between sixteen and twenty-one in 1723 was merely a matter of policy. And in later years the policy varied:

> • [1738] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons, above the age of one and twenty years, within this colony, under the command of such captains as he shall think fit.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]he field officers, and captains, of every county, * * * are * * * required to meet at the court-house of their counties * * * to hold a court martial; which said court shall * * * enquire of the age and abilities of all persons listed, and to exempt such as they shall judge incapable of service[.]"{EN-1536}
>
> Here, no upper age limit at all was specified—the ultimate purpose of such a limit being perhaps better served by the requirement for Militia officers' individualized inquiries into the actual "abilities of all persons listed", whatever their ages happened to be. Moreover, the lower limit of twenty-one was not arbitrary, but evidenced less a concern with the abilities of the men below that age—for in that regard little difference could have existed between most men of (say) twenty as opposed to twenty-one years of age—and more a concern for safeguarding minors from hazardous duty.

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county[917] shall list all male persons, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within this colony (imported servants excepted) [.]"{EN-1537}

• [1775] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, above the age of sixteen, and under fifty years, except such as are * * * excepted, shall be enlisted into the militia by the commander in chief of the county[.]"{EN-1538}

• [1777] "[A]ll free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years [with various exceptions] * * * shall, by the commanding officer of the county in which they reside, be enrolled or formed into companies[.]"{EN-1539}

• [1780] "[T]hree thousand men shall be forthwith raised for the purpose of completing this state's quota of continental forces * * * . The several counties and corporations within this commonwealth [with certain exceptions] * * * shall for this purpose each of them furnish * * * after their militia shall have been laid off into divisions * * * one fifteenth man of such of their militia as exceed the age of eighteen years, including all the commission and non-commissioned officers under the age of fifty years[.]"{EN-1540}

• [1780] "[A]ny person enlisting a soldier between eighteen and fifty years of age, of able body, sound mind, at least five feet four inches high, and not being a deserter * * * , to serve during the war in the troops of this state in continental service, or a soldier in any of the aforesaid troops, shall be exempted from all future drafts and all musters of the militia, except in case of an insurrection or actual invasion of this state, and then shall be subject to serve within the state only."{EN-1541}

• [1782] "[T]he rector, professors, masters and tutors * * * in [Liberty Hall] academy, and in all other seminaries and public schools, and also all students thereof, under the age of twenty-one years, shall be * * * exempted from military duty."{EN-1542}

• [1784 and 1785] "[A]ll free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years [with various exceptions] * * * shall be enrolled or formed into companies[.]"{EN-1543}

Inasmuch as none of Virginia's Militia statutes ever mandated the listing of "male persons" under sixteen or over sixty years old, those ages evidently set the outer bounds to what Virginia's legislators of the *pre-*constitutional era believed was reasonable, in terms of the average man's presumed abilities at various stages of life to perform the duties required of him. Otherwise, the different ranges adopted from time to time for different purposes—no specific limits of age (1632, 1639, 1659, and 1662); or sixteen to sixty (1705), eighteen to sixty (1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771), and twenty-one to sixty, with sixteen to twenty allowed for volunteers as substitutes (1723); or sixteen to fifty (1775 and 1777) and eighteen to fifty (1780, 1784, and 1785); or simply over eighteen (1780) or over twenty-one (1738 and 1782)—reflected flexible legislative policies rather than fixed physiological boundaries. Contractions at either end of the range were never overly extensive, though, because they would have adversely affected the total pool of men eligible for Militia service. And to create narrow exemptions for specific purposes when and where necessary within a large pool of available men was safer than to discover in times of "alarm" that the pool was too small because too narrow ranges of age had been adopted for the initial stage of listing.

---

[917] The Act of 1757 "except[ed] the county of Hampshire".

If below or above the statutory limits on ages, free males could not be formally listed. Presumably, the lower boundary of sixteen years was sufficiently firm as a matter of religious precepts and social mores that boys known to be below that age were never allowed to volunteer for Militia duty. The upper boundary of fifty or sixty years, however, could not have imposed an insuperable bar to volunteers above those ages. For certainly, throughout the pre-constitutional era, Militia officers in not insignificant numbers were more than fifty or even sixty years old. And nothing suggests that the statutory limits on listing men of such ages were ever applied absolutely to exclude such men from service in the ranks when they were physically able to perform their duties.

Interestingly, too, no limitation based on age ever excused the father or guardian of a minor male, or the master of a servant, from being required to pay the fines incurred as a result of the boy's or the servant's defaults in his Militia duties.[918] So even some superannuated men who could perform no Militia service in their own persons remained vicariously subject to some Militia duties.

Today, revitalized "Militia of the several States" should surely prohibit the listing of anyone below some fixed minimum age—most likely sixteen years—which disallowance could be relaxed only in the event of an actual invasion, massive natural disaster, or other calamity. At the other extreme, a merely suggested maximum age—most likely sixty years—should be set, with any individual above that age allowed to volunteer for service, subject to a Militia board of inquiry's assessment of his actual suitability for duty.[919]

D. Disability. In the final analysis, the real value of lower and upper limits on the ages of individuals to be listed in the Militia was that those boundaries provided rough estimates as to the men's physical abilities to perform the duties required of them. Virginia's statutes went further, of course, and specified that only actually able-bodied "male persons" were wanted in the service:

---

[918] See ante, at 428-432.

[919] See post, at 948-950.

> • [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church[.]"{EN-1544}
>
> • [1644] "[I]n places of danger it shall not be lawfull for any to seat or inhabitt without ten sufficient men at the least, and arms and ammunition accordingly[.]"{EN-1545}
>
> • [1659 and 1662] "[E]very man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least[.]"{EN-1546}
>
> • [1691] The Governor and his Council "Ordered that the Comand[rs] in Cheife doe forme into Troopes of Horse & Companies of Foot all the persons fitt to beare Armes in the Severall Counties", but that "the Comand[rs] in Cheife take Care that all the Soldiers und[r] their Comands be well furnished with Armes and Amunition according to Law, but where any of the persons Listed for Soldiers appeare to them not to be fitt, that they leave them out."{EN-1547}
>
> • [1705] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * [shall] list all male persons whatsoever, from sixteen to sixty years of age within his respective county, to serve in horse or foot, as in his discretion he shall see cause and think reasonable, having regard to the ability of each person, he appoints to serve in the horse[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> "And * * * the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * [shall] make * * * a new list of all the male persons * * * capable * * * to serve in the militia, and to order and dispose them into troops or companys, according to * * * the respective circumstances of the ability of the persons listed[.]"{EN-1548}
>
> • [1723] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia of every county * * * [shall] list all free male persons whatsoever, from twenty-one to sixty years of age, * * * to serve in horse or foot; having regard to the ability of each person[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [N]othing * * * shall hinder or debar any captain from admitting any able-bodied white person, who shall be above the age of sixteen years, to serve in his troop or company, in the place of any person required * * * to be listed."{EN-1549}
>
> • [1738] "[T]he * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons, above the age of one and twenty years, within this colony[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]he field officers, and captains, of every county, * * * [shall] meet at the court-house of their counties * * * to hold a court > martial; which said court shall * * * enquire of the age and abilities of all persons listed, and to exempt such as they shall judge incapable of service[.]"{EN-1550}

>
> • [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he chief officer of the militia in every county[920] shall list all male persons, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years * * * (imported servants excepted)[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [T]he field officers and captains * * * [shall] meet at the court-house of their counties, * * * the day next following the general muster in September, every year, * * * to hold a court martial, * * * to enquire of the age and abilities of all persons listed, and to exempt such as they shall adjudge incapable of service[.]"{EN-1551}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he field-officers and captains of every county * * * [shall] meet at the courthouse of their respective counties the day next following the general muster in * * * April and October in every year * * * to hold a court-martial * * * to inquire of the age and abilities of all persons enlisted, and exempt such as they shall adjudge incapable of service[.]"{EN-1552}
>
> • [1777] The chief Militia officers "shall hold a court martial * * * on the day following their general muster"; and the "court * * * shall have power to exempt all persons enrolled whom, from age or inability, they may adjudge incapable of service[.]"{EN-1553}

Although Virginia's Militia statutes expressed the standard for physical eligibility in the very general terms of men who were "fittinge to beare armes", "sufficient", "able to beare armes", "fitt to beare Arms", "capable * * * to serve", or just "able-bodied", they were not prone to any significant degree of arbitrary or capricious enforcement. For only after individuals had been enlisted would Militia officers have "exempt[ed] such as they * * * adjudge[d] incapable of service"—the officers' decisions to have been made presumably on the basis of their close personal observations of the individuals' abilities, coupled with the officers' own knowledge of what would likely have been required of their Militiamen in the field. No competent Militia Captain would have been expected to have intentionally undermined the strength of his own Company—thereby perhaps elevating the risk to his own life and limbs in the Company's next deployment in active service—by stubbornly or stupidly seeking to exclude capable, or especially to include incapable, men.

Moreover, no exemption of the grounds of disability was necessarily permanent. For example,

---

920 The Act of 1757 "except[ed] the county of Hampshire".

> [1787] "[W]here the courts martial shall exempt any of the militia on account of bodily infirmity from duty, they may again direct such persons to be enrolled when able to do duty."{EN-1554}

Finally, no personal physical disability ever excused the father or guardian of a minor male, or the master of a servant, from being required to pay the fines incurred by the boy's or the servant's defaults in his Militia duties.[921] So, even some men completely exempted from personal service perforce of their own disabilities still retained a modicum of duty in the Militia through financial liabilities.

E. Public offices and private occupations. Virginia considered the performance of some public offices and private occupations so important to the community that she exempted from certain Militia duties the men performing those services. That exemptions from Militia service were required at all for these individuals proves that, otherwise, they would have been considered members of, and required to serve in, the Militia, to the fullest extent mandated by law, perforce simply of their being able-bodied "free male persons". But, in these cases, exemptions made eminently good sense. For, although "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state",[922] it is neither the full embodiment nor the purpose of "a free state". Neither is it capable, by itself alone, of maintaining "a free state" in operation in the normal course of human events. Civil government and essential private enterprises are necessary, too. The Militia would actually prove detrimental to the "safe defence of a free state" if its demands for manpower seriously undermined the efficacy of government or the provision of vital private services. So limitations on the Militia's ability to impress men out of civil pursuits must be established.

1. Public offices. In pre-constitutional Virginia, exemptions from Militia duties on the basis of public office were either complete or conditional.

a. From time to time, men with complete exemptions were simply not "listed" at all in the Militia:

> • [1691] "Council Order the Militia Officers not to list * * * persons * * * in Commission of Peace[,] * * * Readers[,] Clerks[.]"{EN-1555}
>
> • [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons hereafter mentioned, to muster, that is to say, such as are members of the council, speaker of the house of Burgesses, receiver general, auditor, secretary, attorney general, clerk of the council, clerk of the secretary's office, * * * the mayor, recorder, and Aldermen of

---

[921] See ante, at 428-432.

[922] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

> the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, the keeper of the public goal * * * who are all hereby exempted, from being inlisted, or any way concerned in the militia, during the time they shall continue in such station or capacity."{EN-1556}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he keeper of the publick jail * * * shall be exempted from * * * enlistment [in the Militia]."{EN-1557}
>
> • [1777] "FOR forming the citizens of this commonwealth into a militia, and disciplining the same for defence thereof, Be it enacted * * * That all free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years (except the governour and members of the council of state, members of the American congress, judges of the superiour courts, speakers of the two houses, treasurer, attorney general, commissioners of the navy, auditors, clerks of the council of state, of the treasury, and of the navy board, * * * postmasters, keepers of the publick jail and publick hospital, * * * and military officers or soldiers, whether of the continent or this commonwealth, all of whom are exempted from the obligations of this act) shall * * * be enrolled or formed into companies[.]"{EN-1558}
>
> • [1784 and 1785] "[A]ll free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, except the members of the council of state, members of the American congress, judges of the superior courts, speakers of the two houses of assembly, treasurer, attorney general, auditors and their clerks, solicitor general and his clerks, clerks of the council of state and treasury, register of the land-office, his deputy and clerks, custom-house officers, all inspectors of tobacco, * * * post-masters, keepers of the public gaol and public hospital, * * * all of whom are exempted * * * , shall be enrolled or formed into companies[.]"{EN-1559}

Nonetheless, what appeared to be an absolute exemption in law was not always so in fact, because many of the individuals who were excused from being "listed" or otherwise participating in the Militia on account of their holding public offices were often officers in the Militia, too. For example, in 1755 through 1771 the Militia Acts required certain public officials, otherwise "exempted from mustering", to "provide arms for the use of the county, city, or borough, wherein they * * * reside": "each councillor not being an officer of the militia"; "[t]he speaker of the house of Burgesses, not being an officer of the militia"; "[t]he receiver general, auditor, and secretary, not being * * * officer[s] of the militia"; "[t]he attorney general, not being an officer of the militia"; "[t]he clerk of the council, and clerk of the secretary's office, not being officers of the militia"; and "[t]he mayor, recorder, and aldermen of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, * * * not being officers of the militia".{EN-1560} And in 1762 through 1771 the Militia Acts exempted "from appearing or mustering" all Justices of the Peace, "except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia".{EN-1561} Obviously, many men who held these positions also must have held or been expected to hold commissions in the Militia, or such statutory provisions would have been unnecessary.

b. Sometimes, as in 1692, exemptions were granted only from the requirement to appear at musters:

> It being represented to this Board [that is, the Governor and his Executive Council], that in some of the Counties in this Colony Counstables are Compelled to Musters, being listed Soldiers, It is hereby declared that it is reasonable Counstables and headboroughs should be Exempted, and it is therefore Ordered that for the future they be Exempted from Musters, dureing the time they remain in the said Offices.{EN-1562}

c. Sometimes, exemptions from Militia duty on the basis of an individual's public office were conditional, with fulfillment of the condition being the measure of the man's Militia duty:

> • [1705] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * give any power or authority to any * * * chief officer * * * to list any person that shall be, or shall have been of her majesty's councill in this colony, or any person that shall be, or shall have been speaker of the house of burgesses, or any person that shall be, or shall have been * * * attorney general, or any person that shall be, or shall have been a justice of the peace within this colony, or any person that shall have born any military commission within this colony as high as * * * captain, * * * or the clerk of the councill for the time being, or the clerk of the general court for the time being, or any county court clerk during his being such, or any parish clerk * * * during his being such, * * * or any constable during his being such, * * * but that all and every such person * * * be exempted from serving either in horse or foot. * * *
>
> " * * * [F]or as much as severall of the persons exempted * * * , though they be of sufficient ability to find and keep a serviceable horse and horse arms, and such men whose personal service may not only be usefull, but necessary upon an insurrection or invasion * * * will perhaps account themselves free from provideing and keep the same at the places of their abode, which is not intended:
>
> "Be it therefore enacted * * * That the persons of a councellor, of a speaker of the house of burgesses, of a justice of the peace, of an attorney-general, and of a captain or an higher officer in the militia, are exempted from being listed and serving * * * , merely for the dignity of the office * * * held, and that notwithstanding * * * all and every such person or persons, and also the clerk of the councill, the clerk of the general court, and every county court clerk shall provide and keep * * * at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition * * * , and to produce or cause the same to be produced in the county where they respectively reside yearly, and every year at the generall muster * * * , upon pain of forfeiting for every neglect * * * twenty shillings current money of Virginia.

"And in case of any rebellion or invasion shall also be obliged to appear * * * and serve in such stations as are suitable for gentlemen * * * , under the same penaltys as any other person or persons, who * * * are injoyned to be listed in the militia[.]"{EN-1563}

The care with which these exemptions were fashioned appears in the distinctions made in this statute and the statutes of 1723 and 1738 (quoted immediately below) between "any person that shall be, or shall have been" in some office, on the one hand, and an individual in some office "for the time being" or "during his being [in] such [office]", on the other hand.

• [1723] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any person or persons that shall be, or shall have been, of his Majesty's council * * * , speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary of this colony, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, his Majesty's attorney-general, a justice of the peace, or any person that shall have born any military commission * * * as high as * * * captain, or the clerk of the council, for the time being, or the clerk of the general court, for the time being, or any county court clerk, during his being such, personally to appear at any musters: But that all, and every the persons aforesaid * * * are * * * required, to find and provide one able-bodied white man, a good horse, and such trooper's accoutrements * * * , who shall constantly appear and exercise at all musters."{EN-1564}

• [1738] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons herein after-mentioned, to a personal attendance at musters: that is to say, Such as are, or shall have been, members of his majesty's council, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary, receiver-general, auditor, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, attorney-general, clerk of the council, clerk of the house of burgesses, clerk of the secretary's office, a justice of the peace, clerk of any county court, or any person that shall have borne any military commission as high as * * * captain * * * : Yet all the persons aforesaid, shall * * * send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person exempted from personal appearance only, failing to send an able bodied man, or man and horse, * * * in his room, to be trained and exercised, shall pay the same fine as is * * * inflicted for not appearing at musters."{EN-1565}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons hereafter mentioned, to muster, that is to say, such as are members of the council, speaker of the house of Burgesses, receiver general, auditor, secretary, attorney general, clerk of the council, clerk of the secretary's office, * * * the mayor, recorder, and Aldermen of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, the keeper of the public goal, * * * who are all hereby exempted, from being inlisted, or any way concerned in the militia, during the time they shall continue in such station or capacity.

* * * * *

" * * * And * * * the several persons * * * exempted from mustering, (except * * * the keeper of the public goal * * *) * * * shall provide arms for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside in the following manner; that is to say, each councillor not being an officer of the militia, four complete sets of arms * * * for a foot soldier: The speaker of the house of Burgesses not being an officer of the militia, four compleat sets of arms * * * : The receiver general, auditor, and secretary, not being a councillor or officer of the militia, each four compleat setts * * * : The attorney general, not being an officer of the militia, two compleat sets * * * : The clerk of the council, and clerk of the secretary's office, not being officers of the militia, each two compleat sets * * * : The mayor, recorder, and aldermen of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, (* * * not being officers of the militia) each two compleat sets[.]"{EN-1566}

In contradistinction to the statutes of 1705 through 1738, the statutes of 1755 through 1771 exempted only men who actually held certain public offices at the time, not those who once had been public officials. Moreover, although the former men were not required personally to appear at regular musters, the statutes presumed that some, perhaps even all, of them were "officers of the militia"—and therefore doubtlessly would have appeared unless their other public duties precluded them from doing so.

•[1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he several persons herein aftermentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective companies * * * : All his majesty's justices of the peace within this colony, who have qualified themselves for their offices by taking the oaths by law appointed * * * and who are really and bona fide acting justices of their respective counties (except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia in their respective counties) * * * shall not be subject or liable to any fine, forfeiture or penalty, for absenting themselves from the same.

" * * * Provided always, That the persons so exempted from mustering shall provide complete sets of arms * * * for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they shall respectively reside[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person so exempted shall always keep in his house or place of abode such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia of this colony * * * : And such > exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition * * * and shall then be incorporated with * * * the other militia[.]"{EN-1567}

>
> Again, the care with which this exemption was drafted is noteworthy: "who have qualified themselves for their offices by taking the oaths by law appointed * * * and who are really and bona fide acting justices of their respective counties". Revealing, too, is that these exempted individuals were, "in case of any invasion or insurrection, to appear with their arms and ammunition * * * and shall then be incorporated with * * * the other militia"—plainly indicating that the statutes considered them to be within the Militia at all times, notwithstanding their partial exemptions.
>
> • [1775] "[T]he members of his majesty's council, and the committee of safety, the president of the convention, treasurer, attorney-general, auditor, clerk of the council, clerk of the secretary's office, clerk of the general convention, and clerk of the committee of safety (each of which exempts furnishing a stand of arms for a soldier) * * * shall be exempted from * * * enlistment [in the Militia]."{EN-1568}

So, in each of these cases, an exemption did not amount to a complete immunity. The persons exempted on the basis of their public offices from the duty personally to appear at regular Militia musters were still subject to other Militia duties: to maintain arms "at their respective places of abode" and appear "in case of any rebellion or invasion" (1705); to provide a substitute (1723 and 1738); to supply arms for the Militia (1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, 1771, and 1775); or to supply arms for the Militia, maintain personal arms "in [their] house[s] or place[s] of abode", and appear "in case of any invasion or insurrection" (1762, 1766, and 1771). Had they failed to fulfill any of these conditions, they would have forfeited their exemptions.

d. Exemptions based on public offices also could benefit individuals who performed certain special functions within the Militia. For example, Militiamen who served in "the slave patrols"[923] were sometimes granted exemptions from appearing at regular musters:

> [1738 and 1754] "[S]uch patrollers shall be exempted from attendance at private musters * * * for those years in which they shall be emploied in that service."{EN-1569}

Even more often, the Militiamen who served as their Companies' clerks (and as a consequence of that office always attended musters) received special exemptions peculiar to them:

---

[923] See ante, at 339-343 and 392-395, and post, at 718-723.

• [1705] "[E]very captain of a troop of horse or ffoot company within this colony be permitted and allowed to take one of the soldiers under his command to be clerk to his troop or company, and that such clerk in consideration of his service in that respect be excused from carrying or appearing in arms at any muster, generall or particular, except in case of a rebellion or invasion[.]"{EN-1570}

• [1723] "[E]very captain of a troop or company * * * be permitted and allowed to take one of the soldiers under his command, to be clerk to his troop or company: And that such clerk * * * be excused from carrying arms at any muster, except in case of a rebellion, or an invasion[.]"{EN-1571}

• [1738] "[E]very captain shall have power to appoint a clerk, to his troop or company, who shall keep the muster-rolls, and attend all musters with the same; and such clerk shall be exempted from appearing at arms, in all such musters."{EN-1572}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "Every captain shall have power to appoint a clerk to his troop or company, who shall keep the muster-rolls, and attend all musters with the same, and such clerk shall be exempted from mustering but shall appear with arms[924] at all such musters."{EN-1573}

Inasmuch as "slave patrollers" and Company clerks were unquestionably in the Militia, and were granted their exemptions precisely because of their services for the Militia, these exemptions were plainly not a means to differentiate men who were not members of the Militia at all from men who were, but to excuse some men within the Militia from some Militia duties otherwise incumbent upon them, in consideration for other duties those men performed beyond the norm. That is, these exemptions presupposed continuous Militia membership and even a degree of service in excess of that expected of Militiamen in general.

2. Private occupations. Exemptions, both complete and conditional, were extended to men who followed certain important private occupations, too.

a. Complete exemptions were allowed for a number of occupations the reasons for the promotion of which are self evident:

• [1691] "Council Order the Militia Officers not to list * * * Physicians[,] Chirurgeons[,] * * * Ferrymen[.]"{EN-1574}

• [1705] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * give any power or authority to any * * * chief officer * * * to list any person that shall be * * * any minister, * * * or any * * * school-master during his being such, or any overseer that hath four or more slaves under his care, * * * or any miller who hath a mill in keeping, or any servant by importation, or any slave, but that all and every such person * * * be exempted from serving either in horse or foot."{EN-1575}

[924] The Act of 1757 substituted "arms, powder, and ball" for "arms" simpliciter.

These exemptions were narrowly drafted so as solely to benefit those whose actual occupations at the time benefitted the community—thus, a "school-master during his being such", "any overseer that hath four or more slaves under his care", and a "miller who hath a mill in keeping". This specificity was, moreover, hardly accidental; for carefully confined exemptions of this type appeared again and again in subsequent statutes.

• [1723] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * cause to be listed, any minister of the church of England, or the president, masters, professors, or students, of the college of William and Mary, during the times of their being such; or any * * * overseer * * * having four or more slaves under his care; or any miller, having a mill under his charge and keeping; or the founders, keepers, or any other persons emploied in or about any iron, copper, or lead work, or any other mine, during the time of their being so emploied[.]"{EN-1576}

• [1738] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * cause to be listed, any of the ministers of the church of England, the president, masters, or professors, and students, of the college of William and Mary, during the time of their being such, any overseers residing on the plantation where the slaves under their care are worked, all millers, having the charge and keeping of any mill, nor the founders, keepers, or other persons emploied in or about any iron, copper, or lead work, or any other mine, during the time of their being so emploied; who are hereby exempted from being any ways concerned in the militia."{EN-1577}

• [1738] "[N]o person, who shall be emploied as a sailor or seaman, on board any ship or vessel, within this colony, shall, during the time he is in actual pay, on board such ship or vessel, be compelled to serve in the militia in any county, city, or borough, where such person is an inhabitant."{EN-1578}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons hereafter mentioned, to muster, that is to say, such as are * * * ministers of the church of England, the president, masters or professors, and students of William and Mary college, * * * any person being bona fide, an overseer over four servants or slaves, and actually residing on the plantation where they work, and receiving a share of the crop or wages, for his care and pains, in looking after such servants and slaves: Any miller having the charge and keeping of any mill, and founders, keepers, or other persons employed in or about any copper, iron or lead mine, who are all hereby exempted, from being inlisted, or any way concerned in the militia, during the time they shall continue in such station or capacity.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he several persons * * * exempted from mustering, (except ministers of the church of England, the president, masters or professors, and students of William and Mary college, * * * overseers and millers, and all workers in any mine whatsoever) shall provide arms for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside[.]"{EN-1579}

• [1775] "[A]ll clergymen and dissenting ministers, the president, professors, students, and scholars, of William and Mary college, * * * all overseers of four tithables residing on a plantation, and all millers, and persons concerned in iron works, shall be exempted from * * * enlistment [in the Militia]."{EN-1580}

But, that same year, this allowance was qualified by the restriction that "no dissenting minister, who is not duly licensed by the general court, or the society to which he belongs, shall be exempted from bearing arms in the militia of this colony".{EN-1581}

• [1777] "FOR forming the citizens of this commonwealth into a militia, and disciplining the same for defence thereof, Be it enacted * * * , That all free male persons, hired servants, and apprentices, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years (except * * * all ministers of the gospel licensed to preach according to the rules of their sect, who shall have previously taken * * * an oath of fidelity to the commonwealth, * * * millers, except in the counties of Accomack and Northhampton, persons concerned in iron or lead works, or persons solely employed in manufacturing fire arms, * * * all of whom are exempted from the obligations of this act) shall * * * be enrolled or formed into companies[.]"{EN-1582}

• [1781] "[E]very artificer actually and necessarily employed at any iron works in this state, shall be exempted from all military duty, during the time they are so employed; and * * * waggons or other carriages with their teams and drivers, as are also actually and necessarily employed at such works, shall be exempted from all impresses for publick service during such employment[.]"{EN-1583}

That this particular statute was enacted and then twice continued in the same year not only demonstrates the practical importance the General Assembly attached to this exemption but also emphasizes that it was a special privilege, not in any sense an "inherent right".

• [1783 and 1786] "[F]or * * * encouragement of pilots to do their duty, Be it enacted, That every branch pilot * * * is hereby exempted from, militia duty, during the time he shall act as a pilot."{EN-1584}

• [1784 and 1785] "[A]ll free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, except * * * all professors, tutors, and students at the university of William and Mary,[925] and other public seminaries of > learning, all ministers of the gospel, licensed to preach according to the rules of their sect, who shall have previously taken * * * an oath of fidelity to the commonwealth, * * * millers, persons concerned at iron or lead works, or persons solely employed in repairing or manufacturing fire arms, all of whom are exempted from the obligations of this act, shall be enrolled or formed into companies[.]"{EN-1585}

[925] The Act of 1785 deleted "students".

Obviously, the social utility of exemptions from Militia duty for individuals in these occupations—and the absence of a perceived need for exemptions to the benefit of individuals in other occupations—depended upon the General Assembly's assessment of economic and social conditions at the time. In the nature of things, to gauge the accuracy of these assessments after the fact is difficult. But not impossible—for the importance of Virginia's lead mines, as a prime example, was proven by the attempt of the British during the War of Independence to shut them down.[926]

Unlike exemptions relating to public office, the validity of which in any particular case was the plainest matter of public record, exemptions based upon private occupations had to be strictly policed in order to ferret out and eliminate unqualified or even fraudulent claimants. Thus the specificity in the statutes: "persons emploied in or about any iron, copper, or lead work, or any other mine, during the time of their being so employed" (1738); "during the time [a sailor] is in actual pay, on board [a] ship or vessel" (1738); "no dissenting minister, who is not duly licensed by the general court, or the society to which he belongs" (1775); "every artificer actually and necessarily employed at any iron works" (1781); "every branch pilot * * * during the time he shall act as a pilot" (1783 and 1786); and "persons solely employed in manufacturing fire arms" (1777) or "in repairing or manufacturing firearms" (1784 and 1785). Apparently, this problem was particularly acute in the case of purported "overseers" of slaves. For, not only did several of the Militia Acts address the subject in general terms—"having four or more slaves under his care" (1723); "residing on the plantation where the slaves under their care are worked" (1738); and "any person being bona fide, an overseer over four servants or slaves, and actually residing on the plantation where they work, and receiving a share of the crop or wages, for his care and pains, in looking after such servants and slaves" (1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771)—but also one Act specifically provided that,

> [1756] "whereas it is expected, that many persons will, to avoid being drafted as soldiers, * * * enter themselves as overseers, by which means they may be deemed not a part of the militia: Be it enacted * * * , That no person not having been bona fide an overseer * * * shall be exempted from being drafted in the militia[.]"{EN-1586}

---

[926] See Merrill D. Peterson, Thomas Jefferson and the New Nation, A Biography (New York, New York: Oxford University Press, 1970), at 193-194.

b. In some cases, exemptions from Militia duty for individuals in certain private occupations were specifically defeasible upon the individual's failure to meet their conditions:

> • [1705] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * give any power or authority to any colonel * * * to list * * * any overseer that hath four or more slaves under his care * * * .
>
> "Provided always, That if any overseer that is by this act exempted from being listed shall appear at any muster, either of horse or foot, he shall appear in arms fit for exercise, and shall perform his duty as other private soldiers do, on pain of paying * * * [a] fine[.]"{EN-1587}
>
> • [1723] "[N]othing * * * shall impower or enable any colonel * * * to list * * * any person being employed as an overseer, and having four or more slaves under his care; or any miller, having a mill under his charge and keeping[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [I]f an exempted overseer, or miller * * * shall presume to appear at any muster whatsoever, the party so offending, shall for every such offence, forfeit and pay one hundred pounds of tobacco, and shall immediately give security to the * * * commanding officer, for paiment of the same[.]"{EN-1588}
>
> • [1738] "[N]othing * * * shall impower or enable any colonel * * * to list * * * any overseers residing on the plantation where the slaves under their care are worked, [and] all millers, having the charge and keeping of any mill[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [I]f any exempted overseer, or miller, shall presume to appear at any muster, or in any muster field whatsoever, on the day on which such muster shall be appointed; the party so offending, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay ten shillings, or one hundred pounds of tobacco; to be assessed upon him by the next court-martial[.]"{EN-1589}
>
> • [1755] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons hereafter mentioned, to muster, that is to say, such as are * * * any person being bona fide, an overseer over four servants or slaves, and actually residing on the plantation where they work, and receiving a share of the crop or wages, for his care and pains, in looking after such servants and slaves: Any miller having the charge and keeping of any mill[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [I]f any exempted overseer or miller, shall presume to appear at any muster, or in any muster-field whatsoever, on the day on which such muster shall be appointed, the party so offending, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay ten shillings, to be assessed upon him by the next court martial[.]"{EN-1590}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any person hereafter mentioned to muster, that is to say, such as are * * * any person being bona fide an overseer over four servants or slaves, being tithables, and actually residing on the plantation where they work, and receiving a share of the crop or wages for his care and pains in looking after such servants and slaves; [and] any miller having the charge and keeping of any mill[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f any exempted overseer or miller shall presume to appear at any muster, or in any muster-field whatsoever on the day on which such muster shall be appointed, the party so offending shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay twenty shillings, to be assessed upon him by the next court-martial[.]"{EN-1591}

• [1775] "[A]ll overseers of four tithables residing on a plantation, and all millers * * * shall be exempted from * * * enlistment [in the Militia].

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f any exempted miller or overseer shall presume to appear at any muster of the militia or minute-men, or in any muster-field, on the day on which such muster shall be appointed, the party so offending shall forfeit and pay twenty shillings, to be assessed upon him by the next court-martial[.]"{EN-1592}

Inasmuch as overseers and millers were granted exemptions specifically because of their work, they were expected to be actually at their work, not lounging in idleness at Militia musters—and if they did so turn up, their exemptions from regular duty ipso facto become void. Meaning that their exemptions never excluded them from the Militia in the first place, but merely excused them from certain duties only so long as Militia service in fact interfered with the performance of their occupations (which could never have been the case when they personally showed up on the muster-field). Self-evidently, if their exemptions had excluded them from the Militia entirely, these individuals could never have been subjected to Militia fines assessed by courts-martial, and particularly to physical punishment, when they violated the conditions set for their exemptions. Thus, because violations of their exemptions were tried under Militia law, those exemptions must have been the means to establish what their duties within the Militia were, not licenses that absolved them of all such duties.

c. In other cases, exemptions did not apply during "alarms":

• [1730 and 1748] "[A]s a further encouragement to adventurers in iron-works, Be it enacted * * * That all persons whatsoever, which * * * shall be emploied in and about the building and carrying on such iron-work, or the cutting of wood, making of coal, raising of oar, or any other thing necessary, for the carrying on, and compleating such design, during > the time of their being so emploied, be exempted from serving in the militia, at any general or private muster, except in the case of an invasion, insurrection, or rebellion."{EN-1593}

>
> •[1783] "That the acting inspectors of tobacco at the several ware-houses be * * * exempt from militia duty, except in case of actual invasion or insurrection."{EN-1594}

That these individuals were exempt from Militia duty "except in the case of an invasion, insurrection, or rebellion" establishes that they were always members of the Militia in principle, their particular service in practice depending upon circumstances.

Revealing in this regard is the Militia statute of 1762 (continued in 1766 and 1771), which provided that > the several persons herein after-mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective companies * * * : All * * * persons bred to and actually practising physick or surgery * * * .

>
> " * * * [T]he persons so exempted from mustering shall provide complete sets of arms * * * for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [E]very person so exempted shall always keep in his house or place of abode such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia of this colony * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition * * * and shall then be incorporated with * * * the other militia[.]"{EN-1595}

That these individuals were excused from appearing at musters "of their respective companies" indicates that the statutes deemed them to be members of certain "companies", and therefore of the Militia. And that, when they were required to appear, the statutes ordered them to "be incorporated with * * * the other militia" renders that construction certain.

3. Exemption a matter of legislative policy. Inasmuch as every exemption from Militia service in *pre-*constitutional Virginia was always a matter of legislative grace alone, not the product of any "inherent right" ab initio or the source of any "vested right" after having once been granted, any exemption could be withheld, amended, or withdrawn entirely whenever in the legislators' judgment the conditions that justified it never or no longer obtained. Thus, Virginia's Militia Acts never explicitly exempted Sheriffs from regular service as Militiamen.[927] Although her Militia Act of 1705 exempted "any constable during his being such",{EN-1596} subsequent statutes did not mention Constables at all. (This was not because the General Assembly did not extend favors to Constables "for their encouragement to perform their duty", such as declaring them "exempted from the paiment of all public, county, and parish levies, for their own persons, during their continuance in their office".{EN-1597}) And although in 1738 the Militia Act specified that > the * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons, above the age of one and twenty years * * * .

>
> * * * Provided always, That nothing * * * shall * * * compel any persons herein after-mentioned, to a personal attendance at musters: that is to say, Such as are, or shall have been, members of his majesty's council, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary, receiver-general, auditor, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, attorney-general, clerk of the council, clerk of the house of burgesses, clerk of the secretary's office, a justice of the peace, clerk of any county court, or any person that shall have borne any military commission as high as * * * captain, or any of the people commonly called Quakers: Yet all the persons aforesaid, shall * * * send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters{EN-1598}

—nonetheless in 1740 a statute repealed this exemption: "That all and every person and persons, who, by the act made in [1738] * * * are directed to be listed, shall be obliged to give their personal attendance at all musters".{EN-1599} As the title of the Act of 1740—"An Act, for the better security of the Country in the present time of Danger"[928]—implied, this was but a temporary measure; for the Act was to continue only "for three years * * * and no longer", and in any event to be "repealed and made void" "if the present war [with France] shall be ended before the expiration of" that time.{EN-1600} The nature of the repeal of the exemption—fixed in temporal extent and conditioned upon events—rather starkly emphasized the legislature's plenary power over the matter, with respect even to the highest public officials as well as conscientious objectors in the Colony.

Similarly, although bona fide overseers, millers, and men employed in iron works had generally been broadly exempted from Militia duties in early years, the General Assembly later restricted or repealed these allowances:

> • [1775] "[O]verseers, heretofore exempted, shall be obliged to furnish themselves with arms and ammunition, in the same manner as the militia men, and * * * to act as [slave] patrollers when thereto required

---

[927] See ante, at 324-326

[928] Bold-faced emphasis supplied.

by the commanding-officer of the militia of the county, or corporation, wherein they reside[.]"{EN-1601}

This change was hardly surprising, though, as perhaps no one would have known the habits of slaves and the lay of the land around their places of habitation as well as overseers.

• [1776] "WHEREAS by an ordinance * * * all overseers of four tithables residing on a plantation, and all millers, are exempted from being enlisted into the militia of their respective counties, which said exemption of overseers and of millers residing in the counties of Accomack and Northhampton * * * hath been found incovenient and unnecessary: Be it therefore ordained * * * , That all overseers * * * and all millers residing in the counties of Accomack and Northhampton, shall be enlisted into the militia[.]"{EN-1602}

• [1780] "[S]o much of the militia law as exempts millers and persons employed in iron works (except iron works belonging to the publick) shall be * * * repealed."{EN-1603}

In the same way, an exemption for persons connected with William and Mary College was first established, then soon abolished:

• [1775] "[T]he president, professors, students, and scholars, of William and Mary college * * * shall be exempted from * * * enlistment [in the Militia]."{EN-1604}

• [1777] "FOR forming the citizens of Williamsburg, borough of Norfolk, and the professors and students of William and Mary college, into a militia, and better disciplining them: Be it enacted * * * , That all male persons between the ages of sixteen and fifty years, within the * * * said city or borough, except the persons exempted by an [earlier Militia A]ct * * * and such of the professors and students of William and Mary college as would otherwise be part of the militia of James City county, in which the college is situate, shall * * * be enrolled and formed into companies * * * .

" * * * And the militia of the said city and borough, with the professors and students of the said college, shall be mustered, trained, and employed, * * * and * * * shall be armed with the same weapons * * * as the militia of a county[.]"{EN-1605}

The exemption was reinstated in 1784, however, so "[t]hat all free male persons between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, except * * * all professors, tutors, and students at the university of William and Mary, and other public seminaries of learning * * * shall be enrolled [in the Militia]"{EN-1606}—only to be amended once again in 1785, to limit it solely to "all professors, and tutors at the University of William and Mary, and other public seminaries of learning".{EN-1607}

4. Exempted offices and occupations integral to Militia service. That performance of the tasks connected with these public offices and private occupations could be substituted for certain types of Militia service illustrates the acceptance and application within every aspect of Virginia's *pre-*constitutional society of the fundamental principle that everyone owed a duty of some personal service to the community. In the first instance, this duty was to be fulfilled through actual Militia service, because "a well regulated militia * * * is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state".[929] But exemptions from some aspects of actual service were granted to those individuals who performed certain other, purely civilian functions. The criterion for any such exemption was that function's practical necessity in relation to the purposes of the Militia.

F. Time to comply with statutory requirements. With respect to the basic requirement that Militiamen should furnish themselves with firearms and ammunition at least minimally suitable for service from the free market if they were capable of doing so,[930] Virginia's Militia statutes typically provided exemptions in the form of periods of grace—from as short as six months to as long as two years—during which Militiamen were expected to expend their best efforts at compliance:

> • [1705] "That eighteen months time be given and allowed to each trouper and ffoot soldier not heretofore listed to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition[.]"{EN-1608}
>
> • [1723 and 1738] "That eighteen months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * —So as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters with such arms as he is already furnished with."{EN-1609}
>
> • [1740] "[I]t shall * * * be lawful, to and for the several courts martial, * * * to excuse and acquit any soldier, who [s]hall not, within twelve months from the passing of this act, be furnished and provided with arms * * * and whom they, in their consciences, shall believe and adjudge to be unable to furnish and provide the same[.]"{EN-1610}
>
> • [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "That twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * , so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with[.]"{EN-1611}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he soldiers shall be allowed six months after enlisting to provide themselves with arms, and in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have[.]"{EN-1612}

---

[929] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[930] See ante, Chapters 17 through 20.

• [1777] "Every officer and soldier shall be allowed six months after his appointment or enrollment to provide such arms or accoutrements as he had not at the time."{EN-1613}

• [1784 and 1785] "That twelve months after the commencement of this act[931] shall be allowed for providing the arms and accoutrements herein directed; but in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them the best arms and accoutrements they can get."{EN-1614}

Today, exemptions of this kind could prove to be particularly useful in revitalized "Militia of the several States", in which, because of the States' large populations, only a relatively few adult able-bodied individuals would be needed for active service most of the time, with the remainder held in reserve. Thus, various levels of reserves could be defined by different lengths of time allowed for their compliance with such requirements as providing personal information preliminary to enlistment, obtaining firearms and other necessary equipment, and undergoing training.

G. Exceptional cases. Some exemptions dealt with exceptional cases. For example, those who personally served in, obtained a recruit for, or captured a deserter from the Continental Army during the War of Independence were granted limited exemptions from future military service:

• [1777] "WHEREAS it is of the greatest moment to the cause of America that the continental army be speedily completed, Be it therefore enacted * * * , That any two of the militia of any county, city, or borough, who shall * * * procure one able bodied soldier, other than an apprentice or servant, within the time of his conviction or indenture, and those employed in the publick manufacture of fire arms, to serve for * * * three years, or during the present war, in either of the first nine battalions raised within this commonwealth, * * * shall be exempted from all draughts whatever, and from attending private and general musters in the respective militia to which they belong, which exemption shall continue during the term for which such recruit shall be enlisted, * * * provided that the number of soldiers so enlisted shall not exceed the twentieth part of the militia of each county, city, or borough[.]"{EN-1615}

• [1777] "WHEREAS it is indispensably necessary that the regiments of infantry raised * * * , on continental establishment, be speedily recruited * * * : Be it therefore enacted * * * , That * * * the said regiments * * * be completed by recruits or draughts[.]

* * * * *

"It is farther enacted, That * * * a number of men shall be draughted from the single men of the militia of the several counties, and

---

[931] The Act of 1785 allowed for "two years" of grace.

the city of Williamsburg, * * * above eighteen years of age, who have no child, in * * * [certain] proportions * * * , and each man so draughted shall * * * be compelled to serve one year, or find an able bodied man to serve in his room * * * . And as well such draughts, as those who enlist * * * , shall after such service be exempted from all other draughts for the regular service, for so long a time after their discharge as they shall have actually served."{EN-1616}

• [1780] "That three thousand men shall be forthwith raised for the purpose of completing this state's quota of continental forces * * * ; and if any division [of the Militia] shall * * * fail to deliver a recruit * * * the * * * commanding officer * * * shall * * * draft an able bodied man by fair and impartial lot out of such division, to serve in the continental army * * * ; who may nevertheless be permitted to procure an able bodied man in his room; and any person who * * * shall enlist an able bodied soldier to serve in his stead during the war, shall * * * be exempted from all future drafts, except in case of actual invasion[.]"{EN-1617}

• [1780] "[A]ny person enlisting a soldier between eighteen and fifty years of age, of able body, sound mind, at least five feet four inches high, and not being a deserter * * * , to serve during the war in the troops of this state in continental service, or a soldier in any of the aforesaid troops, shall be exempted from all future drafts and all musters of the militia, except in case of an insurrection or actual invasion of this state, and then shall be subject to serve within the state only."{EN-1618}

• [1781] "[A]s an inducement * * * to persons for apprehending deserters, * * * any militia-man who shall apprehend and deliver an able-bodied deserter to any officer of the continental army or of the troops of this state, * * * or if the deserter be a militia-man shall deliver him to the commanding officer of the battalion or regiment from whence he deserted * * * , in either case it shall be considered as having thereby performed a tour of militia duty."{EN-1619}

An unique situation arose with respect to Virginians who refused to prove their allegiance to the Commonwealth's new patriotic government:

[1777] "WHEREAS allegiance and protection are reciprocal, and those who will not bear the former are not entitled to the benefits of the latter, Therefore Be it enacted * * * , that all free born male inhabitants of this state, above the age of sixteen years, except imported servants during the time of their service, shall * * * take and subscribe * * * [a prescribed] oath or affirmation [of allegiance] * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he chief commanding officer of the militia * * * is * * * directed forthwith to cause * * * recusants [that is, persons who refused to take the oath or affirmation] to be disarmed.

> " * * * [T]he person so disarmed shall, nevertheless, be obliged to attend musters, but shall be exempted from the fines imposed for appearing * * * without arms, accoutrements, and ammunition."{EN-1620}

Those whose own conduct admitted their disloyalty remained titular members of the Militia, as evidenced by their continuing "oblig[ation] to attend musters". They were, however, more spectators than participants—being present but having been deprived of the instruments through which the Militia exercised political power. The statutory exemption merely recognized, as justice demanded, that the community could not both disallow them to possess arms and punish them for being disarmed.

Revealingly, this statute reduced disloyal White citizens to the same inferior status the Militia Acts reserved for people of color:

> [1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[A]ll * * * free mulattos, negros, or Indians, as are * * * listed, * * * shall appear without arms; and may be emploied as drummers, trumpeters, or pioneers, or in such other servile labour, as they shall be directed to perform."{EN-1621}

Indeed, the status of disloyal citizens was lower than that of free people of color and even some slaves, because other than during service in the Militia individuals in the latter two classes could be armed under certain circumstances, whereas disloyal White citizens were completely disarmed.[932]

H. Provision of substitutes and selective drafts. As explained above, in *pre-*constitutional Virginia men required to perform some Militia or other military duty were often allowed to provide substitutes or furnish arms in lieu of their own personal service.[933] This license amounted to a complete exemption. Similarly, impressments were often made on a selective basis.[934] The statutory criteria for selection constituted implicit exemptions for those men outside of the set of potential draftees.

I. Payment of fines. Virginia subjected her Militiamen to fines for various derelictions of duty.[935] In practice, in any particular case a Militiaman's payment of a fine amounted to the purchase of an ad hoc exemption from personally performing the underlying duty, at the individual's election. Moreover, Virginia's statutes often limited the number of times a fine could be imposed for some specific default, thereby exempting a Militiaman's further refusals to serve in that manner. Thus—

---

[932] See post, at 733-746.

[933] See ante, at 382-391 and 419-423.

[934] See ante, at 375-382.

[935] See post, at 666-697.

1. The statutory allowance for imposition of only a single fine for a Militiaman's multiple refusals to serve in certain special capacities in effect provided an exemption from that duty after the initial refusal:

> • [1705 and 1723] "[F]orasmuch as some difficulty hath been found in procuring some soldiers to be willing to serve as serjeants, corporals, drummers or trumpeters, all of them absolutely necessary in troops and companys: For prevention of the like in time to come,
>
> "Be it enacted * * * , That whatsoever soldier shall refuse to take upon him, act in and execute any of the said places and offices in the troop or company wherein he is listed, being known to be capable and thereunto appointed by his captain, shall for such his refusall be fined five hundred pounds of tobacco, which being once paid, he shall thereafter be exempted from being fined for any such refusall."{EN-1622}
>
> • [1738] "Every soldier refusing to serve as a serjeant, corporal, drummer, or trumpeter, being thereto appointed by his captain, shall pay fifty shillings, or five hundred pounds of tobacco, at his election; but such person shall be fined but once for such refusal."{EN-1623}

2. In effect, the statutory immunity from fines greater in number than the number of mandatory musters exempted Militiamen from attending whatever extra musters their officers might have scheduled:

> • [1705 and 1723] "That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county once every year at least, cause a generall muster and exercise of all the horse and ffoot in his county * * * and oftener if there be occasion, and that every captain both of horse and foot once in every three months, muster, train, and exercise his troop or company, or oftener if occasion require.
>
> "Provided, That no soldier in horse or foot, be fined above five times in one year for neglect in appearing."{EN-1624}
>
> • [1738] "[E]very captain shall, once in three months, or oftner, if required, muster, train, and exercise his troop or company: And the * * * chief commanding officer, in every county, shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the troops and companies within his county * * * in the month of September, every year.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * Every person listed to serve in the horse, shall pay seven shillings and six pence, or seventy five pounds of tobacco: And every person listed in the foot, shall pay five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, at their election, for not appearing at muster, compleatly armed and accoutred; so that no person be fined above five times a year for such failure."{EN-1625}
>
> • [1740] "[E]very captain, once in every two months, or oftner, if required, shall muster, train, and exercise his troop or company: And the * * * chief commanding officer, in every county, shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the troops and companies within his county to be made, in the months of March and September, in every year, or oftner, if there shall be occasion: And the officers and soldiers respectively offending against th[is] direction * * * shall, for every offence, incur * * * penalties * * * ; so that no person be fined above eight times in any year."{EN-1626}

• [1755] "[E]very captain shall once in three months, and oftner if thereto required, by the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, muster, train and exercise his troop or company, and the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the troops and companies within his county, to be made in the months of March and September yearly[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very soldier, either of the horse or foot, failing to appear at such muster, shall forfeit and pay ten shillings, for every such failure. Provided, That no person be fined above six times in the year for any particular default[.]"{EN-1627}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771]"[E]very captain shall, once in three months, and oftner if thereto required by the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, muster, train, and exercise his troop or company, and the * * * chief commanding officer in the county shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the troops and companies within his county, to be made in the months of March or April, and September or October, yearly[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very soldier failing to appear at such muster shall forfeit and pay ten shillings, for every such failure. Provided, That no person be fined above six times in the year for any particular default."{EN-1628}

This put a check on officers whom their men considered over-zealous with respect to training. For although officers could call for an indeterminate number of extra musters at their discretion, the statutes required their men to attend only a fixed number of specified musters. So the availability of implicit exemptions from any additional musters provided a means for democratic control over the peculiar rigors with which particular officers might have attempted to discipline their men.

Approaching and during the crisis of the War of Independence, though, explicit limitations of this kind were dropped, because the statutes lodged no discretion in Militia officers to call for extra musters on their own recognizance, and therefore no exemption in favor of the men's nonappearance at such musters was necessary as a check on possible martinets:

• [1775] "[T]here shall be a private muster of the several companies in each county once a fortnight, except in the months of

December, January, and February, * * * and moreover, there shall be a general muster in every county, in the months of April and October in each year[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [A]nd every soldier not appearing, or appearing without proper arms, [will pay a fine of] five shillings; or for not bringing with him three charges of powder and ball, three shillings[.]"{EN-1629}

• [1777 and 1779] "There shall be a private muster of every company once in every month, except the months of January and February, * * * and a general muster in each county * * * in the months of April and October, in every year[.]

* * * * * *

" * * * For failing to appear at any general or private muster, properly armed or accoutred, every captain shall forfeit forty shillings, * * * every non-commissioned officer or soldier five shillings."{EN-1630}

• [1784] "There shall be a private muster of every company once in every three months * * * ; a muster of each regiment * * * in the month of March or April, in every year * * * ; and a general muster of the whole * * * in the month of October or November, in every year[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [A] non-commissioned officer or soldier, for failing to attend at any muster with the arms, ammunition and equipments, as directed * * * shall forfeit and pay ten shillings[.]"{EN-1631}

• [1785] "There shall be a private muster of every company once in two months, except December and January * * * ; a muster of each regiment * * * in the month of March or April, in every year * * * ; and a general muster of the whole * * * in the month of October or November, in every year[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [A] non-commissioner officer or soldier, for failing to attend at any muster with the arms, ammunition and equipments, as directed * * * shall forfeit and pay ten shillings[.]"{EN-1632}

J. Conscientious objection. *Pre-*constitutional Virginia granted members of certain religious sects, as long as they remained such, statutory exemptions from the duties personally to be armed and to appear at musters. Nonetheless, these individuals were required to be formally "inlisted" in the Militia, and directly or indirectly to provide substitutes if they refused to serve in the field themselves:

• [1738] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons herein after-mentioned, to a personal attendance at musters: that is to say, Such as are * * * any of the people commonly called Quakers: Yet all the persons aforesaid, shall * * * send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters."{EN-1633}

• [1755] "[E]very person * * * inlisted, (except the people commonly called Quakers * * *) and placed or ranked in the horse or foot, shall be armed and accoutred[.]"{EN-1634}

• [1766 and 1771] "[T]he several persons herein after mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective companies * * * , that is to say, * * * all the people called Quakers * * * ; and they shall not be subject or liable to any fine, forfeiture or penalty, for absenting themselves from * * * musters of their respective counties.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he * * * chief commanding officer of the militia in every county shall list all male * * * Quakers, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, * * * under the command of such captain as he shall think fit; and if upon any invasion or insurrection the militia of the counties to which such Quakers belong, shall be drawn out into actual service, and any Quaker so inlisted shall refuse to serve or provide an able and sufficient substitute in his room, * * * every Quaker so refusing * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds * * * which sum shall be applied * * * towards providing a substitute in the room of the Quaker * * * .

" * * * Provided always, That the number of Quakers required * * * to serve or find substitutes * * * shall not exceed the proportion the whole number of Quakers bear to the whole number of the other militia, upon the muster rolls of the * * * county.

" * * * Provided also * * * , That no Quaker shall be exempted from appearing at musters * * * until he shall produce * * * a testimonial or certificate * * * that he is * * * bona fide one of the people called Quakers * * * ; and if at any time any person calling himself a Quaker shall be excommunicated or excluded from the said society, * * * the same [shall] * * * be certified to the * * * chief officer of the militia of the county, and thereupon the person so excluded shall be deprived of the exemption from appearing at musters[.]"{EN-1635}

• [1775] "[A]ll quakers, and the people called Menonists, shall be exempted from serving in the militia, agreeable to the several acts of the general assembly * * * made for their relief and indulgence in this respect."{EN-1636}

• [1777] "[Q]uakers and menonists who shall be * * * draughted shall be discharged from personal service, and * * * the field officers and justices who attend the draught shall * * * procure, upon the best terms they can, proper substitutes to serve in their stead, and to adjust and divide the charge thereof among all the * * * quakers and menonists in the county, in proportion to the number of tithables in the family of or belonging to each member[.]"{EN-1637}

• [1780] "[A]ny Quaker or Menonist who shall be * * * drafted, shall be discharged from personal service, and * * * the commanding officer * * * is * * * required to employ any two or more discreet persons, to procure on the best terms they can, a proper substitute or substitutes to serve in his or their room, and to adjust and divide the charge thereof among all the * * * Quakers or Menonists, in the division to which such draft belongs, in proportion to their assessable property[.]"{EN-1638}

• [1781] "[W]here any quaker or menonist shall be allotted to any division of the militia, who is to perform the succeeding tour of duty, he shall not be compelled personally to serve the same, but * * * the commanding officer of the militia of * * * [the] county * * * [may] cause to be levied on all the society of quakers and menonists in such county according to their assessable property * * * such sum * * * of money as he shall think sufficient to procure a substitute for each quaker or menonist whose tour of duty it is, and the money when collected shall be deposited in the hands of the commissioners of the money tax, who shall pay the same * * * to such substitute * * * as may be employed for such quaker or menonist, and the overplus (if any) shall be returned to the said quakers or menonists in equal proportion to their different advancements or credited in their next money tax[.]"{EN-1639}

• [1782] "[W]here any quaker or menonist shall be drafted * * * he shall not be compelled to serve, but shall pay * * * fourteen pounds[.]"{EN-1640}

• [1782] "[W]here any quaker or menonist shall be subjected to a tour of duty in consequence of the militia or invasion law, such quaker or menonist shall not be compelled to perform such duty, but the * * * commanding officer of the militia, shall * * * procure a substitute upon the best terms possible, * * * and the consideration agreed to pay him * * * shall in the first instance be against the estate of each quaker or menonist so draughted * * * , to be levied on their lands, goods, and chattels * * * ; and i[f] any of the said quakers or menonists so draughted, shall not have sufficient property on which a levy can be made, then * * * such substitute money, shall be levied on the property of all the quakers and menonists in the * * * county, that are subject to militia service, each to pay in proportion to his taxable property."{EN-1641}

• [1784] "[A]ll the people called quakers are hereby exempted from attending private or general musters in their respective counties.

" * * * Provided always, * * * That no quaker shall be exempted from appearing at musters * * * until he shall produce * * * a testimonial or certificate * * * that he is really and bona fide of the people called quakers, and is acknowledged and received by them as a member of their society. And if at any time any person calling himself a quaker, shall be excommunicated or excluded from the said society, * * * the person so > excluded shall be deprived of the exemption from appearing at musters[.]"{EN-1642}

So, even these conscientious objectors were actual members of the Militia, simply being excused from certain types of service upon their compliance with various conditions.

Conscientious objection, moreover, was no "inherent right" or otherwise "vested right". For example,

> [1784 and 1785] "[T]his act shall not be construed to deprive the people called quakers of any privilege granted to them by an act of assembly [enacted in 1784], intituled, 'An act to exempt quakers from attending musters.'[936] Provided also, That the governor, with advice of council, shall have power to suspend the operation thereof in the counties on the western waters, so long as they may think proper."{EN-1643}

And if conscientious objection were recognized in "the Militia of the several States" today, it would not be a constitutional right, either.[937]

K. Commission or suspicion of some crime. In *pre-*constitutional Virginia, no general exemption, exclusion, or other disqualification existed with respect to individuals who had been convicted—let alone who had merely been charged with the commission or simply suspected—of some crime. In only one instance this study has uncovered did Virginia's Militia statutes ever stipulate that someone actually convicted of a crime could not serve in a particular capacity in the Militia:

> [1738] "[N]othing * * * shall * * * compel any persons herein after-mentioned, to a personal attendance at musters: that is to say, Such as are, or shall have been, members of his majesty's council, speaker of the house of burgesses, secretary, receiver-general, auditor, judge of the court of vice-admiralty, attorney-general, clerk of the council, clerk of the house of burgesses, clerk of the secretary's office, a justice of the peace, clerk of any county court, or any person that shall have borne any military commission as high as * * * captain, or any of the people commonly called Quakers: Yet all the persons aforesaid, shall * * * send one able-bodied man, not being a convict, or man and horse, armed and accoutred, * * * constantly to appear, and exercise at musters."{EN-1644}

And even this statute did not preclude "a convict" from serving on his own behalf, rather than as a substitute for someone else—for the statute mandated that "the * * * chief officer of the militia, in every county, shall list all free male persons, above

---

[936] The Act of 1785 referred sweepingly to "any privilege granted the[Quakers] by any former law".

[937] See post, at 969-973.

the age of one and twenty years, within this colony",{EN-1645} in which category "a convict" who had completed his sentence and returned to society would have been included.

Moreover, in only a single instance this study has found did one of Virginia's statutes affirmatively disarm any White citizen while simultaneously requiring him to serve in the Militia:

> [1777] "WHEREAS allegiance and protection are reciprocal, and those who will not bear the former are not entitled to the benefits of the latter, Therefore Be it enacted * * * , that all free born male inhabitants of this state, above the age of sixteen years, except imported servants during the time of their service, shall * * * take and subscribe * * * [a prescribed] oath or affirmation [of allegiance] * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> "And be it farther enacted * * * , That * * * the court of every county * * * shall appoint some of their members to make a tour of the county, and tender the oath or affirmation * * * to every free born male person above the age of sixteen years, except as before excepted; and * * * in the certificate * * * returned * * * shall be mentioned the names of such as refuse. And * * * the * * * chief commanding officer of the militia * * * is * * * directed forthwith to cause such recusants to be disarmed.
>
> " * * * [T]he person so disarmed shall, nevertheless, be obliged to attend musters, but shall be exempted from the fines imposed for appearing * * * without arms, accoutrements, and ammunition."{EN-1646}

Distinguishably, the Militia statutes that allowed conscientious objections for Quakers and Menonites implicitly recognized that those people disarmed themselves voluntarily as a consequence of their religious scruples. And even the statutes that required "all * * * free mulattos, negros, or Indians, as are * * * listed [in the Militia], * * * [to] appear without arms * * * [to] be emploied as drummers, trumpeters, or pioneers, or in such other servile labour, as they shall be directed to perform",{EN-1647} did not prevent all of those individuals from possessing arms in other situations—and neither did any other statute.[938]

Revealingly, all of this was not because convicts who returned to society were free from all serious disabilities in their political and economic lives. To the contrary: In 1705, the General Assembly decreed that > no person whatsoever, already convicted, or which hereafter shall be convicted in * * * England[,] in this or any other her majestys dominion, colonies, islands, territorys or plantations, or in any other kingdom,

---

[938] See post, at 736-738.

> dominion or place, belonging to any foreign prince or state whatsoever, of treason, murther, fellony, blasphemy, perjury, forgery, or any other crime whatsoever, punishable by the laws of England, this country, or other place wherein he was convicted with the loss of life or member, * * * shall * * * bear any office, ecclesiasticall, civill or military, or be in any place of public trust or power, within * * * Virginia[.]{EN-1648}

And in 1748, the General Assembly ordained that > no person that hath been, or hereafter shall be convicted of any felonious crime * * * shall be capable to obtain * * * [a] licence [to practice law as an attorney in various courts]: And where any person, convicted of any felonious crime, shall obtain a license, the judges of the general court, upon proof * * * shall * * * supersede his license.{EN-1649}

Yet disabilities of this kind did not extend to service in the Militia—including, most importantly, each individual's duty personally to possess firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements suitable for that service.[939] This, in contrast to the contemporary situation, in which convictions of an increasingly wide range of "crimes" or other infractions automatically results in the perpetrators' usually permanent losses of various rights to possess firearms.[940]

L. Exemptions as a means for organizing the Militia. Exemptions under Virginia's *pre-*constitutional laws were not exclusions from, but special conditions for defining by limitation certain types of service within, her Militia. If, absent their particular exemptions, the parties would normally have been listed in the Militia, they were considered still to be members of the Militia. For instance:

> [1762, 1766, and 1771] "That * * * the several persons herein after-mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective counties * * * : All his majesty's justices of the peace, * * * all persons bred to and actually practicing physick or surgery,[941] and all inspectors at the public warehouses appointed for the inspection of tobacco * * * .
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * [E]very person so exempted[942] shall always keep in his house or place of abode such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and

---

[939] See ante, Chapters 17 through 19.

[940] See post, at 981-1014.

[941] Here, the Act of 1766 added the words "all the people called Quakers".

[942] Here, the Act of 1766 added the words "(not being a Quaker)".

> ammunition * * * and shall then be incorporated with * * * the other militia[.]"{EN-1650}

That men in these offices or occupations were, "in case of any invasion or insurrection", to be "incorporated with * * * the other militia" evidences the General Assembly's belief that they were always Militiamen, but merely subject to less-extensive duties than those "other militia". Of course, the situation of women in this structure was sui generis, because of their peculiar legal status. The general exemption for women was only implicit, in the Militia statutes' specific call for "male persons" only. Yet, if the adjective "male" had not been included in the statutes, women could have been impressed into the Militia along with men. For nothing else in the statutes precluded their application to both men and women indiscriminately.[943]

In strict legal parlance, some exemptions constituted rights: For example, individuals with disabilities enjoyed a right to exemption on the ground that their satisfactory service was simply impossible—which right was indefeasible as long as they suffered from their disabilities. And because the Militia statutes called for "male persons", women enjoyed a right not to be impressed for regular duty—but only a partially defeasible right, inasmuch as some women were required to pay the Militia fines imposed upon their minor sons or servants; or perhaps a totally defeasible right, inasmuch as all adult able-bodied women could have been drafted in an emergency had the General Assembly chosen to amend the Militia statutes or to enact the necessary new legislation. Some exemptions constituted privileges: For example, men exempted perforce of their public offices or private occupations were not compelled to appear at regular musters, but (other than overseers and millers) could have turned out had they so desired. And under the Militia statute of 1723, able-bodied free men from sixteen to twenty-one years of age were exempted from being listed, but could have offered themselves as substitutes for men over twenty-one years, at their own election. Some exemptions constituted immunities: For example, under every Militia act, men whose ages were less than some lower limit, or more than some upper limit, could not be listed at all. Some exemptions constituted duties: For example, at times overseers and millers not only were exempted from being listed, but also were affirmatively prohibited from attending musters. And some exemptions actually involved associated liabilities: For example, although free Negroes, Mulattoes, and Indians were often exempted from the requirement to keep and bear arms, they were usually compelled to serve the Militia in the lowly positions of musicians, pioneers, and servile workers. In any event, whether exempted on the grounds of gender, age, race, disability, public office or private occupation, or conscientious objection—and whether his or her exemption was absolute or conditional—everyone in the community who was arguably capable of serving in the Militia was "organized" in some way. For Virginia always coupled an exemption with particular duties incumbent upon the parties exempted—such as the parties' supplying firearms to the Militia; or with conditions to or for the exemption—such as the parties' providing substitutes; or with limitations to the exemption—such as the parties' appearing fully armed in the field during insurrections or invasions. Only in the cases of physically disabled adults and children under sixteen years of age did the relevant exemptions apply absolutely—no doubt on the recognition that disabled adults simply could not, and children should not, serve at all. Never did *pre-*constitutional Virginia—whether by means of exemptions or otherwise—purport to create an "*un*organized militia" composed of vast numbers of individuals with no duties whatsoever, other than to do nothing most of the time, as is the all-too-typical statutory pattern for neglect of the Militia today.[944] So exemptions in Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia laws could never undergird a plausible argument, let alone supply a precedent, for such contemporary statutes.

---

[943] See ante, at 601-607.

Virginia's experience with exemptions did not rationalize an "unorganized militia" then and could not rationalize one now, because she limited exemptions to such as were reasonably necessary to achieve a very specific public purpose while at the same time not unduly weakening the Militia. In the recruitment of her regular troops, distinguishably, Virginia's statutes were far more selective than they were with respect to enlisting her Militia:

> • [1775] "[T]o prevent the enlistment of such men as are unfit for service, * * * the committee [of safety] of each county, city, and borough, shall appoint one certain place of rendezvous * * * wither the captain, and other officers, of each company * * * shall resort with their men * * * . And if it shall appear to such committee that the company is complete, of able and proper men, * * * the said committee shall grant to the captain a certificate[.]"{EN-1651}
>
> • [1775] "[T]he soldiers to be raised shall be enlisted on the terms following, to wit: That they shall continue in the service so long as may be judged necessary by the general congress, or by the general convention or general assembly of this colony, but not be compelled to continue more than two years[.]
>
> * * * * *
>
> "Provided always, That no recruiting officer shall be allowed to enlist into the service * * * any man unless he be five feet four inches high, healthy, strong made, and well limbed, not deaf, or subject to fits."{EN-1652}

---

[944] See Code of Virginia §§ 44-1, 44-4, 44-75.1(A), and 44-88.

> • [1780] "[A]ny person enlisting a soldier between eighteen and fifty years of age, of able body, sound mind, at least five feet four inches high, and not being a deserter * * * , to serve during the war in the troops of this state in continental service * * * , shall be exempted from all future drafts and musters of the militia, except in the case of an insurrection or actual invasion of this state, and then shall be subject to serve within the state only."{EN-1653}

It should occasion no surprise either that the standards for selection of these regular troops—"five feet four inches high, healthy, strong made, and well limbed, not deaf, or subject to fits"—were more exacting than those which Militiamen were required to meet; or that such strict standards were applied at the initial stage of recruitment—"to prevent the enlistment of such men as are unfit for service"—not as criteria for subsequent exemptions of men already listed. For Virginia's Militia recruited everyone who could reasonably be recruited: "the body of the people, trained to arms", as distinguished from relatively small "standing armies" of picked men. Virginia's Militia was far less choosy than her regular forces in terms of its standards for enlistment, because, in the final analysis, the Militia was primarily concerned, not with developing a purely military efficacy among an highly selective group, but instead with maximizing political, legal, and military power and authority among "the body of the people" as "the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state".[945]

---

[945] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

Virginia enforced her pre-constitutional Militia laws in numerous ways, particularly through the imposition of fines on defaulters.

Legal mandates are one thing, enforcement of them another. Being more than mere compilations of hortatory rhetoric, Virginia's pre-constitutional Militia statutes provided many means to enforce their requirements.

A. Actual compliance always the goal. One historian has contended that "[t]he lack of militia court martial records before the first half of the eighteenth century prevents any determination of whether the [Virginia] militia laws were really enforced. By the middle of the century, however, the laws were being enforced."[946] Of course, that Virginia's early Militia laws might have been only laxly enforced cannot detract from their being the official embodiments of the settled political, legal, and social policy of that era, from their character as laws, or from their unique status as the controlling sources of the pre-constitutional legal definition of "well regulated Militia".[947] But even the earliest history is not nearly as vague as the source just quoted suggests. To the contrary, from the earliest days Virginia's official records evidenced a settled intent and repeated efforts on the part of the Colony's government to ensure that her Militia laws were being made obligatory in actual fact, as well as in legal principle, and as thoroughly and effectively as possible.

The underlying justification for legal compulsion and penalties was the necessity to organize Virginia's residents in order to enable the community to defend itself and all of its component parts, down to families and even individuals, against violent attacks from whatever source. Rather than "each for himself", the rule was "all for one and one for all". As one statute commanded in 1632, "THE adoiyninge plantations, shall assist the frontiers or theire neighbours, uppon alarums, the default to be severelie censured, and false alarums punished".{EN-1654} Naturally, then, public officials' primary concern throughout the pre-constitutional period was to see to it that the men eligible for Militia service were in fact as adequately armed and accoutred as possible. Not just in 1702 did the Governor "ask[ ] y^{e} advice of y^{e} Councill what was most proper [to] be done for Making y^{e}

---

[946] H. Gill, Jr., The Gunsmith in Colonial Virginia, ante note 731, at 12.

[947] On the last of these points, see ante, at 63-81.

Militia more Effectuall * * * being he had observed at all y^e^ Musters he had been at y^t^ not one fourth of y^e^ men were Armed and Accounted [accoutered] for Service".{EN-1655}

1. Assessment of the situation. Obviously, the first step in enforcement of the Militia laws had to be, and in fact was, to determine the extent of the citizenry's compliance with them. This process was well in hand long before the *mid-*1700s:

> • [1673 and 1676] "FOR the better supply of the country with armes and ammunition, Be it enacted * * * , that the captaines of ffoote and horse in each county doe take a strict and perticuler account of what armes and ammunition are wanting in their severall companies and troops, and represent the same into their respective colonells, at the next county courts * * * , but if there by not any colonell of horse within the county, then the captains of horse to represent their said wants imediately to the county court, into which courts at their next session following the colonells aforesaid are * * * enjoyned to retorne and represent the wants of the militia in their said county as they shall receive the same from their subordinate officers[.]"{EN-1656}
>
> • [1684] "His Excellency [the Governor] having under consideration the present unsetled condition of the militia, and being desirous, It may be put into y^e^ best and most suitable way and meanes for * * * y^e^ Countries safety, * * * It's therefore ordered, that Letters be writt unto the militia officers of every respective County forthwith to render to his Excellency y^e^ condition of their militia, what number they consist of, both horse and foot, as likewise how furnished with armes, and the names of all the militia officers in each respective County[.]"{EN-1657}
>
> • [1690] The Lieutenant Governor and Council "Ord^r^d that the Respective Comand^rs^ in Cheife, doe * * * return an account * * * of the Severall Captaines of Horse and Foot, and the Number of Souldi^rs^ under every of their Comands, and how furnished".{EN-1658}
>
> • [1691] The Lieutenant Governor, through the county Sheriffs, ordered all the "Comanders in Chiefe of the respective Counties" to "return an acco^t^ of the Powder in yo^r^ County, and the Names of the persons in whose possession the same is, and take Care that none be disposed of, but according to * * * Ord^rs^"; and also required "the respective Cap^ts^ of Horse, Dragoones and foot * * * to return * * * an Exact List of the Names of the Souldiers under their Comand, how armed, and what Colours, Trumpetts and Drums belongs to each Troope and Company, * * * and whether there be any persons fitt to beare Armes within their respective precincts, not Listed, their Names, and in what quallity they are Capable to Serve, And * * * that they take all possible Care the Souldiers under their comands be furnished with Horses Armes and Amunition according to Law".{EN-1659}

• [1695] "His Ex^{y} [the Governor] Ordered the Severall Comanders in Cheife of this Colony to Inspect the State of the Militia and to se how Armed & to returne account thereof."{EN-1660}

• [1699] The Governor and his Council "[o]rdered, that all Commanders in Cheif of the Militia, which have not already made returne of the Muster Roll of the Militia under their Command do forthwith returne the same to the Councill Office at James Citty".{EN-1661}

• [1700] The Governor and his Council "[o]rdered that the Commander in Cheif of ye Militia in y^{e} severall Countyes do deliver y^{e} Muster Rolls of all y^{e} men under their Command unto y^{e} Clerkes of their respective County Courts".{EN-1662}

• [1701] The Governor and his Council "require[d] all & Every y^{e} Colls and Comand^{rs} in Cheife of Each and Every County * * * Imediately to Issue out orders to y^{e} sev^{ll} officers und^{r} their Command to return a true and perfect List of y^{e} sev^{11} troops of horse & Companies of foot under their respective Commands, & how & in what they are fitted & Equipt wth Armes an Amunition Setting the same down in Distinct Columns".{EN-1663}

• [1702] The Governor ordered "y^{e} * * * Collonells and Commanders in chief of every respective County * * * to examine and enquire * * * how their said troops and Companys are now armed".{EN-1664}

• [1703] "And to the end the State of the Militia * * * may be better known", the Governor ordered the commanders in chief of the Militia in each County "to provide * * * copys of the Muster Rolls of every Troop and Company under their respective commands according to the Specimen * * * sent [to them]", and "to cause dilligent enquiry to be made & an exact acco^{t} taken of all arms, Powder and Shott within their respective Countys, and of what quality the said arms are".{EN-1665}

• [1705] "That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county be required * * * to make * * * a new list of all the male persons in his respective county capable * * * to serve in the militia, * * * and the respective circumstances of the ability of the persons listed, to the end each trooper or ffoot soldier may be thereby guided to provide and furnish himself with such arms and ammunition and within such time as this act * * * directs."{EN-1666}

• [1711] "[I]t is necessary the Country be put into an imediate posture of defence by training the Militia, and that the following Scheme proposed by the Governor for the more effectual prevention of the Enemy's attempts be put in execution Viz^{t}

"That a General Muster of the Militia of each County be forthwith appointed and an exact account taken how they are armed & provided with ammunition."{EN-1667}

2. Education of the populace. At the same time, the government took care to acquaint Virginia's residents with their specific duties under her Militia laws, and to premonish them that those laws would be enforced:

> • [1690] The Governor and his Council "Ord^{r}d that the Comand^{rs} in Cheife of the Militia * * * Doe Cause the Acts for Settlement of the Militia and for Providing of Armes to be twice a yre read at the head of every Troope & Company[.]"{EN-1668}
>
> • [1691] "[Y]^{e} Cap^{ts} of y^{e} militia are hereby required to cause y^{e} Severall Laws about y^{e} Militia to be read twice every year at y^{e} head of their troop or Company[.]"{EN-1669}
>
> • [1692] "Whereas it is of absolute Necessity for their Ma[jesties'] Service and Security of this Countrey that all the Inhabitants be well provided with Armes and Amunition, and Severall good Laws made to that End in this Colony, as also by the said Laws great Care taken that noe Souldiers Armes should be Imprest or taken away from him upon any pretence whatsoever, Notwithstanding all which severall persons have failed to provide themselves with Armes and Amunition as by the said Laws are enjoyned and required, as also of makeing their appeareances at Musters * * * , It is therefore * * * Ordered that the Comand^{rs} in Chief of their Ma^{s} Forces of this Colony doe take Care that the Laws for provideing of Armes and Amunition and appeareing at Musters be duely put in Execution on all those who have been formerly listed Souldiers and had time to be provided with Armes * * * ; And that the aforesaid Laws may be made publick that soe noe person or persons may plead for Excuse they did not know them, It is Ordered that the Comanders in Chief doe forthwith cause them together with this Order to be published in each respective County Court within their precincts, and at the head of every Troope and Foot Company under their respective Comands."{EN-1670}
>
> • [1699] "Ordered, that the Commander in Cheif of the Militia in the severall Counties do give notice to all Persons under their Command * * * that as soon as possible they do provide themselves with Armes on pain of being fined as the Law in that Case doe provide."{EN-1671}
>
> • [1702] Because "repeated advices * * * g[a]ve ground to Believe y^{t} a warr either is or will speedily be declared", the Governor commanded "y^{e} Collonell and Commanders in Cheif of all & every y^{e} Countys * * * that they cause each troop and Company under their Respective Commands to be duly Mustered and Exercised by y^{e} Cap^{ts} thereof once in every fortnight and y^{t} they also give strict Charge and directions to y^{e} Captains of such troops and Companys to take especiall care that all Persons without Priveledge or Exemption be listed and personally performe their dutys at y^{e} said Musters".{EN-1672}
>
> • [1702] The Governor ordered the "Cl[er]ks of every County Court * * * to give to y^{e} Command^{r} in chief of y^{e} Melitia in their respective Countys a true Copy of * * * [the statute] for y^e^ better strengthning the Frontiers and discovering y^e^ approaches of an Enemy which said Commanders in chief are * * * Required to give Copys of y^e^ same to every Cap^t^ under their respective Comands and y^e^ said Cap^ts^ are required to give copys thereof to each Commission officer * * * and to cause y^e^ same to be published at every perticular Muster that so none may pretend Ignorance of their duty on such an Occasion". {EN-1673}

• [1732] "Ordered that 300 Copies of the Law concerning the Militia be forthwith printed & dispers'd among the sev^l^ Officers for their better direction in their duty[.]"{EN-1674}

• [1736] "That a proclamation issue for enforcing the due execution of the Laws for regulating the Militia & appointing Patrols for the better preventing the Insurrections of Negroes[.]"{EN-1675}

• [1763] "[O]rder'd that a Proclamation issue for the more effectual putting in Execution the Laws concerning the Militia".{EN-1676}

• [1775] "[T]his ordinance shall, by command of each colonel [in the Militia], be publickly read at the head of his regiment, as soon as the same is embodied and formed, and once in six months thereafter, under the penalty of one hundred pounds * * * ; and the same shall also be publickly read at every meeting of a battalion of the minute-men in each district, and at every general muster, by the order of the colonel, county-lieutenant, or chief officer then present, under the penalty of one hundred pounds[.]"{EN-1677}

• [1777] "This act shall be read to every company of the militia, by order of the captain * * * , at the first muster next succeeding every general muster, on penalty of five pounds for every omission."{EN-1678}

• [1779] "[T]his act shall be publickly read at the head of each company by the captain * * * thereof, within one month after receiving the same, under the penalty of five pounds."{EN-1679}

• [1781] "[F]or the due promulgation of this act and the better information of the militia, Be it * * * enacted, That such a number of printed copies of this act * * * as the governor may deem necessary, shall be with all possible expedition transmitted to each county in this commonwealth for the use of the militia officers therein, and shall by such officers be read to their respective militias at every general and petty muster. Each county lieutenant failing therein shall for every offence forfeit * * * five thousand pounds of tobacco; each field officer three thousand; and each captain two thousand pounds of tobacco."{EN-1680}

• [1784 and 1785] "That the plan of major general baron Steuben * * * for forming and disciplining the troops of the United States, shall be the guide for the militia of this commonwealth * * * . It shall be the duty of every commander of a county regiment and company, at every of their > respective musters, to cause the militia to be exercised and trained, agreeable to said plan, under pain of being arrested and tried for breach of their duty; and for this purpose the said officers are * * * authorized to order the most expert and fit officer in their respective companies to perform that duty. And to the end that a general knowledge thereof may be diffused, the executive is * * * required, to have a sufficient number of copies of the said plan printed * * * , to afford to every commissioned officer of the militia, one".{EN-1681}

3. Enforcement of the laws. Also from the earliest days, Virginia's government endeavored to put the requirements of her Militia statutes into actual practice as quickly, strictly, and extensively as circumstances allowed:

> • [1676] An act providing for the supply of armes and ammunition, enacted in 1673, was ordered to "be putt into strict and effectual execution".{EN-1682}

> • [1690] "His Hono^{r} the L^{t} Gov^{r} acquainting this Board [that is, the Council] that in his travell thro the Country, he observed the Militia was not in Such Condicon as it ought, * * * this Board takeing into their Considerations that the Law * * * [of] 1684 * * * Entituled an Act for the better Supply of Armes and Amunition doth fully provide for the Same, Doe Order that the Respective Comand^{rs} in Cheife in this Government, doe take care to put the said Act in Effectual Execution."{EN-1683}

> • [1690] The Governor and his Council "Ord^{r}d that the Comand^{rs} in Cheife of the Militia * * * Doe Cause the Acts for Settlement of the Militia and for Providing of Armes to be twice a yre read at the head of every Troope & Company and use their utmost endeavours to put the same in Execution against all Such as are of ability to Comply with the performance of the same, and that all fines of Delinquents be Imployed for the buying of Drums, Armes and Amunition * * * , and that the Offic^{rs} at the heads of their Companies acquaint the Soldiers that all fines be Imployed as before is Expressed."{EN-1684}

> • [1691] "[Y]^{e} Cap^{ts} of y^{e} militia are hereby required * * * to return to y^{e} Comanders in Cheif all Such Soldiers as shall not be provided with armes and amunicon according to Law, and all Such as shall not appear at their Muster with armes, and y^{e} Comanders in Cheif are to cause Such delinquents to be fined as y^{e} Law provides, and to cause y^{e} fines to be imployed for y^{e} buying armes amunicion &c as y^{e} Law directs and y^{e} Sherrives of y^{e} Severall Counties are hereby Strictly required to Collect all Such fines as shall be turn'd to him and on refusall to distrain for them as y^{e} Law provides."{EN-1685}

> • [1691] The Governor and his Council "Ordered that the respective Comanders in Cheife in this Colony, doe forthwith issue their Orders, requireing that all fines on delinquent Souldiers be levied according to Law, and disposed of, as is directed".{EN-1686}

• [1692] "It being represented to [the Governor and his Council] * * * that the fines on delinquent Soldiers in Severall Countyes in this Colony, have not been putt to the uses the Law directs, It is therefore Ordered that the Law * * * be both duely observed and performed".{EN-1687}

• [1701] The Governor and Council "required [all Militia officers] to take speciall Care y^t^ y^e^ Law's for their [men's] appearance at Musters & being armed & Equipt according to Law und^r^ y^e^ fines & Penalties therein Contained be put in Due & Effectuall Execution".{EN-1688}

• [1701] The Governor did "strictly Charge and Comand all & Every the Colls and Comd^rs^ in Cheif of Each and every Co^ty^ * * * y^t^ they Cause Each & Every Troope of horse and Comp^a^ of Foot und^r^ their Respective Comand to be duly Muster'd & Exercised once every fortnight and y^t^ they take especiall Care y^t^ all and Every Person belonging to their sever^ll^ Troopes and foot Comp^as^ do personally appear and perform their duty w^th^out Exemption or Priviledge and all and every Coll^s^ and Comand^rs^ in Cheif are hereby Required and enjoyned to take Especially Care that at Every such time of must^rs^ y^t^ all & Every Respective Souldier appear well armed and equipt for warr and that all and Every the Laws in y^t^ Case * * * have their due observance and be put in Effectuall Execution by punishing the delinquents as the Law Enjoynes".{EN-1689}

• [1703] "[W]hereas the most effectual means for the defence of this Colony depends upon the well ordering and disciplining the Militia," the Governor "require[d] the Collonels & Commanders in cheif of each County * * * to appoint a Gen^ll^ Muster of all the Militia under their respective commands, and take especial care & give strict directions that all Persons serving in the Militia be well provided with arms & ammunition according to Law. And the s^d^ Coll^os^ & Command^rs^ in chief are at the said General Musters to give directions to the Captains of each Troop & Company under their command duly to exercise their said Troops & Companys once every three weeks, and to take care that all Persons without Priveledge or exemption be listed & Personally Performe their duty at the said Musters".{EN-1690}

• [1705] "[T]o the end no wilfull and obstinate defaulter or offender * * * may escape the penalty inflicted by this act for his default or offence,

"Be it enacted * * * , That all captains of troops and foot companys * * * be required, and every one of them is hereby strictly required and injoyned, at every muster (generall or particular) to take * * * an exact account in writing of every such default or offence made or committed in his troop or company, by whom the default or offence was made or done, and at what time, and to sign the same with his own hand and deliver it

* * * within a month after the taking to the * * * chief officer of the militia of the county whereunto he belongs, for such further proceeding thereupon as the persons * * * impowered to inquire into the merit of the said defaults or offences shall judge reasonable in the pursuance of, and according to the tenor and true intent and meaning of this act.

"And be it further enacted * * * , That the field officers and captains of every county * * * have full power * * * to inspect the severall lists or accounts * * * and thereupon to mulct every defaulter or offender * * * according to the merit of his default or offence[.]"{EN-1691}

• [1706] "Ordered that a Proclamation be issued requiring * * * That * * * the Chiefe officer of the Militia residing in each County do forthwith give notice to y^e^ respective Troops & Companys under their Command to be ready upon the first alarm of the Enemy to meet * * * and afterwards proceed for repulsing the enemy according as the said Chief officer shall direct, And that all persons serving in the militia be in areadiness with arms and ammunitions, and provisions to march for y^e^ defense of the Country."{EN-1692}

• [1706] "[T]he late act for settling the militia [in 1705] having strictly enjoyned all persons to provide armes on a certain penalty, the due execution of that Law will oblige people to be more diligent in purchasing[.]"{EN-1693}

• [1709] "Ordered that the Commanders in Cheif of the Militia * * * appoint Masters of the Militia * * * for training & exerciseing the Soldiers and that they take particular Care that the said Soldiers be provided with arms and ammunition according to Law & have their arms constantly well fixed & themselves in a readiness to draw together on an hours warning, hereby strictly chargeing all the said Officers to take particular notice of any person who on this Occasion shall prove deficient in their duty that they may be punished according to Law[.]"{EN-1694}

• [1723] "[T]o the end, no wilfull and obstinate defaulter or offender may escape the penalty * * * for his default or offence, Be it enacted * * * , That all captains of troops and companies * * * be required * * * at every muster, to take * * * an exact account in writing, of every such default or offence made or committed in his troop or company, by whom the said default or offence was made or done, and at what time, * * * and deliver it * * * to the field officers and captains, at their next meeting for the fining offenders.

" * * * And be it further enacted * * * , That the field officers and captains of every county * * * have full power * * * to inspect the several lists or accounts * * * and thereupon to fine every defaulter or offender therein charged[.]"{EN-1695}

• [1727] When certain Quakers "complain[ed] of divers fines levied upon them for not attending at the Musters of the Militia", it was held that "they ought * * * not to be relieved".{EN-1696}

Obviously, the fines must have been being enforced with such burdensome effects as to cause the Quakers to complain.

• [1736] A proclamation issued, "requiring * * * all and every the County Lieutenants, as well as other Subordinate Officers of the Militia, to cause private Musters to be made, of the several Troops and Companies under their Command, at such Times and Places as they shall judge most convenient, for the Listing, Training, and Exercising all such Persons as by Law ought to serve therein.

"And, to the End all Persons oblig'd to serve in the Militia, and who ought to be furnished with Arms and Ammunition, as the Law directs, may no longer be excused from this necessary part of their Duty, * * * That the * * * Chief Commanding Officer, residing in each County, * * * do take care, that a Court Martial be appointed and held * * * and to cause to be fined, all Persons whatsoever, who shall have absented themselves from General or Private Musters, or shall have appeared there not Armed and Accoutred as the Act of Assembly doth direct and require."{EN-1697}

• [1738 and 1755] "[E]very captain * * * shall duly make a list of all the persons upon his muster-roll, who * * * do not appear at any of the * * * musters, armed and accoutred * * * ; and return the same * * * to the court-martial, to which he belongs.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he field officers, and captains, of every county, * * * are hereby required to meet at the court-house of their counties * * * to hold a court martial; which * * * shall have power * * * to enquire of the age and abilities of all persons listed, and to exempt such as they shall judge incapable of service; and of all delinquents * * * for absence from musters, or appearing without arms and accoutrements; and to order * * * fines * * * to be levied upon all delinquents[.]"{EN-1698}

• [1755] The Lieutenant Governor ordered "all the County Lieutenants * * * to muster, and keep their Militia in proper Order, so that they may be in Readiness to resist and repel any * * * invasion, and that they appoint proper Places for their Rendezvous"; and "commanding Officers of the Frontier Counties, to keep a strict Lookout, and have a Number of their Militia on the Watch, by Way of Patrolers, and immediately to send [the Lieutenant Governor] Advice if any Number of Men shall appear in Arms on our Frontiers, and to give a proper Alarm to the neighboring Counties, that we may be in a condition of defending our Country from any Insults."{EN-1699}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[E]very captain * * * shall duly make a list of all persons upon his muster-roll who * * * do not appear at any of the * * * musters, armed, and with powder and ball * * * and return the same * * * to the next court martial * * * .

" * * * And be it further enacted * * * , That * * * the field officers and captains of every county * * * are * * * required to meet at the court house * * * the day next following the general muster in September or October every year,[948] * * * to hold a court martial * * * to enquire of the age and abilities of all persons inlisted, and to exempt such as they shall adjudge incapable of service, and of all delinquents * * * for absence from musters or appearing without arms, powder, or ball; * * * and to order * * * fines * * * to be levied upon all delinquents[.]"{EN-1700}

• [1762] "[T]he County Lieutenant * * * was requir'd * * * to put the Town of York in as defensible a State as possible and to keep the Militia of the County on the most respectable Footing."{EN-1701}

• [1772] When Virginia's Governor "informed the Board [that is, the Council], that he had been applied to, to remit certain Militia Fines" and "ask[ed] their advice", "the Board gave it as their Opinion, that all such Fines being appropriated by the Act of Assembly to particular Purposes, it was not in his Excellency's Power to remit them".{EN-1702} So fines were being collected and applied exclusively to statutory purposes.

• [1775] "[E]very captain * * * shall make return of all delinquencies in his company, either at general or private musters, to the next court-martial; and the better to enable him to do so, the senior serjeant * * * shall act as clerk, and call over the roll at each muster. * * *

"And be it farther ordained, That * * * the field-officers and captains of every county * * * [shall] meet at the courthouse * * * the day next following the general muster in * * * April and October in every year * * * to hold a court-martial * * * to inquire of the age and abilities of all persons enlisted, and exempt such as they shall adjudge incapable of service, and of all delinquents * * * for absence from musters, or appearing without arms, powder, or ball."{EN-1703}

• [1777] "Each captain shall, at every muster, * * * note down the delinquencies occurring in his company, and make return thereof to the next court martial[.]"{EN-1704}

• [1784 and 1785] "At every muster, each captain or commanding officer, shall call his roll, examine every person belonging thereto, and note down all delinquencies * * * , and make return thereof at the next regimental or general muster to the * * * commanding officer of his regiment, including those which may occur on that day. * * * Provided, That the commanding officer of a county or of a regiment, shall not be obliged to extend their roll calls, or individual examinations beyond the

---

[948] In 1762, 1766, and 1771, "the general muster" was required to be held in March or April of every year.

officers, unless they observe some apparent necessity therefor. * * * Every * * * commanding officer of a company shall, within ten days after every regimental and general muster, make up * * * a return of his company, including all arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, * * * distinguishing effective and good from non-effective and bad, noting therein such as have died, removed, been exempted or added, and all persons within the bounds of his company not on his roll, who ought to be enrolled."{EN-1705}

B. A variety of punishments and penalties available. Being essentially a para-military establishment throughout the pre-constitutional era, Virginia's Militia employed a wide variety of means to enforce discipline among its members.

1. Corporal punishment. Not surprisingly, precisely because it was a para-military establishment, Virginia's Militia was always authorized to inflict physical punishments on certain defaulters:

• [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service and sermons both forenoon and afternoon, and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte. And every one that shall transgresse this lawe shall forfeite three shillings a time to the use of the churche, all lawful and necessary impediments excepted. But if a servant in this case shall willfully neglecte his M[aste]r's comande he shall suffer bodily punishmente."{EN-1706}

• [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church uppon payne for every effence, yf the mayster allow not thereof to pay 2 lb. of tobacco, * * * and the servants to be punished."{EN-1707}

• [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott vpon penalty of ten pounds of tobacco for every master of a family so offending * * * , and servants being commanded and yet omitting shall receive twenty lashes on his or theire bare shoulders, by order of the county courts where he or they shall live."{EN-1708}

• [1723] "[I]f an exempted overseer, or miller, or any free Negro, Mulatto, or Indian, other than as * * * excepted, shall presume to appear at any muster whatsoever, the party so offending, shall for every such offence, forfeit and pay one hundred pounds of tobacco, and shall immediately give security to the * * * commanding officer, for paiment of the same * * * . And each person failing to pay, or give security, * * * shall * * * be tied neck and heels * * * for any time not exceeding twenty minutes.

* * * * *

" * * * [A]ll soldiers, during the time they are in arms, shall observe and obediently perform the commands of their officer, relating to their exercise, according to the best of their skill. And if any soldier * * *

shall, at any such muster, disobey his officers' commands, or behave himself disorderly or refractorily thereat, * * * the chief commanding officer then present, * * * [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time not exceeding twenty minutes."{EN-1709}

• [1738] "[I]f any soldier, during the time he is in arms at a general muster, shall refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, * * * the chief commanding officer, * * * [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time, not exceeding five minutes * * * . And if any soldier, during the time he is in arms, at any private muster, shall misbehave, * * * such offender shall * * * be tied neck and heels, for any time, not exceeding five minutes[.]"{EN-1710}

• [1755] "[I]f any inferior officer or soldier, during the time the militia shall be employed for suppressing any invasion or insurrection, * * * shall disobey the lawful commands of his superior officer, or behave himself refractorily, or shall be guilty of prophane swearing, drunkenness, or any other such like offence, every person so offending, shall * * * suffer such corporal punishment, not extending to life or member, as by a court martial * * * shall be inflicted or imposed.

" * * * Provided always, That no such person shall be adjudged * * * to receive more than twenty lashes, for any one of the said offences[.]"{EN-1711}

• [1755, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[I]f any officer or soldier, during the time the militia shall be employed, for suppressing any invasion or insurrection * * * , shall desert the said service, or raise any mutiny or sedition, in the troop or company to which he belongs, or any other troop or company in the said service,[949] or coming to the knowledge of any such mutiny or intended mutiny, shall not give information thereof, to his commanding officer, and use his utmost endeavour to suppress the same, shall suffer such corporal punishment, as shall be inflicted on him by a court martial * * * , not extending to life or member. And every person holding correspondence with, or giving intelligence to the enemy, during the time such militia is employed, for suppressing such invasion and insurrection, shall suffer death, as in cases of felony, without benefit of clergy, upon being thereof lawfully convicted before the general court of this colony."{EN-1712}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[I]f any inferior officer or soldier during the time the militia shall be employed for suppressing any invasion or insurrection * * * shall disobey the lawful commands of his superior officer, or behave himself refractorily, every officer so offending shall pay such fine, not exceeding fifty pounds;

---

[949] The Acts of 1757 through 1772 referred simply to "the company", rather than "the troop or company".

and every soldier so offending shall pay such fine, not exceeding five pounds, as by a court martial * * * shall be imposed; and if any soldier shall fail or refuse to pay down such fine immediately * * * or give sufficient security to pay the same within three months, then such soldier shall receive thirty-nine lashes on his bare back well laid on; and if any inferior officer or soldier during the time the militia shall be employed as aforesaid, shall be guilty of prophane swearing, drunkenness, or any other the like offence, every person so offending shall * * * pay five shillings for every offence, so that the same at any one time doth not exceed twenty shillings; and if any soldier shall fail to pay the same, or give security as aforesaid, he shall for every of the said offences receive five lashes on his bare back well laid on, so that the same at any one time doth not exceed twenty lashes."{EN-1713}

• [1757 and 1759] "[I]f any soldier shall, at any general or private muster, refuse to perform the command of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at the courts martial * * * the chief commanding officer, then present, * * * [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes, or inflict such corporal punishment as he shall think fit, not exceeding twenty lashes."{EN-1714}

• [1762, 1766, 1771, 1775, and 1777] "[I]f any soldier shall at any general or private muster refuse to perform the command of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at * * * [a] court-martial, * * * it shall and may be lawful to and for the chief commanding officer then present to cause such offender to be tied, neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes, and shall not inflict any other corporal punishment[950]."{EN-1715}

• [1775] "[E]very officer or militia man, and every officer and minute-man, who shall refuse, or unreasonably delay, conforming to * * * [certain] directions [with respect to invasions or insurrections], in every particular, shall, for every refusal or delay, forfeit and pay the several sums following * * * [then enumerating the fines] * * * .

"Provided, That * * * every private soldier, or minute-man, refusing or neglecting to pay the same, or to give security to pay the same in one month after conviction, shall be subject to such corporal punishment as may be inflicted by a court-martial, not extending to life or member."{EN-1716}

• [1777] "If any soldier be certified to the court martial to be so poor that he cannot purchase * * * arms, the said court shall cause them to be procured at the expense of the publick, to be reimbursed out of the fines on the delinquents of the county, which arms shall be delivered to such poor person to be used at musters, but shall continue the property of the county; and if any soldier shall sell or conceal such arms, the seller or concealer, and purchaser, shall each of them forfeit the sum of six pounds. * * *

---

[950] The Acts of 1775 and 1777 omitted the language "and shall not inflict any other corporal punishment".

"And if any poor soldier shall remove out of the county, and carry his arms with him, he shall incur the same penalty as if he had sold such arms; and if any persons concerned in selling or concealing such arms shall be sued for the said penalty, and * * * shall fail to make payment, he shall suffer such corporal punishment as the court[-martial] * * * shall think fit, not exceeding thirty nine lashes."{EN-1717}

• [1781] "[A]ny militia-man deserting while in actual service with public arms, shall, upon conviction before a court-martial, suffer death, or such other punishment as the said court shall inflict. And every militia-man deserting without public arms, shall suffer such punishment, not touching life or member, as a court-martial shall direct[.]"{EN-1718}

• [1784] "Any non-commissioned officer or soldier offending, shall be tried by a * * * court-martial, and may, on conviction, be censured or fined at the discretion of the court; and failing to make instant payment of such fine, or to give sufficient security therefor, * * * shall receive corporal punishment, not exceeding twenty lashes."{EN-1719}

• [1784 and 1785] "If any private shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court * * * appointed for trying delinquencies * * * that he is so poor that he cannot purchase the arms * * * required, such court shall cause them to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents. * * * [A]nd if any private shall sell or conceal the same, the seller, concealer, and purchaser, shall each forfeit and pay four pounds * * * . And if any poor private shall remove out of the county, and carry such arms with him, he shall incur the same penalty as if he had sold them. And if any person concerned in selling, purchasing, concealing or removing such arms shall be prosecuted for the penalty, and upon conviction shall fail to make instant payment, or give security to pay the same * * * , he shall suffer such corporal punishment as the court * * * may think fit, not exceeding thirty-nine lashes.[951]

* * * * *

" * * * If any noncommissioned officer or soldier, shall behave himself disobediently or mutinously when on duty, on, or before any [Militia] court or board, * * * the commanding officer, court or board may * * * cause him to be bound neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes."{EN-1720}

2. Imprisonment. Militia officers also were authorized to punish their men's misbehavior with imprisonment:

---

[951] The Act of 1785 omitted the limitation "not exceeding thirty-nine lashes".

• [1705] "[A]ll soldiers in horse and ffoot during the time they are in arms, shall observe and obediently perform the commands of their officer relating to their exercising according to the best of their skill, and * * * the chief officers upon the place * * * may imprison mutineers and such soldiers as do not do their dutys as soldiers at the day of their musters and training, and * * * may inflict for punishment for every such offence * * * the penalty of imprisonment without bail or mainprise, not exceeding ten days.

" * * * [I]f any soldier either in horse or foot upon occasion of an incursion, invasion, insurrection or rebellion, or other alarm or surprise, shall be summoned * * * and shall fail to appear * * * , such soldier shall for such his offence * * * suffer three months imprisonment, without bail or mainprise."{EN-1721}

• [1723] "[A]ll soldiers, during the time they are in arms, shall observe and obediently perform the commands of their officer, relating to their exercise, according to the best of their skill. And if any soldier * * * shall, at any * * * muster, disobey his officers' commands, or behave himself disorderly or refractorily thereat, * * * the chief commanding officer then present, * * * [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time not exceeding twenty minutes. And if any such soldier shall thereafter offend, it shall * * * be lawful * * * to commit such offender to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days; and * * * the said offender shall not be thence discharged, until he hath paid and satisfied all fees due, and accustomed for sherifs or goalers to take, upon any commitments and discharges."{EN-1722}

• [1738] "[I]f any soldier, during the time he is in arms at a general muster, shall refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, * * * the chief commanding officer, then present, * * * [may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time, not exceeding five minutes: And for a second offence, * * * the offender shall be punished by * * * the field officers and captains, * * * who are hereby impowered * * * to commit the offender to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days. And if any soldier, during the time he is in arms, at any private muster, shall misbehave, * * * such offender shall be punished by any field officer then present * * * [who may] cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time, not exceeding five minutes, for the first offence; and for the second offence, the * * * commission-officers * * * [may] commit such offender to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days. And in either case, of commitment to the county goal, the offender * * * shall not be thence discharged, until the lawful fees for commitment, imprisonment, and discharge, be fully satisfied and paid."{EN-1723}

• [1755] "That * * * a sum of money not exceeding two thousand pounds * * * be laid out for and in the raising and maintaining three compa[n]ies of men * * * to be employed as rangers, for the protection of the subjects in the frontiers of this colony * * * . And in case the * * * men, cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily enlist * * * chief officer[s] of the militia * * * [may] draft out of the militia * * * such and so many young men * * * who have not wives and children * * * . And if any person so drafted shall refuse to serve * * * , every person so refusing shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds * * * , and in case of failure in paying down the same, * * * such person shall * * * be committed to goal, there to remain until he shall agree to enter into the said service, or pay the said penalty[.]"{EN-1724}

• [1755] "[I]n case the * * * [required] number of men cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily inlist in the * * * service * * * , it shall and may be lawful, for the field officers and captains of the militia * * * to draft out of the militia of their counties * * * such and so many of their militia, who have not wives or children, * * * to be employed in the * * * service * * * . And if any person so drafted, shall refuse to serve * * * or find and provide some other able person to serve in his room, every person so refusing shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds * * * , and in case of failure in paying down * * * or giving sufficient security * * * then such person shall * * * be committed to goal, there to remain until he shall agree to enter into the * * * service, or provide another * * * , or pay or give security[.]"{EN-1725}

• [1755] "[I]f any soldier, shall at any general or private muster, refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at the courts martial, * * * it shall and may be lawful * * * for the chief commanding officer, then present, to fine every such soldier, if an horseman, any sum not exceeding ten shillings, and if a footman, not exceeding seven shillings and six pence, which fine shall be immediately paid down * * * ; but in case any such offender shall not be able to pay down such fine immediately, then he shall give good security * * * for the payment of the same in three months. And in case any soldier so fined * * * shall refuse or fail to pay down his fine, or to give such security * * * , then it shall and may be lawful * * * to commit every such soldier to the county goal, there to remain without bail or mainprize, for any time not exceeding three days, and the offender * * * so committed, shall not be thence discharged, until the lawful fees for commitment, imprisonment, and discharge, shall be fully paid and satisfied."{EN-1726}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1762, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "And whereas it may be necessary in time of danger to arm part of the militia, not otherwise sufficiently provided out of his majesty's magazine, and other stores within this colony, Be it * * * enacted * * * , That if any person or persons so armed * * * shall detain or embezzle any arms or ammunition to him or them delivered for the public service, and shall not produce and re-deliver the same when ordered and required so to do, * * * [the] chief commanding officer * * * [may] commit such offender to prison, there to remain until he shall make satisfaction for the arms or ammunition by him detained or embezzled."{EN-1727}

• [1775] "[I]f any officer or soldier [among the Minutemen], during the time of his attendance on training duty, in battalion or companies, * * * shall refuse to obey the commands of his superiour officer, or behave himself mutinously or refractorily, or shall in any other manner transgress the rules of good order and decency, every such offender shall * * * be confined, for any time not exceeding twenty four hours[.]"{EN-1728}

• [1777] "If any soldier, at any muster, shall refuse to obey the command of his officer, or shall behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at a court martial, the commanding officer, or court martial, may * * * put him under arrest for the day[.]"{EN-1729}

• [1777] "The soldiers of * * * [the] militia, if not well armed and provided with ammunition, shall be furnished with the arms and ammunition of the county, and any deficiency in these may be supplied from the publick magazines, or if the case admit not that delay, by impressing arms and ammunition of private property, which ammunition, so far as not used, and arms, shall be duly returned, as soon as they may be spared. And any person embezzling any such publick or private arms, or not delivering them up when required by his commanding officer, shall * * * be committed to prison without bail or mainprize, there to remain till he deliver or make full satisfaction for the same, unless he be sooner discharged by the court of his county."{EN-1730}

• [1779] "Every non-commissioned officer or private, who at any muster shall not obey the lawful commands of his superiour officer, or shall behave mutinously, riotously, get drunk or not demean himself as a non-commissioned officer or soldier, shall be put under guard for the day[.]"{EN-1731}

• [1784 and 1785] "If any noncommissioned officer or soldier, shall behave himself disobediently or mutinously when on duty, on, or before any [Militia] court or board, * * * the commanding officer, court or board, may * * * confine him for the day[.]"{EN-1732}

Local Militia officers could also summarily punish obstreperous individuals who were not members of the Militia (or, if members of the Militia, were for one or another reason not in service at that time):

• [1777] "If any bystander interrupt, molest, or insult any officer of soldier while on duty, at any general or private muster, or misbehave before any court martial, the commanding officer, or court martial, may put him under arrest for the day."{EN-1733}

• [1779] "If any by-stander interrupt, molest, or insult any officer of soldier when on duty, at any general or private muster, or misbehave before any court martial, he may be put under guard by the commanding officer for the day[.]"{EN-1734}

• [1784 and 1785] "If any bystander shall interrupt, molest, or insult any officer or soldier while on duty at any muster, or shall be guilty of the like conduct before any [Militia] court or board * * * , the commanding officer, or such court or board, may cause him to be confined for the day."{EN-1735}

3. Drafts into the regular Armed Forces. During the War of Independence, Virginia (along with all of the other States) fielded not only "a well regulated militia", but also her own regular "Troops", as well as dispatching men to serve the United States in the Continental Army.[952] Sometimes, disobedient Militiamen were disciplined by being drafted as State "Troops" or as Continental soldiers:

• [1779] "If any non-commissioned officer or soldier [in the Militia] shall refuse to march when ordered into actual service according to his tour of duty, or find an able bodied man in his room, or shall while in service, mutiny, or desert, and thereof shall be convicted before a court-martial, such offender shall serve as a regular soldier in the troops of this state six months[.]"{EN-1736}

• [1780] "WHEREAS a dangerous invasion of South Carolina now threatens * * * that state, and the troops engaged in its defence may be overpowered by superiour numbers, if timely aid be not sent to them. And as it is incumbent upon this state, on every principle of policy and good neighbourhood, to assist our friends and fellow citizens in distress, as speedily and effectually as possible, Be it enacted * * * , That two thousand five hundred infantry be forthwith called into service, in legal rotation, from * * * [certain] counties, and in * * * [certain] proportions[.]

* * * * *

" * * * If any non-commissioned officer or soldier shall fail to attend when summoned, not having a just and reasonable excuse, or refuse to march when ordered into actual service according to his tour of duty, or find an able bodied man in his room, or shall while in service, mutiny or desert, * * * such offender shall serve as a regular soldier in the troops of the state for eight months".{EN-1737}

---

[952] The distinctions between "Militia" and "Troops" of the States, on the one hand, and the "Army" of the United States, on the other hand, were carried over into the Constitution. Compare U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cls. 12, 15, and 16, with art. II, § 2, cl. 1, and with art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

• [1780] "[W]hereas it has been a practice of many tradesmen to entice their apprentices to enlist as soldiers, and to sell them as substitutes for large sums of money; Be it enacted, That if any tradesman or other person to whom any infant is, or shall be bound as an apprentice, shall directly or indirectly take or receive, or agree to take or receive any money or other gratuity in consideration of such apprentice, his enlisting as a soldier or sailor in any corps whatsoever, every such tradesman or person so offending, * * * being an able bodied man under the age of fifty years, * * * shall be deemed a soldier to serve in this state's quota of continental troops during the war[.] * * *

"And whereas a practice has prevailed of enlisting men for small bounties and afterwards selling them * * * for higher bounties * * * ; Be it enacted, That every person guilty of such offence, shall be subject to the same penalties as tradesmen and others enlisting or selling their apprentices[.]"{EN-1738}

• [1781] "Every militia-man ordered into actual service, who shall refuse and neglect to appear at the time and place of rendezvous appointed for the company, corps or detachment to which he belongs, without a reasonable excuse, or produce an able-bodied substitute to serve in his room (but no person shall be admitted as a substitute except he belongs to the militia of the same county, and if it shall come to such substitute's tour of duty before he returns, then the person employing him shall be obliged to serve in his room or procure a second substitute) shall * * * be declared a regular soldier for six months[.]"{EN-1739}

• [1782] "[T]he governor shall cause to be delivered to the * * * commanding officers of the militia of such counties as are most exposed to the incursions of the enemy, and to the officers of the militia of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, such a number of arms as he may think necessary, not less than sufficient to arm three tenths of their militia * * * ; who, on having served their tour of duty, shall return their arms, in good order, * * * to be delivered in like manner to such of the militia as stand next in rotation.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very militia-man to whom arms shall be delivered * * * , who shall neglect or refuse to return the same * * * , shall forfeit and pay the sum of twelve pounds; and on failing so to do, or giving security * * * , every such militia-man shall be obliged to serve in the continental army the term of three years or during the war."{EN-1740}

Statutes of this type are of no little importance, because they exemplify how, during the pre-constitutional era, the power to draft (or impress) men into any armed force was lodged exclusively in the States in three ways: (i) for their Militia, which always were institutions based on near-universal, compulsory service; (ii) for their own "Troops", which usually were composed of volunteers, but could be augmented by selective drafts from the Militia; and (iii) for soldiers whom the States drafted to serve in the Army of the United States. This tripartite structure should be maintained today, under the Constitution.[953]

4. Fines. Usually, Virginia's *pre-*constitutional Militia enforced discipline by levying fines against defaulters.

a. Virginia's Militia laws imposed fines upon essentially every conceivable type of dereliction of duty by her Militiamen:

> • [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service and sermons both forenoon and afternoon, and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte. And every one that shall transgresse this lawe shall forfeite three shillings a time to the use of the churche, all lawful and necessary impediments excepted."{EN-1741}
>
> • [1632] "ALL men that are fittinge to beare armes, shall bringe their peices to the church uppon payne for every effence, yf the mayster allow not thereof to pay 2 lb. of tobacco, to be disposed by the church-wardens, who shall levy it by distresse[.]"{EN-1742}
>
> • [1639] "ALL persons except negroes to be provided with arms and amunition or be fined[.]"{EN-1743}
>
> • [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott vpon penalty of ten pounds of tobacco for every master of a family so offending[.]"{EN-1744}
>
> • [1659 and 1662] "BEE it enacted that a provident supplie be made of gunn powder and shott to our owne people, and this strictly to bee lookt to by the officers of the militia, (vizt.) That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least which are to be provided by every man for his family * * * , and whosoever shall faile of makeing such provision to be fined ffiftie pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1745}
>
> • [1666] "WHEREAS the officers of the militia have complained that divers refractory persons have in contempt of the authority impowring them, and to the ruyne of all military discipline refused to appeare upon the dayes of exercise * * * , It is enacted * * * that every person soe neglecting to appeare, shall for every such neglect be amerced and fined one hundred pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1746}
>
> • [1673 and 1676] "FOR the better supply of the country with armes and ammunition, Be it enacted * * * , that the captaines of ffoote and horse in each county doe take a strict and perticuler account of what armes and ammunition are wanting in their severall companies and troops

---

[953] See post, Chapter 49.

* * * : And be it further enacted * * * , that the perticuler county courts be * * * impowred upon their respective counties to lay and raise a levy for the provideing of armes and ammunition for supplying the wants aforesaid, that is to say, muskitts and swords for the ffoote, and pistolls, swords and carbines for horse, as alsoe for every lysted souldier at the least two pounds of powder and six pounds of shott, the said armes and ammunition * * * to remaine in the hands of the officers of the militia for them to dispose of the same as there shalbe occasion; and that those to whome distribution of armes and ammunition shalbe made doe pay for the same at a reasonable rate * * * ; and if any court or courts shall faile in their duty to provide, within one yeare after such presentment made by the officers of the militia * * * of their wants * * * , for the full supplying thereof * * * , be fined tenn thousand pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1747}

• [1682] "[E]ach captain * * * shall once every month muster, treine, exercise, instruct and discipline the troop or soldiers under his command on paine to forfeite five hundred pounds of tobacco in caske for each time he shall neglect such muster or exercise * * * . And that every captain * * * shall at the least once in every fourteen daies range and scout about the frontiers of the county * * * and in such other places as shall be most likely for the discovery of the enemy under paine of forfeiting for every time he shall neglect such ranging and scouting one thousand pounds of tobacco in caske. And that every soldier that shall neglect or omitt to appeare at such muster, shall forfeite one hundred pounds of tobacco in caske, and for not scouting and rangeing * * * two thousand pounds of tobacco and caske for every such default[.]"{EN-1748}

• [1684] "[E]very trooper, failing to supply himselfe * * * with * * * arms and furniture, and not * * * keeping the same well fixt, shall forfeite four hundred pounds of tobacco * * * , and every foot souldier soe failing to provide himselfe, * * * and not keeping the same well fixt, shall forfeit two hundred pounds of tobacco".{EN-1749}

• [1705] " * * * [T]he persons of a councellor, of a speaker of the house of burgesses, of a justice of the peace, of an attorney-general, and of a captain or an higher officer in the militia, are exempted from being listed and serving * * * , merely for the dignity of the office * * * held, and that notwithstanding * * * all and every such person or persons, and also the clerk of the councill, the clerk of the general court, and every county court clerk shall provide and keep * * * at their respective places of abode a troopers horse, furniture, arms and ammunition * * * , and to produce or cause the same to be produced in the county where they respectively reside yearly, and every year at the generall muster * * * , upon pain of forfeiting for every neglect * * * twenty shillings current money of Virginia.

"And in case of any rebellion or invasion shall also be obliged to appear * * * and serve in such stations as are suitable for gentlemen * *

* , under the same penaltys as any other person or persons, who * * * are injoyned to be listed in the militia * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * That whatsoever trooper or ffoot soldier shall fail to appear * * * , or appearing shall not be furnished and provided with arms and ammunition * * * for muster and exercise, or shall not keep at his place of abode what * * * he is directed there to have and bring into the field with him all and singular the arms and ammunition * * * when thereunto specially required, such trooper or ffoot soldier shall for his neglect in any of the premises, be fined one hundred pounds of tobacco, every time he is warned or appointed to appear.

* * * * *

" * * * [A]ll soldiers in horse and ffoot during the time they are in arms, shall observe and obediently perform the commands of their officer relating to their exercising according to the best of their skill, and * * * the chief officers upon the place * * * shall * * * inflict for punishment for every * * * offence, any mulct not exceeding fifty pounds of tobacco * * * .

" * * * [I]f any soldier either in horse or foot upon occasion of an incursion, invasion, insurrection or rebellion, or other alarm or surprise, shall be summoned * * * and shall fail to appear * * * , such soldier shall * * * be fined ten pounds current money * * * .

"And forasmuch as some difficulty hath been found in procuring some soldiers to be willing to serve as serjeants, corporals, drummers or trumpeters, all of them absolutely necessary in troops and companys: For prevention of the like in time to come,

"Be it enacted * * * , That whatsoever soldier shall refuse to take upon him, act in and execute any of the said places and offices in the troop or company wherein he is listed, being known to be capable and thereunto appointed by his captain, shall * * * be fined five hundred pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1750}

•[1723] "[I]f an exempted overseer, or miller, or any free Negro, Mulatto, or Indian, other than as * * * excepted, shall presume to appear at any muster whatsoever, the party so offending, shall for every such offence, forfeit and pay one hundred pounds of tobacco, and shall immediately give security to the * * * commanding officer, for paiment of the same * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [W]hatsoever soldier shall fail to appear * * * , or appearing, shall not be furnished and provided with arms and ammunition * * * for muster and exercise, or shall not keep at his place of abode, what * * * is directed, such soldier, for every such failure, shall be fined one hundred pounds of tobacco.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very captain of a troop or company, who shall fail to appear at any muster * * * , or appearing, fail and neglect to exercise the troop or company under his command, * * * for every such offence, shall be fined two hundred pounds of tobacco. And every lieutenant, cornet, or ensign, who shall at any time fail to appear at any such muster, and perform his duty thereat, shall forfeit and pay one hundred pounds of tobacco for every such offence.

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f any soldier, upon occasion of an incursion, invasion, insurrection, or rebellion, or other alarm or surprize, * * * shall fail to appear, such soldier shall be fined for his failure, the sum of ten pounds, current money * * * .

" * * * [I]f any officer shall fail or neglect to appear on occasion of any such incursion, invasion, insurrection, or rebellion, or other alarm, every such officer, so offending, shall be fined the sum of twenty pounds, current money, for every such failure.

" * * * [F]orasmuch, as some difficulty hath been found in procuring some soldiers * * * to serve as serjeants, corporals, drummers, or trumpeters, all of them absolutely necessary in troops and companies: For prevention of the like in time to come, Be it enacted * * * That whatsoever soldier shall refuse to take upon him, act in, and execute any of the said places and offices, in the troop or company wherein he is listed, being known to be capable, and thereunto appointed by his captain, shall for such his refusal be fined five hundred pounds of tobacco[.]"{EN-1751}

•[1738] "[F]or settling the fines to be inflicted upon all persons who shall fail to do their duty, * * * and on all other delinquents * * * , Be it * * * enacted * * * , That the several persons herein after mentioned, for such failure, shall forfeit and pay the sums following, respectively, * * * The lieutenant of any county, * * * failing to appoint a general muster, * * * shall pay ten pounds for every failure * * * . Every colonel, lieutenant-colonel, or major, failing to appear at such general muster, or court[-martial], shall pay forty shillings. Every captain, who shall fail to muster and exercise his troop or company * * * shall pay twelve shillings for every failure. And every captain failing to appear at the court martial, or general muster, shall pay twenty shillings for every failure. And every lieutenant who fails to appear at muster, shall pay ten shillings for every failure. And every cornet, or ensign, seven shillings and six pence. And every captain * * * , failing to return a list of the persons who shall not appear at musters, or shall appear without his arms or accoutrements, shall pay fifty shillings. Every soldier refusing to serve as a serjeant, corporal, drummer, or trumpeter * * * shall pay fifty shillings, or five hundred pounds of tobacco, at his election * * * . Every person listed to serve in the horse, shall pay seven shillings and six pence, or seventy five pounds of tobacco: And every person listed in the foot, shall pay five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, at their election, for not appearing at muster, compleatly armed and accoutred * * * . And every clerk of a court-martial failing to deliver the orders of the court to the sheriff of the county * * * shall forfeit all the salary or allowance for his service, as clerk, for that year.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person exempted from personal appearance only, failing to send an able bodied man, or man and horse, * * * in his room, to be trained and exercised, shall pay the same fine * * * inflicted for not appearing at musters. And every person ordered to go to church armed, failing to do his duty therein, shall pay five shillings. And every person ordered to patrol, and failing so to do, * * * shall pay ten shillings, for every failure. * * *

* * * * *

" * * * And * * * if any sheriff shall refuse to receive the orders of any court-martial offered to him * * * , or to collect and levy the fines therein mentioned; such sheriff * * * shall be fined, for such refusal, fifty pounds current money[.]"{EN-1752}

• [1748 and 1753] "[I]f any officer of the militia, who upon occasion of any invasion or insurrection, shall receive any orders or instructions, from the governor or commander in chief for the time being, or from any other his superior officer, either for calling together the soldiers, or marching them to any particular place, shall neglect or refuse to execute such orders and instructions, in the best manner he is capable, every such officer so neglecting or refusing, shall respectively, forfeit and pay the sum following, that is to say, every lieutenant of a county, the sum of fifty pounds, every colonel, lieutenant colonel, or major, thirty pounds, and every captain, lieutenant, cornet, or ensign, twenty pounds; and every soldier who shall be summoned to appear, upon any such occasion, and shall fail so to do, or shall fail to bring with him his arms and accoutrements, together with one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball, shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds[.]"{EN-1753}

• [1754] "[I] the chief officer of the militia, residing in any county, shall fail to appoint patrollers, * * * such officer shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds; and every person appointed to patrol * * * , failing to do his duty therein, shall pay the sum of five shillings for every failure[.]"{EN-1754}

• [1755] "That * * * a sum of money not exceeding two thousand pounds * * * be laid out for and in the raising and maintaining three compa[n]ies of men * * * to be employed as rangers * * * . And in case the * * * men, cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily enlist * * * chief officer[s] of the militia [in certain counties] * * * [may] draft out of the militia * * * such and so many young men * * * who have not wives and children * * * . And if any person so drafted shall refuse to serve * *

* , every person so refusing shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds[.]"{EN-1755}

• [1755] "[I]n case the * * * [required] number of men cannot be raised, by such as will voluntarily inlist in the * * * service * * * , it shall and may be lawful, for the field officers and captains of the militia * * * to draft out of the militia of their counties * * * such and so many of their militia, who have not wives or children, * * * to be employed in the * * * service * * * . And if any person so drafted, shall refuse to serve * * * or find and provide some other able person to serve in his room, every person so refusing shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds[.]"{EN-1756}

• [1755] "[I]f it shall be made to appear to the court of any county, * * * that any soldier inlisted in the foot, is so poor, as not to be able to purchase the arms [required for service in the Militia] * * * ; then such court shall * * * depute some person to send for the same to England * * * ; and if any person shall presume to buy or sell any such arms, * * * then and in such case, every person so buying or selling, shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds * * * .

" * * * [T]he several persons * * * exempted from mustering * * * shall provide arms for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they shall respectively reside * * * . And if they shall fail or refuse so to do, * * * then * * * the several courts of the counties * * * are * * * required to levy the value of the same on each of them respectively.

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f any soldier, shall at any general or private muster, refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at the courts martial, * * * the chief commanding officer, then present, * * * [may] fine every such soldier, if a horseman, any sum not exceeding ten shillings, and if a footman, not exceeding seven shillings and six pence, which fine shall be immediately paid down to such officer; but in case any such offender shall not be able to pay down such fine immediately, then he shall give good security * * * for the payment of the same in three months.

* * * * *

" * * * [P]ersons * * * failing to do their duty * * * shall forfeit and pay the several sums following * * * ; that is to say, the lieutenant of any county or the chief commanding officer there, failing to appoint a general muster * * * [twice] in every year, * * * shall for every such failure, forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds; every county lieutenant, colonel, lieutenant colonel and major failing to appear at every * * * general muster, or at the court martial, shall forfeit and pay ten pounds for every such failure; every captain who shall fail to muster and exercise his troop or company * * * shall forfeit and pay forty shillings, for every time he shall so fail to muster and exercise; and every captain failing to appear at every general muster and court martial, shall forfeit and pay five pounds, for every such failure; every lieutenant who shall fail to appear at any muster, shall forfeit and pay twenty shillings, for every such failure; and every coronet and ensign ten shillings, for every such failure; and every captain, or in his absence the lieutenant, failing to return a list of the persons who shall not appear at musters, or shall appear without arms and accoutrements, shall forfeit and pay ten pounds, for every such failure; every clerk failing to appear with arms shall pay ten shillings, for every such failure; every soldier refusing to serve as a serjeant, corporal, drummer or trumpeter * * * shall pay five shillings, for every muster that he shall so refuse; every person inlisted to serve in the horse, appearing at muster without a serviceable horse * * * [and] carbine * * * , shall pay five shillings, for every such failure: and such persons appearing at muster * * * without holsters, a case of pistols, cutting-sword, double cartouch-boxes, and six charges of powder and ball shall pay five shillings, for every such failure; and every person listed to serve in the foot, appearing at such muster without a firelock well fixed, and a bayonet fitted to the same, shall pay three shillings, for every such failure; and every such person appearing * * * without a cutting-sword, a double cartouch-box, and three charges of powder and ball shall pay three shillings, for every such failure; and every soldier, either of the horse or foot, failing to appear at such muster, shall forfeit and pay ten shillings, for every such failure. Provided, That * * * every soldier ordered to go armed to church, neglecting so to do, shall pay five shillings, for every such failure; and every clerk of a court martial failing to deliver the orders of the court martial to the sheriff * * * shall forfeit fifty pounds.

" * * * [E]very officer of the militia * * * shall at all times he acts on duty, at any private or general muster appear well armed, * * * under the penalty of ten shillings for every time that every such officer shall appear without * * * arms. * * *

" * * * And the same fines and penalties shall be paid by the officers and soldiers of the militia, in the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, in case of their failing or refusing to do, and perform the several services, and to appear armed and accoutred in the same manner, as is * * * required, of the officers and soldiers of the militia, of the several counties[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fines and penalties incurred by infants and servants for the breach or neglect of their duty in any particular service * * * required, of them, shall be paid by the parent, guardian or master, respectively; and if the breach or neglect of such servants is not occasioned by their master's influence or direction, then the fines incurred by them, and so paid by the master, shall be repaid to the master by the further service of such servant, after the time they are bound to serve is expired * * * .

" * * * [I]f any sheriff shall refuse to receive the orders of any court martial * * * , or to collect and levy the fines * * * , such sheriff * * * shall be fined for every such refusal, one hundred pounds[.] * * *

" * * * [E]very commission officer in the militia, shall before he acts under or executes any such commission * * * take the oaths appointed by law * * * . And every person accepting a commission in the militia, who shall neglect or refuse to qualify himself * * * by taking * * * the oaths * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds.

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f the chief officer of the militia in any county shall fail to appoint patrollers, * * * such officer shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds, and every person appointed to patrol, * * * failing to do his duty therein, shall pay the sum of five shillings for every failure * * * . And in like manner the chief officer of the militia, in the * * * city of Williamsburg, or borough of Norfolk, shall appoint all the persons of their militia, to patrol * * * ; which officers and patrollers, shall be subject to the same fines and penalties * * * in the case of patrollers in the counties."{EN-1757}

• [1755] "[I]f any officer of the militia, who upon occasion of any invasion or insurrection, shall receive any orders or instructions * * * either for calling together the soldiers, or marching them to any particular place, shall neglect or refuse to execute such orders and instructions, in the best manner he is capable, every such officer so neglecting or refusing, shall respectively forfeit or pay the sums following, that is to say, every lieutenant of a county, the sum of two hundred pounds; every colonel, the sum of two hundred pounds; every lieutenant colonel, the sum of two hundred pounds; every major, the sum of one hundred pounds; every captain, the sum of seventy five pounds; every lieutenant, the sum of fifty pounds; every cornet or ensign, the sum of twenty five pounds; every quartermaster, serjeant, or corporal, twenty pounds. And every soldier who shall be summoned to appear upon any such occasion, and shall fail so to do, or shall fail to bring with him his arms and accoutrements, together with one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f any inferior officer or soldier, during the time the militia shall be employed for suppressing any invasion or insurrection, * * * shall disobey the lawful commands of his superior officer, or behave himself refractorily, or shall be guilty of prophane swearing, drunkenness, or any other such like offence, every person so offending, shall pay such fine * * * as by a court martial * * * shall be inflicted or imposed.

" * * * Provided always, That no such person shall be adjudged to pay more than the sum of five pounds * * * for any one of the said offences[.]"{EN-1758}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f it shall be certified to the court of any county, by order of the court-martial, that any soldier inlisted in * * * [a Militia] company is so poor as not to be able to purchase the arms * * * [required of a Militiaman], then such court shall * * * immediately * * * depute some person to send for the same to Great-Britain * * * ; and if any person shall presume to buy or sell any such arms, * * * then, and in such case, every person so buying or selling shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds * * * .

" * * * [T]he several persons * * * exempted from mustering * * * shall provide arms for the use of the county, city, or borough, wherein they shall respectively reside * * * . And if they shall fail or refuse so to do, * * * then * * * the several courts of the counties * * * are * * * required to levy the value of the same on each of them respectively.

* * * * *

" * * * [P]ersons * * * failing to do their duty * * * shall forfeit and pay the several sums following * * * : The lieutenant of any county * * * failing to appoint a general muster * * * [twice] in every year, * * * shall for every such failure forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds; every county lieutenant, colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major failing to appear at every * * * general muster, or at the court-martial shall forfeit and pay ten pounds for every such failure; every captain who shall fail to muster and exercise his company * * * shall forfeit and pay forty shillings for every time he shall so fail to muster and exercise, and every captain failing to appear at every general muster and court-martial shall forfeit and pay five pounds for every such failure; every lieutenant who shall fail to appear at any muster shall forfeit and pay twenty shillings for every such failure; and every ensign ten shillings for every such failure; and every captain * * * failing to return a list of the persons who shall not appear at musters, or shall appear without arms, powder and ball, shall forfeit and pay ten pounds for every such failure; every clerk failing to appear with arms, powder and ball, * * * shall pay ten shillings for every such failure; every soldier refusing to serve as a serjeant, corporal or drummer * * * shall pay five shillings for every muster he shall so refuse; and every soldier appearing at muster without a firelock well fixed, and a bayonet fitted to the same, shall pay three shillings for every such failure, and for appearing at muster without a double cartouch-box shall pay one shilling, and without three charges of powder shall pay two shiilings [sic] for every such failure, and every soldier failing to appear at muster shall forfeit and pay ten shillings for every such failure. * * * Every soldier ordered to go armed to church neglecting so to do shall pay five shillings for every such failure; and every clerk of a court-martial failing to deliver the orders of the court-martial to the sheriff * * * shall forfeit and pay fifty pounds.

" * * * [E]very officer of the militia * * * shall at all times that he acts on duty at any private or general muster, appear well armed, * * * under the penalty of ten shillings for every time that every such officer shall appear without * * * arms * * * .

" * * * [T]he same fines and penalties shall be paid by the officers and soldiers of the militia in the city of Williamsburg and borough of Norfolk, in case of their failing or refusing to do and perform the several services, and to appear armed and with powder, in the same manner as is * * * required of the officers and soldiers of the militia of the several counties.

* * * * *

"[I]f any exempted overseer or miller shall presume to appear at any muster, or in any muster-field whatsoever on the day on which such muster shall be appointed, the party so offending shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay twenty shillings * * * ; and * * * the fines and penalties incurred by infants and servants for the breach or neglect of their duty in any particular service * * * required of them, shall be paid by the parent, guardian, or master, respectively; and if the breach or neglect of such servants is not occasioned by their masters influence or direction, then the fines incurred by them and so paid by the master, shall be repaid to the master by the further service of such servant, after the time they are bound to serve is expired * * * .

" * * * [I]f any sheriff shall refuse to receive the orders of any court martial offered to him, * * * or to collect and levy the fines * * * , such sheriff * * * shall be fined for every such refusal, one hundred pounds * * * .

" * * * [E]very commission officer in the militia, shall, before he acts under or executes any such commission * * * take the oaths appointed by law * * * . And every person accepting a commission in the militia, who shall neglect or refuse to qualify himself * * * by taking * * * the oaths * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds.

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f the chief officer of the militia in any county, shall fail to appoint patrollers * * * such officer shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds, and every person appointed to patrol * * * failing to do his duty therein shall pay the sum of five shillings, for every such failure * * * ; and in like manner the chief officer of the militia in the * * * city of Williamsburg and borough of Norfolk, shall appoint all the persons of their militia to patrol within the said city and borough, or within half a mile of the limits thereof * * * , which officers and patrollers shall be subject to the same fines and penalities * * * [as] in the case of patrollers in the counties."{EN-1759}

•[1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[A]ny officer receiving information of any invasion or insurrection from any officer of an adjacent county * * * that shall refuse to raise his militia, and call a council of his field officers and captains, for the determination of what is necessary to be done on such information, shall forfeit and pay the sum of two hundred pounds, and every officer summoned to such council * * * that shall refuse to attend * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty pounds.

" * * * [I]f any officer of the militia who upon occasion of any invasion or insurrection, shall receive any orders or informations * * * either for calling together the soldiers or marching them to any particular place, shall neglect or refuse to execute such orders or instructions in the best manner he is capable, every such officer so neglecting or refusing, shall respectively forfeit and pay the sums following, that is to say, every lieutenant of a county the sum of two hundred pounds; every colonel the sum of two hundred pounds; every lieutenant colonel the sum of two hundred pounds; every major the sum of one hundred pounds; every captain the sum of seventy five pounds; every lieutenant the sum of fifty pounds; every ensign the sum of twenty five pounds; every serjeant or corporal twenty pounds; and every soldier who shall be summoned to appear upon any such occasion and shall fail so to do, or shall fail to bring with him his arms, with one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, or shall refuse to march, shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [I]f any inferior officer or soldier during the time the militia shall be employed for suppressing any invasion or insurrection * * * shall disobey the lawful commands of his superior officer, or behave himself refractorily, every officer so offending shall pay such fine, not exceeding fifty pounds; and every soldier so offending shall pay such fine, not exceeding five pounds, as by a court martial * * * shall be imposed; * * * and if any inferior officer or soldier during the time the militia shall be employed as aforesaid, shall be guilty of prophane swearing, drunkenness, or any other like offence, every person so offending shall * * * pay five shillings for every offence, so that the same at any one time doth not exceed twenty shillings[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]o the end a sufficient number of men may be appointed for guarding the batteries erected in the several rivers of this dominion, and to assist in the better managing the great guns there mounted, when occasion shall be, It is hereby further enacted, That it shall * * * be lawful for the governor * * * to appoint and assign such a number of the militia as he shall think fit to attend the said batteries, * * * which number of the militia shall be drafted out of any of the militia of the county by the commanding officer of such county in which such battery is or shall be erected, and shall be exempted from all private musters, except at such battery only during their attendance at such battery; and if any soldier drafted * * * shall refuse to enter upon the said service, or shall refuse to obey the commands and orders of the commanding officer at such battery, every soldier so offending shall forfeit and pay three pounds, * * * for every such refusal[.]"{EN-1760}

• [1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he several persons herein aftermentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective counties * * * : All his majesty's justices of the peace * * * (except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia * * *) all persons bred to and actually practising physick or surgery, and all inspectors at the publick warehouses appointed for the inspection of tobacco; and they shall not be subject or liable to any fine, forfeiture or penalty, for absenting themselves from the same.

"* * * Provided always, That the persons so exempted from mustering shall provide complete sets of arms * * * required for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside; and if they shall fail or refuse so to do, * * * then * * * the courts * * * are hereby empowered and required, to levy the value of such arms on each of them respectively.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very person so exempted shall always keep in his house or place of abode such arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, as are * * * required to be kept by the militia * * * ; and if he shall fail or refuse so to do he shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds * * * : And such exempts shall also, in case of any invasion or insurrection, appear with their arms and ammunition * * * , and be subject to * * * the same fines, forfeitures and penalties, for non-appearance or misbehaviour, * * * as the other militia * * * .

" * * * [I]f any soldier shall at any general or private muster refuse to perform the command of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at * * * [a] court-martial, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of forty shillings current money[.]"{EN-1761}

• [1766] "[I]t shall and may be lawful for the chief officer of the militia in each county * * * to appoint an officer and * * * men of the militia * * * once in every month, or oftener if * * * required * * * , to patrol and visit all negro quarters and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons * * * .

" * * * [I]f the chief officer of the militia, in any county, shall fail to appoint patrollers * * * , such officer shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds; and every person appointed to patrol * * * , failing to do his duty * * * , shall pay the sum of twenty shillings for every failure[.]"{EN-1762}

• [1766 and 1771] "The * * * chief commanding officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons of the people called Quakers, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within his county, under the command of such captain as he shall think fit; and if upon any invasion or insurrection the militia * * * to which such Quakers belong, shall be drawn out into actual service, and any Quaker so inlisted shall refuse to serve or provide an able and sufficient

substitute in his room, if thereto required * * * every Quaker so refusing * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds[.]"{EN-1763}

• [1775] "[E]very officer of minute-men who shall absent himself either from battalion duty or the private musters, in their counties, * * * shall be subject to the following fines, to wit: The colonel, for every day's absence from battalion duty thirty shillings; the lieutenant-colonel, twenty five shillings; the major, twenty shillings; a captain, twelve shillings; a lieutenant, eight shillings; an[ ] ensign, six shillings; a serjeant, five shillings; a corporal, drummer, and fifer, four shillings; and each private minute-man three shillings; an adjutant, twenty shillings; a quarter-master, twelve shillings; and a serjeant-major, six shillings. And for non-attendance at private musters, * * * the officers and minute-men shall, for every day's absence, be subject to the following fines, to wit: a captain, twelve shillings; a lieutenant, eight shillings; an[ ] ensign, six shillings; a serjeant, five shillings; a corporal, drummer, and fifer, four shillings; and each private minute-man three shillings. * * * And if any officer or soldier [among the Minutemen], during the time of his attendance on training duty, in battalion or companies, * * * shall refuse to obey the commands of his superiour officer, or behave himself mutinously or refractorily, or shall in any other manner transgress the rules of good order and decency, every such offender shall or may be * * * fined, in any sum not exceeding one month's pay, as shall be determined by the judgment of a court-martial * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very officer of the minute-men receiving notice from any other officer of the minute-men * * * of any invasion or insurrection, shall forthwith raise the men under his command, and send intelligence to the commanding-officer of the minute-men of that county, and also the commanding-officer of the militia, or, being himself commanding-officer of the minute-men of that county, shall immediately raise the men under his command, and proceed to oppose the enemy, taking care to despatch intelligence to the commanding-officer of the district, and also to the officer of the minute-men in the next adjacent county, who is to proceed in the same manner as the officer first receiving such intelligence is directed to do.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very officer or militia man, and every officer and minute-man, who shall refuse, or unreasonably delay, conforming to the above directions, in every particular, shall, for every refusal or delay, forfeit and pay the several sums following, to wit: Every lieutenant of a county the sum of two hundred pounds, every colonel two hundred pounds, every lieutenant-colonel (either of the minute-men or militia) the sum of two hundred pounds, every major of the minute-men or militia the sum of one hundred pounds, every captain the sum of seventy five pounds, every lieutenant the sum of fifty pounds, every ensign the sum of ten pounds, every serjeant and corporal the sum of five pounds; and every soldier or minute-man failing to appear, and not bringing with him his arms, shall forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very county-lieutenant * * * failing to appoint a general muster * * * shall forfeit and pay one hundred pounds; and every colonel, lieutenant-colonel, or major, failing to appear with their proper arms at any general muster, shall forfeit and pay ten pounds; and every captain failing to muster and exercise his company * * * shall forfeit and pay forty shillings for every neglect; and failing to appear at any general muster, shall forfeit and pay fifty shillings. Every lieutenant failing to appear at any muster twenty shillings, and every ensign, for the like failure, the sum of twenty shillings; and every soldier not appearing, or appearing without proper arms, five shillings; or for not bringing with him three charges of powder and ball, three shillings; or failing to bring into the field, when required by his commanding officer, one pound of powder, and four pounds of ball, five shillings. And every captain * * * , failing to return the list of the persons who shall not appear at muster to the courts-martial, or who shall appear without proper arms, powder, and ball, shall forfeit and pay ten pounds * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very officer of the militia * * * shall, at all times that he acts on duty, at any private or general muster, appear armed in the following manner, that is to say: every county lieutenant, colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major, with a sword, and every captain and lieutenant with a fire-lock and bayonet, and a sword, and three charges of powder and ball; every ensign with a sword; every serjeant and corporal with a sword and halberd, under the penalty of twenty shillings * * * .

" * * * [T]he soldiers shall be allowed six months after enlisting to provide themselves with arms, and in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have, under the penalty of five shillings, to be inflicted by a court-martial * * * .

" * * * [A]ll fines and penalties incurred by infants or servants, for breach or neglect of duty in any particular service by this ordinance required of them, shall be paid by the parent, guardian, or master, of such infant or servant; and if the breach or neglect of such servants is not occasioned by their masters influence or direction, then the fines incurred by them, and so paid by their masters, shall be repaid to their masters, by the farther service of such servants after the times they are bound to serve are expired.

"And * * * if any collector, appointed by a court-martial, shall refuse to collect the fines imposed by such court-martial, * * * he shall forfeit and pay one hundred pounds; and if any collector refuses, or unreasonably delays, to pay all fines by him collected * * * , he shall forfeit and pay double the amount thereof.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]his ordinance shall, by command of each colonel, be publickly read at the head of his regiment, as soon as the same is embodied and formed, and once in six months thereafter, under the penalty of one hundred pounds, to be paid by such colonel for every neglect; and the same shall also be publickly read at every meeting of a battalion of the minute-men in each district, and at every general muster, by the order of the colonel, county-lieutenant, or chief officer then present, under the penalty of one hundred pounds, to be paid by any such officer for every neglect."{EN-1764}

•[1775] "[E]ach minute-man who shall furnish himself with a good musket, or other gun, to be approved of by his captain, shall be allowed by the publick ten shillings per annum, as a consideration for the use thereof, and shall be liable to a fine of twenty shillings for not appearing with the same when called on duty.

* * * * *

" * * * [N]o dissenting minister, who is not duly licensed * * * , shall be exempted from bearing arms in the militia * * * ; and * * * overseers, heretofore exempted, shall be obliged to furnish themselves with arms and ammunition, in the same manner as the militia men, and shall be obliged to act as patrollers when thereto required by the commanding officer of the militia of the county, or corporation, wherein they reside; and if any militia man, or overseer, shall neglect or refuse so to do, he or they so refusing shall be liable to a fine of five shillings for every neglect or refusal[.]"{EN-1765}

•[1777] "[T]he captains * * * shall have power to order * * * their serjeants * * * to give notice to every person belonging to the company of the time and place of * * * [each] general or private muster * * * ; and if any serjeant, so appointed, shall fail in his duty, he shall forfeit and pay forty shillings for every such failure. * * * If any soldier be certified to the court martial to be so poor that he cannot purchase * * * arms [required of Militiamen], the * * * court[-martial] shall cause them to be procured at the expense of the publick, * * * which arms shall be delivered to such poor person to be used at musters, but shall continue the property of the county; and if any soldier shall sell or conceal such arms, the seller or concealer, and purchaser, shall each of them forfeit the sum of six pounds. * * *

"And if any poor soldier shall remove out of the county, and carry his arms with him, he shall incur the same penalty as if he had sold such arms * * * .

" * * * Every captain * * * shall, at every general muster, make up and report to his county lieutenant a state of the company last assigned to him, noting therein such as are dead, removed, or exempted, and adding the names of such persons, not already enrolled, as are within the extent of his company, and ought to be enrolled; and, on failure to make such report, shall forfeit five pounds. For failing to qualify himself to a commission at the first or second court which shall be held, after accepting the same, every officer shall forfeit five pounds. For failing to enrol the militia, or to appoint a general muster, the county lieutenant * * * shall forfeit one hundred pounds. For not appointing a private muster, the captain * * * shall pay forty shillings. For failing to appear at any general muster properly armed, or at any court martial, every county lieutenant and field officer shall pay ten pounds. For failing to appear at any court martial, every captain shall pay forty shillings. For failing to appear at any general or private muster properly armed or accoutred, every captain shall forfeit forty shillings, every lieutenant or ensign twenty shillings, every non-commissioned officer or soldier five shillings. For not returning to the next court martial a true list of delinquents in his company, every captain * * * shall forfeit ten pounds. Every officer failing to furnish himself with one pound of powder shall forfeit and pay ten shillings, and the same for failing to furnish himself with four pounds of ball; and every soldier failing therein shall likewise be liable for the same penalties, which penalties, where incurred by infants, shall be paid by the parent or guardian, and where incurred by servants shall be paid by the master, who, if such delinquency were without his influence or direction, may retain so much out of the hire of such servant, or be compensated by farther service, to be ascertained by the county court.

* * * * *

" * * * [I]t shall * * * be lawful for the chief officer of the militia in every county * * * , yearly, to appoint an officer, and so many men of the militia as to him shall appear to be necessary * * * , to patrol and visit all negro quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons * * * .

" * * * And every commanding officer of the militia failing to appoint patrollers * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty pounds; and every person appointed to patrol * * * , and failing to do his duty, shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty shillings for every such failure * * * .

* * * * *

"This act shall be read to every company of the militia, by order of the captain * * * , at the first muster next succeeding every general muster, on penalty of five pounds for every omission."{EN-1766}

• [1777] "[F]or the more speedy and certain completion of the * * * new battalions, every county, city, and borough [with certain exceptions] * * * , in case the * * * officers by them appointed * * * shall not * * * enlist the quota of men allotted to [them]* * * , shall make up such deficiency by draughts * * * from their respective militias * * * .

" * * * And every commanding officer failing to summon the field officers and magistrates [for that purpose] * * * shall forfeit and pay five hundred pounds; and every field officer and magistrate failing to attend * * * shall for each failure * * * forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred pounds * * * over and above the fines already imposed by the militia and invasion laws."{EN-1767}

• [1779] "Every commanding officer of a battalion for refusing or neglecting to turn out, train, and exercise his battalion, or for refusing or neglecting to perform any of the other duties required by the * * * [Militia] acts; or who shall neglect to examine the returns and levy the fines upon delinquents, shall forfeit and pay the sum of two hundred and fifty pounds. Every county lieutenant or next commanding officer, the sum of two hundred and fifty pounds. Every other field officer, the sum of one hundred pounds. Every captain, the sum of fifty pounds. And every lieutenant or ensign, the sum of twenty five pounds. Every non-commissioned officer or private who shall neglect or refuse to attend any general or private muster * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of three pounds for every offence, except as is excepted by the * * * [Militia] acts. Every non-commissioned officer or private, who at any muster shall not obey the lawful commands of his superiour officer, or shall behave mutinously, riotously, get drunk or not demean himself as a non-commissioned officer or soldier, * * * shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding ten pounds. * * * Every field officer or inferiour commissioned officer refusing or neglecting to obey the lawful commands of his superiour officer, misbehaving when on duty, or not demeaning himself as an officer, * * * upon conviction of any such offence, shall be fined at the discretion of * * * [the] court[-martial]. * * * And * * * if at any time it shall be necessary to call the militia together for the purpose of drafting men for the continental army or any other purpose, the officers and soldiers shall be subject to the same fines and penalties for not appearing * * * as for not appearing at general musters. * * *

" * * * [T]his act shall be publickly read at the head of each company by the * * * commanding officer thereof, within one month after receiving the same, under the penalty of twenty pounds."{EN-1768}

• [1780] "[W]hereas it has been a practice of many tradesmen to entice their apprentices to enlist as soldiers, and to sell them as substitutes for large sums of money; Be it enacted, That if any tradesman or other person to whom any infant is, or shall be bound as an apprentice, shall directly or indirectly take or receive, or agree to take or receive any money or other gratuity in consideration of such apprentice, his enlisting as a soldier or sailor in any corps whatsoever, every such tradesman or person so offending, not being an able bodied man under the age of fifty years, shall forfeit and pay double the sum of money or worth of such other gratuity so taken, received, or agreed for * * * .

"And whereas a practice has prevailed of enlisting men for small bounties and afterwards selling them * * * for higher bounties * * * ; Be it enacted, That every person guilty of such offence, shall be subject to the same penalties as tradesmen and others enlisting or selling their apprentices[.]"{EN-1769}

• [1781] "[F]or the due conviction of all such delinquents [that is, deserters], a court-martial shall * * * be held * * * under the penalty of ten thousand pounds of tobacco on such county lieutenant or commanding officer neglecting to order the same, and of five thousand pounds of tobacco upon every member of such court failing to attend[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [F]or the due promulgation of this act and the better information of the militia, Be it * * * enacted, That such a number of printed copies of this act * * * as the governor may deem necessary, shall be with all possible expedition transmitted to each county in this commonwealth for the use of the militia officers therein, and shall by such officers be read to their respective militias at every general and petty muster. Each county lieutenant failing herein shall for every offence forfeit and pay the sum of five thousand pounds of tobacco; each field officer three thousand; and each captain two thousand pounds of tobacco.

"And be it farther enacted, That all the penalties inflicted by the [existing laws to regulate and discipline the militia and to provide against invasions and insurrections] * * * shall cease, and in lieu thereof there shall be inflicted an additional penalty in the proportion of ten for one upon every officer, non-commissioned officer and private, for neglect or failure of duty therein prescribed[.]"{EN-1770}

• [1782] "[T]he governor shall cause to be delivered to the * * * commanding officers of the militia of such counties as are most exposed to the incursions of the enemy, and to the officers of the militia of the city of Williamsburg, and borough of Norfolk, such a number of arms as he may think necessary * * * ; who, on having served their tour of duty, shall return their arms, in good order, * * * to be delivered in like manner to such of the militia as stand next in rotation.

" * * * [T]he penalties and forfeitures for every neglect of duty in any officer of the militia, or militia-man, whether of the cavalry or infantry, shall be the same * * * as is directed and prescribed by [the Militia Act of 1777] * * * .

" * * * [E]very militia-man to whom arms shall be delivered * * * , who shall neglect or refuse to return the same * * * , shall forfeit and pay the sum of twelve pounds[.]"{EN-1771}

• [1784 and 1785] "Any officer ordered * * * to give * * * notices [of general and private musters], failing therein, shall, for every offence, forfeit and pay five pounds; and every sergeant so failing, shall forfeit and pay one pound for every such failure * * * . If any private shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court[-martial] * * * appointed for trying delinquencies * * * , that he is so poor that he cannot purchase the arms * * * required, such court shall cause them to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents. The arms so purchased * * * the captain of the company to which such poor private may belong * * * shall deliver * * * to the private, but they shall continue the property of the county; and if any private shall sell or conceal the same, the seller, concealer, and purchaser, shall each forfeit and pay four pounds * * * . And if any poor private shall remove out of the county, and carry such arms with him, he shall incur the same penalty as if he had sold them.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he commanding officer of the militia in every county, shall * * * in every year, appoint an officer, and so many men of the militia as to him shall appear necessary * * * to patrole and visit all negro quarters, and other places suspected of entertaining unlawful assemblies of slaves, servants, or other disorderly persons * * * . And every commanding officer failing to appoint patrollers * * * shall forfeit and pay ten pounds; and every person appointed to patrole, failing to do his duty, shall forfeit and pay twenty shillings for every such failure * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he following forfeitures and penalties shall be incurred for delinquencies, viz. By the county lieutenant or commanding officer of a county, for failing to take any oath, to summon any court or board, to attend any court or board, to transmit any recommendation of an officer * * * to the governor, to deliver any commission * * * , to appoint a general muster, to attend such muster armed as required, to report delinquencies, to make a general return of his militia to the governor * * * shall, for each and every such offence or neglect, forfeit and pay twenty pounds; failing to send into actual service any militia called for by the governor, or to turn out his militia upon an invasion or insurrection of his county, fifty pounds: By a lieutenant colonel commandant[954], for failing to take any oath, to attend any court or board, to appoint a regimental muster, to give notice of a general muster, to examine his regiment, to report delinquencies, or to make any return as directed * * * , he shall forfeit and pay for each and every offence or neglect, ten pounds; failing to call forth from his regiment, with due dispatch, any detachment of men and officers, armed and equipped, as shall * * * be required by the commanding officer, on any call from the governor, invasion of, or insurrection in his county, or requisition of a neighbouring county, twenty-five pounds: By a major [955] for failing to take any oath, to attend any court or board, to attend any muster armed * * * , he shall for each and every such offence or neglect, forfeit and pay eight pounds; failing to repair to his rendezvous when summoned upon any call of the governor, invasion of or insurrection in the county, or requisition of the commander of a neighbouring county, he shall forfeit and pay sixteen pounds: By a captain, for failing to take any oath, to attend any court, to enroll his company, to appoint private musters, to give notice of a general or [954] In the Act of 1785, this position was filled by a Colonel.

---

[955] In the Act of 1785, this position was filled by a Lieutenant Colonel or a Major.

regimental muster, to attend any muster armed, to call his roll, examine his company, and report delinquencies, to make any return as is directed * * * he shall forfeit and pay for each and every such offence and neglect, six pounds; failing to call forth such officers and men, as the commanding officer shall * * * order from his company, upon any call from the governor, invasion of or insurrection in the county, or requisition from an adjacent county, or failing on any such occasion to repair to the place of rendezvous, he shall forfeit and pay twelve pounds: By a subaltern officer, for failing to take any oath, to attend any court or muster armed as directed, for each of the said offences he shall forfeit and pay three pounds; failing to repair to his place of rendezvous armed as required, when ordered upon any call from the governor, invasion of or insurrection in the county, or requisition from a neighbouring county, he shall forfeit and pay six pounds. * * * By a non-commissioned officer or soldier, for failing to attend at any muster, with the arms, ammunition, and equipments, as directed * * * , he shall forfeit and pay ten shillings; failing to repair to his rendezvous, when ordered upon any call from the governor, invasion of or insurrection in the county, or requisition from a neighbouring county, he shall forfeit and pay two pounds."{EN-1772}

• [1786] "[A]ny officer of the militia, called into actual service, neglecting or refusing to do his duty, shall * * * be amerced at the discretion of a court martial, that is to say, a county lieutenant in any sum not exceeding one hundred and fifty pounds; a colonel or lieutenant colonel not exceeding one hundred pounds; a major not exceeding seventy five pounds; a captain not exceeding fifty pounds; a lieutenant or ensign in any sum not exceeding forty pounds; and non-commissioned officers or privates in like manner refusing or neglecting shall also be fined * * * in any sum not exceeding twenty pounds each[.]"{EN-1773}

b. All of these fines, of course, were assessed against members of the Militia for neglect of or refusal to perform various affirmative duties. Fines were also assessed, though, against individuals whom the statutes exempted from most Militia duties, but who nonetheless chose not to avail themselves of those exemptions:

• [1705] "[I]f any overseer * * * exempted from being listed shall appear at any muster, either of horse or foot, he shall appear in arms fit for exercise, and shall perform his duty as other private soldiers do, on pain of paying the fine inflicted * * * upon such persons as do not provide troopers, arms and other accoutrements."{EN-1774}

• [1723] "[I]f an exempted overseer, or miller * * * shall presume to appear at any muster whatsoever, the party so offending, shall for every such offence, forfeit and pay one hundred pounds of tobacco, and shall immediately give security to the * * * commanding officer, for paiment of the same[.]"{EN-1775}

> • [1738, 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, 1771, and 1775] "[I]f any exempted overseer or miller, shall presume to appear at any muster, or in any muster-field whatsoever, on the day on which such muster shall be appointed; the party so offending, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay ten shillings, or one hundred pounds of tobacco;[956] to be assessed upon him by the next court martial[.]"{EN-1776}

These fines might at first appear perverse, because they penalized individuals who waived what seemed to be personal statutory benefits. That, however, would be a superficial assessment of the situation. At base, the ostensibly personal benefits these exemptions provided actually embodied and facilitated fulfillment of particularly important duties to the community, for the diligent performance of which the individuals were granted exemptions from other duties in the Militia that would have been imposed upon them. In any largely agricultural society in pre-constitutional times, a mill—along with the skilled miller who operated it—was central to economic activity. So millers were exempted from normal Militia duties, because the timely performance of their functions was vital to economic "homeland security". Their operations of their mills were accepted as the equivalent (or perhaps more than the equivalent) of any normal duties they might have performed as rank-and-file Militiamen. Similarly, in a community where agriculture was largely based upon large plantations worked by slave labor, overseers were central, not only to promote economic activity, but also to police the slaves. Militia "slave patrols" were mounted for general oversight of the bondsmen.[957] But, in the nature of things, these patrols could not maintain the close watch over the slaves that was necessary in order to maintain proper surveillance, enforce discipline, and maximize productivity on a day-to-day and even an hour-by-hour basis. Overseers did that. So, for overseers to appear at Militia musters contradicted the very purposes of their exemptions, and to some significant degrees jeopardized the community's economic, and even physical, security. Thus, millers and overseers were granted exemptions to work at their trades in the public interest, not to forsake their work by attending musters as idle spectators for their own personal amusement—and they were justifiably punished if they indulged in the latter activity at the expense of the former.

Of course, troublesome spectators in general fared no better than millers and overseers who proved derelict in their particular duties:

> [1779] "If any by-stander interrupt, molest, or insult any officer of soldier when on duty, or misbehave before any court-martial, he * * * shall be fined in any sum not exceeding ten pounds."{EN-1777}

---

[956] The fine was restricted to ten shillings in 1755, then raised to twenty shillings in 1757.

[957] See ante, at 339-343 and 392-395, and post, at 718-723.

(Actually, this was not the worst of such spectators' possible worries, as they could have been arrested, as well as merely fined, for their misbehavior.[958]) These irksome "by-stander[s]" might have included individuals exempted from Militia service in the Locality, because they were too old, too young, not able-bodied, or merely transient. They might have included individuals not required to participate in musters at all, such as women, people of color (except those who were "to be emploied as drummers or trumpeters" or "to do the duty of pioneers, or * * * other servile labor"),{EN-1778} or perhaps Militiamen from jurisdictions other than those which were conducting the private musters or courts-martial at issue. Or they might have included individuals who enjoyed some specific statutory exemptions from mustering, such as public officials or practitioners of some critical trade or profession (other than millers and overseers). In any event, the seriousness of Militia training required that their interference be punished.

c. Although misbehavior was adjudicated and fines were assessed through Militia courts-martial, normal civil proceedings usually were employed to collect those judgements:

> • [1643] "[M]asters of every family shall bring with them to church on Sondays one fixed and serviceable gun with sufficient powder and shott vpon penalty of ten pounds of tobacco for every master of a family so offending to be disposed of by the churchwardens who shall leavy it by distresse[.]"{EN-1779}
>
> • [1691] The Governor and his Council ordered that "y^e^ Comanders in Cheif are to cause * * * delinquents to be fined as y^e^ Law provides * * * and y^e^ Sherrives of y^e^ Severall Counties are * * * Strictly required to Collect all Such fines as shall be turn'd to him and on refusall to distrain for them as y^e^ Law provides".{EN-1780}
>
> • [1705] "That the severall fines and penaltys * * * which the * * * ffield officers * * * shall * * * order and direct, be levyed by distress and sale of the goods and chattles belonging to the defaulter or offender by warrant * * * to the sheriff (in case the defaulter or offender refuse to pay the same in specie * * * without further process)[.]"{EN-1781}
>
> • [1723] "[W]here any person on whom any fine shall be laid or assessed * * * shall fail or refuse to pay the same to the sheriff, in specie, * * * the sheriff * * * [may] levy the same by distress and sale of the offender's goods * * * . And if * * * the sheriff * * * can find no goods whereon to make distress, * * * the sheriff * * * [shall] cause the body of the said offender to be committed to the county goal, without bail or mainprize, until he shall satisfy the same fine, and all fees incident, in the same manner, as in executions served at common law."{EN-1782}

---

[958] See ante, at 663-664.

• [1738] "[F]or settling the fines to be inflicted upon all persons who shall fail to do their duty, * * * and on all other delinquents * * * , Be it * * * enacted * * * , That the several persons herein after mentioned, for such failure, shall forfeit and pay * * * [certain] sums * * * : To be recovered, with costs, by action for debt, or information, in any court of record, in this colony[.]"{EN-1783}

• [1748 and 1753] After listing the fines applicable to officers and soldiers in the Militia for various derelictions of duty, these statutes provided that "one moiety of all which forfeitures shall go * * * for and towards the better supplying with arms that county where such offence shall be committed, and the other moiety to him or them that will inform or sue for the same, to be recovered with costs, by action of debt, or information, in any court of record wherein the same shall be cognizable".{EN-1784}

• [1755] "[I]f it shall be made to appear to the court of any county * * * that any soldier inlisted in the foot, is so poor, as not to be able to purchase the arms [required of a Militiaman] * * * ; then such court shall * * * depute some person to send for the same to England * * * ; and if any person shall presume to buy or sell any such arms * * * , then and in such case, every person so buying or selling, shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds, to be recovered with costs by information before the court of the county to which the arms shall belong, or in the court of the county wherein the offender or offenders shall reside[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he field officers and captains of every county * * * [shall] hold a court martial * * * to enquire * * * of all delinquents * * * : And such court shall * * * order the fines * * * to be levied upon all delinquents * * * . And after the holding of every * * * court[-martial], * * * the sheriff of the county * * * [shall] demand and receive the money or tobacco * * * charged, of the [delinquents] * * * and in case of nonpayment * * * levy the same by distress and the sale of the goods of the person refusing according to the directions of the laws now in force, enabling the sale of goods distrained for rent; and where any delinquent shall remove out of the county, before he hath paid and satisfied all fines laid on him, * * * and shall not leave sufficient effects in the county, to satisfy the same, then the * * * clerk shall send copies of the * * * orders against such delinquents to the sheriff of the county, into which he or they shall be removed, and such sheriff is * * * required to collect, levy and account for the same * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fines and penalties incurred by infants and servants for the breach or neglect of their duty in any particular service * * * shall be paid by the parent, guardian or master, respectively; and if the breach or neglect of such servants is not occasioned by their master's influence or direction, then the fines incurred by them and so paid by the master, shall be repaid to the master by the further service of such servant, after the time they are bound to serve is expired; which shall be determined by the county court or court of Hustings, in the city of Williamsburg or borough of Norfolk, wherein either of the parties reside, upon complaint made to them thereof, by such master.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fine * * * imposed on the * * * chief commanding officer of the militia, for neglecting to order general musters, * * * shall * * * be recovered with costs by action of debt or information, in any court of record."{EN-1785}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f it shall be certified to the court of any county, by order of the court-martial, that any soldier inlisted in * * * [a Militia] company is so poor as not to be able to purchase the arms [required of a Militiaman] * * * , then such court shall * * * immediately * * * depute some person to send for the same to Great-Britain * * * ; and if any person shall presume to buy or sell any such arms, * * * then, and in such case, every person so buying or selling shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds, to be recovered, with costs, by information, before the court of the county to which the arms shall belong, or in the court of the county wherein the offender or offenders shall reside[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he field officers and captains of every county * * * shall * * * order the fines * * * to be levied upon all delinquents * * * : And * * * the sheriff of the county * * * is * * * required to demand and receive the money * * * charged of the [delinquent] * * * , and in case of non-payment * * * to levy the same by distress and sale of the goods of the person refusing, according to the directions of the laws now in force enabling the sale of goods distrained for rent; and where any delinquent shall move out of the county before he hath paid and satisfied all fines laid on him * * * and shall not leave sufficient effects in the county to satisfy the same, then the * * * clerk shall send copies of the * * * orders against such delinquents to the sheriff of the county into which he or they shall be removed, and such sheriff is hereby impowered and required to collect, levy and account for the same in the manner herein before directed.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fines and penalties incurred by infants and servants for the breach or neglect of their duty in any particular service * * * shall be paid by the parent, guardian, or master, respectively; and if the breach or neglect of such servants is not occasioned by their masters influence or direction, then the fines incurred by them and so paid by the master, shall be repaid to the master by the further service of such servant, after the time they are bound to serve is expired, which shall be determined by the county court, or the court of Hustings in the city of Williamsburg or borough of Norfolk, wherein either of the parties reside, upon complaint made to them thereof by such master.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fine * * * imposed on the * * * chief commanding officer of the militia for neglecting to order general musters * * * shall and may be recovered with costs, by action of debt or information, in any court of record."{EN-1786}

• [1757, 1758, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1769, and 1772]. "[A]ll the fines inflicted by this act, and not otherwise directed, shall be one half * * * for and towards supplying with arms the militia of the county to which the offender belongs, and the other half to the informer, to be recovered with costs by action of debt or information in any court of record within this dominion."{EN-1787}

• [1766 and 1771] "[T]he * * * chief commanding officer of the militia in every county shall list all male persons of the people called Quakers, above the age of eighteen years, and under the age of sixty years, within his county * * * ; and if upon any invasion or insurrection the militia of the counties to which such Quakers belong, shall be drawn out into actual service, and any Quaker so inlisted shall refuse to serve or provide an able and sufficient substitute in his room, * * * every Quaker so refusing * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten pounds; to be recovered before any justice of the peace of the county, upon the complaint of such * * * chief officer, and to be levied by distress and sale of the estate of the Quaker so refusing[.]"{EN-1788}

• [1775] "[T]he court-martial of each county and corporation shall * * * appoint a collector of all fines to be assessed at each sitting of such court * * * ; and in case of non-payment * * * , to levy the same by distress and sale of the goods of the person refusing, according to the laws enabling the sale of goods distrained for rent."{EN-1789}

• [1777] "[A]ll fines shall be collected by the sheriff of the county, who shall have power to levy the same in like manner * * * as in the case of execution by fieri facias; and on failing * * * or refusing to make such collection, shall be held accountable for the same, to be recovered with costs, before any court of record, by action, to be brought in the name of the members of * * * [the] court martial[.]"{EN-1790}

• [1782] "[E]ach class or district [of the Militia in each county] * * * shall * * * enlist * * * one man * * * to serve as a soldier in the continental army for three years or during the war, * * * or pay a sum equal to one eighth part of the taxes payable by the several persons of which such class shall consist * * * to such person as they * * * shall appoint to receive the same * * * . And in case of failure of the payment of such sum or delivering such soldier * * * the collector of each district * * * [shall] levy the sums due from the * * * delinquents * * * by distress and sale of their goods and chattels, in the same manner as is by law directed in the case of county or parish levies[.]"{EN-1791}

• [1784 and 1785] "All fines to be assessed by virtue of this act, shall be collected by the sheriff of the county * * * . And should any person so charged with fines, fail to make payment * * * , the sheriff is * * * authorized to make distress and sale therefor, in the same manner as is directed in the collection of taxes."{EN-1792}

In some instances, fines were assessed in principle against individuals, but collected in practice from the groups to which those individuals belonged, not unlike a tax:

• [1780] "[A]ny Quaker or Menonist who shall be * * * drafted, shall be discharged from personal service, and * * * the commanding officer * * * is * * * required to employ any two or more discreet persons, to procure on the best terms they can, a proper substitute or substitutes to serve in his or their room, and to adjust and divide the charge thereof among all the * * * Quakers or Menonists, in the division to which such draft belongs, in proportion to their assessable property, and to authorize the sheriff of the county * * * to levy such charge by distress in case of any member refusing or neglecting to make payment[.]"{EN-1793}

• [1781] "[W]here any quaker or menonist shall be allotted to any division of the militia, who is to perform the succeeding tour of duty, he shall not be compelled personally to serve the same, but * * * the commanding officer * * * [may] cause to be levied on all the society of quakers and menonists in such county according to their assessable property, by warrant * * * directed to the sheriff * * * , such sum * * * of money as he shall think sufficient to procure a substitute for each quaker or menonist whose tour of duty it is, and the money when collected shall be deposited in the hands of the commissioners of the money tax, who shall pay the same * * * to such substitute * * * as may be employed for such quaker or menonist, and the overplus (if any) shall be returned to the said quakers or menonists in equal proportion to their different advancements or credited in their next money tax * * * . Any sheriff * * * failing to perform his duty * * * shall forfeit and pay five thousand pounds of tobacco * * * . The fines thus recovered shall go towards satisfying the quakers or menonists who shall be aggrieved thereby, and the overplus towards enlisting a soldier to serve in the continental army."{EN-1794}

• [1782] "[W]here any quaker or menonist shall be subjected to a tour of duty in consequence of the militia or invasion law, such quaker or menonist shall not be compelled to perform such duty, but the * * * commanding officer of the militia, shall * * * procure a substitute upon the best terms possible, * * * and the consideration agreed to pay him * * * shall in the first instance be against the estate of each quaker or

> menonist so draughted * * * , to be levied on their lands, goods, and chattels * * * ; and i[f] any of the said quakers or menonists so draughted, shall not have sufficient property on which a levy can be made, then * * * such substitute money, shall be levied on the property of all the quakers and menonists in the said county, that are subject to the militia service, each to pay in proportion to his taxable property."{EN-1795}

d. In addition to punishing past defaulters and deterring future derelictions of duty—

(1) A fine could actually benefit the individual paying it. As explained heretofore, in certain instances an individual Militiaman could choose to pay a fine as a means of effectively granting himself an exemption from some routine or extraordinary duty.[959] (Of course, no one sought such a self-generated exemption by submitting to corporal punishment or imprisonment, when those were possible penalties for misbehavior.) Such practical exemptions-in-fact were not free to the Militiamen who employed them; but presumably in any particular instance the value of the benefit exceeded its cost.

(2) Besides being of value to some Militiamen as individuals, fines served not only the disciplinary but also the pecuniary interests of the Militia as a whole, because the proceeds were applied to the purchase of firearms, ammunition, and other necessary equipment for Local units:

> • [1659 and 1662] "BEE it enacted that a provident supplie be made of gunn powder and shott to our owne people, and this strictly to bee lookt to by the officers of the militia, (vizt.) That every man able to beare armes have in his house a fixt gunn two pounds of powder and eight pound of shott at least which are to be provided by every man for his family * * * , and whosoever shall faile of makeing such provision to be fined ffiftie pounds of tobacco to bee laied out by the county courts for a common stock of amunition for the county."{EN-1796}
>
> • [1666] "WHEREAS the officers of the militia have complained that divers refractory persons have in contempt of the authority impowring them, and to the ruyne of all military discipline refused to appeare upon the dayes of exercise * * * , It is enacted * * * that every person soe neglecting to appeare, shall for every such neglect be amerced and fined one hundred pounds of tobacco, to be disposed of by the militia to the use of the regiment[.]"{EN-1797}
>
> • [1684] "[E]very trooper, failing to supply himselfe * * * with * * * arms and furniture, and not * * * keeping the same well fixt, shall forfeite four hundred pounds of tobacco * * * , for the use of the county in which the delinquent shall live, towards the provideing of colours,

---

[959] See ante, at 635-638.

drums and trumpetts therein, and every foot souldier soe failing to provide himselfe * * * , and not keeping the same well fixt, shall forfeit two hundred pounds of tobacco * * * for the use aforesaid[.]"{EN-1798}

• [1690] The Governor and his Council "Ord^{r}d * * * that all fines of Delinquents be Imployed for the buying of Drums, Armes and Amunition * * * and that the Offic^{rs} at the heads of their Companies acquaint the Soldiers that all fines shall be [so] Imployed[.]"{EN-1799}

• [1691] "[Y]^{e} Comanders in Cheif are to cause * * * delinquents to be fined as y^{e} Law provides, and to cause y^{e} fines to be imployed for y^{e} buying armes amunicon &c as y^{e} Law directs[.]"{EN-1800}

• [1691] The Governor and his Council "Ordered that the respective Comanders in Cheife in this Colony, doe forthwith issue their Orders, requireing that all fines on delinquent Souldiers be levied according to Law, and disposed of, as is directed[.]"{EN-1801}

• [1692] "It being represented to [the Governor and Council] * * * that the fines on delinquent Soldiers * * * have not been putt to the uses the Law directs, It is therefore Ordered that the Law * * * be both duely observed and performed".{EN-1802}

• [1705] "[T]he * * * ffield officers and captains have full power and authority to appoint and imploy a clerk to attend them * * * , and to allow the said clerk such sallary for his said service, and for providing necessary books and paper for their use as in their discretion they shall think fit and reasonable, and to pay the same out of the penaltys and fines accrewing by th[e Militia] act.

" * * * [T]he * * * ffield officers and captains * * * have full power and authority to * * * dispose the tobaccoes which shall * * * accrew and arise upon the ffines, penaltys and fforfeitures * * * for paying * * * a clerk * * * , and for furnishing the severall troops and companys belonging to the county with necessary drums, colours, trumpets, leading staffes, partizans and halberts, and for procuring * * * books of military dissipline * * * , and after all these for providing arms and ammunition for the countys use with the overplus."{EN-1803}

• [1723] "[T]he * * * field officers and captains have full power and authority to appoint and employ a clerk to attend them at their meetings * * * and to allow the said clerk such salary * * * as in their discretion they shall think fit and reasonable, and to pay the same out of the penalties and fines accruing by this act.

" * * * [T]he * * * field officers and captains * * * have full power and authority to order and dispose of the fines, penalties, and forfeitures * * * for paying * * * a clerk, * * * and for furnishing the several troops and companies belonging to the county, with necessary drums, colours, trumpets, leading-staffs, partizans, and halberts, and after all those, for providing arms and ammunition for the county's use."{EN-1804}

• [1738] "[T]he field officers, and captains, of every county, * * * [shall] meet at the court-house of their counties * * * to hold a court martial * * * and to order and dispose of all * * * fines, in the first place, for buying drums, trumpets, and trophies, for the use of the troop or company from whence the same arise ; and afterwards, for supplying the militia with arms.

* * * * *

" * * * And, for settling the fines to be inflicted upon all persons who shall fail to do their duty, * * * and on all other delinquents * * * , Be it further enacted * * * , That * * * [certain] persons * * * , for such failure, shall forfeit and pay [certain] sums * * * ; one moiety * * * for and towards the better supplying the county with arms; and the other moiety to the informer, for his proper use."{EN-1805}

• [1748 and 1753] After setting out a list of fines for various breaches of duty by officers and soldiers in the Militia, the legislature mandated that "one moiety of all which forfeitures shall go * * * for and towards the better supplying with arms that county where such offence shall be committed, and the other moiety to him or them that will inform or sue for the same".{EN-1806}

• [1755] "[I]f * * * any soldier inlisted in the foot, is so poor, as not to be able to purchase the arms [required of a Militiaman] * * * ; then * * * [the county] court shall * * * send for the same to England * * * ; and if any person shall presume to buy or sell any such arms * * * , every person so buying or selling, shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds, * * * one moiety whereof shall be to, and for the use of the county, to which the arms shall belong, for the purchasing other arms, and the other moiety to the informer[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [S]uch court[-martial] shall and may * * * order the fines inflicted by this act * * * to be levied upon all delinquents * * * , and to order and dispose of all such fines, for buying drums, trumpets and trophies for the use of the militia of the county, and for supplying the militia of the said county with arms.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fine * * * imposed on the * * * chief commanding officer of the militia, for neglecting to order general musters, shall be one moiety to the informer, and the other to and for the use of the county, for providing arms[.]"{EN-1807}

• [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f * * * any soldier inlisted in * * * [a Militia] company is so poor as not to be able to purchase the arms [required of a Militiaman,] * * * [the county] court shall * * * immediately * * * send for the same to Great-Britain * * * ; and if any person shall presume to buy or sell any such arms, * * * every person so buying or selling shall forfeit and pay the sum of six pounds, *

* * one moiety whereof shall be to and for the use of the county to which the arms shall belong for the purchasing other arms, and the other moiety to the informer[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [I]t shall and may be lawful for the field officers and captains of every county * * * to hold a court martial, which court shall have power * * * to order the fines inflicted by th[e Militia] act * * * to be levied upon all delinquents * * * , and to order and dispose of all such fines for buying drums and trophies for the use of the militia of the county, and for supplying the militia of the said county with arms[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fine * * * imposed on the * * * chief commanding officer of the militia for neglecting to order general musters, shall be one moiety to the informer and the other to and for the use of the county for providing arms[.]"{EN-1808}

• [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[A]ll the fines inflicted by this act, and not otherwise directed, shall be one half * * * for and towards supplying with arms the militia of the county to which the offender belongs, and the other half to the informer[.]"{EN-1809}

• [1775] "[T]he captain of each company shall * * * appoint one drummer and one fifer, who shall be paid for their attendance * * * ; and the said captains shall provide drums, fifes, colours, and halberds, at the publick expense, to be reimbursed out of the fines * * * .

" * * * [E]very officer of the militia * * * shall, at all times he acts on duty, at any private or general muster, appear armed * * * , under the penalty of twenty shillings; and the said fines to be levied by a court-martial, and appropriated to the purchasing arms and ammunition for the use of such as are not able to procure the same.

* * * * *

" * * * [T]he fines imposed * * * on the chief officer [of the Militia] for not enlisting the men in his county, and on the commanding-officer present in the county for not appointing general musters, shall be to the use of the county, for providing arms[.]"{EN-1810}

• [1777] "If any soldier * * * be so poor that he cannot purchase * * * arms [required of Militamen], the * * * court[-martial] shall cause them to be procured at the expense of the publick, to be reimbursed out of the fines on the delinquents of the county * * * .

" * * * Each captain shall appoint a drummer and fifer to his company, and also shall provide a drum, fife, and colours for the same, at the publick expense, to be reimbursed out of the fines on the delinquents of his county.

* * * * *

> "All fines * * * shall be appropriated, in the first place, to the payment of the salaries [of certain Militia personnel] * * * , then to reimbursing the publick treasury for any arms purchased for the poor soldiers of such county, and for drums, fifes, and colours, bought for the several companies; and if any surplus remain, it shall be laid out by the court martial in establishing and furnishing, for the use of their county, a magazine of small arms, field pieces, ammunition, and such other military stores as may be useful in case of invasion or insurrection."{EN-1811}
>
> •[1784 and 1785] "If any private shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court * * * appointed for trying delinquencies * * * , that he is so poor that he cannot purchase the arms herein required, such court shall cause them to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents.
>
> * * * * *
>
> " * * * Every person belonging to the * * * light companies, shall wear while on duty, such caps and uniforms as the executive shall direct, to be purchased by the commanding officer of the county, out of the monies arising on delinquents."{EN-1812}

These provisions were not simply hortatory, but instead declaratory and compulsory. For example, when in 1772 Virginia's Governor "informed the Board [that is, the Council], that he had been applied to, to remit certain Militia Fines" and "ask[ed] their advice", "the Board gave it as their Opinion, that all such Fines being appropriated by the Act of Assembly to particular Purposes, it was not in his Excellency's Power to remit them".{EN-1813}

e. In sum, throughout the *pre-*constitutional era, Virginia Militia's relied heavily on fines—imposed on essentially every conceivable category of default and misbehavior—in order to maintain discipline. True enough, from time to time complaints arose that a Militia Act "hath proved very ineffectual, whereby the colony is deprived of its proper defence in time of danger"—but one need simply compare the degree of reliance on fines in the Act of 1738 about which this very complaint was registered{EN-1814} to the degree of such reliance in the Act of 1755 in which the complaint served as a preamble and through which the problem was to be rectified{EN-1815} in order to conclude that Virginia's legislators never doubted that the exaction of fines could effectively enforce discipline in her Militia. Of course, in times of extreme crisis, when the performance of Militia duties entailed the greatest personal risk, all too many individuals might have sought—and apparently did seek—to shirk their responsibilities. This led, however, not to legislators' denial of the efficacy of fines in principle, but to their multiplication of the fines' severity—as in 1781, when a statute mandated "[t]hat all the penalties inflicted by the [then-existing laws to regulate and discipline the militia and for providing against invasions and insurrections] * * * shall cease, and in lieu thereof

there shall be inflicted an additional penalty in the proportion of ten for one upon every officer, non-commissioned officer and private, for neglect or failure of duty".{EN-1816}

The use of fines simply made much too good sense ever to be questioned. First, fines were relatively easy to impose and collect—by courts-martial initially, then through normal judicial processes with which everyone was familiar. Second, fines were more objective, predictable, and therefore just than corporal punishment or imprisonment, because in most cases (at least where the fines were paid) exactly the same statutorily defined penalty would be imposed for the same offence, every time. Third, fines were very flexible instruments of discipline—for, depending upon the degree of deterrence or punishment desired, they could be made light or heavy; as circumstances changed, they could be altered; if errors occurred in the determination of alleged defaulters' guilt, they could be remitted in full (which could never happen when corporal punishment or imprisonment was imposed as a penalty); and in many cases they could serve as the prices that Militiamen voluntarily paid for exemptions from routine duties. Fourth, fines were eminently practical, because they helped to make the Militia self-financing, by hypothecating to its use the moneys collected—thus compelling defaulters to do their duty in a direct and tangible manner even when, and in fact because, they had earlier failed to do their duty in another way (a result impossible of achievement through corporal punishment or imprisonment).

So, if (as Virginia concluded on the basis of both political theory and practical experience) "a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state",[960] then fines must be among, if not in the forefront of, the means most "proper, natural, and safe" to guarantee that the Militia always remain "well regulated". Indeed, the use of fines to impose Militia discipline must be part of the historical—and now the constitutional—definition of "a well regulated militia".[961]

5. Other judicial remedies. The Militia's reliance on the civil courts was not restricted to the collection of fines. In addition, normal judicial processes were employed to recover arms that were misappropriated by Militiamen or others:

> [1784 and 1785] "If any private shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court * * * appointed for trying delinquencies * * * , that he is so poor that he cannot purchase the arms * * * required, such court shall cause them to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents. The arms so purchased * * * shall continue the property of the county * * * . And if any person concerned in selling, purchasing, concealing or removing such arms shall be prosecuted for the penalty, and

---

[960] Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) art. 13.

[961] See ante, at 63-81.

> * * * shall fail to make instant payment, or give security * * * , he shall suffer * * * corporal punishment * * * . And the * * * commanding officer * * * may recover any arms so sold, concealed, or removed, by action or petition in detinue or trover, with costs."{EN-1817}

And resort to the courts was had in order to recover the costs of arms that should have been provided to the Militia as the quid pro quo for exemptions from mustering that were granted to certain categories of individuals:

> • [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[T]he several persons * * * exempted from mustering (except ministers of the church of England, the president masters or professors, and students of William and Mary college, the keeper of the public goal, overseers and millers, and all workers in any mine whatsoever) shall provide arms for the use of the county, city, or borough wherein they * * * reside, in the following manner, that is to say: Each counsellor, not being an officer of the militia, four compleat sets of arms * * * for a soldier; the speaker of the house of burgesses, not being an officer of the militia, four compleat sets * * * ; the receiver-general, auditor, and secretary, not being a counsellor or officer of the militia, each four compleat sets * * * ; the attorney-general, not being an officer of the militia, two compleat sets * * * ; the clerk of the council and clerk of the secretary's office, not being officers of the militia, each two compleat sets * * * ; the mayor, recorder, and aldermen of the city of Williamsburg and borough of Norfolk, * * * not being officers of the militia, each two compleat sets * * * . And if they shall fail or refuse so to do, * * * the several courts of the counties wherein the[se] persons * * * shall reside * * * are * * * impowered and required to levy the value of the same on each of them respectively."{EN-1818}
>
> • [1762] "[T]he several persons herein after-mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective counties * * * : All his majesty's justices of the peace * * * (except such as * * * bear any commission as officers of the militia * * *) all persons bred to and actually practising physick or surgery, and all inspectors at the publick warehouses appointed for the inspection of tobacco; and they shall not be subject or liable to any fine, forfeiture or penalty, for absenting themselves from the same.
>
> " * * * Provided always, That the persons so exempted * * * shall provide complete sets of arms * * * required for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside; and if they shall fail or refuse so to do * * * then * * * the courts * * * are * * * required, to levy the value of such arms on each of them respectively."{EN-1819}
>
> • [1766 and 1771] "[T]he several persons herein after mentioned shall be * * * free and exempt from appearing or mustering either at the private or general musters of their respective counties * * * , that is to say, all his majesty's justices of the peace * * * (except such as * * * bear any

> commission as officers of the militia * * *) all persons bred to, and actually practising physic or surgery, all the people called Quakers, and all inspectors at the public warehouses, appointed for the inspection of tobacco; and they shall not be subject or liable to any fine, forfeiture or penalty, for absenting themselves from * * * musters * * * .
>
> " * * * Provided always, That the persons so exempted (not being Quakers) shall provide compleat sets of arms * * * required for soldiers, for the use of the county, city or borough, wherein they * * * reside: And if they shall fail or refuse so to do * * * then * * * the courts * * * are hereby impowered and required to levy the value of such arms on each of them respectively."{EN-1820}

C. Limitations on punishments. The imposition of fines and other penalties on Militiamen who were somehow derelict in the performance of their duties was never arbitrary or capricious. Neither were punishments imposed without affording the putative defaulters their opportunities for explanation, excuse, and exculpation. The basic principle of evidentiary due process in this regard was stated very early on:

> [1619] "All persons whatsoever upon the Sabaoth daye shall frequent divine service and sermons both forenoon and afternoon, and all suche as beare arms shall bring their pieces swordes, poulder and shotte. And every one that shall transgresse this lawe shall forfeite three shillings a time to the use of the churche, all lawful and necessary impediments excepted."{EN-1821}

Later, "lawful and necessary impediments" were explicitly set out in statutes, or left to alleged defaulters to raise and courts-martial to judge the reasonableness thereof on an ad hoc basis. All of them, though, were in that era (and remain today) familiar matters of legal common sense:

1. Statute of limitations. One such device was a limitation on the time for which the assessment of a fine could be delayed:

> [1705 and 1723] "That nothing * * * be construed to give any power or authority to the ffield officers and captains * * * to mulct any defaulter or offender for any default or offence whatsoever * * * which hath been made or done above a year[.]"{EN-1822}

Such a limitation does not appear in any of the later Militia Acts, obviously because Virginia's General Assembly considered it unnecessary—which indicates that the penalties imposed by those Acts were to a satisfactory degree timely enforced, so that few Militiamen could justifiably complain of being prosecuted for stale claims. For example, the Militia Act of 1738 dealt with two types of derelictions of duty. The first involved an immediate summary punishment:

> [E]very captain shall, once in three months, or oftner, if required, muster, train, and exercise his troop or company: And the county lieutenant, * * * in every county, shall cause a general muster and exercise of all the troops and companies within his county, to be made in the month of September, every year. And if any soldier, during the time he is in arms at a general muster, shall refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, it shall and may be lawful, to and for the chief commanding officer, then present, to cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time, not exceeding five minutes: And for a second offence * * * the offender shall be punished by the sentence of the majority of the field officers and captains, then present; who are hereby impowered * * * to commit the offender to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days.{EN-1823}

If these penalties were not enforced by the appropriate officer or officers "then present", they could not be enforced later on. The second type of default involved punishment after a hearing by a court-martial:

> [E]very captain * * * shall duly make a list of all the persons upon his muster roll, who * * * do not appear at any of the * * * musters, armed and accoutred, * * * and return the same * * * to the court-martial, to which he belongs.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * [T]he field officers, and captains, of every county * * * are hereby required to meet * * * on the day next following the general muster, then and there to hold a court martial; which * * * shall have power * * * to enquire * * * of all delinquents returned by the captains, for absence from musters, or appearing without arms and accoutrements; and to order the fines * * * to be levied upon all delinquents * * * . And after the holding of such court, the clerk shall make out copies of all their orders, and deliver the same, within one month next following the said court, to the sheriff of the county; who is * * * required to demand and receive the money or tobacco therein charged, of the persons made chargeable therewith[.]{EN-1824}

The court-martial immediately followed a general muster, and "then and there" heard complaints that arose out of derelictions of duty at that general muster or at the private musters that followed the preceding general muster. Obviously, if penalties for misbehavior at those musters were not enforced at that court-martial, they could not be enforced at a subsequent one. This was the pattern followed in the Militia Acts of 1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, 1771, 1775, and 1777.{EN-1825}

On the other hand, a Militia Act passed in 1779 emphasized the General Assembly's determination that liability for defaults and offences should not be allowed to lapse because of the accident that the event at issue occurred when one statute was in force, but a later court-martial could impose a fine only under the aegis of a superseding statute. Referring to earlier Acts "'for regulating and disciplining the militia'" and "'for providing against invasions and insurrections'", the Act of 1779 mandated that "[t]he said recited acts as far as they come within the perview of this act, stand hereby repealed, provided that any court-martial which may be held by virtue of this act, shall proceed upon all delinquencies committed or done before the passing of this act according to the said recited acts, and determine accordingly".{EN-1826} And to the end that offenses would not escape adjudication through mere procedural snags, a Militia Act passed in 1781 (and reaffirmed on this point in 1782) provided that > whereas there are many difficulties in bringing delinquent officers of the militia to punishment; It is * * * enacted, That any militia officer either on duty or not, for crimes relating to the duties of his office may be arrested in the same manner as is allowed by the law-martial, and when arrested shall be tried within the number of days prescribed by the continental articles of war, * * * and if the rank of the delinquent officer shall make it impossible to get a court-martial for his trial * * * , the governor * * * shall order a court-martial to be appointed out of the militia at large within any reasonable time, for the trial of the offender.{EN-1827}

2. Double jeopardy. This is an old principle in English law. As described by Blackstone, > the plea of auterfois acquit, or a former acquittal, is grounded on this universal maxim of the common law of England, that no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life, more than once, for the same offence. And hence it is allowed as a consequence, that when a man is once fairly found not guilty upon an indictment, or other prosecution, he may plead such acquittal in bar of any subsequent accusation for the same crime. * * *

>
> * * * [T]he plea of auterfois convict, or a former conviction for the same identical crime, though no judgment was ever given, or perhaps will be, * * * is a good plea in bar to an indictment. And this depends upon the same principle as the former, that no man ought to be twice brought in danger of his life for one and the same crime.[962]

---

[962] Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 4, at 329-330 (footnote omitted). See also W. Hawkins, A Treatise of The Pleas of the Crown, ante note 434, Book II, Chapter XXXV, § 1, at 368, and Chapter XXXVI, § 10, at 377. Of course, this principle is now incorporated in the clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution which provides: "nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb".

Although not all of the rules of English common law were adopted throughout the American Colonies,[963] this tenet did become part of Virginia's general law.[964] So it should not be surprising to find that various of Virginia's Militia Acts explicitly applied it, too:

> • [1755] "[I]f any inferior officer or soldier, during the time the militia shall be employed for suppressing any invasion or insurrection, * * * shall disobey the lawful commands of his superior officer, or behave himself refractorily, or shall be guilty of prophane swearing, drunkenness, or any such like offence, every person so offending, shall pay such fine* * * as by a court martial * * * shall be * * * imposed.
>
> " * * * Provided always, That no such person shall * * * be subject to a second trial for the same offence, after he hath been once condemned or acquitted thereof."{EN-1828}

> • [1757, 1758, 1759, 1761, 1762, 1764, 1766, 1769, and 1772] "[I]f any inferior officer or soldier during the time the militia shall be employed for suppressing any invasion or insurrection * * * shall disobey the lawful commands of his superior officer, or behave himself refractorily, every officer so offending shall pay such fine, not exceeding fifty pounds; and every soldier so offending shall pay such fine, not exceeding five pounds, as by a court martial * * * shall be imposed; * * * and if any inferior officer or soldier during the time the militia shall be employed as aforesaid, shall be guilty of prophane swearing, drunkenness, or any other like offence, every person so offending shall upon conviction thereof before a court martial * * * pay five shillings for every offence * * * . And no person shall be subject to a second trial for the same offence, after he hath been once condemned or acquitted thereof."{EN-1829}

3. Maximum number of fines allowable for the same type of offense. Perhaps peculiar to the Militia statutes were limitations on the number of times a Militiaman might be fined for the same type of default in duty:

> • [1705] "That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county once every year at least, cause a generall muster and exercise * * * , and that every captain * * * once in every three months, muster, train and exercise his troop or company, or oftener if occasion require.
>
> "Provided, That no soldier in horse or foot, be fined above five times in one year for neglect in appearing.
>
> * * * * *
>
> "And forasmuch as some difficulty hath been found in procuring some soldiers to be willing to serve as serjeants, corporals, drummers or

---

[963] See W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ante note 142, Volume 1, at 106-107.

[964] See Arthur P. Scott, Criminal Law in Colonial Virginia (Chicago, Illinois: University of Chicago Press, 1930), at 81-82, 102.

trumpters, all of them absolutely necessary in troops and companys: For prevention of the like in time to come,

"Be it enacted * * * , That whatsoever soldier shall refuse to take upon him, act in and execute any of the said places and offices in the troop or company wherein he is listed, being known to be capable and thereunto appointed by his captain, shall for such his refusall be fined five hundred pounds of tobacco, which once being paid, he shall thereafter be exempted from being fined for any such refusall."{EN-1830}

• [1723] "[T]o the end, the militia * * * may be the better fitted for service, Be it * * * enacted * * * , That the * * * chief officer of the militia of every county, once every year at least, cause a muster and exercise of all the troops and companies in his county * * * —And that every captain, once in every three months, muster, train, and exercise his troop or company, or oftner, if occasion require. Provided, that no officer or soldier be fined above five times in one year.

* * * * *

" * * * And forasmuch, as some difficulty hath been found in procuring some soldiers to be willing to serve as serjeants, corporals, drummers, or trumpeters, all of them absolutely necessary in troops and companies: For prevention of the like in time to come, Be it enacted * * * , That whatsoever soldier shall refuse to take upon him, act in, and execute any of the said places and offices, in the troop or company wherein he is listed, being known to be capable, and thereunto appointed by his captain, shall, for such his refusal, be fined five hundred pounds of tobacco; which being once paid, he shall thereafter be exempted from being fined for any such refusal."{EN-1831}

• [1738] "Every soldier refusing to serve as a serjeant, corporal, drummer, or trumpeter * * * shall pay fifty shillings, or five hundred pounds of tobacco, at his election; but such person shall be fined but once for such refusal. Every person listed to serve in the horse, shall pay seven shillings and six pence, or seventy five pounds of tobacco: And every person listed in the foot, shall pay five shillings, or fifty pounds of tobacco, at their election, for not appearing at muster, compleatly armed and accoutred; so that no person be fined above five times a year, for such failure."{EN-1832}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[Certain] persons * * * failing to do their duty * * * shall forfeit and pay * * * [certain] sums * * * . Provided, That no person be fined above six times in the year for any particular default[.]"{EN-1833}

As explained heretofore, this limitation functioned as a control which rank-and-file Militiamen could invoke against overzealous Militia officers.[965]

---

[965] See ante, at 635-638.

In some instances, however, the sequence of penalties a statute imposed made it impossible for any single individual to commit more than two offences of a certain kind at any one time:

> • [1723] "[I]f any solider * * * shall, at any * * * muster, disobey his officers' commands, or behave himself disorderly or refractorily thereat, it shall * * * be lawful for the chief commanding officer * * * to cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time not exceeding twenty minutes. And if such soldier shall thereafter offend, it shall * * * be lawful * * * to commit such offender to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days[.]"{EN-1834}

> • [1738] "[I]f any soldier, during the time he is in arms at a general muster, shall refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, it shall * * * be lawful, to and for the chief commanding officer * * * to cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time, not exceeding five minutes: And for a second offence, at such general muster, the offender shall be punished by the sentence of the majority of field officers and captains, then present; who are * * * impowered * * * to commit the offender to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days. And if any soldier, during the time he is in arms, at any private muster, shall misbehave, as aforesaid, such offender shall be punished by any field officer then present; or * * * by * * * a majority of the commission officers, then present * * * [who] are * * * impowered to cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time, not exceeding five minutes, for the first offence; and for the second offence, the majority of the commission officers, then present, are * * * impowered * * * to commit such offender to the county goal, there to remain for any time not exceeding ten days."{EN-1835}

In another instance, the procedure employed might preclude more than a single offence of a certain type at any one time:

> [1755] "[I]f any soldier, shall at any general or private muster, refuse to perform the commands of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at the courts martial, * * * it shall * * * be lawful * * * for the chief commanding officer, then present, to fine every such soldier, if an horseman, any sum not exceeding ten shillings, and if a footman, not exceeding seven shillings and six pence, which fine shall be immediately paid down to such officer; but in case any such offender shall not be able to pay down such fine immediately, then he shall give good security to such officer, for the payment of the same in three months. And in case such soldier so fined * * * shall refuse or fail to pay down his fine, or to give such security * * * , then it shall * * * be lawful, for such officer * * * to commit every such soldier to the county goal, there to remain without bail or mainprize, for any time not exceeding three days, and the offender * * * shall not be > thence discharged, until the lawful fees for commitment, imprisonment, and discharge, shall be fully paid and satisfied."{EN-1836}

In yet other instances, though, an indefinite number of punishments for an indefinite number of offences was apparently possible (although perhaps the very severity of the punishments would have deterred any but the hardiest or most reckless defaulter):

> [1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f any soldier shall, at any general or private muster, refuse to perform the command of his officer, or behave himself refractorily or mutinously, or misbehave himself at the courts martial * * * , it shall and may be lawful to and for the chief commanding officer, then present, to cause such offender to be tied neck and heels, for any time not exceeding five minutes, or inflict such corporal punishment as he shall think fit, not exceeding twenty lashes."{EN-1837}

4. Extensions of time to comply with statutory requirements. As to the most important particular of "a well regulated militia"—namely, having Militiamen suitably armed at all times—Virginia's General Assembly looked in the first instance to individual members of the Militia to provide their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements at their own expense through the free market.[966] But legislators also recognized that everyone could not always meet such requirements immediately, either because particular individuals sometimes lacked sufficient money in hand to purchase that equipment, or because some or all of the equipment was not always readily available in the marketplace. So the Militia Acts and officials' enforcement of them routinely mitigated the requirement by allowing the men various periods of grace in which to comply, before the statutory penalties for noncompliance would be invoked:

> • [1692] "It is * * * Ordered that the Comand^rs^ in Chief of their Ma^s^ Forces of this Colony doe take Care that the Laws for provideing of Armes and Amunition and appeareing at Musters be duely put in Execution on all those who have been formerly listed Souldiers and had time to be provided with Armes & c. [et cetera] but for that some persons have been lately listed who have not had time to be provided with Armes & c none being to be had but from England. It is Ordered that they be Exempted, and they are hereby Exempted from the penalty of the Law relateing thereto till after a Fleete of Ships hath gon from hence for England, and a return from thence made hither, it not being reasonable any person should be fined till after it hath been possible for him to be provided[.]"{EN-1838}

---

[966] See ante, Chapters 17 through 20.

• [1705] "That eighteen months time be given and allowed to each trouper and ffoot soldier not heretofore listed to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * & that no trooper or foot soldier be fined for appearing without or not having the same at his place of abode untill he hath been eighteen months listed[.]"{EN-1839}

• [1723] "That eighteen months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition, according to this act; and that no soldier be fined for appearing without, or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been listed eighteen months, * * * [s]o as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters with such arms as he is already furnished with."{EN-1840}

• [1738] "That eighteen months time be * * * allowed to each soldier to furnish and provide himself with arms and ammunition * * * : And that no soldier be fined for appearing without, or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been listed eighteen months * * * ; so as every soldier, during the said eighteen months, do appear at all musters, with such arms as he is already furnished with."{EN-1841}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[E]very * * * officer shall have twelve months allowed him after his promotion to such office, for the furnishing the arms [required] * * * , but in the mean time shall appear with such of the * * * arms, as he already hath. * * *

" * * * That twelve months time be given and allowed to each soldier, to furnish and provide himself with arms and amunition, * * * and that no soldier be fined for appearing without, or not having the same at his place of abode, until he hath been inlisted twelve months, * * * so as such soldier do appear at all musters, during the said twelve months, with such arms as he hath, and is already furnished with[.]"{EN-1842}

• [1775] "[T]he soldiers [in the Militia] shall be allowed six months after enlisting to provide themselves with arms, and in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have[.]"{EN-1843}

• [1777] "Every officer and soldier shall be allowed six months after his appointment or enrollment to provide such arms or accoutrements as he had not at the time."{EN-1844}

• [1784 and 1785] "[T]welve months after the commencement of this act[967] shall be allowed for providing the arms and accoutrements herein directed; but in the mean time, the militia shall appear at musters with, and keep by them the best arms and accoutrements they can get."{EN-1845}

---

967 The Act of 1785 allowed for "two years" of grace.

Important to observe here is that the limits on applications of the statutory penalties were themselves circumscribed in order to maximize the Militia's preparedness at every moment by taking full advantage of the resources then available in individuals' hands: "[s]o as every soldier * * * do appear * * * with such arms as he is already furnished with", "in the mean time shall bring with them such arms as they have", and "shall * * * keep by them the best arms * * * they can get". Limitations on the penalties wisely provided incentives for Militiamen to put to public use whatever arms they privately possessed or might obtain—thus rewarding them for fielding some arms that could temporarily serve the purpose at least marginally, rather than penalizing them for not already possessing or immediately acquiring arms particularly suitable for Militia service when they might not have been economically able to do so.

5. Sickness or other disability. Even for a normally able-bodied individual, the proof of a temporary physical disability was a valid excuse for a failure to perform Militia duty:

> • [1682] "[E]ach captain * * * shall once every month muster, treine, exercise, instruct and discipline the troop of soldiers under his command on paine to forfeite five hundred pounds of tobacco in caske for each time he shall neglect such muster or exercise unless occasioned by sickness."{EN-1846}
>
> • [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[W]here any person is returned a delinquent to a court martial, and shall not be able by reason of sickness, or other real disability to attend such court, to give in his reasonable excuse for such delinquency; it shall and may be lawful, for the succeeding court martial * * * wherein such person shall be returned a delinquent, upon such reasonable excuse then offered, to remit such fine or fines levied by the preceeding court-martial on such person[.]"{EN-1847}
>
> • [1776] "[W]here any soldier of the militia shall fail to appear at musters through sickness, the captain * * * of such company * * * shall and may hear any evidence offered on behalf of such person failing to attend, and admit the excuse, if to him it shall seem just[.]"{EN-1848}
>
> • [1777] "Each captain shall, at every muster, * * * note down the delinquencies occurring in his company, and make return thereof to the next court martial; but where any person is disabled by sickness from attending, the captain, * * * being satisfied thereof by testimony on oath * * * , shall not note down such non-attendance."{EN-1849}

6. Financial or other economic inability to comply. Because Virginia's Militiamen were generally required to obtain their own firearms, ammunition, and accoutrements in the free market by their own efforts and at their own expense,[968] situations could arise in which particular individuals, through no fault of their own, simply could not afford to purchase the necessary equipment. In these cases, their penury provided an immunity from the fines that would otherwise have been inflicted on them—and, indeed, justified the provision of arms to such poor Militiamen at public expense. Similarly, if for whatever reason arms were simply not readily available for purchase in or maintenance through the marketplace, a Militiaman would be excused for not having obtained them. Thus—

---

[968] See ante, Chapters 17 through 20.

> • [1690] "[A]s to the Militia the Comand^{rs} in Cheife * * * have used all their Endeavours to have the Soldiers armed pursuant to an Act of Assembly * * * which Inflicts fines on those that did not furnish themselves with Armes and a Certaine quantity of Amunition, but that many of the Foot Soldiers were soe Indigent by reason of the Low price of their onely Comodity Tob[acco] and now these times the same lyeing by some of them unsold for want of Shipps to Carry it away, that it was impossible for the Foot Sold^{rs} all Compleately to furnish themselves with Swords and Amunition by reason of their Indigency and those that were able could not have it for pay, it not being in the Country, And it appearing * * * that the offic^{rs} of the Militia have all along pressed the Soldiers to Equipe themselves according to Law, but for the reasons aforesaid could not accomplish it[.]"{EN-1850}
>
> • [1692] "It is * * * thought fitt and accordingly Ordered that the Comand^{rs} in Chief * * * doe take Care that the Laws for provideing of Armes and Amunition and appeareing at Musters be duely put in Execution on all those who have been formerly listed Souldiers and had time to be provided with Armes * * * but for that some persons have been lately listed who have not had time to be provided with Armes * * * none being to be had but from England. It is Ordered that they be Exempted * * * from the penalty of the Law relateing thereto till after a Fleete of Ships hath gon from hence for England, and a return from thence made hither, it not being reasonable any person should be fined till after it hath been possible for him to be provided[.]"{EN-1851}
>
> • [1692] "Complaint being made * * * by the Comand^{rs} in Chief * * * that the Souldiers under their Comands cannot get their Guns fixt, the Smiths refuseing to worke for Tobacco, and for that the same may be of very bad Consequence in these times of danger, It is Ordered that the respective Smiths in this Colony doe without delay fix all Armes shall be brought them by any of the Souldiers * * * , keepe an account of the Worke done and for whom, and returne the same to the next Gen^{ll} Assembly that then such care may be taken for payment thereof, as shall be found fitt."{EN-1852}
>
> • [1740] "[I]t shall * * * be lawful, to and for the several courts martial, * * * to excuse and acquit any soldier, who [s]hall not, within twelve months from the passing of this act, be furnished and provided with arms * * * and whom they, in their consciences, shall believe and adjudge to be unable to furnish and provide the same, from the fines and forfeitures inflicted * * * for want thereof[.]"{EN-1853}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]f it shall be made to appear to the court of any county, by the * * * chief commanding officer in the county, and captain of any company,[969] that any soldier inlisted in the foot, is so poor, as not to be able to purchase the arms [statutorily required of Militiamen] * * * ; then such court shall * * * send for the same to England, * * * and * * * levy the charge thereof in the next county levy[.]"{EN-1854}

• [1775] "[E]very militia man * * * shall furnish himself with a good rifle, if to be had, or otherwise with a * * * common firelock * * * and shall constantly keep by him one pound of powder and four pounds of ball, to be produced whenever called for by his commanding officer.

"Provided always, That no person shall be subject to the penalties * * * inflicted, for the not providing or producing the quantity of powder required, who shall make it appear to the court-martial that he has used his best endeavours to procure such powder, and hath not been able to do so; also, if it be certified by a court-martial that any soldier enlisted is so poor as not to be able to purchase the arms aforesaid, then such arms shall * * * be procured as soon as may be, at the expense of the publick."{EN-1855}

• [1777] "If any soldier be certified to the court martial to be so poor that he cannot purchase * * * arms, the said court shall cause them to be procured at the expense of the publick, to be reimbursed out of the fines on the delinquents of the county[.]"{EN-1856}

• [1784 and 1785] "If any private shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court[-martial] * * * appointed for trying delinquencies * * * , that he is so poor that he cannot purchase the arms * * * required, such court shall cause them to be purchased out of the money arising from delinquents."{EN-1857}

7. Other reasonable excuses. Being highly realistic and eminently practical people, Virginians during the *pre-*constitutional era recognized that unpredictable and even unique circumstances could provide justifiable excuses for individuals' failures to perform their Militia duties. So Virginia's statutes allowed for the acceptance in mitigation of punishment of essentially any reasonable explanation for a default:

• [1705 and 1723] "And to the end that no wilfull and obstinate defaulter or offender * * * may escape the penalty * * * for his default or offence,

---

[969] The Act of 1757 and its continuations thereafter required that the matter of financial disability "shall be certified to the court of any county, by order of the court-martial".

"Be it enacted, * * * That all captains of troops and foot companys * * * be * * * strictly required and injoyned, at every muster (generall and particular) to take or cause to be taken an exact account in writing of every * * * default or offence made or committed in his troop or company * * * .

* * * * *

"And because severall persons may happen to be charged with default or offence * * * who are not wilfully guilty thereof, or may have a fair and just excuse for their not complying with this act—

"For remedy in such cases,

"Be it enacted * * * , That whensoever any soldier charged with a default or offence * * * can and doth shew forth to the * * * ffield officers and captains * * * such matter and cause that he ought not to be fined for the same as they shall judge reasonable, and be convinced withall before he be actually fined, it shall be lawfull for the * * * ffield officers and captains * * * to admit of such soldiers excuse and to lay no mulct or ffine upon him for such default or offence[.]"{EN-1858}

Central was these statutes' explicit concern—reiterated in other language in subsequent Militia Acts—that "no wilfull and obstinate defaulter or offender * * * escape", or (on the other hand) that those "not wilfully guilty" or with "a fair and just excuse" not be punished, and that a putative offender's judges should accept in exoneration any "matter and cause" that appeared "reasonable" to them. Virginia's Militia inflicted punishments, not on the basis of strict liability, but as a consequence of some intentional dereliction of duty. (Of course, inasmuch as a "reasonable excuse" was an affirmative defense to an admitted failure to perform some duty, the burden of proof in every case lay on the offender.)

• [1738] "[T]he field officers, and captains, of every county, * * * [shall] meet at the court-house of their counties * * * to hold a court martial; which said court shall * * * enquire * * * of all delinquents * * * for absence from musters, or appearing without arms and accoutrements; and to order the fines * * * to be levied upon all delinquents, who shall not make out some just excuse for not performing their duty[.]"{EN-1859}

• [1755, 1757, 1759, 1762, 1766, and 1771] "[I]t shall and may be lawful for the field officers and captains of every county * * * to meet at the court-house of their counties, * * * the day next following the general muster * * * every year, * * * to hold a court martial, * * * to enquire * * * of all delinquents returned by the captains, for absence from musters, or appearing without arms and accoutrements. * * * And such court shall and may * * * order the fines inflicted by this act * * * to be levied upon all delinquents who shall not make out some just excuse, for not performing their duty[.]

* * * * *

" * * * [P]ersons * * * failing to do their duty * * * shall forfeit and pay the several sums following * * * ; that is to say, the lieutenant of any county, * * * failing to appoint a general muster * * * [twice] in every year, not having a reasonable excuse, shall for every such failure, forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds[.]"{EN-1860}

• [1775] "[E]very officer of minute-men who shall absent himself either from battalion duty or the private musters, in their counties, without sufficient excuse, to be judged of and allowed by a court-martial, shall be subject to * * * fines * * * . And for non-attendance at private musters, without a sufficient excuse, * * * the officers and minute-men shall * * * be subject to * * * fines * * * .

"Provided always, That the commanding officer or captain of any company may, when occasion shall require, give leave of absence to any inferiour officer or minute-man; but they shall not be entitled to pay during such absence.

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very officer or militia man, and every officer and minute-man, who shall refuse, or unreasonably delay, conforming to * * * [certain] directions [with respect to invasions or insurrections], in every particular, shall, for every refusal or delay, forfeit and pay [certain] sums * * * .

* * * * *

" * * * [E]very captain * * * failing to return the list of persons who shall not appear at muster to the courts-martial, or who shall appear without proper arms, powder, and ball, shall forfeit and pay ten pounds; provided, if the person so failing shall, at the next court-martial, or in the case of his inability to attend at the succeeding court-martial, offer a reasonable excuse for any such delinquencies, such excuse shall and may be admitted, and the party complained of discharged of all and every the penalties aforesaid."{EN-1861}

• [1777] "The court[-martial] * * * shall * * * inquire * * * into all delinquencies * * * , and where no reasonable excuse for the same is made to appear to them, shall give judgment for the penalties * * * . But if it shall appear to the * * * court martial that any person fined for * * * delinquency was unable to attend the court, by which he was fined, and had reasonable excuse for the delinquency, such fine shall be remitted."{EN-1862}

• [1777] "[F]or the more speedy and certain completion of * * * new battalions, every county, city, and borough [with certain exceptions] * * * , in case the * * * officers by them appointed * * * shall not * * * enlist the quota of men allotted to [them] * * * , shall make up such deficiency by draughts, to be taken from their respective militias * * * .

" * * * And every commanding officer failing to summon the field officers and magistrates [for that purpose] * * * shall forfeit and pay five hundred pounds; and every field officer and magistrate failing to attend *

* * shall for each failure, without a sufficient excuse, forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred pounds[.]"{EN-1863}

• [1777] "The several divisions of the militia of any county shall be called into duty by regular rotation * * * ; and every person failing to attend when called on, or to send an able bodied man in his room, shall, unless there be good excuse, be considered as a deserter, and suffer accordingly."{EN-1864}

• [1780] "If any non-commissioned officer or soldier [in the Militia] shall fail to attend when summoned, not having a just and reasonable excuse, or refuse to march when ordered into actual service according to his tour of duty, or find an able bodied man in his room, * * * such offender shall serve as a regular soldier in the troops of the state eight months[.]"{EN-1865}

• [1781] "Every militia-man ordered into actual service, who shall refuse and neglect to appear * * * without a reasonable excuse, or produce an able-bodied substitute to serve in his room * * * shall * * * be declared a regular soldier for six months, and shall * * * be delivered to a continental officer for that purpose * * * . And for the due conviction of all such delinquents, a court-martial shall * * * be held * * * , under the penalty of ten thousand pounds of tobacco on such county lieutenant or commanding officer neglecting to order the same, and of five thousand pounds of tobacco upon every member of such court failing to attend without a reasonable excuse."{EN-1866}

8. Authority of the Militia to inquire into the circumstances of possible incapacities and defaults. Naturally, where evidence of an intentional dereliction of duty was determinative of the propriety of fining a Militiaman, Militia officers were authorized to investigate the situation. As just explained, such an investigation could have been requested by an alleged defaulter himself, seeking to prove that he had a "reasonable" excuse for his neglect of duty. But Militia officers and courts-martial were also authorized to conduct inquiries on their own initiatives:

• [1684] The Governor and his Council "ordered, that Letters be writt unto the militia officers of every respective County forthwith to render to his Excellency y^{e} condition of their militia, what number they consist of, both horse and foot, as likewise how furnished with armes[.]"{EN-1867}

• [1690] "Ordered, that the Respective Comand^{rs} in Cheife, should as soone as Conveniently they Could, return an acco^{t} * * * of the Severall Cap^{ts} of Horse and Foot, and the numb^{r} of Soldiers under every of their Comands, and how furnished[.]"{EN-1868}

• [1691] The Lieutenant Governor ordered the sherriffs to inform "the respective Cap^{ts} of Horse, Dragoones and foot within yo^{r} County, to return * * * an Exact List of the Names of the Souldiers under their

